[10] The High Court held that the will did not have a public character or an indefinite life and its provisions did not discriminate against one or more sectors of society but rather, against certain descendants. Furthermore, it analysed the terms of section 8 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[9] (Equality Act), and its prohibition of unfair discrimination on the grounds of gender, which is stated to include "the system of preventing women from inheriting family property"[10] and "any practice . . . which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men".[11] The High Court considered that this issue did not engage any testamentary "system" or "practice" as contemplated by the Equality Act, and that it would be strained to view it as such, as opposed to a once-off, private testamentary disposition by the testators.[12]

[11] The High Court concluded that in balancing the right to equality and the right to freedom of testation, allowing the former to trump the latter would produce an arbitrary result and would constitute a broad incursion into the fundamental constitutional right to property.[13] The High Court directly applied the Constitution to clause 7 and found that the terms of the fideicommissum infringed on the applicants' right to equality. It went on to consider, without finding that clause 7 was a law of general application, whether the discriminatory provision was a justifiable infringement on the right to equality in terms of section 36 of the Constitution.[14] Upon conducting a justification analysis, it held that the limitation of the second to sixth applicants' right to equality effected by clause 7 of the will was reasonable and justifiable given the importance accorded to freedom of testation. It

[9] 4 of 2000.

[10] Section 8(c) of the Equality Act.

[11] Section 8(d) of the Equality Act.

[12] High Court judgment above n 5 at para 53.

[13] Id at para 69.

[14] Id at paras 71-6.

held that the constitutional challenge to clause 7 should fail and that the impugned clause was also not so unreasonable and offensive so as to be contrary to public policy.[15]

[12] The second issue turned on the interpretation of "male descendants" in clause 7. The High Court held that the proper interpretation of clause 7 was that the testators intended to limit the beneficiaries to the third generation, being their great-grandsons.[16] In the result, the High Court dismissed the claims of the second to sixth applicants and the fourth to eighth respondents with no order as to costs.

Supreme Court of Appeal

[13] The applicants appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeal. Their appeal was heard and dismissed on 13 November 2018. That Court gave no written reasons for its order. In this regard, I endorse the statements of my brother Jafta J, that the failure of the Supreme Court of Appeal to give reasons here is unfortunate.[17]

In this Court

Applicants' submissions

[14] The applicants submit that clause 7 unfairly discriminates against women. They contend that when a provision in a private will unfairly discriminate against female descendants in an out-and-out disinheritance clause,[18] it ought to be struck down by a court on the grounds of public policy. Furthermore, they submit that the High Court erred in its interpretation of the words "male descendants" as being limited to great-grandsons.

[15] Id at paras 71-81.

[16] Id at para 103.

[17] Second judgment at [105].

[18] Concisely defined, out-and-out disinheritance means the absolute exclusion of an individual or individuals from inheriting in terms of a will.

[15] In terms of the discrimination issue, the applicants submit that the High Court incorrectly characterised the right to freedom of testation. Particularly, the extent to which it is protected under the Constitution. They contend that the right to equality should be considered as the right which requires greater protection in the circumstances. The applicants also challenge the distinction reinforced by the High Court between public charitable testamentary trusts and out-and-out disinheritance clauses in private wills. They submit that different consequences should not apply between the two instruments, particularly given that courts do indeed strike down discriminatory provisions in private contracts that are against public policy. The applicants posit that the right to equality reflects current public policy in South Africa, while the right to freedom of testation does not serve a similar purpose.

[16] On the interpretation issue, the applicants contend that the words "male descendants" should be given their ordinary meaning and, therefore, include successive generations, which includes the grandsons of the deceased. This would not defeat the purpose of clause 7. Instead, this would give due regard to the context of the will and would not create a departure from the ordinary meaning of the words.

Respondents' submissions

[17] The first to third respondents oppose the application on the following grounds: (a) the history and circumstances of the will do not render this matter appropriate for adjudication by this Court on the issue of the validity of discriminatory provisions in a private will of this nature; (b) granting relief will result in benefits being awarded arbitrarily to one group of female descendants; and (c) this matter gives rise to the typical situation envisaged by the High Court where testators' last wishes "are second-guessed by a court which might have little inkling as to why"[19] the testators provided as they did.

[19]High Court judgment above n 5 at para 61.

[18] In respect of the discrimination issue, the respondents submit that there is no prospect that this Court will conclude that unfair discrimination on gender within a private will, in the absence of a specific justification for disinheriting potential beneficiaries, cannot be justified under section 36 of the Constitution. The respondents aver that there are critical distinctions between how courts should treat public and private testamentary dispositions.[20] In terms of the interpretation issue, this merely involves the application of trite and unchallenged principles of testamentary dispositions.

Issues

[19] The preliminary issue is whether leave to appeal should be granted. The substantive issues are: (a) the proper interpretation of clause 7; (b) whether clause 7 is unfairly discriminatory against women; and (c) whether it is enforceable. These issues usher in the question whether a discriminatory out-and-out disinheritance provision in a private will can be declared unenforceable based on public policy. The final issue is whether clause 7 itself is contrary to public policy as underpinned by our constitutional values and thus warrants this Court's intervention.

Leave to appeal

[20] The issue whether unfair discriminatory provisions in a private will, which discriminate against females in an out-and-out disinheritance clause, should be considered unenforceable on public policy grounds, engages this Court's jurisdiction as a constitutional matter on two fronts.[21] First, this Court has accepted that what constitutes public policy is determined "by reference to the values that underlie our constitutional democracy as given expression by the provisions of the Bill of Rights".[22] Second, in terms of section 39(2) of the Constitution, this Court has recognised that the development of the common law in line with the values of the Constitution also constitutes a constitutional issue.[23]

[20] The respondents claim that the strength of the Supreme Court of Appeal's reasoning in Harvey N.O. v Crawford N.O. [2018] ZASCA 147; 2019 (2) SA 153 (SCA) strongly weighs against the applicants' prospects of success.

[21] Section 167(3)(b)(i) of the Constitution.

[22] Barkhuizen v Napier [2007] ZACC 5; 2007 (5) SA 323 (CC); 2007 (7) BCLR 691 (CC) at para 29.

[21] The next hurdle is whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. This requires balancing an array of factors including reasonable prospects of success, which is not determinative but is a weighty factor.[24] Other relevant factors include: the importance of the issue;[25] whether a decision by this Court is desirable;[26] and the public interest in the determination of the issue.[27] The question whether courts ought to intervene where there are allegations of unfair discrimination in private testamentary bequests that seek to be enforced in the constitutional dispensation, warrants this Court's attention. This Court has never been called upon to grapple with alleged discriminatory private out-and-out disinheritance testamentary provisions whilst balancing freedom of testation against equality under the umbrella of public policy. This balancing act and the determination of the issue at hand is of interest to the broader public. Therefore, it is in the interests of justice that leave to appeal be granted.

[23] K v Minister of Safety and Security [2005] ZACC 8; 2005 (6) SA 419 (CC); 2005 (9) BCLR 835 (CC) at para 17; Phoebus Apollo Aviation CC v Minister of Safety and Security [2002] ZACC 26; 2003 (2) SA 34 (CC); 2003 (1) BCLR 14 (CC) at paras 3 and 9; and S v Boesak [2000] ZACC 25; 2001 (1) SA 912 (CC); 2001 (1) BCLR 36 (CC) at para 15(b).

[24] General Council of the Bar of South Africa v Jiba [2019] ZACC 23; 2019 JDR 1194 (CC); 2019 (8) BCLR 919 (CC) at para 36.

[25] De Reuck v Director of Public Prosecutions [2003] ZACC 19; 2004 (1) SA 406 (CC); 2003 (12) BCLR 1333 (CC) at para 3.

[26] Id.

[27] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa [2011] ZACC 6; 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC); 2011 (7) BCLR 651 (CC) 2011 at para 53 and Radio Pretoria v Chairperson of Independent Authority of South Africa [2004] ZACC 24; 2005 (4) SA 319 (CC); 2003 (3) BCLR 231 (CC) at para 22.

Analysis

[22] I now deal with the merits of the appeal. The essential question raised by this matter is whether the impugned fideicommissary provision in a private will that bequeaths the property only to male descendants is contrary to public policy and therefore unenforceable. To answer this question, I will begin by considering the current common law position and examples of testamentary bequests which our law has thus far deemed to be contrary to public policy and unenforceable.

The common law position of testate succession in South Africa

[23] Generally, it is accepted that testators have the freedom to dispose of their assets in a manner they deem fit, except insofar as the law places restrictions on this freedom.[28] It is well established that there are various restrictions on freedom of testation. These include: (a) effect will not be given to testamentary dispositions which are illegal, contrary to public policy or vague;[29] (b) the maintenance and education of a parent's children constitute a claim against such a parent's deceased estate;[30]and (c) restrictions imposed by legislation.[31]

Pre-constitutional dispensation

[24] During the pre-constitutional dispensation, "South African testators enjoyed almost unlimited testamentary freedom and courts were generally loath to interfere with testamentary bequests that were capable of being carried out".[32]

[28] De Waal and Schoeman-Malan in Law of Succession above n 1 at 3.

[29] See for instance Minister of Education v Syfrets Trust Ltd N.O. 2006 (4) SA 205 (C) (Syfrets) at para 22; and Aronson v Estate Hart 1950 (1) SA 539 (A); [1950] 2 All SA 13 (A) at 555-6.

[30] Ex Parte Insel 1952 (1) SA 71 (T) at 75; Glazer v Glazer 1963 (4) SA 694 at 707; and *Hoffmann v Herdan N.O.*1982 (2) SA 274 at 275.

[31] This includes: The Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990; The Trust Property Control Act 57 of 1988; and the Pension Funds Act 24 of 1956.

[32] Du Toit "Constitutionalism, Public Policy and Discriminatory Testamentary Bequests – A Good Fit Between Common Law and Civil Law in South Africa's Mixed Jurisdictions" (2012) 27 Tulane European & Civil Law Forum at 114.

[25] The common law rule was that testamentary bequests that were considered contrary to public policy were unenforceable. This public policy test was flexible and gave testators considerable latitude to include discriminatory clauses in their bequests.[33] A notable case is Aronson, in which the testator provided for a forfeiture of benefits should a beneficiary "marry a person not born in the Jewish faith or forsake the Jewish faith".[34] The forfeiture clause was challenged on various grounds including whether the forfeiture provision was against public policy.[35] The Appellate Division held that it was not contrary to public policy. It reasoned that a marriage of that nature would increase tensions, could lead to irreconcilable differences, and would have an unsettling effect on children. Furthermore, in that case, Greenberg JA went on to state that "I know of no principle in law which would make it contrary to public policy for the testator to attempt (according to his rights) to safeguard his descendants against these perils".[36]

[26] However, in other cases involving private wills, certain conditions attached to bequests were deemed contrary to public policy. For instance, in Levy,[37] a testator provided that one of his daughters would only receive benefits if her marriage was dissolved by death or "through any other cause".[38] The Court held that a provision in a will which was calculated to break up an existing marriage was contra bonos mores (against public morals) and therefore invalid. In terms of that provision, that Court held "it was difficult to imagine

[33] Id.

[34] Aronson above n 29 at 540.

[35] Id at 546. These other grounds outlined were twofold. Firstly, it was void for uncertainty, and, secondly, it amounted to a nude prohibition.

[36] Id. See further the concurrence by Van den Heever JA. This approach was criticised by various academics, see for instance, Hahlo "Jewish Faith and Race Clauses in Wills – A Note on Aronson v Estate Hart 1950 1 SA 539 (A)" (1950) 67 SALJ 231 at 239-240 and Corbett et al The Law of Succession in South Africa 2 ed (Juta and Company, Cape Town, 2002) at 130-1.

[37] Levy N.O. v Schwartz, N.O. 1948 (4) SA 930 (W).

[38] Id at 498.

provisions in a will more repugnant to public policy".[39] The impugned condition was deemed unenforceable and the daughter was able to inherit unconditionally.

[27] In the context of public wills, testators were afforded considerable scope in the realm of charitable trusts to limit certain benefits on various grounds. In Marks,[40] the testator created a trust for the payment of bursaries to students at a university but stipulated that the recipient must be a "Jew or Jewess (not a converted)" and the bursary would lapse "if the grantee prove religiously inclined".[41] A challenge on the basis that the condition was vague and contrary to public policy was unsuccessful. The Appellate Division held that there was sufficient certainty and that, regarding the public policy issue, it was not framed in peremptory terms and it was difficult to ascertain the intention of the testator.[42] In doing so, the court in Marks reinforced the primacy of freedom of testation in the context of public charitable trusts and consequently, condoned limits on potential beneficiaries on particular grounds.

[28] However, there were outliers, for instance, the High Court's decision in the matter of William Marsh, albeit in the context of the Trust Property Control Act, not the common law,[43] where Mr Marsh executed a will in 1899 to create a trust providing for a home for destitute white children. During the 1970's, the Methodist Church began to administer the homes and over time, as a result of changes within the socio-economic landscape, there

[39] Id at 499.

[40] Marks v Estate Gluckman 1946 AD 289.

[41] Id at 294.

[42] Id at 310. Tindall JA states that "In my opinion, it cannot be said that the provision in clause 7, giving the administrator this discretion, is contrary to public policy merely because it advises him to cancel the bursary 'if the grantee prove religiously inclined'. There is some difficulty in determining the precise meaning of these words. If they are directed against the use of a bursary for the purpose of qualifying for a religious career, the advice to the administrator is not contrary to public policy. . .".

[43] Ex Parte President of the Conference of the Methodist Church of Southern Africa: in re William Marsh Will Trust 1993 (2) SA 697 (C) (Willam Marsh) per Berman J and Seligson AJ. At 702 Berman J states that "it is to my mind fortunately unnecessary for the Court to consider the application on the basis of the common law approach".

came to be a dearth of destitute white children.[44] As a result, the Church applied in terms of section 13 of the Trust Property Control Act to delete the word "white".[45] The Court, based on section 13, held that the intention of the testator was frustrated by the racial prohibition and that the racial limitation was contrary to public policy since it would not be in the public interest for children of other races to be excluded from accessing children's homes for the destitute. The Court held that it was in the public interest and in accordance with public policy, that the discriminatory provisions be removed.[46] In light of the discriminatory provision in the will, the court made an order in favour of the applicants to the effect that the term "white" be removed from the phrase "white destitute children". However, it is important to note that these cases were all before the enactment of the Constitution, whereupon the position changed.

Common law position under the constitutional dispensation

[29] Since the advent of the Constitution, testamentary bequests have been challenged on the basis of public policy as infused by constitutional values. In particular, decisions have emerged in which courts have intervened in matters dealing with public charitable trusts.

[30] In Syfrets, a will and codicil executed in 1920 created a charitable testamentary trust that was established in the 1960's, under which bursaries to study abroad had been provided for "deserving students with limited or no means".[47] The eligibility of the bursaries was restricted to persons of "European descent" and excluded persons of "Jewish descent" and "females of all nationalities". The High Court was asked to delete the discriminatory criteria (in this case, race, religion, and gender). Applying established common law

[44] Id at 700.

[45] Id.

[46] Id.

[47] Syfrets above n 29 at para 1.

principles, the court considered whether the impugned provisions were against public policy. In doing so, it noted that in the constitutional era public policy was rooted in the Constitution and the values it enshrines.[48] The Court, therefore, considered whether the provisions constituted unfair discrimination and if so, whether they were contrary to public policy. The High Court held that the provisions constituted indirect discrimination on the basis of race as well as direct discrimination on the grounds of religion and gender. The Court proceeded to apply the Harksen[49] test, and balanced competing constitutional values and principles of public policy.[50] It also noted the public nature of the trust,[51] and concluded that "the testamentary provisions in question constitute unfair discrimination. Accordingly, it concluded that they were contrary to public policy as reflected in the foundational values of non-racialism, non-sexism, and equality".[52] It held that it was therefore empowered to vary the trust and delete the offending provisions.

[31] In Emma Smith,[53] a will executed in 1938 created a charitable trust which was designated for the "higher education" of "European girls born of British South African or Dutch South African parents who have been resident in Durban".[54] They had to be "poor" and, but for such assistance, "unable to pursue their studies".[55] The matter hinged on whether the trust could be varied to delete the racially restrictive provision in terms of section 13 of the Trust Property Control Act. The Supreme Court of Appeal focused on whether the impugned trust provisions were in conflict with the public interest. In doing

[48] Id at para 24.

[49] Harksen v Lane N.O. [1997] ZACC 12; 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC).

[50] Id at paras 33 and 39.

[51] Id at para 46.

[52] Id at para 47.

[53] Curators Ad Litem to Certain Potential Beneficiaries of Emma Smith Educational Fund v The University of KwaZulu-Natal [2010] ZASCA 136; 2010 (6) SA 518 (SCA) (Emma Smith).

[54] Id at para 8. The parties agreed that "'European' is an obsolete reference to white South Africans".

[55] Id.

so, it considered section 9 of the Constitution,[56] the Equality Act and the Higher Education Act.[57] It stated that "in the public sphere there can be no question that racially discriminatory testamentary dispositions will not pass constitutional muster".[58] It noted that the university, in administering the trust, would operate "in the public sphere" and therefore, must act consistently with public policy as well as constitutional values. The Supreme Court of Appeal held:

> "The constitutional imperative to remove racially restrictive clauses that conflict with public policy from the conditions of an educational trust intended to benefit prospective students in need and administered by a publicly funded educational institution such as a University, must surely take precedence over freedom of testation, particularly given the fundamental values of our Constitution and the constitutional imperative to move away from our racially divided past."[59]

[56] Section 9 of the Constitution reads:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
>
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
>
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.
>
> (5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[57] 101 of 1997.

[58] Emma Smith above n 53 at para 38. See further para 37 which endorses Cameron et al Honore's South African Law of Trusts 5 ed (Juta and Company, Cape Town 2002) 171-2:

> "The Bill of Rights applies to all law including the law relating to charitable trusts. . . the objects of a trust will have to conform with the disavowal of unfair discrimination under the 1996 Constitution and the Equality Act, which envisage equality even in person-to-person relations".

[59] Id at para 42.

[32] Similarly, BOE Trust[60] concerned a trust created in a will executed in 2002 in which the testator provided for the trust income to go towards bursaries to assist "white South African students" to study abroad on condition that the recipient "must return to South Africa". The trustees approached the court for an order to delete the word "white" from the trust deed. Although both parties accepted that the condition unfairly discriminated against potential beneficiaries on the basis of race, the High Court held that it was not clearly contrary to public policy. The court went on to state that "it is recognised that discrimination designed to achieve a legitimate government purpose is not unfair".[61] The High Court considered that the testator may have had a legitimate objective – to counter the brain drain,[62] but, there was no firm finding in this regard.[63] The Supreme Court Appeal affirmed the principle of freedom of testation but held that it was "not absolute".[64]

[33] From this analysis, it is evident that discriminatory testamentary bequests in public trusts have been tested against the robust yardstick of public policy. However, our courts to date have only applied this to: (a) testamentary forfeiture clauses (even in the private context, often in the form of resolutive or negative potestative conditions); and (b) public charitable trusts. A public policy challenge to out-and-out disinheritance cases in the private sphere is, therefore, novel. The question that arises is whether these types of provisions are contrary to public policy under our constitutional dispensation. This, in turn, begs the question, whether the common law should be developed to address discriminatory

[60] BOE Trust Ltd N.O. (in their capacities as co-trustees of the Jean Pierre De Villiers Trust 5208/2006) [2012] ZASCA 147; 2013 (3) SA 236 (SCA) (BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment).

[61] BOE Trust Ltd N.O. 2009 (6) SA 470 (WCC) (BOE Trust High Court judgment) at para 14.

[62] Id at para 15 where it stated:

> "During the post-constitutional years must has been said and written about the increasing trend amongst white graduates of our universities to emigrate, upon the completion of their education, thereby depriving the country of benefit of their skills obtained at the expense of the South African tertiary-education system."

[63] Id at para 17.

[64] BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 28.

provisions in out-and-out disinheritance testamentary provisions in private wills. I will consider the first issue for determination namely, the interpretation of clause 7.

The golden rule of interpretation

[34] The point of departure when interpreting wills is "to ascertain the wishes of the testator from the language used in the will".[65] Courts are obliged to give effect to the wishes of the testator unless they are prevented by some law from doing so. The "golden rule" for the interpretation of wills and this inherent limitation is famously described as follows in Robertson:

> "The golden rule for the interpretation of testaments is to ascertain the wishes of the testator from the language used. And when these wishes are ascertained, the court is bound to give effect to them, unless we are prevented by some rule or law from doing so."[66]

[35] If one considers clause 7 of the will, the clear interpretation of "male descendants" is to provide for sons only, after the first generation. No armchair or extrinsic evidence was put before this Court to consider otherwise. Therefore, in giving effect to the wishes of the testators from the language used it is clear that as far as the second and third generations are concerned, they intended for the fideicommissary beneficiaries to be male descendants, and thus, for benefits not to devolve upon any of their female descendants.

[36] The next question to consider is whether this Court is barred from giving effect to the testators' intention by any rule or law. The analysis above canvassed some of our

[65] Robertson v Robertson Executors 1914 SA 503 (AD) at 507. This dictum was quoted with approval in the context of a fideicommisssum by Watermeyer JA in Jewish Colonial Trust Ltd v Estate Nathan 1940 AD 163 at 183.

[66] Robertson id at 507.

The common law has developed additional rules to guide courts when using the golden rule. These include, the "general scheme of the will," and the dominant clause must be ascertained. "The plain meaning rule" stipulates that ordinary words must attain their ordinary meaning and technical words their technical meaning. See further Corbett, Hofmeyr (eds) and Khan The Law of Succession in South Africa 2 ed (Juta and Company, Cape Town 2001) at 454-455.

jurisprudence both before and after the advent of the Constitution. It revealed that whilst freedom of testation is a central principle of testate succession, it is a trite rule of the law of succession that clauses which are contrary to public policy are unenforceable. But, our courts have, up until now, only dealt with this in respect of conditions attached to private bequests or in the cases of public charitable testamentary bequests as opposed to out-and-out disinheritance bequests. Our courts have not been faced with a set of facts such as this to be tested against public policy. Specifically, an out-and-out disinheritance bequest where the testators had no personal relationships or interactions with the lineal descendants,[67] yet excluded these descendants that they had never met (unknown lineal descendants) on the sole basis of their immutable characteristics.[68] This ushers in the pivotal question whether this matter warrants the development of the common law, as infused with our constitutional values.

Direct versus indirect application of the Bill of Rights

[37] Before turning to this point, I wish to dispose of the question whether this Court ought to consider the enforceability of clause 7 on the ground that it amounts to discrimination on the basis of gender and sex[69] in contravention of section 9 of the Constitution (direct application of the Bill of Rights) or whether we should consider

[67] Only blood relations in the descending line.

[68] The potential beneficiaries in question are the lineal descendants of the testator and succeed the testator's own generation and that of their children's generation and so on. "Excluded" in this context connotes an implicit exclusion of one group of potential beneficiaries by proximity to a similarly placed group of potential beneficiaries who have been expressly "included" solely due to immutable characteristics. The status of the applicants before us is as follows: unknown (meaning they had no personal relationships or interactions with the testator, as they were born after the death of the testator) lineal descendants that are excluded as potential beneficiaries on the basis of immutable characteristics.

Immutable characteristics are defined as those enshrined under section 9(3) of the Constitution including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

[69] It is critical to mention that our courts have used the grounds of gender and sex interchangeably but it is nonetheless important to note that they are distinct. On one hand, "gender" can be understood as the "socially and culturally constructed differences between men and women" while, in contrast "sex" is described as the "biological differences between men and women". See Woolman and Bishop Constitutional Law of South Africa 2 ed (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 2013) at 2665.

enforceability through the lens of public policy, as infused with constitutional values (an indirect application of the Bill of Rights).

[38] In Barkhuizen, Ngcobo J held that the proper approach to constitutional challenges to contractual terms is "whether the term challenged is contrary to public policy as evidenced by the constitutional values, in particular, those found in the Bill of Rights".[70] This was, among other things, due to various concerns with directly applying the provisions in the Bill of Rights to the contract. First, that the impugned clause in Barkhuizen, the time-bar clause, did not constitute a law of general application which could limit a right under section 36 of the Constitution.[71] Second, that the time-bar clause did not amount to a "law" or "conduct" which a court could declare invalid under section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution.[72]

[39] Various parallels can be drawn between contractual and testamentary provisions. Clause 7 is a clause in a private will, it is not a law of general application for purposes of section 36, nor does it amount to "law" or "conduct" for the purposes of section 172(1)(a). In Barkhuizen, it was also noted that this approach "leaves space for the doctrine of pacta sunt servanda to operate".[73] Equally, this approach allows for the principle of freedom of testation to flourish alongside and subject to our constitutional values. For this reason, coupled with the fact that this approach is primarily pleaded by the applicants, I shall, therefore, resort to an indirect horizontal application of the Bill of Rights through the vehicle of public policy.

[40] I have had the benefit of reading the judgments penned by my brother Jafta J (second judgment); and my sister Victor AJ (third judgment). While the second judgment

[70] Barkhuizen above n 22 at para 30.

[71] Id at para 24.

[72] Id.

[73] Id at para 30.

determines the matter by directly applying the Constitution and Equality Act, and the third judgment applies the Equality Act directly to clause 7 in accordance with the principle of constitutional subsidiarity, I am resolute that this matter should be determined from a common law viewpoint through the lens of public policy as imbued with our constitutional values.

[41] In both written and oral argument, the applicants predominantly pleaded that the matter should be determined in terms of the common law, and its development.[74] Since time immemorial, courts have considered the common law rule that clauses that are contrary to public policy are unlawful and are unenforceable. Our law reports are teeming with examples of what is against public policy and therefore unenforceable. These matters are not limited to unfair discriminatory issues. It would be remiss of us to take a detour and neglect engaging with this body of jurisprudence and not attempt to bring it in line with a constitutionally infused common law approach. In my view, there is no bar to applying the common law instead of the Equality Act, because the Equality Act gives effect to section 9 and the right to equality and does not purport to codify the common law public policy standard or the limits of freedom of testation.

Duty to develop the common law

[42] Section 39(2) of the Constitution obliges courts to develop the common law to "promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights". This principle is bolstered by section 173 of the Constitution which endows this Court with "the inherent power to . . . develop the common law, taking into account the interests of justice".

[43] In Carmichele, this Court considered the nature of the section 39(2) obligation as follows:

[74] The applicants submit that "This Court is compelled to consider whether section 39(2) of the Constitution mandates a change to the common law notion of freedom of testation."

> "It needs to be stressed that the obligation of courts to develop the common law, in the context of the section 39(2) objectives, is not purely discretionary. On the contrary, it is implicit in section 39(2) read with section 173 that where the common law as it stands is deficient in promoting the section 39(2) objectives, the courts are under a general obligation to develop it appropriately. We say a 'general obligation' because we do not mean to suggest that a court must, in each and every case where the common law is involved, embark on an independent exercise as to whether the common law is in need of development and, if so, how it is to be developed under section 39(2).
>
> . . .
>
> The influence of the fundamental constitutional values on the common law is mandated by section 39(2) of the Constitution. It is within the matrix of this objective normative value system that the common law must be developed."[75]

[44] The importance of developing the common law in light of our constitutional values was underscored in Du Plessis when Mahomed DP stated:

> "the common law is not to be trapped within limitations of the past . . . it needs to be revisited and revitalised with the spirit of constitutional values. . . defined in chapter 3 of the Constitution and with full regard to the purport and objects of that chapter ".[76]

[45] This Court has accepted that "the normative influence of the Constitution must be felt throughout the common law".[77] It has been said that "the mission of section 39(2) is to carry out the audit and re-invention of the common law".[78]

[75] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) [2001] ZACC 22; 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC); 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 39 and para 54.

[76] Du Plessis v De Klerk [1996] ZACC 10; 1996 (3) SA 850 (CC); 1996 (5) BCLR 658 CC) at para 86 in the context of the interim Constitution.

[77] K above n 23 at para 17. See also S v Thebus [2003] ZACC 12; 2003 (2) SA 505 (CC); 2003 (10) BCLR 1100 (CC) at para 28.

[78] Davis and Klare "Transformative Constitutionalism and the Common and Customary Law" (2010) 26 SAJHR 403 at 426.

[46] Section 1 of the Constitution provides for our cherished founding values.[79] Notably, the constitutional normative value system has been sketched as follows:

> "The content of this normative system does not only depend on an abstract philosophical inquiry but rather upon an understanding that the Constitution mandates the development of a society which breaks clearly and decisively from the past and where institutions which operated prior to our constitutional dispensation had to be instilled with a new operational vision based on the foundational values of our constitutional system."[80]

[47] The duty of the courts to develop the common law, in true fidelity to the ethos of the transformative constitutional project, is well articulated by Cameron J in Fourie:[81]

> "Developing the common law involves a simultaneously creative and declaratory function in which the court puts the final touch on a process of incremental legal development that the Constitution has already ordained . . . This process also requires faith in the capacity of all to adapt and to accept new entrants to the moral parity and equal dignity of constitutionalism. Judges are thus entitled to put faith in the sound choices the founding negotiators made on behalf of all South Africans in writing the Constitution. And they are entitled also to trust that South Africans are prepared to accept the evolving implications that those choices entail. The task of applying the values in the Bill of Rights to the common law thus requires us to put faith in both the values themselves and in the people

[79] Section 1 of the Constitution provides:

> "The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:
>
> (a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.
>
> (b) Non-racialism and non-sexism.
>
> (c) Supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law.
>
> (d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness."

[80] Geldenhuys v Minister of Safety and Security 2002 (4) SA 719 at 728. Also, the term of art "an objective normative value system" is imported from German law, see further Carmichele above n 75 at para 54.

[81] Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs [2004] ZASCA 132; 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA).

whose duly elected representatives created a visionary and inclusive constitutional structure that offered acceptance and justice across diversity to all."[82]

[48] This prompts the question: when is section 39(2) triggered? O'Regan J proffered laudable guidance on this in K:[83]

"It is necessary to consider the difficult question of what constitutes 'development' of the common law for the purposes of section 39(2). In considering this, we need to bear in mind that the common law develops incrementally through the rules of precedent. The rules of precedent enshrine a fundamental principle of justice: that like cases should be determined alike. From time to time, a common-law rule is changed altogether, or a new rule is introduced, and this clearly constitutes the development of the common law. More commonly, however, courts decide cases within the framework of an existing rule. There are at least two possibilities in such cases: firstly, a court may merely have to apply the rule to a set of facts which it is clear fall within the terms of the rule or existing authority. The rule is then not developed but merely applied to facts bound by the rule. Secondly, however, a court may have to determine whether a new set of facts falls within or beyond the scope of an existing rule. The precise ambit of each rule is therefore clarified in relation to each new set of facts. A court faced with a new set of facts, not on all fours with any set of facts previously adjudicated, must decide whether a common-law rule applies to this new factual situation or not. If it holds that the new set of facts falls within the rule, the ambit of the rule is extended. If it holds that it does not, the ambit of the rule is restricted, not extended.

The question we should consider is whether one characterises such cases as development of the common law for the purposes of section 39(2). The overall purpose of section 39(2) is to ensure that our common law is infused with the values of the Constitution. It is not only in cases where existing rules are clearly inconsistent with the Constitution that such an infusion is required. The normative influence of the Constitution must be felt throughout the common law. Courts making decisions which involve the incremental development of the rules of the common law in cases where the values of the Constitution > are relevant are therefore also bound by the terms of section 39(2). The obligation imposed upon courts by section 39(2) of the Constitution is thus extensive, requiring courts to be alert to the normative framework of the Constitution not only when some startling new development of the common law is in issue, but in all cases where the incremental development of the rule is in issue."[84]

[82] Id at paras 23-5.

[83] K above n 23.

[49] Based on what was said by this Court in K, determining whether a novel set of facts falls within the ambit of an existing common law rule is within the domain of section 39(2). Therefore, should we choose to extend the existing common law rule (that clauses contrary to public policy are unenforceable) to private out-and-out disinheritance testamentary provisions, which unfairly discriminate between unknown included and excluded lineal descendants on the sole basis of immutable characteristics, this would be an incremental, yet significant, development of the common law. As I see it, the second judgment applies the broad existing common- law rule as it stands,[85] without acknowledging that, given the novel facts, a development is warranted in light of section 39(2) coupled with what was said by this Court in K.

[50] When considering these novel facts, this Court has a constitutional obligation to craft and mould the common law in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. It is worth noting that in Mighty Solutions, this Court cautioned that before a court proceeds to develop the common law it must consider various steps.[86] The purpose

[84] Id at paras 16-7. See also Carmichele above n 75 at para 40.

[85] See second judgment at [90].

[86] In Mighty Solutions CC t/a Orlando Service Station v Engen Petroleum Ltd [2015] ZACC 34; 2016 (1) SA 621 (CC); 2016 (1) BCLR 28 (CC) at para 39, this Court noted that before a court proceeds to develop the common law it must:

> (a) Determine exactly what the common law position is;
>
> (b) Consider the underlying reasons for it;
>
> (c) Enquire whether the rule offends the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights and thus requires development;
>
> (d) Consider precisely how the common law should be amended; and of this is not to impugn the principle of freedom of testation. Rather, the purpose of applying some of these steps is to allow us to re-evaluate the weight attached to freedom of testation when juxtaposed with other constitutional considerations such as balancing a public policy enquiry.

Principles underlying the current common law position

[51] The common law position has been outlined in detail above. The common law rule in effect aims to respect the wishes of the testator through the principle of freedom of testation.[87] This is inherited from, among others, the English approach of unlimited freedom of testation, notwithstanding the distinct economic and social developments that have taken place in both England and South Africa.[88] Hahlo remarked:

> "The principle of unlimited freedom of disposition by will which South Africa took over from England during the nineteenth century was the product of the individualistic and laissez faire attitude which prevailed in English law at that time, but has since given way to a socially minded approach."[89]

[52] It is evident that the primacy of freedom of testation in testate succession, as it currently stands, is based on our law's respect of freedom, to act as one wishes in the private sphere. Our mixed legal system, with all its historical nuances, has clasped onto the importance of the English law view, as it was at the time of its adoption into our law, of autonomy, private property and unfettered freedom to bequeath one's property as one

(e) Take into account the wider consequences of the proposed change on that area of the law.

The respondents contend that the applicants in King have not met the factors outlined in Mighty Solutions. However, they do not expand on this. Rather, the respondents list 8 reasons why it is not in the interests of justice to deal with the discrimination issue.

[87] Corbett et al above n 36 at 39.

[88] Hahlo "The Case against Freedom of Testation" (1959) South African Law Journal 76 (435) at 442.

[89] Id.

wishes, whilst retaining some of the Roman and Roman-Dutch law exceptions to this.[90] The question that then arises is to what extent must this primacy of freedom of testation be balanced against other key constitutional values (including equality and non-sexism) which underpin our constitutional dispensation? Similarly, it is important to question whether there may be certain types of bequests, beyond the current exceptions, that should be unenforceable because they are contra bonos mores. Before dealing with these questions, I will briefly highlight the patriarchal manifestations of the law of testation as well as the status of freedom of testation in other jurisdictions.

The patriarchal manifestation of the law of testation

[53] Testate succession, and in particular the principle of freedom of testation, while facially neutral, has traditionally manifested in a patriarchal manner. Roman private law was based on the idea that each family had a male head. Families residing in one household were centred patriarchally with their roots firmly lodged in the notion of the paterfamilias.[91] The move towards freedom of testation was seemingly brought about with an expectation that the predominantly male testators would dispose of their property through the reasonable man[92] standard, for which the social expectation at the time was to ensure the well-being of one's family.

[54] In Bhe, this Court acknowledged:

> "Roman-Dutch law, like the Roman law upon which it was founded, was neither humanitarian nor egalitarian. In its gender bias, it was similar to other European systems [90] For example, the common law position in our current law that conditions attached to bequests that seek to break up marriages are contra bonos mores appear directly related to the Roman law position that conditions which encouraged an immoral act were against public policy. See Du Toit "The impact of social and economic factors on freedom of testation in Roman and Roman-Dutch Law" (1999) 10(2) Stellenbosch Law Review at 240.

[91] Leage and Ziegler Roman Private Law: Founded on the 'Institutes' of Gaius and Justinian 2 (Macmillan, 1906) at 1.

[92] I use "man" consciously because that was the "reality" of the time.

> of its time, and its effects on both the South African legal system and South African society have been enormous."[93]

[55] Therefore, it must be accepted that the genesis and development of freedom of testation have undeniable layers of patriarchy, deeply rooted in notions that women cannot own property as well as be commercially active, and thus cannot inherit property. As I will demonstrate below, these underlying social and economic considerations are not static and are inimical to the values of the Constitution.

Comparative analysis

[56] It is useful to consider the role of the principle of freedom of testation in other jurisdictions. In Canada, freedom of testation is a deeply entrenched common law principle. The Supreme Court of Canada has recognised the importance of testamentary autonomy,[94] maintaining that this right may only be limited in certain instances.[95] Most recently, in Spence v BMO Trust Company,[96] the Ontario Court of Appeal (ONCA) considered the exclusion by Mr Spence, a Jamaican man, of his daughter and grandson from his will. The testator stated in his will that the reason for the exclusion was that his daughter "has had no communication with him for several years and has shown no interest in him as her father".[97] However, extrinsic evidence indicated that the true reason for the exclusion was that his daughter had had a child with a white man, and her son was [93] Bhe v Khayelitsha Magistrate [2004] ZACC 17; 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC); 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at fn 112 cites Zaal "Origins of gender discrimination in SA Law" in Liebenberg (ed) The Constitution of South African from a Gender Perspective (Community Law Centre, University of the Western Cape in association with David Phillip, Cape Town 1995) at 34.

[94] Tataryn v Tataryn Estate [1994] 2 SCR 807.

[95] For example, in Canada Trust Co. v Ontario Human Rights Commission 1990 CanLII 486 (ONCA) (Canada Trust), the Ontario Court of Appeal found certain terms of an educational trust, which included racist and religious qualifications, to be discriminatory. However, at 25 the ONCA held that it is the public nature of charitable trusts which attracts the requirement that they conform to the public policy against discrimination.

[96] 2016 ONCA 196.

[97] Id at para 10.

accordingly of "mixed-race". While the Ontario Superior Court of Justice set aside the will in its entirety, based on contravention of public policy, the ONCA upheld an appeal. Of significance is that the ONCA held that judicial interference with Mr Spence's testamentary freedom was not warranted. The will was not facially discriminatory and therefore did not offend public policy. However, the ONCA stated that even a facially discriminatory will would have been valid as it reflects a testator's intentional and private disposition of his property, with which the Court was not entitled to interfere.[98]

[57] The applicants in Spence relied on the decision in McCorkill which confirmed that courts are authorised to examine the validity of a bequest on grounds of public policy.[99] However, the ONCA in Spence held that this decision to strike down an absolute (unconditional) bequest was exceptional.[100] It is worth noting that Ontario's Succession Law Reform Act, unlike that of other Canadian provinces, places a strong emphasis on will formality and adherence to the testator's intentions. Additionally, private individuals in Canada are not subject to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. It is therefore difficult to challenge a will based on suspicion of discrimination in Ontario.[101]

[58] A curious position arises in the United States of America's federal legal system relating to testamentary freedom. Most states recognise that "the right to make a will is not a natural, inalienable, inherited, fundamental, or inherent right, and it is not one guaranteed by the Constitution. The right to make a will is conferred and regulated by

[98] Id at para 73.

[99] McCorkill v McCorkill Estate, 2014 NBQB 148, aff'd 2015 NBCA 50. The testator in McCorkill had bequeathed the residue of his state to a neo-Nazi organisation, and the court struck this down on the basis of public policy. Also, in Fox v Fox Estate, 1996 CanLII 779 (ONCA), a trustee's actions were prohibited because they represented bad faith, and not because they were discriminatory.

[100] Based on the illegal activities of the organisation that would have been funded by the residue of the testator's estate. The implementation of the testator's intentions would have facilitated the financing of hate crimes.

[101] Spiro "Could the Charter be Extended to Prohibit Discrimination in a Will?" CanLII Connects (2019). Available at https://canliiconnects.org/en/commentaries/67792.

statute".[102] The courts of Wisconsin, however, have "dissented sharply from this theory"[103] in several cases, deeming the right to make a will as a "sacred right" and one that is guaranteed by the Constitution".[104] These courts consider it "more sacred than the right to make a contract", and an "inherent power and not a statutory power".[105] However, in Estate of Ogg, the Wisconsin Supreme Court noted that this position goes against the majority opinion of the United States' legal authority, where the "right to make a will is in no sense a property right or a so-called natural right".[106]

[59] I now turn to consider civil law jurisdictions.[107] Germany provides for constitutionally protected rights of private ownership and private succession in terms of article 14.1 of the German Grundgesetz (Basic Law),[108] which states that "property and the right of inheritance are guaranteed. Their content and limitation shall be determined by the

[102] Fullam v Brock, 155 SE 2d 737, 739 (NC 1967).

[103] Estate of Ogg v First National Bank of Madison, 54 NW 2d 175 (Wis. 1952) at page 177.

[104] Id at 177-78 wherein Estate of Ogg cites the following cases: Will of Rice (1912), 150 Wis. 401, 136 NW 956, 137 NW 778; Upham v. Plankinton (1913), 152 Wis. 275, 140 NW 5; Will of Ball (1913), 153 Wis. 27, 141 NW 8; Duncan v. Metcalf (1913), 154 Wis. 39, 141 NW 1002; Will of Schaefer (1932), 207 Wis. 404, 241 NW 382.

[105] Estate of Ogg above n 103 at 177.

[106] Id.

[107] On 8 April 2020, this Court, as it has previously done, sent a request to the World Conference on Constitutional Justice (Venice Commission) to determine other jurisdictions' constitutional stance on the freedom of testation. In contrast to common law jurisdictions, civil law jurisdictions often explicitly enshrine freedom of testation under their constitutional property right provisions and consequently the right of succession, which is frequently framed as "the right to inherit is guaranteed" or similarly (where the right to inheritance is not expressed in the Constitution, it is enshrined under the jurisdiction's civil code). See also Article 48 of the Constitution of the Republic of Croatia, 22 December 1990; Article 11(1) of the Czech Charter of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, 16 December 1992; Article 64 of the Constitution of the Republic of Poland, 2 April 1997; Article 60 of the Constitution of the Republic of Armenia, 5 July 1995; Article 29 of the Constitution of the Republic of Azerbaijan, 12 November 1995; Article 46 of the Constitution of the Republic of Moldova ; Article 20 of the Constitution of the Slovak Republic, 1 October 1992.

[108] Germany: Basic Law for the Federal Republic of Germany, 23 May 1949. According to the most recent decision of the German Federal Constitutional Court, that Court characterizes the freedom to make a will as a key element of the guarantee of the right to inheritance. This freedom includes "the right of the testator in [their] lifetime to order a transfer of [their] assets after [their] death … to one or several legal successors, in particular to exclude a statutory heir from participation in the estate and to restrict his or her inheritance to the [monetary] value of the statutory compulsory portion (see BVerfGE 58, 377 (398)). The testator is thereby afforded the possibility to arrange the terms of the succession [themselves] by last will largely in accordance with [their] personal wishes and idea s. In particular, the testator is constitutionally not forced to treat his or her descendants equally. See BVerfG, Order of the First Senate of 19 April 2005, 1 BvR 1644/00, para. 63. And BVerfGE 67, 329 (345) - Official Digest (Entscheidungen des Bundesverfassungsgerichts – BVerfGE) 112, 332 (348), ECLI:DE:BVerfG:2005:rs20050419.1bvr164400, available in English on that Court's website at http://www.bverfg.de/e/rs20050419_1bvr164400en.html.

laws".[109] As a result, the Privaterbrecht (law of private succession) is expressly enshrined and the state is thus restricted, to an extent, from interfering.[110] The nexus between private ownership and freedom of testation has been recognised by the German Constitutional Court.[111] In doing so, the Court considered freedom of testation as an element of the transferability of ownership. German law thus provides a guarantee of freedom of testation by the express provision for private ownership and private succession.[112] However, the Basic Law in Germany does not have horizontal application and so the equality clause cannot directly restrict freedom of testation.[113] Regardless, "the Legislature must ensure the fundamental content of the constitutional guarantee contained in article 14.1 of the Basic Law, keep in line with all other constitutional provisions, and must, in particular, adhere to the principles of proportionality and equality".[114]

[60] In addition, the role of good morals operates in German law.[115] A testamentary provision would be, objectively, Sittenwidrig (contrary to good morals) "if it offends the legal convictions of all reasonable and right-minded people"[116] which is determined by the

[109] Translation by Du Toit "Constitutionalism, Public Policy and Discriminatory Testamentary Bequests – A Good Fit Between Common Law and Civil Law in South Africa's Mixed Jurisdiction?" above n 32. The original stipulates "Das Eigentum und das Erbrecht warden gewährleistet. Inhalt und Schranken warden durch die Gesetze bestimmt".

[110] De Waal "Bill of Rights Compendium: The Law of Succession and the Bill of Rights" (Butterworths, Durban 2012) at 3G-4.

[111] Id at 3G-8 citing BverfGE 67, 329 (341). See also BVerfGE 26, 215 (222); BVerfGE 50, 290 (340).

[112] Id at 35-5 citing Erbrecht 24. Leipold contends:

> "freedom of testation plays an important part with regard to [the] power of disposition and functions as an essential element of private ownership. The relationship between freedom of testation and private ownership is established by the guarantee of private ownership in article 14(1) of the Basic Law."

[113] De Waal above n 110 at 3G-8.

[114] BVerfG, Order of the First Senate of 19 April 2005 – 1 BvR 1644/00 at para 62.

[115] Dutch law does not recognize a constitutional guarantee of private ownership and private succession, however the concept of goede zeden (good morals) plays a role. Although little judicial exploration has been conducted into the impact of rights such as equality, freedom of association and religious beliefs and their impact on freedom of testation. Du Toit above n 32.

[116] Paragraph 138 (1) of the Civil Code.

"opinion of the decent average person".[117] Consequently, any testamentary provision that conflicts with good morals is void.

[61] Similarly, the Dutch Civil Code, in terms of article 4:44, determines that a "testamentary bequest is void if the decisive motive for making the will or bequest is contrary to the public order or good morals, provided such motive is evident from the will itself".[118] More specifically, a condition or testamentary obligation imposed by a will that is contrary to, amongst others, the public order or good morals, is deemed not to have been written.[119] It is noteworthy that testamentary dispositions that conflict with article 4:44 are fairly rare in modern Dutch wills.[120] This is likely attributable to article 21(2) of the Dutch Notaries Act which obliges a notary to refuse to provide their services when, according to reasonable conviction, the service would contravene the law or public order or would amount to the assistance of an act that will have an unlawful purpose or consequence.[121] Notaries will therefore caution testators against including potentially discriminatory provisions in wills.[122] There are, however, established Dutch authorities confirming that prescriptive (conditional) testamentary provisions can constitute an infringement on the fundamental rights of a beneficiary.[123]

[62] Based on this analysis, while some jurisdictions, whether common law or civil, tend to defer to freedom of testation, it is clear that testamentary freedom is never completely

[117] Du Toit "Constitutionalism, Public Policy and Discriminatory Testamentary Bequests – A Good Fit Between Common Law and Civil Law in South Africa's Mixed Jurisdictions" above n 32 at 105.

[118] Id at 105.

[119] Id at 106.

[120] Du Toit "Constitutionalism, Public Policy and Discriminatory Testamentary Bequests – A Good Fit Between Common Law and Civil Law in South Africa's Mixed Jurisdictions" above n 32 at 105.

[121] Id at 108.

[122] Id at 108. Civil Law notaries cannot represent any person in the Netherlands, but rather act for the public good. Notaries will therefore caution testators against including potentially discriminatory provisions in wills.

[123] HR 21 June 1929 NJ 1325 1327-1328. For example, the Hoge Raad in the case of Elisabeth invalidated a testamentary forfeiture clause which obliged a beneficiary to baptise her children in a particular denomination, based on a violation of good morals.

unfettered. A noticeable trend is that the public policy yardstick is exercised to different extents and in various contexts to limit deference to testamentary freedom.

Public policy and private wills under the constitutional dispensation

[63] I turn now to consider whether the common law position which prioritises freedom of testation in the context of private wills ought to be extended as set out in K, and in line with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, so that courts may test private out-and-out disinheritance provisions against the public policy standard and weigh the principle of freedom of testation against other constitutional considerations.

Constitutional protection of freedom of testation

[64] While not expressly enshrined in the Constitution, freedom of testation garners constitutional protection from a concatenation of rights in the Bill of Rights including the right to property, dignity and privacy.

[65] This Court has accepted that freedom of testation "is fundamental to testate succession".[124] It has been said that freedom of testation implicitly forms part of section 25(1) of the Constitution in that it protects a person's right to dispose of her assets, upon death, as she wishes.[125] In Syfrets, it was accepted, albeit obiter, that while no express mention is made of freedom of testation in the Constitution "it forms an integral part of a person's right to property, and must therefore be taken to be protected in terms of section 25".[126] This was revisited in BOE Trust in which the Supreme Court of Appeal stated that this view is "well held". It went on to state that were the inverse held to be true, it would entitle the state to effectively "infringe a person's property rights after he or she has passed away, unbounded by the strictures which obtain while that person is still alive".[127] That Court endorsed Du Toit's account of the centrality of freedom of testation and its connection with the right to property.[128]

[124] Moosa N.O. v Minister of Justice [2018] ZACC 19; 2018 (5) SA 13 (CC); 2018 (10) BCLR 1280 (CC) at para 18.

[125] BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 26.

[126] Syfrets above n 29 at para 18.

[66] However, in Syfrets, that Court was circumspect on whether testamentary wishes that are contrary to public policy curtail section 25(1). Firstly, deprivation of property engages a considerably high threshold as it constitutes a "substantial interference or limitation that goes beyond the normal restrictions on property use and enjoyment".[129] Secondly, "for deprivation to be arbitrary, it must be procedurally unfair or must take place without sufficient reason . . . there can be no question of procedural unfairness . . . given that any order would be granted only after a full hearing by a court".[130] That Court went on to state that "in any event, it is, of course, trite that the principle of freedom of testation has never been absolute and unfettered: various restrictions have been placed on this freedom".[131] In other words, limiting freedom of testation, due to contravention of public policy, is by no means an arbitrary deprivation – it is for good cause. I endorse this view that the unenforceability of testamentary bequests that are contrary to public policy for being impermissibly discriminatory does not constitute an arbitrary deprivation for the purposes of section 25(1).

[127] BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 26.

[128] Id. The Supreme Court Appeal endorsed the view that "freedom of testation is further enhanced by the fact that private ownership and the concomitant right of an owner to dispose of the property owned (the ius disponendi) constitute basic tenets of the South African law of property."

[129] Syfrets above n 29 at para 20.

[130] Id at para 21.

[131] Id at para 22.

[67] The principle of freedom of testation has been held to warrant constitutional refuge through the right to privacy[132] coupled with the right to dignity.[133] In BOE Trust, the Supreme Court of Appeal espoused:

> "Not to give due recognition to freedom of testation, will, to my mind, also fly in the face of the founding constitutional principle of human dignity. The right to dignity allows the living, and the dying, the peace of mind of knowing that their last wishes would be respected after they have passed away."[134]

[68] Autonomy and moral agency underscore the importance that freedom of testation affords to the right to privacy.[135] Also, this Court has recognised that the right to privacy and dignity are closely related as "the right to privacy, through the constitutional order, serves to foster human dignity".[136]

[132] Section 14 of the Constitution reads:

> "Everyone has the right to privacy, which includes the right not to have—
>
> (a) their person or home searched;
>
> (b) their property searched;
>
> (c) their possessions seized; or
>
> (d) the privacy of their communications infringed."

[133] Section 10 of the Constitution reads: "everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected".

Our courts have indicated that freedom of testation can be shielded by these rights in BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 27 and Syfrets above n 29 at para 41.

[134] BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 27.

[135] De Vos et al South African Constitutional Law in Context (Oxford University Press, Cape Town 2015) at 463 note that privacy and dignity are closely related and note further that "where a person's privacy is breached, that person will often not be treated with concern and respect". Steyn "Limiting Freedom of Testation: Evaluating 'Discriminatory' Stipulations in Testamentary Charitable Trusts" (LLM, NWU 2018) at 19.

[136] Centre for Child Law v Media 24 Limited [2019] ZACC 46; 2020 (4) SA 319 (CC); 2020 (3) BCLR 245 (CC) at para 44 and in Khumalo v Holomisa [2002] ZACC 12; 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC); 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 27 this Court stated—

> "there is a close link between human dignity and privacy in our constitutional order. The right to privacy, entrenched in section 14 of the Constitution, recognises that human beings have a right to a sphere of intimacy and autonomy that should be protected from invasion. This right serves to foster human dignity."

[69] Therefore, the principle of freedom of testation is at the heart of testate succession and cloaked in constitutional protection by virtue of the rights to property, dignity, and privacy. Freedom of testation thus informs public policy and carries significant weight in any analysis of what public policy, as infused with our constitutional values, dictates.

[70] However, one cannot ignore that there are competing values at play. Our Constitution also envisages and promises a democratic State based on "human dignity, the achievement of equality . . . non-racialism and non-sexism . . . and the supremacy of the Constitution".[137] Furthermore, it protects all persons from direct or indirect unfair discrimination, both in the public and private sphere. It is therefore evident that the common law position – where out-and-out disinheritance clauses in private wills have seemingly been out of reach of the courts' powers to declare them unenforceable on public policy grounds – cannot be maintained. This is because, in a constitutional dispensation based on the supremacy of the Constitution, we are enjoined to recognise both freedom of testation as well as recognise the principle of non-discrimination even in the private sphere. We, therefore, have no choice but to navigate the point at which they interact.

Retrospectivity

[71] Before addressing the question whether public policy, infused with our constitutional values, would find the impugned clause 7 unenforceable, it is critical to dispose of an issue raised by the respondents concerning retrospectivity. The respondents submit that the Constitution cannot reach backwards so as to invalidate actions taken under then valid laws, even if those laws are contrary to fundamental rights. The practical implication of this view is that a litigant can only seek constitutional relief for a violation of human rights by conduct that occurred after the commencement of the Constitution.

[137] Section 1(a)-(c) of the Constitution.

[72] I disagree. Public policy is considered in light of the boni mores (good values) of today, as infused with our constitutional values and "it is axiomatic that the public policy of 1902 does not necessarily correspond in all respects with the public policy of today".[138] Since this matter focuses, via the common law, on the question of public policy, this elusive concept[139] is by its very nature ever-evolving – so too the common law is ever-evolving. These types of enquiries involve, by virtue of the doctrine of precedent, a backwards and forwards process of adjudication.[140]

[73] Before the advent of the Constitution, courts in this country had the power to develop the common law through their jurisprudence in light of public policy and adjust it to the ever-changing needs of society.[141] It has been said that "determining the content of public policy was once fraught with difficulties".[142] Now, however, we have instructive guidance since public policy is deeply rooted in our Constitution and its ingrained values.[143] Therefore, applying the public policy of today does not raise the question of the [138] Syfrets above n 29 at paras 25-6 and noted at para 23 "the position in this regard is analogous to the principle in the law of contract regarding contractual provisions which are contrary to public policy and it would appear that identical considerations apply to both fields".

[139] Along with boni mores, legal convictions of the community, norms of conduct required by the society and the general standard of reasonableness.

[140] Davis "How Many Positive Legal Philosophers Can Be Made To Dance on the Head of a Pin? A Reply to Professor Fagan" (2012) 129 SALJ 59 at 70 said:

> "In order to determine the ambit of the rule, we move backwards to divine the meaning of the past. In this way judges decide a case by considering a past rule, the application of which holds implications for the future. The court may deviate from the past in order to develop the rule for present or future application. In evaluating past decisions as a means by which to confront the future, courts are guided by some normative idea which informs the legal system, past, present and future."

[141] Corbett "Aspects of the Role of Policy in the Evolution of our Common Law" (1987) 104 SALJ 52 at 59 and 67 said that:

> "When the court is confronted with a legal problem in the common-law for which there is no precedent or authority and whether the judge has thus to step into the unknown; or when the court is asked to depart from the common law precedent and strike out in a new direction."

[142] Barkhuizen above n 22 at para 28.

[143] Id and above n 11. Syfrets above n 29 at para 24 states that "since the advent of the constitutional era, however, public policy is now rooted in the Constitution and the fundamental values it enshrines, thus establishing a normative value system".

retrospective application of the Constitution. Rather, it is consistent with the role of courts to develop the common law to bring it in line with the Constitution.

[74] In any event, we are dealing with the enforcement of the testamentary provisions, which occurred in 2015 on the death of Mr Kalvyn de Jager, and not the drafting of the provisions which dates back to the early 1900's. It is perspicuous that public policy is determined or measured as it is at the time that the will, or any provision therein, is enforced, not the point at which it is executed. Thus, the issue of retrospectivity that the respondents are concerned with, must fall to be dismissed as devoid of merit.

[75] Our Constitution affords our society the opportunity and duty to jettison overt and covert patriarchal practices that still remain prevalent. Given our past and present, coupled with our entrenched constitutional values, the common law must be developed to give effect to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. In other words, it must establish a "constitutionally-founded boni mores criterion"[144] to tackle out- and-out disinheritance clauses of this nature where they appear in the private sphere. I expand below on discriminatory testamentary bequests on the grounds of gender and sex and whether the clause before us, and those similar to it, ought to be declared unenforceable based on public policy.

Is clause 7 contrary to public policy?

[76] It is common cause that the impugned clause is unfairly discriminatory.[145] The respondents acknowledge that there may be testamentary provisions in the private sphere that are so fundamentally against public policy as to be "abhorrent" and should, therefore, not be enforceable by courts. They submit that discrimination on the basis of gender and sex, without more, is not abhorrent. I disagree. The respondents fail to account for the significance of our entrenched constitutional values, and specifically, the rights to equality and non-sexism.

[144] Du Toit "The Constitutionally Bound Dead Hand – The Impact of Constitutional Rights and Principles on Freedom of Testation" (2001) 12 Stellenbosch Law Review 222 at 227.

[145] The respondents conceded this point in oral argument before this Court.

[77] Equality as an entrenched right and founding value is perspicuously the lodestar of our transformative constitutional project. This Court has said:

> "The achievement of equality goes to the bedrock of our constitutional architecture. The Constitution commands us to strive for a society built on the democratic values of human dignity, the achievement of equality, the advancement of human rights and freedom. Thus the achievement of equality is not only a guaranteed and justiciable right in our Bill of Rights but also a core and foundational value; a standard which must inform all law and against which all law must be tested for constitutional consonance."[146]

[78] Similarly, in Fraser,[147] this Court stated that "there can be no doubt that the guarantee of equality lies at the very heart of the Constitution. It permeates and defines the very ethos upon which the Constitution is premised".[148] Equality as a founding value underpins our constitutional democracy and informs public policy.

[79] The historical analysis above illustrates that the facially neutral principle of freedom of testation as it currently stands reinforces patriarchal and outdated ideas concerning sex, gender, property, ownership, family structures and norms. Our courts are aware of the impact of discriminatory testamentary bequests on women. In re Heydenrych Testamentary Trust,[149] in the context of a public charitable trust, the applicants submitted that direct discrimination on the basis of sex and gender should be treated "more

[146] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden [2004] ZACC 3; 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC); 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) at para 22 (Van Heerden).

[147] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North [1997] ZACC 1; 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC); 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC).

[148] Id at para 20.

[149] In re Heydenrych Testamentary Trust 2012 (4) SA 103 (WCC).

circumspectly" than direct discrimination on the basis of race.[150] The amicus curiae[151] took issue with the discriminatory provisions on the ground of gender.[152] The Court found that the impugned conditions in that trust constituted unfair discrimination on grounds of gender and race.[153]

[80] Furthermore, in Bhe, Ngcobo J correctly anchored our obligations to counter discrimination against women as stemming from core-binding international instruments such as the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW)[154] coupled with the African (Banjul) Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights.[155]

[81] In order to answer the question whether the unfairly discriminatory clause in issue is unenforceable, this Court has to consider whether it is inimical to public policy, as imbued with the Constitution's values and rights. As noted above, the principle of freedom of testation gives effect to constitutional rights and these must be borne in mind in determining public policy in this context. At the same time, discriminatory clauses infringe upon the founding value of equality and the right to non-discrimination. Determining public policy in this context requires due consideration of all the relevant rights and values.

[82] It cannot be gainsaid that private testamentary bequests (when juxtaposed to public trusts) relate to our most intimate personal relationships and can very well be based on irrational and erratic decisions which are located in the domain of the "most intimate core of privacy". It is, therefore, apposite for the right to privacy to play an active role in

[150] Id at para 2.

[151] Women's Legal Centre intervened.

[152] In re Heydenrych Testamentary Trust above n 149 at para 3.

[153] Id at para 20.

[154] Bhe above n 93 at para 51.

[155] Articles 1, 2 and 5(a). South Africa signed the Convention on 29 January 1993 and ratified it on 14 January 1996.

determining whether judicial interference can enter the perimeter of private testamentary bequests. This, in turn, buttresses the point that when courts intervene in private testamentary bequests of this nature there ought to be a lower level of judicial scrutiny.

[83] Bequests that entail fideicommissa are already regulated by the law.[156] Fideicommissa tend to run over a long period and impact successive generations and they often concern beneficiaries unknown to the testator. This influences our decision to allow a court to reach a finding that unfair discriminatory clauses in fideicommissa are contrary to public policy and that it may be justified for a court to declare such provisions unenforceable. Private testamentary bequests are in the truly personal realm. However, some of these bequests discriminate against a testator's unknown lineal descendants, with whom the testator never had personal relationships or interactions, solely based on immutable characteristics. In those instances, there is a shift along the continuum, which warrants a greater level of judicial intervention.

[84] With the above in mind, the immutable characteristic at issue here is womanhood; the testators excluded future lineal female descendants unknown to them simply because they are women. As the applicants submit, "in this instance, a testator is not excluding a particular individual or individuals because their idiosyncrasies are disfavoured by the testator. Here the testator excludes future beneficiaries unknown to him simply because they are women, and includes future unknown beneficiaries simply because they are men". There is no relevant armchair or extrinsic evidence to show the contrary. It is the "unknown lineal descendants" element of this bequest, along with other elements discussed above, that weighs in the direction of favouring the right to non-discrimination over absolute freedom of testation in cases like these. It can never accord with public policy for a testator, even in the private sphere, to discriminate against lineal descendants unknown to her or him purely on the ground of gender. No privacy or property right considerations can ever trump that; that is simply the sort of discrimination that our present-day public policy cannot countenance. Any sense that this view is violative of dignity or property interests is not worthy of being countenanced by our constitutional order. This being presumptively unfair discrimination,[157] today's public policy simply cannot admit of the constitutional protection of discrimination of that nature.

[156] In terms of the Immovable Property (Removal or Modification of Restrictions) Act 94 of 1965.

[85] All this leads me to the conclusion that unfair discrimination against women in the context of private out-and-out disinheritance clauses against unknown lineal descendants is abhorrent and inimical to our constitutional rights and values. This manner of unfair discrimination is contrary to our constitutionally infused conception of public policy. It has gone on long enough and must be stopped.

Remedy

[86] What remains is the question of remedy, and in particular whether this Court should vary or rectify clause 7. In doing so, it must be borne in mind that courts should be circumspect that amending or varying the terms of testamentary provisions is a last resort in view of the importance of freedom of testation to our constitutional dispensation. On these facts, however, it is not appropriate to vary the provision, since it is the final substitution of the fideicommissum,[158] and in any event, a variation would not be fair in light of the prior generations of women who have already been left out.

[87] A just and equitable remedy will be one where a declaration is made that clause 7 is unenforceable from the date of this judgment coupled with a declaration that, for the [157] In terms of section 9(5), read with section 9(3) of the Constitution, discrimination on the ground of gender is presumed to be unfair.

[158] According to the Immovable Property (Removal or Modifications of Restrictions) Act, a testator cannot prevent the alienation of land by means of a long-term fideicommissa. Sections 6, 7 and 8 of the Act provide that long-term provisions are restricted to two fideicommissaries.

purposes of the final substitution, the second to sixth applicants are beneficiaries of equal shares of the fideicommissary property.

Conclusion

[88] It follows that the appeal must be upheld. Clause 7 of the will of the late Mr Carel Johannes Cornelius de Jager and the late Mrs Catherine Dorothea de Jager dated 28 November 1902 is unconstitutional, invalid and must be declared unenforceable. Had I commanded the majority reasoning, I would have issued a declaratory order that clause 7 is contrary to public policy. To ensure that the applicants are afforded effective relief, I would have also made a declaratory order that the second to sixth applicants are beneficiaries of equal shares of the fideicommissary property.

JAFTA J (Mogoeng CJ, Majiedt J, Mathopo AJ and Victor AJ concurring):

Introduction

[89] I have had the benefit of reading the judgment of my colleague Mhlantla J (first judgment). I agree that the appeal must be upheld and that the impugned clause of the will should be declared unenforceable. I also think that relief should be granted in favour of the applicants. But my reasons differ materially from those furnished by my colleague.

[90] I do not think that the public policy relevant to this matter must be determined by preferring the value of equality over those of freedom and dignity. Nor do I think that it is necessary to develop the common law. As the common law presently stands, unlawful wills and those that are contrary to public policy are not enforceable.[159]

[159] Harvey above n 20 at para 65.

[91] Moreover, as the first judgment illustrates, our courts accept that freedom of testation constitutes a right protected by section 25(1) of the Constitution.[160] This compounds the complex issue of determining whether freedom of testation is contrary to public policy. This is because our public policy rests on the values underlying the Constitution. At the very least it appears that there is a clash of some of those values here. The value of equality, on the one hand, collides with the values of freedom and dignity, on the other.

[92] The first judgment seeks to resolve this difficulty by making reference to the origins of freedom of testation. It concludes that freedom of testation is a neutral principle "steeped in patriarchal and outdated ideals concerning sex, gender, property ownership, family structures and norms".[161] Building on an academic article that concludes that freedom of testation perpetuates discrimination against women who were historically excluded from ownership of property, the first judgment holds that unfair discrimination against women in the context of inheritance is "abhorrent and inimical to our constitutional rights and values".[162]

[93] As I see it, this conclusion conflates the conduct of unfair discrimination with freedom of testation. While unfair discrimination is plainly not in line with the value of equality, it does not constitute freedom of testation. The first judgment acknowledges that freedom of testation is "a neutral principle" and as such, it may not be equated to unfair discrimination which is a consequential act of a particular clause in a will. Freedom of testation should not be confused with the terms of a particular will, nor should it be taken as a licence to unfairly discriminate.

[160] Syfrets above n 29; BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60 at para 26.

[161] First judgment at [79].

[162] Id at [85].

[94] Freedom of testation entails a testator's right to dispose of her estate as she pleases in a will, provided that the disposition is lawful and is not contrary to public policy.[163] Subject to these restrictions she is free to do as she wishes with her property and her wishes must be respected, after her departure from this world. These limitations render freedom of testation flexible. In its current form the principle does not justify testamentary provisions which are illegal or contrary to public policy.

[95] Proceeding from the premise that freedom of testation is a neutral principle, it is difficult to appreciate how at the same time it can be said it has deficiencies of the nature that warrants its development as contemplated in section 39(2) of the Constitution. This Court has emphasised under this section that the common law development is triggered when that law deviates from the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[164]

[96] Since freedom of testation in its present form acknowledges that a will that is contrary to public policy is unenforceable, there is no need to develop it to achieve what is already obtainable. I can think of no deviation of freedom of testation from the objects of the Bill of Rights which warrants development in this matter. With regard to the claim based on public policy, the applicants are entitled to assert that clause 7 is unenforceable for being contrary to the value of equality and for that reason, the clause is contrary to public policy. They do not need the development of the common law in order to succeed in their claim. Nor can the respondents resist the claim on the ground that freedom of testation permits the breach of the equality value.

[163] Harvey above n 20 at para 56.

[164] Carmichele above n 75 at paras 33-5.

Issue

[97] As I see it, the question that arises for consideration is whether the clause that gives rise to unfair discrimination in the present will may be enforced in light of section 9 of the Constitution. The issue arises here because parties on both sides agree that the impugned clause unfairly discriminates against women. Proceeding from this common cause fact, the applicants ask that, by order of the court, the will be amended by deleting certain words and replacing them with words which are not discriminatory against women.

[98] But before I address the question, I need to clarify one matter. This is the conflation of the public policy claim with the equality claim in the judgment of the High Court and to some extent in the first judgment. These are discrete claims with distinct elements. For example, in an equality claim the complaint is that the right to equality is violated, and not the value of equality. Whereas in a public policy claim the complaint is that certain conduct is contrary to the value of equality. With regard to the latter, the justification analysis under section 36 of the Constitution is inapposite because that section applies to a limitation of rights and not to what is inconsistent with values. Departing from this erroneous premise, the High Court mistakenly defined the issue before it as being whether "the impugned provision of clause 7 of the will, can be justified under the limitation clause in section 36 of the Constitution".[165]

[99] This was plainly in error. Section 36 expressly prescribes that rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application. Clause 7 of the will we are concerned with is not a law, let alone a law of general application. This simply means that clause 7 cannot constitute a limitation that is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. But this was not the only error committed by the High Court. In the section 36 justification analysis undertaken by that Court, it appears that the Court understood the limitation it was dealing with to have been a limitation of the right to freedom of testation.

[165] High Court judgment above n 5 at para 71.

[100] The High Court stated:

> "In applying the limitation test it is significant that two of the three values mentioned in section 36, human dignity and freedom, are engaged when exercising one's right to freedom of testation. The right to equality or to equal treatment, although fundamental, is a broadly stated right and must, in appropriate instances, give way to competing rights.
>
> As far as the importance of the limitation is concerned, no material has been placed before the court to indicate whether similar discriminatory provisions in private wills are a commonplace problem which justifies such a potentially far-reaching limitation. The envisaged limitation, namely, that one cannot dispose of one's property without first complying with an equality equation, would make a significant inroad upon the right to freedom of testation and may well produce unintended consequences, including those referred to above.
>
> . . .
>
> Whilst the relationship between the limitation of the right to freedom of testation in the present matter and its purpose is clear, it is difficult to conceive of a less restrictive means to achieve the purpose."[166]

[101] Relying on the minority judgment in De Lange,[167] the High Court held that because the discrimination occurred in "the private and limited sphere of testators and their direct descendants", the discrimination "effected by clause 7 of the will is reasonable and justifiable, particularly given the importance accorded to the right to freedom of testation."[168]

[166] Id at paras 73 and 76.

[167] De Lange v Presiding Bishop of the Methodist Church of Southern Africa for the time being [2015] ZACC 35; 2016 (2) SA 1 (CC); 2016 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[168] High Court judgment above n 5 at paras 75 and 80.

[102] It may well be that the High Court was inaccurate in the articulation of its reasons. What in effect it wanted to say was that the limitation on the applicants' equality right was brought about by the principle of freedom of testation and that clause 7 was authorised by that principle. If this was what the High Court intended to say, the question is whether the requirements of section 36 of the Constitution are satisfied.

[103] But the High Court defined the core issue that confronted it in these terms:

> "[T]he question must be whether public policy has advanced to the extent that courts should be empowered to act as the final arbiter of whether a testator may discriminate, even unfairly so, in his or her private will."[169]

[104] This definition of the real issue as seen by the High Court was influenced by the minority reasoning in De Lange which the High Court understood to be saying courts should not interfere in "people's private lives and personal preferences".[170] It was in this context that the High Court concluded that, even if it were to be assumed in favour of the applicants that they had a right to be treated equally with the testator's male descendants, the unfair discrimination that they were subjected to by clause 7 of the will was reasonable and justifiable.[171]

[105] It is unfortunate that, despite all these missteps in the High Court's judgment, the Supreme Court of Appeal merely issued an order dismissing the appeal to it without reasons.[172] This unusual approach in disposing of an appeal meant that the Supreme Court of Appeal endorsed the reasons of the High Court. Courts are under a duty to give reasons

[169] Id at para 78.

[170] Id at para 75; De Lange above n 167 at para 79.

[171] Id at para 80.

[172] The order was issued by Cachalia JA (with Tshiqi JA, Saldulker JA, Mokgohloa AJA, and Mothle AJA concurring).

for their decisions and here the Supreme Court of Appeal has failed to discharge that obligation.

[106] In Mphahlele this Court affirmed this principle and stated:

> "There is no express constitutional provision which requires Judges to furnish reasons for their decisions. Nonetheless, in terms of section 1 of the Constitution, the rule of law is one of the founding values of our democratic state, and the Judiciary is bound by it. The rule of law undoubtedly requires Judges not to act arbitrarily and to be accountable. The manner in which they ordinarily account for their decisions is by furnishing reasons. This serves a number of purposes. It explains to the parties, and to the public at large which has an interest in courts being open and transparent, why a case is decided as it is. It is a discipline which curbs arbitrary judicial decisions. Then, too, it is essential for the appeal process, enabling the losing party to take an informed decision as to whether or not to appeal or, where necessary, seek leave to appeal. It assists the appeal Court to decide whether or not the order of the lower court is correct. And finally, it provides guidance to the public in respect of similar matters. It may well be, too, that where a decision is subject to appeal it would be a violation of the constitutional right of access to courts if reasons for such a decision were to be withheld by a judicial officer."[173]

[107] Courts of appeal may not furnish reasons only where they decide an application for leave to appeal. Here leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal was granted by the High Court. This illustrates that the High Court was persuaded that another court might come to a different conclusion. In these circumstances, the Supreme Court of Appeal was not excused from giving reasons for its order.

[108] It is now convenient to consider the claims presented to the High Court by the applicants.

[173] Mphahlele v First National Bank of SA Ltd [1999] ZACC 1; 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC); 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC) at para 12.

[109] The first claim was brought by the first applicant, Mr James King, in his capacity as the executor in the deceased's estate. Mr King is an attorney by profession. The will under which he was appointed executor was that of the late Mr Kalvyn de Jager who died in 2015. In his lifetime, the deceased had inherited and became co-owner of half of the undivided shares in the farms Nieuwdrift Nr 88, Doornkuil and Buffelsdrift Nr 260, all of which are located in the district of Oudtshoorn. But the deceased's co-ownership was subject to the fideicommissum in clause 7 of the will of the deceased's grandparents.

[110] These farms had been inherited by the deceased's father as a fiduciary heir. And upon the death of the deceased's father in 1957, these properties were inherited by the deceased and his two brothers in equal shares, as fiduciary heirs. When one of the deceased's brothers died with no children, his share in the properties devolved in equal shares between the deceased and his other surviving brother. This meant that the deceased and his surviving brother, Mr John de Jager, held equal half shares in the farms in question. The title deed reflected this and stipulated that each share was subject to clause 7 of the grandparents' will.

[111] Clause 7 of that will reads:

> "With respect to the bequest of grounds/land to their sons and daughters, as referred to under Clauses 1, 2, 3, and 4 of this, their Testament, it is the will and desire of the appearers that such grounds/land will devolve, following the death of their children, to said children's sons and following the death of the said grandsons again and in turn to their sons, in such a way that, in the case of the death of any son or son's son who does not leave a male descendant, his share/portion will fall away on the same conditions as above and therefore pass to his brothers or their sons in their place and in the case of the death of a grandson without any brothers, to the other Fidei Commissaire heirs from the lineage of the sons of the appearers by representation, in continuity, and in the case of the death of a daughter or a daughter's son without leaving a male descendant, her or his share will fall away in the same way and on the same conditions, and go to the other daughters or their sons, by representation, or the deceased's son's brothers or their sons per stirpes, respectively. And > they stipulate furthermore that none of their heirs down to the third generation will renounce, by leasing, donating, selling, or in any other way whatsoever, his (or in the first generation, her) life right or any interest therein/on and should any heir who is subject to the Fidei Commissum, attempt such renunciation, or should such life right or any interest therein be arrested or be seized under the order/sentence of a court or as a result of insolvency of the person to whom the above belongs, then his right will, with immediate effect take an end and will be accepted by the hereinafter appointed administrators, who will, as they deem fit and at their discretion, from time to time, pay out the fruits thereof to such person, or invest said capital until his death when the said amount will devolve, together with the grounds/land, to the nearest and next heir in line."

[112] In terms of this clause, the fideicommissary property was supposed to pass from the deceased and his brother to their respective sons only. Indeed, when Mr John de Jager died in 2005, his half share was inherited by his three sons[174] who are the first to third respondents in these proceedings. They were cited as such in the High Court.

[113] The deceased had 5 children at the time of his death in 2015. They are Ms Trudene Forward; Ms Annelie Jordaan; Ms Elna Slabber; Ms Kalene Roux; and Ms Surina Serfontein. All of them are females. And in terms of clause 7 of the grandparents' will, the fideicommissary property that was held by their father could not devolve upon them for the sole reason that they were not sons. Yet in terms of the deceased's will, his five daughters inherited equally from his estate, including the fideicommissary property.

[114] The executor was then confronted by competing claims from the deceased's daughters, on the one hand, and the sons of the deceased's brother, on the other. The claim by the deceased's daughters was based on his will. While the claim by the sons of his brother was based on clause 7 of the grandparents' will which stipulated that on the deceased's death his share shall fall away and devolve upon the sons of the deceased's brother, just like the share of the deceased's brother who died childless devolved on the deceased and his surviving brother. This was because the deceased had no sons.

[174] These sons were Mr Cornelius Albertus de Jager, Mr Johannes Frederick de Jager, and Mr Arnoldus Johannes de Jager.

[115] As the executor of the deceased's estate, the first applicant was advised to seek guidance from the High Court on who are the rightful heirs of the fideicommissary property. He instituted an application for a declaratory order. But he expressed a view that clause 7 unfairly discriminated against female descendants of the grandparents and therefore could not be enforced on the ground that it was contrary to public policy.

[116] The deceased's daughters joined the proceedings as second to sixth applicants. They did so both in their capacities as claimants and co-executors under the deceased's will. They cited the sons of the deceased's brother as the first to third respondents, the latter parties had laid claim to the fideicommissary property in terms of clause 7. The fourth to eighth respondents are sons of the deceased's daughters, the second to sixth applicants. The latter group had claimed that, as grandsons of the deceased, they were entitled to inherit his share, if their mothers' claims were not successful. They too sought to base their claim on clause 7.

[117] Each group of these claimants sought a decision in their favour from the High Court. The case pleaded by the deceased's daughters was two-fold. First, they supported the contention by the first applicant, the executor, that clause 7 was against public policy. Second, they contended that the clause violated their right to equality which is guaranteed by section 9 of the Constitution. Consequently, they asked the Court to invalidate the discriminatory terms of clause 7 and replace them with terms that cover both male and female descendants of the testators.

[118] For their part, the sons of the deceased's brother asserted that on a proper interpretation of clause 7, the fideicommissary property must devolve on them. They argued that in the past the clause was given the interpretation they were advancing. This interpretation benefited the deceased and their father on the occasion of the death of an uncle who had no children. They argued that the testators' intention was manifestly that the fideicommissary property would remain in the De Jager family for three generations, devolving upon grandsons and great-grandsons. And where a fiduciary heir has left no son, their share would devolve upon his surviving brothers or their sons if a brother has died before that fiduciary heir. This, they argued, was the wish of the testators and it must be respected.

[119] Having considered a number of decisions on the relevant topics, the High Court concluded that clause 7 was not contrary to public policy. That Court also rejected the equality claim on the ground that the unfair discrimination imposed by clause 7 was reasonable and justifiable under section 36 of the Constitution. It will be recalled that the High Court took the view that the unfair discrimination complained of occurred "in the private and limited sphere of testators and their direct descendants", and thus it affected a limited number of persons for a limited duration.

[120] The High Court proceeded to consider the alternative claim by the sons of the deceased's daughters and concluded that they have failed to make out a proper case for the relief sought. Consequently, the application was dismissed with no order as to costs.

[121] For reasons which are not apparent from the judgment, the High Court failed to determine and declare who of the three groups was entitled to receive the fideicommissary property, as requested by the executor of the deceased's estate. That issue remains unresolved and the Supreme Court of Appeal did not consider it necessary to determine the issue, even though guidance was required by the executor.

[122] At the heart of the process of determining who is entitled to the fideicommissary property is clause 7 of the will. The answer to this question depends on whether the discriminatory part of the clause is presently enforceable.

Is clause 7 enforceable?

[123] The testator's testamentary freedom finds expression in her ability to dispose of her property in whatever manner she considers necessary. It is the freedom of testation right that entitles a testator to put in place whatever conditions she likes upon the disposal of her property by means of a will. And her wishes must be respected and enforced subject to one fundamental condition. That is whatever method she may choose, in the exercise of freedom of testation, must not be unlawful or contrary to public policy.

[124] Therefore, it cannot be gainsaid that freedom of testation, as a right, is protected in our law. It is protected not only because it forms part of our common law, but also because it advances the values of freedom and dignity which are the foundation of the Constitution, our supreme law.[175] The importance of freedom of testation to our law of succession was affirmed by this Court in Moosa N.O.[176]

[125] But freedom of testation, important as it is, is not a licence for testators to act unlawfully. This means that a testator may not dispose of her property in a will or trust deed by unlawful methods. Nor can she impose unlawful conditions. If she does any of these things, she renders the will unenforceable to the extent of the unlawfulness. This is because a testator cannot, after departing from this world, do what she could not achieve in her lifetime. The right of ownership, of which freedom of testation forms part, entitles the owner to do as she pleases with her property, as long as what she chooses to do is permissible under the law.

[126] In Harvey, the Supreme Court of Appeal captured this principle in these words:

[175] Syfrets above n 29 and BOE Trust Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 60.

[176] Moosa above n 124 at para 18.

> "The right of ownership permits an owner to do with her thing as she pleases, provided that it is permitted by the law. The right to dispose of the thing is central to the concept of ownership and is a deeply entrenched principle of our common law. Disposing of one's property by means of executing a will or trust deed are manifestations of the right of ownership. The same holds true under the Constitution."[177]

[127] Even before the Constitution came into force, unlawful terms of a will or trust deed were unenforceable on the ground that it was contrary to public policy for a court to enforce unlawful acts.[178] This was a principle of the common law which remains good law even today. But now the principle is reinforced by the Constitution which declares that any law or conduct which is inconsistent with it, is invalid.[179] The supremacy clause of the Constitution together with section 172(1) impose a duty on courts to uphold the Constitution.[180]

[128] This obligation entails that a court may not enforce a will or trust deed which is inconsistent with the Constitution. Instead, such will or trust deed must be declared invalid to the extent of its inconsistency with the Constitution. This means that if clause 7 of the will we are dealing with here is inconsistent with the Constitution, it cannot be enforced and it must be declared invalid.

[177] Harvey above n 20 at para 56.

[178] Cool Ideas v 1186 CC Hubbard [2014] ZACC 16; 2014 (4) SA 474 (CC); 2014 (8) BCLR 869 (CC).

[179] Section 2 of the Constitution provides:

> "This Constitution is the supreme law of the Republic; law or conduct inconsistent with it is invalid, and the obligations imposed by it must be fulfilled."

[180] Section 172(1) of the Constitution provides:

> "When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court
>
> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
>
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including—
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect."

Inconsistency

[129] It is not in dispute that clause 7 limited inheritance of the fideicommissary property to male descendants, to the exclusion of female descendants of the testators. What this illustrates is that, beyond the first generation of the descendants of the original testators, the late Mrs Catherine Dorothea de Jager and the late Mr Carel Johannes Cornelius de Jager, the clause denied female descendants the benefit of inheriting the property. This denial on its own does not lead to an inconsistency with the Constitution, because it may constitute legitimate differentiation when account is taken of the testator's freedom of testation and the fact that no descendants had a right to inherit any of the fideicommissary property.

[130] Even if the denial amounted to discrimination, it would still not be inconsistent with the Constitution. This is because the Constitution does not prohibit fair discrimination. The inconsistency would arise if the discrimination is unfair to the second to sixth applicants. And this enquiry may be determined with reference to the specific facts of this case. Since the discrimination was based on gender, one of the grounds listed in section 9(3),[181] the applicants were assisted by the presumption in section 9(5)[182] in establishing that clause 7 creates unfair discrimination.

[131] This presumption shifted the burden to the first to third respondents to show that the discrimination in question was fair. These respondents have failed to do this. In fact, they admitted that clause 7 had caused unfair discrimination. This admission is crucial to the

[181] Section 9(3) of the Constitution provides:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[182] Section 9(5) provides:

> "Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

adjudication of this case. It means that the question whether the clause in question is inconsistent with the Constitution must be assessed on the basis that the clause unfairly discriminated against the second to sixth applicants.

[132] Section 9(4) of the Constitution is vital to the enquiry. It provides:

> "No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination."

[133] Plainly, this provision prohibits every person, including a testator, from unfairly discriminating against another person on one or more of the grounds listed in section 9(3). Evidently this restricts the scope of the right of freedom of testation. In exercising the right to dispose of her property, a testator may not unfairly discriminate against another person. If the manner in which the testator chooses to dispose of her property or the conditions she imposes on that disposal constitutes unfair discrimination against any person, her will becomes inconsistent with section 9(4) of the Constitution.

[134] In addition, the terms of a will must not violate the prohibition against unfair discrimination in the legislation contemplated in section 9(4) of the Constitution. It is not in dispute that the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act is such legislation. This Act prohibits unfair discrimination in general and specific terms. Section 6 stipulates that no person may unfairly discriminate against another person, whereas section 8 provides that no person may unfairly discriminate against another person on the ground of gender, including on the specific grounds listed in that section.

[135] The High Court rejected the assertion that clause 7 was unlawful as it violated section 8 of the Act, on the basis that section 8(c) refers to "the system of preventing women from inheriting family property". The High Court reasoned that clause 7 does not constitute a system in terms of which women were prevented from inheriting family property.[183] While it may be true that the clause does not amount to a system, it cannot be gainsaid that the clause prevented female descendants of the testators from inheriting the fideicommissary property of the De Jager family.

[136] The overly narrow interpretation of section 8 by the High Court is not supported by the scheme and the language of section 8. First, section 8 expressly states that it is subject to section 6 which provides for an overriding general prohibition against unfair discrimination based on gender. The reach of section 8 is not limited to the specific bases listed in section 8(a) to (i). This is so because the opening words of the section state that "no person may unfairly discriminate against any person on the ground of gender, including…". Then specific bases are listed. Properly construed, section 8 prohibits any unfair discrimination on the ground of gender, regardless of whether the discrimination is on the listed bases or not. The prohibition against unfair discrimination on the ground of gender is not limited but includes the listed bases. That this is so is made plain by New Nation Movement where, quoting from New Clicks,[184] this Court held that "[o]rdinarily, 'the terms "including" or "includes" are not terms of exhaustive definition but terms of extension'".[185]

[137] Consequently, the High Court erred in concluding that clause 7 does not violate section 8 of the Act. It does, and as a result, the clause is unlawful. It is this unlawfulness which renders clause 7 unenforceable, regardless of whether the unlawfulness stems from the inconsistency with section 9(4) of the Constitution or from a violation of section 8 of the Act. From time immemorial, our courts have declined to enforce clauses of wills or wills that are unlawful or contrary to public policy. It appears to me that public policy requires no development in this regard.

[183] High Court judgment above n 5 at para 53.

[184] Minister of Health v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd (Treatment Action Campaign as Amicus Curiae) (New Clicks) [2005] ZACC 14; 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC); 2006 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 455.

[185] New Nation Movement NPC v President of the Republic of South Africa [2020] ZACC 11; 2020 (6) SA 257 (CC); 2020 (8) BCLR 950 (CC) at para 23.

[138] However, the first to third respondents have argued that when the unfair discrimination in issue here is subjected to a justification analysis in terms of section 36 of the Constitution, it is reasonable and justifiable. With regard to the claim based on public policy, there is no merit in this submission. As mentioned, a section 36 analysis applies to a limitation of a right in the Bill of Rights. It is not applicable to a case of unlawfulness which renders conduct unenforceable on the ground that enforcing it would be contrary to public policy.

[139] For a number of reasons, the proposition that the unfair discrimination arising from clause 7 is reasonable and justifiable, as contemplated in section 36, is misconceived. First, the invalidity attack mounted by the applicants here is not directed at a piece of legislation but at a clause in a will. The first to third respondents, in an attempt to ward off that claim, did not assert that the unfair discrimination complained of was imposed by a particular law and that it was a reasonable and justifiable limitation in terms of section 36. Instead, they contended that the impugned clause expresses the intention of the testators to keep the fideicommissary property in the De Jager family and as a result, it must be enforced, as it had been previously.[186]

[140] Had the respondents relied on a law to justify the unfair discrimination, I have no doubt that the focus of the challenge would have been directed at that law. Then, and only then, would the section 36 standard be applicable. It will be recalled that section 36 permits limitation of rights in the Bill of Rights only if the limitation is imposed by a law of general application. Indeed, it is clear from Harksen[187] that the test it lays down applies to an attack against a legal provision or an executive decision. In that matter, this Court said:

[186] High Court judgment above n 5 at paras 22-4.

> "Where section 8 is invoked to attack a legislative provision or executive conduct on the ground that it differentiates between people or categories of people in a manner that amounts to unequal treatment or unfair discrimination, the first enquiry must be directed to the question as to whether the impugned provision does differentiate between people or categories of people. If it does so differentiate, then in order not to fall foul of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution there must be a rational connection between the differentiation in question and the legitimate governmental purpose it is designed to further or achieve. If it is justified in that way, then it does not amount to a breach of section 8(1)."[188]

[141] But even if the Harksen test were to apply and that there was a limitation imposed by a law of general application, the respondent's argument would still face considerable difficulties. It is doubtful that unfair discrimination which is expressly prohibited by section 9(4) of the Constitution may constitute a reasonable and justifiable limitation under section 36 of the Constitution. If these two provisions of the Constitution were to be read this way, a conflict between them would arise. What is unlawful under one provision would be lawful under the other. It is a well-established principle of our law that the Constitution must be read harmoniously.[189] In addition, on the respondents' argument, a further conflict will be created between the law that imposes unfair discrimination as a limitation and the legislation envisaged in section 9(4). And for the unfair discrimination to withstand scrutiny, the former must prevail over the latter. Here this would mean that the common law trumps the statute. This does not accord with the principle that in the case of conflict, a statute takes precedence over the common law. However, it is not necessary to determine this issue definitively in this matter.

[187] Harksen above n 49 at para 54.

[188] Id at para 43.

[189] Doctors for Life International v Speaker of the National Assembly [2006] ZACC 11; 2006 (6) SA 416 (CC); 2006 (12) BCLR 1399 (CC) at para 48 and United Democratic Movement v President of the Republic of South Africa (African Christian Democratic Party intervening; Institute for Democracy in South Africa as amicus curiae) (No 2) [2002] ZACC 21; 2003 (1) SA 495 (CC); 2002 (11) BCLR 1179 (CC) at para 83.

[142] The second reason that renders the respondents' argument untenable is that the applicants were obliged by the principle of constitutional subsidiarity to base their challenge on the Act. Under the Act, which outlaws unfair discrimination, the applicant is merely required to prove that the conduct challenged amounts to discrimination.[190] He or she is not required to show that indeed the discrimination is unfair. The burden of proof shifts to the respondent who must refute that the discrimination has occurred or that it is unfair. Discrimination which is based on one of the prohibited grounds under the Act is presumed unfair unless the respondent shows that it is fair. Gender is one of the prohibited grounds.

[143] In terms of the Act, once a court is satisfied that unfair discrimination has occurred, the claim must succeed. There is no room for a justification analysis. Here the first to third respondents have conceded that clause 7 unfairly discriminated against the second to sixth applicants. This admission should have driven the High Court to the conclusion that clause

[190] Section 13 of the Act provides:

> "(1) If the complainant makes out a prima facie case of discrimination—
>
> (a) the respondent must prove, on the facts before the court, that the discrimination did not take place as alleged; or
>
> (b) the respondent must prove that the conduct is not based on one or more of the prohibited grounds.
>
> (2) If the discrimination did take place—
>
> (a) on a ground in paragraph (a) of the definition of 'prohibited grounds', then it is unfair, unless the respondent proves that the discrimination is fair;
>
> (b) on a ground in paragraph (b) of the definition of 'prohibited grounds', then it is unfair—
>
> (i) if one or more of the conditions set out in paragraph (b) of the definition of 'prohibited grounds' is established; and
>
> (ii) unless the respondent proves that the discrimination is fair."

7 was unenforceable and that an appropriate order was warranted.[191] In each case where it is claimed that the testator in her will has discriminated against someone, a careful analysis will be essential to determine whether the discrimination was indeed unfair. But where, as here, the unfairness of the discrimination is conceded, the need to decide this issue falls away. In that event, the consequence would be that the discriminatory clauses are unenforceable.

[144] It bears emphasis that in our law, no one has a right to inherit the testator's property. This includes her children. And the testator is free to dispose of her estate in a will in whatever way she wishes, provided that she does not breach the law or public policy. When these principles are kept in mind, a bequeath to some, and not all, of the testator's children does not without more constitute unfair discrimination and cannot be rendered ineffective unless it is established that the will creates unfair discrimination.

[145] The fact that the will we are dealing with was executed in 1902, long before the Constitution and the Act came into operation, is immaterial. Both of them are rendered applicable to this matter by the fact that the first to third respondents seek to enforce clause 7 of the will now. The testators had intended the clause to continue to apply until the third generation of heirs has inherited the fideicommissary property. With regard to this matter, that could only take place upon the deceased's death in 2015.

Remedy

[146] The applicants had asked the High Court not only to declare that the discriminatory terms of clause 7 were not enforceable, but also that those terms be excised from the clause and replaced with non-discriminatory ones. Because the High Court did not consider the clause to be contrary to public policy and the Constitution, it did not reach the severance and reading-in remedies sought by the applicants. Generally, our courts are reluctant to change the terms of a will or trust deed. The rationale being that courts are not there to make wills for testators. And that freedom of testation, the foundation of our law of succession, is so important that once the intention of the testator is established effect must be given to it.[192]

[191] Section 21 of the Act empowers a court to make an appropriate order if unfair discrimination is established.

[147] While this proposition may be true, it is not the alpha and omega of our law of succession. The respect enjoyed by the testator's intention depends on whether that intention was exercised within the confines of the law. Even at common law, wills which are contrary to public policy, whether they contain unlawful, improper or indecent terms, are not enforceable despite the intention of the testator.[193] And unfair discriminatory terms may be added to this list.[194]

[148] However, our courts have drawn a distinction between public and private trusts. In the case of public trusts, courts have been willing to amend the trust deed to remove terms that are unfairly discriminatory.[195] It appears from the reasoning in both Syfrets and Emma Smith that the distinction lies on the premise from which the courts departed. This is evident in Syfrets where it was stated:

> "What also serves to 'outweigh' the principle of freedom of testation, is the fact that one is dealing, in this instance, with an 'element of State action', in the sense that 'the institution appointed to distribute the rewards of the testator's beneficence' is a public agency or quasi-public body, i.e. the university. As Du Toit points out:
>
> > 'State action renders the distribution practice of such an institution with regard to the proceeds of a charitable bequest open to a constitutional

[192] Ex parte Kruger 1976 (1) SA 609 (O); Ex parte Jewish Colonial Trust Ltd: In re Estate Nathan 1967 (4) SA 397 (N); Jewish Colonial Trust above n 65; Ex parte Trustees Estate Loewenthal 1939 TPD 250.

[193] Syfrets above n 29. See also William Marsh above n 43 at 703C-704.

[194] Emma Smith above n 53 and Syfrets above n 29 at para 47.

[195] Syfrets id.

> challenge simply on the ground that the Constitution prohibits the State from conducting discriminatory practices.'
>
> Moreover, a trust, though usually created by a private individual or group, is an institution of public concern. This is a fortiori the position with regard to a charitable trust such as the present trust.
>
> Based on the foregoing analysis, I conclude that the testamentary provisions in question constitute unfair discrimination and, as such, are contrary to public policy as reflected in the foundational constitutional values of non-racialism, non-sexism and equality. It follows, in my judgment, that this Court is empowered, in terms of the existing principles of the common law, to order variation of the trust deed in question by deleting the offending provisions from the will."[196]

[149] Building on this reasoning, the Supreme Court of Appeal in Emma Smith said:

> "The curators contended that the amendment of the will would interfere with freedom of testation which, they argued, is not only a fundamental principle of the law of succession but also part of the fundamental right not to be deprived of property in an unjustifiable fashion. The constitutional imperative to remove racially restrictive clauses that conflict with public policy from the conditions of an educational trust intended to benefit prospective students in need and administered by a publicly funded educational institution such as the University, must surely take precedence over freedom of testation, particularly given the fundamental values of our Constitution and the constitutional imperative to move away from our racially divided past. Given the rationale set out above, it does not amount to unlawful deprivation of property."[197]

[150] It is evident from both these cases that the relevant courts, although they referred to the Constitution and its values, put on their common law lens in search for a remedy for a breach of the Constitution. This has resulted in drawing this difference that lacks substance. A public trust deed or will that violates the values of the Constitution or one of its provisions has the same impact as a private trust deed or will in breach of the same provisions. Both of them are inconsistent with the Constitution and the supremacy of the Constitution renders them both equally invalid.

[196] Syfrets above n 29 at paras 45-7.

[197] Emma Smith above n 53 at para 42.

[151] To hold otherwise would subvert the supremacy of the Constitution and would suggest that the Constitution does not reach individual conduct in the private sphere, despite the horizontal application of the Bill of Rights.

[152] In Harvey, the Supreme Court of Appeal substantiated the distinction between public and private testaments in these terms:

> "There is much to be said for public trusts being judged more strictly than private trusts. Unlike the dispositions in Canada Trust and Curators, Emma Smith Educational Fund, we are concerned here with what occurs in the private and limited sphere of the donor and his direct family. It affects a limited number of people, is of limited duration and is not manifestly discriminatory. Nor, can it be said that at the time when the deed was executed it was intended to infringe the dignity of the second and third appellants."[198]

[153] I cannot endorse this reasoning. It is difficult for me to appreciate how the sphere where the violation of the Constitution occurs can justify the breach and render valid what is invalid in the eyes of the Constitution. I do not think that freedom of testation empowers a testator to violate the rights of members of his or her family by unfairly discriminating against them. Lest I be misunderstood, the Constitution does not require the testator to treat his or her family equally when gifting them with his or her property. Nor does it oblige him or her to leave any of his or her assets to them. They too have no entitlement to his or her property. But what the Constitution prohibits is unfair discrimination on the part of the testator when disposing of his or her property.

[198] Harvey above n 20 at para 62.

[154] The fact that a testator may have decided to exclude some of her children from inheriting her property does not, without more, amount to a breach of the Constitution or public policy. Nor does the fact that she may have bequeathed the property to them in unequal shares or had decided to disinherit all her children. The Constitution does not oblige testators to treat their children equally. So long as what she had done, in disposing of her property by a will, does not constitute unfair discrimination, it is permitted by freedom of testation if she had acted within the law.

[155] Therefore, differentiation or even discrimination that arises from the terms of a will does not violate the Constitution as long as it does not constitute unfair discrimination. This is so because section 9(4) of the Constitution forbids unfair discrimination by one person against the other. In addition, this provision outlaws unfair discrimination that is based on one of the grounds listed in section 9(3). Consequently, a party that impugns the validity of a will on the basis of discrimination must establish that the discrimination complained of is unfair or that it is based on a listed ground, if reliance is placed on section 9(4) or a relevant provision of the Act.

[156] Here both these issues have been established. Clause 7 discriminates against the second to sixth applicants on the basis of gender. And the first to third respondents have admitted that the discrimination is unfair. Consequently, the clause is in breach of section 8 of the Act and as a result it is unlawful. As an unlawful clause it is unenforceable. There is nothing controversial in this proposition, even if it is looked at through the lens of the common law. Since time immemorial, unlawfulness has been recognised as one of the limitations to the exercise of freedom of testation. During the Group Areas Act of the apartheid era, if a testator were to leave her immovable property, situated in an area reserved for whites, to a black person, that testament would be unenforceable on the basis of unlawfulness. The fact that this would have occurred in a private and limited sphere of one testator and that it affected only one beneficiary would not have saved it from invalidity.

[157] Accordingly, the distinction drawn by the courts below between public and private testaments is artificial and cannot be sustained, especially where the challenge is based on the Constitution. Moreover, the search for the appropriate remedy in such matters must be informed by the Constitution itself. This is because section 172(1) of the Constitution, as mentioned, obliges courts to declare that conduct which is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid. In addition, these courts are empowered to make orders that are just and equitable. Justice and equity require that the interests of parties affected by the order must be taken into account.

[158] But in the present matter the position is that clause 7 which contains the fideicommissary condition is invalid for being contrary to public policy. In our law the effect of this invalidity is that the bequest to the deceased which this clause purported to regulate is regarded as having been without a condition.[199] What this means is that the property concerned was transferred to the deceased, as a fiduciary unburdened with conditions. Therefore, it formed part of his estate that was subject to the will he had executed and in terms of which he had bequeathed that property to the applicants.

[159] This common law principle was lucidly articulated in Levy. With reference to common law authorities, on the point Price J distilled the principle that a fideicommissum condition that is contrary to law or public policy is treated pro non scripto (as if it was never written) and the heir under the will concerned succeeds unconditionally.[200] This position is altered only where the deletion of the condition renders the remaining bequest meaningless. Here that is not the position. It is clear from the will that the testators wished to keep the fideicommissary property in the hands of their male descendants until the third generation.

[199] De Wayer v SPCA Johannesburg 1963 (1) SA 71 (T) and Levy above n 37. See also De Waal, Erasmus, Gauntlett and Wiechers "Wills and Succession, Administration of Deceased Estates and Trusts" in Joubert LAWSA, 2 ed (Lexis Nexis, Durban 2011) 31 at 356.

[200] Levy id at 937-8.

[160] The applicants' father received it as such heir and on condition that upon his death, it will pass to his male children. The applicants' father and his brother were the last generation on whom the offensive condition applied. The interim Constitution which came into effect in April 1994 brought about a change to the principles of law relating to public policy. This impacted on the validity of clause 7 which became contrary to public policy. As from April 1994, clause 7 was pro-non scripto in the eyes of the common law, as amended by the interim Constitution which changed public policy. Consequently the relevant property, which was still in the hands of the applicants' father, was free of the offending condition and formed part of his estate. Like all his assets, it became the subject of his will upon his death in 2015.

[161] In the special circumstances of the present matter, the application of the common law rule leads to a just and equitable outcome. This is because the respondents had already received the other half of the property from their own father. It would be unjust for them to be entitled to the half that was held by the applicants' father, over and above what they had already obtained

Costs

[162] While the applicants are successful in this Court, I do not think that the principle that costs follow the result is appropriate for the present matter. None of the parties is responsible for the offensive clause in the will and the legal position regarding its enforcement under the Constitution was not clear. Therefore, it became necessary for the courts to be approached to give clarity. It seems to me here that since the testator's estate was wound up a long time ago, it will not be fair to direct that costs be borne by the estate of the applicants' father. The applicants' father was not responsible for the offensive clause. However, his estate must pay costs of the first applicant who acted in his official capacity as an executor with no personal interest in the matter. In the present circumstances, it would be fair to make no order as to costs in respect of other parties.

Order

[163] In the present result the following order is made:

1. Leave to appeal is granted.
2. The appeal is upheld.
3. The orders granted by the High Court and Supreme Court of Appeal are set aside.
4. It is declared that clause 7 of the will of the late Mr Carel Johannes Cornelius De Jager and the late Mrs Catherine Dorothea de Jager dated 28 November 1902 is inconsistent with the Constitution and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000, and therefore unenforceable.
5. The costs of Mr James King shall be paid from the estate of Mr Kalvyn de Jager.
6. There shall be no order as to costs in respect of other parties.

VICTOR AJ

Introduction

[164] I have had the pleasure of reading the judgment of my sister Mhlantla J (first judgment). Her judgment highlights that the law of testation reinforces patriarchal and "outdated ideas concerning sex, gender, property, ownership, family structures and norms."[201] I have also had the privilege of considering the judgment of my brother Jafta J (second judgment) who sees no need for the development of the common law because wills contrary to public policy have never been enforceable and thus there is no need to revisit this aspect.

[165] I have benefited from reading both judgments. Why a separate concurrence then with the second judgment? While I agree with the outcome proposed in the second judgment and broadly its reasons, I arrive at the same conclusion from a somewhat multi layered perspective. I endorse the second judgment's conclusion that the common law does not have to be developed, but would rather emphasise the principle of constitutional subsidiarity because of the Equality Act. The Equality Act was promulgated in compliance with section 9(4) of the Constitution and thus constitutes a direct reflection of our public policy on furthering the needs of our constitutional democracy in terms of our fundamental vision of equality. It is within this framework that freedom of testation must be analysed. I would also add further reasons regarding the implementation and interpretation of the Equality Act based on a more constitutionally transformative basis. The applicants also rely to some extent on the Equality Act. They bemoan the fact that the High Court failed to fully interrogate the application of the provisions of section 8(d) of the Equality Act in the context of this matter.[202]

[166] In what follows, I will discuss the need to revisit the principle of freedom of testation in light of the obligation to ensure substantive equality. I will be guided by the principles of transformative constitutionalism to this end.

[201] First judgment at [79].

[202] Section 8(d) of the Equality provide as follows:

> "Prohibition of unfair discrimination on ground of gender.—Subject to section 6, no person may unfairly discriminate against any person on the ground of gender, including—
>
> (d) any practice, including traditional, customary or religious practice, which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men, including the undermining of the dignity and well-being of the girl child."

[167] In applying the principles of the Equality Act it is incumbent on every court to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[203] My concurrence is therefore directed at focusing on the Equality Act and how it should be interpreted in a more robust manner on the issue of testation based on transformative equality. My analysis considers the constitutional framework and section 9 of the Constitution as being the source of the right sought to be enforced without circumventing the Equality Act. The Equality Act seeks to regulate unfair discrimination and the adoption of positive measures in the public and private spheres.

[168] Unless there is a transformative constitutional approach taken by courts when equality rights are affected, the historical and insidious unequal distribution of wealth in South Africa will continue along various fault lines such as in this case, gender. A more robust understanding of substantive equality within our constitutional framework is necessary.[204] Public policy is now deeply rooted in the Constitution and its underlying values. This means that substantive equality must be evaluated within the realm of public policy. The majority in Barkhuizen held:

> "[T]he proper approach to the constitutional challenges to contractual terms is to determine whether the term challenged is contrary to public policy as evidenced by the constitutional values, in particular, those found in the Bill of Rights".[205]

[169] The concept of taking substantive equality seriously means that it should be a component of the public policy test and if necessary, a basis for restricting freedom of testation. This does not mean that testators can no longer elect to whom they wish to bequeath their property; the limitation would only arise if the bequest amounts to unfair discrimination based on a recognised ground such as gender. The purpose of the limitation would be to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination. It has been accepted that in a democratic society differentiation is permissible and even necessary.[206] However, differentiation becomes impermissible (and consequently results in unfair discrimination) when the right to equality and dignity of the person is violated.[207]

[203] Section 39(2) of the Constitution.

[204] See generally Albertyn "Contested Substantive Equality in the South African Constitution: Beyond Social Inclusion Towards Systemic Justice" (2018) 34 SAJHR 441.

[205] Barkhuizen above n 22 at para 30.

Direct or indirect application?

[170] The first judgment contends that the correct approach would be indirect application of the Bill of Rights because the question of whether the clauses of a will should be enforced is similar to the enforceability of contractual provisions. Relying on Barkhuizen, the first judgment argues that direct application of the Bill of Rights is inappropriate in the circumstances.

[171] On the other hand, the second judgment argues that there is no need for the development of the common law because wills contrary to public policy have never been enforceable. The second judgment contends that there is no need to revisit this test. What must rather be established is whether the provisions of this specific will should be enforced in light of section 9(4). The judgment goes through some lengths to explain why the High Court's approach of using a section 36 limitation analysis was wrong. I agree with these remarks. This is not a section 36 analysis.

[172] However, neither judgment answers the question whether direct or indirect application is warranted in these circumstances.

[206] Prinsloo v van der Linde [1997] ZACC 5; 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 24.

[207] Id at para 31.

[173] The starting point for the applicability of direct application is the case of Khumalo.[208] In that case this Court had to determine the question of horizontality and concluded that this question is determined primarily by section 8(2) and 8(3) of the Constitution.[209] Citing these provisions, the Court found that the right to freedom of expression was "of direct horizontal application" because of: (a) the intensity of the right; and (b) the potential invasion of the right by persons other than organs of state.[210]

[174] In Daniels,[211] this Court confirmed that the scheme of the Bill of Rights enables rights to be invoked against private parties in certain circumstances. Importantly, the Court made the following remarks in this regard:

> "I see no basis for reading the reference in section 8(2) to 'the nature of the duty imposed by the right' to mean, if a right in the Bill of Rights would have the effect of imposing a positive obligation, under no circumstances will it bind a natural or juristic person (private persons). Whether private persons will be bound depends on a number of factors. What is paramount includes: what is the nature of the right; what is the history behind the right; what does the right seek to achieve; how best can that be achieved; what is the 'potential of invasion of that right by persons other than the State or organs of state'; and, would letting private persons off the net not negate the essential content of the right? If, on weighing up all the relevant factors, we are led to the conclusion that private persons are not only bound but must in fact bear a positive obligation, we should not shy away from imposing it; section 8(2) does envisage that."[212]

[208] Khumalo above n 136.

[209] Id at paras 31-2.

[210] Id at para 33.

[211] Daniels v Scribante [2017] ZACC 13; 2017 (4) SA 341 (CC); 2017 (8) BCLR 949 (CC).

[212] Id at para 39.

[175] In the recent decision of Pridwin,[213] this Court endorsed this approach and confirmed that direct horizontal application is possible in certain circumstances. Importantly it remarked that:

> "In subjecting private power to constitutional control, section 8(2) recognises that private interactions have the potential to violate human rights and to perpetuate inequality and disadvantage."[214]

[176] Although the minority did not apply the same approach it similarly remarked on the importance of horizontal application by stating that "independent schools cannot be enclaves of power immune from constitutional obligations".[215]

[177] The majority went on to apply the Bill of Rights directly to the facts at hand and found that the right to a basic education and the best interests of the child principle necessitated that there be a fair process when an independent school decides to terminate a parent contract.[216] Notably, the majority opted not to follow the two-stage enquiry used for the enforcement of contracts as per Barkhuizen.[217] Instead, it used direct application. It based this conclusion in part on the basis that the rights in question formed an independent basis for a hearing that was separate from the contract itself and because a case for direct application had been pleaded by the parties.[218] Notably like in Pridwin, the applicants in this case have made out a case for direct application in their papers albeit via the Equality Act.

[213] Pridwin Preparatory School [2020] ZACC 12; 2020 (5) SA 327 (CC); 2020 (9) BCLR 1029 (CC).

[214] Id at para 131.

[215] Id at para 82.

[216] Id at paras 153 and 209.

[217] Barkhuizen above n 22 at paras 56-8.

[218] Pridwin above n 213 at para 130.

[178] Based on Pridwin and Daniels, it seems direct horizontal application is applicable here because of: (a) the intensity, history and nature of the right to equality and what it seeks to achieve – it is self-evidently applicable to private parties; (b) there is a danger that not reaching into the private sphere could "perpetuate inequality and disadvantage" and; (c) "letting private persons off the net" in these circumstances would "negate the essential content of the right" by undermining the constitutional goal of achieving substantive equality.

[179] The first judgment's reliance on Barkhuizen may need to be reconsidered. First, following from Pridwin, indirect application is not always the correct route, even in contract cases. Second, Barkhuizen concerned the right of access to courts which if relied on directly would pose certain conceptual difficulties. In this case, however, the impugned right is the right to equality. Section 9 is one of a few sections of the Constitution which mandates that national legislation be enacted to give effect to it. The Equality Act is such legislation.

[180] The present case presents a bit of a quandary. On the one hand, following precedent in Daniels and Pridwin, it seems that the requirements for direct application have been met and it would be defensible to invoke section 9(4) directly. This is countenanced furthermore by the fact that section 9(4) envisages special legislation to give effect to it. That makes this case distinct from cases in which this Court has gone the route of indirect application. On the other hand, this Court bears a duty under section 39(2) to develop the common law of freedom of testation to address the kinds of deficiencies that have been identified in the first judgment.[219]

[219] It should be noted furthermore that this Court has emphasised that when the common law is found to be deficient there is a duty on courts to develop it in line with section 39(2). See Carmichele above n 75 at para 39 where this Court said:

> "It needs to be stressed that the obligation of Courts to develop the common law, in the context of the section 39(2) objectives, is not purely discretionary. On the contrary, it is implicit in section 39(2) read with section 173 that where the common law as it stands is deficient in promoting the [181] There is a seeming tension that must be resolved based on the principle of constitutional subsidiarity, which I address next.

Constitutional subsidiarity

[182] In My Vote Counts, Cameron J in a minority judgment defined the principle of subsidiarity as being "the norm that a litigant cannot directly invoke the Constitution to extract a right he or she seeks to enforce without first relying on, or attacking the constitutionality of, legislation enacted to give effect to that right".[220] It also "denotes a hierarchical ordering of institutions, of norms, of principles, or of remedies, and significance of the Constitution".[221]

[183] Constitutional subsidiarity becomes a central consideration in this case. In My Vote Counts, it was outlined what subsidiarity means in cases such as this one where legislation (in this case the Equality Act) has been invoked to give effect to a specific constitutional right:

> "Once legislation to fulfil a constitutional right exists, the Constitution's embodiment of that right is no longer the prime mechanism for its enforcement. The legislation is primary. The right in the Constitution plays only a subsidiary or supporting role."[222] > section 39(2) objectives, the Courts are under a general obligation to develop it appropriately. We say a 'general obligation' because we do not mean to suggest that a court must, in each and every case where the common law is involved, embark on an independent exercise as to whether the common law is in need of development and, if so, how it is to be developed under section 39(2). At the same time there might be circumstances where a court is obliged to raise the matter on its own and require full argument from the parties."

[220] My Vote Counts NPC v Speaker of The National Assembly [2015] ZACC 31; 2016 (1) SA 132 (CC); 2015 (12) BCLR 1407 (CC) at para 53.

[221] Id at para 46.

[222] Id.

[184] It is notable that although they reached a different conclusion, the majority per Khampepe J concurred with Cameron J's exposition of the history behind constitutional subsidiarity.[223]

[185] The majority did caution as follows:

> "We should not be understood to suggest that the principle of constitutional subsidiarity applies as a hard and fast rule. There are decisions in which this Court has said that the principle may not apply. This Court is yet to develop the principle to a point where the inner and outer contours of its reach are clearly delineated. It is not necessary to do that in this case.[224]

In finding that constitutional subsidiarity is not a hard and fast rule this Court has made it clear that the constitutional enquiry does not cease because there is legislation promulgated to give effect to a specific constitutional right. In other words, subsidiarity does not ringfence the meaning and import of the constitutional right to equality by legislative enactment.[225] In cases such as these, the primary concern of the Court should be whether the legislature has adequately fulfilled its section 9(4) obligation. The litigants in this case do not rely on the "restricted ambit" of the Equality Act.[226] Within the context of this case Parliament has adequately fulfilled this obligation through the enactment of the Equality Act and no suggestion has been made to the contrary.

[223] Id at para 121, the majority stated, "We further agree with the minority judgment's exposition of the history behind the principle of constitutional subsidiarity".

[224] Id at para 182

[225] Some academic commentators have criticized the Court's jurisprudence on subsidiarity and warned that courts should not delegate the responsibility of giving content to fundamental constitutional rights to the Legislature lest they water down the scope and promise of those rights. See generally Klare "Legal Subsidiarity and Constitutional Rights: A reply to AJ van der Walt" (2008) 1 Constitutional Court Review 129.

[226] My Vote Counts above n 220 at para 72.

[186] In My Vote Counts, three inter-related principles for applying the principle of subsidiarity were illustrated. First, respecting the programmatic scheme and significance of the Constitution.[227] Second, according due respect to Parliament's legislative role in light of the separation of powers.[228] Third, the development of an integrated and consistent rights jurisprudence.[229]

[187] Langa CJ in Pillay[230]citing a few decisions of this Court,[231] confirmed that in cases concerning the horizontality of the right to equality, that is cases of unfair discrimination committed by private parties, it is the Equality Act, and not section 9(4) which must be invoked:

> "The first is that claims brought under the Equality Act must be considered within the four corners of that Act. This court has held in the context of both administrative and labour law that a litigant cannot circumvent legislation enacted to give effect to a constitutional right by attempting to rely directly on the constitutional right. To do so would be to 'fail to recognise the important task conferred upon the legislature by the Constitution to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights.' The same principle applies to the Equality Act. Absent a direct challenge to the Act, courts must assume that the Equality Act is consistent with the Constitution and claims must be decided within its margins."[232]

[188] Section 8(1) of the Bill of Rights provides for direct constitutional scrutiny into private relationships such as between testator and heir or fideicommissary as in this case. Section 8(2) provides that:

[227] My Vote Counts above n 220 at para 61.

[228] Id at para 62.

[229] Id at para 63.

[230] MEC for Education, KwaZulu-Natal, and Others v Pillay [2007] ZACC 21; 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC) (2008 (2) BCLR 99 (CC) (Pillay).

[231] New Clicks above n 184*; South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence and Others* [2007] ZACC 10; 2007 (5) SA 400 (CC); 2007 (8) BCLR 863 (CC).

[232] Pillay above n 230 at para 40.

> "A provision in the Bill of Rights binds a natural or a juristic person if, and to the extent that, it is applicable, taking into account the nature of the right and the nature of any duty imposed by the right."

[189] As explained by Woolman, section 8(2) of the Bill of rights eliminates any doubt about (a) the application of the substantive provisions of the Bill of Rights to disputes between private parties, in general; and (b) about the ability to use the Bill of Rights to develop new rules of law and new remedies that will give adequate effect to the specific provisions of the Bill of Rights, in particular developing the common law.[233]

[190] Evidently, this case requires direct application as opposed to indirect application. The direct application of the Bill of Rights, however, must be consonant with the principle of constitutional subsidiarity. Therefore, in applying the Bill of Rights directly in this case, reliance must be placed on the Equality Act because its definition of unfair discrimination "covers the field".[234]

[191] It is unassailable in this case and indeed in cases relating to the freedom of testation that the reach of section 8 of the Bill of Rights applies to these private parties. Whilst the Bill of Rights reaches into the private sphere this is perfectly congruent with the competing right to freedom of testation. It also follows, therefore, that the Equality Act which was promulgated pursuant to section 9(4) of the Constitution is the benchmark against which the freedom of testation must be measured within the private sphere.

[192] No case has been made out that the Equality Act does not give effect to the right to equality in testation. The first judgment opts for the development of the common law. But it can only develop the common law if the legislation does not give effect to that right. In this case the Equality Act was promulgated pursuant to section 9 (4) of the Constitution and in the absence of an attack on the validity of the Equality Act it must yield to the principle of constitutional subsidiarity.[235] Here there is neither an attack on the constitutional validity of the Equality Act nor is there any suggestion in the applicants' case that the protections do not go far enough. In addition, the respondents also do not attack any provision in the Equality Act.

[233] Woolman and Bishop above n 69 at 73.

[234] Cameron J uses this expression in My Vote Counts above n 220 at para 66 to refer to an argument that the scope of the constitutional right in question has been subsumed by a piece of legislation.

[193] For all these reasons, in my view the tension between direct and indirect application in the first and second judgments must be resolved on the basis of the principle of constitutional subsidiarity. The Equality Act is now the benchmark for evaluating any conduct of a private person which has an impact on another person's right to equality and to be free from unfair discrimination to this end.

[194] It is necessary to consider a more robust approach to an analysis of what freedom of testation means after the advent of the Constitution. When dealing with freedom of testation it is cumbersome to lurch from case to case when the application of the Equality Act provides the framework in which to determine most matters relating to the freedom of testation going forward.

[235] This point was recently reiterated by this Court in Economic Freedom Fighters v Minister of Justice and Correctional Services [2020] ZACC 25 in which the applicant argued for a convoluted interpretation of the Trespass Act instead of launching a frontal attack on its constitutionality. Mogoeng CJ in dismissing the interpretive argument made the following remarks at paras 74-5:

> "Since PIE owes its breath to section 26(3) of the Constitution, it is not unreasonable or inappropriate to read a reference to PIE as a pointer to the inescapability of the role of section 26(3) as the cardinal reference point in addressing this issue. The way the issue was raised renders it unavoidable that the constitutionality of section 1(1) of the Trespass Act be effectively pronounced upon, even if it might not be expressly referred to as such. Truth be told, this is another way of seeking to have us declare this section unconstitutional. This we will not do. This approach, foisted upon us by the applicants, is very difficult if not impossible to manage to its intended end. They ought to have launched a frontal challenge to the constitutionality of section 1(1). Nothing stopped them from doing so. But, they chose not to. Instead, they opted for this intractable interpretive route. They would therefore have to fall by their free choice."

Transformative constitutionalism and the implementation of the principle of freedom of testation

[195] Section 39(2) makes it clear that "*[w]hen interpreting any legislation,. . . every cour*t, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights". The Constitution now requires courts to continuously ensure South Africa's transformation into a human rights state. The guiding principles of the Constitution demonstrate that the reach of equality must be substantive. It must advance more than merely formal or de jure equality.[236] Whilst the first judgment seeks to develop the common law, this is unnecessary in this case because the Equality Act cannot be circumvented.

[196] In this case the central question remains whether human dignity is enhanced or diminished, and whether the achievement of equality is promoted or undermined by the measure in whatever legal reasoning is to be applied.

[197] If courts fail to adopt a more innovative approach towards transformative substantive equality in its mission, this will entrench formal equality at the expense of substantive equality, and, especially in the private sphere, the deeper dimensions of the constitutional values of justice will be lost.

[198] It is generally accepted that the law both shapes and constructs relationships in society.[237] In addition to the role law plays in constructing societal relationships, it also draws from the *"underlying moral or value choice"* of society.[238] In this sense, the law

[236] See Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development v SA Restructuring and Insolvency Practitioners Association [2018] ZACC 20; 2018 (5) SA 349 (CC); 2018 (9) BCLR 1099 (CC) at para 61 where Madlanga J expressed himself as follows:

> "Throughout the many many years of the struggle for freedom, the greatest dream of South Africa's oppressed majority was the attainment of equality. By that I mean remedial, restitutionary or substantive equality, not just formal equality."

[237] Davis and Klare above n 78 at 443-4.

[238] See Froneman J's dissent in Beadica 231 CC v Trustees, Oregon Trust [2020] ZACC 13; 2020 (5) SA 247 (CC); 2020 (9) BCLR 1098 (CC) at para 106.

should not be regarded as a neutral set of principles that has no bearing on power dynamics in society. So, the essential point here is that the law is not a neutral or amoral enterprise but is based on the interplay between its constitutive role of shaping society and the underlying moral or value choices which also shape our equality jurisprudence. In this case it is amply demonstrated that the law has "distributive" consequences because absent the proper application of the equality jurisprudence the powers, privileges and liabilities of both individuals and groups in society will go unchecked. In this case only male descendants will benefit. In the absence of a male descendant then other males will benefit. Female descendants are excluded simply because of being female.

Legislative framework of the Equality Act

[199] The provisions of the preamble to the Equality Act make its nature and intended purpose clear. The consolidation of democracy requires the eradication of inequalities especially those that are systemic in nature and which were generated in South Africa's history by colonialism, apartheid and patriarchy. The Equality Act also recognises that although significant progress has been made in restructuring and transforming our society and its institutions, systemic inequalities and unfair discrimination remain deeply embedded in social structures, practices and attitudes. This undermines the aspirations of our constitutional democracy and the Equality Act still requires practical application and of course, the development of an appropriate body of jurisprudence.

[200] Section 9 (4) of the Constitution provides for the enactment of national legislation to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination and to promote the achievement of equality; the Equality Act is such a piece of legislation. The Equality Act endeavours to "facilitate the transition to a democratic society, united in its diversity, marked by human relations that are caring and compassionate, and guided by the principles of equality, fairness, equity, social progress, justice, human dignity and freedom".[239]

[239] Preamble to the Equality Act.

[201] It is clear from the scheme and tenor of the Equality Act that it aims to ensure substantive as opposed to merely formal equality. By ensuring that the right to equality can be invoked against private persons, the Constitution acknowledges that colonialism and apartheid were not only facilitated by a repressive state apparatus but also through the complicity of individuals who benefitted directly from an unjust status quo. The Equality Act is an acknowledgement that to those on the receiving end of discrimination, the source of the discrimination (be it public or private) matters not.

Transformative constitutionalism and freedom of testation

[202] A commitment to transformative constitutionalism and enabling substantive equality requires this Court to consider the "distributional and ideological consequences" of common law principles such as freedom of testation.[240] The first judgment provides a useful summary of the history of the principle in our jurisprudence. I will contend that, where appropriate, common law principles such as freedom of testation should be recalibrated towards more egalitarian and ubuntu based ends.

[203] The first judgment correctly suggests that by extending the common law there will be a clash between freedom of testation, which constitutes a right protected by section 25 (1) of the Constitution and the right to equality. The different provisions of the Constitution must be read in harmony.[241] By implementing the provisions of the Equality Act there is a recognition that freedom of testation brings with it the values of freedom and dignity and for this reason it must be evaluated against public policy. Freedom of testation is in essence freedom of contract. Freedom of testation cannot now be cloaked with

[240] Davis and Klare above n 78 at 449.

[241] United Democratic Movement above n 189 at para 83 this Court stated:

> "A court must endeavour to give effect to all the provisions of the Constitution. It would be extraordinary to conclude that a provision of the Constitution cannot be enforced because of an irreconcilable tension with another provision. When there is tension, the courts must do their best to harmonise the relevant provisions and give effect to all of them."

constitutional protection under the guise of "human dignity and autonomy". There is an overemphasis on the use of individualist, libertarian and neo-liberal definitions of freedom of testation as opposed to a definition founded on the countervailing principles of equality and ubuntu. There is a failure to consider the appropriate context and the distributive consequences of freedom of testation.

[204] In my view, whilst the first judgment is trailblazing in many ways as it addresses patriarchy and sexism, it does not directly address the enquiry in terms of the common law. There is no need to develop the common law when there is a statute enacted pursuant to section 9(4) of the Bill of Rights to give effect to equality. Our nascent constitutional values are fully embodied in the Equality Act. However, the first judgment seems to conflate the principle of freedom of testation with the rights to dignity, privacy and property as opposed to establishing how the very principle itself must be recalibrated and understood within a constitutional framework based on equality and ubuntu. In doing so, it elevates the status of what is merely a common law rule and clothes it with constitutional protection. While the arguments that freedom of testation is supported by the rights to dignity, property and privacy have merit, they de-contextualise and overlook the way freedom of testation actually operates in a society with stark inequalities such as ours.

[205] The approach of the first judgment adopts a libertarian and neo-liberal basis for freedom of testation that imports and constitutionally sanctions market logics, in the problematic way described by Davis and Klare.[242] In addition, despite the first judgment's excellent analysis of the history of succession, it does not provide a contextual analysis which interrogates how freedom of testation sustains unequal wealth distribution in South

[242] See Davis and Klare above n 78 at 479-481 where they evaluate the approach taken by courts in cases involving the scope of the common law principle of pacta sunt servanda in light of our nascent constitutional values. Amongst other things, they argue that this line of decisions endorses libertarian and individualist ideas of rights and governance which unwittingly legitimise neo-liberal economic policies that are removed from the extent of deprivation that is the reality for the majority of South Africans.

Africa based on gender, class and so on.[243] The concept of patrimonial capitalism through inheritance continues unchecked.

[206] Piketty critiques what he refers to as "patrimonial capitalism."[244] Essentially this is the tendency for wealth to beget wealth and conversely for poverty to beget poverty.[245] He highlights how inheritance laws sustain and legitimize the unequal distribution of wealth in societies thus enabling a handful of powerful families to remain economically privileged while the rest remain systematically deprived.[246] In my view, this system entrenches inherited wealth along the male line. In applying this critique to the facts in this case, our common law principle of freedom of testation is continuing to entrench a skewed gender bias in favour of men. The Human Rights Commission has noted how patrimonial capitalism functions in the South African context.[247] There is no basis to avoid applying the principles of the Equality Act to eradicate the problems of inequality entrenched by the common law.

[207] Unfettered freedom of testation excludes women, and this results in negative distributive consequences for them. While it may be true that freedom of testation is related [243] Recent studies on wealth inequality in South Africa illustrate the concerning distribution of wealth in South Africa. A study by the Southern Centre for Inequality Studies estimates that the richest top 10% of South Africans own 85% of all wealth whilst the richest 0.1% own about 25% of all wealth. The same study notes that the majority of the top earners are white. It stands to reason that given the gendered nature of poverty the majority of top earners are male as well. Notably the same study finds that "the bottom 50 per cent of the South African population have negative net worth: the levels of the debts that they owe exceeds the market value of the assets they own." The study concludes that there is no evidence that wealth concentration has decreased since apartheid. In fact, if anything, it is on the rise. See Chatterjee, Czajka, and Gethin Estimating the Distribution of Household Wealth in South Africa (Working Paper no 2020/06, April 2020), available at https://wid.world/document/estimating-the-distribution-of-household-wealth-in-south-africa-wid-world-working-paper-2020-06/.

[244] Piketty Capital in the Twenty-First Century (Harvard University Press, Cambridge 2014) at 267-302. When referring to patrimonial capitalism he means that the economic elite mostly attain their fortunes through inheritance rather than entrepreneurship or innovation. These inherited fortunes produce a class of rentiers who dominate politics with all sorts of (mostly implied, but very plausible) negative consequences.

[245] Id.

[246] Id.

[247] South African Human Rights Commission Equality Report: 2017/18 (July 2018), available at:https://www.sahrc.org.za/home/21/files/SAHRC%20Equality%20Report%202017_18.pdf.

to the rights to dignity, privacy and property it also has significant distributive consequences. In a society with stark inequalities based on gender, an unfettered approach to freedom of testation sustains class hierarchies inherited from the colonial and apartheid legacy and frustrates the establishment of a society based on equality and in particular gender equality. In this regard, interpreting the principle of freedom of testation to confer a broad right to disinherit based on gender undermines the constitutional objective to heal the injustices of the past and establish an egalitarian society.

[208] It is incumbent upon this Court to acknowledge that the importance the law has accorded to freedom of testation in the past is precisely what sustains the unearned privileges in society such as male privilege. By maintaining systems of privilege, it simultaneously traps vulnerable groups such as women in a cycle of poverty and entrenches systemic disadvantage.

[209] An analysis of freedom of testation that fails to take seriously its distributive consequences and iniquitous legacy may also result in a form of "colonial unknowing".[248] Decolonial scholars use the latter term to describe situations in which the "afterlife" of colonialism and apartheid and their effects on contemporary society are erased or overlooked when the law provides its unequivocal stamp of approval of the status quo.[249] This is the danger if the route of the common law is the determinative factor. It follows

[248] See Modiri "Conquest and Constitutionalism: First Thoughts on an Alternative Jurisprudence" (2018) 34 SAJHR 300 at 308 where he expands on this concept as follows:

> "It is through colonial unknowing that the afterlife of colonial-apartheid can at once remain pervasive in the form of inequality, poverty, violence and suffering but not be 'comprehended as an extensive and constitutive living formation'. Colonial unknowing operates centrally through the disavowal, dissociation and normalisation of the history and horror of colonialism, land dispossession, white domination and racism. By making settler-colonialism illegible as a historical, political and moral problem, colonial unknowing normalizes white hegemony in South Africa, enforces the expiry of colonised people's right to historical justice, and structures the field of sense, knowledge, perception and imagination in such a way as to make substantive decolonisation appear 'unreasonable and unrealistic'."

[249] Id.

therefore that the implementation and application of the Equality Act ensures that the exercise of freedom of testation is consistent with the demands of our Constitution.

[210] It is also necessary to balance freedom of testation against substantive equality as a component of public policy.

Substantive equality as a component of public policy

[211] The first judgment correctly notes that equality is a founding value of essential importance to our new constitutional order and therefore an essential component of the public policy yardstick. It correctly contends that this stems from the constitutional commitment to heal the injustices of the past and establish a non-sexist society. Furthermore, this commitment is bolstered by South Africa's international obligations to advance gender equality.[250]

[212] Our equality jurisprudence has developed an approach where the right to equality has been interpreted to mean that individuals have equal dignity and respect.[251] Albertyn suggests that our equality jurisprudence needs to move beyond "equal concern and respect", towards deeper structural changes.[252] As such, she suggests that our equality jurisprudence to date has been powerfully inclusive, but not transformative nor has it required a fundamental re-ordering of the status quo.[253]

[213] Despite the notable achievements of our current equality jurisprudence in terms of including groups into the social and economic status quo, Albertyn argues that its legacy

[250] South Africa is a signatory to the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 18 December 1979, amongst other treaties and covenants which require it to ensure gender equality.

[251] Albertyn above n 204 at 458.

[252] Id.

[253] Id.

"is contested by those who seek to centre ideas of disadvantage, structural inequalities, unequal power relations and more radical ideas of difference and systemic justice".[254] This requires social structures and their taken-for-granted norms to be uprooted and abolished if necessary.[255] It requires political, social and economic conditions, structures, processes and institutions to be radically transformed in society.[256] So substantive equality should pay close attention to the structures, norms and so on which reproduce hierarchies and marginalisation and should seek to dismantle them if necessary.

[214] It is this more robust framework for substantive equality which provides several important insights for this matter. The emphasis on moving beyond social inclusion towards systemic justice is relevant. This would mean that the Court should not only highlight how patriarchal traditions which endorsed women's disinheritance were an injury to their dignity, but also how they sustained inequality between men and women in terms of wealth and resources.

[215] As stated previously, allowing for unfettered freedom of testation as embedded in the common law enables these serious distributive consequences to go unchecked, shielding them from constitutional scrutiny. The Constitution requires a decisive break from the past. As it stands, freedom of testation in its private context remains unchecked and the goal of "substantive freedom" has been undermined as described by Albertyn.[257]

[216] This approach demonstrates why the equality enquiry in this matter should therefore extend beyond the failure to treat women with equal concern and respect. Instead, the equality enquiry should highlight the way freedom of testation sustains iniquitous gender-based hierarchies which the Constitution seeks to uproot or abolish.

[254] Id at 459.

[255] Id at 461.

[256] Id at 462.

[257] Id.

[217] So, a proper contextual analysis in this case should take seriously the wide chasm in both power and resources between men and women in society and how freedom of testation facilitates this unequal distribution. By doing so, freedom of testation threatens the achievement of substantive equality for those groups who are systematically disadvantaged based on their sex, gender or other characteristics.

[218] Context sensitive legal reasoning can advance transformative constitutionalism. However, contextual legal reasoning will only be truly transformative if a court explains what they hope the reformulated norm will accomplish in relation to the social relationships attached to the problem and the impact this will have on the lived experiences of the constituencies which are affected by it.[258]

[219] It is in the private sphere where freedom of testation within the context of transformative constitutionalism needs to be tested. Professor Penelope Andrews in interpreting feminist legal theory within the context of the South African Constitution, points to the false dichotomy between the public and the private sphere insofar as recognizing and protecting women's rights are concerned.[259] To ensure gender equality, a constitution with a Bill of Rights helps but it is not enough. It needs to be bolstered by an overarching vision that seeks to transform institutions, laws, and practices that subjugate women.[260] The Equality Act is that transformative statute that does "bolster" equality for women even in the private sphere where the "overarching vision" ought to ensure that testation is not a form of subjugation of women. It is this consideration which requires this Court's attention when determining the validity of the impugned clause in the will.

[258] Davis and Klare above n 78 at 496.

[259] Andrews From Cape Town to Kabul: Rethinking Strategies for Pursuing Women's Human Rights (Ashgate Publishing Company, Burlington 2012) at 108

[260] Id at 174

[220] This matter needs to illustrate with greater clarity what the constitutional value of equality as a component of the public policy yardstick means for the scope of freedom of testation in future. In reformulating the public policy standard, it should indicate how far-reaching the commitment to equality is in the new dispensation. To this end, the attempt to subject private wills to a significantly lower standard of scrutiny than public charitable trusts is concerning. A horizontal application of rights between private individuals is part of our jurisprudence. Rights in the Bill of Rights are capable of horizontal application; in fact, in appropriate circumstances they may even impose positive obligations on private parties.[261]

[221] Equality is a fundamental organizing principle of the Constitution and the kind of society it seeks to bring into being. Our courts have not adopted different levels of scrutiny regarding claims of unfair discrimination based on a public/private distinction.[262] My view here is not that the public/private distinction is completely irrelevant. One could easily imagine a range of considerations that might bear on public charitable trusts as opposed to private wills such as various aspects of public policy.

[222] Equality, however, is fundamentally different from other public considerations in terms of how far-reaching it is. It is not clear therefore, how equality - as a foundational constitutional value – might impose certain obligations on public charitable trusts that it would not similarly impose on private wills. The attempt to establish a bright line between the public/private divide in respect of freedom of testation and the right to equality might risk the establishment of a private domain in which to discriminate.[263] The argument that drafting a will by its nature includes some element of arbitrariness is not convincing. The above discussion on the distributive consequences of freedom of testation demonstrates why an attempt to shield the so-called private domain from scrutiny frustrates the achievement of a more egalitarian society.

[261] Daniels above n 211 at para 39.

[262] The United States is notable for its difference in this regard. Its Supreme Court has adopted several different forms of judicial review for racial discrimination, discrimination on the basis of sex, and discrimination based on sexual orientation. By design, the South African Constitution embraces a relatively uniform approach to discrimination and rejects this compartmentalized and arbitrary approach.

[263] See Davis and Klare above n 78 at 416-7 where they argue that attempts to shield the common law from constitutional scrutiny would enable a sphere of private apartheid where gross violations of human rights continue unabated.

[223] Thus, the second judgment correctly concluded that the distinction which both the High Court and the first judgment draw between the powers of the courts to vary provisions of a public charitable trust as opposed to private wills is misconceived.

[224] I reach this same conclusion based on the importance of achieving substantive equality through the lens of transformative constitutionalism. The second judgment also correctly concludes that the impact of the discrimination is no different depending on where it comes from. Whether the source of the discrimination is public or private, it will undermine the constitutional value of substantive equality.

[225] At paragraph 151, the second judgment makes a particularly powerful remark which I support:

> "To hold otherwise, would subvert the supremacy of the Constitution and would suggest that the Constitution does not reach individual conduct in the private sphere, despite the horizontal application of the Bill of Rights."

[226] This conclusion is important otherwise systems of oppression which manifest in the private sphere, such as sexism, will remain free from the scrutiny of the Bill of Rights.

The application of the Equality Act to the impugned provisions of the will [227] The starting point in this regard is section 1 of the Equality Act which defines "discrimination" as follows:

> "[A]ny act or omission, including a policy, law, rule, practice, condition or situation which directly or indirectly—
>
> (a) imposes burdens, obligations or disadvantage on; or
>
> (b) withholds benefits, opportunities or advantages from, any person on one or more of the prohibited grounds."

[228] Notably section 8 of the Equality Act also prohibits gender discrimination. The relevant provisions read as follows:

> "Subject to section 6, no person may unfairly discriminate against any person on the ground of gender, including—
>
> (c) the system of preventing women from inheriting family property;
>
> (d) any practice, including traditional, customary or religious practice, which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men, including the undermining of the dignity and wellbeing of the girl child."

[229] In this matter, the impugned clauses of the will constitute "discrimination" in terms of the Equality Act because they withhold a "benefit, opportunity or advantage", namely the right to benefit from the deceased estate. Whilst it is true that no person has the "right to inherit", the reference in the Equality Act to a "benefit" refers to the broad array of privileges, rights and interests a person may not obtain merely on account of their sex, gender or other status. In this regard, the Equality Act recognises that systems of oppression are maintained by accruing certain privileges and opportunities to some groups whilst concomitantly imposing certain burdens or disadvantages on others. Substantive equality requires positive measures to be taken to actively redistribute resources and provide benefits to those who have not had the same opportunities in the past.[264]

[264] Van Heerden above n 146 at para 31 where Moseneke J remarked as follows:

> "Equality before the law protection in section 9(1) and measures to promote equality in section 9(2) are both necessary and mutually reinforcing but may sometimes serve distinguishable purposes, which I need not discuss now. However, what is clear is that our Constitution and in particular section 9 thereof, read as a whole, embraces for good reason a substantive conception of equality inclusive of measures to redress existing inequality. Absent a positive commitment progressively to

[230] The High Court erred when it found that because a will is a once-off testamentary instrument it does not qualify as a "system" in terms of section 8 of the Act. I agree with the second judgment that the words "including" at the beginning of section 8 means that it is not a closed list and other forms of gender discrimination are also prohibited. In addition, the applicant is correct that the impugned clauses would also fall foul of section 8(d) which prohibits any practice which impairs the dignity of women or undermines the equality of men and women.

[231] The Equality Act must be interpreted broadly and purposively to give effect to its fundamental objectives which include amongst others "the promotion of equality"; "the value of non-sexism"; and "the prevention of unfair discrimination and the protection of human dignity". The High Court erred when it construed the provisions of the Equality Act so narrowly that the common law principle of freedom of testation was considered out of reach. The clear and obvious purpose of section 8(c) is to abolish and proscribe the continuance of all forms of gender discrimination including in the sphere of inheritance. Its purpose is to address the distributive consequences of unfettered freedom of testation and its impact on achieving gender equality in terms of both the Equality Act and the Constitution.

[232] Having determined that a prima facie case of discrimination has been made, it remains to be considered if the discrimination is "fair" in terms of section 14 of the Equality Act. Section 14(3) outlines the relevant factors to consider:

> "(3) The factors referred to in subsection (2)(b) include the following:
>
> (a) Whether the discrimination impairs or is likely to impair human dignity;
>
> (b) the impact or likely impact of the discrimination on the complainant;
>
> eradicate socially constructed barriers to equality and to root out systematic or institutionalised under-privilege, the constitutional promise of equality before the law and its equal protection and benefit must, in the context of our country, ring hollow."

(c) the position of the complainant in society and whether he or she suffers from patterns of disadvantage or belongs to a group that suffers from such patterns of disadvantage;
(d) the nature and extent of the discrimination;
(e) whether the discrimination is systemic in nature;
(f) whether the discrimination has a legitimate purpose;
(g) whether and to what extent the discrimination achieves its purpose;
(h) whether there are less restrictive and less disadvantageous means to achieve the purpose;
(i) whether and to what extent the respondent has taken such steps as being reasonable in the circumstances to—
    (i) address the disadvantage which arises from or is related to one or more of the prohibited grounds; or
    (ii) accommodate diversity."

[233] This Court has noted that the fairness enquiry in section 14 is a hybrid test which incorporates elements of the fairness enquiry from Harksen whilst also incorporating elements of proportionality that resemble a limitation analysis.[265]

[234] There is no doubt that women are a vulnerable group in society who merit protection. Furthermore, as the first judgment correctly points out women have historically been discriminated against in the context of inheritance. The earlier discussion on the distributive consequences of unfettered freedom of testation furthermore highlights how the plight of women in this regard is systemic and that the continued uneven distribution of wealth sustains patterns of disadvantage based on gender, sex and related grounds. The impact of the exclusion of women from inheritance merely on account of their gender is indeed egregious.

[265] Pillay above n 230 at para 70.

[235] The only "legitimate purpose" which might be advanced in the present case is freedom of testation. To the extent that one conceives of freedom of testation in broad terms, it follows that excluding any category of individuals from inheriting one's assets is a component of that right.

[236] I do not agree with the second judgment that the definition of freedom of testation excludes the right to disinherit individuals in a way that contributes to unfair discrimination. It is important for this Court to acknowledge that there is indeed a clash of competing principles in this case: freedom of testation on the one hand versus substantive equality on the other. In my view, for the reasons enumerated above, there can simply be no contest between the raison d'etre (reason for being) of the Constitution, namely the abolition of patriarchy and sexism, and the "right" to freedom of testation.

Ubuntu and gender equality

[237] I will conclude with the importance of how the now constitutionally integrated value and norm of ubuntu applies. As outlined above, the facts in this case demonstrate a disregard for the dignity and value of women heirs. This Court has affirmed ubuntu as a principle in our law which should inform all forms of adjudication.[266] At the heart of ubuntu is the idea that a society based on human dignity must take care of its most vulnerable members and leave no one behind. It emphasises the adage that none of us are free until all of us are free.

[266] For example, in Port Elizabeth Municipality v Various Occupiers [2004] ZACC 7; 2005 (1) SA 217 (CC); 2004 (12) BCLR 1268 (CC), at para 37, Sachs J said:

> "The spirit of ubuntu, part of the deep cultural heritage of the majority of the population, suffuses the whole constitutional order. It combines individual rights with a communitarian philosophy. It is a unifying motif of the Bill of Rights, which is nothing if not a structured, institutionalised and operational declaration in our evolving new society of the need for human interdependence, respect and concern."

[238] In Makwanyane, Langa J (as he was then) described ubuntu as a concept that recognises a person's status as a human being entitled to "unconditional respect, dignity, value and acceptance" from the community.[267] The essence of ubuntu and human dignity manifests through the recognition of every person in the community, from the infants to the dying because "the life of another person is at least as valuable as one's own".[268]

[239] In Makwanyane Mokgoro J stated:

> "In interpreting the Bill of Fundamental Rights and Freedoms, as already mentioned, an all-inclusive value system, or common values in South Africa, can form a basis upon which to develop a South African human rights jurisprudence . . . While it envelops the key values of group solidarity, compassion, respect, human dignity, conformity to basic norms and collective unity, in its fundamental sense it denotes humanity and morality."[269]

[240] Mohamed J (as he was then) in Makwanyane also described the inclusion of ubuntu in our constitutional jurisprudence:

> "The need for ubuntu expresses the ethos of an instinctive capacity for and enjoyment of love towards our fellow men and women; the joy and the fulfilment involved in recognizing their innate humanity; the reciprocity this generates in interaction within the collective community; the richness of the creative emotions which it engenders and the moral energies which it releases both in the givers and the society which they serve and are served by.[270]

[241] Clearly therefore ubuntu is tightly integrated into our constitutional jurisprudence bringing to bear its transformative nature on all aspects of our law. This case illustrates this in an important way. Academic writers point out that in relation to ubuntu:

[267] S v Makwanyane [1995] ZACC 3; 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 224.

[268] Id at para 225.

[269] Id at paras 307-8.

[270] Id at para 263.

> "Efforts to pin it down and to contain it within overly strict boundaries or definitions are misguided. Proper understanding of this concept calls for wisdom and open-mindedness. This does not, however, mean that ubuntu has a mercurial nature that changes according to its context. Rather, it is more like humanity in its diversity, and serves to remind us that our diversity should not cover up our humanity, lest we forget."[271]

[242] Although Davis and Klare similarly argue strongly in favour of ubuntu as a principle to inform the development of the common law, this too is relevant to the interpretation of the jurisprudence emerging from the Equality Act. They argue as such that ubuntu has already transformed the common law principle of property. They note that property rights have never been absolute but always buttressed by social considerations.[272] The authors argue that such "social considerations" now include ubuntu as well.[273] As such, the traditional notion of "private property" is slowly morphing into a constitutionally recalibrated concept of "socially engaged property".[274]

[243] In the context of freedom of testation, ubuntu means that the Constitution places a high premium on establishing a compassionate society which does not discard the humanity of any of its members. As such, the right to dispose of one's property upon one's death must be balanced against the discriminatory effect it may have by precluding members of society from an adequate share in the wealth and resources of the nation.

Conclusion

[244] Transformative constitutionalism and the obligation to ensure substantive equality means that the first judgment should take this into account in its assessment of freedom of [271] Himonga et al "Reflections on Judicial Views of Ubuntu" (2013) 16 Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal 370 at 374.

[272] Davis and Klare above n 78 at 485-6.
[273] Id.
[274] Id.

testation. While the argument that freedom of testation is closely related to several rights - such as dignity, privacy and property - may have some merit, this approach de- contextualises what freedom of testation really means in a grossly unequal society such as South Africa. The countervailing values of equality and ubuntu require this Court to consider the significant distributive consequences that placing a high premium on freedom of testation has meant. Amongst these consequences is the glaring wealth inequality based on the fault lines of race, gender and class that has endured after apartheid. Balancing freedom of testation against equality both as a right and value should mean more than treating women with equal concern and respect. It should mean more than social inclusion and instead move towards systemic justice that seeks to abolish or root out common law rules which simultaneously sustain women's subordination and prop up male privilege.

[245] Lastly, considerations of ubuntu imply that the narrow-minded and self-indulgent understanding of freedom of testation should be tempered by considerations of social justice and equity. In this context ubuntu means nothing more than the adage that none of us are free until all of us are free when dealing with freedom of testation within the context of gender equality. The rights to privacy and property should not be used as a smokescreen to shield structural inequality from constitutional scrutiny.

[246] It is for these additional reasons that I concur in the order proposed in the second judgment.

For the Applicants	JA van der Merwe SC and M Adhikari instructed by James King and Badenhorst Incorporated
For the First to Third Respondents	HJ De Waal SC and HL Du Toit instructed by Coetzee and Van Der Bergh

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

Case CCT 306/19

In the matter between:

SYLVIA BONGI MAHLANGU	First Applicant
SOUTH AFRICAN DOMESTIC SERVICE AND ALLIED WORKERS UNION	Second Applicant
and
MINISTER OF LABOUR	First Respondent
DIRECTOR-GENERAL FOR THE DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR	Second Respondent
ACTING COMPENSATION COMMISSIONER	Third Respondent
and
COMMISSION FOR GENDER EQUALITY	First Amicus Curiae
WOMEN'S LEGAL CENTRE TRUST	Second Amicus Curiae

Neutral citation: Mahlangu and Another v Minister of Labour and Others [2020] ZACC 24

Coram: Mogoeng CJ, Jafta J, Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Majiedt J, Mathopo AJ, Mhlantla J, Theron J, Tshiqi J and Victor AJ

Judgments: Victor AJ (majority): [1] to [131]
Jafta J (dissenting): [132] to [182]
Mhlantla J (concurring): [183] to [196]

Heard on: 10 March 2020

Decided on: 19 November 2020

Summary: Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act 130 of 1993 — constitutionality of section 1(xix)(v) — provision is unconstitutional

---

ORDER

On application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity granted by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria:

1. The declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 1(xix)(v) of the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act 130 of 1993 made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria is confirmed.
2. The order is to have immediate and retrospective effect from 27 April 1994.
3. The first respondent must pay the applicants' costs in this Court.

JUDGMENT

VICTOR AJ (Mogoeng CJ, Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Majiedt J, Theron J, Tshiqi J concurring):

Introduction

[1] Domestic workers are the unsung heroines in this country and globally. They are a powerful group of women[1] whose profession enables all economically active members of society to prosper and pursue their careers. Given the nature of their work, their relationships with their own children and family members are compromised, while we pursue our career goals with peace of mind, knowing that our children, our elderly family members and our households are well taken care of.

[2] Many domestic workers are breadwinners in their families who put children through school and food on the table through their hard work. In some cases, they are responsible for the upbringing of children in multiple families and may be the only loving figure in the lives of a number of children. Their salaries are often too low to maintain a decent living standard but by exceptional, if not inexplicable effort, they succeed. Sadly, despite these herculean efforts, domestic work as a profession is undervalued and unrecognised; even though they play a central role in our society.[2]

[3] At issue here is social security for domestic workers. The cornerstone of any young democracy is a comprehensive social security system, particularly for the most vulnerable members of society. Although passed before the advent of our constitutional democracy, the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act[3] (COIDA) partially contributes to our country's social security system. Unfortunately, 26 years into our democracy and despite the constitutional promise and aspirational expectations, in the event of injury, disablement, or death at the workplace, domestic workers do not enjoy the protection under COIDA.[4] By stark contrast, all other employees are.

[1] In a report by the International Labour Organisation titled Domestic Workers Across the World: Global and Regional Statistics and the Extent of the Legal Protection (2013) (ILO Report) it points out that in South Africa, more than three quarters of domestic workers are women.

[2] See further Clarke "Domestic Work, Joy or Pain? Problems and Solution of the Workers" (2002) 51 Social and Economic Studies: Vulnerability and Coping Strategies 153.

[3] 130 of 1993. COIDA was enacted on 24 September 1993 and commenced on 1 March 1994.

[4] This despite there being an opportunity to bring COIDA in line with the Constitution. The South African Law Reform Commission (Law Reform Commission) published a report in which it detailed the outcome of its review of national legislation with a view to align it with the right to equality entrenched in section 9 of the Constitution.

[4] Section 1 of our Constitution, which sets out our founding values, provides that:

> "The Republic of South Africa is one sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:
>
> (a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms;
>
> (b) Non-racialism and non-sexism."[5]

[5] Arising from the founding values, one of the aims of the Constitution is to heal the divisions of the past, improve the quality of life of all citizens and free the potential of each person.[6] Unfortunately domestic workers have not basked in the fulfilment of this constitutional promise. Instead, their fate has been blighted as a result of being excluded from statutory protections.

[6] This Court is required to consider the constitutionality of section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA, which expressly excludes domestic workers from the definition of an "employee", thus excluding them from the social security benefits provided for under COIDA.[7] This case turns on the social security system enshrined in section 27(1)(c) of

Despite the Law Reform Commission's mandate, it unfortunately left in place this most egregious exclusion of domestic workers from the definition of "employee" in COIDA. The reason for this exclusion was ascribed to policy considerations and that this "exclusion is not necessarily discriminatory or unfair". It vaguely promised that sometime in the future a review of the exclusion of domestic workers would be considered.

[5] Section 1(a) and (b) of the Constitution.

[6] Preamble of the Constitution. Notably this Court has stressed that this principle in the Preamble imposes a constitutional obligation to eradicate all systems of subordination and oppression inherited from South Africa's colonial and apartheid past. In Tshwane City v Afriforum [2016] ZACC 19; 2016 (6) SA 279 (CC); 2016 (9) BCLR 1133 (CC) at para 8 this Court remarked on this obligation as follows:

> "As a people who were not only acutely divided but were also at war with themselves primarily on the basis of race, one of several self-imposed obligations is healing the divisions of the past. The effects of the system of racial, ethnic and tribal stratification of the past must thus be destroyed and buried permanently. But the healing process will not even begin until we all make an effort to connect with the profound benefits of change. We also need to take steps to breathe life into the underlying philosophy and constitutional vision we have crafted for our collective good and for the good of posterity."

[7] Section 1 of COIDA defines an "employee" as follows:

> "'employee' means a person who has entered into or works under a contract of service or of apprenticeship or learnership, with an employer, whether the contract is express or implied, oral the Constitution and its application to domestic workers who are not currently protected in the event of injury, disablement or death in the workplace. In addition, the rights to equality and dignity are also at the heart of this matter.

Background

[7] Ms Mahlangu was employed as a domestic worker in a private home at the time of her death. She was employed by the same family for 22 years in Faerie Glen, Pretoria. On the morning of 31 March 2012, Ms Mahlangu drowned in her employer's pool in the course of executing her duties. Her body was found floating in the swimming pool by her employer who had been present in the home at the time of the incident, but asserted that he heard no sounds of a struggle. It is alleged that Ms Mahlangu was partially blind and could not swim, which resulted in her drowning.

or in writing, and whether the remuneration is calculated by time or by work done, or is in cash or in kind, and includes—

(a) a casual employee employed for the purpose of the employer's business;

(b) a director or member of a body corporate who has entered into a contract of service or of apprenticeship or learnership with the body corporate, in so far as he acts within the scope of his employment in terms of such contract;

(c) a person provided by a labour broker against payment to a client for the rendering of a service or the performance of work, and for which service or work such person is paid by the labour broker;

(d) in the case of a deceased employee, his dependants, and in the case of an employee who is a person under disability, a curator acting on behalf of that employee;

but does not include—

(i) a person, including a person in the employ of the State, performing military service or undergoing training referred to in the Defence Act, 1957 (Act 44 of 1957), and who is not a member of the Permanent Force of the South African Defence Force;

(ii) a member of the Permanent Force of the South African Defence Force while on 'service in defence of the Republic' as defined in section 1 of the Defence Act, 1957;

(iii) a member of the South African Police Force while employed in terms of section 7 of the Police Act, 1958 (Act 7 of 1958), on 'service in defence of the Republic' as defined in section 1 of the Defence Act, 1957;

(iv) a person who contracts for the carrying out of work and himself engages other persons to perform such work;

(v) a domestic employee employed as such in a private household."

[8] Following Ms Mahlangu's death, her daughter, the first applicant, who was financially dependent on her mother at the time, approached the Department of Labour (Department) to enquire about compensation for her mother's death. She was informed that she could neither get compensation under COIDA, nor could she get unemployment insurance benefits for her loss which would ordinarily be covered by COIDA.

[9] Assisted by the second applicant, the South African Domestic Service and Allied Workers Union (SADSAWU),[8] she launched an application in the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria (High Court) to have section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA declared unconstitutional to the extent that it excludes domestic workers employed in private households from the definition of "employee". The Commission for Gender Equality[9] (Gender Commission) and the Women's Legal Centre Trust[10] were granted leave to intervene as first and second amici curiae, respectively, in these proceedings. Both amici work tirelessly to advance the rights of women.

Litigation history

[10] On 23 May 2019 the High Court declared section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA invalid to the extent that it excluded domestic workers employed in private households from the definition of "employee", thereby denying them compensation in the event of injury, disablement or death in the workplace.[11] The High Court failed to provide reasons for

[8] SADSAWU has advocated for domestic workers over many years and was active in the process in South Africa for the adoption in 2011 of the International Labour Organisation (ILO) Convention Concerning Decent Work for Domestic Workers, No. 189, 16 June 2011 (Domestic Workers Convention).

[9] The Commission for Gender Equality is a state institution established in terms of section 187 of the Constitution. The Gender Commission's mandate is "to promote respect for gender equality and the protection, development and attainment of gender equality" and to do so through, inter alia, legislative initiatives, effective monitoring and litigation.

[10] The Women's Legal Centre Trust is a juristic person created in terms of a Trust Deed dated 3 August 1998. Clause 4 of its Trust Deed provides that the Women's Legal Centre Trust's core objective is to advance and protect the human rights of women and girls in South Africa, particularly those women who suffer multiple and intersecting forms of disadvantage, so as to contribute to redressing systematic discrimination and disadvantage. The Trust fulfils its main objective by providing free legal assistance to women, advocacy, education and outreach, and through public interest litigation, which includes amicus submissions to assist courts in constitutional and public interest matters that concern women's rights and gender equality.

[11] Section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution provides:

its declaration of constitutional invalidity. The issue of retrospectivity of the order of constitutional invalidity was postponed by the High Court to allow the parties to file further submissions on this aspect.

[11] On 17 October 2019 the High Court, having considered the submissions from the parties on retrospectivity, handed down a second order declaring that the declaration of invalidity must apply retrospectively and with immediate effect to provide relief to domestic workers who were injured or who had died at work prior to the granting of the order.

[12] Before us is an application for confirmation of that declaration of constitutional invalidity.

The High Court's failure to furnish reasons

[13] The High Court granted an order declaring section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA unconstitutional, but unfortunately did not furnish any reasons for making such an order. The High Court merely made its orders on the basis of draft orders prepared by the parties, who had "settled" the issue of the unconstitutionality of section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA. This failure to furnish full reasons is regrettable as this Court does not have the benefit of the High Court's reasoning. This Court has held on numerous occasions that it is always helpful to consider the reasoning of the court of first instance.[12] Reasons provide a window into the basis of the judgment and are a valuable tool as they highlight

> "(1) When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court—
>
> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency."

[12] In Tiekiedraai Eiendomme (Pty) Limited v Shell South Africa Marketing (Pty) Limited [2019] ZACC 14; 2019 JDR 0719 (CC); 2019 (7) BCLR 850 (CC) at para 20 Cameron J held that—

> "[r]elated is the respect this Court pays to the views of the High Court and for the Supreme Court of Appeal. Our precedents say that this Court functions better when it is assisted by a well-reasoned judgment (or judgments) on the point in issue".

See also Minister of Home Affairs v Fourie; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project v Minister of Home Affairs [2005] ZACC 19; 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC); 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC) at para 39; Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security [2001] ZACC 22; 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC); 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC) at para 55; and Amod v Multilateral Motor Vehicle Accidents Fund [1998] ZACC 11; 1998 (4) SA 753 (CC); 1998 (10) BCLR 1207 (CC) at para 33.

the process of reasoning in a transparent way.[13] This gives members of the public insight into and understanding of their constitutional rights.

[14] Section 167(5) of the Constitution provides that this Court makes the final decision whether "an Act of Parliament, a Provincial Act . . . is constitutional, and must confirm any order of invalidity made by the Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court, or a court of similar status, before that order has any force". It follows that in doing so the reasoning of the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal is of fundamental importance. The same section also provides that such an order will not come into force unless this Court confirms the order.

[15] Section 172(2)(a) of the Constitution provides for confirmation proceedings. In Von Abo[14] Moseneke DCJ held as follows:

> "This Court is the highest court on all constitutional matters and is clothed with both exclusive and concurrent jurisdiction. It enjoys exclusive jurisdiction in regard to specified constitutional matters and makes the final decision on other constitutional issues that are also within the jurisdiction of other superior courts and in particular, the Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Court. The exclusive and supervisory jurisdiction of this Court may be properly gathered by three constitutional provisions. They are sections 172(2)(a) and 167(5) of the Constitution, which regulate concurrent jurisdiction with the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal, and section 167(4) which carves out jurisdictional exclusivity for this Court."[15]

[16] Von Abo makes it clear that in respect of confirmation proceedings, this Court exercises its supervisory jurisdiction on orders of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal. Our supervisory task becomes more challenging when the High Court, as in this case, does not provide well-reasoned judgments but merely rubber stamps draft orders prepared by parties. This renders this Court a de facto (in fact) court of first and last instance.

[13] The Supreme Court of Canada in R v Shephard [2002] 1 SCR 869 stated that "[j]ustice cannot be seen to be done if Judges fail to articulate the reasons for their orders".

[14] Von Abo v President of the Republic of South Africa [2009] ZACC 15; 2009 (5) SA 345 (CC); 2009 (10) BCLR 1052 (CC).

[15] Id at para 27.

[17] Furthermore, in Mphahlele[16] Goldstone J held that if courts of first instance fail to furnish reasons for their decisions, this may amount to a violation of a constitutional duty.[17] In Strategic Liquor Services this Court stated that "[i]t is elementary that litigants are ordinarily entitled to reasons for a judicial decision following upon a hearing".[18] It is important to stress that the High Court ordinarily bears a constitutional duty to provide reasons for its decisions. Failure to do so is an abdication of this constitutional duty.[19]

In this Court

[18] The applicants and amici submit that the exclusion of domestic workers amounts to unfair discrimination and impairs the fundamental dignity of domestic workers. They submit that, because domestic workers are predominantly Black women, this means that the discrimination against them constitutes indirect discrimination on the basis of race and gender. Both the applicants and amici describe the intersectional impact of discrimination on domestic workers as a result of a breach of their rights to equality and dignity on grounds of social status, gender, race and class. They also argue that the effect of patriarchy and lack of access to education has equally had an impact on their

[16] Mphahlele v First National Bank of South Africa Limited [1999] ZACC 1; 1999 (2) SA 667 (CC); 1999 (3) BCLR 253 (CC).

[17] Id at para 18. See also Stuttafords Stores (Pty) Ltd v Salt of the Earth Creations (Pty) Ltd [2010] ZACC 14; 2011 (1) SA 267 (CC); 2010 (11) BCLR 1134 (CC) (Stuttafords Stores) at para 10 where the Court held as follows:

> "This Court has stated that furnishing reasons in a judgment—
>
> > 'explains to the parties, and to the public at large which has an interest in courts being open and transparent, why a case is decided as it is. It is a discipline which curbs arbitrary judicial decisions.'"

[18] Strategic Liquor Services v Mvumbi N.O. [2009] ZACC 17; 2010 (2) SA 92 (CC); 2009 (10) BCLR 1046 (CC) at para 15.

[19] This concern was recently echoed by Khampepe J in Chisuse v Director-General, Department of Home Affairs [2020] ZACC 20; 2020 (6) SA 14 (CC); 2020 (10) BCLR 1173 (CC) at paras 18-20. Khampepe J heeded a warning that "[t]his duty to provide reasons is a vital strut to the Judiciary's legitimacy in our constitutional democracy, which is based on a culture of justification".

rights and lived realities. In order to conclude that their exclusion from COIDA is indirect discrimination on the basis of gender and race, the amici submit that an analysis within an intersectional framework is appropriate because it leads to a nuanced, purposive and socio-contextual consideration when interpreting the implementation and amendment of COIDA. The cumulative effect of intersectional discrimination exacerbates the already compromised position of domestic workers in society and marginalises them further.

[19] The applicants and amici assert that domestic workers are one of the most vulnerable groups in society.[20] They suffer past and present disadvantages on the basis that their work is not taken seriously. The fact that they are deprived of the benefits of social insurance provided under COIDA is an apt example of this. They also argue that the exclusion of domestic workers under COIDA means that the only remedy currently available to domestic workers is a common law delictual claim for damages which is fault-based. On the other hand, those employees covered by COIDA are afforded a remedy, regardless of fault and independent of the financial means of their employer. It also precludes domestic workers from equal access to social security protection.

[20] They further argue that the exclusion cannot be justified under the limitation clause in section 36 of the Constitution. There is no apparent legitimate governmental purpose for any of the provisions of COIDA that justifies this impairment of the rights of domestic workers. The applicants assert that the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA is not rationally connected to the ends sought to be achieved by COIDA, which are to afford social insurance to employees who are injured, contract diseases, or die in the course of their employment.

[20] In the ILO Report above n 1 it records Africa as the third largest employer of domestic workers, after Asia and Latin America. Approximately 5.2 million domestic workers are employed throughout the region, of which 3.8 million are women. Domestic workers account for at least 4.9% of wage employment, and women domestic workers represent 13.6% of all female paid employees. In Southern Africa domestic work is more common than in other parts of the continent, with South Africa having the highest number of domestic workers in the region. More than three-quarters of all domestic workers in South Africa are female. It further records that the racial distribution of domestic workers is highly uneven, with the vast majority classified as "black" (91%) and the remainder as "coloured" (9%).

[21] The Gender Commission relies on the Domestic Workers Convention, which emphasises that—

> "[d]omestic work continues to be undervalued and invisible and is mainly carried out by women and girls, many of whom are migrants or members of disadvantaged communities and who are particularly vulnerable to discrimination in respect of conditions of employment and of work, and to other abuses of human rights."[21]

[22] The Gender Commission argues that Article 14 requires South Africa, as a state party to the Domestic Workers Convention, to ensure that domestic workers enjoy equal protection and have access to social security. Article 14 obliges member states to take appropriate measures—

> "in accordance with national laws and regulations and with due regard for the specific characteristics of domestic work, to ensure that domestic workers enjoy conditions that are not less favourable than those applicable to workers generally in respect of social security protection."

[23] These considerations apply equally to this Court's decision in respect of constitutionality and retrospectivity. The Women's Legal Centre Trust submits that women who are employed as domestic workers are also often the financial heads of their families. These families, within an African context, often include extended family, where domestic workers provide for the financial needs of their children. They also provide for the financial needs of their grandchildren, as well as the children of other relatives within the broader family unit. Cycles of generational poverty are difficult to break. Women have long been viewed as matriarchs, whose indomitable strength ensures that both their immediate and extended families are able to respond to hardships. Ms Mahlangu is an example of such a woman.

[24] The Women's Legal Centre Trust submits that the generational impact of South Africa's apartheid history on Black women is also relevant. The values in the

[21] Preamble to the Domestic Workers Convention above n 8.

Preamble of the Constitution recognise the injustices of our past and that respect should be shown to those who have worked to build and develop our country, such as domestic workers. It further submits that historically the occupation of domestic work has been stigmatised and that stigma continues to this day. The Women's Legal Centre Trust's argument continues that the fact that domestic workers were viewed as unworthy of receiving social protection in the workplace, and that this remains unchanged, is an example of how this stigma continues to permeate within our constitutional dispensation.

[25] The respondents initially contended that it is unnecessary to challenge the constitutionality of COIDA through a court application on the basis that the relief sought by the applicants would only be of academic value, because the Minister is spearheading the drafting of amendments to COIDA in order to include domestic workers. In oral argument, the respondents concede that the provision should be struck from COIDA.

[26] Furthermore, the respondents concede that the exclusion of domestic workers limits their rights under sections 9, 10 and 27(1)(c) of the Constitution. Given the absence of any justifiable purpose for the limitation which would satisfy the requirements of section 36 of the Constitution, the respondents do not oppose the application for the confirmation of the order of invalidity.

[27] The Department has the capacity to successfully administer COIDA in the domestic sector, following its successful administration of the Unemployment Insurance Act[22] in the sector.

[22] 63 of 2001.

Issues

[28] The applicants contend that section 1(xix)(v) is irrational and infringes a number of constitutional rights: the right to equality,[23] the right to human dignity[24] and the right to have access to social security.[25] The applicants and amici also raise the effect of intersecting forms of discrimination on these rights, referred to in more detail below. The respondents accepted in the High Court and accept in this Court that the provision is unconstitutional on the bases listed by the applicants.

[29] In Phillips[26] this Court explained that it will not merely confirm an order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal; this Court must satisfy itself that the impugned provisions are indeed inconsistent with the Constitution.[27] Despite the respondents' concessions, it remains necessary for this Court to analyse all the issues raised prior to confirming the High Court's order.

[30] A further issue is that of an appropriate remedy. Should the order of constitutional invalidity have immediate and retrospective effect?

[23] Section 9 of the Constitution, in relevant parts, provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[24] Section 10 of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[25] Section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has the right to have access to . . . social security."

[26] Phillips v Director of Public Prosecutions, Witwatersrand Local Division [2003] ZACC 1; 2003 (3) SA 345 (CC); 2003 (4) BCLR 357 (CC).

[27] Id at para 8.

Legislative history of COIDA

[31] On 1 March 1994 the enactment of COIDA repealed the Workmen's Compensation Act. COIDA made several significant changes to the system of statutory compensation for employees involved in occupational accidents or who contract occupational diseases, regardless of their earnings level.

[32] In Jooste[28] Yacoob J described this compensation as follows:

> "[COIDA] is important social legislation which has a significant impact on the sensitive and intricate relationship amongst employers, employees and society at large. The state has chosen to intervene in that relationship by legislation and to effect a particular balance which it considered appropriate."[29]

An analysis of how COIDA achieves its objectives

[33] The Director-General is entitled in terms of section 15 of COIDA to collect levies from employers, the amount of which is determined by the actuarial risk profile of the relevant sector in which these employees are employed. The levies collected from employers form one part of the contributions to the Compensation Fund.[30] The Compensation Fund consists of assessments and other payments (including penalties paid by employers), interest on investments, amounts transferred from the Reserve Fund[31] and contributions by individually liable employers and mutual associations.[32]

[34] Section 16 of COIDA describes how money in the Compensation Fund must be applied. The Compensation Fund is the central institution for the financial

[28] Jooste v Score Supermarket Trading (Pty) Ltd (Minister of Labour Intervening) [1998] ZACC 18; 1999 (2) SA 1 (CC); 1999 (2) BCLR 139 (CC).

[29] Id at para 9.

[30] The Compensation Fund is established by section 15 of COIDA. The purpose of the Compensation Fund is to provide compensation to employees who are injured, disabled or die during the course and scope of their employment. The Compensation Fund has several sources of revenue including levies, assessments and penalties.

[31] The Reserve Fund is established by section 19 of COIDA.

[32] Section 15 of COIDA.

administration of COIDA. It is administered by the Director-General who receives all monies payable to the Compensation Fund and is responsible to account for their receipt and utilisation.

[35] Section 19(3) of COIDA states that the object of the Reserve Fund is to provide for unseen demands on the Compensation Fund and to stabilise the tariffs of assessment. Section 22(1) provides that if an employee meets with an accident resulting in disablement or death, that employee (or in the event of death, their dependent) shall be entitled to benefits provided by COIDA. The exclusion of domestic workers from the definition of an "employee" means that they and/or their dependents are not entitled to claim compensation under this section.

South Africa's obligations in respect of social security

[36] Social security is recognised as a human right in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights (Declaration).[33] Article 22 of the Declaration provides that "[e]veryone, as a member of society, has a right to social security". Article 25(1) of the Declaration provides that "[e]veryone has the right . . . to security in the event of unemployment, sickness, disability, widowhood, old age or other lack of livelihood in circumstances beyond [their] control". In addition, Article 9 of the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR)[34] provides that "[t]he state parties recognise the right of everyone to social security, including social insurance".

[37] Article 13 of the Maputo Protocol[35] entitled "Economic and Social Welfare Rights" requires states parties to—

[33] Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 10 December 1948.

[34] International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 16 December 1966.

[35] Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa (Maputo Protocol), 11 July 2003.

> "adopt and enforce legislative and other measures to guarantee women equal opportunities in work and career advancement and other economic opportunities. In this respect, they shall:
>
> . . .
>
> (f) establish a system of protection and social insurance for women working in the informal sector and sensitise them to adhere to it."

[38] Furthermore, the Southern African Development Community (SADC) requires states parties to recognise the provision of social security as a human right. Article 10 of the Charter of Fundamental Social Rights in SADC provides:[36]

> "Member states shall create an enabling environment so that every worker in the Region shall have a right to adequate social protection and shall, regardless of status and the type of employment, enjoy adequate social security benefits."

[39] The Women's Legal Centre Trust submits that South Africa's obligations go further. South Africa has committed itself to the eradication of extreme poverty and the implementation of appropriate social protection systems for all in terms of the United Nations Sustainable Development Goals (SDGs). SDG 8 seeks to promote the protection of labour rights including safe and secure working environments. In the face of SDG 8, there is no basis for COIDA's exclusion of domestic workers from the definition of "employee" in section 1(xix)(v).[37]

[40] Because South Africa is a signatory to these international instruments, the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA benefits is inexplicable. The provisions of these international instruments call for domestic workers to benefit from the same protections as other employees.

[36] Charter of Fundamental Social Rights in SADC, 1 August 2003.

[37] By amending our legislation to ensure that there is no discrimination against domestic workers, this will demonstrate that South Africa is one of the countries in Africa that is already taking steps to implement the ambitions articulated in the 2030 Agenda into tangible outcomes for their people and also integrating the SDGs into their national visions and plans.

[41] When interpreting rights in the Bill of Rights, courts must prefer an interpretation which is consistent with international law.[38] Evidently, the various instruments alluded to above would regard benefits in terms of COIDA as a component of the fundamental right to social security. This is based on the interdependence of rights and how such an interpretation will further South Africa's international obligations to advance gender equality and just and favourable conditions of work for vulnerable groups. As will be seen from the analysis below, international and regional benchmarks must be attained for domestic workers, and their continued exclusion as employees under COIDA means that South Africa is not compliant with these obligations.

South Africa's international law and regional law obligations

[42] The applicants and the amici urge this Court, when considering the constitutional challenge of unfair discrimination against domestic workers, to consider South Africa's international and regional legal obligations. Section 39(1)(b) of the Constitution requires this Court to have regard to international law when interpreting the rights in the Bill of Rights. This applies to the interpretation of the right of access to social security guaranteed in section 27(1)(c) of the Bill of Rights: in other words, do the COIDA benefits constitute social security as envisaged in section 27(1)(c)? It is important and helpful in assessing discrimination against a group or class of women of this magnitude that a broad national and international approach be adopted in the discourse affecting domestic workers.

[43] South Africa has ratified various conventions to eliminate all forms of discrimination against women. These include the Convention on the Elimination of All

[38] See section 233 of the Constitution which states:

> "When interpreting any legislation, every court must prefer any reasonable interpretation of the legislation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with international law."

Forms of Discrimination Against Women[39] (CEDAW), ICESCR,[40] the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination[41] and the Convention on Domestic Workers.[42] Article 2 of CEDAW requires states parties to adopt appropriate legislative measures to protect women against discrimination. Article 11(f) of CEDAW makes specific provision for equality in the workplace.

[44] Article 2 of ICESCR requires states to introduce legislative measures in a manner that does not result in discrimination on grounds of race, sex or social origin. Article 3 of ICESCR provides for equal enjoyment of economic and social rights by men and women.[43] It is noteworthy that in the first report of the Concluding Observations to

[39] Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women, 18 December 1979.

Notably, CEDAW adopts an intersectional vision of gender equality by referencing the relationship between racism and gender equality. This is recognised in its Preamble as follows:

> "Emphasising that the eradication of apartheid, all forms of racism, racial discrimination, colonialism, neo-colonialism, aggression, foreign occupation and domination and interference in the internal affairs of States is essential to the full enjoyment of the rights of men and women."

[40] To this end, in expanding on the meaning of the obligations under the ICESCR, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights adopted General Comment No. 23 on the right to just and favourable conditions of work on 27 April 2016. Notably, regarding domestic workers, at para 47(h), the Committee stresses the following:

> "The vast majority of domestic workers are women. Many belong to ethnic or national minorities or are migrants. They are often isolated and can be exploited, harassed and, in some cases, notably those involving live-in domestic workers, subject to slave-like conditions. They frequently do not have the right to join trade unions or the freedom to communicate with others. Due to stereotyped perceptions, the skills required for domestic work are undervalued; as a result, it is among the lowest paid occupations. Domestic workers have the right to just and favourable conditions of work, including protection against abuse, harassment and violence, decent working conditions, paid annual leave, normal working hours, daily and weekly rest on the basis of equality with other workers, minimum wage coverage where this exists, remuneration established without discrimination based on sex, and social security. Legislation should recognise these rights for domestic workers and ensure adequate means of monitoring domestic work, including through labour inspection, and the ability of domestic workers to complain and seek remedies for violations."

[41] International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 21 December 1965. Notably, the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination has emphasised the gendered implications of racism in its General Recommendation No. 25 on the gender-related dimensions of racial discrimination, 20 March 2020. It is also noteworthy that the Special Rapporteur on Contemporary forms of Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance has also called for an intersectional approach in addressing racial discrimination. See for example her following reports: UN Doc A/HRC/38/52; UN Doc A/74/321; and UN Doc A/HRC/41/54.

[42] Domestic Workers Convention above n 8.

[43] Notably, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights found that this Article calls for an intersectional vision of gender equality. See for example, General Comment No. 16 on the equal right of men and women to the enjoyment of all economic, social and cultural rights, 11 August 2015 at para 5 which states the following:

South Africa submitted in terms of ICESCR, the Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights pointed out that "domestic workers . . . often labour under exploitative conditions."[44] To this end, the Committee recommended that South Africa strengthen the legislative framework applicable to domestic workers by extending the benefits of COIDA to this class of workers.[45] In its view, this would be consistent with ensuring just and favourable conditions of work in terms of the ICESCR.[46]

[45] The Domestic Workers Convention recognises the vulnerabilities of domestic workers and Article 3 places a duty on the state to promote and protect them. Article 13 of the Convention further provides that states must ensure the health and occupational safety of workers.

[46] At a regional level, it is necessary to consider the impact of African-based initiatives on the treatment of women in employment. In terms of Article 66 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Charter), to which South Africa is a signatory, special protocols may be adopted to supplement its provisions. In line with Article 66 of the African Charter, the Maputo Protocol was adopted.[47] Today, the Maputo Protocol constitutes a model framework and an endless

> "Women are often denied equal enjoyment of their human rights, in particular by virtue of the lesser status ascribed to them by tradition and custom, or as a result of overt or covert discrimination. Many women experience distinct forms of discrimination due to the intersection of sex with such factors as race, colour, language, religion, political and other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth, or other status, such as age, ethnicity, disability, marital, refugee or migrant status, resulting in compounded disadvantage."

[44] Concluding observations on the initial report of South Africa, UN Doc E/C12/ZAF/CO/1.

[45] Id.

[46] Id.

[47] Portions of the Preamble of the Maputo Protocol provide as follows:

> "Considering that Article 2 of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights enshrines the principle of non-discrimination on the grounds of race, ethnic group, colour, sex, language, religion, political or any other opinion, national and social origin, fortune, birth or other status;
>
> . . .
>
> Further noting that the African Platform for Action and the Dakar Declaration of 1994 and the Beijing Platform for Action of 1995 call on all Member States of the United Nations, which have made a solemn commitment to implement them, to take concrete steps to give greater source of inspiration for women in Africa. It aims to put an end to gender stereotypes and discrimination against women and bring about the economic emancipation of women in the fields of civil, political, and reproductive health rights.

Social Security Challenge

[47] The Constitution brought with it fundamental reforms to social security. Section 27(1)(c) and (2) of the Constitution provide:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to have access to—
>
> . . .
>
> (c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance.
>
> (2) The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights."

[48] This right covers social security assistance for those in need of support and sustenance due to an injury or disease that is work-related or the death of a breadwinner as a result of such injury or disease.[48] Economic, social and cultural rights, of which the right of access to social security is a part, are indispensable for human dignity and equality. It is important to note that although COIDA predates the Constitution and that this may steer COIDA away from social security as envisaged in section 27 of the > attention to the human rights of women in order to eliminate all forms of discrimination and of gender-based violence against women;

>
> Recognising the crucial role of women in the preservation of African values based on the principles of equality, peace, freedom, dignity, justice, solidarity and democracy;
>
> . . .
>
> Concerned that despite the ratification of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights and other international human rights instruments by the majority of States Parties, and their solemn commitment to eliminate all forms of discrimination and harmful practices against women, women in Africa still continue to be victims of discrimination and harmful practices."

[48] I explain this shortly.

Constitution, item 2 of Schedule 6 makes it clear that "old order legislation" continues in force subject to its consistency with the Constitution.[49]

[49] COIDA therefore must be interpreted through the prism of the Bill of Rights and the foundational values of human dignity, equality and freedom. To interpret COIDA as a mere enactment of the common law would constrain the objectives of the Constitution and have anomalous results. This Court has warned that to limit the reach of the Constitution because law or conduct took place before its enactment would negate its fundamental objectives and aspirations.[50] In interpreting COIDA through the prism of the Bill of Rights, it is noteworthy that in Khosa[51] this Court considered the now repealed Social Assistance Act[52] against the provisions of section 27(1)(c) and (2); even though that Act also predated the Constitution. This Court found that the denial of access to social grants to permanent residents did not constitute a reasonable legislative measure as contemplated by section 27(2) of the Constitution.[53]

[50] What is the reach or scope of the right of access to social security? Does it include social security assistance for those in need of support and sustenance due to an injury or disease that is work-related or the death of a breadwinner as a result of such injury or disease?

[51] In answering these questions, one must first consider whether COIDA is social security legislation as envisioned by section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution. In Jooste this [49] Item 2 of Schedule 6 of the Constitution provides that:

> "(1) All law that was in force when the new Constitution took effect, continues in force, subject to—
>
> (a) any amendment or repeal; and
>
> (b) consistency with the new Constitution."

[50] S v Mhlungu [1995] ZACC 4; 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 8.

[51] Khosa v Minister of Social Development; Mahlaule v Minister of Social Development [2004] ZACC 11; 2004 (6) SA 505 (CC); 2004 (6) BCLR 569 (CC).

[52] 59 of 1992.

[53] Khosa above n 51 at para 82.

Court described COIDA as "important social legislation".[54] It went on to describe COIDA's objectives as follows:

> "Section 35(1) of the Compensation Act is therefore logically and rationally connected to the legitimate purpose of the Compensation Act, namely a comprehensive regulation of compensation for disablement caused by occupational injuries or diseases sustained or contracted by employees in the course of their employment."[55]

[52] The definition of "social security" in the Bill of Rights expressly includes social assistance to provide support to persons and their dependents when they are unable to support themselves.[56] In circumstances such as these, where a breadwinner has died or cannot work due to injury or illness, her dependents may be left destitute and unable to support themselves. Evidently in these circumstances, the benefits provided to those dependents by COIDA serve a similar purpose to the social grants which are provided in terms of the now Social Assistance Act[57] insofar as they intend to ameliorate the circumstances of those who would otherwise be condemned to living in abject poverty. To regard COIDA only as a statutory mechanism to address former common law claims between employers and employees is, in my view, unduly restrictive. To divorce COIDA from social security because it amounts to "compensation" misses the wide net of social security, which section 27 provides for and seeks to address. For the reasons that follow, COIDA must now be read and understood within the constitutional framework of section 27 and its objective to achieve substantive equality.

[53] In determining the scope of the right to social security, one must have regard to section 39(1)(a) of the Constitution which requires that an interpretation of the Bill of Rights must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom.

[54] Jooste above n 28 at para 9.

[55] Id at para 17.

[56] See section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution.

[57] 13 of 2004.

[54] In Khosa this Court held that equality is a foundational value which must inform the interpretation of the Bill of Rights, including the right to have access to social security.[58] The Constitution itself makes it clear that socio-economic rights must be bestowed on an equal footing by declaring that those rights are held by "everyone".[59]

[55] The approach to interpreting the rights in the Bill of Rights and the Constitution as a whole is purposive and generous and gives effect to constitutional values including substantive equality.[60] So, when determining the scope of socio-economic rights, it is important to recall the transformative purpose of the Constitution which seeks to heal the injustices of the past and address the contemporary effects of apartheid and colonialism.[61]

[56] It is unassailable that the inability to work and sustain oneself, or the loss of support by dependents as a result of the death of a breadwinner subjects the worker or dependents to a life of untold indignity. The interpretative injunction in section 39(1)(a) of the Constitution demands that this indignity and destitution be averted. Surely then, social assistance that seeks to heed this injunction falls within the ambit of that right.[62]

[58] Khosa above n 51 at para 42.

[59] Id.

[60] S v Zuma [1995] ZACC 1; 1995 (2) SA 642 (CC); 1995 (4) BCLR 401 (CC) at para 15 and S v Makwanyane [1995] ZACC 3; 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 9.

[61] Minister of Health v Treatment Action Campaign [2002] ZACC 15; 2002 (5) SA 721 (CC); 2002 (10) BCLR 1033 (CC) (TAC) at para 24 and Government of the Republic of South Africa v Grootboom [2000] ZACC 19; 2001 (1) SA 46 (CC); 2000 (11) BCLR 1169 (CC) (Grootboom) at para 25.

[62] Underscoring the importance of coming to the aid of the needy and vulnerable, Mokgoro J said in Khosa above n 51 at paras 52 and 74:

> "The right of access to social security, including social assistance, for those unable to support themselves and their dependents is entrenched because as a society we value human beings and want to ensure that people are afforded their basic needs. A society must seek to ensure that the basic necessities of life are accessible to all if it is to be a society in which human dignity, freedom and equality are foundational.
>
> . . .
>
> There can be no doubt that the applicants are part of a vulnerable group in society and, in the circumstances of the present case, are worthy of constitutional protection. We are dealing, here, with intentional, statutorily sanctioned unequal treatment of part of the South African community. This has a strong stigmatising effect."

[57] More importantly, the amici submit that the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA's reach traps both them and their dependents in a cycle of poverty which is a direct legacy of the country's colonial and apartheid past. It is that very system of racialised and gendered poverty that the Constitution seeks to undo.

[58] Lastly, this Court is enjoined to interpret rights in the Bill of Rights consistently with international law. The international instruments alluded to above certainly demand that the type of benefits provided by COIDA be considered a component of the right to social security.

[59] For all these reasons, I find that social security assistance in terms of COIDA is a subset of the right of access to social security under section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution. But that is not the end of the enquiry.

[60] Section 27(1)(c) and 27(2) must be read together.[63] Section 27(1)(c) guarantees everyone a right to have access to social security. Section 27(2) enjoins the state to take reasonable legislative and other steps to progressively realise this right. It is clear that these sub-sections are inextricably linked: section 27(2) is an internal limitation which qualifies the section 27(1) right.[64] COIDA is an example of the very type of legislation that the Constitution envisages as a "reasonable legislative measure, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of [the] right". The fact that COIDA predates the Constitution does not take it outside of the state's obligation to enact legislation and take other measures. Nor does it allow that legislation to be immune

[63] In TAC above n 61 at para 39, this Court held:

> "We therefore conclude that section 27(1) of the Constitution does not give rise to a self-standing and independent positive right enforceable irrespective of the considerations mentioned in section 27(2). Sections 27(1) and 27(2) must be read together as defining the scope of the positive rights that everyone has and the corresponding obligations on the state to "respect, protect, promote and fulfil" such rights. The rights conferred by sections 26(1) and 27(1) are to have "access" to the services that the state is obliged to provide in terms of sections 26(2) and 27(2)."

[64] Khosa above n 51 at para 83.

from the section 27(2) requirement of reasonableness. The question, therefore, is whether the exclusion of domestic workers from the definition of "employee" in COIDA is reasonable.

[61] In Grootboom this Court expounded upon the reasonableness standard of judicial review that applies to measures taken to give effect to socio-economic rights.[65] Notably, in both Grootboom and Khosa this Court remarked on the interdependence of rights in the Bill of Rights and the task of evaluating the reasonableness of a policy against its impact on the rights to dignity and equality.[66] To that end, a core aspect of the reasonableness enquiry is whether a law or policy takes cognisance of the most vulnerable members of society and those in most desperate need.[67] A law or policy that fails to do so would be considered unreasonable.

[62] In Khosa this Court was faced with a similar exclusion to that found in COIDA, also in respect of the right of access to social security. There, this Court pointed out that context is indispensable in determining the reasonableness of such an exclusion. Mokgoro J expounded upon this as follows:

> "In dealing with the issue of reasonableness, context is all-important. We are concerned here with the right to social security and the exclusion from the scheme of permanent residents who, but for their lack of citizenship, would qualify for the benefits provided under the scheme. In considering whether that exclusion is reasonable, it is relevant to have regard to the purpose served by social security, the impact of the exclusion on permanent residents and the relevance of the citizenship requirement to that purpose."[68]

[63] The purpose of social security is to ensure that everyone, including the most vulnerable members of our society, enjoy access to basic necessities and can live a life

[65] Grootboom above n 61 at para 39.

[66] Id at paras 23-4 and Khosa above n 51 at paras 40 and 44.

[67] Grootboom above n 61 at para 44 and TAC above n 61 at para 68.

[68] Khosa above n 51 at para 49.

of dignity.[69] Moreover, social security legislation serves a remedial purpose: namely, to undo the gendered and racialised system of poverty inherited from South Africa's colonial and apartheid past.

[64] In the present matter, it is clear that no legitimate objective is advanced by excluding domestic workers from COIDA. If anything, their exclusion has a significant stigmatising effect which entrenches patterns of disadvantage based on race, sex and gender. The amici have highlighted the lived experiences of domestic workers, the majority of whom are Black women, and the structural barriers which they and their dependents continue to face.

[65] In considering those who are most vulnerable or most in need, a court should take cognisance of those who fall at the intersection of compounded vulnerabilities due to intersecting oppression based on race, sex, gender, class and other grounds. To allow this form of state-sanctioned inequity goes against the values of our newly constituted society namely human dignity, the achievement of equality and ubuntu. To exclude this category of individuals from the social security scheme established by COIDA is manifestly unreasonable.

[66] For all these reasons, I find that the obligation under section 27(2) to take reasonable legislative and other measures, within available resources, includes the obligation to extend COIDA to domestic workers. The failure to do so in the face of the respondents' admitted available resources constitutes a direct infringement of section 27(1)(c), read with section 27(2) of the Constitution.

[67] Section 27(2) contains an internal limitation whereby the state may defend its failure to give effect to a socio-economic right listed in section 27(1) based on a lack of available resources to do so. I consider this at the end of this judgment where I discuss the appropriate remedy, the actuarial report and the issue of retrospectivity.

[69] Id at para 52.

[68] This leads me to consider the right to equality that the applicants also rely on in their constitutional challenge to section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA.

Equality challenge

[69] The Constitution, through its founding values and section 9 makes it peremptory for both racial and gender equality to be advanced. Section 9 provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
>
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
>
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.
>
> (5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[70] The respondents correctly concede that there is no basis for the differentiation between "employees" and the disadvantaged group of domestic workers. The applicants submit that failing to include domestic workers under the protection of COIDA constitutes unequal treatment in breach of section 9(1). While the constitutional attack is based on both sections 9(1) and 9(3), the attack on section 9(1) was not strongly pressed by counsel for the applicants or the amici. It is necessary, however, to consider section 9(1) briefly within the context of these facts.

Section 9(1) challenge

[71] In Prinsloo[70] Ackermann J stated that:

> "It is convenient, for descriptive purposes, to refer to the differentiation presently under discussion as 'mere differentiation'. In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional state is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate government purpose for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional state. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the state is bound to function in a rational manner."[71]

Prinsloo was concerned with section 8 of the interim Constitution. What I have quoted applies equally to section 9(1) of the Constitution. For completeness, let me add only that part of the "Harksen test"[72] that is relevant to the present enquiry. In Harksen this Court held:

[70] Prinsloo v Van Der Linde [1997] ZACC 5; 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC).

[71] Id at para 25.

[72] Harksen v Lane N.O. [1997] ZACC 12; 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC). The full Harksen test is as follows:

> "(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government I purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.
>
> (b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two-stage analysis:
>
> (i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.
>
> (ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).

> "Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination."[73]

Yet again, this finds application to section 9(1) of the Constitution.

[72] A question that arises then is whether the differential treatment of not affording domestic workers benefits under COIDA serves any rational government purpose. In their submissions the applicants correctly answer this question in the negative. As indicated, the respondents who are conceding the challenge understandably do not proffer a basis for the differentiation. In these circumstances, the differentiation between domestic workers and other categories of workers is arbitrary and inconsistent with the right to equal protection and benefit of the law under section 9(1). As such, even on the first stage of the Harksen test, COIDA would be constitutionally invalid.

Section 9(3) challenge and the application of intersectionality

[73] In this case however, the differentiation between domestic workers and other categories of workers also amounts to discrimination albeit indirectly. I say indirectly because, as the applicants and amici submit, domestic workers are predominantly Black women. This means discrimination against them constitutes indirect discrimination on the basis of race, sex and gender. Section 9(3) proscribes unfair discrimination by the state on certain specified grounds, which include race, sex and gender. Clearly the race, sex and gender of domestic workers is woefully apparent in the discrimination against them. In terms of section 9(5), which is quoted above, these grounds are presumptively unfair. As I will demonstrate below, with these grounds intersecting, not only is the discrimination presumptively unfair but the level of discrimination is aggravated.

> (c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (section 33 of the interim Constitution)."

[73] Id at para 54.

[74] In their written submissions, the applicants contend that "section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA discriminates on the grounds listed in section 9(3) of the Constitution, specifically the grounds of race, sex and/or gender". They also include social origin. As such, they argue that the exclusion discriminates against domestic workers both directly (as a class of workers) and indirectly on numerous listed grounds. They contend further that the section 9(3) analysis should consider how the implicated grounds intersect. Section 9(3) defines the grounds of discrimination by enumerating a defined list which is by no means a numerus clausus (closed list) of grounds of discrimination. This proscribed discrimination can be direct or indirect, but importantly, it also provides that there may be more than one ground of discrimination,[74] thus anticipating multiple grounds of discrimination simultaneously converging. It is in this notion of multiple grounds of discrimination that the importance of an intersectionality analysis becomes unavoidable.

[75] In my view, even though COIDA is invalid on a section 9(1) analysis alone, it is in the interests of justice to also deliberate on the unfair indirect discrimination challenge. In light of the unique circumstances of domestic workers, this case provides an unprecedented opportunity to expressly consider the application of section 9(3) through the framework of intersectionality. This Court has also had the benefit of hearing full oral argument on the benefits and implications of the intersectional approach.

[76] There is nothing foreign or alien about the concept of intersectional discrimination in our constitutional jurisprudence. It means nothing more than acknowledging that discrimination may impact on an individual in a multiplicity of ways based on their position in society and the structural dynamics at play. There is an array of equality jurisprudence emanating from this Court that has, albeit implicitly, considered the multiple effects of discrimination.

[74] Section 9(3) also states "on one or more grounds".

[77] At the early stages of our constitutional dispensation, Sachs J pertinently invoked it in so many words in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality where he explained:

> "One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgement that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both, that is globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly. The objective is to determine in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way if the group concerned is subjected to scarring of a sufficiently serious nature as to merit constitutional intervention. Thus, black foreigners in South Africa might be subject to discrimination in a way that foreigners generally, and [Black people] as a rule, are not; it could in certain circumstances be a fatal combination. The same might possibly apply to unmarried mothers, or homosexual parents, where nuanced rather than categorical approaches would be appropriate. Alternatively, a context rather than category-based approach might suggest that overlapping vulnerability is capable of producing overlapping discrimination. A notorious example would be African widows, who historically have suffered discrimination as [Black people], as Africans, as women, as African women, as widows and usually, as older people, intensified by the fact that they are frequently amongst the lowest paid workers."[75]

[78] Although this was a concurring judgment, the majority judgment by Ackermann J concurred in by all other Justices expressed agreement with it.[76]

[79] Furthermore, in Hassam[77] this Court looked at sameness and difference in group disadvantage on the question of intestacy between Muslim women in polygamous

[75] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice [1998] ZACC 15; 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) at para 113.

[76] Id at para 78.

[77] Hassam v Jacobs N.O. [2009] ZACC 19; 2009 (5) SA 572 (CC); 2009 (11) BCLR 1148 (CC).

marriages and other women. Such textured analysis in relation to discrimination is an indispensable legal methodology and, using the intersectionality framework as a legal tool, leads to more substantive protection of equality. Adopting intersectionality as an interpretative criterion enables courts to consider the social structures that shape the experience of marginalised people. It also reveals how individual experiences vary according to multiple combinations of privilege, power, and vulnerability as structural elements of discrimination. An intersectional approach is the kind of interpretative approach which will achieve "the progressive realisation of our transformative constitutionalism".[78]

[80] Two further examples stem from Van Heerden and Brink.[79] Here is how Moseneke J in Van Heerden recognised the intersectional effects of different forms of disadvantage:

> "This substantive notion of equality recognises that besides uneven race, class and gender attributes of our society, there are other levels and forms of social differentiation and systematic under-privilege, which still persist. The Constitution enjoins us to dismantle them and to prevent the creation of new patterns of disadvantage. It is therefore incumbent on courts to scrutinise in each equality claim the situation of the complainants in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or adds to group disadvantage in real life context, in order to determine its fairness or otherwise in the light of the values of our Constitution. In the assessment of fairness or otherwise a flexible but situation sensitive approach is indispensable because of shifting patterns of hurtful discrimination and stereotypical response in our evolving democratic society."[80]

[81] O'Regan J in Brink in dealing with the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage and discrimination, did not characterise it using the word "intersectionality", but nevertheless described multiple and intersecting forms of harm:

[78] Id at para 28.

[79] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden [2004] ZACC 3; 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC); 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) (Van Heerden) and Brink v Kitshoff N.O. [1996] ZACC 9; 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC).

[80] Van Heerden id at para 27.

> "Section 8 was adopted then in the recognition that discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm. Such discrimination is unfair: it builds and entrenches inequality amongst different groups in our society. The drafters realised that it was necessary both to proscribe such forms of discrimination and to permit positive steps to redress the effects of such discrimination. The need to prohibit such patterns of discrimination and to remedy their results are the primary purposes of section 8 and, in particular, subsections (2), (3) and (4)."[81]

[82] Recently, albeit in different contexts, this concept was endorsed in the concurring judgment of Khampepe J in Tshabalala in the context of the causes and effects of rape on Black women.[82] In the majority judgment in Centre for Child Law, when discussing agency and stigma, Mhlantla J noted the presence of "intersecting axes of discrimination".[83]

[83] The intersectional approach is evident in other jurisdictions. For instance, in 2012 the European Court of Human Rights introduced for the first time an intersectional interpretation of discrimination in the case of BS v Spain.[84] Analysing discrimination within the framework of intersectionality proved to be a useful tool in determining the presence and extent of the discrimination. That Court considered ways in which gender intersects with other identities and how these intersections contribute to unique experiences of oppression and privilege. A single-axis comparison by contrast, may not yield the full extent of the discrimination. For example, assessing discrimination against women in general does not consider the differing impacts of certain discrimination on Black women as compared to that experienced by White women.

[81] Brink above n 79 at para 42.

[82] S v Tshabalala [2019] ZACC 48; 2020 (5) SA 1 (CC); 2020 (3) BCLR 307 (CC) at paras 68-9 and fn 38.

[83] Centre for Child Law v Media 24 Ltd [2019] ZACC 46; 2020 (4) SA 319 (CC); 2020 (3) BCLR 245 (CC) at para 86.

[84] BS v Spain no 47159/08, ECHR 2012-III.

[84] It is undisputed between the parties that domestic workers who are in the main Black women, experience discrimination at the confluence of intersecting grounds. This simultaneous and intersecting discrimination multiplies the burden on the disfavoured group. It is now apt to consider how scholars have developed and grappled with the intersectional lens and how it is a helpful framework in determining the nature of the discrimination in the current matter.

[85] Crenshaw,[85] who coined the concept of the "intersectional" nature of discrimination, writing as a Black feminist on women studies, recognised and demonstrated how overlapping categories of identity (such as gender, sex and race) impact individuals and institutions. Intersectionality aims to evaluate how intersecting and overlapping forms of oppression result in certain groups being subject to distinct and compounded forms of discrimination, vulnerability and subordination.[86] As such, at times Black women may experience compounded forms of discrimination as compared to Black men or White women. In other cases, they may experience forms of discrimination and vulnerability that are qualitatively different from both these groups.[87] The power of an intersectional approach lies in its capacity to shed light on the experiences and vulnerabilities of certain groups that have been erased or rendered invisible. Unless there is recognition and an articulation of intersectional discrimination, the enormous burden experienced by, in this case, domestic workers will not be sufficiently acknowledged.

[86] Intersectionality has been described as one of "the most important theoretical contributions that women studies has made thus far".[88] Intersectionality is an approach

[85] Crenshaw "Demarginalising the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Anti-Discrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory, and Anti-Racist Policies" (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139. Crenshaw is a pioneer and leading scholar on intersectionality. Intersectionality as a concept has been used and developed by legal scholars and lawyers in the field of discrimination law.

[86] Id at 149. See also Crenshaw "Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Color" (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1241 at 1249-50.

[87] Id at 148.

[88] McCall "The Complexity of Intersectionality" Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society (2005) 30 at 1771.

that recognises that different identity categories can intersect and co-exist in the same individual thus creating a qualitatively different experience when compared to that of another individual. These overlapping burdens can lead to excessive hardship for an individual.[89]

[87] The discrimination in this case illustrates what Albertyn posits as the need for the concept of equality to be developed beyond the idea of equal concern and respect. In discussing the plasticity of the concept of equality, she reminds us that—

> "the goal of equality . . . is to remove systemic barriers to substantive freedom and actively to create conditions of equality, including attention to restructuring relations of equality at individual, institutional and societal inequalities. It is also to take account of the intersectional nature of inequalities in comprehending the problem and identifying its solutions".[90]

[88] By including domestic workers in the definition of "employee" under COIDA, the goal of substantive equality is advanced at a structural level by granting the remedy sought. To this end, it empowers domestic workers and brings them closer to the kind of "substantive freedom" that Albertyn persuasively argues should be the main object of equality jurisprudence.

[89] Atrey explains that intersectionality consists of several strands, such as sameness and difference of experiences within the context of multiple forms of discrimination.[91] This is the notion that individuals within the same group may simultaneously experience discrimination in the same way, and also differently. One cannot generalise. The applicants and amici submit that not recognising these patterns of intersecting grounds of discrimination, exacerbates patterns of group disadvantage. The outcome of an intersectional analysis, on the other hand, results in a transformative outcome which addresses systemic disadvantage. This will hopefully remove, rectify and reform the disadvantage suffered as a result of intersectional discrimination.

[89] Smith "Intersectional Discrimination and Substantive Equality: A Comparative and Theoretical Perspective" The Equal Rights Review (2016) 16 at 73.

[90] Albertyn "Contested Substantive Equality in the South African Constitution: Beyond Social Inclusion Towards Systemic Justice" (2018) 34 SAJHR 441 at 462.

[91] Atrey Intersectional Discrimination (OUP, United Kingdom, 2019) at 36. Atrey discusses sameness and difference as well sameness and difference in group disadvantage.

[90] This brings to the fore the need to consider patterns of group disadvantage and discrimination along intersectional lines. Multiple axes of discrimination are relevant to the case of domestic workers. Domestic workers experience racism, sexism, gender inequality and class stratification. This is exacerbated when one considers the fact that domestic work is a precarious category of work that is often undervalued because of patronising and patriarchal attitudes.[92] The application of an intersectional approach helps us to understand the structural and dynamic consequences of the interaction between these multiple forms of discrimination.

[91] Atrey, in referring to the concept of group disadvantage as raised by O'Regan J in Brink, explains that this phrase requires some analysis:

> "First of all, intersectionality conceives of 'disadvantage' broadly, including every kind of harm, oppression, powerlessness, subordination, marginalisation, deprivation, domination and violence. Moreover, the disadvantage is defined not by isolated or stray incidents but by systemic or structural nature. It represents a pattern of historic motifs of disadvantage which have been entrenched over time. Such disadvantage is also not personally towards random individuals but suffered by individuals because of their membership to a social group."[93]

[92] Some may contend that because COIDA only excludes certain categories of workers such as domestic workers, this only amounts to an irrational differentiation, as opposed to unfair discrimination in terms of section 9(3). I disagree. First, this Court has already established that a seemingly benign or neutral distinction that nevertheless has a disproportionate impact on certain groups amounts to indirect discrimination.[94] Secondly, this Court has established that for the purposes of a section 9(3) enquiry, there is no qualitative difference between discrimination that occurs directly or indirectly.[95] Once indirect discrimination on a listed ground has been established, then the law or conduct in question is presumed to be unfair.[96]

[92] See for example, Mantouvalou "Human Rights for Precarious Workers: The Legislative Precariousness of Domestic Labour" (2012) 34 Comparative Labour Law & Policy Journal 133 at 138.

[93] Atrey above n 91 at 41.

[93] In the present case, the uncontested evidence is that the overwhelming majority of domestic workers are women, and Black women for that matter. It is also noteworthy that the domestic work sector is the third largest employer of women in the country.[97] In addition, as I will demonstrate below, these various grounds of discrimination intersect, thus rendering domestic workers amongst the most indigent and vulnerable members of our society. In my view, there is no doubt that although the distinction in COIDA could be said to refer to a category of worker which, on the face of it, would not trigger a section 9(3) enquiry, the same cannot be said of the historical and contemporary marginalisation of domestic workers, and the various listed grounds of discrimination that intersect where discrimination is made between domestic workers and other workers.

[94] While it is true, as pointed out by my brother Jafta J in the second judgment, that COIDA also excludes members of the South African National Defence Force (SANDF) and the South African Police Service (SAPS) from its provisions, this omits to take into account that, because domestic workers are predominantly Black women, their exclusion indirectly discriminates against them on grounds of sex, gender and race. In terms of section 9(5) that discrimination is presumptively unfair. That is all that is relevant. It is noteworthy that the omission of members of the SANDF and SAPS is not

[94] Pretoria City Council v Walker [1998] ZACC 1; 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC); 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) (Walker) at paras 31-2.

[95] Id at para 35.

[96] Id.

[97] ILO Report above n 1 at 33.

the same as that of domestic workers. Section 57 of the Defence Act[98] establishes a fund for SANDF members to claim compensation for death or injury. In the case of the SAPS, a special medical scheme has been established of which only members of the SAPS can become members.[99] In terms of this scheme, SAPS' members can lodge claims for death, injury or disability to this scheme the way they would have lodged claims under COIDA. Hence, it is only domestic workers who are in a legislative vacuum without any coverage whatsoever. In addition, the historical exclusion domestic workers have faced, which I outline below, demonstrates that an analogy between them and members of the SAPS or the SANDF is inapposite.[100]

[95] Intersectionality requires that courts examine the nature and context of the individual or group at issue, their history, as well as the social and legal history of society's treatment of that group. Thus, this Court is required to consider the particular history of social security in South Africa, as it relates to domestic workers. Furthermore, this Court must consider the historical disadvantage that Black women have faced as a group.

[96] It is often said that Black women suffer under a triple yoke of oppression based on their race, gender and class.[101] The racial hierarchy established by apartheid placed Black women at the bottom of the social hierarchy.[102] During apartheid, Black women were oppressed both by codified apartheid laws and a patriarchal form of customary

[98] 42 of 2002.

[99] South African Police Service Medical Scheme (POLMED) is a closed medical scheme registered under the Medical Schemes Act 131 of 1998. Only employees of the SAPS, appointed under the South African Police Service Act 68 of 1995 and their dependants are eligible to be members of POLMED. "POLMED" available at http://www.polmed.co.za/about-us/. Also see sections 34 (1)(f) and (g) of the South African Police Service Act 68 of 1995.

[100] To the extent that the exclusion of labour brokers is similar to that of domestic workers, this Court need not make any pronouncement on it, because the question of its constitutionality is not properly before this Court.

[101] Nolde "South African Women Under Apartheid: Employment Rights with Particular Focus on Domestic Service and Forms of Resistance to Promote Change" (1991) Third World Legal Studies 203 at 204.

[102] Wing and de Carvalho "Black South African Women: Toward Equal Rights" (1995) 8 Harvard Human Rights Journal 57 at 60.

laws and norms, which rendered them perpetual minors who were at the mercy of White men and women as well as Black men.[103]

[97] This Court has on a number of occasions stressed the importance of "the need to make a decisive break from the ills of the past".[104] This constitutional imperative stems from the Constitution's commitment to establishing a non-racist and non-sexist society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. At the heart of the constitutional project is an aspiration to achieve substantive equality and undo the burdens of our past.[105]

[98] But ensuring that the vestiges of our racist past are eradicated, also requires an exploration of the lingering gendered implications of apartheid's racist system.[106] The combination of influx control laws and the migrant labour system also had a particularly onerous effect on Black women.[107] Taken together, they restricted the ability of Black women to seek and obtain employment opportunities, thus rendering them dependent on absent husbands or sons.[108] Essentially, this all sedimented a gendered and racialised system of poverty, that was particularly burdensome for Black women.

[99] Being at the bottom of the social hierarchy meant that Black women were often required to do the "least skilled, lowest paid and most insecure jobs".[109] The case of domestic workers was particularly severe. Domestic workers, the majority of whom

[103] Id.

[104] South African Revenue Service v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration [2016] ZACC 38; 2017 (1) SA 549 (CC); 2017 (2) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 5 and see further Tshwane City above n 6 at para 6.

[105] Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development v SA Restructuring and Insolvency Practitioners Association [2018] ZACC 20; 2018 (5) SA 349 (CC); 2018 (9) BCLR 1099 (CC) at para 61.

[106] See for example Poinsette "Black Women Under Apartheid: An Introduction" (1985) 8 Harvard Women's Law Journal 93 at 105 where she discusses the implications of the Immorality Act for Black women. Amongst other things she points out that that most prosecutions under the Immorality Act were against White men having sex with Black women. Also, because White men were often Black women's employers, Black Women were effectively pressurised into these sexual relationships.

[107] Andrews "From Gender Apartheid to Non-Sexism: The Pursuit of Women's Rights in South Africa" (2001) 26 North Carolina Journal of International Law and Commercial Regulation 693 at 695.

[108] Id at 696.

[109] Wing and de Carvalho above n 102 at 67.

were – and still are – Black women, were denied both a family life and social life.[110] They lived in poor conditions devoting more time to caring for the children of their employers, than their own.[111]

[100] The marginalisation that domestic workers currently face is therefore historical. During apartheid, domestic workers had a tenuous form of employment which was excluded from fair labour standards including compensation for workplace injuries, minimum wage standards and unemployment insurance.[112] Their employment conditions were not formalised and their lives were often based on the whims of their White employers.

[101] Poinsette captures the tragic lives of domestic workers during apartheid with the following remarks:

> "Black women who work as servants in white homes sometimes describe themselves as 'slaves'. Their typical living conditions are restricted, bare, and cramped. Amenities basic to any white home are often denied to the servants who work in such homes. One commentator tells of a domestic servant who was forced to wash in the toilet in her servant's quarters."[113]

[102] Because Black women found themselves at the intersection or convergence of multiple oppressions, some argue that the indignities they face can tell us something about the "grand design" or brutality of apartheid.[114] Intersectionality indeed becomes a useful analytical tool to understand the convergence of sexism, racism and class stratification and the discriminatory logic embedded in these systems. Unravelling the multiple layers of discrimination that Black women faced and still face might aid us in

[110] Poinsette above n 106 at 116-7.

[111] Id. Poinsette goes on to argue that the state targeted Black women to destabilise African families and undermine their "procreative capacity" in order to keep the black population under control.

[112] Wing and de Carvalho above n 102 at 68.

[113] Poinsette above n 106 at 116.

[114] Id at 118.

the quest to make a decisive break from our past towards the establishment of a democratic, compassionate and truly egalitarian society.[115] An intersectional framework therefore enables this Court to shift its normative vision of equality and the "baseline" assumptions embedded in anti-discrimination law.[116] The marginalisation that domestic workers and Black women in general faced during apartheid has regrettably been extended to the present day.

[103] The exclusion of domestic workers from the protections under COIDA has resulted in a situation where domestic workers have for decades into our democracy, had to bear work-related injuries or death without compensation. They are a category of workers that have been lamentably left out and been rendered invisible. Their lived experiences have gone unrecognised. It took the tragic death of Ms Mahlangu to bring this egregious form of discrimination into vivid focus.

[104] Much like their apartheid counterparts, domestic workers today remain in an unenviable position. Domestic work is a circumstance-driven employment decision, driven by financial need. Domestic workers remain shackled by poverty, because the salaries they earn are low and not nearly enough to take care of all their daily needs and those of their families. In some instances, they are single parents who do not have an additional salary to help support them and their children.

[115] See Makwanyane n 60 at para 262 where Mahomed J describes the transformative nature of the Constitution as follows:

> "In some countries, the Constitution only formalises, in a legal instrument, a historical consensus of values and aspirations evolved incrementally from a stable and unbroken past to accommodate the needs of the future. The South African Constitution is different: it retains from the past only what is defensible and represents a decisive break from, and a ringing rejection of, that part of the past which is disgracefully racist, authoritarian, insular, and repressive and a vigorous identification of and commitment to a democratic, universalistic, caring and aspirationally egalitarian ethos, expressly articulated in the Constitution. The contrast between the past which it repudiates and the future to which it seeks to commit the nation is stark and dramatic."

[116] For a more comprehensive discussion on how intersectionality shifts the normative vision of anti-discrimination law by interrogating its baseline assumptions see Crenshaw (1989) above n 85 at 145 and further Carbado and Crenshaw "An Intersectional Critique of Tiers of Scrutiny: Beyond Either/or Approaches to Equal Protection" (2019) 129 Yale Law Journal Forum 108.

[105] Section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA differentiates between employees as defined and domestic workers employed in private households who are excluded from that definition. It is evident from the above discussion that the state has discriminated against domestic workers indirectly in ways already referred to. They are a critically vulnerable group of workers. It is this very right to equality that the state has violated. If the equality breach is analysed through an intersectional lens with all the multi-axes of indirect discrimination taken into account, this can have an impact on achieving structural systemic transformation.

[106] The Constitution serves a transformative purpose that is advanced through our equality and dignity jurisprudence. It recognises that the values of equality and human dignity, although linked, each serve as independent rights and constitutional values which must be given specific content. Section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA does not advance the material well-being of domestic workers. Declaring that section invalid will fulfil the transformative mandate set by our Constitution, at both an individual and a group-based level.

[107] To conclude on equality, the exclusion of domestic workers and, therefore, their dependents from deriving benefits under COIDA limits the rights to equality before the law and equal protection and benefit of the law under section 9(1) and the right not to be discriminated against unfairly guaranteed in section 9(3).

Human dignity challenge

[108] It is undisputed in this case, that the dignity of domestic workers is being impaired by their exclusion from the definition of "employee" in COIDA. Section 10 of the Constitution provides that "[e]veryone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected". The exclusion of domestic workers from benefits under COIDA has an egregious discriminatory and deleterious effect on their inherent dignity. The exclusion demonstrates the fact that not only is domestic work undervalued, it is also not considered to be real work of the kind performed by workers that do fall within the definition of the impugned section of COIDA. One can only imagine the pain of these women who work graciously, hard and with pride only for their work and by consequence them, to go unrecognised. This amounts to domestic workers themselves not being treated with dignity.

[109] Counsel for the respondents properly concede the constitutional values and principles that apply in this case and that these include the dignity of domestic workers. Mogoeng CJ in Freedom of Religion South Africa[117] dealt with the right to human dignity and explained:

> "There is a history and context to the right to human dignity in our country. As a result, this right occupies a special place in the architectural design of our Constitution, and for good reason. As Cameron J correctly points out, the role and stressed importance of dignity in our Constitution aim 'to repair indignity, to renounce humiliation and degradation, and to vest full moral citizenship to those who were denied it in the past'. Unsurprisingly because not only is dignity one of the foundational values of our democratic state, it is also one of the entrenched fundamental rights."[118]

[110] Historically, in varying contexts across the world, domestic work has generally not been regarded as real work and has been undervalued for that reason.[119] In the American context, it has been argued that the historical undervaluation of domestic workers stems primarily from the gendered and racialised nature of those who have traditionally done this work, namely African-American women.[120] To this end, domestic work there has been undervalued for two reasons. First, it has been described as work done by a "despised race".[121] Second, it has been regarded as "women's work" or a "labour of love" having no economic currency.[122] In my view, the same rings true

[117] Freedom of Religion South Africa v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development [2019] ZACC 34; 2020 (1) SA 1 (CC); 2019 BCLR 1321 (CC).

[118] Id at para 45.

[119] See for example, Mantouvalou above n 92.

[120] Shah and Seville "Domestic Worker Organizing: Building a Contemporary Movement for the Dignity and Power" (2011) Albany Law Review 413 at 416.

[121] Id.

[122] Id.

in the South African context, where domestic work has been undervalued precisely because of who performs this work: poor Black women. The injury to dignity hence stems from the same intersectional harms elaborated upon above.

[111] The reasons for undervaluing this work and not according it the necessary dignity are deeply gendered and reflect the patriarchal values which inform what counts as real work. In one of its reports, the International Labour Organisation captures this point succinctly:

> "Domestic work, however, is still undervalued. It is looked upon as unskilled because most women have traditionally been considered capable of doing the work, and the skills they are taught by other women in the home are perceived to be innate. When paid, therefore, the work remains undervalued and poorly regulated."[123]

[112] The idea that the duties performed by domestic workers do not constitute real work, and that they are merely engaging in an inherently feminine endeavour is deeply sexist and has a significant stigmatising effect on their dignity.

[113] The often exploitative relationship between domestic workers and their employers is also relevant to the dignity enquiry. This exploitative relationship, coupled with the undervaluation of their work demonstrates how the labour of domestic workers has been commodified and how they have been objectified to that end.[124] But, the Constitution's commitment to human dignity prohibits the idea that people can be reduced to objects and treated as a means to achieve an end.[125] The Constitution

[123] International Labour Organization Report: "Decent Work for Domestic Workers" Report IV (1) International Labour Conference 99th session (2010).

[124] Mantouvalou above n 92 at 161.

[125] Steinmann "The Core Meaning of Human Dignity" (2016) 19 Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal 1 at 17. This particular understanding of human dignity is neatly summed up in the following quote in Prinsloo above n 70 at para 31 where this Court said the following:

> "We are emerging from a period of our history during which the humanity of the majority of the inhabitants of this country was denied. They were treated as not having inherent worth; as unequivocally confers self-worth on and demands respect for each individual, which must be protected and jealously guarded by courts.

[114] It is apparent that the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA calls for a re-examination of the legal and moral foundations of the discrimination against them. The multiple intersecting forms of discrimination illustrate the indignity domestic workers have endured for so long. When this case is measured along an intersectional framework, it is plainly evident that there are still disadvantaged groups who have not benefitted from democracy, or from the transformative constitutional project and whose dignity remains impaired and unprotected.

[115] For all these reasons, it is clear that the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA is an egregious limitation of their right to dignity, alongside its infringements on their other constitutional rights. It extends the humiliating legacy of exclusion experienced during the apartheid era into the present day, which is untenable.

Justification analysis

[116] The limitation of the rights I have dealt with is quite egregious and far-reaching in nature. No reasons were tendered to justify it pursuant to a section 36 limitation analysis.[126] The intersectional discrimination could not be objectively justified by the state on any criteria. This is understandable because the state is conceding > objects whose identities could be arbitrarily defined by those in power rather than as persons of infinite worth. In short, they were denied recognition of their inherent dignity."

[126] Section 36(1) of the Constitution provides:

> "The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including—
>
> (a) the nature of the right;
>
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
>
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
>
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and
>
> (e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose."

unconstitutionality. That notwithstanding, this Court must satisfy itself that the limitation of the affected rights is not justified.[127]

[117] Unquestionably, the right to equal protection of the law, the right not to be discriminated against unfairly and the right to dignity are of singular importance in our constitutionalism. Unsurprisingly they even feature in our Constitution's founding values.[128] Equally, the right of access to social security is important. It seeks to uplift the vulnerable and marginalised from destitute conditions and for that reason, it is also closely linked to the value of and right to dignity.

[118] On the other hand, the limitation serves no governmental purpose whatsoever. That much has been conceded by the state. All the state has said is that the continued exclusion of domestic workers from the enjoyment of benefits under COIDA was simply a matter of timing. It explained that it needed to prepare itself for handling the increased numbers of beneficiaries that would result from an extension of the benefits. Without suggesting that this was an acceptable reason, the state contends that it is now prepared to handle the numbers.

[119] The justification analysis must end here. The limitations on the fundamental rights outlined above are neither reasonable nor justifiable in terms of section 36(1).

Conclusion

[120] The invalidation of section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA will contribute significantly towards repairing the pain and indignity suffered by domestic workers. It should result in a greater adjustment of the architectural focus as to their place and dignity in society. Not only should this restore their dignity, but the declaration of invalidity will hopefully have a transformative effect in other areas of their lives and those of their families, in the future.

[127] Phillips above n 26 at para 20.

[128] See [4].

Remedy

[121] The starting point on the issue of an appropriate remedy is found in section 172 of the Constitution. Section 172(1)(b) empowers this Court, when deciding a constitutional matter within its power, to declare any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution invalid to the extent of its inconsistency. This Court is further empowered to make any order that is just and equitable, which may include an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity or its suspension with the aim of allowing Parliament to correct the defect.[129]

[122] The applicants seek an order confirming the High Court's order of constitutional invalidity of section 1(xix)(v) of COIDA with immediate and retrospective effect.

[123] Jafta J held in Mvumvu:[130]

> "Unless the interests of justice and good government dictate otherwise, the applicants are entitled to the remedy they seek because they were successful. Having established that the impugned provisions violate their rights entrenched in the Bill of Rights, they are entitled to a remedy that will effectively vindicate those rights. The court may decline to grant it only if there are compelling reasons for withholding the requested remedy. Indeed, the discretion conferred on the courts by section 172(1) must be exercised judiciously."[131]

[129] Section 172(1) provides:

> "When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court–
>
> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
>
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including–
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
>
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any condition, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect."

[130] Mvumvu v Minister for Transport [2011] ZACC 1; 2011 (2) SA 473 (CC); 2011 (5) BCLR 488 (CC).

[131] Id at para 46.

[124] The default position in the law is that a declaration of constitutional invalidity will apply retrospectively. When the declaration is made in relation to a statutory provision, it will be retrospective from the date that the Constitution came into effect, or in the case of post-constitutional legislation, from the date that the statutory provision came into force. This principle is based on the doctrine of objective constitutional invalidity.[132] The question then is whether the declaration of constitutional invalidity should be qualified to limit the retrospective effect of the order or whether this order of invalidity should be effective from the date the Constitution took effect.

[125] The respondents concede that the applicants are entitled to effective relief. While they do not oppose the relief sought by the applicants in respect of retrospectivity of any order this Court may make, they faintly put up two justifications in support of limiting the retrospective effect of the order being: the administrative and financial burdens this may have on the Compensation Fund. Without any evidence, the respondents claim that such burdens will arise from old injuries or diseases. In particular, if claims arising from old injuries or diseases are to be met, that will impact on the Compensation Fund's ability to meet future claims.

[132] Id at para 44, where Jafta J held as follows:

> "In terms of the doctrine of objective constitutional invalidity, unless ordered otherwise by the court the invalidity operates retrospectively to the date on which the Constitution came into force. But if the legislation in question was enacted after that date, as was the present Act, the retrospective operation of invalidity goes back to the date on which the legislation came into force."

See also Ferreira v Levin N.O.; Vryenhoek v Powell N.O. [1995] ZACC 13; 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC); 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) where this Court stated at para 28:

> "A pre-existing law which was inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution became invalid the moment the relevant provisions of the Constitution came into effect. The fact that this Court has the power in terms of section 98(5) of the Constitution to postpone the operation of invalidity and, in terms of section 98(6), to regulate the consequences of the invalidity, does not detract from the conclusion that the test for invalidity is an objective one and that the inception of invalidity of a pre-existing law occurs when the relevant provision of the Constitution came into operation. The provisions of section 98(5) and (6), which permit the Court to control the result of a declaration of invalidity, may give temporary validity to the law and require it to be obeyed and persons who ignore statutes that are inconsistent with the Constitution may not always be able to do so with impunity."

Actuarial Report

[126] The respondents filed an abbreviated actuarial report, dubbed a high-level assessment. A more detailed actuarial report would have been helpful. The respondents are in possession of their own financial information and this would have assisted the actuary in producing a full report on the effect of the retrospectivity of the order. It is incumbent on the respondents to place cogent evidence before this Court on why this Court should limit the retrospectivity of the order of constitutional invalidity.

[127] Reverting to the abbreviated actuarial report on the question of retrospectivity, the actuary states that her mandate was limited to simply perform a high-level consideration report.[133] No basis was laid as to why the actuary was given this specific and very limited mandate. The state is not a naïve, inexperienced and impecunious litigant that had to limit the actuarial report to a high-level assessment for costs or other reasons which has resulted in an unhelpful report full of unsupported generalisations. This chosen approach is a curious one when it comes to the state assisting the Court on something as important as domestic workers' rights. Its presumed intention was to assist the Court regarding the practical realities faced by the state, and to assist it in determining a viable way forward on the important issue of domestic workers' rights under COIDA. The respondents tender no evidence which suggests that the Reserve Fund would be unable to meet the demand should there be no limiting of retrospectivity. Importantly, one of the objects of the Reserve Fund is to provide for unforeseen demands on the Compensation Fund.[134]

[128] The fact that this case concerns intersectional discrimination is a relevant factor in determining whether a retrospective order should be granted.[135] As discussed above, [133] High-level means "general" or "big picture". Some may consider a "high-level overview" to be redundant, like saying "brief summary". A "high-level overview" is one that does not cover details. It provides a very basic and general explanation or presentation of the material/subject.

[134] Section 19(3)(a) of COIDA.

[135] In this case a retrospective order will address the systematic disadvantage faced by domestic workers and their dependents. Crenshaw (1991) above n 87 at 1250 argues that intersectional discrimination cannot be addressed unless the remedy is designed to address the "intersectional location" of the affected women.

I am hopeful that the inclusion of domestic workers in the definition of "employee" under COIDA will contribute towards the amelioration of systemic disadvantage suffered by these women and contribute to breaking the cycle of poverty they suffer. The above discussion dismisses any argument that the state is unable to include domestic workers based on a lack of available resources.

[129] I conclude that a just and equitable order is to not limit the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity. The impugned provision has been in place since before the advent of our constitutional democracy. During the hearing, the parties agreed that in the event of the retrospective effect of the order not being limited, the cut-off date should be the date of the interim Constitution which took effect on 27 April 1994. I agree with that cut-off date.

Costs

[130] The applicants have been successful, and costs must follow the result.

Order

[131] The following order is made:

1. The declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 1(xix)(v) of the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act 130 of 1993 made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria is confirmed.
2. The order is to have immediate and retrospective effect from 27 April 1994.
3. The first respondent must pay the applicants' costs in this Court.

JAFTA J (Mathopo AJ concurring):

Introduction

[132] This matter concerns the validity of a statutory exclusion in the COIDA,[136] of domestic workers from receiving compensation for injuries sustained in employment. The background against which the claim arises is the following. The mother of Ms Sylvia Bongi Mahlangu was a domestic worker and Ms Mahlangu was her dependant. Ms Mahlangu's mother sadly died in an accident that occurred in the course of her employment. Consequently, Ms Mahlangu lost the financial support she had received from her mother.

[133] Following this loss, Ms Mahlangu duly submitted a claim for compensation to the Director-General for the Department of Labour. The claim was lodged in terms of COIDA. She was advised that her claim was not successful because she was not eligible to claim compensation on the ground that domestic workers and their dependants were excluded from compensation payable in terms of COIDA. Dissatisfied with this decision, Ms Mahlangu and the trade union, South African Domestic Service and Allied Workers Union instituted proceedings in the Gauteng Division of the High Court. They challenged the validity of the exclusion. The Minister of Labour, the Director-General for the Department of Labour and the Compensation Commissioner were cited as respondents.

[134] By agreement between the parties, the High Court issued an order declaring the impugned provision invalid, without rendering a judgment. The Court merely converted the parties' draft order into a court order.

[135] I have had the benefit of reading the judgment of my colleague Victor AJ (first judgment). I agree that the impugned provisions are inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid for reasons that differ materially from those contained in the first judgment. First, I do not think that the socio-economic right guaranteed by section 27(1) of the Constitution is at all violated[137]. Second, I do not think that in this matter it has been shown that denying domestic workers the COIDA benefits enjoyed by other workers impairs the right to dignity. It is not shown how the denial, of itself alone, degrades domestic workers or lowers their dignity, especially because the exclusion applies to police, soldiers and other workers.

[136] Above n 3.

[136] Third, although the first judgment invokes section 9(3) of the Constitution[138] to decide the equality claim, it does not follow the test laid down in Harksen[139]. And since the applicants did not rely on a ground listed in section 9(3) for their unfair discrimination claim, the unfairness of the discrimination could not be presumed. The failure to apply the Harksen test makes it difficult to determine whether the applicants have established that the impugned provision constitutes unfair discrimination.

[137] It was incumbent upon the applicants to prove by way of evidence that the discrimination was indeed unfair. The first judgment mentions that the impugned provision violates the equality right of domestic workers under section 9(3) and proceeds to conclude that "the State has discriminated against domestic workers indirectly . . .".[140] The actual act of discrimination is the Director-General's failure to

[137] Section 27(1) provides:

> "Everyone has the right to have access to—
>
> (a) health care services, including reproductive health care;
>
> (b) sufficient food and water; and
>
> (c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance."

[138] Section 9(3) of the Constitution provides:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[139] Harksen above n 72.

[140] See the first judgment at [105].

compensate domestic workers for injuries sustained at work on the basis that COIDA does not authorise him or her to pay compensation. It is not clear to me how this constitutes indirect discrimination.

[138] But I think there is a simpler and straightforward pathway to the outcome reached in the first judgment. That is section 9(1) of the Constitution which guarantees equality before the law and equal protection and benefit of the law[141]. But before illustrating how the impugned provision breaches section 9(1), I must address the process followed by the High Court in declaring the impugned provision invalid.

Process in the High Court

[139] The High Court followed an unusual and impermissible procedure in disposing of this matter. At the hearing of the matter, it appears that the High Court was presented with a draft order, declaring the impugned provision invalid. That Court approved and granted the order requested by consent by the parties and postponed the determination of whether the declaration of invalidity should operate retrospectively, to a date approximately six months later. The Court failed to render a judgment on the matter.

[140] Therefore, it is not clear from the record which sections of the Constitution the High Court had found the impugned provision to be inconsistent with. It will be recalled that the applicant had invoked sections 9, 10 and 27 of the Constitution as the benchmark against which the impugned provision was to be tested. Consequently, there is no indication whatsoever why the High Court has declared the provision in question invalid. This is unacceptable, more so in view of the fact that the High Court was alert to the principle that its order could not be effective until confirmed by this Court[142].

[141] Section 9(1) provides:

> "Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law."

[142] Section 172(2)(a) of the Constitution provides:

> "The Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Court of South Africa or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act

This is so because this Court occupies a special place in our constitutional order and is at the apex of the Judiciary arm of the state. The orders that have to be confirmed by it under section 172 relate to decisions of the highest organs in the other arms of the state.

[141] In Pharmaceutical Manufacturers this Court stated:

> "This is the context within which s 172(2)(a) provides that an order made by the [Supreme Court of Appeal], a High Court or a Court of similar status 'concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President' has no force unless confirmed by the Constitutional Court. The section is concerned with the law–making acts of the legislatures at the two highest levels, and the conduct of the President who, as head of state and head of the Executive, is the highest functionary within the State. The use of the words 'any conduct' of the President shows that the section is to be given a wide meaning as far as the conduct of the President is concerned. The apparent purpose of the section is to ensure that this Court, as the highest Court in constitutional matters, should control declarations of constitutional invalidity made against the highest organs of State."[143] > or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court."

[142] Declaring an Act of Parliament invalid is a serious intrusion into the domain of Parliament but that intrusion is permitted by the Constitution. However, it remains a serious matter which must be done only where a competent court is persuaded that the impugned legislation is inconsistent with the Constitution and a declaration of invalidity should be limited to the extent of the inconsistency. It is the duty of the court itself and not the litigants, to determine whether an inconsistency with the Constitution has been established. A court may not abdicate this responsibility to litigants, as happened here. It is explicit from section 172(1) that it is the court which is vested with the power to decide whether a law is inconsistent with the Constitution[144].

[143] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers Association of South Africa: In re Ex Parte President of the Republic of South Africa [2000] ZACC 1; 2000 (2) SA 674 (CC); 2000 (3) BCLR 241 (CC) at para 56.

[144] Section 172(1) of the Constitution provides:

> "When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court—

[143] Although procedurally it is permissible to cite only the Minister responsible for the administration of the impugned law, the consent order presented to the High Court here was not shown to have been supported by Parliament. Yet the order struck down an Act of Parliament. Without reasons being furnished by the High Court, Parliament and other parties affected by that order would have no knowledge of reasons why the Act was declared invalid. This Court has emphasised that reasons in a judgment explain to the parties and the public at large why a particular decision in a case was taken[145]. Those reasons are also helpful to a higher court which is called upon to consider the decision of the court of first instance, either on appeal or in confirmation proceedings. Without those reasons it is impossible for the higher court to determine whether the decision of the court of first instance was correct. Here this Court was driven to approach the matter as if it is a court of first instance.

[144] In Stuttafords Stores[146] this Court also pointed out that the discipline of furnishing reasons prevents arbitrary judicial decisions. It was stated that reasons reveal whether the decision taken was correct.[147] If the High Court had given reasons, it probably would have realised that the application has not established the inconsistency between the impugned provision and some of the sections of the Constitution relied on by the applicants. I illustrate this below.

[145] The High Court erred in failing to furnish reasons for the order it issued. As the declaration of invalidity was granted, which could not come into effect unless confirmed

> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
>
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including—
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
>
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect."

[145] Mphahlele above n 16.

[146] Stuttafords Stores above n 17.

[147] Id at paras 10 and 11.

by this Court, we must consider the matter and determine whether a proper case has been made out for the declaration. Otherwise the validity of the impugned provision would be left in limbo and this would generate considerable uncertainty.

Invalidity

[146] After the death of her mother the first applicant, Ms Sylvia Bongi Mahlangu, who was the deceased's dependant at the time of her accidental death, sought compensation from the compensation fund under the control of the Director-General for the Department of Labour. The Director-General rejected her request because her mother was a domestic worker in a private household. The Director-General is mandated to pay compensation from the Fund in respect of damage suffered by employees or their dependants as a result of injuries sustained at the workplace or during the course and scope of employment. Ms Mahlangu did not accept the Director-General's decision. She challenged the validity of the statutory provision on which that decision was based.

[147] The attack mounted against that provision in the High Court was three-pronged. The first ground on which the provision was impugned was based on section 9 of the Constitution. The applicants contended that the provision was irrational and that it authorised unfair discrimination against domestic workers. The second ground was that the impugned provision violated the dignity of domestic workers in breach of section 10 of the Constitution. Lastly, it was contended that the provision concerned infringed domestic worker's right of access to social security enshrined in section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution.

[148] It is necessary to consider the terms of the impugned provision with a view to determining whether it unjustifiably limits the rights on which the applicants rely.

Impugned provision

[149] In declining to compensate Ms Mahlangu for her loss, the Director-General relied on section 1 of COIDA. Section 1 defines an employee and tabulates categories of workers which constitute employees as defined in COIDA. It goes further to list classes of workers who are excluded. The exclusion mentions the following:

> "(i) a person, including a person in the employ of the State, performing military service or undergoing training referred to in the Defence Act, 1957 (Act 44 of 1957), and who is not a member of the Permanent Force of the South African Defence Force;
> (ii) a member of the Permanent Force of the South African Defence Force while on 'service in defence of the Republic' as defined in section 1 of the Defence Act, 1957;
> (iii) a member of the South African Police Force while employed in terms of section 7 of the Police Act, 1958 (Act 7 of 1958), on service in defence of the Republic' as defined in section 1 of the Defence Act, 1957;
> (iv) a person who contracts for the carrying out of work and himself engages other persons to perform such work;
> (v) a domestic employee employed as such in a private household…"

[150] The effect of this exclusion with regard to domestic workers is that they do not enjoy the statutory entitlement to compensation for injuries sustained during the course and scope of employment. In so doing, COIDA differentiates between domestic workers, members of the South African National Defence Force and members of the South African Police Service, on the one hand and other workers on the other. It also differentiates between domestic workers who are not employed in private households and those who are so employed. The question that arises is whether that differentiation is consonant with the three sections of the Constitution on which the applicants rely. The answer to this question requires consideration of the relevant sections of the Constitution. The first is section 9.

Equality Claim

[151] Section 9 of the Constitution provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
>
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
>
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.
>
> (5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[152] This is one provision of the Constitution which has frequently received the attention of our courts, including this Court, on numerous occasions. Almost all of its terms have been interpreted and here ours is to apply those constructions to the present matter. Importantly, in Harksen this Court laid down the test to be applied in determining whether the impugned provision amounts to unfair discrimination[148]. That test applies to every claim based on unfair discrimination.

[153] In the context of an equality claim, the rationality test is sourced from section 9(1) of the Constitution. This section guarantees three distinct rights. First, the right to equality before the law. This right has been construed by this Court in Prinsloo[149] as meaning that everybody is entitled to equal treatment by our courts of law. The second one is the right to equal protection under the law and the third is the right to equal benefit of the law.

[148] Harksen above n 72 at para 43.

[149] Prinsloo above n 70 at para 22.

[154] This Court had to determine quite early in its existence that not every differentiation should be the subject of judicial scrutiny. Otherwise courts would be "compelled to review the reasonableness or the fairness of every classification of rights".[150] In Prinsloo, it was held that the State must act in a rational manner:

> "It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest naked preferences that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional State. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the State is bound to function in a rational manner".[151]

[155] Consequently this Court concluded that for an equality claim to succeed, the claimant must prove either that the differentiation is irrational in the sense that there is no rational link between the differentiation and a legitimate governmental purpose or that the differentiation amounts to unfair discrimination. It is not enough to show that the differentiation constitutes discrimination, for section 9(3) proscribes unfair discrimination only. Having identified these two types of constitutionally objectionable differentiation, this Court proceeded to lay down the test for determining unconstitutional differentiation. The test has sequential stages and in Prinsloo it was stated:

> "Accordingly, before it can be said that mere differentiation infringes s 8, it must be established that there is no rational relationship between the differentiation in question and the governmental purpose which is proffered to validate it. In the absence of such rational relationship the differentiation would infringe s 8. But while the existence of such a rational relationship is a necessary condition for differentiation not to infringe s 8, it is not a sufficient condition; for the differentiation might still constitute unfair discrimination if that further element . . . is present".[152]

[150] Id at para 17.

[151] Id at para 25.

[152] Id at para 26.

[156] Later in Harksen, this Court laid down a more detailed test for determining an equality claim. The Court proclaimed:

> "[I]t may be as well to tabulate the stages of enquiry which become necessary where an attack is made on a provision in reliance on s 8 of the interim Constitution. They are:
>
> (a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of s 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.
> (b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two-stage analysis:
> (i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.
> (ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).
> (c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (s 33 of the interim Constitution)".[153]

[153] Harksen above n 72 at para 54.

[157] It bears emphasis that this test applies in full where the claim for equality is based on both subsections (1) and (3) of section 9. Where the claim is limited to section 9(3) the first stage relating to rationality would be inapposite. This is because section 9(3) is dedicated to anti-discrimination claims. In Walker this Court said:

> "I am satisfied that the differentiation in the present case was rationally connected to legitimate governmental objectives. Not only were they measures of a temporary nature but they were designed to provide continuity in the rendering of services by the council while phasing in equality in terms of facilities and resources, during a difficult period of transition. This is, however, not the end of the enquiry as differentiation 'that does not constitute a violation of section 8(1) may nonetheless constitute unfair discrimination for the purpose of section 8(2)'".[154]

Applying the Harksen test

[158] As mentioned here the applicants relied on section 9(1) and (3) of the Constitution. This means that the entire test including rationality is applicable. It will be recalled that in sequence the rationality test applies at the very first stage. And it is important to recall what this test requires. In Law Society of South Africa[155] we are reminded of what rationality entails. There it was stated:

> "It remains to be said that the requirement of rationality is not directed at testing whether legislation is fair or reasonable or appropriate. Nor is it aimed at deciding whether there are other or even better means that could have been used. Its use is restricted to the threshold question whether the measure the lawgiver has chosen is properly related to the public good it seeks to realise. If the measure fails on this count, that is indeed the end of the enquiry. The measure falls to be struck down as constitutionally bad".[156]

[154] Walker above n 94 at para 27.

[155] Law Society of South Africa v Minister of Transport [2010] ZACC 25; 2011 (1) SA 400 (CC); 2011 (2) BCLR 150 (CC).

[156] Id at para 35.

[159] Here the differentiation arising from excluding domestic workers from compensation and benefits payable to employees and their dependants for injuries sustained at work has no rational link to any government purpose. Let alone any legitimate one. This is because no purpose has been identified by the respondents as the objective of the exclusion. On the contrary, the respondents have conceded, rightly so, that the exclusion serves no purpose. Accordingly, the impugned provision fails the rationality standard and as a result it is inconsistent with section 9(1) of the Constitution. For this reason alone it should be declared invalid to the extent of the inconsistency.

Other grounds of invalidity

[160] For various reasons it is not necessary to determine whether the other grounds on which the applicants relied, for challenging the validity of the impugned provision, were established. First, the conclusion on rationality is sufficient for striking the provision down. Second, the respondents have conceded that the provision is invalid. Third, the rationality issue which is the easiest of them all to determine, shows that the impugned provision is indeed inconsistent with the Constitution. Fourth, in the context of an equality claim, rationality falls to be determined first under the Harksen test. Fifth, there are no reasons compelling that the unfair discrimination claim and the other two grounds also be adjudicated in this matter. If these issues were not addressed in the first judgment, I would not mention or consider them.

Unfair Discrimination

[161] As mentioned, it is not clear from the first judgment whether this claim was based on the discrimination against domestic workers, as a class of workers or not. This is important as it determines how the Harksen test should be applied. For example, as 'domestic worker' is not one of the grounds listed in section 9(3), it does not trigger the presumption in section 9(5). The effect of this is that the burden was on the applicants to establish not only that the differentiation rises to discrimination but also that it amounts to unfair discrimination.

[162] The fairness of the discrimination would have to be assessed in the context of COIDA. COIDA abolishes the employees' common law claim against employers for compensation for injuries suffered in the course and scope of work. The abolished claim is replaced with a statutory claim against the compensation fund controlled by the Director-General. Classes of workers excluded from COIDA, retain their common law right but they do not enjoy the COIDA statutory right. Domestic workers are not the only class excluded. The exclusion also applies to members of the South African National Defence Force and members of the South African Police Service, Black and White. In addition, it applies to labour brokers, regardless of their race just as it covers all domestic workers in private households, Black and White. The true position is that COIDA creates two categories of employees who enjoy compensation for injuries sustained at work. One category benefits from the statutory right and the other is entitled to compensation under the common law.

[163] It is in this context that it must be established whether the differentiation constitutes discrimination and if it does, whether that discrimination is unfair. The first judgment overlooks this inquiry which entails the application of the Harksen test. In the view I take of the matter, it is not necessary to evaluate the evidence to determine whether the unfair discrimination claim has been proved. The breach of the rationality requirement suffices for declaring the impugned provision invalid.

Right to Dignity

[164] The first judgment finds that domestic work is undervalued. Proceeding from this premise, it holds that the failure to recognise domestic work as real work in the impugned exclusion amounts to "domestic workers themselves not being treated with dignity".[157] This is mistaken. The dignity of domestic workers is not bound up with the type of work they do. If that work is not recognised as real work, it does not follow as a matter of course that the dignity of those who perform the work is undervalued.

[157] First judgment at [108].

Dignity attaches to individuals regardless of the work they do which is not a personal attribute of an individual.

[165] But even if it is true that domestic workers are undervalued, this does not flow from the exclusion from COIDA benefits. It is difficult to appreciate how COIDA, by the exclusion alone, can be regarded as impairing the dignity of domestic workers. The real issue is that the exclusion treats domestic workers and other workers, including members of the South African National Defence Force and the South African Police Service, differently to other workers who receive statutory compensation. It may well be that the advantages of the statutory compensation outweigh those of the common law claim. But this does not lower or degrade the dignity of the soldiers, the police, labour brokers and domestic workers.

[166] The exclusion does not target domestic workers on the basis of human attributes. Instead, they are excluded on the ground of their occupation just like members of the South African National Defence Force, South African Police Service and labour brokers. Of itself, the exclusion does not have a dehumanising or degrading effect on the groups of workers to whom it applies. Nor does it reduce their worth as human beings.

[167] With regard to members of the South African National Defence Force, the exclusion is apparently justified because they enjoy the same right under a different statute. Consequently, the COIDA exclusion has no impact on them. This illustrates the simple point that the impugned exclusion does not inherently have an effect that impairs the dignity of those it excludes from the COIDA benefits. Therefore, the exclusion in these circumstances may impair the dignity of domestic workers only if there is proof that it accords them a status inferior to the one enjoyed by the workers entitled to COIDA benefits. In other words, it must be established that the common law claim retained by the excluded groups is inferior to the COIDA statutory right.

[168] All this has not been established here. Instead, what we have is that employers undervalue domestic workers. But as mentioned the employers' conduct in this regard does not stem from the impugned exclusion. If employers violate the domestic workers' dignity, this can be stopped by enforcing the workers' right to dignity against employers. The removal of the exclusion cannot protect domestic workers from the employers' abuse. More so because under COIDA it is not the employers who pay benefits. Therefore, there is no correlation between the abuse and the benefits concerned.

Right of access to social security

[169] The first judgment holds that the impugned provision infringes section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution. It reasons that by failing to extend the benefits of COIDA to domestic workers employed in private households, the impugned provision violates section 27(1)(c).[158] The reasoning is based on the proposition that section 27(1)(c) read with (2) requires the state to take reasonable legislative and other measures to achieve progressive realisation of access to social security, including appropriate social assistance.

[170] In determining whether COIDA is legislation contemplated in section 27(2) of the Constitution, the first judgment holds that COIDA benefits payable to dependants of a deceased employee serve a similar purpose to social grants. Therefore, the first judgment concludes from this that COIDA provides for social security envisaged in section 27 of the Constitution[159].

[171] I disagree. This reasoning proceeds from an incorrect premise. The question whether COIDA regulates the section 27(1)(c) right may be determined with reference to the text of section 27. There is nothing in the language of the section suggesting that some of the conditions to enjoying the right guaranteed by section 27(1)(c) are that there must be harm suffered as a result of bodily injuries sustained by an employee in the course of her employment[160]. The section confers on everyone the right of access to social security which includes access to social assistance if the person concerned cannot support herself and her dependants. The condition for social assistance is the right bearer's inability to support herself and nothing else.

[158] Id at [67].

[159] Id at [53].

[172] Incorporating COIDA into section 27 of the Constitution leads to new and further conditions being introduced for the enjoyment of the right in section 27(1)(c). In addition, that interpretation is not supported by the text of the section. But more importantly, that interpretation creates a separate right of access to social security which is limited to only employees and their dependants. This is contrary to the express provision that the right is available to everyone unable to support themselves and their dependants.

[173] Moreover, a claim for compensation under COIDA is not subject to limitations in section 27(2)[161]. The enforcement of the statutory right in COIDA is not subject to a progressive realisation requirement. Nor is it contingent upon available resources. Once it is established that an employee is injured at work, the Director-General of the Department of Labour must pay compensation. All this illustrates the distinction between the statutory right in terms of COIDA and the constitutional right in section 27(1)(c).

[160] Section 27(1) of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has the right to have access to—
>
> (a) health care services, including reproductive health care;
>
> (b) sufficient food and water; and
>
> (c) social security, including, if they are unable to support themselves and their dependants, appropriate social assistance."

[161] Section 27(2) of the Constitution provides:

> "The state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to achieve the progressive realisation of each of these rights."

[174] As the facts on record show that Ms Mahlangu depended solely on financial support from her late mother, it appears that she cannot support herself and this alone qualified her for social assistance from the State. And if she had demanded such assistance, the State would have been obliged to provide it. The State could not have resisted her claim on the ground that she does not meet COIDA requirements or that her mother, as a domestic worker, was excluded from having access to COIDA benefits. COIDA has no bearing on the enforcement of the right in section 27(1)(c) of the Constitution. Consequently, it cannot be inconsistent with that section.

[175] Ms Mahlangu's right which was contingent upon her mother's death, is her claim for loss of support. That is her common law right which she still has. Because it was her mother who lost the right to life as a result of the accident, no constitutional right under section 27(1) of Ms Mahlangu was affected. This means that she retained all her rights under this section which she could enforce without any reference to her mother's death.

[176] When an employee sustains an injury in the course of her employment, the constitutional rights affected are those of the employee alone. One of them is the right to security of the person, which includes freedom from all forms of violence guaranteed by section 12(1)(c) of the Constitution[162]. In Mankayi, Khampepe J held that COIDA implicates this right:

> "The issue that the High Court was required to decide was whether section 35(1) of COIDA extinguishes the common law claim of an employee, who is not entitled to

[162] Section 12(1) of the Constitution reads:

> "Everyone has the right to freedom and security of the person, which includes the right—
>
> (a) not to be deprived of freedom arbitrarily or without just cause;
>
> (b) not to be detained without trial;
>
> (c) to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources;
>
> (d) not to be tortured in any way; and
>
> (e) not to be treated or punished in a cruel, inhuman or degrading way."

> claim for compensation under COIDA but only under [Occupational Diseases in Mines and Works Act]. If AngloGold's contention is correct then this provision extinguishes Mr Mankayi's common law right to sue it for negligence. This issue ineluctably implicates the right to freedom and security of a person as enshrined in section 12 of the Constitution. The right in section 12(1)(c) confers on everyone the right to be free from all forms of violence from either public or private sources."[163]

[177] And after referring to Law Society of South Africa, my colleague proceeded to say:

> "The protection of the right to the security of the person may be claimed by any person and must be respected by public and private entities alike. Neither counsel addressed specific argument on whether the alleged extinction of a common law right infringed upon section 12(1)(c). Despite the absence of pointed argument on this issue, in my view the question whether this Court entertains jurisdiction to decide a case does not depend on counsels' approach. What is evident is that the right to security of the person is engaged whenever a person is subjected to some form of injury deriving from either a public or a private source. This is because the common law right to claim damages for the negligent infliction of bodily harm constitutes an effective remedy required by section 38 of the Constitution in order to protect and give effect to the section 12(1)(c) right, as in Law Society."[164]

[178] The conclusion reached in the first judgment is at odds with the decisions in Mankayi and Law Society of South Africa. In the latter case, Moseneke DCJ observed:

> "A plain reading of the relevant constitutional provision has a wide reach. Section 12(1) confers the right to the security of the person and freedom from violence on 'everyone'. There is no cogent reason in logic or in law to limit the remit of this provision by withholding the protection from victims of motor vehicle accidents. When a person is injured or killed as a result of negligent driving of a motor vehicle, the victim's right to security of the person is severely compromised. The state, properly > so, recognises that it bears the obligation to respect, protect and promote the freedom from violence from any source."[165]

[163] Mankayi v AngloGold Ashanti Ltd [2011] ZACC 3; 2011 (3) SA 237 (CC); 2011 (5) BCLR 453 (CC) at para 13.

[164] Id at para 15.

[179] The rights to security of the person and freedom from violence entrenched in section 12 of the Constitution also exist under the common law. These rights have received statutory protection in COIDA and its predecessors. The history of that legislation is comprehensively set out in Mankayi and as a result, there is no need to repeat it here[166]. Unlike the socio-economic rights which were introduced by the Constitution, the right to have compensation for bodily injuries has been part of our law since time immemorial. This illustrates that the right regulated by COIDA differs from the socio-economic rights in section 27(1) of the Constitution.

[180] The approach preferred in the first judgment would also lead to anomalies. The first anomaly is that, having concluded that COIDA was legislation envisaged in section 27(2) of the Constitution, the first judgment holds that section 27(1)(c) is infringed. This is at variance with our jurisprudence which states that measures adopted in compliance with section 27(2) may be challenged only on the ground of reasonableness.[167] If a legislative measure is found to be unreasonable, it constitutes a violation of section 27(2) and not 27(1).

The other anomaly is that under COIDA, compensation is payable on demand and under section 27 social security assistance is not. With regards to payment of compensation under COIDA, if the Director-General fails to compensate a claimant who is entitled to compensation, a court of law may intervene, determine the amount payable and order the Director-General to pay with immediate effect. This is not the position in relation to socio-economic rights. This was made plain in Mazibuko:

[165] Law Society of South Africa above n 155 at para 63.

[166] Mankayi above n 165 at paras 41-55.

[167] Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg [2009] ZACC 28; 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC); 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC) at paras 59-67.

> "Secondly, ordinarily it is institutionally inappropriate for a court to determine precisely what the achievement of any particular social and economic right entails and what steps government should take to ensure the progressive realisation of the right. This is a matter, in the first place, for the legislature and executive, the institutions of government best placed to investigate social conditions in the light of available budgets and to determine what targets are achievable in relation to social and economic rights. Indeed, it is desirable as a matter of democratic accountability that they should do so for it is their programmes and promises that are subjected to democratic popular choice."[168]

[181] Evidently, payment of compensation under COIDA is not subject to the reasonableness of measures taken by the state. Nor is it contingent upon available resources. Yet, it cannot be gainsaid that the right in section 27(1)(c) is subject to all these constitutional conditions, including progressive realisation of socio-economic rights.[169] Therefore, the COIDA claim for compensation for bodily injuries does not constitute a socio-economic right enshrined in section 27(1) of the Constitution. And a failure to pay compensation does not amount to a breach of that section.

[182] With regard to remedy, I embrace the first judgment's analysis and for all these reasons I support the order proposed in the first judgment.

[168] Id at para 61.

[169] Grootboom above n 61.

MHLANTLA J:

Introduction

> "What amazed me as a worker is that she is a woman just like me. But when she want[s] to shout at me, she will shout at me. Then it seems to me that I am a child. And one day I stood up and I said to her that she must remember and she must also respect me as a worker and as a woman, because I am a woman just like she is."[170]

[183] I have had the pleasure of reading the two judgments by my colleagues, Victor AJ (first judgment) and Jafta J (second judgment). I agree that the impugned provision is unconstitutional and thus support the order. I support the judgment of my sister Victor AJ when it comes to her reasoning on equality, unfair discrimination and dignity. However, I depart from her approach and support my brother Jafta J when it comes to the particular issue of social security for the reasons he gives. I agree that, based on the plain reading of the section coupled with other key differences between the statutory right juxtaposed against the constitutional right, one cannot merely incorporate COIDA into section 27(1)(c).[171]

[184] I write this concurrence to underscore the historical significance of this matter coupled with its intersectional nature. Importantly, it is to recognise the fundamental role domestic workers play in building and nurturing our society that has often gone unacknowledged due to the informal and private nature of their role.

[170] Fish "Engendering Democracy: Domestic Labour and Coalition-Building in South Africa" (2006) 32 Journal of Southern African Studies 107 at 112 quoted from a domestic worker interview, February 2001.

[171] See second judgment at [171] to [173].

Historical perspective

[185] The role of the domestic worker, and failure to deem them – by them, predominantly Black women[172] – worthy of COIDA's protection, is a manifestation of our past that seeps through to our present. This is a complex history entrenching racism, sexism and social class.

[186] I accept the warning lamented by Cameron J in Daniels that "it is not within the primary competence of judges to write history".[173] An attempt to write history or overcome the "perils of writing history"[174] is not the aim of this concurrence. Rather, this concurrence wishes to "give voice to history"[175] and afford "recognition of the historical injustice that underlies"[176] the plight of domestic workers in this matter. Considering this issue through a historical lens is particularly relevant – and necessary – given the injustices experienced by domestic workers, and that they are labelled as a ghost;[177] "invisible";[178] plagued with "historical silence";[179] and rendered "powerless".[180] But, why is this so?

[172] In South Africa, domestic work represents a sizeable segment of the employment base. Of those employed in this sector, the majority are female. See Department: Statistics South Africa Quarterly Labour Force Survey (P0211, February 2020). It is worth noting that the inescapable cycle that has led to black women making up the majority of domestic workers comes from the fact that some black women were and are systematically excluded from contributing to the economy, and as a result, are left to take up domestic responsibilities in their own homes. See further Department: Women The Status of Women in the South African Economy (1 August 2015).

[173] Daniels v Scribante [2017] ZACC 13; 2017 (4) SA 341 (CC); 2017 (8) BCLR 949 (CC) at para 150.

[174] Id at para 152.

[175] Id at para 147.

[176] Id at para 116.

[177] Baderoon "The Ghost in the House: Women, Race and Domesticity in South Africa" (2014) 1 Cambridge Journal of Postcolonial Literary Inquiry 173 at 179.

[178] Cock Maids and Madams: A Study in the Politics of Exploitation (Ravan Press Johannesburg 1980) at 278.

[179] Gaitskell et al "Class, Race and Gender: Domestic Workers in South Africa" (1983) 27/28 Review of African Political Economy 86 at 107.

[180] Gwynn "Overcoming Adversity from All Angles: The Struggle of the Domestic Worker during Apartheid" South African History Online (10 June 2015), available at https://www.sahistory.org.za/article/overcoming-adversity-all-angles-struggle-domestic-worker-during-apartheid-bennett-gwynn. See further Cock above n 178 at 232.

[187] The reasons originate from the grinding together of the tectonic plates of racism, sexism, and social class, which are all exacerbated by the private nature of their place of work – the household. This intersectional picture of discrimination is not novel. It was also painted by the scholar Cock. In the 1980s, she reported that "domestic workers are situated at the convergence of three lines along which social inequality is generated: sex, class and race".[181] She went on to state that domestic workers' experiences typify "ultra-exploitation" and that:

> "Domestic service in South Africa is a social institution that has a special significance, firstly in the sense that it constitutes the largest single source of employment for Black women after agriculture. Secondly, domestic service constituted an initial point of incorporation of Black women into colonial society . . . while domestic service until 1890 was a kaleidoscopic institution [that involved various races], men as well as women, it has gradually been transformed into a predominantly black female institution. As such, it reflects changing patterns of sexual and racial domination. Thirdly, domestic service is a microcosm of the existing pattern of inequality in South Africa, and contributes to these inequalities in important ways. Fourthly, domestic service is significant in that it is an important route of incorporation into urban-industrial society for many Black women."[182]

[188] It is worthwhile to further unpack the patterns of race, sex, gender and class from a historical perspective. First, there is the discriminatory notion that domestic work, with its low wages and poor working conditions, should be performed in most instances by black people, as a form of slavery, servitude, subordination and oppression.[183] Through white settlers and colonialism, the role of the domestic worker shifted from

[181] Id at 263.

[182] Id at 307. See also Women in Informal Employment: Globalizing and Organizing (WIEGO) "Domestic Worker's Laws and Legal Issues in South Africa" (November 2014), available at http://www.wiego.org/sites/default/files/resources/files/Domestic-Workers-Laws-and-Legal-Issues-South-Africa.pdf.

[183] Gaitskell et al above n 179 at 88 states that:

> "[A]s has already become clear, domestic service, especially in colonial societies, has a racial character. Almost everywhere in the world it is performed by 'socially inferior' groups: immigrants, blacks, and ethnic minorities. In South Africa, from the turn of the century, household-based domestic service has been above all a black institution".

white women to women of colour, again with the majority being Black women. Initially, black men conducted domestic services and in certain areas, black men dominated the domestic services space.[184] However, over time the domestic work has increasingly been done by a black female-dominated workforce. This has been attributed to black male labour being absorbed by growing industrial sectors such as mining and manufacturing,[185] coupled with the concomitant increase in the demand for domestic workers.[186]

[189] This is where the intersection of sex, gender and class is pertinent. It is said that "domestic service for [Black women] above all meant access to a wage" and that "[Black women] stayed in domestic service because of a lack of alternative job opportunities".[187] The disparities in the relationship between domestic workers and their employers were formalised and further entrenched by the apartheid regime.[188] In addition, the plight of domestic workers is ignored because the work these women perform is seen as inferior and not as challenging as a traditional man's job.[189] That view perpetuates the gendered character of domestic work and the notion that household work – such as washing, cleaning, cooking and child-care – is naturally women's work, and is not as psychologically challenging, physically strenuous, and socially productive as men's work. It also fails to acknowledge the long-hours, quiet monotony, and close [184] Id at 100, in which Gaitskell et al note that "the labour of African so-called 'houseboys' was in great demand and well-paid".

[185] Id at 101. Gaitskell et al state that:

> "In the context of a racially segregated job market, domestic service for African women above all meant access to a wage. They got a foothold in the domestic service market when women of other races were not available or had escaped its low wages and poor conditions; or when employers found men more expensive to employ or hard to recruit, or when men were considered unsuitable".

[186] Id at 100.

[187] Id at 101.

[188] See Lund and Budlender "Research Report 4: Paid Care Providers in South Africa: Nurse, Domestic Workers, and Home-Based Care Workers" United Nations Research Institute for Social Development (April 2009), available at https://www.unrisd.org/unrisd/website/document.nsf/8b18431d756b708580256b6400399775/57355f8bebd70f8ac12575b0003c6274/$FILE/SouthAfricaRR4.pdf.

[189] Gwynn above n 180.

supervision that domestic work entails. All these cruel injustices tend to go unnoticed simply because they operate in the private sphere.[190]

Post-apartheid

[190] Let us consider the plight of domestic workers since the advent of the Constitution. While domestic workers have achieved unionisation, minimum wages, and are included in the Basic Conditions of Employment Act,[191] according to a study many domestic workers report that despite ongoing and abundant regulation to secure their rights the reality in their lived-experiences at work is that they are yet to see any fundamental and tangible changes.[192] They claim that some employers "remain uninformed about domestic labour laws" and others are defiantly reluctant to abide by them.[193] One of the reasons may stem from the "severe power asymmetries that continue to privilege employers and to protect the private household employment space".[194] This is experienced despite the fact that our post-apartheid households have changed, and domestic workers are employed in households of diverse races, religions, cultures and varying socio-economic classes.

[191] The impact of this judgment must go beyond a symbolic victory for domestic workers, and should also, practically speaking, cement their rights and place in our society. Domestic workers have for many years reported being unable to vindicate rights through legislative protection;[195] this may, to an extent, be attributed to traditional attitudes towards domestic workers. Generally speaking, women have been expected to shoulder cooking and cleaning as well as caring for children, the elderly, and the disabled, among others. And this has notoriously come without real recognition under

[190] See further Cook Human Rights of Women: National and International Perspectives (Penn Press, Pennsylvania 2016) at 70.

[191] 75 of 1997.

[192] Fish above n 170 at 117.

[193] Id. One interviewee reported that: "after employing the same woman for over eighteen years . . . she had no knowledge of the labour legislation nor any intention of implementing it in her household work context".

[194] Id at 117.

[195] Id at 116.

the women's own household and a similar lack of acknowledgement in the professional sphere. The perceptions about the innate nature, as opposed to the formal acquisition, of skills and competencies required to perform these tasks persist. In turn, this feeds into the reason why the exclusion of domestic workers from COIDA has gone unremedied for far too long.

[192] That domestic workers are afforded protection by COIDA is critical for various reasons. Women conducting domestic work are often the financial head of their families. In our African context, this is often an extended family where one provides for her children, grandchildren, other relatives and, at times, others who are not even relatives. Whilst they deserve to be lauded as family matriarchs who respond to situations of hardship by providing aid, they remain stuck in the historical cycle of poverty.[196] To add to their plight, apartheid, and further discrimination, resulted in Black women being historically and generationally impacted, such women were often singlehandedly providing the foundation to their family, and, collectively, to millions of families.[197]

[193] Furthermore, the working hours for domestic workers have been described as long and unpredictable. In reality, this class of Black women dedicates a substantial amount of time to provide support to another family while being away from their own [196] In addition, female-headed households suffer a greater incidence of poverty than male-headed households and the women in the former tend to be the main earner despite earning significantly less than men. See Nwosu and Ndinda "Female Household Headship and Poverty in South Africa: An Employment Based Analysis" Economic Research Southern Africa (August 2018), available at https://econrsa.org/system/files/publications/working_papers/working_paper_761.pdf.

[197] Gywnn above n 180. Further, this trend is seen in other countries as well, where women commonly from comparatively lower socio-economic statuses are the ones who gravitate towards domestic work. Thus, having a large and crucial yet silent role in being foundational to supporting the progression of the economy in countries all over the world. See ILO Report above n 1: in Asia, domestic work is one of the most important sources of employment for Asian women, comprising predominantly women (at 82%) and up to 7.8% of all women in paid employment. In the Middle East, domestic work, often taken up by migrant workers, accounts for almost 6% of employment, but in specific countries accounts for up to 21%. The gender demographic differs, however, as men make up a third of domestic workers. This is in part due to the low employability of women; 32% of all female wage workers in the Middle East are domestic workers. Africa has 5.2 million domestic workers employed throughout, with 3.8 million being women. Figures in European nations vary drastically with women in countries such as France, Italy and Spain making up 80-90% of the sector, versus 60% in the United Kingdom. Still the trend dictates that it is a highly female-saturated field, where many are "migrants or members of historically disadvantaged groups" at 28-39.

children.[198] Cock aptly captures this tragic bind as follows: "cheap, black, domestic labour is the instrument whereby white women [today, women of any colour]" escape from some of the constraints of their domestic roles. They do so at a considerable cost to Black women, especially mothers.[199] This pattern, largely created by the apartheid system that perpetuated migrant labour, is said to have dismantled the family unit. The tragic consequence is felt to this day. This lived reality of predominant time spent in their employers' households coupled with the pressure of being the breadwinner, demonstrates the importance of COIDA's protection and the assurance of safe and decent working conditions.

[194] The plight of domestic workers has a unique and entrenched history in the South African context and these battles persist to this day. Yet, this problem transcends our borders. It is a global phenomenon fought by many women of vulnerable, disadvantaged and minority backgrounds.[200] The International Labour Organisation, through the Domestic Workers Convention,[201] recognises that part of what lends to vulnerability and the precarious situation is the private and informal nature of the job.[202] The International Labour Organisation further recognises that domestic work is work like no other and that it has special characteristics which lead to domestic workers facing particular vulnerabilities, warranting specific responses to ensure the vindication of their rights.[203]

Concluding remarks

[195] Domestic workers – despite the advent of our constitutional dispensation – remain severely exploited, undermined, and devalued as a result of their

[198] Cock above n 178 at 75.

[199] Id at 259.

[200] See further United Nations Sustainable Development Goals; CEDAW above n 39; and ICESCR above n 34.

[201] Domestic Workers Convention above n 8.

[202] Id.

[203] Id at 43 states that "[e]xtending the reach of labour law is a means of bringing domestic workers within the formal economy and into the mainstream of the Decent Work Agenda".

lived experiences at the intersecting axes of discrimination. Yet, these Black women are survivors of a system that contains remnants of our colonial and apartheid past. These Black women are brave, creative, strong, and smart. They are committed mothers and caretakers and have the ability to perform work in conditions that are challenging both psychologically and physically. These Black women are not "invisible" or "powerless". On the contrary, they have a voice, and we are listening. These Black women are at the heart of our society. Ensuring that they are afforded basic rights, and an avenue to vindicate these rights, is central to our transformative constitutional project.

[196] Therefore, I support the order proposed in the first judgment.

For the Applicants:	K Moroka SC and M Lekoane instructed by the Socio-Economic Rights Institute of South Africa
For the Respondents:	N H Maenetje SC and R Ramashia instructed by State Attorney, Pretoria
For the First Amicus Curiae:	E Webber and L Phasha instructed by Norton Rose Fulbright South Africa Incorporated
For the Second Amicus Curiae:	P Khoza instructed by the Women's Legal Centre

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

Case CCT 23/20

In the matter between:

AGNES SITHOLE First Applicant

COMMISSION FOR GENDER EQUALITY Second Applicant

and

GIDEON SITHOLE First Respondent

MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND CORRECTIONAL SERVICES Second Respondent

Neutral citation:	Sithole and Another v Sithole and Another [2021] ZACC 7
Coram:	Mogoeng CJ, Jafta J, Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Majiedt J, Mathopo AJ, Mhlantla J, Theron J, Tshiqi J and Victor AJ
Judgments:	Tshiqi J (unanimous)
Heard on:	17 September 2020
Decided on:	14 April 2021
Summary:	Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984 — constitutionality of section 21(2)(a) — section is unconstitutional.

ORDER

On application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity granted by the High Court of South Africa, KwaZulu-Natal Local Division, Durban:

1. The provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984 ('the MPA') are hereby declared unconstitutional and invalid to the extent that they maintain and perpetuate the discrimination created by section 22(6) of the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927 ('the BAA'), and thereby maintain the default position of marriages of black couples, entered into under the Black Administration Act before the 1988 amendment, that such marriages are automatically out of community of property.
2. All marriages of black persons that are out of community of property and were concluded under section 22(6) of the Black Administration Act before the 1988 amendment are, save for those couples who opt for a marriage out of community of property, hereby declared to be marriages in community of property.
3. Spouses who have opted for marriage out of community of property shall, in writing, notify the Director-General of the Department of Home Affairs accordingly.
4. In the event of disagreement, either spouse in a marriage which becomes a marriage in community of property in terms of the declaration in paragraph 2, may apply to the High Court for an order that the marriage shall be out of community of property, notwithstanding that declaration.
5. In terms of section 172(1) (b) of the Constitution, the orders in paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not affect the legal consequences of any act done or omission in relation to a marriage before this order was made.
6. From the date of this order, Chapter 3 of the Matrimonial Property Act will apply in respect of all marriages that have been converted to marriages in community of property, unless the affected couple has opted out in accordance with the procedure set out in paragraph 3 above.

7. Any person with a material interest who is adversely affected by this order, may approach the High Court for appropriate relief.
8. The second respondent is ordered to pay the costs of this application and such costs to include the costs of two counsel, where so employed.
9. It is ordered that the first respondent's attorney, Mr Dlamini, should forfeit his legal fees in respect of this application.

JUDGMENT

TSHIQI J (Mogoeng CJ, Jafta J, Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Majiedt J, Mathopo AJ, Mhlantla J, Theron J and Victor AJ concurring):

Introduction

[1] This application for confirmation of an order of invalidity by the High Court[1] concerns a constitutional challenge aimed at the provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the Matrimonial Property Act[2] (MPA). The section is attacked on the basis that it is inconsistent with the Constitution and should be declared invalid to the extent that it maintains the default position of marriages of Black people entered into before the commencement of the Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act[3] (Amendment Act). Historically marriages of Black people had a separate dispensation from other marriages. They were governed by the Black Administration Act[4] (BAA). In terms of section 22(6) of the BAA these marriages were automatically out of community of property, except where certain conditions were met. Section 22(6) was repealed by the Amendment Act. The Amendment Act deleted section 22(6) and

[1] Section 167(5) of the Constitution.

[2] 88 of 1984.

[3] 3 of 1988.

[4] 38 of 1927.

inserted sections 21(2)(a) and 25(3) into the MPA, thereby giving persons married out of community of property in terms of section 22(6) of the BAA the opportunity to change their matrimonial property regime within two years from 2 December 1988. Those parties who did not know that they could change their matrimonial property regime and those who were simply not aware that their marriages were automatically out of community of property, or did not appreciate the legal consequences of this, are still married out of community of property.

[2] The first applicant, Mrs Sithole, is one of those who did not know that their marriages are out of community of property. Her version will become more apparent below when I traverse the facts. She challenged section 21(1) and 21(2)(a)[5] of the MPA on the basis that it unfairly discriminates against women in her position on the grounds of gender and race. The challenge compels us to focus sharply on the effects of the alleged unfair discrimination on the capacity of Black couples, especially women in her position, to own property. It also requires us to examine the intersectional effects of the unfair discrimination on the constitutional rights of women to dignity, healthcare, food, water and social security. It further obliges us to deal with the uncomfortable reality that even after twenty-five (25) years into our constitutional democracy, Black people are still subjected to the remnants of the oppressive and discriminatory laws of the apartheid regime, notwithstanding the Constitution, which envisages that everyone be equally protected by the law. Our Constitution enjoins us to adopt restitutionary measures that remedy the cruel effects of these past discriminatory laws and deliver substantive equality. As Aristotle aptly observes:

> "Equality and justice are synonymous: to be just is to be equal, to be unjust is to be unequal."[6]

[3] The High Court agreed that section 21(2)(a) of the MPA does not pass constitutional muster, in that it discriminates unfairly on the grounds of gender and race.

[5] Section 21(1) and (2)(a) are quoted below.

[6] Jyakhwo "Right to Equality" (2019) 28 Nepal Law Review 477 at 477.

The High Court thus declared that all marriages concluded out of community of property under section 22(6) of the BAA are deemed to be marriages in community of property from the date of its order. It permitted couples who wish to opt out of this position and who wish to alter the matrimonial property system applicable to their marriage as a result of the declaratory order to do so by executing and registering a notarial contract to this effect. The High Court further ordered that existing burdens on the property falling into the joint estate as a result of its order will remain in place; and that from the date of its order, Chapter 3[7] of the MPA will apply in respect of all marriages that have been converted to marriages in community of property, unless and until the affected couple has opted out of such a matrimonial property regime. The High Court, however, did not agree that section 21(1) of the MPA is discriminatory.

Parties

[4] The first applicant is Mrs Agnes Sithole, a seventy-two (72) year old housewife residing in KwaZulu-Natal. She brings this application in her own personal interest, as well as in the interests of many other Black women whose marriages were subject to section 22(6) of the BAA. Those women remain married out of community of property because they did not know that they could opt out of their matrimonial regime or knew they could, but did not, due to several socio-economic factors. Ms Deborah Jean Budlender, an expert who is a social policy researcher and who filed an affidavit in support of the application in the High Court, acknowledges that it is not possible to estimate the exact number of women in the first applicant's position because the data that is available is incomplete. Drawing on evidence, which is set out in her affidavit, she concludes that there could be more than 400 000 women in the same position as Mrs Sithole.

[5] The second applicant is the Commission for Gender Equality established in terms of section 187 of the Constitution to promote respect for and the protection, development and attainment of gender equality. It brings the application in furtherance of its constitutional mandate. Through this application, the applicants seek to address the legacy of section 22(6) of the BAA in terms of which Black couples who concluded civil marriages were married out of community of property by default. The first respondent is Mr Gideon Sithole, a then seventy-four (74) year old male electrical contractor. Mr Sithole sadly passed away on 23 January 2021, after the application was argued. The second respondent is the Minister of Justice and Correctional Services, cited herein as the executive member responsible for the administration of the MPA, and as the representative of the Government of the Republic of South Africa.

[7] Chapter 3 of the MPA deals with the provisions relating to marriages in community of property.

Background facts

[6] Mr and Mrs Sithole got married to each other on 16 December 1972, out of community of property under section 22(6) of the BAA. At the time Mrs Sithole launched the application, they had been married for a period of 47 years and the marriage still subsisted. It was out of community of property due to the fact that the provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the MPA did not automatically alter their matrimonial regime.

[7] Between 1972 and 1985 Mrs Sithole was a housewife and raising her family. She ran a home-based business selling clothing. Her earnings were utilised to pay for the education of their children at private schools. The remainder was used for family and household expenses. In 2000, she and her husband purchased a house which was registered in Mr Sithole's name. After a while the relationship between the parties deteriorated. Mr Sithole then threatened to sell the house.

[8] Mrs Sithole sought and obtained an order interdicting and restraining Mr Sithole from selling the house or in any manner alienating it pending the finalisation of the present application. She is a devout member of the Roman Catholic Church, and divorce in her church is discouraged and frowned upon. She still entertained hope of reconciling with her husband. She was therefore, not willing to divorce her husband in order to secure an equitable distribution of the parties' assets by utilising the remedy which section 7(3) to (5) of the Divorce Act[8] provides for, in the event parties who are married out of community of property, get divorced.

[9] Mr Sithole admitted that the relationship between them had deteriorated. He also admitted that he intended to sell the house but denied that he threatened to do so. Regarding the matrimonial regime, Mr Sithole submitted that he and Mrs Sithole agreed to a marriage out of community of property while fully cognisant of its consequences and that there was never any interest by either of them to conclude a marriage in community of property. In support of this averment, he attached an affidavit from a priest, Father Mdabe of the Catholic Church, stationed at Marianhill Monastery Church, who was only ordained in 1989, 17 years after their marriage was solemnised. It sets out the procedure generally followed before marriages are concluded in that church.

[10] Apart from the fact that the affidavit does not deal with the procedure that was followed 17 years previously when Mr and Mrs Sithole got married, the contents of the affidavit are irrelevant to whether the provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the MPA are consistent with the Constitution. Whether they deliberately elected to marry out of community of property is also not before this Court.

Issues

[11] The core issue for determination is whether the order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court should be confirmed.[9] The outcome of that inquiry is predicated on whether the impugned provisions discriminate unfairly against Black couples whose marriages were concluded in terms of the BAA, including the applicant and other women similarly placed. If they do, the next question would be whether there is a justification that saves the challenged provisions from constitutional inconsistency. Lastly, if unfair discrimination is found and it cannot be justified, this Court must

[8] 70 of 1979.

[9] Section 167(5) of the Constitution.

confirm the order of constitutional invalidity and make an order that is just and equitable.[10]

Statutory scheme of Marriages concerning Black persons

[12] Section 22(6) of the BAA provided:

> "A marriage between Natives, contracted after the commencement of this Act, shall not produce the legal consequences of marriage in community of property between the spouses: Provided that in the case of a marriage contracted otherwise than during the subsistence of a customary union between the husband and any woman other than the wife it shall be competent for the intending spouses at any time within one month previous to the celebration of such marriage to declare jointly before any magistrate, native Commissioner or marriage officer (who is hereby authorized to attest such declaration) that it is their intention and desire that community of property and of profit and loss shall result from their marriage, and thereupon such community shall result from their marriage except as regards any land in a location held under quitrent tenure such land shall be excluded from such community."

[13] Section 22(6) of the BAA created the default position that Black couples were married out of community of property. They were permitted to marry in community of property if, in the month prior to their marriage, they jointly declared to a Magistrate, commissioner or marriage officer that they intended their marriage to be in community of property and of profit and loss. That could only occur if the marriage was not contracted during the subsistence of a customary union between the husband and any woman other than his wife. As the text indicates, section 22(6) of the BAA only governed marriages of Black people and not marriages of other races.

[14] Section 22(6) of the BAA was repealed by the Amendment Act. The Amendment Act deleted section 22(6) of the BAA and inserted sections 21(2)(a) and 25(3) into the MPA. The effect of the repeal for Black couples was that those who were married out of community of property under section 22(6) of the BAA had the opportunity to change their matrimonial regimes within two years from 2 December 1988. Couples were required to do so by executing and registering a notarial contract to that effect. Section 21(2)(a) of the MPA permitted couples to make the out of community accrual system provided for in Chapter I of the MPA applicable to their marriages. It provides:

[10] Id.

> "(a) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any law or the common law contained, but subject to the provisions of paragraphs (b) and (c), the spouses to a marriage out of community of property –
>
> . . .
>
> (ii) entered into before the commencement of the Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act, 1988, in terms of section 22 (6) of the Black Administration Act, 1927 (Act No. 38 of 1927), as it was in force immediately before its repeal by the said Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act, 1988,
>
> may cause the provisions of Chapter I of this Act to apply in respect of their marriage by the execution and registration in a registry within two years after the commencement of this Act or, in the case of a marriage contemplated in subparagraph (ii) of this paragraph, within two years after the commencement of the said Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act, 1988, as the case maybe, or such longer period, but not less than six months, determined by the Minister by notice in the Gazette, of a notarial contract to that effect."

[15] Section 25(3)(b) of the MPA permitted couples married out of community of property under section 22(6) of the BAA, where the wife was subject to the marital power of their husbands, to convert their marriage to a marriage in community of property. Section 25(3)(b) of the MPA provided:

> "(3) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any law or the common law contained, the spouses to a marriage entered into before the commencement of the Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act, 1988, and in respect of which the matrimonial property system was governed by section 22 of the Black Administration Act, 1927 (Act No. 38 of 1927), may –

. . .

(b) if they are married out of community of property and the wife is subject to the marital power of the husband, cause the provisions of Chapter II of this Act to apply to their marriage, by the execution and registration in a registry within two years after the said commencement or such longer period, but not less than six months, determined by the Minister by notice in a Gazette, of a notarial contract to the effect, and in such a case those provisions apply from the date on which the contract was so registered."

[16] The marital power was fully abolished by section 11 of the MPA as amended by section 29 of the General Law Fourth Amendment Act,[11] including in respect of marriages entered into before the commencement of the MPA. Prior to the amendment, section 11 of the MPA partially abolished the marital power. It provided that subject to the provisions of section 25, the marital power which a husband has under the common law over the person and property of his wife is hereby abolished in respect of marriages entered into after the commencement of this Act.

[17] Section 21(1) of the MPA permits couples to apply to a court at any time, to alter the matrimonial property regime applicable to their marriages. To achieve this both spouses must consent and certain procedural requirements must be complied with. Section 21(1) provided:

"(1) A husband and wife, whether married before or after the commencement of this Act, may jointly apply to a court for leave to change the matrimonial property system, including the marital power, which applies to their marriage, and the court may, if satisfied that-

(a) there are sound reasons for the proposed change;

(b) sufficient notice of the proposed change has been given to all the ` creditors of the spouses; and

(c) no other person will be prejudiced by the proposed change,

[11] 132 of 1993.

> order that such matrimonial property system shall no longer apply to their marriage and authorise them to enter into a notarial contract by which their future matrimonial property system is regulated on such conditions as the court may think fit."

[18] The Divorce Act was also amended by section 36(b) of the MPA and then by section 2 of the Amendment Act to address part of the legacy of the BAA. Section 7(3) to (5) of the Divorce Act now provides that a divorce court may order the equitable distribution of assets between spouses married out of community of property under section 22(6) of the BAA as the court may deem just. The applicants contend that although these amendments have ameliorated the discriminatory legacy of section 22(6), they do not remedy or reverse the negative impact of section 22(6) on Black spouses. The default position of these marriages continues to be out of community of property, unless the couples have taken steps to alter their matrimonial regime. For the reasons that will be explored later during the analysis, this submission has merit. Before embarking on the analysis, it is helpful to contextualise this submission and briefly set out a conspectus of the relevant equality and discrimination jurisprudence.

Equality and discrimination

[19] The idea of differentiation lies at the heart of equality jurisprudence in general.[12] Equality jurisprudence deals with differentiation in two ways: differentiation which does not involve unfair discrimination and another which does.[13] The principle of equality does not require everyone to be treated the same, but simply that people in the same position should be treated the same. However, the government may classify people and treat them differently for a variety of legitimate reasons. For, "[i]t is impossible to [regulate the affairs of inhabitants] without differentiation and without classifications which treat people differently and which impact on people differently".[14]

[12] Prinsloo v Van der Linde [1997] ZACC 5; 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 23.

[13] Id.

[14] Id at para 24.

Mere differentiation will be valid as long as it does not deny equal protection or benefit of the law, or does not amount to unequal treatment under the law in violation of section 9(1) of the Constitution.

[20] In Harksen v Lane N.O.,[15] this Court said that where the equality clause is invoked to attack a legislative provision or executive conduct on the ground that it differentiates between people or categories of people in a manner that amounts to unequal treatment or unfair discrimination, the following stages of the enquiry into a violation of section 8 are helpful:[16]

> "(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.
>
> (b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two stage analysis:
>
> (i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. …
>
> (ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. …
>
> If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).
>
> (c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (section 33 of the interim Constitution [now section 36 of the Constitution])."[17]

[21] The first question in the Harksen enquiry must be answered in the affirmative. The provisions perpetuate the existence of a special matrimonial regime for Black

[15] Harksen v Lane N.O. [1997] ZACC 12; 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC).

[16] In Harksen this Court was dealing with section 8, the equality clause under the interim Constitution, which has been replaced by section 9 of the Constitution.

[17] Harksen above n 15 at para 54*; Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund (Women's Legal Centre Trust as Amicus Curiae)* [2006] ZACC 4; 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC); 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC) at para 42.

couples who concluded their marriages before 1988. In this regard marriages of Black people were different from those of other races. No evidence was tendered in support of a government purpose for which the differential treatment of marriages between Blacks existed. I cannot conceive of any such purpose either. Therefore, the question of a rational connection between the differention and a legitimate government purpose does not arise.

[22] I now consider whether the impugned provisions amount to unfair discrimination. The discrimination complained about is on the listed grounds of race, gender and age in section 9(3) of the Constitution. In terms of this section, the state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more of the grounds listed in the section.[18] In terms of section 9(5) of the Constitution, discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in section 9(3) is presumed to be unfair unless proven otherwise. It was thus open to the respondents to prove that the discrimination is fair and none of them have contended that it is. This is not suprising, as there is no basis upon which such a submission could have been made.

[23] The discriminatory effect of the provisions can be traced back to the provisions of the BAA. The differentiation under the BAA was on a racial basis in that it created a special dispensation for Black couples. Section 22(6) of the BAA had the effect that unless Black couples expressed a desire to enter into a marriage in community of property their marriage was automatically out of community of property. This was different to what pertained in respect of other racial groups whose marriages were automatically in community of property.

[24] Section 21(2)(a) of the MPA did not have the effect of automatically converting the default position of marriages of Black people so that they were automatically in community of property like those of other races. Instead, it required all spouses in marriages out of community of property, entered into before the commencement of the MPA either (i) in terms of an antenuptial contract; or (ii) in terms of section 22(6) of the BAA, to cause the provisions of Chapter I of the MPA (the accrual system) to apply for the conversion of their marriages, within two years after the commencement of the MPA. Thus, although the amendment brought by section 21(2)(a) formally rectified the discriminatory provisions of the BAA, it failed to address the lasting discriminatory effects of these provisions. Instead, it imposed a duty on Black couples who wanted their matrimonial regimes to be similar to those of the other racial groups, to embark on certain laborious, complicated steps to enjoy equality with other races.

[18] Section 9(3) of the Constitution provides:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[25] The kind of equality envisaged by section 9 of the Constitution was aptly articulated by this Court in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice in these terms:[19]

> "Section 9 of the 1996 Constitution, like its predecessor, clearly contemplates both substantive and remedial equality. Substantive equality is envisaged when section 9(2) unequivocally asserts that equality includes 'the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms'. The State is further obliged 'to promote the achievement of such equality' by 'legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination', which envisages remedial equality."[20]

[26] Thus, although section 21(2)(a) may superficially seem to have afforded the same treatment to couples of all the different races, it effectively guaranteed formal equality but not substantive equality (equality of outcomes and opportunity), which is the kind of equality promised by our Constitution.[21] Furthermore, section 9(3) prohibits both direct and indirect discrimination. A provision is indirectly discriminatory against a group where it has a disproportionate impact on that group.[22] Therefore, when examining the constitutionality of section 21(2)(a), the emphasis should not be on the fact that it provided an option for Black couples to convert their marriages, but rather on its failure to level the playing field and place marriages of Black people under the same umbrella as marriages of couples of other racial groups.

[19] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice [1999] ZACC 17; 1998 (2) SACR 556 (CC); 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC).

[20] Id at para 62.

[21] City Council of Pretoria v Walker [1998] ZACC 1; 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC); 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 73.

[27] The challenged provisions also have indirect unfair discriminatory consequences for women. The evidence led at the High Court showed that Black women are hard hit by the impugned provisions disproportionately to their husbands and the challenged provisions have far reaching intersectional effects on Black women's rights compared to their male counterparts. It is thus necessary, before I venture into whether the provisions can be justified under the limitations clause, which is the third stage of the Harksen enquiry, to elaborate on the intersectional consequences of the impugned provisions on women's constitutional rights, especially the rights to dignity (section 10), property (section 25), housing (section 26), and health care, food, water and social security (section 27). It is to this that I now turn my focus.

[28] Intersectionality is a recognised concept in our law of equality. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality,[23] Sachs J's concurring judgment acknowledged the concept and held:

> "One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgement that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both, that is globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly. The objective is to determine in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way if the group concerned is subjected to scarring of a sufficiently serious nature as to merit constitutional intervention. … Alternatively, a context rather than category-based approach might suggest that overlapping

[22] Id.

[23] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality above n 19 at para 78 the judgment penned by Ackermann J and concurred in by all other members of this Court, agreed with this concurrence.

> vulnerability is capable of producing overlapping discrimination. A notorious example would be African widows, who historically have suffered discrimination as [Black people], as Africans, as women, as African women, as widows and usually, as older people."[24]

[29] In Van Heerden[25] this Court said:

> "This substantive notion of equality recognises that besides uneven race, class and gender attributes of our society, there are other levels and forms of social differentiation and systematic under-privilege, which still persist. The Constitution enjoins us to dismantle them and to prevent the creation of new patterns of disadvantage. It is therefore incumbent on courts to scrutinise in each equality claim the situation of the complainants in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or adds to group disadvantage in real life context, in order to determine its fairness or otherwise in the light of the values of our Constitution. In the assessment of fairness or otherwise a flexible but 'situation sensitive' approach is indispensable because of shifting patterns of hurtful discrimination and stereotypical response in our evolving democratic society."[26]

[30] Recently in Mahlangu,[27] this Court, dealing with the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act[28] and the exclusion of domestic workers from its protection, said the following about multiple forms of discrimination:

> "Crenshaw who coined the concept of the 'intersectional' nature of discrimination, writing as a Black feminist on women studies, recognised and demonstrated how overlapping categories of identity (such as gender and race) impact individuals and institutions. Intersectionality aims to evaluate how intersecting and overlapping forms of oppression result in certain groups being subject to distinct and compounded forms

[24] Id at para 113.

[25] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden [2004] ZACC 3; 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC); 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) (Van Heerden).

[26] Id at para 27.

[27] Mahlangu v Minister of Labour [2020] ZACC 24; 2021 (2) SA 54 (CC); 2021 (1) BCLR 1 (CC).

[28] 130 of 1993.

> of discrimination, vulnerability and subordination.[29] As such, at times Black women may experience compounded forms of discrimination as compared to say Black men or White women. Yet still in other cases they may experience forms of discrimination and vulnerability that are qualitatively different from both these groups." [30]

[31] Societal dynamics such as patriarchy, gender stereotyping, inflexible application of oppressive cultural practices etc, perpetuate the intersectional consequences of the challenged provisions on Black women. Patriarchy has resulted in different forms of discrimination against women with dire consequences. It is therefore one of the main drivers of the oppression of women through gender stereotyping and the abuse of cultural practices. These dire consequences have rendered women vulnerable and this vulnerability is an aspect of social reality. In unpacking patriarchy Coetzee[31] traces its origin and evolution as follows:

> "The 'ideology of patriarchy' … seems to have developed as a result of the elevation of 'the idea of the leadership of the fathers', to a position of paramount importance in society. … However, as a result of the elevation of this ideal to acquire hyper-normative status, women were regarded as inferior to men. An uneven power-relationship developed through which the male sex obtained supremacy over women, resulting in their subordination to men throughout society."[32]

She then observes how it has been used to oppress women for generations and says:

> "In the first instance, women have been oppressed for generations and have been kept from liberating themselves by structures of domination, designed to maintain the ideology. In the struggle to maintain the supremacy of the fathers, women were kept in their position of subservience through measures such as less educational

[29] Crenshaw "Demarginalising the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Anti-Discrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory, and Anti-Racist Policies" (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139 at 149. Crenshaw is a pioneer and leading scholar on intersectionality. Intersectionality as a concept has been used and developed by legal scholars and lawyers in the field of discrimination law.

[30] Mahlangu above n 27 at para 85.

[31] Coetzee "South African Education and the Ideology of Patriarchy" (2001) 21 South African Journal of Education 300.

[32] Id at 300.

> opportunities than men, economic dependence, physical harassment, exclusion from leading roles in education, politics, the church and society at large.'[33]

[32] It is uncontroverted that the devastating impact of the challenged provisions on women, which is in turn aggravated by the multiple forms of discrimination and societal dynamics, manifests itself in different ways. For instance, women traditionally bear the main responsibility for house work and child care. The result is that women are less likely to be employed than men and, if employed, are more likely to earn less than men.[34] Most of these women depend on their husbands for maintenance.

[33] Men, as income earners, are also more likely to obtain credit and therefore acquire property. The consequence is that women in the position of Mrs Sithole are not able to register property or valuable assets in their own names. Their husbands, who are generally breadwinners, are able to have property, usually the residential home of the couple, registered in their names. The effect of this is that the wife will have no control over the family property. The husband may recklessly fritter away the family's wealth, leave the property to somebody else other than his wife upon his death or unilaterally sell the family house. This in turn may impact negatively upon the rights and interests of the wife in various ways: she may be evicted out of her home, and possibly leaving her vulnerable and unsafe; and she may be left with no livelihood or nothing to ensure that her basic needs are met (including healthcare, food and security).

[34] This is the kind of situation that Mrs Sithole found herself in when she experienced marital problems. She had utilised her own meagre earnings to pay for the other needs of the family, yet, according to her, her husband threatened to dispose of the property unilaterally with no regard for her welfare and security. In order to avoid losing her home, she had to seek an interdict. Had she not sought legal advice in order to obtain the interdict, she would probably have been rendered homeless. The fact that she had used her own income for the other household expenses would not have been factored in.

[33] Id at 301.

[34] Sinden "Exploring the Gap Between Male and Female Employment in the South African Workforce" (2017) 8 Mediterranean Journal of Social Sciences 37 at 37.

[35] Women of other racial groups who got married before the 1988 amendment and who did not opt out of the default position, did not suffer the prejudices suffered by the likes of Mrs Sithole. The default position was that they were married in community of property and this meant that assets acquired with their husbands' income fell into the joint estate and they became co-owners of those assets.

[36] Most women did not change their matrimonial regimes, because they were unaware of their legal rights and were not apprised of the provisions of section 21(2)(a). The fact that a majority of Black women in the position of Mrs Sithole did not convert their matrimonial regimes as envisaged in section 21(2)(a) can be attributed largely to the legacy of our ugly racial and unequal past. As is commonly known a majority of Black women in South Africa live in the rural areas and townships and are not fully apprised of their legal rights. Ms Budlender, in her affidavit, highlights the fact that the apartheid government did not place the same emphasis as the current democratic government on informing people of their rights.

[37] For these reasons, few people took up the opportunity to execute and register notarial contracts to modify their matrimonial regime. The second applicant corroborates, to a certain extent, Ms Budlender's evidence that some women are simply ignorant of their matrimonial regimes. It states that, "it is not a rare occurrence for persons married under the BAA to wrongly assume that their marriage is in community of property. For such persons, the 1988 amendment of the MPA, creating the right to change the matrimonial property regime by registering a notarial contract, was a dead letter."

[38] Although section 21(1) was held to pass constitutional muster by the High Court, it is important to highlight that to the extent that it envisages consensus between the parties in order to vary the matrimonial regime, it is not disputed that many women are unable to obtain their husband's consent to alter their matrimonial regime. This is because a marriage in community of property would generally benefit the wife as the man would be compelled to share the estate with the wife. Ms Budlender, in her affidavit, says that "research showed that many men believe that they should be the primary decision-makers rather than make decisions through discussion and consensus. Such men are unlikely to agree to change their matrimonial property system, specifically when such a change would shift a significant portion of the decision-making power to their wives. For women in this position, the protective measures under section 21(1) and 21(2)(a) were thus not available."

[39] In any event, in order for a woman to seek the consent of her husband to the alteration of the matrimonial regime, she must have had the knowledge of her rights and the necessary access to legal services, to enable her to approach a court or arrange the execution and registration of a notarial contract. It is not in dispute that a substantial number of the women married under the BAA were not in such a position.

[40] Section 7 of the Divorce Act does not assist women in Mrs Sithole's position. Although section 7(3) to (5) gives a divorce court the discretion to redistribute the assets held by the parties as it deems just, this does not assist women who cannot (or will not) divorce their husbands for religious or social or family reasons. Furthermore, as this solution is only available in the event of a divorce, it does not address the inherent discrimination during the course of the marriage. The Constitution does not contemplate that a woman must divorce her husband and rely on the exercise of a discretion by a court, in order to achieve her right to equality.

[41] This Court in Gumede,[35] dealing with the effect of section 8(4)(a) of the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act,[36] (Recognition Act) first acknowledged that Mrs Gumede could have approached the Divorce Court for an order that is just and equitable in relation to the marriage property. It said that the persisting difficulty is that the provisions of section 8(4)(a) of the Recognition Act, read together with section 7(3) to (7) of the Divorce Act, apply only upon dissolution of the customary marriage. It also said that the fact that a divorce court may make the equitable order in relation to family property only when the marriage is dissolved, does not cure the discrimination which a spouse in a customary marriage has to endure during the course of the marriage.

[35] Gumede v President of the Republic of South Africa [2008] ZACC 23; 2009 (3) SA 152 (CC); 2009 (3) BCLR 243 (CC) at para 45.

[36] 120 of 1998.

[42] The second respondent did not dispute the evidence that shows the intersectional effects of the challenged provisions on women, nor did he contend that this form of discrimination against women is fair. It follows that the impugned provisions do not only amount to unfair discrimination on the basis of race, but also on the basis of gender.

[43] There can be no doubt that the provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the MPA perpetuate the discriminatory effect of section 22(6) of the BAA. The measures taken to remedy the discriminatory legacy of section 22(6) of the BAA are inadequate.

[44] Having held that the provisions amount to unfair discrimination, the next enquiry is whether they can be justified under the limitations clause.[37] The second respondent did not contend that there was any basis on which the unfair discrimination suffered by Black couples can be justified. The genesis of the provisions was the orchestrated pattern of racial discrimination and segregation. They resulted from a legislated, deliberate, unjust and senseless system of separation between races that was based on a twisted notion that Black and white people were not worthy of the same treatment. Blacks specifically were regarded as inferior to all other races and not worthy of being respected nor protected by government.

[45] The fact that the ghosts of our ugly past still rear their ghastly heads in the form of provisions like this many years after the advent of democracy is unacceptable. The only possible explanation for the retention of these remnants of past discriminatory laws in our statutes is that they have been overlooked. The dire consequences suffered by Black people as a result of such discriminatory laws make it compelling that such laws should be obliterated from our statutes urgently.[38] To do so would have the effect that the constitutional right to dignity[39] of all Black couples affected by the impugned provisions is respected and protected as commanded by the Constitution. The pressing need for the vindication of the dignity of Black couples points away from any possibility of the unfair discrimination being reasonable and justifiable. The Republic of South Africa is founded on the values of human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.[40] In terms of section 7(1) of the Constitution, the Bill of Rights is the cornerstone of our democracy and "enshrines the rights of all people in our country and affirms the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom". The right to human dignity is therefore one of the core constitutional rights.

[37] Section 36 of the Constitution.

[46] Recognising the right to dignity is an acknowledgment of the intrinsic worth of human beings. This right therefore is the foundation of many other rights that are specifically entrenched in the Bill of Rights. One of these is the right to equality. Black couples, like all others have to be afforded equal protection and benefit of the law[41] so that their inherent dignity is respected and protected.[42]

[47] To conclude, the unfair discrimination is not saved by section 36(1) of the Constitution. The provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the MPA are thus inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid and the High Court order to this effect should be confirmed. Henceforth, the default position must be that all marriages which, in terms of the BAA, were automatically out of community of property are in community of property. The [38] Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha; Shibi v Sithole ; South African Human Rights Commission v President of the Republic of South Africa [2004] ZACC 17; 2005 (1) SA 580 (CC); 2005 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 61.

[39] Section 10 of the Constitution guarantees everyone's right to "inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[40] Section 1 of the Constitution.

[41] Section 9 of the Constitution.

[42] Section 10 of the Constitution.

affected couples must then have the option, like other races, to opt out and change their matrimonial regime to be out of community of property.

Remedy

Order and retrospectivity

[48] Having held that the impugned section is inconsistent with the Constitution and thus invalid, this Court must make an order that is just and equitable. That order may entail an "order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and suspending the declaration of invalidity" to allow the legislature to correct the defect. The second respondent has not asked this Court to limit the retrospective effect of the order of invalidity, as contemplated in section 172(1)(b)(i) of the Constitution.

[49] As already indicated, the fact that these kinds of provisions are still in our statute book is unacceptable. It would thus not be just and equitable to limit the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity. Furthermore, a prospective order would not grant any, or effective relief to Black couples in marriages concluded before 1988. The retrospective regime which the order would permit is properly aligned with the prospective regime created by Parliament for other couples of other racial groups and the effect is that the default position in all marriages would be marriages in community of property.

[50] There is no basis to delay and thus perpetuate the unjustified unequal treatment of Black couples. However, the order should not affect the legal consequences of any act or omission existing in relation to a marriage before this order was made. Also, the order must not undo completed transactions in terms of which ownership of property belonging to any of the affected spouses has since passed to third parties. Further, a saving provision or generic order should be made in favour of a person claiming specific prejudice arising from the retrospective change of the matrimonial regime, to approach a competent court for appropriate relief.

Costs

[51] Only the first respondent has opposed the application. In the interests of protecting Mrs Sithole's share of the joint estate, no costs order should be made against Mr Sithole's estate.

[52] In the High Court costs were sought against the Minister only if he opposed the application. He did not oppose the application but he was ordered to pay the costs. The applicants have elected to abandon that order as it was sought and granted in error.

[53] In this Court too the Minister has elected to abide by our decision. However, as a member of the Executive responsible for the administration of the legislation in question, he bears the responsibility to detect areas of concern in legislation and take responsibility to rectify them. Had he amended the legislation, this application would not have been brought. In the circumstances a costs order against the Minister in this Court is appropriate. In any event, generally where this Court confirms a declaration of constitutional invalidity, the applicant is entitled to costs against the member of the Executive responsible for the administration of the impugned legislation.

[54] This application was set down for hearing on 17 September 2020. On 16 September 2020 the applicants' attorneys contacted Mr Sithole's attorney, Mr Dlamini to ascertain whether he would be participating in the hearing. They were advised that Mr Dlamini had no knowledge of the matter being set down for hearing on 17 September 2020. Mr Dlamini provided the applicants' attorneys with a different email address to the one previously provided to them as well as the different courts. On the morning of 17 September 2020, Mr Dlamini, through his counsel, alleged that he had not received notification of the set down, and for this reason requested a postponement. Mr Sithole's counsel advised this Court that Mr Dlamini has several email addresses which change very often due to the fact that he has an "inherent phobia of technology". In the interests of fairness, the application was postponed and directions requiring Mr Dlamini to show cause why a punitive costs order should not be made against him were issued.

[55] No affidavit was received by this Court in response to the directions, but during argument, Mr Sithole's counsel stated that she had been briefed that an affidavit had been filed in this regard. Counsel, however, could not explain to this Court why Mr Dlamini did not inform this Court of the several changes in his email addresses. The only explanation proffered was that Mr Dlamini expected that service would be effected physically to his office address because a certain set of pleadings had previously been served in this fashion.

[56] Subsequent to the postponement, and in an attempt to deal with the version of Mr Dlamini suggesting that he was not apprised of the progress of the proceedings, and in response to an insinuation that the applicants deliberately conducted these proceedings secretly, the applicants' attorneys filed an affidavit. The affidavit maps out the several measures taken by the applicants' attorneys to ensure service of all the court processes on Mr Dlamini. What stands out from the affidavit is that from 16 April 2019, when the applicants' attorneys served the High Court application on Mr Dlamini, they had to prompt the latter through several emails and telephone calls before any set of pleadings could be received from Mr Dlamini.

[57] The affidavit highlights that on one occasion, after several attempts to contact Mr Dlamini were unsuccessful, the applicants' attorneys contacted Mr Sithole personally. He undertook to contact his attorney. Subsequently, a full set of pleadings was served on Mr Sithole personally and this prompted Mr Dlamini to file a notice of opposition of the High Court application. However, he did not file an answering affidavit afterwards until two days before the hearing.

[58] The narrative given by the applicants' attorneys shows just how tardily Mr Dlamini has handled this matter. He has litigated with indifference and has not displayed the professionalism expected from an officer of the court. He has also failed to ensure that his client's interests were promptly and efficiently protected. Had it not been for the efforts of the applicants' attorneys prompting him to perform his legal duties, his client's interests would probably not have been protected. He should not be entitled to charge Mr Sithole or his estate any fees in this matter.

Order

[59] The following order is made:

1. The provisions of section 21(2)(a) of the Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984 ('the MPA') are hereby declared unconstitutional and invalid to the extent that they maintain and perpetuate the discrimination created by section 22(6) of the Black Administration Act 38 of 1927 ('the BAA'), and thereby maintain the default position of marriages of black couples, entered into under the Black Administration Act before the 1988 amendment, that such marriages are automatically out of community of property.
2. All marriages of black persons that are out of community of property and were concluded under section 22(6) of the Black Administration Act before the 1988 amendment are, save for those couples who opt for a marriage out of community of property, hereby declared to be marriages in community of property.
3. Spouses who have opted for marriage out of community of property shall, in writing, notify the Director-General of the Department of Home Affairs accordingly.
4. In the event of disagreement, either spouse in a marriage which becomes a marriage in community of property in terms of the declaration in paragraph 2, may apply to the High Court for an order that the marriage shall be out of community of property, notwithstanding that declaration.
5. In terms of section 172(1) (b) of the Constitution, the orders in paragraphs 1 and 2 shall not affect the legal consequences of any act done or omission in relation to a marriage before this order was made.
6. From the date of this order, Chapter 3 of the Matrimonial Property Act will apply in respect of all marriages that have been converted to marriages in community of property, unless the affected couple has opted out in accordance with the procedure set out in paragraph 3 above.

7. Any person with a material interest who is adversely affected by this order, may approach the High Court for appropriate relief.
8. The second respondent is ordered to pay the costs of this application and such costs to include the costs of two counsel, where so employed.
9. It is ordered that the first respondent's attorney, Mr Dlamini, should forfeit his legal fees in respect of this application.

For the Applicants:	G Budlender SC, S Sephton and MZ Suleman Instructed by Legal Resources Centre
For the First Respondent:	N Badat Instructed by BT Dlamini Attorneys
For the Second Respondent:	M G Mello Instructed by State Attorney

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

Case CCT 13/20

In the matter between:

JONATHAN DUBULA QWELANE	Applicant
and
SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION	First Respondent
MINISTER OF JUSTICE AND CORRECTIONAL SERVICES	Second Respondent
and
SOUTH AFRICAN HOLOCAUST AND GENOCIDE FOUNDATION	First Amicus Curiae
PSYCHOLOGICAL SOCIETY OF SOUTH AFRICA	Second Amicus Curiae
WOMEN'S LEGAL CENTRE TRUST	Third Amicus Curiae
SOUTHERN AFRICAN LITIGATION CENTRE	Fourth Amicus Curiae
FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION INSTITUTE	Fifth Amicus Curiae
NELSON MANDELA FOUNDATION TRUST	Sixth Amicus Curiae
MEDIA MONITORING AFRICA	Seventh Amicus Curiae

Neutral citation: Qwelane v South African Human Rights Commission and Another [2021] ZACC 22

Coram: Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Majiedt J, Mathopo AJ, Mhlantla J, Theron J, Tshiqi J and Victor AJ

Judgments: Majiedt J (unanimous)

Heard on: 22 September 2020

Decided on: 30 July 2021

Summary: Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 — constitutionality of section 10(1) — section 10(1) is unconstitutional to the extent that it includes "hurtful"

ORDER

On appeal from, and in an application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity granted by, the Supreme Court of Appeal (hearing an appeal from the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Local Division, Johannesburg), the following order is made:

1. In respect of the confirmation application:
   (a) The declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 10(1) of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (Equality Act) made by the Supreme Court of Appeal is confirmed in the terms set out in paragraph (b).
   (b) It is declared that section 10(1) of the Equality Act is inconsistent with section 1(c) of the Constitution and section 16 of the Constitution and thus unconstitutional and invalid to the extent that it includes the word "hurtful" in the prohibition against hate speech.
   (c) The declaration of constitutional invalidity referred to in paragraph (b) takes effect from the date of this order, but its operation is suspended for 24 months to afford Parliament an opportunity to remedy the constitutional defect giving rise to constitutional invalidity.

(d) During the period of suspension of the order of constitutional invalidity, section 10 of the Equality Act will read as follows:

"(1) Subject to the proviso in section 12, no person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words that are based on one or more of the prohibited grounds, against any person, that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to be harmful or to incite harm and to promote or propagate hatred.

(2) Without prejudice to any remedies of a civil nature under this Act, the court may, in accordance with section 21(2)(n) and where appropriate, refer any case dealing with the publication, advocacy, propagation or communication of hate speech as contemplated in subsection (1), to the Director of Public Prosecutions having jurisdiction for the institution of criminal proceedings in terms of the common law or relevant legislation."

(e) The interim reading-in will fall away when the correction of the specified constitutional defect by Parliament comes into operation.

(f) Should Parliament fail to cure the defect within the period of suspension, the interim reading-in in paragraph (d) will become final.

2. In respect of the appeal against the hate speech complaint:

(a) Leave to appeal is granted.

(b) The appeal by the South African Human Rights Commission is upheld.

(c) The order of the Supreme Court of Appeal is set aside.

(d) The offending statements (made against the LGBT+ community) are declared to be harmful, and to incite harm and propagate hatred; and amount to hate speech as envisaged in section 10 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act No 4 of 2000.

3. In respect of the constitutionality challenge, the Minister of Justice is ordered to pay half of Mr Jonathan Dubula Qwelane's costs in the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court.

4. Mr Jonathan Dubula Qwelane is ordered to pay the costs of the South African Human Rights Commission in the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and in this Court.

JUDGMENT

MAJIEDT J (Khampepe J, Madlanga J, Mathopo AJ, Mhlantla J, Theron J, Tshiqi J and Victor AJ concurring):

Introduction

[1] It is a truth universally acknowledged that "[t]o be hated, despised, and alone is the ultimate fear of all human beings".[1] Speech is powerful – it has the ability to build, promote and nurture, but it can also denigrate, humiliate and destroy. Hate speech is one of the most devastating modes of subverting the dignity and self-worth of human beings. This is so because hate speech marginalises and delegitimises individuals based on their membership of a group. This may diminish their social standing in the broader society, outside of the group they identify with. It can ignite exclusion, hostility, discrimination and violence against them. Not only does it wound the individuals who share this group identity, but it seeks to undo the very fabric of our society as envisioned by our Constitution. We are enjoined by our Constitution "to strive for a society built on the democratic values of human dignity, the achievement of equality, the advancement of human rights and freedom".[2]

[1] Matsuda "Public Response to Racist Speech: Considering the Victim's Story" (1989) 87 Michigan Law Review 2320 at 2320.

[2] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden [2004] ZACC 3; 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC); 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC) (Van Heerden) at para 22.

[2] Central to the issue before us is a delicate balancing exercise between the fundamental rights to freedom of expression, dignity and equality. This exercise arises against the backdrop of an article penned by the applicant, the late Mr Jonathan Dubula Qwelane, and published in the Sunday Sun newspaper on 20 July 2008. The article, which was deeply offensive to members of the LGBT+ community,[3] evoked universal umbrage and denunciation and eventuated in proceedings in the Equality Court and the High Court. The latter proceedings culminated in this application for confirmation of the Supreme Court of Appeal's declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 10 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act[4] (Equality Act). Mr Qwelane sadly passed away on 24 December 2020.[5]

Background

[3] The impugned article was titled "Call me names – but gay is not okay". In relevant part, the article reads:

> "The real problem, as I see it, is the rapid degradation of values and traditions by the so-called liberal influences of nowadays; you regularly see men kissing other men in public, walking holding hands and shamelessly flaunting what are misleadingly termed their 'lifestyle' and 'sexual preferences'. There could be a few things I could take issue with Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe, but his unflinching and unapologetic stance over homosexuals is definitely not among those. Why, only this month – you'd better believe this – a man, in a homosexual relationship with another man, gave birth to a child! At least the so-called husband in that relationship hit the jackpot, making me wonder what it is these people have against the natural order of things. And by the way, please tell the Human Rights Commission that I totally refuse to withdraw or apologise for my views. . . . Homosexuals and their backers will call me names, printable and not, for stating as I have always done my serious reservations about their

[3] LGBT+ is an acronym that refers to Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual and Transgender individuals. The "+" provides for an open list to include various spectrums of sexuality and gender such as Intersex, Queer and Asexual individuals.

[4] 4 of 2000.

[5] Mr Qwelane was accorded a special provincial official funeral, an indication of the high esteem he was held in during his lifetime.

> 'lifestyle and sexual preferences', but quite frankly I don't give a damn: wrong is wrong. I do pray that someday a bunch of politicians with their heads affixed firmly to their necks will muster the balls to rewrite the Constitution of this country, to excise those sections which give licence to men 'marrying' other men, and ditto women. Otherwise, at this rate, how soon before some idiot demands to 'marry' an animal, and argues that this Constitution 'allows' it?"

[4] This article was accompanied by a cartoon depicting a man on his knees next to a goat, appearing in front of a priest for their nuptials. A speech bubble linked to the priest contained the text: "I now pronounce you man and goat". The caption above the cartoon read: "[w]hen human rights meet animal rights". It is common cause that Mr Qwelane was not the author of the cartoon, nor was he aware of it before its publication. It is also common cause that the article was an endorsement of the former Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe's strident remarks reviling homosexuals by comparing them to animals.

[5] At the time of the publication of the article, Mr Qwelane was a weekly columnist for the Sunday Sun, which was the fastest growing newspaper in the country,[6] and a host of a popular talk show on Radio 702. In addition, Mr Qwelane was a well-known and respected anti-apartheid activist of significant stature and was, in his own words, "an experienced journalist". Shortly after the publication of the article, Mr Qwelane received an ambassadorial posting to Uganda.[7]

[6] As a result of this publication, the first respondent, the South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC), received 350 complaints, the largest number of complaints it had ever received at that time emanating from a single incident.[8] More than 1000 complaints were also lodged with the Press Ombud. The complaints to the

[6] The evidence was that it had the third highest circulation of weekend newspapers and 2.5 million readers, the majority of whom lived in townships and were predominantly black (around 99%).

[7] Mr Qwelane's term as ambassador to Uganda expired in 2013.

[8] The SAHRC is a constitutional entity established to support constitutional democracy. It is tasked by section 184(1) of the Constitution to, amongst other things, promote the protection, development and attainment of human rights.

Press Ombud largely centred around allegations that the article amounted to hate speech. After considering these complaints, the Press Ombud found the Sunday Sun in breach of section 2.1 of the South African Press Code on three counts and ordered it to publish an appropriate apology, which the Sunday Sun did.[9]

[7] Subsequent to the conclusion of the Press Ombud's proceedings, the SAHRC instituted proceedings in the Equality Court in terms of section 20(1)(f) of the Equality Act against Media24 Limited (the owner of the Sunday Sun) and Mr Qwelane.[10]

[8] The SAHRC alleged that the article constituted prohibited hate speech in contravention of section 10(1) of the Equality Act (the impugned section), which reads:

> "Subject to the proviso in section 12, no person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words based on one or more of the prohibited grounds, against any person, that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to—
>
> (a) be hurtful;
>
> (b) be harmful or to incite harm;
>
> (c) promote or propagate hatred."

[9] Section 2.1 of the Press Code of Ethics and Conduct for South African Print and Online Media provides that:

> "The press should avoid discriminatory or denigratory references to people's race, colour, ethnicity, religion, gender, sexual orientation or preference, physical or mental disability or illness, or age."

[10] Section 20(1)(f) of the Equality Act reads:

> "(1) Proceedings under this Act may be instituted by—
>
> . . .
>
> (f) the South African Human Rights Commission, or the Commission for Gender Equality."

The Equality Act, in section 4, envisages the expeditious and informal processing of cases in order to facilitate participation by the parties to the proceedings; access to justice to all persons and the use of corrective or restorative measures in conjunction with measures of a deterrent nature. The section recognises—

> "the existence of systemic discrimination and inequalities, particularly in respect of race, gender and disability in all spheres of life as a result of past and present unfair discrimination, brought about by colonialism, the apartheid system and patriarchy: and . . . the need to take measures at all levels to eliminate such discrimination and inequalities."

These aspects must be taken into account in the adjudication of matters in the Equality Court.

[9] Section 10(2) of the Equality Act is also of some importance. It reads:

> "Without prejudice to any remedies of a civil nature under this Act, the court may, in accordance with section 21(2)(n) and where appropriate, refer any case dealing with the publication, advocacy, propagation or communication of hate speech as contemplated in subsection (1), to the Director of Public Prosecutions having jurisdiction for the institution of criminal proceedings in terms of the common law or relevant legislation."

[10] Section 12 of the Equality Act provides:

> "No person may—
>
> (a) disseminate or broadcast any information;
>
> (b) publish or display any advertisement or notice, that could reasonably be construed or reasonably be understood to demonstrate a clear intention to unfairly discriminate against any person: Provided that bona fide engagement in artistic creativity, academic and scientific inquiry, fair and accurate reporting in the public interest or publication of any information, advertisement or notice in accordance with section 16 of the Constitution, is not precluded by this section."

[11] The "prohibited grounds", referred to in section 10(1), are defined in section 1 of the Act as follows:

> "(a) race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth; or
>
> (b) any other ground where discrimination based on that other ground—
>
> (i) causes or perpetuates systemic disadvantage;
>
> (ii) undermines human dignity; or
>
> (iii) adversely affects the equal enjoyment of a person's rights and freedoms in a serious manner that is comparable to discrimination on a ground in paragraph (a)."

[12] Media24 and Mr Qwelane responded by challenging the constitutionality of section 10(1), read with sections 1, 11 and 12 of the Equality Act in the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Johannesburg (High Court).[11] The basis for the constitutionality challenge was that these impugned provisions undermine the constitutionality of the sections and the rule of law on account of their overbreadth and vagueness. Before the proceedings in respect of the constitutionality challenge commenced, the SAHRC reached a settlement with Media24, but the Equality Court proceedings against Mr Qwelane continued.

In the High Court

[13] By agreement between the parties, the proceedings before the High Court and the complaint proceedings before the Equality Court were consolidated and adjudicated. In the former proceedings, the second respondent, the Minister of Justice and Correctional Services, was joined and participated as a respondent. Two amici curiae were admitted: the Psychological Society of South Africa (Psychological Society)[12] and the Freedom of Expression Institute (Freedom Institute).[13] The Psychological Society and the Freedom Institute are the second and fifth amici curiae respectively in this Court. The other amici curiae in this Court are: the South African Holocaust and Genocide Foundation (first amicus curiae, Holocaust Foundation); the Women's Legal Centre Trust (third amicus curiae, WLC); the Southern African Litigation Centre (fourth amicus curiae, SALC); the Nelson Mandela Foundation Trust (sixth amicus curiae, Mandela Foundation) and Media Monitoring Africa (seventh amicus curiae, MMA).

[14] Extensive evidence was adduced in support of the SAHRC's hate speech complaint against Mr Qwelane. A brief outline will suffice – a more comprehensive narration will follow when the complaint against Mr Qwelane is discussed. The SAHRC's head of legal services, Mr Gregoriou, testified about the numerous complaints received from members of the LGBT+ community, even before the article was published. These complaints related to numerous horrific violent attacks against black lesbians and transgender persons; a lack of policing in the form of the police being seriously remiss in their duties to properly investigate complaints by members of the LGBT+ community and exhibiting an anti-LGBT+ inclination. He testified further that there were complaints from that community about the denial of access to essential services to them.

[11] Section 11 of the Equality Act states that "no person may subject any person to harassment".

[12] The Psychological Society is an association of more than 2000 eminent psychologists.

[13] The Freedom Institute promotes efforts to protect the public's right to receive and impart information, ideas and opinions; to defend freedom of expression; and to oppose all forms of censorship.

[15] Ms Mokoena, the executive director of People Opposing Women Abuse (POWA),[14] confirmed parts of Mr Gregoriou's evidence relating to the brutal attacks against lesbians, including the repulsive practice called "corrective rape". Her evidence, too, reflected poorly on the police for their disturbing apathy in respect of these types of complaints. Ms Mokoena alluded to five widely publicised instances of horrific violent attacks against lesbians.

[16] The last witness called by the SAHRC, Ms MN, a 52-year-old who identifies as a lesbian, testified in camera (in private) for fear of reprisals. She recounted her personal encounters with homophobia and discrimination on the basis of her sexual orientation. Ms MN broke down in the witness box while narrating the verbal and physical attacks perpetrated against her. She poignantly remarked that she did not bother to report some of these incidents since, in her words, "the law does not protect people like me".

[17] The evidence adduced on behalf of the SAHRC remained largely uncontested. The only witness who testified on behalf of Mr Qwelane was Mr Viljoen, a Production Editor of the Sunday Sun at the time the article was published. He testified about the newspaper's internal processes for the publication of the article and the cartoon; the numerous complaints received after the publication of the article; and the fact that the newspaper had subsequently published an apology. Significantly, Mr Viljoen conceded during his evidence-in-chief that the article was "reprehensible" and that it should never have been published.

[14] POWA provides support and counselling services as well as shelter to female victims of domestic violence in previously disadvantaged communities, particularly to lesbians.

[18] The Psychological Society led the evidence of its former chairperson, Professor Nel, a research professor at the University of South Africa with a special interest in LGBT+ related work. Apart from recounting his own lived experiences of ill-treatment and discrimination on the basis of his identification as a gay man, and the psychological trauma suffered generally by the LGBT+ community due to their exclusion and rejection, Professor Nel also commented on the severely deleterious psychological impact the article had on that community.

[19] Based on the evidence, the High Court found that the SAHRC had succeeded in proving that the article was hurtful and harmful and had the potential to incite harm and promote hatred against the LGBT+ community.[15] As a result, it held that the article constituted hate speech as contemplated by section 10(1) of the Equality Act and ordered Mr Qwelane to tender a written apology to members of the LGBT+ community.[16]

[20] The High Court considered the correct interpretation of the impugned section. It held that speech ought to be assessed objectively in its factual and social context.[17] It accordingly proposed that the word "hurtful" should be interpreted to mean a type of severe psychological impact, and "harmful" to refer to physical harm.[18] The High Court held that paragraphs (a)-(c) of the impugned section must be read conjunctively to ensure consistency with section 16 of the Constitution.[19]

[15] South African Human Rights Commission v Qwelane; Qwelane v Minister for Justice and Correctional Services 2018 (2) SA 149 (GJ) (High Court judgment) at paras 52-3.

[16] Id at para 70.

[17] Id at para 53.

[18] Id at paras 58 and 60.

[19] Id at para 65.

[21] On the overbreadth challenge, the High Court held that the impugned section could be read in conformity with section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution,[20] and, if not, it could not be said to suffer from overbreadth until it was proven that it fails a limitations analysis in terms of section 36 of the Constitution.[21] On that score, it found that the impugned section did not fail the limitations test merely because it prohibits more speech than section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution.[22]

[22] The High Court dismissed the vagueness challenge as well. It reasoned that the operation of the impugned section is contingent on a significant proviso.[23] Therefore, speech falling under section 12 is not prohibited under section 10.[24] As a result, it dismissed the constitutional challenge.[25]

In the Supreme Court of Appeal

[23] Discontented with the outcome and relying on the same argument, Mr Qwelane appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeal.[26] That Court dismissed the overbreadth challenge on the basis that the impugned section includes the ground of sexual orientation as one of the prohibited grounds, beyond the listed prohibited grounds in section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution.[27] It reasoned that the Legislature sought to provide a wider protection, by imposing liability for hate speech based on the extended prohibited grounds, beyond the ones listed in section 16(2).[28]

[20] Id.

[21] Id at para 53.

[22] Id.

[23] Id at para 52.

[24] Id at para 59.

[25] Id.

[26] Qwelane v South African Human Rights Commission [2019] ZASCA 167; 2020 (2) SA 124 (SCA) (Supreme Court of Appeal judgment) at para 36.

[27] Id at para 67.

[28] Id.

[24] However, the Supreme Court of Appeal found that the impugned section limits speech beyond what is allowed in terms of section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution. The Court reasoned that by using the words "reasonably construed to demonstrate a clear intention", it introduced a subjective standard of assessment of speech, contrary to the objective standard imposed by section 16(2)(c).[29] It held that the words "reasonably construed" removed the threshold of the objective test and replaced it with the subjective opinion of a reasonable person hearing the words.[30] In this way, it becomes unnecessary for potential or actual harm to be demonstrated.[31]

[25] The Supreme Court of Appeal found that, based on the fact that paragraphs (a)-(c) of the impugned section are not connected by the conjunction "and", but are separated by a semicolon, they should be interpreted disjunctively.[32] It held that the section, as currently formulated, decouples the constitutional requirements of "advocating hatred and incitement to cause harm, so that one or neither of them may lead to a finding of hate speech".[33] It reasoned that a disjunctive reading is supported by the disjunctive placement of the words "publish", "propagate", "advocate" or "communicate".[34]

[26] In addition, the Supreme Court of Appeal noted that the impugned section is vague in that it is difficult to define what "hurtful" means. It found that the harm envisaged in section 16 of the Constitution, and contemplated in the provisions of the impugned section, need not necessarily be physical harm, but can be related to psychological impact. However, the impact has to be more than just hurtful in the dictionary sense.[35]

[29] Id at pars 62 and 64.

[30] Id at para 66.

[31] Id at para 64.

[32] Id.

[33] Id.

[34] Id at para 65.

[35] Id at para 70.

[27] The Supreme Court of Appeal held that section 12 of the Equality Act merely excludes from the limitation any of the stipulated activities, but does not narrow the limitation of freedom of expression caused by the impugned section.[36] However, it found that section 12 is difficult to understand, in particular if one has regard to the concluding part of the provision: "publication of information, advertisement or notice in accordance with section 16 of the Constitution".[37]

[28] For all these reasons, the Supreme Court of Appeal found that the impugned section in its present form is inconsistent with the provisions of section 16 of the Constitution, and is therefore invalid. It also dismissed the complaint against Mr Qwelane. Ultimately, it proposed the following reading-in to section 10, which forms the subject of these proceedings:

> "(1) No person may advocate hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender, religion or sexual orientation and that constitutes incitement to cause harm.
>
> (2) Without prejudice to any remedies of a civil nature under this Act, the court may, in accordance with section 21(2)(n) and where appropriate, refer any case dealing with the advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender, religion or sexual orientation, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm, as contemplated in subsection (1), to the Director of Public Prosecutions having jurisdiction for the institution of criminal proceedings in terms of the common law or relevant legislation."[38]

In this Court

[29] This matter comes before us as confirmation proceedings in terms of section 167(5), read with section 172(2), of the Constitution. This Court has exclusive jurisdiction to confirm the Supreme Court of Appeal's declaration of constitutional invalidity of the impugned section.[39] This matter engages the supervisory jurisdiction of this Court in respect of the declaration of invalidity made by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal.[40] Accordingly, there is no need for a further enquiry into jurisdiction.

[36] Id at para 75.

[37] Id at para 76.

[38] Id at para 96.

[30] It is, however, necessary to note that the order granted by the Supreme Court of Appeal has been cross-appealed by SAHRC, including the order in respect of the complaint against Mr Qwelane. This cross-appeal plainly engages this Court's jurisdiction, for it is linked to the confirmation proceedings.

[31] The issues for determination are:

(a) whether the impugned provision entails a subjective or objective test;

(b) whether section 10(1)(a)-(c) must be read disjunctively or conjunctively;

(c) whether the impugned provision is impermissibly vague;

(d) whether the impugned provision leads to an unjustifiable limitation of section 16 of the Constitution;[41]

(e) if the constitutional challenge is successful, the appropriate remedy;

(f) the complaint against Mr Qwelane in terms of the Equality Act; and [39] Section 167(5) provides that:

> "The Constitutional Court makes the final decision whether an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President is constitutional, and must confirm any order of invalidity made by the Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Court of South Africa, or a court of similar status, before that order has any force."

In terms of section 172(2)(a):

> "The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court."

[40] Von Abo v President of the Republic of South Africa [2009] ZACC 15; 2009 (5) SA 345 (CC); 2009 (10) BCLR 1052 (CC) at para 27.

[41] I use the term "unjustifiable limitation" throughout this judgment when discussing the challenge levelled at section 10(1). While the parties have largely preferred "overbreadth", I am cognizant of the potential confusion that may arise from the concept of the overbreadth of a provision. That was recognised by this Court in South African National Defence Union v Minister of Defence [1999] ZACC 7; 1999 (4) SA 469 (CC) 1999 (6) BCLR 615 (CC) (SANDU) at para 18, where it alluded to the fact that it may be used either at the first or second stage of the limitations analysis. I therefore avoid using the term.

(g) costs.

[32] Before discussing these issues, a broad overview of the Equality Act in its constitutional setting and the correct approach to section 10 of that Act will be considered. Hate speech in general and in its international and South African context will also bear consideration. This will provide the basis for a discussion of the two challenges facing section 10 – one concerning the suggestion of an unjustified limitation of section 16, and the other concerning the suggestion that the section is inconsistent with the rule of law. The conclusions reached in respect of these two enquiries will lead to the particular remedies that are granted in this case.

The applicant's submissions

[33] Mr Qwelane did not challenge the Supreme Court of Appeal's finding that the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground is reasonable and justifiable. He contended that, while the article evinces a strident view on homosexuality, it does not advocate hatred against the LGBT+ community, nor does it incite others to cause harm to them as there is no instigation of others to take action, let alone harmful action, against them. He justified the article by virtue of his right to freedom of expression.

[34] Mr Qwelane broadly contended further that the impugned section extends beyond section 16(2)(c) and therefore infringes section 16(1), in the following ways:

(a) It sets a lower threshold for assessing hate speech than the Constitution.

(b) On a proper interpretation, subsections (a)-(c) must be read disjunctively, giving rise to a far broader category of prohibited hate speech than the category prohibited in the Constitution, although even a conjunctive reading unjustifiably limits section 16(1) of the Constitution.

(c) It includes more prohibited grounds than those listed in section 16(2)(c), (although the inclusion of sexual orientation is not challenged by the applicant).

(d) The proviso in section 12 is not capable of an interpretation that renders the impugned section constitutional.

[35] In amplifying his contentions, Mr Qwelane pointed out that a disjunctive reading of the elements in the impugned section significantly limits freedom of expression, considering that the comparable elements of section 16 are expressly conjunctive.[42] He contended that even a conjunctive reading results in a limitation of free expression, given the difference in standards between section 16(2) and the impugned section. Whereas section 16(2) envisages an objective standard in which the expression is assessed against the requirements that it be "advocacy of hatred", based on a listed ground and which "constitutes incitement to cause harm", the impugned section differs in two material respects. First, it does not require an objective standard, but a subjective test as to whether the expression "could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention". And, second, the expression need not amount to "advocacy", but could rather fall under an expanded list of prohibited expression via publishing, propagating, advocating or communicating words based on the prohibited grounds.

[36] Mr Qwelane supported the Supreme Court of Appeal's finding that section 12 does not save the impugned section from being unconstitutional, but instead exacerbates its vagueness. He cited as an example the challenge of ascertaining what is meant by the mala fide publication of information envisaged in that section.

[37] In respect of a proportionality enquiry, Mr Qwelane alluded to the reasons why freedom of expression is so important in our constitutional landscape. He pointed out that the Equality Act's laudable objectives do not justify the impugned provision, or render it constitutional.[43] The overbreadth of the impugned section does not strike an appropriate balance between the rights to freedom of expression on the one hand and the right to equality on the other, and thereby unduly infringes the right to freedom of expression. It was emphasised that the limitation is clearly overbroad. The result of such overbroad and vague language would be a chilling effect on expression, as ordinary citizens will be unable to determine in advance with a reasonable degree of certainty whether their expression will fall foul of the impugned section. While this limitation clearly seeks to promote equality, the limitation on free expression goes far beyond what the promotion of equality requires.

[42] In this regard reliance is placed on the views espoused by Cheadle et al South African Constitutional Law: The Bill of Rights 2 ed (Lexis Nexis, Cape Town 2017) at 11-2 to 11-4.1.

[43] Reliance is placed on this Court's dictum in Print Media South Africa v Minister of Home Affairs [2012] ZACC 22; 2012 (6) SA 443 (CC); 2012 (12) BCLR 1346 (CC) at para 55.

[38] Mr Qwelane submitted that the threshold of protection against hate speech is set at an appropriate level in section 16(2)(c). The promotion of equality can be achieved by identifying further groups of vulnerable persons that could justifiably be afforded protection from speech of that nature. This overbroad restriction does not properly promote equality, nor adequately balance equality with freedom of expression. It therefore fails to be justifiable in relation to the purposes it seeks to achieve. In its order, the Supreme Court of Appeal found less restrictive means by maintaining the threshold set by section 16(2)(c), but incrementally expanding the list of grounds (and therefore the groups of vulnerable persons protected from hate speech). In sum, Mr Qwelane supported that Court's broad reasoning and its proposed remedy.

The respondents' submissions

[39] The SAHRC emphasised that equality is the bedrock of our Constitution and that the Equality Act fulfils the injunction in section 9(2) of the Constitution, which allows the State to provide for legislative and other measures to promote and protect the achievement of equality.[44] It asserted that the objective of the impugned section is to ensure that human dignity and equality are not limited in the name of freedom of speech. Where speech infringes equality and dignity, the impugned section reasonably and justifiably limits the right to freedom of expression.

[44] Section 9(2) reads:

> "Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken."

[40] The SAHRC advanced a wide-ranging attack on the Supreme Court of Appeal's findings. It argued that that Court lost sight of the fact that the first duty in an interpretative exercise is to comply with section 39(2) of the Constitution – when interpreting any legislation, it "must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights". The Court also failed to interpret the impugned section consistently with the Constitution as far as possible, to the extent that the text is reasonably capable of bearing that meaning.

[41] The SAHRC contended that the phrase "that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to" is clear, and that the Supreme Court of Appeal was wrong in its finding that this introduces a subjective test, whereas section 16 postulates an objective test. The requirement in the impugned section is an objective test, as the speech must objectively demonstrate the requisite intention. The impugned section not only requires demonstrable intention (thus excluding negligent or inadvertent speech), but the intention must also be "clear". The requirement of reasonableness also indicates an objective test. Intention also encompasses the secondary meaning and innuendo of words. The requirement of reasonableness indicates an objective test.

[42] In respect of "hurtful", the SAHRC submitted that dignity is the threshold by which the impugned words must be assessed. "Harmful or to incite harm" extends beyond mere physical harm and includes psychological, emotional and social harm that adversely affects the right to dignity, as long as the harm is serious enough to pass the hate speech threshold. With regard to "promote or propagate hatred", it emphasised that the dictionary meanings are clear and should be applied. The proviso in section 12 is intended to be a carve-out of the exclusions to hate speech and it refers not to section 16(2), but to section 16(1).

[43] The SAHRC accepted that the impugned section infringes the right to freedom of expression, but submitted that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in terms of section 36(1). It emphasised the fact that the Equality Act creates civil remedies, as opposed to criminalising hate speech. This is achieved by creating a civil law prohibition against hate speech and preventing speech that may impinge on a person's dignity. The impugned section also promotes the right to equality, as required by section 9(2).

[44] The SAHRC also contended that the Supreme Court of Appeal was wrong in suggesting that less restrictive means would mirror the provisions of section 16(2). This is because first, speech under section 16(2) is unprotected and there is no limitation analysis involved. Second, if one were to mirror the provisions of section 16(2), one would then exclude the grounds of prohibition set out in section 1 of the Equality Act, which reflects the grounds in section 9(3) of the Constitution.[45] Third, it would remove the protection afforded to journalists and artists in section 12. Lastly, the SAHRC submitted that costs should not have been ordered against it, given its special constitutional obligations.

[45] The Minister restricted his submissions to the question of the constitutionality of the impugned section. He accepted that the impugned section limits the right to freedom of expression, but submitted that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable. His contention was that the impugned section prohibits expression that falls beyond that outlined in section 16(2)(c) in three ways. First, it enumerates the forms of expression which are prohibited (no person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words). This is not dealt with in the Constitution. Second, it prohibits hate speech on "prohibited grounds" as defined in the Equality Act. These prohibited grounds reflect the grounds of discrimination enumerated in section 9(3) of the Constitution. Section 16(2)(c), on the other hand, lists only four prohibited grounds, namely race, ethnicity, gender and religion. Third, the impugned section is broader than section 16(2)(c) in the following ways: (a) it includes words clearly intended to be "hurtful" or "harmful"; and (b) it introduces a different standard, namely that of

[45] Section 9(3) provides:

> "The State may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

"reasonably construed to demonstrate a clear intention to", whereas section 16(2)(c) speaks of "advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm".

[46] The Minister emphasised the constitutional obligation on the State to, for present purposes, respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights to equality and human dignity. These two rights are connected. He supported most of the arguments advanced by the SAHRC in criticising the approach adopted by the Supreme Court of Appeal in its interpretation of the impugned section. The Minister submitted that, ultimately, in balancing the competing rights, it is clear that the section 16(1) right must yield to the rights to equality and dignity as encapsulated in the impugned section.

[47] The amici made very helpful, wide-ranging and insightful submissions. Most of the amici confined their submissions to the issue of whether the impugned section passes constitutional muster, and did not venture into a discussion of the merits of the complaint against Mr Qwelane. All of them, save for the Freedom Institute and MMA, adopted the position that the Supreme Court of Appeal erred in its decision on the constitutionality of the impugned section.[46] Reference will be made to these submissions in the course of this judgment. A useful starting point is to place the Equality Act within an appropriate constitutional context. This will allow us to interpret section 10(1) of the Equality Act in line with section 39(2) of the Constitution, setting out the basis for the consideration of the challenges to the provision.[47]

[46] It must be said, though, that MMA adopted a more neutral approach to the question of the constitutionality of the impugned section. It disclaimed an absolutist position and propounded a balanced approach. Ultimately, it contended that the impugned section does not pass constitutional muster.

[47] This interpretive stage is similar, although not identical, to the two-stage process followed to determine whether there has been a limitation of a right, as established in Ex parte Minister of Safety and Security: In Re: S v Walters [2002] ZACC 6, 2002 (4) SA 613 (CC); 2002 (7) BCLR 663 (CC) at para 26. In that matter, this Court stated that that process "entails examining (a) the content and scope of the relevant protected right(s) and (b) the meaning and effect of the impugned enactment to see whether there is any limitation of (a) by (b)".

The Equality Act in a proper constitutional setting

[48] The Equality Act has three main objectives: First, it seeks to prevent and prohibit unfair discrimination from thriving in our society by giving effect to section 9(4) of the Constitution. Second, it aims to protect and advance categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination as envisaged in section 9(2) of the Constitution. Finally, it facilitates the State's compliance with its international law obligations.

[49] The preamble to the Equality Act explicates that its overarching goal is to steer our journey to an equal and democratic society by, amongst other things, eradicating inequality, transforming our society and embracing our diversity. It is thus clear that the Equality Act aspires to heal the wounds of the past and guide us to a better future. This commitment was fulfilled by Parliament, pursuant to section 9(2) of the Constitution. One of the ways in which the Equality Act realises this commitment is through prohibiting hate speech in section 10. The Legislature was alive to the reality that unfair discrimination can be perpetuated by both conduct and the dissemination of words (or more broadly, through expression). Through this prism, section 10 is located at the confluence of three fundamental rights: equality, dignity and freedom of expression, and we ought to navigate an interpretation of that section within this terrain.

[50] The Holocaust Foundation contended that section 9(4) of the Constitution requires legislation to be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination. Thus, so it contended, all that is required for purposes of testing the constitutionality of section 10 is an investigation into whether section 10 fulfils that constitutional injunction. That argument is fallacious, because it effectively pits the rights to human dignity and equality against the right to free speech by attributing more weight to the constitutional injunction at the expense of the fundamental right to free speech. The injunction cannot be considered in isolation, but must rather be considered in harmony with other constitutional provisions. We are required to go further and consider section 10 in light of sections 9, 10 and 16 of the Constitution, as opposed to setting these rights against one another.

[51] The Equality Act in general, and the impugned section in particular, must be understood in the context of the obligation imposed on the State in terms of section 7(2) of the Constitution to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights. This is an obligation that emanates from the transformative objective of our Constitution.[48] The ambit of this obligation is both positive and negative.[49] It requires of the State not only to refrain from infringing on fundamental rights, but also to take positive steps to ensure that these rights are realised.[50] We must be cognizant of the requirement that measures taken in terms of section 7(2) must be "reasonable and effective".[51]

Section 39(2) of the Constitution

[52] The appropriate point of departure in interpreting the impugned section is section 39(2) of the Constitution, which enjoins courts when interpreting legislation to "promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights". Along this interpretative journey, we must be guided by the jurisprudence of this Court. In Cool Ideas this Court expounded that:

> "A fundamental tenet of statutory interpretation is that the words in a statute must be given their ordinary grammatical meaning, unless to do so would result in an absurdity. There are three important interrelated riders to this general principle, namely:
>
> (a) that statutory provisions should always be interpreted purposively;
>
> (b) the relevant statutory provision must be properly contextualised; and

[48] In The Citizen 1978 (Pty) Ltd v McBride [2011] ZACC 11; 2011 (4) SA 191 (CC); 2011 (8) BCLR 816 (CC) at para 74, this Court explicated:

> "The Preamble to the Constitution, its founding values and this Court's jurisprudence have all emphasised that our venture in constitutionalism and democracy commits us to transforming our society from an oppressive past to a non-racial, just and united nation."

[49] Mazibuko v City of Johannesburg [2009] ZACC 28; 2010 (4) SA 1 (CC); 2010 (3) BCLR 239 (CC) at paras 46-50.

[50] Brink v Kitshoff N.O. [1996] ZACC 9;1996 (4) SA 197 (CC);1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 42.

[51] Glenister v President of the Republic of South Africa [2011] ZACC 6; 2011 (3) SA 347 (CC); 2011 (7) BCLR 651 (CC) at para 189, confirmed recently in Sonke Gender Justice NPC v President of the Republic of South Africa [2020] ZACC 26; 2021 (3) BCLR 269 (CC) at paras 42-3.

> (c) all statutes must be construed consistently with the Constitution, that is, where reasonably possible, legislative provisions ought to be interpreted to preserve their constitutional validity. This proviso to the general principle is closely related to the purposive approach referred to in (a)."[52]

[53] Moreover, when interpreting legislation that implicates a fundamental right entrenched in the Bill of Rights, a court must read the particular statute "through this prism of the Constitution".[53] In Hyundai this Court stressed that a purposive approach is essential and that:

> "The Constitution requires that judicial officers read legislation, where possible, in ways which give effect to its fundamental values. Consistently with this, when the constitutionality of legislation is in issue, they are under a duty to examine the objects and purport of an Act and to read the provisions of the legislation, so far as is possible, in conformity with the Constitution."[54]

[54] Turning to interpretation, the correct approach is to interpret the impugned provision in light of these rights congruently. This approach is undergirded by an array of reasons. First, freedom of expression is "constitutive of the dignity and autonomy of human beings"[55] and it constitutes "a web of mutually supporting rights" in the Constitution.[56] Second, section 39(2) cannot be invoked in a partisan way. If various rights are implicated, this Court must give effect to the normative force of the spirit,

[52] Cool Ideas 1186 CC v Hubbard [2014] ZACC 16; 2014 (4) SA 474 (CC); 2014 (8) BCLR 869 (CC) at para 28. This was recently affirmed in Competition Commission of South Africa v Pickfords Removals SA (Pty) Limited [2020] ZACC 14; 2021 (3) SA 1 (CC); 2020 (10) BCLR 1204 (CC) at para 34.

[53] Makate v Vodacom (Pty) Ltd [2016] ZACC 13; 2016 (4) SA 121 (CC); 2016 (6) BCLR 709 (CC) at para 87.

[54] Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd In re: Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd v Smit N.O. [2000] ZACC 12; 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC); 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) (Hyundai) at para 22.

[55] Khumalo v Holomisa [2002] ZACC 12; 2002 (5) SA 401 (CC); 2002 (8) BCLR 771 (CC) at para 21.

[56] Case v Minister of Safety and Security; Curtis v Minister of Safety and Security [1996] ZACC 7; 1996 (3) SA 617 (CC); 1996 (5) BCLR 609 (CC) at para 27.

purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[57] Third, this concatenation of inextricably linked rights is evident in the various objects of the Equality Act.[58]

[55] Before considering the proper interpretation of section 10, it is necessary to analyse these fundamental rights, with due regard to this Court's jurisprudence.

Equality and dignity

[56] Our constitutional commitment to equality lies at the heart of our new constitutional order and is crucial to our transformation.[59] It has been said that "it permeates and defines the very ethos upon which the Constitution is premised".[60] In Van Heerden, this Court held:

> "The achievement of equality goes to the bedrock of our constitutional architecture . . . . [T]he achievement of equality is not only a guaranteed and justifiable right in our Bill of Rights but also a core and foundational value; a standard which must inform all law and against which all law must be tested for constitutional consonance."[61]

[57] Section 9 of the Constitution provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

[57] Phumelela Gaming and Leisure Limited v Grundlingh [2006] ZACC 6; 2007 (6) SA 350 (CC); 2006 (8) BCLR 883 (CC) at para 35.

[58] See section 2 of the Equality Act, in particular subsections (iv) and (v).

[59] Soobramoney v Minister of Health, KwaZulu-Natal [1997] ZACC 17; 1998 (1) SA 765 (CC); 1997 12 BCLR 1696 (CC) at para 8.

[60] Fraser v Children's Court Pretoria North [1997] ZACC 1; 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC); 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC) at para 20 and fn 11.

[61] Van Heerden above n 2 at para 22.

> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
>
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.
>
> (5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[58] Our jurisprudence is resolute that the type of equality underpinning our constitutional framework is not mere formal equality, but in order to give meaning to the right to dignity, also substantive equality.[62] Substantive inequality "is often more deeply rooted in social and economic cleavages between groups in society", and so it aims to tackle systemic patterns where the structures, context and impact underpinning the discrimination matters.[63]

[59] There is also the principle of intersectionality, which interrogates how aspects of identity are mutually constitutive.[64] Recently, in Mahlangu,[65] this Court expressly endorsed this principle. It said:

[62] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice [1998] ZACC 15; 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC) (National Coalition I) at para 62.

In Albertyn and Goldblatt "Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality" (1998) 14 SAJHR 248 at 249, it is postulated that the transformative nature of our Constitution—

> "require[s] a complete reconstruction of the state and society, including a redistribution of power and resources along egalitarian lines. The challenge of achieving equality within this transformation project involves the eradication of systemic forms of domination and material disadvantage based on race, gender, class and other grounds of inequality. It also entails the development of opportunities which allow people to realise their full human potential within positive social relationships."

[63] Albertyn and Goldblatt "Equality" in Woolman et al Constitutional Law of South Africa Service 5 (2013) at 6. They observe further at 8 that "the idea of inequality as systemic – deeply embedded within society, and manifest in group disadvantage through social stigma and stereotypes, material inequality or social and economic forms of exclusion".

[64] Crenshaw "Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Colour" (1993) 43 Stanford Law Review 1241 at 1244.

[65] Mahlangu v Minister of Labour [2020] ZACC 24; 2021 (2) SA 54 (CC); 2021 (1) BCLR (CC).

> "There is nothing foreign or alien about the concept of intersectional discrimination in our constitutional jurisprudence. It means nothing more than acknowledging that discrimination may impact on an individual in a multiplicity of ways based on their position in society and the structural dynamics at play. There is an array of equality jurisprudence emanating from this Court that has, albeit implicitly, considered the multiple effects of discrimination."[66]

[60] Intersectionality is particularly relevant in our grossly unequal society, in which people occupy vastly different positions in society in terms of wealth and resources.

[61] Based on this, unfair discrimination is the linchpin of inequality. It is for this reason that section 9(3) of the Constitution expressly proscribes unfair discrimination on specified grounds.[67] Section 9(4) of the Constitution envisages the need to enact, amongst other things, legislative measures to protect categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. To this end, this Court in National Coalition II remarked that:

> "It is insufficient for the Constitution merely to ensure, through its Bill of Rights, that statutory provisions which have caused such unfair discrimination in the past are eliminated. Past unfair discrimination frequently has ongoing negative consequences, the continuation of which is not halted immediately when the initial causes thereof are eliminated, and unless remedied, may continue for a substantial time and even indefinitely. Like justice, equality delayed is equality denied."[68]

[62] This Court emphasised in Harksen that the prohibition of unfair discrimination in the Constitution is instrumental in that it provides a bulwark against invasions of the right to human dignity.[69] While equality and dignity are self-standing rights and values,[70] axiomatically, equality is inextricably linked to dignity.[71] As Hugo expounds:

[66] Id at para 76.

[67] It is worth noting that our Constitution was the first in the world to entrench LGBT+ equality through prohibiting unfair discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. See Williams and Judge "Happy (N)ever After? Public Interest Litigation for LGBTI Equality" in Brickhill (ed) Public Interest Law in South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 2018) at 239. Also see Fourie v Minister of Home Affairs [2004] ZASCA 132; 2005 (4) SA 429 (SCA) at para 6.

[68] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs [1999] ZACC 17; 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC); 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) (National Coalition II) at para 60.

> "At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked."[72]

[63] In Freedom of Religion, this Court underscored the importance of the right to human dignity:

> "There is a history and context to the right to human dignity in our country. As a result, this right occupies a special place in the architectural design of our Constitution, and for good reason. As Cameron J correctly points out, the role and stressed importance of dignity in our Constitution aim 'to repair indignity, to renounce humiliation and degradation, and to vest full moral citizenship to those who were denied it in the past'. Unsurprisingly because not only is dignity one of the foundational values of our democratic state, it is also one of the entrenched fundamental rights".[73]

[69] Harksen v Lane N.O. [1997] ZACC 12; 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC) at para 50.

[70] Section 10 of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

See further Dawood v Minister of Home Affairs; Shalabi v Minister of Home Affairs; Thomas v Minister of Home Affairs [2000] ZACC 8; 2000 (3) SA 936 (CC); 2000 (8) BCLR 837 (CC) at paras 35-7 and Moseneke J in Daniels v Campbell [2004] ZACC 14; 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC); 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC).

[71] In particular, dignity and unfair discrimination are linked. This Court's jurisprudence on unfair discrimination shows that treating people differently, in a way that impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, essentially renders human dignity the basis for the test for unfair discrimination. See further Ackermann Human Dignity: Lodestar for Equality in South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 2012) at 179 and 251. Kant also links dignity to equality, see Groundwork of the Metaphysics of Morals (Cambridge University Press, Cambridge 1997) at 56-7.

[72] President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo [1997] ZACC 4; 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41. The Court quoted the Canadian case of Egan v Canada [1995] 2 SCR 513, which analysed the purpose of section 15 of the Canadian Charter and held that equality dictates zero tolerance for legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second-class citizens, that demean them without valid reason, or that otherwise offends fundamental human dignity. See also: National Coalition I above n 62 at para 30.

[73] Freedom of Religion South Africa v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development [2019] ZACC 34; 2020 (1) SA 1 (CC); 2019 (11) BCLR 1321 (CC) (Freedom of Religion) at para 45.

[64] And, in Makwanyane, this Court stressed that the protection of dignity is a cornerstone of our democratic project:

> "The importance of dignity as a founding value of the new Constitution cannot be overemphasised. Recognising a right to dignity is an acknowledgement of the intrinsic worth of human beings: human beings are entitled to be treated as worthy of respect and concern. . . . Respect for the dignity of all human beings is particularly important in South Africa. For apartheid was a denial of a common humanity. Black people were refused respect and dignity and thereby the dignity of all South Africans was diminished. The new constitution rejects this past and affirms the equal worth of all South Africans. Thus recognition and protection of human dignity is the touchstone of the new political order and is fundamental to the new Constitution."[74]

[65] Chaskalson, writing extra-curially, explained that:

> "[I]n a broad and general sense, respect for dignity implies respect for the autonomy of each person, and the right of everyone not to be devalued as a human being or treated in a degrading or humiliating manner."[75]

[66] It has been acknowledged that the concept of dignity is not easy to define in exact terms. However, in National Coalition I, this Court said that "it is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and worth of all individuals as members of our society".[76]

Freedom of expression

[67] It is not only the rights to equality and dignity that our Constitution seeks to protect. The right to free speech is equally protected. The right to freedom of expression, as enshrined in section 16(1) of the Constitution, is the benchmark for a vibrant and animated constitutional democracy like ours. Section 16 of the Constitution provides:

[74] S v Makwanyane [1995] ZACC 3; 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) (Makwanyane) at paras 328-9.

[75] Chaskalson "The Third Bram Fisher Lecture: Human Dignity as a Foundational Value of Our Constitutional Order" (2000) 16 SAJHR 193 at 203.

[76] National Coalition I above n 62 at para 28.

> "(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of expression, which includes—
>
> (a) freedom of the press and other media;
>
> (b) freedom to receive or impart information or ideas;
>
> (c) freedom of artistic creativity; and
>
> (d) academic freedom and freedom of scientific research.
>
> (2) The right in subsection (1) does not extend to—
>
> (a) propaganda for war
>
> (b) incitement of imminent violence; or
>
> (c) advocacy of hatred that is based on race, ethnicity, gender or religion, and that constitutes incitement to cause harm."

[68] Freedom of expression "is of the utmost importance in the kind of open and democratic society the Constitution has set as our aspirational norm".[77] This is because it "is an indispensable facilitator of a vigorous and necessary exchange of ideas and accountability".[78]

[69] According to Emerson, there are four particular values that undergird the right to freedom of expression.[79] These, as I understand them, include: (a) the pursuit of truth; (b) its value in facilitating the proper functioning of democracy; (c) the promotion of individual autonomy and self-fulfillment; and (d) the encouragement of tolerance.

[77] S v Mamabolo [2001] ZACC 17; 2001 (3) SA 409 (CC); 2001 (5) BCLR 449 (CC) (Mamabolo) at para 37.

[78] Economic Freedom Fighters v Minister of Justice and Correctional Services [2020] ZACC 25; 2021 (2) SA 1 (CC); 2021 (2) BCLR 118 (CC) at para 1.

[79] Emerson The System of Freedom of Expression (Random House, New York 1970) at 6-7. See further the helpful analyses in Davis "Freedom of Expression" in Cheadle above n 42 at 11-2 to 11-4(1) and Milo et al "Freedom of Expression" in Woolman et al (eds) Constitutional Law of South Africa 2 ed (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 2014) at 15-30.

[70] Dworkin suggests that these values can be reduced to two overarching justifications: the instrumental conception and the constitutive conception.[80] The former refers to the notion that the quality of government is improved when criticism is free and unfettered, "a collective bet that free speech will do us more good than harm over the long run".[81] The latter refers to the idea that freedom of expression "is an essential and constitutive feature of a just, political society the government of which treats all its adult members, except those who are deemed legally incompetent, as responsible moral agents".[82]

[71] As has been acknowledged, "[t]he right to freedom of expression lies at the heart of our constitutional democracy, not only because it is an 'essential and constitutive feature' of our open democratic society, but also for its transformative potential".[83] Both the instrumental and constitutive value of freedom of expression, as articulated by Dworkin, bear emphasis.

[72] This was largely echoed by the majority of this Court in Democratic Alliance:

> "This Court has already spoken lavishly about this right. The Constitution recognises that people in our society must be able to hear, form and express opinions freely. For [80] Dworkin Freedom's Law: The Moral Reading of the American Constitution (Harvard University Press, Cambridge 1996) at 200. First, free speech has instrumental value "not because people have any intrinsic moral right to say what they wish, but because allowing them to do so will produce good effects for the rest of us". Second, free speech has the constitutive value because expression is an important part of what it means to be a human and "[w]e retain our dignity, as individuals, only by insisting that no one – no official and no majority – has the right to withhold an opinion from us on the ground that we are not fit to hear and consider it".

Currie and de Waal in The Bill of Rights Handbook 6 ed (Juta & Co Ltd Pty, Cape Town 2018) at 340 note that Dworkin's instrumental conception "is important because it contributes to the Constitution's project of overturning an authoritarian polity and establishing a democracy in place" however "this conception of the right should not be focused on the extent that the intrinsic and dignity-reinforcing value of free expression is obscured".

[81] Dworkin id.

[82] Id at 57. Davis observes that:

> "[T]he value of free speech articulated by both Emerson and Dworkin cannot be underestimated in our constitutional state. The ability of citizens to speak their minds, to receive information and opinions allows each individual to develop as a human being."

While I firmly acknowledge the differences in freedom of expression in the context of the United States of America when juxtaposed with South Africa, their philosophical underpinnings and understanding of the rationales for freedom of expression are relevant and helpful when unpacking the content of the right.

[83] Economic Freedom Fighters above n 78 at para 95 with reference to Dworkin above n 80 at 200.

> freedom of expression is the cornerstone of democracy. It is valuable both for its intrinsic importance and because it is instrumentally useful. It is useful in protecting democracy, by informing citizens, encouraging debate and enabling folly and misgovernance to be exposed. It also helps the search for truth by both individuals and society generally. If society represses views it considers unacceptable, they may never be exposed as wrong. Open debate enhances truth-finding and enables us to scrutinise political argument and deliberate social values. What is more, being able to speak freely recognises and protects 'the moral agency of individuals in our society'. We are entitled to speak out not just to be good citizens, but to fulfil our capacity to be individually human."[84]

[73] In addition, this Court has highlighted that "[t]he corollary of the freedom of expression and its related rights is tolerance by society of different views. Tolerance, of course, does not require approbation of a particular view. In essence, it requires the acceptance of the public airing of disagreements and the refusal to silence unpopular views."[85] In Islamic Unity, Langa DCJ elucidated:

> "Freedom of expression is applicable, not only to information or ideas that are favourably received or regarded as inoffensive or as a matter of indifference, but also to those that offend, shock or disturb the state or any sector of the population. Such are the demands of that pluralism, tolerance and broadmindedness without which there is no democratic society."[86]

[74] These dictates of pluralism, tolerance and open-mindedness require that our democracy fosters an environment that allows a free and open exchange of ideas, free from censorship no matter how offensive, shocking or disturbing these ideas may be.[87] However, as stated by this Court in Mamabolo, this does not mean that freedom of

[84] Democratic Alliance v African National Congress [2015] ZACC 1; 2015 (2) SA 232 (CC); 2015 (3) BCLR 298 (CC) at paras 122-3.

[85] SANDU above n 41 at para 8. See further Moyo v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development; Sonti v Minister of Justice and Correctional Services [2018] ZASCA 100; 2018 (2) SACR 313 (SCA) at para 42.

[86] Islamic Unity Convention v Independent Broadcasting Authority [2002] ZACC 3; 2002 (4) SA 294 (CC); 2002 (5) BCLR 433 (CC) (Islamic Unity) at para 26 endorsed Handyside v the United Kingdom, no 5493/72, § 49, ECHR, 1976.

[87] Handyside above n 86 at para 49.

expression enjoys superior status in our law.[88] Similarly, a unanimous Court in Khumalo v Holomisa stated that, although freedom of expression is fundamental to our democratic society, it is not a paramount value.[89] That being said, as this Court observed in Laugh it Off, "we are obliged to delineate the bounds of the constitutional guarantee of free expression generously".[90]

[75] Furthermore, the historical stains of our colonial and apartheid past reinforce the point that freedom of expression has a particularly important role to play in our constitutional democracy, as Mogoeng CJ lamented:

> "Expression of thought or belief and own worldview or ideology was for many years extensively and severely circumscribed in this country. It was visited, institutionally and otherwise, with the worst conceivable punishment or dehumanising consequences. The tragic and untimely death of Steve Biko as a result of his bold decision to talk frankly and write as he liked, about the unjust system and its laws, underscores the point. This right thus has to be treasured, celebrated, promoted and even restrained with a deeper sense of purpose and appreciation of what it represents in a genuine constitutional democracy, considering our highly intolerant and suppressive past."[91]

[76] Turning to how section 16 ought to be interpreted, it is well accepted that Islamic Unity is the lodestar for the interpretation and application of section 16. In that case, this Court outlined the contours of the right enshrined in section 16 of the Constitution. Section 16(1) entrenches the right to freedom of expression and demarcates the scope of the right. Section 16(2) is definitional in that it sketches what does not form part of the scope of the right in section 16(1) and is expressly excluded from constitutional protection.[92] In consequence, regulation of expression that falls

[88] Mamabolo above n 77 at para 41.

[89] Khumalo v Holomisa above n 55 at para 25.

[90] Laugh It Off Promotions CC v South African Breweries International (Finance) BV t/a Sabmark International [2005] ZACC 7; 2006 (1) SA 144 (CC); 2005 (8) BCLR 743 (CC) (Laugh It Off) at para 47.

[91] Economic Freedom Fighters above n 78 at para 2. See also: Daniels v Scribante [2017] ZACC 13; 2017 (4) SA 341 (CC); 2017 (8) BCLR 949 (CC) at paras 23-4.

[92] Islamic Unity above n 86 at paras 30-2.

within section 16(2) would not be a limitation of the right in section 16(1).[93] However, "where the state extends the scope of regulation beyond expression envisaged in section 16(2), it encroaches on the terrain of protected expression and can do so only if such regulation meets the justification criteria in section 36(1) of the Constitution".[94]

[77] I accept that, on a plain reading of section 10 of the Equality Act, juxtaposed with section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution, the former is broader than the latter in various respects. In true fidelity to the reasoning in Islamic Unity, the key consideration then is whether, on a proper interpretation, section 10 limits the right to freedom of expression protected in section 16(1) of the Constitution. As stated, only once we have established the existence of a limitation of a right, will it be necessary to proceed to a full section 36 limitations analysis. With these general principles as a backdrop, what follows is a close consideration of hate speech.

Hate speech

[78] Hate speech is the antithesis of the values envisioned by the right to free speech – whereas the latter advances democracy, hate speech is destructive of democracy.[95] As the Holocaust Foundation submitted, section 10 of the Equality Act is the primary mechanism to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination caused by expression.

[79] It bears emphasis that the expression of unpopular or even offensive beliefs does not constitute hate speech.[96] This is because, as noted above, a healthy democracy requires a degree of tolerance towards expression or speech that shocks or offends. This

[93] Id at para 31.

[94] Id at para 34.

[95] Vejdeland v Sweden, no 1813/07, ECHR, 2012, concurring opinion of Spielmann J joined by Nussberger J at para 5. Handyside above n 86 at para 49.

[96] Handyside above n 86. In Hotz v University of Cape Town [2016] ZASCA 159; 2017 (2) SA 485 (SCA) at para 68, Wallis JA observed that:

> "A court should not be hasty to conclude that because language is angry in tone or conveys hostility it is therefore to be characterised as hate speech, even if it has overtones of race or ethnicity."

begs the question then: what constitutes hate speech? There is no universally accepted definition of the term "hate speech".[97]

[80] In their submissions, the Psychological Society drew this Court's attention to Whatcott, where the Supreme Court of Canada held:

> "Restricting expression because it may offend or hurt feelings does not give sufficient weight to the role expression plays in individual self-fulfillment, the search for truth, and unfettered political discourse. Prohibiting any representation which 'ridicules, belittles or otherwise affronts the dignity of' protected groups could capture a great deal of expression which, while offensive to most people, falls short of exposing its target group to the extreme detestation and vilification which risks provoking discriminatory activities against that group. Rather than being tailored to meet the particular requirements, such a broad prohibition would impair freedom of expression in a significant way."[98] (Emphasis added.)

And that:

> "Representations that expose a target group to detestation tend to inspire enmity and extreme ill-will against them, which goes beyond mere disdain or dislike. Representations vilifying a person or group will seek to abuse, denigrate or delegitimise them, to render them lawless, dangerous, unworthy or unacceptable in the eyes of the audience. Expression exposing vulnerable groups to detestation and vilification goes far beyond merely discrediting, humiliating or offending the victims."[99]

[81] Thus, it would appear that hate speech travels beyond mere offensive expression and can be understood as "extreme detestation and vilification which risks provoking discriminatory activities against that group".[100] Expression will constitute hate speech

[97] Benesch "Defining and Diminishing Hate Speech" in Minority Rights Group International (2014) State of the World's Minorities and Indigenous Peoples (Minority Rights Group International, London 2014) at 18 at 20.

[98] Saskatchewan (Human Rights Commission) v Whatcott 2012 SCC 11; [2013] 1 SCR 467 (Whatcott) at para 109.

[99] Id at para 41.

[100] This definition is the culmination of a trilogy of hate speech cases emanating from the Supreme Court of Canada. In Canada (Human Rights Commission) v Taylor [1990] 3 SCR 892 (Taylor) at 895, "hatred" was when it seeks to violate the rights of another person or group of persons based on group identity. Hate speech does not serve to stifle ideology, belief or views. In a democratic, open and broad-minded society like ours, disturbing or even shocking views are tolerated as long as they do not infringe the rights of persons or groups of persons. As was recently noted, "[s]ociety must be exposed to and be tolerant of different views, and unpopular or controversial views must never be silenced".[101]

[82] Our case law accords with Canadian jurisprudence. There is a string of jurisprudence emanating from this Court in the context of racism in the workplace. In Rustenburg Platinum Mine,[102] this Court was confronted with the question whether referring to a fellow employee as a "swart man" (black man), within the context of that case, was racist and derogatory. This Court observed that:

> "Our Constitution rightly acknowledges that our past is one of deep societal divisions characterised by strife, conflict, untold suffering and injustice. Racism and racial prejudices have not disappeared overnight, and they stem, as demonstrated in our history, from a misconceived view that some are superior to others. These prejudices do not only manifest themselves with regard to race but it can also be seen with reference to gender discrimination."[103] defined at 928 as "strong and deep-felt emotions of detestation, calumny and vilification". In R v Andrews [1990] 3 SCR 870, the Court found that:

> "Hatred is not a word of causal connection. To promote hatred is to instil detestation, enmity, ill-will and malevolence in another. . . . When expression does instil detestation it does incalculable damage to the Canadian community and lays the founds for the mistreatment of the victimised groups."

Then, in R v Keegstra [1990] 3 SCR 697 at 700, it was said that hatred is "the most severe and deeply felt form of opprobrium", and at 777 that—

> "[h]atred is predicated on destruction, and hatred against identifiable groups therefore thrives on insensitivity, bigotry and destruction of both the target group and the values of our society. Hatred in this sense is a most extreme emotion that belies reason; an emotion that, if exercised against members of an identifiable group, implies that those individuals are to be despised, scorned, denied respect and made subject to ill-treatment on the basis of group affiliation."

[101] Economic Freedom Fighters above n 78 at para 155.

[102] Rustenburg Platinum Mine v SAEWA obo Bester [2018] ZACC 13; 2018 (5) SA 78 (CC); 2018 (8) BCLR 951 (CC).

[103] Id at para 52.

[83] Rustenburg Platinum Mine demonstrates how the effect of even facially innocuous words must be understood based on the different structural positions occupied by white people in relation to black people in contemporary South African society. This approach takes cognisance of how words or, more broadly, expression contribute towards creating or exacerbating systemic disadvantage and subordination.

[84] In South African Revenue Service,[104] this Court had to consider the use of the repulsive term "kaffir" in the workplace and an insinuation that African people are inherently foolish and incapable of providing any leadership worthy of submitting to. This Court reminded us:

> "South Africa's special sect or brand of racism was so fantastically egregious that it had to be declared a crime against humanity by no less a body than the United Nations itself. And our country, inspired by our impressive democratic credentials, ought to have recorded remarkable progress towards the realisation of our shared constitutional vision of entrenching non-racialism. Revelations of our shameful and atrocious past, made to the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, were so shocking as to induce a strong sense of revulsion against racism in every sensible South African. But to still have some white South Africans address their African compatriots as monkeys, baboons or kaffirs and impugn their intellectual and leadership capabilities as inherently inferior by reason only of skin colour, suggests the opposite. And does in fact sound a very rude awakening call to all of us".[105]

[85] With reference to our jurisprudence, this Court pointed out that in essence:

> "[R]acist conduct requires a very firm and unapologetic response from the courts, particularly the highest courts. Courts cannot therefore afford to shirk their constitutional obligation or spurn the opportunities they have to contribute meaningfully towards the eradication of racism and its tendencies. To achieve that goal would depend on whether they view the use of words like kaffir as an extremely hurtful expression of hatred, the lowest form of contempt for African people, or whether the > outrage it triggers is trivialised as an exaggeration of an otherwise less vicious or vitriolic verbal attack."[106]

[104] South African Revenue Service v Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration [2016] ZACC 38; 2017 (1) SA 549 (CC); 2017 (2) BCLR 241 (CC).

[105] Id at para 2.

[86] These two cases demonstrate the presence of deeply rooted structural subordination in relation to race. While these cases focused on race,[107] the facts in the case before us vividly demonstrate the continuing structural subordination and vulnerability relating to sexual orientation and gender identity. In these cases, the Court underscored how facially innocuous words or notorious words have to be understood based on the different structural positions in post-apartheid South African society. This is an approach which takes cognisance of how words perpetuate and contribute towards systemic disadvantage and inequalities. In essence, this is the corollary of our substantive equality demands that flow from the Constitution. The purpose of hate speech regulation in South Africa is inextricably linked to our constitutional object of healing the injustices of the past and establishing a more egalitarian society. This is done by curtailing speech which is part and parcel of the system of subordination of vulnerable and marginalised groups in South Africa.

Regulating hate speech: international law perspectives

[87] I turn now to consider how free speech, and hate speech, are regulated. Section 233 of the Constitution mandates us to, when interpreting legislation, prefer reasonable interpretation that is consistent with international law over any alternative interpretation that is inconsistent with it.[108] Having regard to international law,

[106] Id at para 14.

[107] Id at paras 2 and 14 and Rustenburg Platinum Mine above n 102 at para 52.

[108] Section 233 of the Constitution must of course be read with section 39(1) of the Constitution, which provides:

> "(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum—
>
> (a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;
>
> (b) must consider international law; and
>
> (c) may consider foreign law."

The fourth amicus, SALC, provides useful insight in this sphere in its written and oral submissions. These sources include those identified in Article 38(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice; international and regional treaties; United Nations resolutions; decisions of international and regional courts and tribunals; decisions numerous instruments are in place to limit hate speech. Article 19 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR)[109] entrenches the right to freedom of expression, but restricts that right when necessary.[110] Article 20 limits expression if it is hate speech, by providing that "[a]ny advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited by law". The ICCPR calls upon state parties to adopt legislation to enforce these provisions.[111] In addition, the Equality Act expressly seeks to implement the International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (ICERD).[112] From a regional perspective, the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (Banjul Charter) also entrenches the right to freedom of expression,[113] coupled with obligations "to maintain relations aimed at promoting, safeguarding and reinforcing mutual respect and tolerance".[114]

[88] The right to freedom of expression in international law contains two parts – the first imposes on states the obligation to protect the right to free speech, the second makes it equally mandatory for States to prohibit hate speech.[115] The judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal, while making cryptic reference to international law,[116] did not address at all the provisions of the ICERD, despite its central role. That central role of UN human rights treaty bodies; and reports of UN mandate-holders. See further Brownlie Principles of Public International Law 6 ed (OUP, Oxford 2003) at 6.

[109] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 16 December 1966 (ICCPR). The ICCPR was signed and ratified by South Africa in 1994 and 1998, respectively.

[110] Article 19(3) of the ICCPR reads:

> "The exercise of the rights provided for in paragraph 2 of this article carries with it special duties and responsibilities. It may therefore be subject to certain restrictions, but these shall only be such as are provided by law and are necessary."

[111] Article 2(2) of the ICCPR.

[112] Sections 2(h) and 3(2)(b) of the Equality Act. International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination, 21 December 1965 (ICERD). South Africa signed and ratified this Convention in 1994 and1998, respectively.

[113] Article 9 of the African Charter on Human and People's Rights (Banjul Charter), 21 October 1986. South Africa signed and ratified the Banjul Charter on 9 July 1996.

[114] Id at Article 28.

[115] Articles 19 and 20 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 10 December 1948 (UDHR), and Article 19 of the ICCPR.

[116] It referenced the ICCPR and the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 4 November 1950.

emanates from Article 4(a), which obliges South Africa to proscribe (as "an offence punishable by law") not only "incitement to racial discrimination [or violence]" but "all dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred".

[89] Various factors have been identified in international law that justify the curtailment of freedom of expression. These include: (i) the prevailing social and political context; (ii) the status of the speaker in relation to the audience; (iii) the existence of a clear intent to incite; (iv) the content and form of the speech; (v) the extent and reach of the speech; and (vi) the real likelihood and imminence of harm.[117]

[90] Section 3 of the Equality Act encourages a comparative foreign law analysis.[118] In its judgment, the Supreme Court of Appeal limited its analysis to the United States, Canada and Germany. It failed to acknowledge that in Canada and Germany, hate speech is criminalised,[119] whereas here hate speech is regulated through civil remedies in the Equality Act.[120] Our approach accords with that of the United Nations Rabat Plan of Action where it is recommended that:

> "Criminal sanctions related to unlawful forms of expression should be seen as last resort measures to be applied only in strictly justifiable situations. Civil sanctions and remedies should also be considered, including pecuniary and non-pecuniary damages, along with the right of correction and the right of reply."[121]

[91] That is not to say that helpful guidance cannot be gained from these jurisdictions – Canadian jurisprudence in particular provides useful insight into some of the aspects under consideration, particularly in respect of the definition of hate

[117] Principle 23 of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights, Declaration of Principles on Freedom of Expression and Access to Information in Africa, 10 November 2019.

[118] See section 3(a)-(c) of the Equality Act.

[119] Section 319(1) of the Canadian Criminal Code and section 130(1) of the German Criminal Code.

[120] Section 10(2) pertinently provides that the Equality Court may refer a case relating to hate speech to the Director of Public Prosecutions to institute criminal proceedings. Criminal sanctions play no role here and the Equality Act is plainly a civil statute.

[121] Annual Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, 11 January 2013 A/HRC/22/17/Add 4 at para 34.

speech. The only caveat is that we must be ever mindful that in Canada, hate speech is criminalised.[122] A more extensive conspectus is required to illustrate the scope of developments under foreign law in relation to hate speech as it is applied to the LGBT+ community. An analysis of comparative foreign law must take into account that:

> "[T]he international standard for hate speech regulation becomes less consistent in the absence of equalising circumstances. Depending on the country and its history and culture, the standard vacillates between more or less speech-protection."[123]

[92] The emphasis a society places on freedom of expression and its approach to hate speech regulation is largely a product of that society's culture, history, values and norms. This is an important insight when considering how each jurisdiction aims to reconcile the tension between freedom of expression and hate speech. We are able, however, to discern general features in broad strokes that are common across various jurisdictions.

[93] On 5 October 2020, this Court, as it has on previous occasions, submitted a request to the World Conference on Constitutional Justice (Venice Commission) regarding other jurisdictions' positions on freedom of expression and hate speech prohibitions. Various jurisdictions provided useful submissions on this score and in summary, free speech is generally constrained by prohibitions on hate speech and various forms of hurtful and harmful speech.[124] Useful guidance can be gained from these jurisdictions and others with well-developed hate speech legislation.[125] What bears consideration next is how section 10(1) ought to be interpreted.

[122] Id.

[123] Chandramouli "Protecting Both Sides of the Conversation: Towards a Clear International Standard for Hate Speech Regulation" (2013) 34 University of Pennsylvania Journal of International Law 831 at 848.

[124] Submissions were received from Germany, Sweden, the Netherlands, Brazil and Mexico.

[125] In Belgium, the Belgian Holocaust denial law, passed on 23 March 1995, bans public Holocaust denial. Specifically, the law makes it illegal to publicly "deny, play down, justify or approve of the genocide committed by the Nazi German regime during the Second World War". Prosecution is led by the Belgian Centre for Equal Opportunities. The offense is punishable by imprisonment of up to one year and fines of up to €2 500. In France, France's penal code and press laws prohibit public and private communication that is defamatory or insulting, or that incites discrimination, hatred, or violence against a person or group on account of place of origin, ethnicity

Interpretation of section 10(1)

[94] Having identified the relevant constitutional background to the Equality Act, and section 10 more particularly, we can proceed to answer some of the interpretive questions that were discussed before us.

The remedial character of section 10(1)

[95] In essence, section 10(1) can be described as a statutory delict that innovatively offers, unlike any crime or other delict in our law, specific remedies concerning the right to equality, as the Mandela Foundation argued.[126] I agree with the submissions that Parliament sought to protect victims from infringements of their right to equality, not only in the form of unfair discrimination, but also through hate speech and harassment, by forging new statutory delicts bearing those names, actionable in the Equality Court.

or lack thereof, nationality, race, specific religion, sex, sexual orientation, or handicap. The law prohibits declarations that justify or deny crimes against humanity – for example, the Holocaust (Gayssot Act). In Luxembourg, the law "provides custodial sentences of between 9 days and 2 years and or a fine of €251 to €25 000 for the verbal, written or graphic communication or materials that are made available in public places or meetings which incite discrimination, hate or violence against a natural or legal person or a group or community of persons. Sexual orientation is considered a protected characteristic." In Chile, Article 31 of the "Ley sobre Libertades de Opinión e Información y Ejercicio del Periodismo" (Statute on Freedom of Opinion and Information and the Performance of Journalism) punishes with a large fine those who "through any means of social communication make publications or transmissions intended to promote hatred or hostility towards persons or a group of persons due to their race, sex, religion or nationality". Finally, in Denmark, section 266b of the Danish Criminal Code states that:

> "(1) Any person who, publicly or with the intention of wider dissemination, makes a statement or imparts other information by which a group of people are threatened, insulted or degraded on account of their race, colour, national or ethnic origin, religion, or sexual inclination shall be liable to a fine or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years.
>
> (2) In determining the punishment it shall be considered a particularly aggravating circumstance if the conduct is of a propagandistic nature."

[126] Some of the amici drew analogies between the impugned section and common law defamation and delict. It is indeed so that, while defamation regulates speech that damages reputation and dignity, the impugned section seeks to regulate speech by protecting the rights to equality and dignity of vulnerable people. In a successful defamation claim the victim receives monetary compensation as damages, or an apology or a retraction of the defamatory statements may be ordered. Under the Equality Act, the victim may, apart from a claim for damages, seek an unconditional apology, or ask for the perpetrator to undertake counselling or to make a contribution to an organisation that promotes the rights of the vulnerable.

"That could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention"

[96] Before this Court, the parties debated whether the phrase "that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention" postulates a subjective or objective test. In my view, it is plainly an objective standard that requires a reasonable person test. This is based on the gloss "reasonably be construed" and "to demonstrate a clear intention", implying an objective test that considers the facts and circumstances surrounding the expression, and not mere inferences or assumptions that are made by the targeted group.[127]

[97] This approach accords with the interpretation advanced in SAHRC v Khumalo that "[t]he objective test in section 10(1) implies in the terminology used to articulate it, that an intention shall be deemed if a reasonable reader would so construe the words. Because the objective test of the reasonable reader is to be applied, it is the effect of the text, not the intention of the author, that is assessed."[128] I endorse this approach. It is consistent with our jurisprudence concerning similar issues. An objective normative reasonable person test was accepted by this Court, albeit in a different context, in Mamabolo.[129] This is also consistent with our common law delict of inuria, which evaluates these claims by the reasonableness standard of wrongfulness. In Le Roux, this Court held that, in order to determine whether expression was defamatory—

[127] In his written submissions the Minister cites Marais and Pretorius "A Contextual Analysis of the Hate Speech Provisions of the Equality Act" (2015) 18 Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal 902 at 912:

> "The requirement of a 'clear' intention points to an element of deference to the speaker, as well as caution not to prohibit seemingly discriminatory expression that may in fact serve to promote rather than jeopardise equality."

[128] South African Human Rights Commission v Khumalo 2019 (1) SA 289 (GJ) (SAHRC v Khumalo) at para 89. See also at para 88:

> "The standard of the reasonable person, applied to section 10(1), means, therefore, whether a reasonable person could conclude (not inevitably should conclude) that the words mean the author had a clear intention to bring about the prohibited consequences. Words obviously mean what they imply."

In addition, in Whatcott above n 98, the Canadian Supreme Court stated at para 95:

> "[I]n view of the reasonable person aware of the context and circumstances, the representation exposes or tends to expose any person or class of persons to detestation and vilification on the basis of a prohibited ground of discrimination."

[129] Mamabolo above n 77 at para 43.

> "[t]he test to be applied is an objective one. In accordance with this objective test the criterion is what meaning the reasonable reader of ordinary intelligence would attribute to the statement. In applying this test it is accepted that the reasonable reader would understand the statement in its context and that [they] would have had regard not only to what is expressly stated but also to what is implied."[130]

[98] In Rustenburg Platinum Mine, this Court held that context is axiomatically important as the words in themselves were not racist, and accepted that "the test to determine whether the use of the words is racist is objective".[131] This further buttresses an objective approach.

[99] Importantly, an objective standard gives better effect to the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.[132] On the one hand, if it were based on the subjective perception of the target group, it would unduly encroach on freedom of expression, since claims could be based on "a multiplicity of trivial actions by hypersensitive persons".[133] On the other hand, if it were based on the subjective intention of the speaker, the threshold for civil liability would be considerably higher than usual.[134]

[100] An objective approach, accounting for the general circumstances and context, as well as other factors elucidated by the Special Rapporteur, is appropriate for what hate speech laws aim to prohibit. In Whatcott, the Supreme Court of Canada underscored the effects of hate speech, not the intent, and notes that systemic discrimination tends to [130] Le Roux v Dey [2011] ZACC 4; 2011 (3) SA 274 (CC); 2011 (6) BCLR 577 (CC) at para 89.

[131] Rustenburg Platinum Mine above n 102 para 38. This Court drew an analogy with the test for whether a statement is defamatory, as enunciated in Sindani v Van der Merwe [2001] ZASCA 130; 2002 (2) SA 32 (SCA) at para 11.

[132] SATAWU v Moloto N.N.O. [2012] ZACC 19; 2012 (6) SA 249 (CC); 2012 (11) BCLR 117 (CC) at para 72.

[133] Delange v Costa 1989 (2) SA 857 (A) at 862A-B, cited in Dendy v University of the Witwatersrand [2007] ZASCA 30; [2007] 3 All SA 1 (SCA) at para 6.

[134] For instance, as was stated in the Report of the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights on the expert workshops on the prohibition of incitement to national, racial or religious hatred (A/HRC/22/17/Add.4):

> "Article 20 of [the ICCPR] anticipates intent. Negligence and recklessness are not sufficient for an act to be an offence under article 20 of the Covenant, as this article provides for 'advocacy' and 'incitement' rather than the mere distribution or circulation of material. In this regard, it requires the activation of a triangular relationship between the object and subject of the speech act as well as the audience."

be more widespread than intentional discrimination.[135] This Court has acknowledged that "systemic motifs of discrimination" are part of the fabric of our society.[136] This analysis is apt when considering the philosophical underpinnings of hate speech prohibitions that attach civil liability, coupled with the role of hate speech and systemic discrimination in this country. However, when plugging in an abstract reasonable person test in order to construe the meaning of alleged hate speech, courts ought to be mindful of our diverse and dynamic society and not inadvertently reify prejudices.[137]

[101] For all these reasons, I conclude that the test is an objective reasonable person test and the Supreme Court of Appeal erred in concluding that the test imposed by the impugned section is a subjective one. I therefore endorse those decisions of the Equality Court that have reached a finding that the test is objective.[138]

The correct reading and interpretation of "hurtful"; "harmful or to incite harm"; "promote or propagate hatred"

[102] I am of the view that the Supreme Court of Appeal erred in finding that paragraphs (a)-(c) of section 10(1) must be read disjunctively. The absence of the conjunction "and" between the paragraphs, accentuated by the Supreme Court of Appeal in its reasoning, is countered by the absence of the disjunction "or". This is therefore a neutral factor. On a disjunctive reading, section 10 would prohibit mere private communication which could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to be hurtful – this is an overly extensive and impermissible infringement of freedom of expression.

[135] Whatcott above n 98 at para 126, affirming Taylor above n 100 at 931-2:

> "The preoccupation with effects, and not with intent, is readily explicable when one considers that systemic discrimination is much more widespread in our society than is intentional discrimination. To import a subjective intent requirement into human rights provisions, rather than allowing tribunals to focus solely upon effects, would thus defeat one of the primary goals of the anti-discrimination statute."

[136] Brink above n 50 at para 41.

[137] Modiri "Race, Realism and Critique: The Politics of Race and Afriforum v Malema in the (In)Equality Court" (2013) SALJ 274 at 274.

[138] Afriforum v Malema 2011 (6) SA 240 (EqC) at para 109 and Sonke Gender Justice Network v Malema 2010 (7) BCLR 729 (EqC) at para 11.

[103] Expressions that are merely hurtful, especially when understood in everyday parlance, are insufficient to constitute hate speech. It is well established that the prohibition of hate speech is not aimed at merely offensive speech, but that offensive speech is protected by freedom of expression.[139] This point is eloquently articulated in Whatcott, where it was noted that merely offensive or hurtful expression should be excluded from the ambit of a hate speech prohibition and respect should be given to the Legislature's choice of a provision predicated on hatred.[140] As mentioned above, the Supreme Court of Canada persuasively defined, in the context of hate speech, the legislative term "hatred" as—

> "being restricted to manifestations of emotion described by the words 'detestation' and 'vilification'. This filters out expression which, while repugnant and offensive, does not incite the level of abhorrence, delegitimisation and rejection that risks causing discrimination or other harmful effects."[141]

[104] In striving to interpret the section in a constitutionally compliant manner, as we are required to do, provided that such interpretation can be reasonably ascribed to the provision,[142] the impugned section is reasonably capable of a conjunctive reading. That reading is thus called for. This approach also advances a contextual and purposive interpretation. It is buttressed by the fact that: prohibiting hurtful expression would

[139] See Handyside above n 86 at para 49 and Keegstra above n 100 at 828. Waldron The Harm in Hate Speech (Harvard University Press, London 2012) at 105-6 observes that "[p]rotecting people's feelings against offense is not an appropriate objective for the law" but—

> "[d]ignity on the other hand, is precisely what hate speech laws are designed to protect – not dignity in the sense of any particular level of honour or esteem (or self-esteem), but dignity in the sense of a person's basic entitlement to being regarded as a member of society in good standing."

[140] Whatcott above n 98 at para 46. In that case, the Canadian Supreme Court upheld the regulation of speech that refers to LGBT+ persons as "dirty", "filthy", "degenerate" and as "paedophiles".

[141] Id at 471. It is important to note that the impugned provision in Whatcott only prohibits public communication of hate speech; it does not restrict hateful expression in private communications between individuals. In this regard, one can also consider the Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Promotion and Protection of the Right to Freedom of Opinion and Expression to the General Assembly on "Hate Speech and Incitement of Hatred" (2012), which states that hatred is "a state of mind characterised as intense and irrational emotions of opprobrium, enmity and detestation towards the target group".

[142] Chisuse v Director-General, Department of Home Affairs [2020] ZACC 20; 2020 (6) SA 14 (CC); 2020 (10) BCLR 1173 (CC) at paras 49-59.

undermine the ability to "offend, shock and disturb"; a disjunctive reading is not required by international law;[143] and the impugned provision's title makes it clear that it deals with the prohibition of hate speech. Furthermore, and critically, a disjunctive reading would render the impugned section unconstitutional, since merely hurtful speech, with no element of hatred or incitement, could for example constitute prohibited hate speech. This would be an impermissible infringement of freedom of expression as it would bar speech that disturbs, offends and shocks.[144] Therefore, for all the reasons canvassed above, a conjunctive interpretation is warranted.[145]

[105] In endorsing a conjunctive approach, a truly reasonable interpretation is subject to whether such meanings can be ascribed to the various terms. I turn next to the key question: what are the precise meanings of the terms "hurtful", "harmful" and "to incite harm"? The parties and the amici proffered an array of interpretations.

[106] SAHRC contended that there is a distinction between "hurtful" and "harmful" in that harmful is a more permanent and severe type of harm. On the one hand, "hurtful" refers to expression that causes emotional pain to a person's dignity, but the concept "harmful" connotes deep psychological and emotional effects. In oral argument, however, the SAHRC conceded that there is considerable overlap. The Minister, on the other hand, submitted that "hurtful" refers to when distress is caused to someone's feelings and "harmful" refers to psychological or emotional harm.

[107] Considering next the phrase "to incite harm", it is imperative to point out at the outset that there is no requirement of an established causal link between the expression and actual harm committed. According to international treaties, this form of incitement is not restricted to physical violence, as it also refers to the incitement of discrimination and hatred. Article 20(2) of the ICCPR provides that "[a]ny advocacy of national, racial or religious hatred that constitutes incitement to discrimination, hostility or violence shall be prohibited by law". In addition, Article 4(a) of the ICERD prohibits "all dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred, incitement to racial discrimination, as well as all acts of violence or incitement to such acts".

[143] Article 20(b) of the ICCPR above n 109 and Article 4 of the ICERD above n 112.

[144] Whatcott above n 98 at para 109.

[145] This approach was endorsed in Khumalo v Holomisa above n 55 at para 82 and echoed in Gordhan v Malema 2020 (1) SA 587 (GJ) at para 6.

[108] It is accepted by the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR) that "inciting hatred does not necessarily entail a call for an act of violence, or other criminal acts" and speech that does not "directly recommend individuals to commit hateful acts may still reach the threshold of hate speech".[146]

[109] In Whatcott, the Supreme Court of Canada also questioned the requirement of a causal link in the context of hate speech prohibitions – "both the difficulty of establishing a causal link between an expressive statement and the resulting hatred, and the seriousness of the harm to which vulnerable groups are exposed by hate speech, justify the imposition of preventive measures that do not require proof of actual harm".[147] That Court went on to find that "a reasonable apprehension of societal harm as a result of hate speech" is sufficient.[148]

[110] The Supreme Court of Appeal erred when it concluded that "no evidence was presented to show a link between the article and any subsequent physical or verbal attacks on members of the LGBT+ community".[149] This is misplaced. Our Constitution

[146] In Vejdeland above n 95 at para 55 the Court reiterated:

> "[I]nciting to hatred does not necessarily entail a call for an act of violence, or other criminal acts. Attacks on persons committed by insulting, holding up to ridicule or slandering specific groups of the population can be sufficient for the authorities to favour combating racist speech in the face of freedom of expression exercised in an irresponsible manner. . . . In this regard, the Court stressed that discrimination based on sexual orientation is as serious as discrimination based on 'race, origin or colour'."

Vejdeland is apposite as that case entailed speech where it was claimed that homosexuality was one of the main reasons why HIV/AIDS came into existence and that the "homosexual lobby" tried to play down paedophilia.

[147] Whatcott above n 98 at para 129, referring to Keegstra above n 100 at 776.

[148] Id at paras 132-135. The Supreme Court of Canada stated that "[t]his approach recognises that a precise causal link for certain societal harms ought not to be required. A Court is entitled to use common sense and experience in recognising that certain activities, hate speech among them, inflict societal harms."

[149] Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 26 at para 33.

requires that we not only be reactive to incidences or systems of unfair discrimination, but also pre-emptive. We need to act after the damage has occurred where so required, but, importantly, we are also required to act to ensure that it does not occur.

[111] Our law does not require a causal link. In addition, that finding also disregards the compelling, uncontested evidence in the Equality Court that graphically demonstrated the pervasive past violence and general enmity against members of the LGBT+ community. That, in turn, demonstrates the potential harm contained in the article. The difficulty in determining actual harm against the LGBT+ community is indicative of the hideous nature of hate speech committed against this target group. That there is no requirement for a causal connection is clear from the Equality Act itself. To require a causal link would in and of itself undermine the very same objectives of the Equality Act to prohibit unfair discrimination, in that not every instance of harmful and/or hurtful speech will result in imminent violence. There may be expression which certain groups find hurtful and/or harmful which does not actually result in violence, but that does not take away from the fact that such expression would have been hate speech.

[112] Lastly, it is of some significance that the impugned section distinguishes between "harmful" or "to incite harm" in clear disjunctive terms. This reveals that, even on an overall conjunctive reading, it may be sufficient to demonstrate harm, absent incitement of harm. Thus, the section postulates prohibiting expression that either harms or evokes a reasonable apprehension of harm to the target group.

"Words"

[113] The approach in Nelson Mandela Foundation Trust,[150] that "speech" must be interpreted broadly, so as to encompass the ideas behind the words themselves and both verbal and non-verbal expressions, commends itself to me.[151] This wide meaning accords not only with our Constitution, but also with the provisions of the Equality Act. And it is consonant with international law and comparative foreign law.

[150] Nelson Mandela Foundation Trust v Afriforum NPC 2019 (6) SA 327 (GJ).

[151] Id at para 47.

[114] The use of the terms "advocate" and "propagate" in section 10 of the Equality Act is indicative of ideas rather than words, if they are to be accorded their full meaning. Attaching a literal interpretation to these words would not achieve the objects of the provision. The inclusion of these two concepts suggests that the intention is to give effect to article 4 of the ICERD and section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution respectively, which are specifically concerned with racist "propaganda" and the "advocacy" of hatred.[152]

"Communicate"

[115] Words have meaning and effect should be given to them. To communicate assumes the conveyance of ideas. Words in and of themselves are otherwise meaningless. As it was described in Nelson Mandela Foundation Trust, "[w]hat the section targets is thus the meaning behind the words, and not simply the words".[153] I am also in agreement with that Court's view that an interpretation of the term "words" to include speech, ideas, ideologies, belief, meaning, instructions and so forth, affords this term a sensible and reasonable interpretation that is constitutionally compliant. A purposive interpretation of this sort is undoubtedly required.

[116] In contradistinction to the other verbs in the impugned provision – such as "publish"; "propagate" or "advocate" that all inherently require some form of public dissemination[154] – "communicate" is capable of both being public and private. But, "communicate" in terms of section 10(1) plainly requires that the speaker transmits words to a third party – there must be communication, the transmission of information.

[152] As set out in sections 2(b)(v) and 2(h) of the Equality Act.

[153] Nelson Mandela Foundation Trust above n 150 at para 132.

[154] According to Lexico, the definitions of these terms are as follows: "publish" refers to "prepare and issue (a book, journal, piece of music, etc.) for public sale, distribution or readership"; "advocate" means to "publicly recommend or support"; and "propagate" means "to spread and promote (an idea, theory etc.) widely".

And the conjunctive reading required here entails that "communicate" must be read in light of what appears in section 10(a)-(c). The concepts "promote" and "propagate" in (c) connote the dissemination of information and do not fit the notion of communicating in private. And on a reading that accords with section 39(2), one would – in any event – have to read "communicate" to mean communication that excludes private conversations.

[117] Our most private communications – and being able to freely communicate in one's private and personal sphere – form part and parcel of the "inner sanctum of the person" and are in the "the truly personal realm".[155] This approach resonates with Canadian jurisprudence. I hasten to acknowledge that their jurisprudence must be understood in view of the fact that section 319 of the Canadian Criminal Code extends to private conversations. It is nonetheless useful to consider it with that caveat in mind.[156]

[118] Hate speech prohibitions, even those that attach civil liability, should not extend to private communications, because that would be incongruent with the very purpose of regulating hate speech – that public hateful expression undermines the target group's dignity, social standing and assurance against exclusion, hostility, discrimination and violence. Furthermore, the purpose of hate speech prohibitions is "to remedy the effects of such speech and the harm that it causes, whether to a target group or to the broader societal well-being. The speech must expose the target group to hatred and be likely to perpetuate negative stereotyping and unfair discrimination. It is improbable that most private conversations will have this effect."[157]

[119] Ultimately, hate speech prohibitions are concerned with the impact and effect of the hate speech and protecting the public good; this is inevitably limited when

[155] Bernstein v Bester N.N.O. [1996] ZACC 2; 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at para 67.

[156] See, amongst others: R v Ahenakew 2006 SKQB 27 at para 15; Keegstra above n 100 at 772-3.

[157] Botha and Govindjee "Hate Speech Provisions and Provisos: A Response to Marais and Pretorius and Proposals for Reform" Potchefstroom Electronic Law Journal (2017) 2 at 13.

communicated in the private sphere. Therefore, true hate speech presupposes a public dissemination of some sort, [158] or at the very least it cannot be conveyed in mere private communications. Indeed, "the regulation of hate speech which occurs publicly sets a normative benchmark and has the potential to shape future behaviour".[159]

[120] This approach accords with the requirement of a constitutionally compliant interpretation in terms of section 39(2) of the Constitution. And this restrictive interpretation is justified on the basis of the eusdem generis canon of construction (of the same kind, class, or nature): when general words follow specific words in a statute in which several items have been enumerated, the general words are construed to embrace only objects similar in nature to the objects enumerated by the preceding specific words of the statute.[160]

"Against any person"

[121] The main criticism is that hate speech prohibitions focus on the negative impact on the targeted group and the greater societal harm as opposed to the specific impact on an individual (it is not based on their individual characteristics).[161] Put differently, the focus ought to be on group or societal harm not solely individual harm. It is contended that "against any person" may diminish the critical role of the wider targeted group.

[122] It is quite conceivable, though, that hate speech may be directed at an individual but impact not just that individual, but the group to which that individual belongs. The offensive language used by Mr Qwelane might have been directed by an individual at one homosexual person – something like, "I do not understand your sexuality. Just how can you be sexually attracted to another man? One of these days you are going to want to marry an animal." Although purportedly directed at one homosexual person, that [158] See Article 4(a) of ICERD, which states that it shall "declare an offence punishable by law all dissemination of ideas based on racial superiority or hatred, or incitement".

[159] Id.

[160] Road Traffic Management Corporation v Waymark (Pty) Ltd [2019] ZACC 12; 2019 (5) SA 29 (CC); 2019 (6) BCLR 749 (CC) at para 48.

[161] Botha and Govindjee above n 157 at 16.

will definitely cause untold harm, insult and injury to the LGBT+ community, not just the individual to whom the words were directed. Analogously, the same is bound to happen with the black community if a person uses the vile word "kaffir" against one black person. In my view, there is nothing objectionable in the inclusion of the words "against any person". This interpretation makes sense in the context of the wide – and not individualised – dissemination that the section requires. Indeed, the words are a necessary component of section 10, if it is to cover what is required by section 16(2) of the Constitution.

The proviso in section 12

[123] Section 12 of the Equality Act is not part of these confirmation proceedings. However, the High Court reasoned that because it is inextricably linked to section 10 through the proviso, a case may be made that it bears consideration. In view of the conclusion that I reach below in respect of section 10(1)(a), however, I do not deem it necessary to decide this point.

Challenges to section 10

[124] Having discussed the interpretive background against which section 10 must be understood, we can now turn to the challenges it faces in this Court. Since the constitutional challenge is based on two overarching attacks, I will consider the issues in terms of whether the impugned provision violates the Bill of Rights, and whether it is vague.

Bill of Rights challenges: limitation of section 16

[125] The main complaint by Mr Qwelane is that the impugned provision's limitation of freedom of expression is overbroad, by which he means that it is unjustified and therefore unconstitutional. He founds this claim on a number of words and phrases, which he submits make section 10(1) impermissibly overbroad. In considering this Bill of Rights challenge, there must first be a determination of whether they go beyond what is envisioned in section 16 of the Constitution, thereby limiting the right.[162] If they do, we are enjoined to conduct a justification analysis in terms of section 36 of the Constitution.[163]

The prohibited grounds

Sexual orientation

[126] The Supreme Court of Appeal provided for an interim reading-in that merely adds "sexual orientation" to the other grounds already listed in section 16(2)(c), namely race, ethnicity, gender or religion. This means that the prohibited ground of sexual orientation is enough to found a case of hate speech based on section 10(1) of the Equality Act, but it goes beyond the limitations of free speech that are constitutionally allowed in section 16(2). Therefore, it is clear that the inclusion of this ground is a limitation of section 16(1) beyond what is permitted in section 16(2). This requires a justification analysis on this ground.

The conundrum: no evidence and no reasoning on the other "prohibited grounds"

[127] The Supreme Court of Appeal observed that, other than the added ground of sexual orientation, "the other prohibited grounds provided for in section 1 of [the Equality Act] beyond those set out in section 16(2) of the Constitution, were not in issue before us and no evidence was directed to them". In the High Court this issue was not considered in any detail. That Court noted the broadness of the prohibited grounds, but undertook no further analysis. Instead, it focused on the evidence regarding hate speech against the LGBT+ community. This presents a potential conundrum, inasmuch as no evidence was led concerning the other grounds, nor has there been any reasoned decision in respect of them in either the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[162] Walters above n 47 at para 26.

[163] Id at para 27.

[128] Through a recent amendment to section 1(a) of the Equality Act, discrimination on the ground of HIV/AIDS status was included as a prohibited ground.[164] The remaining potentially vexed inclusions are those that are wide-ranging and that may elicit apprehension about interference by the draconian "thought police", like the concepts "conscience" and "belief". There are well-grounded fears that their inclusion may impermissibly encroach upon the right to freedom of expression. Some of the amici make insightful submissions in this regard.[165] However, since this is not an issue that is before this Court for confirmation and, particularly in view of the absence of judgments on this point by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal, it is not in the interests of justice to engage with this issue.[166] It is best left to Parliament to deal with.

Adding analogous grounds

[129] What bears consideration next is the inclusion of analogous grounds. It must be emphasised that various thresholds must be cleared in order for grounds to constitute analogous grounds for the purposes of section 1 of the Equality Act. These thresholds resonate with the very purpose of combating hate speech through legislative regulation. As was articulated in Whatcott:

> "Hate speech is an effort to marginalise individuals based on their membership in a group. Using expression that exposes the group to hatred, hate speech seeks to [164] In 2017, section 1(a) of the Equality Act was amended to include a prohibition of discrimination on the grounds of HIV/AIDS status. For purposes of the Equality Act, HIV/AIDS status "includes actual or perceived presence in a person's body of the Human Immunodeficiency Virus (HIV) or symptoms or Acquired Immune Deficiency Syndrome (AIDS), as well as adverse assumptions based on this status".

[165] Thus, the Holocaust Foundation contends that repeating the section 9(3) prohibited grounds and adding HIV/AIDS status is appropriate, since the Equality Act, through the constitutional injunction of section 9(4) of the Constitution, is obliged to prevent unfair discrimination. Therefore, so the argument goes, section 10(1) is mandated and required by the Constitution itself. The Freedom Institute, on the other hand raises concerns in respect of overbreadth. Its difficulty lies with the expansion of the wide-ranging acts that may constitute hate speech, as opposed to the broadness of the grounds the hate speech is based on. A restrictive interpretation of the additional prohibited grounds is advocated by MMA. It cited as an example that "belief" should not be understood to include political ideology. MMA also contends for a causal link between the speech and the prohibited ground – to be "based on" one of the prohibited grounds, the prohibited grounds must be the "reason for the speech".

[166] Tiekiedraai Eiendomme (Pty) Limited v Shell South Africa Marketing (Pty) Limited [2019] ZACC 14; 2019 (7) BCLR 850 (CC) at paras 18-24.

> delegitimise group members in the eye of the majority, reducing their social standing and acceptance within society."[167]

[130] It bears emphasis that the prohibition of hate speech seeks to protect against the dissemination of hatred that causes or incites harm, in that it undermines the dignity and humanity of the target group and undermines the constitutional project of substantive equality and acceptance in our society. Provisions prohibiting hate speech can be contrasted with our law around unfair discrimination. In that context, listed grounds are grounds where the "dignity assessment" is presumed to have already been done – our jurisprudence tells us that discrimination on the basis of a listed ground is presumed to be unfair. This is based on past experiences, historic suffering or systemic disadvantage. As a result, in the unfair discrimination scenario, the onus shifts onto the respondent to show that discrimination on a listed ground is not unfair. In this regard, listed grounds differ from analogous grounds, where unfairness must be shown.

[131] In this way. section 1(b) of the Equality Act plays a similar role to that of the unfairness requirement as espoused in Harksen. It is necessary to reiterate the provisions of section 1(b):

> "(b) any other ground where discrimination based on that other ground—
>
> (i) causes or perpetuates systemic disadvantage;
>
> (ii) undermines human dignity; or
>
> (iii) adversely affects the equal enjoyment of a person's rights and freedoms in a serious manner that is comparable to discrimination on a ground in paragraph (a)."

[132] One must guard against a narrow definition of these terms. What the specified grounds have in common is that they have been used (or misused) in the past (both in South Africa and elsewhere) to categorise, marginalise and often oppress persons who have had, or who have been associated with, these attributes or characteristics. These grounds have the potential, to demean persons by denying them their inherent humanity and dignity. There is often a complex relationship between these grounds. In some cases, they relate to immutable biological attributes or characteristics, in some to the associational life of humans, in some to the intellectual, expressive and religious dimensions of humanity and in some cases to a combination of one or more of these features. The temptation to force them into neatly self-contained categories should be resisted.[168]

[167] Whatcott above n 98 at para 71.

[133] While it is essential that targeted groups are not overly broad, it is equally clear that, since section 10(1)(b) does encapsulate and require certain elements that underscore the importance of membership, systemic discrimination and the undermining of dignity, this does not leave the door open for the addition of analogous grounds that allow for an unjustifiable limitation of the right to freedom of expression.

[134] For these reasons, the expansion of the listed grounds to include analogous grounds, does not render the definition of prohibited grounds unconstitutional. The extended prohibited grounds are narrowly crafted to fulfil the purpose of the hate speech prohibition. Accordingly, I conclude that the limitation is proportionate in an open and democratic society. The challenge based on a limitation of section 16 of the Constitution must therefore fail.

"Hurtful"

[135] The potential vagueness of the term "hurtful" will be discussed below, but a separate question is whether it limits section 16 of the Constitution. Section 10(1)(c) of the Equality Act prohibits words that "promote or propagate hatred", and this may be interpreted to accord with the prohibition of the "advocacy of hatred" in section 16(2). Similarly, the classification in section 10 of hate speech as speech that is "harmful or incite[s] harm" may be read to align with the prohibition against the "advocacy of hatred" in section 16(2)(c) of the Constitution. However, there is no similar exercise that can be conducted to read "hurtful" constitutionally, as section 16 has no similar wording. Furthermore, the term is clearly broader than what is envisioned in section 16, which focuses on war, violence and hatred, and not merely speech that hurts. Therefore, on this count, section 10 limits section 16 of the Constitution, and a justification analysis is required.

[168] Harksen above n 69 at para 47.

Justification analysis

[136] The term "hurtful" and the inclusion of "sexual orientation" in the Equality Act extend the regulation of expression beyond expression envisaged in section 16(2) of the Constitution. Islamic Unity holds that "[w]here the State extends the scope of regulation beyond expression envisaged in section 16(2), it encroaches on the terrain of protected expression and can do so only if such regulation meets the justification criteria in section 36(1) of the Constitution".[169] Similarly, here the Equality Act is certainly past what is envisaged in section 16(2), so that there is a limitation of the section 16(1) right. Therefore, that takes us directly to the justification analysis.

[137] Section 36(1) provides:

> "The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including—
>
> (a) the nature of the right;
>
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
>
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
>
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and
>
> (e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose."

[138] It is necessary to apply the various factors in section 36 to each limitation caused by section 10(1). These are the limitations brought about firstly through the inclusion of the term "hurtful", and secondly through the inclusion of the prohibited ground of "sexual orientation".

[169] Islamic Unity above n 86 at para 32.

Can the inclusion of the term "hurtful" be justified?

[139] With respect to the term "hurtful", much of what is relevant to the justification analysis has already been discussed. The importance of the right to freedom of expression on the one hand and the importance of the purpose of the limitation of that right, namely to protect the equally important rights to equality and dignity by way of prohibiting hate speech, have been expounded. So too, the nature and extent of the limitation and the relation between the limitation and its purpose. However, it is here that the usefulness of the term "hurtful" becomes less clear. If speech that is merely hurtful is considered hate speech, this sets the bar rather low. It is an extensive limitation. The prohibition of hurtful speech would certainly serve to protect the rights to dignity and equality of hate speech victims. However, hurtful speech does not necessarily seek to spread hatred against a person because of their membership of a particular group, and it is that which is being targeted by section 10 of the Equality Act. Therefore, the relationship between the limitation and its purpose is not proportionate.

[140] This finding on proportionality suggests that section 10(1) leads to an unjustifiable limitation of section 16 of the Constitution, and that there might be less restrictive means to achieve the purpose of limiting hate speech. Most obviously, the term "hurtful" – which is the source of the limitation – can merely be excised from the provision.

[141] The existence of less restrictive means to achieve the purpose is a strong indication that the limitation occasioned by the term "hurtful" in section 10 cannot be justified. However, as this Court held in Economic Freedom Fighters:

> "While less restrictive means is where most limitations analyses may 'stand or fall', one must not conflate this leg with the broader balancing proportionality enquiry as envisaged by section 36(1)."[170]

[142] Further in Mamabolo this Court explicated:

> "Where section 36(1)(e) speaks of less restrictive means it does not postulate an unattainable norm of perfection. The standard is reasonableness. And in any event, in theory less restrictive means can almost invariably be imagined without necessarily precluding a finding of justification under the section. It is but one of the enumerated considerations which have to be weighed in conjunction with one another, and with any others that may be relevant."[171]

[143] Rather, as this Court explained in Economic Freedom Fighters:

> "All relevant factors must be taken into account to measure what is reasonable and justifiable, and the factors listed in section 36(1)(a)-(e) are not exhaustive. What is required is for a court to 'engage in a balancing exercise and arrive at a global judgment on proportionality and not adhere mechanically to a sequential check-list'."[172]

[144] Following this approach, we must consider the important constitutional purpose of limiting freedom of expression in the case of hate speech. We must also consider the fact that the limitation of "hurtful" speech goes beyond the justified limitation of hate speech, and that it is possible to avoid this by merely excising "hurtful". In the circumstances, the term "hurtful" leads to an unjustifiable limitation on freedom of speech, and is therefore unconstitutional.

[170] Economic Freedom Fighters above n 78 at para 146.

[171] Mamabolo above n 77 above n 80 at para 49. See also Case above n 56 at para 49:

> "To determine whether a law is overbroad, a court must consider the means used (that is, the law itself, properly interpreted), in relation to its constitutionally legitimate underlying objectives. If the impact of the law is not proportionate with such objectives, that law may be deemed overbroad."

[172] Economic Freedom Fighters above n 78 at para 91.

Can the inclusion of "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground be justified?

[145] The inclusion of "sexual orientation" as a prohibited ground in section 10(1) read with section 1 of the Equality Act stands on an entirely different footing. The justification analysis must begin in the same way: the importance of the right to freedom of expression – as explored above – must be considered, and the limitation of this right in the case of hate speech remains central to the protection of the rights to dignity and equality. However, the prohibition of hate speech based on sexual orientation is entirely proportional to its purpose. It would not be possible to protect the rights of the LGBT+ community without prohibiting hate speech based on sexual orientation. Less restrictive means of achieving this purpose have not been suggested, and are in fact inconceivable.

[146] All of the section 36 factors therefore point towards justifiability, and so the inclusion of the prohibited ground of "sexual orientation" in section 10(1) of the Equality Act, read with section 1, is a justified limitation of section 16(1).

Rule of law challenge

[147] Section 10 of the Equality Act has also been challenged on the ground that it is vague. If it is, it would be contrary to the rule of law, and would therefore violate section 1(c) of the Constitution. More specifically, what we must consider is whether in section 10 the terms "hurtful", "harmful" and "to incite harm" are vague.

General principles

[148] The rule of law requires, amongst other things, that laws be coherent, clear, stable and practicable.[173] This Court has noted that "[i]t is indeed an important principle of the rule of law, which is a foundational value of our Constitution, that rules be articulated clearly and in a manner accessible to those governed by the rules".[174] In Affordable Medicines Trust, this Court held:

[173] Fuller The Morality of Law (Yale University Press, New Haven and London 1964) at 63-5.

> "The doctrine of vagueness is founded on the rule of law, which, as pointed out earlier, is a foundational value of our constitutional democracy. It requires that laws must be written in a clear and accessible manner. What is required is reasonable certainty and not perfect lucidity. The doctrine of vagueness does not require absolute certainty of laws. The law must indicate with reasonable certainty to those who are bound by it what is required of them so that they may regulate their conduct accordingly."[175]

[149] This Court expounded that the "ultimate question is whether, so construed, the regulation indicates with reasonable certainty to those who are bound by it what is required of them".[176] In Hyundai it was explained that "the Legislature is under a duty to pass legislation that is reasonably clear and precise, enabling citizens and officials to understand what is expected of them".[177] And in Opperman, this Court observed that "[l]aws must of course be written in a clear and accessible manner. Impermissibly vague provisions violate the rule of law, a founding value of our Constitution. For the 'law' to 'rule', it must be reasonably clear and certain."[178] This Court continued:

> "Before constitutional compliance can be evaluated, a court must attribute a meaning to a provision. If more than one meaning is reasonably plausible, the one resulting in constitutional compliance must be chosen. But if the interpretation that emerges from the wording and context results in constitutional invalidity a court has to make a finding of unconstitutionality. The fact that a constitutionally compliant interpretation cannot reasonably be given to it, does not necessarily lead to vagueness. A finding of vagueness based on a perceived inability to interpret the provision would in any event

[174] Dawood above n 70 at para 47 and Bertie Van Zyl (Pty) Ltd v Minister for Safety and Security [2009] ZACC 11; 2010 (2) SA 181 (CC); 2009 (10) BCLR 978 (CC) (Bertie Van Zyl) at para 22.

[175] Affordable Medicines Trust v Minister of Health [2005] ZACC 3; 2006 (3) SA 247 (CC); 2005 (6) BCLR 529 (CC) at para 108.

[176] Id at para 109.

[177] Hyundai above n 54 at para 24, citing Dawood above n 70 at paras 47-8.

[178] National Credit Regulator v Opperman [2012] ZACC 29; 2013 (2) SA 1 (CC); 2013 (2) BCLR 170 (CC) (Opperman) at para 46, citing Affordable Medicines Trust above n 175 at para 108; Bertie Van Zyl above n 174 at para 100; and South African Liquor Traders' Association v Chairperson, Gauteng Liquor Board [2006] ZACC 7; 2009 (1) SA 565 (CC); 2006 (8) BCLR 901 (CC) at para 27.

> also result in constitutional invalidity. And an interpretation that renders the provision meaningless would lead nowhere. It would be futile."[179]

[150] In international law, a previous United Nations Special Rapporteur on the Promotion and Protection of the Right to Freedom of Opinion and Expression stated that,[180] amongst other things, domestic laws prohibiting hate speech ought to be "[p]rovided by law, which is clear, unambiguous, precisely worded and accessible to everyone".

[151] Mere shoddy draftsmanship, impreciseness and opacity are, however, not in themselves conclusive. In order to reach a point of "a constitutionally fatal level of vagueness . . . the provision [must be] utterly meaningless and unworkable".[181] If, applying the ordinary rules of construction, there are words or phrases in an impugned section or other related sections that allow for a constitutionally viable meaning, effect should be given to that interpretation.[182] The lack of reasonable certainty has serious concomitant effects. It erodes the ability of ordinary citizens to exercise their agency and autonomy when they express themselves. It undermines the norm-changing impact of the law; and undermines the deterrent goal of hate speech prohibitions. What bears consideration next are the specific challenges presented by the impugned provision in respect of vagueness.

[179] Opperman id at para 42.

[180] Report of the Special Rapporteur on the Promotion and Protection of the Right to Freedom of Opinion and Expression "Hate Speech and Incitement of Hatred" (7 September 2012) A/67/357 at para 41(a) and para 41 which states that:

> "The Special Rapporteur wishes to underscore that any restriction imposed on the right to freedom of expression, on the basis of any of the above-mentioned instruments, must comply with the three-part test of limitations to the right, as stipulated in Article 19 (3) of the Covenant. This means that any restriction must be:
>
> '(a) Provided by law, which is clear, unambiguous, precisely worded and accessible to everyone;
>
> (b) Proven by the State as necessary and legitimate to protect the rights or reputation of others, national security or public order, public health or morals;
>
> (c) Proven by the State as the least restrictive and proportionate means to achieve the purported aim.'''

[181] Opperman above n 178 at para 51, citing South African Liquor Traders Association above n 189 at para 26.

[182] Id at paras 52-5.

Does the impugned provision suffer from vagueness?

[152] Various interpretations for "harmful" and "hurtful" were suggested above. However, they all present problems. In particular, it is not clear whether there is any difference in their meaning or whether one is a component of the other. If one accepts that "hurtful" only refers to emotional or psychological harm and "harmful" refers to physical harm, the immediate difficulty is that expression cannot in and of itself "be harmful" in the physical sense. Put differently, words cannot intrinsically cause physical harm. The SAHRC's proposed definition of these concepts does not appear to me to create any distinction between them. Substantively they appear to mean the same thing. Intricate semantic contortions are required to reach separate meanings in them, and even then, the attainment of separate meanings seems to be a bridge too far. This tortuous interpretative odyssey usurps the Legislature's legislative functions and offends the principle of separation of powers, which I have expanded on above. It falls foul of the caution expressed in Islamic Unity:

> "It is obvious that the interpretation contended for would entail a complicated exercise of interpreting the very wide language of the relevant part of clause 2(a) in the light of the very concise and specific provisions of section 16(2)(c). Whilst this process might assist in determining whether particular expression can be regarded as hate speech, I fail to see how its meaning can coincide with that of the impugned clause on any reasonable interpretation, without being unduly strained."[183]

[153] In addition, if one were to accept the interpretations advanced by the SAHRC and the Minister, they clearly set an unacceptably low standard, so that hate speech prohibitions may unduly encroach on freedom of expression. On a conjunctive reading the threshold will naturally be elevated by the requirements in the other paragraphs, but the paragraphs will then suffer from superfluity. It is a well-established principle of statutory interpretation that "effect is given to every word or phrase in it . . . 'a statute ought to be so construed that, if it can be prevented, no clause, sentence, or word shall be superfluous, void or insignificant'".[184] Furthermore, while some of the parties contended that "hurtful", considered in the context of section 10 as a whole, would elevate what is required, the problem with this line of reasoning is that it naively expects the other components of the already convoluted and torturous provision to alleviate the difficulties. The section cannot, as it were, be expected to pull itself up by its bootstraps.

[183] Islamic Unity above n 86 at para 41.

[154] In contradistinction to the insuperable difficulties with "hurtful", the term "harmful" does not suffer the same fate. On a plain reading, "harmful" can be understood as deep emotional and psychological harm that severely undermines the dignity of the targeted group.[185] In Keegstra, the Supreme Court of Canada eloquently summed up two types of interconnected harms that resonate with the ethos of our diverse constitutional democracy, namely "harm done to the members of the target group" and harm done to "society at large".[186] Similarly, in SAHRC v Khumalo, three types of harm were illustrated.[187] First, "the reaction of persons who read the utterances and who are inclined to share those views and be encouraged by them to also shun, denigrate and abuse the target group". Second, the type of harm experienced by the target group which includes "demoralisation and physiological hurt" and "the harm caused from responding in kind thereby creating a spiral of invective back and forth". And third, "harm to the social cohesion in South African society" which can undermine our nation building project.

[155] In conclusion: it seems to me that the use of "hurtful" on a conjunctive reading appears to be redundant and that contributes to the lack of clarity of the impugned section. This is because "harmful" can be understood as emotional and psychological

[184] S v Weinberg 1979 (3) SA 89 (A) at 98 quoted in De Ville Constitutional and Statutory Interpretation (Interdoc Consultants Limited, 2000) at 167 fns 18-9. This principle was reiterated by this Court in Case above n 56 at para 57 citing Attorney General, Transvaal v Additional Magistrate for Johannesburg 1924 AD 421 at 436. More recently this principle was affirmed in Opperman above n 178 at para 99.

[185] See Meyerson Rights Limited, Freedom of Expression, Religion and the South African Constitution (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 1997) at 130. Meyerson opines that, "[I]t would not be constitutionally legitimate to punish someone for inciting someone else to cause harm if the harmful act thus incited were not itself an offence – or, at the very least, a civil wrong."

[186] Keegstra above n 100 at 746-7.

[187] SAHRC v Khumalo above n 128 at paras 95-7.

harm that severely undermines the dignity of the targeted group as well as physical harm. "Hurtful" could reasonably mean the same as "harmful", that is including both emotional and psychological harm. There is no need to have both. A possible solution would be for "hurtful" to mean something other than emotional harm, something less perhaps. However, due to the conjunctive reading,[188] a claimant would have to show that in addition to being emotionally harmed, she was also hurt. It may be so that harmful communication is always hurtful. If it is, the removal of the word "hurtful" due to its vagueness avoids any redundancy that can lead to a lack of clarity.

[156] Despite our best endeavours to fashion a constitutionally compliant and reasonably understandable meaning of the impugned section, there is no saving grace for its problematic parts. Given the troubling meaning of "hurtful" in the context of section 10(1), it is difficult for ordinary citizens to know whether their conduct will be "hurtful" or "harmful" and thus whether it meets the threshold required by section 10. Consequently, for all the reasons cited, the term "hurtful" in section 10(1)(a) is vague and so breaches the rule of law. For that reason, its inclusion in section 10(1) results in the section suffering from vagueness and it is thus unconstitutional.

[157] Section 10(1)(a) is irredeemably vague and undermines the rule of law, as enshrined in section 1(c) of the Constitution. It thus does not pass constitutional muster. However, this does not render the entire provision unconstitutional. It is possible to excise the constitutionally offensive part from the rest of the provision.

Remedy on the constitutional challenge

[158] Section 172(1) of the Constitution is clear that a court may go further than just declaring certain conduct or laws unconstitutional. There is a further obligation to grant effective remedies.[189] In terms of this provision this Court may supplement a declarator with an order that it considers just and equitable.

[188] As mentioned above, it would also be fatal on the disjunctive approach, since it would prohibit merely hurtful speech.

[159] Having concluded that a part of the impugned section is not constitutionally compliant, the question is what to do with the bad part of the impugned provision and how to salvage the good. To recap: the troublesome concept "hurtful" is irreparably vague and also constitutes an unjustifiable limitation of section 16 of the Constitution. The possible severance of this invalid part of the provision bears consideration.

[160] In Coetzee, this Court said:

> "Although severability in the context of constitutional law may often require special treatment, in the present case the trite test can properly be applied: if the good is not dependent on the bad and can be separated from it, one gives effect to the good that remains after the separation if it still gives effect to the main objective of the statute. The test has two parts: first, is it possible to sever the invalid provisions and second, if so, is what remains giving effect to the purpose of the legislative scheme?"[190]

[161] Having concluded that it was not possible to sever the offending provisions from the relevant legislation without intruding into the legislative sphere, the Court in Coetzee opted to excise the provisions that dealt with the imprisonment of civil debtors. The Court was satisfied that, "in severing such provisions, the object of the statute will nevertheless remain to be carried out".[191] Here, severing the word "hurtful" from the impugned provision would still enable the objects of the Equality Act to be fulfilled.

[189] Corruption Watch NPC v President of the Republic of South Africa; Nxasana v Corruption Watch NPC [2018] ZACC 23; 2018 (2) SACR 442 (CC); 2018 (10) BCLR 1179 (CC) at para 68 and Fose v Minister of Safety and Security [1997] ZACC 6; 1997 (3) SA 786 (CC); 1997 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 19.

[190] Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa; Matiso v Commanding Officer Port Elizabeth Prison [1995] ZACC 7; 1995 (4) SA 631 (CC); 1995 (10) BCLR 1382 (CC) at para 16.

[191] Id at para 17.

[162] As stated, Parliament is obliged by section 9(4) of the Constitution to enact legislation to prohibit hate speech. The order of invalidity will be suspended for 24 months for Parliament to do the necessary. In the interim, section 10(1) must read:

> "Subject to the proviso in section 12, no person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words that are based on one or more of the prohibited grounds, against any person, that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to be harmful or to incite harm and to promote or propagate hatred."

[163] How does this affect the complaint against Mr Qwelane? That is the next aspect for consideration.

The complaint against Mr Qwelane

[164] The second issue to be determined by this Court is whether Mr Qwelane's statements constituted hate speech. In doing so, we need to consider this issue in light of the finding that paragraph (a) of section 10(1) of the Equality Act has been rendered unconstitutional. The unfortunate passing of Mr Qwelane does not render this aspect moot. The complaint in terms of the Equality Act, that the rights of the LGBT+ community had been infringed by the impugned statement, is live and must still be adjudicated.

[165] It cannot be gainsaid that members of the LGBT+ community were impacted negatively by Mr Qwelane's article. In unequivocally aligning himself with former President Mugabe's abominable comments, Mr Qwelane vilified the LGBT+ community as "animals", as less than human beings. Their sexual preferences and relations were degraded to bestiality. Mr Qwelane's article unabashedly exuded his loathing and revulsion. This can be discerned from:

(a) its accusation that members of the LGBT+ community are responsible for the rapid decay of societal values;

(b) the insinuation that their sexual choices are against the natural order of things and akin to bestiality;

(c) the claim that the LGBT+ community should be denied the right to marry; and

(d) its insinuation that they are not worthy of the protection of the law.

[166] An added aggravation is Mr Qwelane's deplorable subversion of the Constitution. He said:

> "I do pray that someday a bunch of politicians with their heads affixed firmly to their necks will muster the balls to rewrite the Constitution of this country, to excise those sections which give licence to men 'marrying' other men, and ditto women. Otherwise, at this rate, how soon before some idiot demands to 'marry' an animal, and argues that this Constitution 'allows' it?"

[167] Mr Qwelane was also unflinchingly unapologetic in the article, saying "[a]nd by the way, please tell the Human Rights Commission that I totally refuse to withdraw or apologise for my views. I will write no letters to the commission either, explaining my thoughts." This intransigence was perpetuated in his papers in which he contended that the article is "merely an expression of belief and opinion".

[168] It is critical to note that unfair discrimination against the LGBT+ community is not a new phenomenon. It has been prevalent since time immemorial. As Cameron opined extra-curially: "Apartheid South Africa was viciously homophobic – like most of the rest of Africa still is. Gays and lesbians, transgender people and gender non-conforming persons were persecuted, assaulted, sidelined and jailed."[192] In this sense, ensuring the LGBT+ community has equal social standing and public assurance against exclusion, hostility, discrimination and violence is part of the greater transformative constitutional project. In the present matter, homophobic speech is part and parcel of the broader system of homophobia and transphobia in South African society which includes both hate speech and violent crimes perpetrated against members of the LGBT+ community. Homophobic speech is not only problematic because it injures the dignity of members of the LGBT+ community, but also because it contributes to an environment that serves to delegitimise their very existence and their right to be treated as equals. Hate speech regulation in our country ought in my view to be grounded in the express anti-racist and anti-sexist tenets of our Constitution. In this respect, our jurisprudence is unique because of its strong pronouncements on the transformative nature of the Constitution and its aim of eradicating the remnants of our colonial and apartheid past.

[192] Cameron "How We Internalise Stigma and Shame" GroundUp (4 December 2019) available at https://www.groundup.org.za/article/how-we-internalise-stigma-and-shame/.

[169] It is appropriate to consider how, on previous occasions, our courts (and those around the world) have confronted the grotesque nature of unfair discrimination against the LGBT+ community. In National Coalition II, this Court observed:

> "Society at large has, generally, accorded far less respect to lesbians and their intimate relationships with one another than to heterosexuals and their relationships. The sting of past and continuing discrimination against both gays and lesbians is the clear message that it conveys, namely, that they, whether viewed as individuals or in their same-sex relationships, do not have the inherent dignity and are not worthy of the human respect possessed by and accorded to heterosexuals and their relationships. This discrimination occurs at a deeply intimate level of human existence and relationality. It denies to gays and lesbians that which is foundational to our Constitution and the concepts of equality and dignity, which at this point are closely intertwined, namely that all persons have the same inherent worth and dignity as human beings, whatever their other differences may be. The denial of equal dignity and worth all too quickly and insidiously degenerates into a denial of humanity and leads to inhuman treatment by the rest of society in many other ways. This is deeply demeaning and frequently has the cruel effect of undermining the confidence and sense of self-worth and self-respect of lesbians and gays."[193]

[170] In the Supreme Court of Appeal, Cameron JA explained:

> "Gays and lesbians are a permanent minority in society which in the past has suffered from patterns of disadvantage. . . . The impact of discrimination on them has been > severe, affecting their dignity, personhood and identity at many levels. The sting of the past and continuing discrimination against both gays and lesbians lies in the message it conveys, namely that, viewed as individuals or in their same sex relationships, they do not have the inherent dignity and are not worthy of the human respect possessed by and accorded to heterosexuals and their relationships. This denies to gays and lesbians that which is foundational to our Constitution and the concepts of equality and dignity, namely that 'all persons have the same inherent worth and dignity', whatever their other differences may be."[194]

[193] National Coalition II above n 68 at para 42.

[171] We were reminded in Prinsloo that:

> "Although one thinks in the first instance of discrimination on the grounds of race and ethnic origin, one should never lose sight in any historical evaluation of other forms of discrimination such as that which has taken place on the grounds of sex and gender. In our view unfair discrimination, when used in this second form in section 8(2), in the context of section 8 as a whole, principally means treating persons differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, who are inherently equal in dignity."[195]

[172] Jurisprudence emanating from the ECHR acknowledges hate speech committed against the LGBT+ community. Vejdeland concerned the applicants' conviction for distributing in a secondary school approximately 100 leaflets containing homophobic statements.[196] The ECHR found that the statements constituted serious and prejudicial allegations. It accepted that the applicants' right to freedom of expression was infringed by the conviction and so the key issues were whether the infringement was prescribed by law and whether it was necessary in a democratic society. The ECHR found that it met these two requirements: it pursued a legitimate aim, namely protecting the rights and reputation of others, and it was not disproportionate.[197] Therefore, there was no

[194] Fourie above n 67 at para 13.

[195] Prinsloo v Van der Linde [1997] ZACC 5; 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 31.

[196] Vejdeland above n 95 at para 8. The statements in the leaflets were, in particular, allegations that homosexuality was a "deviant sexual proclivity", had "a morally destructive effect on the substance of society" and was responsible for the development of HIV and AIDS.

[197] Id at paras 49 and 59. This was pursuant to Article 8 of the Swedish Penal Code, which pursued a legitimate aim of protecting the reputation and rights of others.

violation of Article 10 (the right to freedom of expression). Critically, the ECHR found that:

> "[I]nciting hatred does not necessarily entail a call for an act of violence, or other criminal acts. Attacks on persons committed by insulting, holding up to ridicule or slandering specific groups of the population can be sufficient for the authorities to favour combating racist speech in the face of freedom of expression exercised in an irresponsible manner. In this regard, the Court stresses that discrimination based on sexual orientation is as serious as discrimination based on 'race, origin or colour'."[198]

[173] More recently, in Beizaras and Levickas, two young men in a relationship posted a photograph on Facebook of them kissing, which prompted hundreds of online hate comments.[199] Notably, the ECHR found the prevalence of hate speech on the internet against the LGBT+ community to be widespread. The ECHR reiterated that "pluralism and democracy are built on genuine recognition of, and respect for, diversity. The harmonious interaction of persons and groups with varied identities is essential for achieving social cohesion."[200] The ECHR also noted that when it comes to hate speech, "this equally applies to hate speech against persons' sexual orientation and sexual life. The [ECHR] observe[d] that the instant case concerned undisguised calls to attack the applicants' physical and mental integrity."[201] In sum, the ECHR required the state to investigate online homophobic comments promoting violence against the LGBT+ community.

[174] In Lilliendahl,[202] the applicant had been convicted of having made hateful comments against the LGBT+ community. The ECHR found that hate speech against the LGBT+ community falls outside the scope of the right to freedom of expression, which is provided for in Article 10 of the Convention. Interestingly, the ECHR

[198] Id at para 55.

[199] Beizaras and Levickas v Lithuania no 41288/15, ECHR, 2020 at paras 9-10.

[200] Id at para 107.

[201] Id at para 128.

[202] Lilliendahl v Iceland, no 29297/18, ECHR, 2020.

provided guidance on infringements in terms of Article 17 (prohibition of the abuse of rights), read with Article 10.[203] Ultimately, the ECHR found that the comments constituted hate speech. It further found that, because of this, there had been a reasonable and justifiable limitation of the right to freedom of expression. Importantly, the case reveals the ECHR's continued condemnation of hate speech against the LGBT+ community.

[175] The Supreme Court of Canada expounded the type of harm inflicted by discrimination in respect of sexual orientation:

> "Perhaps most important is the psychological harm which may ensue from this state of affairs. Fear of discrimination will logically lead to concealment of true identity and this must be harmful to personal confidence and self-esteem. Compounding that effect is the implicit message conveyed by the exclusion, that gays and lesbians, unlike other individuals, are not worthy of protection. This is clearly an example of a distinction which demeans the individual and strengthens and perpetuates the view that gays and lesbians are less worthy of protection as individuals in Canada's society. The potential harm to the dignity and perceived worth of gay and lesbian individuals constitutes a particularly cruel form of discrimination."[204]

[203] Id, where the ECHR observed at para 33-6 that:

> "'Hate speech', as this concept has been construed in the Court's case-law, falls into two categories. . . . The first category of the Court's case-law on 'hate speech' is comprised of the gravest forms of 'hate speech', which the Court has considered to fall under Article 17 and thus excluded entirely from the protection of Article 10. As explained above, the Court does not consider the applicant's comments to fall into this category. The second category is comprised of 'less grave' forms of 'hate speech' which the Court has not considered to fall entirely outside the protection of Article 10, but which it has considered permissible for the Contracting States to restrict. . . . Into this second category, the Court has not only put speech which explicitly calls for violence or other criminal acts, but has held that attacks on persons committed by insulting, holding up to ridicule or slandering specific groups of the population can be sufficient for allowing the authorities to favour combating prejudicial speech within the context of permitted restrictions on freedom of expression. In cases concerning speech which does not call for violence or other criminal acts, but which the Court has nevertheless considered to constitute 'hate speech', that conclusion has been based on an assessment of the content of the expression and the manner of its delivery."

[204] Vriend v Alberta [1998] 1 SCR 493 at para 102. See also: Norris v Republic of Ireland, no 10581/83, ECHR, 1998 at para 21.

[176] In the context of hate speech, what must objectively be determined is whether Mr Qwelane's article could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to be harmful or to incite harm and to promote or propagate hatred. Important considerations in making that determination include: who the speaker is, the context in which the speech occurred and its impact, as well as the likelihood of inflicting harm and propagating hatred. These are the considerations I discuss next.

Identity and status of the speaker

[177] As alluded to, Mr Qwelane enjoyed significant stature as a seasoned journalist, commentator of note and a veteran of the liberation struggle. He wrote to a predominantly Black township audience which took his views seriously. In his oral evidence before the Equality Court, Mr Viljoen tellingly observed that at that time it was "damn hard to be gay and stay in a township". There was a clear intent on the part of Mr Qwelane to instigate hatred towards the LGBT+ community amongst his audience.

Context

[178] Mr Qwelane's article was written against the backdrop of the vile remarks of former President Mugabe,[205] which were approvingly referred to, as well as extraordinarily high levels of violent attacks against members of the LGBT+ community. This Court cannot ignore this backdrop.

The impact of the speech

[179] The speech comprised unadulterated vilification and debasement of the LGBT+ community. Its reach and impact were undeniably extensive and devastating. Apart from the flood of complaints to both the SAHRC and the Press Ombud, there is the deeply touching testimony of the witnesses, in particular Ms MN and Professor Nel.

[205] He called gays and lesbians "animals", said that they were "sub-human" and likened them to pigs and dogs. Former President Mugabe also called on Zimbabweans to hand gays and lesbians over to the police if they saw them in the street.

In this regard, Ms MN during her testimony lamented that she prays that courts come to their rescue and punish those who harass and unfairly discriminate against members of the LGBT+ community. Her poignant complaint that the law does not care about people like her has been alluded to. Ms MN testified that the physical attacks on her were accompanied by hateful slurs, while onlookers merely stood around and said that she must defend herself because she acts like a man. She testified that the unrelenting victimisation that she had experienced in her life made her feel that she had died inside, that she had "passed on".

[180] Professor Nel's evidence graphically demonstrated the strong correlation between the prevalence and tolerance of hate speech in a society and the prevalence of hate crimes perpetrated against vulnerable groups. He highlighted the severe effects of hate speech on the dignity and self-esteem of vulnerable groups, particularly LGBT+ communities, culminating in increased incidences of depression and suicide. Professor Nel explained that hate speech results in its victims internalising the notions of inferiority engendered by hate speech, suffering from self-doubt and self-loathing and often experiencing suicidal ideation. It prevents them from becoming fully functioning members of society.

The likelihood of inflicting harm and propagating hatred

[181] The likelihood of the infliction of harm and the propagation of hatred is beyond doubt. It is difficult to conceive of a more egregious assault on the dignity of LGBT+ persons. Their dignity as human beings, deserving of equal treatment, was catastrophically denigrated by a respected journalist in a widely read article. The harm to not only the already vulnerable targeted LGBT+ community, but also to our constitutional project, which seeks to create an inclusive society based on the values of equality, dignity and acceptance, is indubitable.

[182] There can be no question then that Mr Qwelane's statements constitute hate speech. Mr Qwelane was advocating hatred, as the article plainly constitutes detestation and vilification of homosexuals on the grounds of sexual orientation. He was publicly advocating for law reform in favour of the removal of legal protection for same sex marriages. In doing so, he was undermining the protection of the law, the dignity of the LGBT+ community and the public assurance of their decent treatment in society as human beings of equal worth, deserving of human dignity and the protection and enjoyment of the full panoply of rights under the Constitution. In the context of hate speech prohibitions as civil remedies, a proven causal link between the hateful expression and actual harm is not required. But should Mr Qwelane have incurred liability for this hate speech?

Mr Qwelane's liability in terms of the recrafted section 10(1)

[183] The Supreme Court of Appeal invoked the criminal law maxim nullum crimen nulla poena sine lege (no crime, no punishment without law), based on the principle of legality, for its finding that Mr Qwelane cannot be held liable on the SAHRC's complaint based on the new section crafted by it. It found that the only solution for the hate speech complaint was that Mr Qwelane should consider seeking rapprochement.

[184] In this matter, there is no impingement of the rule of law and the principle of legality and the typical concerns regarding retrospectivity are not triggered. This is simply because the recrafted provision does not take away or deprive Mr Qwelane of any existing rights that he had. Before the amendment of section 10, the elements of hate speech that were clear and constitutional were those in section 10(1)(b) and (c), and it is these provisions that Mr Qwelane fell foul of. Therefore, he could not have claimed that he was prejudiced by not knowing the law beforehand and that the hate speech prohibition did not exist at the time the article was published. The Holocaust Foundation correctly contended that "Mr Qwelane cannot be heard to say that he could not have been expected to know that he was susceptible to a hate speech complaint" and that "it is accordingly in no way analogous to a situation where a harsher punishment is imposed retrospectively for a crime committed, contrary to the reasoning of the [Supreme Court of Appeal]". During oral argument Mr Qwelane's counsel offered very little resistance to this proposition regarding the complaint.

[185] It would not be just and equitable to allow a person to escape liability in these circumstances. To do so would be to deny an effective remedy to vindicate the rights of the LGBT+ community. Other concerns are attenuated, since the Supreme Court of Appeal did not interfere with the evidence and factual findings of the High Court, except in one respect – the causal link between the article and physical or verbal attacks. As explained, a causal link is not a requirement for hate speech. In the premises, there are no cogent reasons for this Court not to accept the factual findings of the Equality Court.

[186] Based on both the old provision and the recrafted one, therefore, the article indubitably constitutes hate speech.

[187] As the preceding discussion shows, in the context of hate speech prohibitions as civil remedies, a proven causal link between the hateful expression and actual harm is not required. In any event, while a causal link between the article and specific incidents of violence against the LGBT+ community could not be demonstrated by the evidence, it cannot be gainsaid that the article penned by Mr Qwelane undeniably constituted vilification and detestation. The detailed narration of that evidence clearly illustrates the point.

[188] There is a reasonable apprehension that Mr Qwelane's article fueled the already burning anti-LGBT+ fire (alluded to by the witnesses) and galvanised further discrimination, hostility and violence against the LGBT+ community. This is particularly pertinent when, as contended by the Psychological Society, one considers the context when the article was published in 2008, which in turn fortifies a reasonable apprehension of harm. The Psychological Society points out that that period was characterised by an "extraordinarily high level of violence against the LGBT+ community in South Africa".

[189] The question of a causal link has an additional layer when considering hate speech against vulnerable targeted groups and their lived experiences. We must be mindful that there is reluctance in reporting incidences of violence perpetuated against members of the LGBT+ community, owing to concerns regarding secondary victimisation, the fear of future targets and the lack of trust in the criminal justice system.[206] Therefore, the lack of clear evidence of subsequent linked violent or hostile acts should not negate the harsh reality of vilification, enmity and outright hatred that members of the LGBT+ community continue to experience as a result of the article and similar types of hateful expressions.

[190] In the circumstances, just and equitable considerations demand that a person in the position of Mr Qwelane should not evade liability on the basis that a causal link between their article and incitement of harm cannot be established. Our law does not require such proof. It would adversely affect the rights of the LGBT+ community where there was a full-frontal attack on their dignity as a targeted group and the chipping away of the assurance of their place in society and protection against hostility, discrimination and violence. And, as explicated, none of Mr Qwelane's prevailing rights are being taken away. The Equality Court was correct in upholding the complaint against Mr Qwelane.

[191] A consequence of Mr Qwelane's unfortunate passing is that the personal apology ordered by the Equality Court can no longer be realised. The High Court ordered that:

> "The applicant (Mr Qwelane) is ordered to tender to the LGBTI community (in particular the homosexuals) an unconditional written apology within thirty (30) days of this order, or within such other period as the parties may agree pursuant to negotiation and settlement of the contents of such apology. The apology shall be published in one edition of a national Sunday newspaper of the same or equal circulation as the Sunday Sun newspaper, in order to receive the same publicity as the > offending statements. Thereafter proof of the publication of such written apology shall be furnished to this Court immediately."

[206] This was noted by Professor Nel as summarised by the Supreme Court of Appeal at para 30 of its judgment. In addition, see Brodie Femicide in South Africa (Kwela Books, Cape Town 2020) at 140-8, which draws up a timeline of media reporting of violence and hate crimes committed against black lesbians. The author notes at 137: "This may have been one of the factors which had inhibited, or which continued to inhibit, reporting of hate crimes and violence against lesbians – because of the very real fear that identifying the victim in one crime would implicate other women, and that this might make them targets in turn." Brodie proceeds to note at 139 that the reported cases in the news "did not represent the extent of such killings in real life. But, as above, there were a number of real deterrents to reporting these types of crimes (the risk of others becoming targets, the poor treatment of lesbian complainants by the police)."

[192] That personal remedy against the late Mr Qwelane falls away and it cannot be enforced against third parties. So too, the order of the High Court that the Registrar refer the matter to the Commissioner of the South African Police Service for investigation in terms of section 21(4) of the Equality Act.[207] But, for the reasons set out, the declaratory order of the High Court stands on a completely different footing. It reads:

> "The offending statements (made against the LGBTI community) are declared to be hurtful; harmful, incite harm and propagate hatred; and amount to hate speech as envisaged in section 10 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act No 4 of 2000."

[193] The test whether the article amounts to hate speech is objective. And the declaratory order will not only ameliorate the severe harm caused to the LGBT+ community, but will also convey a strong message of deterrence in respect of hate speech directed against members of that community. That harm is ongoing. The impugned article continues to contribute to an environment of intolerance that may further normalise discrimination and violence against members of the LGBT+ community. Without unequivocal disapprobation from this Court, the contents of the article will continue to haunt those who were – and are – the targets of its hatred.

[194] A declaratory order will meet the key objectives of the Equality Act, namely not to punish the wrongdoer, but to provide remedies for victims of hate speech and to vindicate their constitutional rights. Mr Qwelane's passing did not remove the harm caused by the article he penned. Relief under the Equality Act goes beyond holding

[207] The relevant order was at para 70.4 of the High Court judgment, and read as follows:

> "The Registrar of this Court is ordered to have the proceedings of this matter transcribed immediately and forwarded, with a copy of the revised judgment, to the Commissioner of the South African Police Service for further investigation as envisaged in section 21(4) of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Promotion Act 4 of 2000 (the Equality Act)."

perpetrators accountable – it feeds into our constitutional project of building a more tolerant society. Mr Qwelane's passing does not nullify this project. Furthermore, that order will ensure that South Africa complies with its obligations under international law to prohibit hate speech. Section 38 of the Constitution and section 21 of the Equality Act empower this Court to order any appropriate relief. The two sections do not envisage that a declaratory order is parochial or personal to the immediate parties – it does not require the parties to do anything and may therefore still be granted. Consequently, we must make a declaratory order. Of course, because of the excision of section 10(1)(a), it must differ from that of the High Court.

Costs

[195] The Equality Court ordered costs against Mr Qwelane and held that the Biowatch[208] principle did not persuade it to the contrary. The SAHRC supported this costs order and its underlying motivation. It seeks a similar order before us in respect of the costs here and in the preceding Courts. The reasons for the adverse costs order, as explicated by the Equality Court are:

(a) the manner in which Mr Qwelane litigated in that Court by electing not to come to Court and then failing to produce medical certificates in respect of his alleged ill-health, which he advanced as a reason for his absence from Court;

(b) his lack of remorse and grievous undermining of the Constitution; and

(c) the egregious nature and extent of his abuse of free speech.

[196] The Equality Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal erred in not applying Biowatch.[209] This misdirection by the Equality Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal warrants interference with the costs orders. I am of the view that, in properly applying [208] Biowatch Trust v Registrar Genetic Resources [2009] ZACC 14; 2009 (6) SA 232 (CC); 2009 (10) BCLR 1014 (CC) (Biowatch).

[209] Id.

Biowatch,[210] the costs order ought to reflect that Mr Qwelane is partially successful in his constitutional challenge of the impugned provision in this Court. But it bears consideration that this partial success emanates from Mr Qwelane's egregious violation of the rights of others that resulted in the Equality Court complaint, ultimately leading to him going to Court to vindicate his own rights. Mr Qwelane is consequently entitled to half of his costs. The State, represented here by the Minister, should pay those costs.

[197] As far as the SAHRC is concerned, it is a Chapter 9 institution constitutionally enjoined to strengthen democracy, and is bound to litigate where necessary to vindicate the rights of victims and survivors. As stated, the SAHRC received the largest number of complaints it has ever received in respect of a single incident. Given the circumstances, a costs order against the SAHRC is not appropriate and the Supreme Court of Appeal's adverse order against it should be set aside. The High Court's costs order in favour of the SAHRC must be confirmed and that should also be the outcome in respect of its costs in this Court and in the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Conclusion

[198] Section 10(1)(a) of the Equality Act is declared unconstitutional for vagueness and unjustifiably limiting section 16 of the Constitution. The Supreme Court of Appeal's declaration of invalidity is confirmed only to that limited extent. The complaint against Mr Qwelane is sustained, as section 10(b) and (c) of the Equality Act are constitutional, and it is in terms of these provisions that Mr Qwelane's abhorrent article constitutes hate speech.

Order

The following order is made:

1. In respect of the confirmation application:

[210] Id at para 43. The Court noted that "the general rule for an award of costs in constitutional litigation between a private party and the state is that if the private party is successful, it should have its costs paid by the State, and if unsuccessful, each party should pay its own costs."

(a) The declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 10(1) of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000 (Equality Act) made by the Supreme Court of Appeal is confirmed in the terms set out in paragraph (b).

(b) It is declared that section 10(1) of the Equality Act is inconsistent with section 1(c) of the Constitution and section 16 of the Constitution and thus unconstitutional and invalid to the extent that it includes the word "hurtful" in the prohibition against hate speech.

(c) The declaration of constitutional invalidity referred to in paragraph (b) takes effect from the date of this order, but its operation is suspended for 24 months to afford Parliament an opportunity to remedy the constitutional defect giving rise to constitutional invalidity.

(d) During the period of suspension of the order of constitutional invalidity, section 10 of the Equality Act will read as follows:

"(1) Subject to the proviso in section 12, no person may publish, propagate, advocate or communicate words that are based on one or more of the prohibited grounds, against any person, that could reasonably be construed to demonstrate a clear intention to be harmful or to incite harm and to promote or propagate hatred.

(2) Without prejudice to any remedies of a civil nature under this Act, the court may, in accordance with section 21(2)(n) and where appropriate, refer any case dealing with the publication, advocacy, propagation or communication of hate speech as contemplated in subsection (1), to the Director of Public Prosecutions having jurisdiction for the institution of criminal proceedings in terms of the common law or relevant legislation."

(e) The interim reading-in will fall away when the correction of the specified constitutional defect by Parliament comes into operation.

(f) Should Parliament fail to cure the defect within the period of suspension, the interim reading-in in paragraph (d) will become final.

2. In respect of the appeal against the hate speech complaint:

(a) Leave to appeal is granted.

(b) The appeal by the South African Human Rights Commission is upheld.

(c) The order of the Supreme Court of Appeal is set aside.

(d) The offending statements (made against the LGBT+ community) are declared to be harmful, and to incite harm and propagate hatred; and amount to hate speech as envisaged in section 10 of the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act No 4 of 2000.

3. In respect of the constitutionality challenge, the Minister of Justice is ordered to pay half of Mr Jonathan Dubula Qwelane's costs in the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and this Court.

4. Mr Jonathan Dubula Qwelane is ordered to pay the costs of the South African Human Rights Commission in the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal and in this Court.

For the Applicant:	M Oppenheimer and DC Ainslie instructed by Jurgens Bekker Attorneys
For the First Respondent:	T Ngcukaitobi SC, M Moropa, O Mokgotho and T Ramogale instructed by Bowman Gilfillan Incorporated
For the Second Respondent:	K Pillay SC and N Nyembe instructed by State Attorney, Pretoria
For the First Amicus Curiae:	W Trengove SC, C Steinberg, I Cloete and M Salukazana instructed by Edward Nathan Sonnenbergs Incorporated
For the Second Amicus Curiae:	K Hofmeyr, D Smit, H Cassim and L Buchler instructed by Webber Wentzel
For the Third Amicus Curiae:	F Hobden and B Pithey instructed by Women's Legal Centre Trust
For the Fourth Amicus Curiae:	B Meyersfeld instructed by Lawyers for Human Rights
For the Fifth Amicus Curiae:	SL Shangisa SC and MM Ka-Siboto instructed by Freedom of Expression Institute
For the Sixth Amicus Curiae:	AA Gabriel SC, B Winks and K Raganya instructed by Rupert Candy Incorporated
For the Seventh Amicus Curiae:	G Marcus SC, S Budlender SC and M Mbikiwa instructed by Webber Wentzel

Delwin Vriend, Gala-Gay and Lesbian Awareness Society of Edmonton, Gay and Lesbian Community Centre of Edmonton Society and Dignity Canada Dignité for Gay Catholics and Supporters Appellants

v.

Her Majesty The Queen in Right of Alberta and Her Majesty's Attorney General in and for the Province of Alberta Respondents

and

The Attorney General of Canada, the Attorney General for Ontario, the Alberta Civil Liberties Association, Equality for Gays and Lesbians Everywhere (EGALE), the Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF), the Foundation for Equal Families, the Canadian Human Rights Commission, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Bar Association — Alberta Branch, the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies (CASHRA), the Canadian AIDS Society, the Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Christian Legal Fellowship, the Alberta Federation of Women United for Families, the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada and Focus on the Family (Canada) Association Interveners

INDEXED AS: VRIEND v. ALBERTA

File No.: 25285.

1997: November 4; 1998: April 2.

Present: Lamer C.J. and L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka,* Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major and Bastarache JJ.

* Sopinka J. took no part in the judgment.

Delwin Vriend, Gala-Gay and Lesbian Awareness Society of Edmonton, le Gay and Lesbian Community Centre of Edmonton Society et Dignity Canada Dignité for Gay Catholics and Supporters Appelants

c.

Sa Majesté la Reine du chef de l'Alberta et le procureur général de la province de l'Alberta Intimés et

Le procureur général du Canada, le procureur général de l'Ontario, l'Alberta Civil Liberties Association, Égalité pour les gais et les lesbiennes (EGALE), le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes (FAEJ), la Foundation for Equal Families, la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne, le Congrès du travail du Canada, l'Association du Barreau canadien — Division de l'Alberta, l'Association canadienne des commissions et conseils des droits de la personne (ACCDP), la Société canadienne du SIDA, l'Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada, le Congrès juif canadien, le Christian Legal Fellowship, l'Alberta Federation of Women United for Families, l'Evangelical Fellowship of Canada et la Focus on the Family (Canada) Association Intervenants

RÉPERTORIÉ: VRIEND c. ALBERTA

N° du greffe: 25285.

1997: 4 novembre; 1998: 2 avril.

Présents: Le juge en chef Lamer et les juges L'Heureux-Dubé, Sopinka*, Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci, Major et Bastarache.

* Le juge Sopinka n'a pas pris part au jugement.

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL FOR ALBERTA

Practice — Standing — Charter challenge — Teacher's employment at college terminated because of his homosexuality — Provincial human rights legislation not including sexual orientation as prohibited ground of discrimination — Whether appellants have standing to challenge legislative provisions other than those relating to employment — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 15(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, preamble, ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Application — Legislative omission — Provincial human rights legislation not including sexual orientation as prohibited ground of discrimination — Whether Charter applies to legislation — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, s. 32(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2.

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Equality rights — Provincial human rights legislation not including sexual orientation as prohibited ground of discrimination — Whether non-inclusion of sexual orientation infringes right to equality — If so, whether infringement justified — Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 15(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, preamble, ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

Constitutional law — Charter of Rights — Remedies — Reading in — Non-inclusion of sexual orientation in provincial human rights legislation infringing right to equality — Whether sexual orientation should be read into legislation — Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52 — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, preamble, ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

The appellant V was employed as a laboratory coordinator by a college in Alberta, and was given a permanent, full-time position in 1988. Throughout his term of employment he received positive evaluations, salary increases and promotions for his work performance. In 1990, in response to an inquiry by the president of the college, V disclosed that he was homosexual. In early 1991, the college's board of governors adopted a position statement on homosexuality, and shortly thereafter, the president of the college requested V's resignation. V declined to resign, and his employment was terminated by the college. The sole reason given was his non-compliance with the college's policy on homosexual prac-

EN APPEL DE LA COUR D'APPEL DE L'ALBERTA

Pratique — Qualité pour agir — Contestation fondée sur la Charte — Professeur congédié par un collège en raison de son homosexualité — Orientation sexuelle non incluse dans les motifs de distinction interdits par la législation provinciale sur les droits de la personne — Les appelants ont-ils la qualité pour contester les dispositions législatives ne portant pas sur l'emploi? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 1, 15(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, préambule, art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Application — Omission du législateur — Orientation sexuelle non incluse dans les motifs de distinction interdits par la législation provinciale sur les droits de la personne — La Charte s'applique-t-elle à la législation? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 32(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2.

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Droits à l'égalité — Orientation sexuelle non incluse dans les motifs de distinction interdits par la législation provinciale sur les droits de la personne — La non-inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle porte-t-elle atteinte au droit à l'égalité? — Dans l'affirmative, l'atteinte est-elle justifiée? — Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 1, 15(1) — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, préambule, art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

Droit constitutionnel — Charte des droits — Réparation — Interprétation large — La non-inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle dans la législation provinciale sur les droits de la personne porte atteinte au droit à l'égalité — L'orientation sexuelle devrait-elle être tenue pour incluse dans la législation? — Loi constitutionnelle de 1982, art. 52 — Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, préambule, art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10, 16(1).

L'appelant V a été engagé comme coordonnateur de laboratoire par un collège albertain, et il a obtenu un poste permanent à temps plein en 1988. Pendant toute la durée de son emploi, son travail a été évalué favorablement, et son rendement lui a valu des augmentations de salaire et de l'avancement. En 1990, en réponse à une demande formulée par le président de l'établissement, V a révélé qu'il était homosexuel. Au début de 1991, le conseil des gouverneurs du collège a adopté un énoncé de principe sur l'homosexualité et, peu après, le président de l'établissement a demandé à V de démissionner. Ce dernier a refusé, et il a été congédié par le collège. Le seul motif donné pour justifier le congédiement était tice. V appealed the termination and applied for reinstatement, but was refused. He attempted to file a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission on the grounds that his employer had discriminated against him because of his sexual orientation, but the Commission advised V that he could not make a complaint under the Individual's Rights Protection Act (IRPA), because it did not include sexual orientation as a protected ground. V and the other appellants filed a motion in the Court of Queen's Bench for declaratory relief. The trial judge found that the omission of protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was an unjustified violation of s. 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. She ordered that the words "sexual orientation" be read into ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1) and 10 of the IRPA as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The majority of the Court of Appeal allowed the Alberta government's appeal.

Held (Major J. dissenting in part on the appeal): The appeal should be allowed and the cross-appeal dismissed. The preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA infringe s. 15(1) of the Charter and the infringement is not justifiable under s. 1. As a remedy, the words "sexual orientation" should be read into the prohibited grounds of discrimination in these provisions.

Per Lamer C.J. and Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Bastarache JJ.: The appellants have standing to challenge the validity of the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA. A serious issue as to constitutional validity is raised with respect to all these provisions. V and the other appellants also have a direct interest in the exclusion of sexual orientation from all forms of discrimination. Finally, the only other way the issue could be brought before the Court with respect to the sections of the Act other than those relating to employment would be to wait until someone is discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation in housing, goods and services, etc. and challenge the validity of the provision in each appropriate case. This would not only be wasteful of judicial resources, but also unfair in that it would impose burdens of delay, cost and personal vulnerability to discrimination for the individuals involved in those eventual cases. Since the provisions are all very similar and do not depend on any particular factual context in order le non-respect de la politique du collège en matière d'homosexualité. V en a appelé du congédiement et a demandé sa réintégration, ce qui lui a été refusé. Il a tenté de saisir l'Alberta Human Rights Commission d'une plainte dans laquelle il soutenait que son employeur avait fait preuve de discrimination à son égard en raison de son orientation sexuelle mais la commission a informé V qu'il ne pouvait formuler une plainte en application de l'Individual's Rights Protection Act (l'IRPA) parce que l'orientation sexuelle ne figurait pas au nombre des motifs de distinction illicites. V et les autres appelants ont présenté une requête à la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta en vue d'obtenir un jugement déclaratoire. Le juge de première instance a conclu que l'omission de protéger les citoyens contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle constituait une violation injustifiée de l'art. 15 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Elle a ordonné que «l'orientation sexuelle» soit tenue pour un motif de distinction illicite pour l'application des art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1) et 10 de l'IRPA. L'appel du gouvernement a été accueilli par la majorité des juges de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta.

Arrêt (le juge Major est dissident en partie quant au pourvoi principal): Le pourvoi principal est accueilli et le pourvoi incident est rejeté. Le préambule et les art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) de l'IRPA portent atteinte au par. 15(1) de la Charte et cette violation n'est pas justifiable en vertu de l'article premier. À titre de mesure corrective, les mots «orientation sexuelle» sont tenus pour inclus dans les motifs de distinction interdits par ces dispositions.

Le juge en chef Lamer et les juges Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci et Bastarache: Les appelants ont qualité pour contester la validité du préambule et des art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 et 16(1) de l'IRPA. Une question sérieuse est soulevée quant à la validité constitutionnelle de chacune de ces dispositions. V et les autres appelants ont également un intérêt direct à l'égard de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'ensemble des formes de discrimination. Enfin, la seule autre façon dont notre Cour pourrait être saisie de la question relativement aux autres dispositions de la Loi qui ne concernent pas l'emploi serait d'attendre qu'une personne soit victime de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle en matière d'habitation, de consommation et de services, etc. et qu'elle conteste la validité de la disposition pertinente. Ce serait non seulement peu rentable sur le plan des ressources judiciaires, mais également injuste pour les personnes en cause, parce qu'elles auraient à surmonter les obstacles que sont les délais, les frais et la vulnérabilité personnelle face à la discrimina-to resolve their constitutional status, there is really no need to adduce additional evidence regarding the provisions concerned with discrimination in areas other than employment.

The respondents' argument on their cross-appeal that because this case concerns a legislative omission, s. 15 of the Charter should not apply pursuant to s. 32 cannot be accepted. The threshold test that there be some "matter within the authority of the legislature" which is the proper subject of a Charter analysis has been met. The fact that it is the underinclusiveness of the IRPA which is at issue does not alter the fact that it is the legislative act which is the subject of Charter scrutiny in this case. Furthermore, the language of s. 32 does not limit the application of the Charter merely to positive actions encroaching on rights or the excessive excercise of authority. Where, as here, the challenge concerns an Act of the legislature that is underinclusive as a result of an omission, s. 32 should not be interpreted as precluding the application of the Charter. The application of the Charter to the IRPA does not amount to applying it to private activity. Since the constitutional challenge here concerns the IRPA, it deals with laws that regulate private activity, and not the acts of a private entity.

While this Court has not adopted a uniform approach to s. 15(1), in this case any differences in approach would not affect the result. The essential requirements of a s. 15(1) analysis will be satisfied by inquiring first, whether there is a distinction which results in the denial of equality before or under the law, or of equal protection or benefit of the law; and second, whether this denial constitutes discrimination on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground. The omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground in the IRPA creates a distinction that is simultaneously drawn along two different lines. The first is the distinction between homosexuals and other disadvantaged groups which are protected under the Act. Gays and lesbians do not have formal equality with reference to other protected groups, since those other groups are explicitly included and they are not. The second, more fundamental, distinction is between homosexuals and heterosexuals. The exclusion of the ground of sexual orientation, considered in the context of the social reality of discrimination against gays and lesbians, clearly has a disproportionate impact on them as opposed to heterosexuals. The IRPA in its underinclusive state therefore denies substantive equality to the former group. By reason of its underinclusive-

Dans le cadre de leur pourvoi incident, les intimés font valoir que, parce qu'il s'agit en l'espèce d'une omission du législateur, l'art. 15 de la Charte ne devrait pas s'appliquer en vertu de l'art. 32. Cet argument ne saurait être accepté. Il a été satisfait au critère préliminaire selon lequel il doit s'agir d'un «domaine relevant de [la] législature» lequel est le véritable sujet de l'analyse fondée sur la Charte. Que la portée trop limitative de l'IRPA soit en cause ne change rien au fait qu'en l'espèce, l'examen fondé sur la Charte porte sur l'acte législatif. En outre, le libellé de l'art. 32 n'a pas pour effet de limiter l'application de la Charte aux actions positives qui empiètent sur des droits ou à l'exercice abusif d'un pouvoir. Lorsque, comme en l'espèce, la contestation vise une loi adoptée par la législature qui est trop limitative en raison d'une omission, l'art. 32 ne devrait pas être interprété comme faisant obstacle à l'application de la Charte. Appliquer la Charte à l'IRPA ce n'est pas appliquer la Charte à une activité privée. Comme la présente contestation constitutionnelle porte sur l'IRPA, elle porte sur une loi qui régit l'activité privée et non sur les actes d'une entité privée.

Bien que la Cour n'ait pas adopté une approche uniforme à l'égard du par. 15(1), dans la présence espèce, toute différence pouvant exister quant à la méthode à employer relativement à cette disposition ne modifie en rien le résultat. Les exigences essentielles d'une analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) sont respectées si l'on se demande premièrement s'il y a une distinction entraînant la négation du droit à l'égalité devant la loi ou dans la loi ou la négation du droit à la même protection ou au même bénéfice de la loi et, deuxièmement, si cette négation constitue une discrimination fondée sur un motif énuméré au par. 15(1) ou sur un motif analogue. L'omission de l'orientation sexuelle dans les motifs de distinction interdits par l'IRPA établit une distinction et ce, sous deux rapports différents simultanément. Premièrement, une distinction est créée entre les homosexuels, d'une part, et les autres groupes défavorisés qui bénéficient de la protection de l'IRPA, d'autre part. Les homosexuels ne jouissent pas d'une égalité formelle par rapport aux autres groupes protégés puisque ceux-ci sont explicitement inclus alors que les homosexuels ne le sont pas. Deuxièmement, une distinction encore plus fondamentale est créée entre homosexuels et hétérosexuels. Compte tenu de la réalité sociale de la discriminess, the IRPA creates a distinction which results in the denial of the equal benefit and protection of the law on the basis of sexual orientation, a personal characteristic which is analogous to those enumerated in s. 15(1). This, in itself, is sufficient to conclude that discrimination is present and that there is a violation of s. 15. The serious discriminatory effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act reinforce this conclusion. The distinction has the effect of imposing a burden or disadvantage not imposed on others and of withholding benefits or advantages which are available to others. The first and most obvious effect of the exclusion of sexual orientation is that lesbians or gay men who experience discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation are denied recourse to the mechanisms set up by the IRPA to make a formal complaint of discrimination and seek a legal remedy. The dire and demeaning effect of denial of access to remedial procedures is exacerbated by the fact that the option of a civil remedy for discrimination is precluded and by the lack of success that lesbian women and gay men have had in attempting to obtain a remedy for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation by complaining on other grounds such as sex or marital status. Furthermore, the exclusion from the IRPA's protection sends a message to all Albertans that it is permissible, and perhaps even acceptable, to discriminate against individuals on the basis of their sexual orientation. Perhaps most important is the psychological harm which may ensue from this state of affairs. In excluding sexual orientation from the IRPA's protection, the government has, in effect, stated that "all persons are equal in dignity and rights" except gay men and lesbians. Such a message, even if it is only implicit, must offend s. 15(1).

The exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA does not meet the requirements of the Oakes test and accordingly cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter. Where a law has been found to violate the Charter owing to underinclusion, the legislation as a whole, the impugned provisions, and the omission itself are all properly considered in determining whether the legislative objective is pressing and substantial. In the absence of any submissions regarding the pressing and substantial nature of the objective of the omission at issue here, the respondents have failed to discharge their evidennation exercée contre les homosexuels, l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle a de toute évidence un effet disproportionné sur ces derniers par comparaison avec les hétérosexuels. En raison de sa portée trop limitative, l'IRPA nie donc aux homosexuels le droit à l'égalité réelle. De par sa portée trop limitative, l'IRPA crée une distinction qui conduit à la négation du droit au même bénéfice et à la même protection de la loi sur le fondement de l'orientation sexuelle reconnue comme étant une caractéristique personnelle analogue à celles énumérées au par. 15(1). En soi, cela suffit pour conclure qu'il y a discrimination et, partant, violation de l'art. 15. Les effets discriminatoires graves de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de la Loi renforcent cette conclusion. La distinction a pour effet d'imposer un fardeau ou un désavantage non imposé à d'autres et d'empêcher l'accès aux avantages offerts à d'autres. Le premier effet, et le plus évident, de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle est que les homosexuels victimes de discrimination fondée sur leur orientation sexuelle n'ont pas accès à la procédure établie par l'IRPA pour le dépôt d'une plainte officielle et l'obtention d'une réparation. Les conséquences tragiques et infamantes du non-accès aux recours prévus par la Loi sont exacerbées tant par l'exclusion de tout recours au civil que par le peu de succès qu'ont eu les homosexuels qui ont tenté d'obtenir réparation pour une discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle en invoquant d'autres motifs comme le sexe ou l'état matrimonial. Au surplus, l'exclusion de la protection de l'IRPA envoie à tous les Albertains le message qu'il est permis et, peut-être même, acceptable d'exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne sur le fondement de son orientation sexuelle. La souffrance psychologique est peut-être le préjudice le plus important dans de telles circonstances. En soustrayant à l'application de l'IRPA la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, le gouvernement a, dans les faits, affirmé que «chacun joui[t] de la même dignité et des mêmes droits», sauf les homosexuels. Un tel message, même s'il n'est que tacite, ne peut que violer le par. 15(1).

L'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA ne satisfait pas aux exigences du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Oakes et elle ne peut, en conséquence, être sauvegardée en vertu de l'article premier de la Charte. Lorsqu'une loi est jugée contraire à la Charte en raison de sa portée trop limitative, c'est tout à la fois la loi considérée dans son ensemble, les dispositions contestées ainsi que l'omission elle-même qu'il y a lieu de prendre en compte pour déterminer si l'objectif législatif est urgent et réel. Vu l'absence d'observations quant à la nature urgente et réelle de l'objectif de l'omission en cause, les tiary burden and their case must thus fail at this first stage of the s. 1 analysis. Even if the evidentiary burden were to be put aside in an attempt to discover an objective for the omission from the provisions of the IRPA, the result would be the same. Where, as here, a legislative omission is on its face the very antithesis of the principles embodied in the legislation as a whole, the Act itself cannot be said to indicate any discernible objective for the omission that might be described as pressing and substantial so as to justify overriding constitutionally protected rights.

Far from being rationally connected to the objective of the impugned provisions, the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act is antithetical to that goal. With respect to minimal impairment, the Alberta government has failed to demonstrate that it had a reasonable basis for excluding sexual orientation from the IRPA. Gay men and lesbians do not have any, much less equal, protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation under the IRPA. The exclusion constitutes total, not minimal, impairment of the Charter guarantee of equality. Finally, since the Alberta government has failed to demonstrate any salutary effect of the exclusion in promoting and protecting human rights, there is no proportionality between the attainment of the legislative goal and the infringement of the appellants' equality rights.

Reading sexual orientation into the impugned provisions of the IRPA is the most appropriate way of remedying this underinclusive legislation. When determining whether reading in is appropriate, courts must have regard to the twin guiding principles of respect for the role of the legislature and respect for the purposes of the Charter. The purpose of the IRPA is the recognition and protection of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of Albertans through the elimination of discriminatory practices. Reading sexual orientation into the offending sections would minimize interference with this clearly legitimate legislative purpose and thereby avoid excessive intrusion into the legislative sphere whereas striking down the IRPA would deprive all Albertans of human rights protection and thereby unduly interfere with the scheme enacted by the legislature. It is reasonable to assume that, if the legislature had been faced with the choice of having no human rights statute or having one that offered protection on the ground of sexual orientation, the latter option would have been chosen.

intimés ne se sont pas déchargés de leur fardeau de preuve et partant, n'ont pas réussi à franchir cette première étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier. Même si la question du fardeau de la preuve était écartée en vue de discerner l'objectif de l'omission dans les dispositions de l'IRPA, le résultat serait le même. Lorsque, comme en l'espèce, une omission du législateur est à première vue l'antithèse des principes qu'incarne le texte dans son ensemble, on ne peut dire que l'omission correspond à un objectif qui ressort de la Loi elle-même et qui serait urgent et réel, de telle sorte que soit justifiée une dérogation à des droits constitutionnellement protégés.

Loin d'être rationnellement liée à l'objectif des dispositions contestées, l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle en est l'antithèse. En ce qui concerne l'atteinte minimale, le gouvernement de l'Alberta n'a pas démontré qu'il avait un motif raisonnable d'exclure l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA. Cette loi ne confère aux homosexuels aucune protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, et encore moins une protection égale. Une telle exclusion constitue une atteinte intégrale, et non minimale, à la garantie d'égalité énoncée par la Charte. Enfin, comme le gouvernement de l'Alberta n'a pas établi quels bienfaits cette exclusion apportait à la promotion et à la protection des droits de la personne, il n'y a aucune proportionnalité entre l'atteinte de l'objectif législatif et la violation des droits à l'égalité des appelants.

L'inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle dans les dispositions contestées de l'IRPA par le recours à l'interprétation large est la meilleure façon de corriger la portée trop limitative de ce texte de loi. Lorsqu'ils examinent s'il convient d'adopter une interprétation large, les tribunaux doivent tenir compte de deux principes directeurs, savoir le respect du rôle du législateur et le respect des objets de la Charte. L'IRPA a pour objet de reconnaître et de protéger la dignité inhérente et les droits inaliénables des Albertains au moyen de l'élimination des pratiques discriminatoires. Le recours à l'interprétation large en vue d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle dans les dispositions fautives réduirait l'empiétement sur cet objet manifestement légitime et éviterait ainsi une ingérence excessive dans le domaine législatif, alors que l'annulation de l'IRPA priverait tous les Albertains de la protection des droits de la personne, ce qui modifierait indûment l'économie de la loi adoptée par le législateur. Il est raisonnable de supposer que si le législateur avait eu le choix entre renoncer à faire passer une loi relative aux droits de la personne ou en adopter une qui interdit la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, il aurait opté pour la deuxième solution.

Per L'Heureux-Dubé J.: There is general agreement with the results reached by the majority. While the approach to s. 1 is agreed with, the proper approach to s. 15(1) of the Charter is reiterated. Section 15(1) is first and foremost an equality provision. Its primary mission is the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration. A s. 15(1) analysis should focus on uncovering and understanding the negative impacts of a legislative distinction (including, as in this case, a legislative omission) on the affected individual or group, rather than on whether the distinction has been made on an enumerated or analogous ground. Integral to an inquiry into whether a legislative distinction is discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1) is an appreciation of both the social vulnerability of the affected individual or group, and the nature of the interest which is affected in terms of its importance to human dignity and personhood. Section 15(1) is engaged when the impact of a legislative distinction deprives an individual or group who has been found to be disadvantaged in our society of the law's protection or benefit in a way which negatively affects their human dignity and personhood. Although the presence of enumerated and analogous grounds may be indicia of discrimination, or may even raise a presumption of discrimination, it is in the appreciation of the nature of the individual or group who is being negatively affected that they should be examined.

Le juge L'Heureux-Dubé: Il y a accord pour l'essentiel avec les résultats auxquels parviennent les juges majoritaires. Bien que l'approche retenue à l'égard de l'article premier de la Charte recueille l'adhésion, la façon dont il convient d'aborder le par. 15(1) est exposée à nouveau. Cette disposition porte d'abord et avant tout sur l'égalité. Son objet principal est de favoriser l'existence d'une société où tous ont la certitude que la loi les reconnaît comme des êtres humains qui méritent le même respect, la même déférence et la même considération. L'analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) devrait principalement viser à détecter et à comprendre les incidences négatives d'une distinction législative (et notamment, comme en l'espèce, d'une omission du législateur) sur la personne ou le groupe concerné plutôt qu'à déterminer si la distinction en cause a été établie sur le fondement d'un motif énuméré ou d'un motif analogue. L'un des éléments essentiels de l'examen permettant de déterminer si une distinction législative est, de fait, discriminatoire au sens du par. 15(1) est la prise en compte tant de la vulnérabilité sociale de l'individu ou du groupe concerné que de la nature du droit auquel il est porté atteinte quant à son importance pour la dignité humaine et la personnalité. Le paragraphe 15(1) entre en jeu lorsque l'impact négatif d'une distinction législative prive une personne ou un groupe considéré comme défavorisé dans notre société de la protection et du bénéfice de la loi en portant atteinte à leur dignité humaine et à leur personnalité. Quoique les motifs énumérés et les motifs analogues puissent être des indices de discrimination ou puissent même donner naissance à une présomption de discrimination, c'est à l'étape de l'appréciation de la nature de la personne ou du groupe lésé qu'ils doivent être examinés.

Per Major J. (dissenting in part on the appeal): The Alberta legislature, having enacted comprehensive human rights legislation that applies to everyone in the province, has then selectively denied the protection of the Act to people with a different sexual orientation. No explanation was given for the exclusion of sexual orientation from the prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA, and none is apparent from the evidence filed by the province. The inescapable conclusion is that there is no reason to exclude that group from s. 7 of the Charter and to do so is discriminatory and offends their constitutional rights. The words "sexual orientation" should not be read into the Act, however. While reading in may be appropriate where it can be safely assumed that the legislature itself would have remedied the underinclusiveness by extending the benefit or protection to the previously excluded group, that assumption cannot be made in this appeal. It may be that the legislature would prefer no human rights Act over one that includes sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. As well, there are numerous ways in which the legislation could be amended to address the underinclusiveness. As an alternative, given the legislature's persistent refusal to protect against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, it may be that it would choose to override the Charter breach by invoking the notwithstanding clause in s. 33 of the Charter. In any event it should lie with the elected legislature to determine this issue. The offending sections should be declared invalid and the legislature provided with an opportunity to rectify them. The declaration of invalidity should be restricted to the employment-related provisions of the IRPA, namely ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10. While the same conclusions may apply to the remaining provisions of the IRPA, Charter cases should not be considered in a factual vacuum. The declaration of invalidity should be suspended for one year to allow the legislature an opportunity to bring the impugned provisions into line with its constitutional obligations.

Le juge Major (dissident en partie quant au pourvoi principal): La législature de l'Alberta, après avoir adopté une loi d'ensemble sur les droits de la personne qui s'applique à toutes les personnes dans la province, a ensuite sélectivement privé de la protection de la Loi les personnes ayant une orientation sexuelle différente. Aucune explication n'a été fournie pour expliquer l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs de distinction interdits par l'IRPA et aucune ne ressort de la preuve déposée par la province. On doit inévitablement conclure qu'il n'existe aucune raison d'exclure le groupe visé de l'art. 7 de la Charte, et une telle exclusion est discriminatoire et porte atteinte aux droits constitutionnels des personnes faisant partie de ce groupe. Toutefois, il n'y a pas lieu de recourir à l'interprétation large pour inclure les mots «orientation sexuelle» dans la Loi. Bien que l'interprétation large puisse être appropriée lorsque l'on peut supposer sans risque d'erreur que

Cases Cited

By Cory and Iacobucci JJ.

Referred to: Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513; Haig v. Canada (1992), 9 O.R. (3d) 495; McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229; Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679; Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418; Thibaudeau v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 627; Re Blainey and Ontario Hockey Association (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 513, leave to appeal refused, [1986] 1 S.C.R. xii; Dickason v. University of Alberta, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 1103; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315; Canadian Council of Churches v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 236; Mahe v. Alberta, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342; Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 839; Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995; Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313; Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624; RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573; Tremblay v. Daigle, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 530; Andrews v. Law Society of la législature elle-même aurait remédié à la nature trop limitative de la Loi en étendant le bénéfice ou la protection en question au groupe antérieurement exclu, une telle supposition ne peut être faite dans le présent pourvoi. Il se peut que la législature préfère ne pas adopter de loi sur les droits de la personne plutôt que d'en adopter une qui comprenne l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite. De même, il existe de nombreuses façons de modifier la Loi afin de remédier à sa nature trop limitative. Par ailleurs, vu qu'elle persiste dans son refus d'accorder une protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, la législature pourrait décider d'invoquer l'art. 33 de la Charte pour protéger les dispositions qui portent atteinte à la Charte. De toute façon, il incombe à la législature, dont les membres ont été élus, de trancher cette question. Il est préférable de déclarer invalides les dispositions fautives et de permettre à la législature de les rectifier. La déclaration d'invalidité devrait être limitée aux dispositions de l'IRPA relatives à l'emploi, soit les art. 7(1), 8(1) et 10. Bien que les mêmes conclusions puissent s'appliquer aux autres dispositions de l'IRPA, les causes fondées sur la Charte ne doivent pas être examinées dans un vide factuel. La déclaration d'invalidité devrait être suspendue pour une période d'un an afin de permettre à la législature de modifier les dispositions contestées de façon à les rendre conformes à ses obligations constitutionnelles.

Jurisprudence

Citée par les juges Cory et Iacobucci

Arrêts mentionnés: Egan c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 513; Haig c. Canada (1992), 9 O.R. (3d) 495; McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229; Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679; Miron c. Trudel, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 418; Thibaudeau c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 627; Re Blainey and Ontario Hockey Association (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 513, autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1986] 1 R.C.S. xii; Dickason c. Université de l'Alberta, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 1103; B. (R.) c. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 315; Conseil canadien des Églises c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1992] 1 R.C.S. 236; Mahe c. Alberta, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 342; Renvoi relatif à la Loi sur les écoles publiques (Man.), art. 79(3), (4) et (7), [1993] 1 R.C.S. 839; Haig c. Canada, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 995; Renvoi relatif à la Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alb.), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 313; Eldridge c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 624; SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 573; Tremblay c. Daigle, British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143; R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296; Benner v. Canada (Secretary of State), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 358; Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 241; Knodel v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991), 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 356; Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1219; Bliss v. Attorney General of Canada, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 183; R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295; Romer v. Evans, 116 S.Ct. 1620 (1996); R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103; RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199; Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927; Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22; R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697; Newfoundland (Human Rights Commission) v. Newfoundland (Minister of Employment and Labour Relations) (1995), 127 D.L.R. (4th) 694.

By L'Heureux-Dubé J.

Referred to: Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143; Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513; Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418.

By Major J. (dissenting in part)

Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679; Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145; MacKay v. Manitoba, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 357.

Statutes and Regulations Cited

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, ss. 1, 7, 15(1), 24(1), 32(1), 33.
Canadian Human Rights Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. H-6, s. 3(1).
Constitution Act, 1867, s. 92.
Constitution Act, 1982, s. 52(1).
Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, s. 718.2(a)(i) [ad. 1995, c. 22, s. 6].
Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. H-11.7, preamble, ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11.1, 16(1).
Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2 [am. 1985, c. 33; am. 1990, c. 23], preamble, ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11.1, 16(1).
Individual's Rights Protection Act, S.A. 1972 [am. 1980, c. 27], c. 2, ss. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 9.
Individual's Rights Protection Amendment Act, 1996, S.A. 1996, c. 25.

[1989] 2 R.C.S. 530; Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143; R. c. Turpin, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1296; Benner c. Canada (Secrétaire d'État), [1997] 1 R.C.S. 358; Eaton c. Conseil scolaire du comté de Brant, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 241; Knodel c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991), 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 356; Brooks c. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1219; Bliss c. Procureur général du Canada, [1979] 1 R.C.S. 183; R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295; Romer c. Evans, 116 S.Ct. 1620 (1996); R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103; RJR-MacDonald Inc. c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S. 199; Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927; Tétreault-Gadoury c. Canada (Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration), [1991] 2 R.C.S. 22; R. c. Keegstra, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 697; Newfoundland (Human Rights Commission) c. Newfoundland (Minister of Employment and Labour Relations) (1995), 127 D.L.R. (4th) 694.

Citée par le juge L'Heureux-Dubé

Arrêts mentionnés: Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143; Egan c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 513; Miron c. Trudel, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 418.

Citée par le juge Major (dissident en partie)

Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679; Hunter c. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 R.C.S. 145; MacKay c. Manitoba, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 357.

Lois et règlements cités

Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, art. 1, 7, 15(1), 24(1), 32(1), 33.
Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46, art. 718.2*a*)(i) [aj. 1995, ch. 22, art. 6].
Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. H-11.7, préambule, art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11.1, 16(1).
Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2 [mod. 1985, ch. 33; mod. 1990, ch. 23], préambule, art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11.1, 16(1).
Individual's Rights Protection Act, S.A. 1972 [mod. 1990, ch. 27], ch. 2, art. 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 9.
Individual's Rights Protection Amendment Act, 1996, S.A. 1996, ch. 25.
Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne, L.R.C. (1985), ch. H-6, art. 3(1).
Loi constitutionnelle de 1867, art. 92.
Loi constitutionnelle de 1982, art. 52(1).

Authors Cited

Ackerman, Bruce. "The Rise of World Constitutionalism" (1997), 83 Va. L. Rev. 771.

Alberta. Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel. Edmonton: Alberta Community Development, 1995.

Alberta Hansard, November 22, 1972, at p. 80-63.

Alberta Human Rights Review Panel. Equal in Dignity and Rights: A Review of Human Rights in Alberta. Edmonton: The Panel, 1994.

Beatty, David M. Constitutional Law in Theory and Practice. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1995.

Beatty, David M. "Law and Politics" (1996), 44 Am. J. Comp. L. 131.

Beatty, David M., ed. Human Rights and Judicial Review: A Comparative Perspective. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1994.

Bickel, Alexander M. The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics, 2nd ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1986.

Black, William. "Vriend, Rights and Democracy" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 126.

Dickson, R. G. B. "Keynote Address", in The Cambridge Lectures 1985. Montréal: Yvon Blais, 1985.

Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1980.

Hogg, Peter W., and Allison A. Bushell. "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75.

Jackman, Martha. "Protecting Rights and Promoting Democracy: Judicial Review Under Section 1 of the Charter" (1996), 34 Osgoode Hall L.J. 661.

Khullar, Ritu. "Vriend: Remedial Issues for Unremedied Discrimination" (1998), 7 N.J.C.L. 221.

Knopff, Rainer, and F. L. Morton. Charter Politics. Scarborough, Ont.: Nelson Canada, 1992.

Mandel, Michael. The Charter of Rights and the Legalization of Politics in Canada. Toronto: Wall & Thompson, 1994.

Monahan, Patrick. "A Theory of Judicial Review Under the Charter", in Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada. Toronto: Carswell, 1987, 97.

O'Byrne, Shannon K., and James F. McGinnis. "Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Plessy Revisited: Lesbian and Gay Rights in the Province of Alberta" (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 892.

Peacock, Anthony A., ed. Rethinking the Constitution: Perspectives on Canadian Constitutional Reform,

Doctrine citée

Ackerman, Bruce. «The Rise of World Constitutionalism» (1997), 83 Va. L. Rev. 771.

Alberta. Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel. Edmonton: Alberta Community Development, 1995.

Alberta Hansard, November 22, 1972, at p. 80-63.

Alberta Human Rights Review Panel. Equal in Dignity and Rights: A Review of Human Rights in Alberta. Edmonton: The Panel, 1994.

Beatty, David M. Constitutional Law in Theory and Practice. Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1995.

Beatty, David M. «Law and Politics» (1996), 44 Am. J. Comp. L. 131.

Beatty, David M., ed. Human Rights and Judicial Review: A Comparative Perspective. Dordrecht, The Netherlands: Martinus Nijhoff, 1994.

Bickel, Alexander M. The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics, 2nd ed. New Haven: Yale University Press, 1986.

Black, William. «Vriend, Rights and Democracy» (1996), 7 Forum constitutionnel 126.

Dickson, R. G. B. «Keynote Address», in The Cambridge Lectures 1985. Montréal: Yvon Blais, 1985.

Ely, John Hart. Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review. Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1980.

Hogg, Peter W., and Allison A. Bushell. «The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures» (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75.

Jackman, Martha. «Protecting Rights and Promoting Democracy: Judicial Review Under Section 1 of the Charter» (1996), 34 Osgoode Hall L.J. 661.

Khullar, Ritu. «Vriend: Remedial Issues for Unremedied Discrimination» (1998), 7 N.J.C.L. 221.

Knopff, Rainer, and F. L. Morton. Charter Politics. Scarborough, Ont.: Nelson Canada, 1992.

Mandel, Michael. La Charte des droits et libertés et la judiciarisation du politique au Canada. Traduit de l'anglais par Hervé Juste. Québec: Boréal, 1996.

Monahan, Patrick. «A Theory of Judicial Review Under the Charter», in Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada. Toronto: Carswell, 1987, 97.

O'Byrne, Shannon K., and James F. McGinnis. «Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Plessy Revisited: Lesbian and Gay Rights in the Province of Alberta» (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 892.

Peacock, Anthony A., ed. Rethinking the Constitution: Perspectives on Canadian Constitutional Reform,

Interpretation, and Theory. Don Mills, Ont.: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Pothier, Dianne. "The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application when the Legislature Declines to Speak" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 113.

Renke, Wayne N. "Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Discrimination, Burdens of Proof, and Judicial Notice" (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 925.

Roach, Kent. Constitutional Remedies in Canada. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1994 (loose-leaf updated November 1997, release 4).

Rogerson, Carol. "The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness". In Robert J. Sharpe, ed. Charter Litigation. Toronto: Butterworths, 1987, 233.

APPEAL and CROSS-APPEAL from a judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal (1996), 181 A.R. 16, 116 W.A.C. 16, 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 364, [1996] 5 W.W.R. 617, 132 D.L.R. (4th) 595, 18 C.C.E.L. (2d) 1, 96 C.L.L.C. ¶230-013, 25 C.H.R.R. D/1, 34 C.R.R. (2d) 243, [1996] A.J. No. 182 (QL), reversing a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench (1994), 152 A.R. 1, 18 Alta. L.R. (3d) 286, [1994] 6 W.W.R. 414, 94 C.L.L.C. ¶17,025, 20 C.H.R.R. D/358, [1994] A.J. No. 272 (QL), finding that the omission of protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation from the Alberta Individual's Rights Protection Act was an unjustified violation of s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Appeal allowed, Major J. dissenting in part. Cross-appeal dismissed.

Sheila J. Greckol, Douglas R. Stollery, Q.C., June Ross and Jo-Ann R. Kolmes, for the appellants.

John T. McCarthy, Q.C., and Donna Grainger, for the respondents.

Brian Saunders and James Hendry, for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada.

Robert E. Charney, for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario.

Shirish P. Chotalia and Brian A. F. Edy, for the intervener the Alberta Civil Liberties Association.

Interpretation, and Theory. Don Mills, Ont.: Oxford University Press, 1996.

Pothier, Dianne. «The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application when the Legislature Declines to Speak» (1996), 7 Forum constitutionnel 113.

Renke, Wayne N. «Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Discrimination, Burdens of Proof, and Judicial Notice» (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 925.

Roach, Kent. Constitutional Remedies in Canada. Aurora, Ont.: Canada Law Book, 1994 (loose-leaf updated November 1997, release 4).

Rogerson, Carol. «The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness». In Robert J. Sharpe, ed. Charter Litigation. Toronto: Butterworths, 1987, 233.

POURVOI PRINCIPAL et POURVOI INCIDENT contre un arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta (1996), 181 A.R. 16, 116 W.A.C. 16, 37 Alta. L.R. (3d) 364, [1996] 5 W.W.R. 617, 132 D.L.R. (4th) 595, 18 C.C.E.L. (2d) 1, 96 C.L.L.C. ¶230-013, 25 C.H.R.R. D/1, 34 C.R.R. (2d) 243, [1996] A.J. No. 182 (QL), qui a infirmé une décision de la Cour du Banc de la Reine (1994), 152 A.R. 1, 18 Alta. L.R. (3d) 286, [1994] 6 W.W.R. 414, 94 C.L.L.C. ¶17,025, 20 C.H.R.R. D/358, [1994] A.J. No. 272 (QL), portant que l'omission d'une protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle dans l'Individual's Rights Protection Act constitue une violation injustifiée du par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés. Pourvoi principal accueilli, le juge Major est dissident en partie. Pourvoi incident rejeté.

Sheila J. Greckol, Douglas R. Stollery, c.r., June Ross et Jo-Ann R. Kolmes, pour les appelants.

John T. McCarthy, c.r., et Donna Grainger, pour les intimés.

Brian Saunders et James Hendry, pour l'intervenant le procureur général du Canada.

Robert E. Charney, pour l'intervenant le procureur général de l'Ontario.

Shirish P. Chotalia et Brian A. F. Edy, pour l'intervenante l'Alberta Civil Liberties Association.

Cynthia Petersen, for the intervener Equality for Gays and Lesbians Everywhere (EGALE).

Gwen Brodsky and Claire Klassen, for the intervener Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF).

Raj Anand and Andrew M. Pinto, for the intervener the Foundation for Equal Families.

William F. Pentney and Patricia Lawrence, for the intervener the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

Steven M. Barrett and Vanessa Payne, for the intervener the Canadian Labour Congress.

James L. Lebo, Q.C., James F. McGinnis and Julia C. Lloyd, for the intervener the Canadian Bar Association — Alberta Branch.

Thomas S. Kuttner and Rebecca Johnson, for the intervener the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies (CASHRA).

R. Douglas Elliott and Patricia A. LeFebour, for the intervener the Canadian AIDS Society.

Dale Gibson, for the intervener the Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada.

Lyle S. R. Kanee, for the intervener the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Barbara B. Johnston, for the intervener Christian Legal Fellowship.

Dallas K. Miller, for the intervener the Alberta Federation of Women United for Families.

Gerald D. Chipeur and Cindy Silver, for the interveners the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada and Focus on the Family (Canada) Association.

The judgment of Lamer C.J. and Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci and Bastarache was delivered by Cynthia Petersen, pour l'intervenante Égalité pour les gais et les lesbiennes (EGALE).

Gwen Brodsky et Claire Klassen, pour l'intervenant le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes (FAEJ).

Raj Anand et Andrew M. Pinto, pour l'intervenante la Foundation for Equal Families.

William F. Pentney et Patricia Lawrence, pour l'intervenante la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne.

Steven M. Barrett et Vanessa Payne, pour l'intervenant le Congrès du travail du Canada.

James L. Lebo, c.r., James F. McGinnis et Julia C. Lloyd, pour l'intervenante l'Association du Barreau canadien — Division de l'Alberta.

Thomas S. Kuttner et Rebecca Johnson, pour l'intervenante l'Association canadienne des commissions et conseils des droits de la personne (ACCDP).

R. Douglas Elliott et Patricia A. LeFebour, pour l'intervenante la Société canadienne du SIDA.

Dale Gibson, pour l'intervenante l'Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada.

Lyle S. R. Kanee, pour l'intervenant le Congrès juif canadien.

Barbara B. Johnston, pour l'intervenant le Christian Legal Fellowship.

Dallas K. Miller, pour l'intervenante l'Alberta Federation of Women United for Families.

Gerald D. Chipeur et Cindy Silver, pour les intervenants l'Evangelical Fellowship of Canada et la Focus on the Family (Canada) Association.

Version française du jugement du juge en chef Lamer et des juges Gonthier, Cory, McLachlin, Iacobucci et Bastarache rendu par CORY AND IACOBUCCI JJ. — In these joint reasons Cory J. has dealt with the issues pertaining to standing, the application of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and the breach of s. 15(1) of the Charter. Iacobucci J. has discussed s. 1 of the Charter, the appropriate remedy, and the disposition.

CORY J.

The Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2 ("IRPA" or the "Act"), was first enacted in 1973. When the legislation was introduced in 1972, the Minister responsible commented upon and emphasized the nature and importance of the Act, stating: "it is . . . the commitment of this legislature that we regard The Individual's Rights Protection Act in primacy to any other legislative enactment. . . . [W]e have committed ourselves to suggest that Alberta is not the place for partial rights or half freedoms, but that Alberta hopefully will become the place where each and every man and woman will be able to stand on his own two feet and be recognized as an individual and not as a member of a particular class" (Alberta Hansard, November 22, 1972, at p. 80-63). These are courageous words that give hope and comfort to members of every group that has suffered the wounds and indignities of discrimination. Has this laudable commitment been met?

I. Factual Background

A. History of the IRPA

The IRPA prohibits discrimination in a number of areas of public life, and establishes the Human Rights Commission to deal with complaints of discrimination. The IRPA as first enacted (S.A. 1972, c. 2) prohibited discrimination in public notices (s. 2), public accommodation, services or facilities (s. 3), tenancy (s. 4), employment practices (s. 6), employment advertising (s. 7) or trade union membership (s. 9) on the basis of race, religious beliefs, colour, sex, marital status (in ss. 6 and 9), age (except in ss. 3 and 4), ancestry or place of origin. The Act has since been expanded to include other

LES JUGES CORY ET IACOBUCCI — Dans les présents motifs conjoints, le juge Cory examine les questions relatives à la qualité pour agir, à l'application de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés et à la violation de son par. 15(1). Pour sa part, le juge Iacobucci se penche sur l'article premier de la Charte et sur la réparation appropriée; il est en outre l'auteur du dispositif. 1

LE JUGE CORY

L'Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2 («l'IRPA» ou la «Loi»), a initialement été adoptée en 1973. En présentant le projet de loi en 1972, le ministre responsable a formulé certaines observations et a insisté sur la nature et l'importance de la Loi: [TRADUCTION] «. . . notre législature s'engage à reconnaître la primauté de l'Individual's Rights Protection Act sur tout autre texte législatif [. . .] [N]ous nous sommes engagés à montrer que l'Alberta n'est pas un territoire où des droits partiels ou des demi-libertés sont accordés, mais un lieu où, nous l'espérons, chacun, homme ou femme, pourra affirmer son autonomie et être reconnu en tant qu'individu et non en tant que membre d'une catégorie particulière» (Alberta Hansard, 22 novembre 1972, à la p. 80-63). Il s'agit de propos courageux qui suscitent l'espoir et apportent du réconfort aux membres de tous les groupes qui ont subi les blessures et les outrages de la discrimination. Ce noble engagement a-t-il été respecté? 2

I. Les faits

A. L'historique de l'IRPA

L'IRPA interdit la discrimination dans un certain nombre de domaines de la vie publique et elle prévoit la création de la Human Rights Commission pour l'examen des plaintes relatives à la discrimination. Dans sa version initiale (S.A. 1972, ch. 2), elle interdisait la discrimination dans les avis publics (art. 2), l'hébergement, les services et les équipements offerts au public (art. 3), la location (art. 4), les pratiques d'embauchage (art. 6), la publicité en matière d'emploi (art. 7) et l'activité syndicale (art. 9), sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de 3 grounds, in a series of amendments (S.A. 1980, c. 27; S.A. 1985, c. 33; S.A. 1990, c. 23; S.A. 1996, c. 25). These additions were apparently, at least in part, made in response to the enactment of the Charter and its judicial interpretation. In the most recent amendments the name of the Act was changed to the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act. In 1990, the Act included the following list of prohibited grounds of discrimination: race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry and place of origin. At the present time it also includes marital status, source of income and family status.

l'état matrimonial (art. 6 et 9), de l'âge (sauf les art. 3 et 4), de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine. Depuis, une série de modifications (S.A. 1980, ch. 27; S.A. 1985, ch. 33; S.A. 1990, ch. 23; S.A. 1996, ch. 25) a eu pour effet d'ajouter d'autres motifs à ceux déjà prévus. Ces ajouts faisaient apparemment suite, du moins en partie, à l'adoption de la Charte et à la jurisprudence s'y rapportant. Lors des plus récentes modifications, le titre de la Loi est devenu Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act. En 1990, la Loi énumérait les motifs de distinction illicites suivants: la race, les croyances religieuses, la couleur, le sexe, la déficience physique ou mentale, l'âge, l'ascendance et le lieu d'origine. Depuis, l'état matrimonial, la source de revenu et la situation familiale ont été ajoutés.

4 Despite repeated calls for its inclusion sexual orientation has never been included in the list of those groups protected from discrimination. In 1984 and again in 1992, the Alberta Human Rights Commission recommended amending the IRPA to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. In an attempt to effect such an amendment, the opposition introduced several bills; however, none went beyond first reading. Although at least one Minister responsible for the administration of the IRPA supported the amendment, the correspondence with a number of cabinet members and members of the Legislature makes it clear that the omission of sexual orientation from the IRPA was deliberate and not the result of an oversight. The reasons given for declining to take this action include the assertions that sexual orientation is a "marginal" ground; that human rights legislation is powerless to change public attitudes; and that there have only been a few cases of sexual orientation discrimination in employment brought to the attention of the Minister.

Malgré des demandes répétées en ce sens, l'orientation sexuelle n'a jamais figuré au nombre des motifs de distinction illicites. En 1984, et à nouveau en 1992, l'Alberta Human Rights Commission a recommandé de modifier l'IRPA pour y ajouter l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite. En vue d'obtenir une telle modification, l'opposition a présenté plusieurs projets de loi; cependant, aucun n'a franchi une étape ultérieure à la première lecture. Même si au moins un ministre responsable de l'administration de l'IRPA a appuyé la modification, la correspondance avec un certain nombre de membres du Cabinet et de députés établit clairement que l'omission de l'orientation sexuelle était délibérée, et non le résultat d'un oubli. Les raisons invoquées pour ne pas donner suite à la recommandation comprennent les suivantes: l'orientation sexuelle est un motif «marginal», la législation sur les droits de la personne ne peut modifier les mentalités et seulement un petit nombre de cas de discrimination dans l'emploi fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle ont été portés à l'attention du ministre.

5 In 1992, the Human Rights Commission decided to investigate complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. This decision was immediately vetoed by the Government and the Minister directed the Commission not to investigate the complaints.

En 1992, la Human Rights Commission a décidé de faire enquête sur les plaintes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Le gouvernement s'y est immédiatement opposé, et le ministre a interdit à la commission de mettre son projet à exécution.

In 1993, the Government appointed the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel to conduct a public review of the IRPA and the Human Rights Commission. When it had completed an extensive review, the Panel issued its report, entitled Equal in Dignity and Rights: A Review of Human Rights in Alberta (1994) (the "Dignity Report"). The report contained a number of recommendations, one of which was that sexual orientation should be included as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the Act. In its response to the Dignity Report (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel (1995)), the Government stated that the recommendation regarding sexual orientation would be dealt with through this case.

B. Vriend's Dismissal From King's College and Complaint to the Alberta Human Rights Commission

In December 1987 the appellant Delwin Vriend was employed as a laboratory coordinator by King's College in Edmonton, Alberta. He was given a permanent, full-time position in 1988. Throughout his term of employment he received positive evaluations, salary increases and promotions for his work performance. On February 20, 1990, in response to an inquiry by the President of the College, Vriend disclosed that he was homosexual. In early January 1991, the Board of Governors of the College adopted a position statement on homosexuality, and shortly thereafter, the President of the College requested Vriend's resignation. He declined to resign, and on January 28, 1991, Vriend's employment was terminated by the College. The sole reason given for his termination was his non-compliance with the policy of the College on homosexual practice. Vriend appealed the termination and applied for reinstatement, but was refused.

On June 11, 1991, Vriend attempted to file a complaint with the Alberta Human Rights Commission on the grounds that his employer discriminated against him because of his sexual orientation. On July 10, 1991, the Commission advised

En 1993, le gouvernement a confié à l'Alberta Human Rights Review Panel le mandat de procéder à un examen public de l'IRPA et de la Human Rights Commission. Après un examen approfondi, le comité a présenté son rapport intitulé Equal in Dignity and Rights: A Review of Human Rights in Alberta (1994) (le «rapport sur la dignité»). Celui-ci renfermait un certain nombre de recommandations, l'une d'entre elles étant l'inclusion dans la Loi de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite. Dans sa réponse au rapport sur la dignité (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel (1995)), le gouvernement a indiqué que le sort de la recommandation relative à l'orientation sexuelle dépendait de l'issue de la présente affaire. 6

B. Le congédiement de M. Vriend du King's College et la plainte à l'Alberta Human Rights Commission

En décembre 1987, l'appelant Delwin Vriend a été engagé comme coordonnateur de laboratoire au King's College d'Edmonton (Alberta). En 1988, il a obtenu un poste permanent à temps plein. Pendant toute la durée de son emploi, son travail a été évalué favorablement, et son rendement lui a valu des augmentations de salaire et de l'avancement. Le 20 février 1990, en réponse à une demande formulée par le président de l'établissement, M. Vriend a révélé qu'il était homosexuel. Au début de janvier 1991, le conseil des gouverneurs du King's College a adopté un énoncé de principe sur l'homosexualité et, peu après, le président de l'établissement a demandé à M. Vriend de démissionner. Ce dernier refusant de le faire, il a été congédié le 28 janvier 1991. Le seul motif donné pour justifier le congédiement était le non-respect de la politique du King's College en matière d'homosexualité. Monsieur Vriend en a appelé du congédiement et a demandé sa réintégration, ce qui lui a été refusé. 7

Le 11 juin 1991, M. Vriend a tenté de saisir l'Alberta Human Rights Commission d'une plainte dans laquelle il soutenait que son employeur avait fait preuve de discrimination à son égard en raison de son orientation sexuelle. Le 10 juillet suivant, la 8 commission a informé M. Vriend qu'il ne pouvait formuler une plainte en application de l'IRPA, l'orientation sexuelle ne figurant pas au nombre des motifs de distinction illicites.

Vriend that he could not make a complaint under the IRPA, because the Act did not include sexual orientation as a protected ground.

9 Vriend, the Gay and Lesbian Awareness Society of Edmonton (GALA), the Gay and Lesbian Community Centre of Edmonton Society and Dignity Canada Dignité for Gay Catholics and Supporters (collectively the "appellants") applied by originating notice of motion to the Court of Queen's Bench of Alberta for declaratory relief. The appellants challenged the constitutionality of ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1) and 8(1) of the IRPA on the grounds that these sections contravene s. 15(1) of the Charter because they do not include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The standing of the appellants to bring the application was not challenged. The trial judge found that the omission of protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation was an unjustified violation of s. 15 of the Charter. She ordered that the words "sexual orientation" be read into ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1) and 10 of the IRPA as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The majority of the Court of Appeal of Alberta granted the Government's appeal. The appellants were granted leave to appeal to this Court and the respondents were granted leave to cross-appeal. An order of the Chief Justice stating constitutional questions was issued on February 10, 1997.

Monsieur Vriend, la Gay and Lesbian Awareness Society of Edmonton (GALA), le Gay and Lesbian Community Centre of Edmonton Society et Dignity Canada Dignité for Gay Catholics and Supporters (collectivement appelés les «appelants») ont demandé à la Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta, par voie d'avis de requête introductive d'instance, de rendre un jugement déclaratoire. Les appelants contestaient la constitutionnalité des par. 2(1), 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que des art. 3 et 4 de l'IRPA, pour le motif que ceux-ci étaient contraires au par. 15(1) de la Charte en raison de l'omission de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite. La qualité pour agir des appelants n'a pas été contestée. Le juge de première instance a conclu que l'omission de protéger les citoyens contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle constituait une violation injustifiée de l'art. 15 de la Charte. Elle a ordonné que l'«orientation sexuelle» soit tenue pour un motif de distinction illicite pour l'application des art. 3, 4 et 10 ainsi que des par. 2(1), 7(1) et 8(1) de l'IRPA. L'appel du gouvernement a été accueilli par la majorité des juges de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta. Les appelants ont obtenu l'autorisation d'en appeler devant notre Cour, et les intimés ont été autorisés à interjeter un pourvoi incident. Une ordonnance du juge en chef énonçant les questions constitutionnelles soulevées en l'espèce a été rendue le 10 février 1997.

II. Relevant Statutory Provisions

II. Les dispositions législatives pertinentes

10 Since the time the appellant made his claim in 1992, the relevant statute was amended (Individual's Rights Protection Amendment Act, 1996, S.A. 1996, c. 25). The Act is now known as the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act. In these reasons, however, we refer to the statute, as amended, as the Individual's Rights Protection Act or IRPA, since that is how the legislation was most often referred to by the parties on this appeal. For the sake of convenience, the provisions are set out

La loi applicable a été modifiée (Individual's Rights Protection Amendment Act, 1996, S.A. 1996, ch. 25) depuis que l'appelant a présenté sa demande en 1992. Aujourd'hui le titre de la loi est Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act. Dans les présents motifs, toutefois, nous employons le titre Individual's Rights Protection Act ou l'abréviation IRPA pour la désigner puisque c'est le plus souvent ainsi que les parties y ont fait référence dans le présent pourvoi. Par souci de below first as they existed at the time the action commenced, and then as they currently stand.

commodité, nous reproduisons les dispositions applicables d'abord dans la version qui était en vigueur à l'époque où l'action a été intentée, puis dans la version actuelle.

Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, am. S.A. 1985, c. 33, S.A. 1990, c. 23

Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, mod. S.A. 1985, ch. 33, S.A. 1990, ch. 23

Preamble

[TRADUCTION] Préambule

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

ATTENDU QUE la reconnaissance de la dignité inhérente et des droits égaux et inaliénables de chacun constitue le fondement de la liberté, de la justice et de la paix dans le monde;

WHEREAS it is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and as a matter of public policy that all persons are equal in dignity and rights without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin; and

ATTENDU QUE l'Alberta reconnaît qu'il est fondamental et dans l'intérêt public que chacun jouisse de la même dignité et des mêmes droits sans égard à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance ou au lieu d'origine;

WHEREAS it is fitting that this principle be affirmed by the Legislature of Alberta in an enactment whereby those rights of the individual may be protected . . . .

ATTENDU QU'il est opportun que ce principe soit consacré par la législature de l'Alberta au moyen d'un texte législatif garantissant ces droits de la personne . . .

2(1) No person shall publish or display before the public or cause to be published or displayed before the public any notice, sign, symbol, emblem or other representation indicating discrimination or an intention to discriminate against any person or class of persons for any purpose because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin of that person or class of persons.

2(1) Nul ne doit publier, faire publier, exposer ni faire exposer un avis, un panneau, un symbole, un emblème ou une autre représentation marquant une discrimination ou l'intention d'exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes, à quelque fin que ce soit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'âge, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine de cette personne ou de cette catégorie de personnes.

3 No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of another, shall

3 Nul ne doit, directement ou indirectement, seul ou avec un tiers, personnellement ou par l'entremise d'un tiers, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes:

(a) deny to any person or class of persons any accommodation, services or facilities customarily available to the public, or

a) soit refuser à une personne ou à une catégorie de personnes l'hébergement, les services ou les équipements habituellement offerts au public;

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any accommodation, services or facilities customarily available to the public,

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes relativement à l'hébergement, aux services ou aux équipements habituellement offerts au public.

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, ancestry or place of origin of that person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons.

4 No person, directly or indirectly, alone or with another, by himself or by the interposition of another, shall

(a) deny to any person or class of persons the right to occupy as a tenant any commercial unit or self-contained dwelling unit that is advertised or otherwise in any way represented as being available for occupancy by a tenant, or

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any term or condition of the tenancy of any commercial unit or self-contained dwelling units,

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, ancestry or place of origin of that person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons.

7(1) No employer or person acting on behalf of an employer shall

(a) refuse to employ or refuse to continue to employ any person, or

(b) discriminate against any person with regard to employment or any term or condition of employment, because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry or place of origin of that person or of any other person.

(2) Subsection (1) as it relates to age and marital status does not affect the operation of any bona fide retirement or pension plan or the terms or conditions of any bona fide group or employee insurance plan.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a refusal, limitation, specification or preference based on a bona fide occupational requirement.

8(1) No person shall use or circulate any form of application for employment or publish any advertisement in connection with employment or prospective employment or make any written or oral inquiry of an applicant

4 Nul ne doit, directement ou indirectement, seul ou avec un tiers, personnellement ou par l'entremise d'un tiers, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes:

a) soit refuser de louer à une personne ou à une catégorie de personnes un local commercial ou un logement individuel annoncé ou par ailleurs offert en location;

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes relativement aux conditions de location d'un local commercial ou d'un logement individuel.

7(1) Nul employeur ni quiconque agissant pour son compte ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine:

a) soit refuser d'employer une personne ou refuser de continuer de l'employer;

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne en matière d'emploi ou de conditions d'emploi.

(2) En ce qui concerne l'âge et l'état matrimonial, le paragraphe (1) est sans effet sur l'application de tout régime de retraite légitime ou des modalités de tout régime d'assurance collective ou d'employés légitime.

(3) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux restrictions, aux conditions, aux préférences ni aux refus fondés sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée.

8(1) Nul ne doit utiliser ou mettre en circulation une formule de demande d'emploi, publier une annonce relative à un poste, existant ou éventuel, ni adresser par écrit ou de vive voix à un candidat une demande de renseignements qui:

(a) that expresses either directly or indirectly any limitation, specification or preference indicating discrimination on the basis of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry or place of origin of any person, or

(b) that requires an applicant to furnish any information concerning race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry or place of origin.

a) comporte, directement ou indirectement, une restriction, une condition ou une préférence marquant une discrimination fondée sur la race, les croyances religieuses, la couleur, le sexe, la déficience physique ou mentale, l'état matrimonial, l'âge, l'ascendance ou le lieu d'origine de qui que ce soit;

b) oblige le candidat à fournir de l'information relative à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'état matrimonial, à l'âge, à l'ascendance ou au lieu d'origine.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a refusal, limitation, specification or preference based on a bona fide occupational requirement.

(2) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux restrictions, aux conditions, aux préférences ni aux refus fondés sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée.

10 No trade union, employers' organization or occupational association shall

10 Nul syndicat, organisme professionnel et nulle association patronale, ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine d'une personne ou d'un adhérent:

(a) exclude any person from membership in it,

(b) expel or suspend any member of it, or

(c) discriminate against any person or member,

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry or place of origin of that person or member.

a) exclure une personne de ses rangs;

b) expulser ou suspendre un adhérent;

c) exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'un adhérent.

11.1 A contravention of this Act shall be deemed not to have occurred if the person who is alleged to have contravened the Act shows that the alleged contravention was reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances.

11.1 La personne à qui l'on reproche d'avoir enfreint la Loi est réputée ne pas y avoir contrevenu si elle établit que les actes reprochés étaient raisonnables et justifiables dans les circonstances.

16(1) It is the function of the Commission

(a) to forward the principle that every person is equal in dignity and rights without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin,

(b) to promote an understanding of, acceptance of and compliance with this Act,

(c) to research, develop and conduct educational programs designed to eliminate discriminatory practices related to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin, and

16(1) La commission a les attributions suivantes:

a) promouvoir le principe selon lequel chacun jouit de la même dignité et des mêmes droits sans égard à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance ou au lieu d'origine;

b) favoriser la compréhension, l'acceptation et le respect de la présente Loi;

c) faire de la recherche, ainsi que concevoir et mettre en œuvre des programmes d'éducation en vue de la suppression des pratiques discriminatoires fondées sur la race, les croyances religieuses, la couleur, le sexe, la déficience physique ou mentale, l'âge, l'ascendance ou le lieu d'origine;

(d) to encourage and co-ordinate both public and private human rights programs and activities.

Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. H-11.7

Preamble

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world;

WHEREAS it is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and as a matter of public policy that all persons are equal in: dignity, rights and responsibilities without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status;

WHEREAS multiculturalism describes the diverse racial and cultural composition of Alberta society and its importance is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and a matter of public policy;

WHEREAS it is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and as a matter of public policy that all Albertans should share in an awareness and appreciation of the diverse racial and cultural composition of society and that the richness of life in Alberta is enhanced by sharing that diversity;

WHEREAS it is fitting that these principles be affirmed by the Legislature of Alberta in an enactment whereby those equality rights and that diversity may be protected . . . .

2(1) No person shall publish, issue or display or cause to be published, issued or displayed before the public any statement, publication, notice, sign, symbol, emblem or other representation that

(a) indicates discrimination or an intention to discriminate against a person or a class of persons, or

d) encourager et coordonner la mise en œuvre de programmes et d'activités publics et privés en matière de droits de la personne;

Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. H-11.7

[TRADUCTION] Préambule

ATTENDU QUE la reconnaissance de la dignité inhérente et des droits égaux et inaliénables de chacun constitue le fondement de la liberté, de la justice et de la paix dans le monde;

ATTENDU QUE l'Alberta reconnaît qu'il est fondamental et dans l'intérêt public que tous soient égaux en ce qui concerne la dignité, les droits et les obligations, sans égard à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance, au lieu d'origine, à l'état matrimonial, à la source de revenu ou à la situation familiale;

ATTENDU QUE le multiculturalisme reflète la diversité raciale et culturelle de la société albertaine et que son importance est reconnue en Alberta à titre de principe fondamental et de question d'intérêt public;

ATTENDU QUE l'Alberta reconnaît qu'il est fondamental et dans l'intérêt public que tous les Albertains soient sensibilisés à la diversité raciale et culturelle de la société et la valorisent, et que la vie en Alberta est enrichie par l'ouverture à cette diversité;

ATTENDU QU'il est opportun que ces principes soient consacrés par la législature de l'Alberta au moyen d'un texte législatif protégeant ces droits à l'égalité et cette diversité . . .

2(1) Nul ne doit publier, exposer ou émettre en public, ni faire publier, exposer ou émettre en public une déclaration, une publication, un avis, un panneau, un symbole, un emblème ou une autre représentation qui

a) soit dénote une discrimination ou l'intention de faire une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'âge, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de l'état matrimonial, de la source de revenu ou de la situation familiale de cette personne ou de cette catégorie de personnes;

(b) is likely to expose a person or a class of persons to hatred or contempt

b) soit est susceptible d'exposer une personne ou une catégorie de personnes à la haine ou au mépris sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'âge, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de l'état matrimonial, de la source de revenu ou de la situation familiale de cette personne ou de cette catégorie de personnes.

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status of that person or class of persons.

3 No person shall

3 Nul ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de l'état matrimonial, de la source de revenu ou de la situation familiale d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes:

(a) deny to any person or class of persons any goods, services, accommodation or facilities that are customarily available to the public, or

a) soit refuser à cette personne ou à cette catégorie de personnes des biens, des services, l'hébergement ou l'accès à des équipements habituellement offerts au public;

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any goods, services, accommodation or facilities that are customarily available to the public,

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard de cette personne ou de cette catégorie de personnes relativement à des biens, des services, l'hébergement ou des équipements habituellement offerts au public.

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status of that person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons.

4 No person shall

4 Nul ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de l'état matrimonial, de la source de revenu ou de la situation familiale d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes:

(a) deny to any person or class of persons the right to occupy as a tenant any commercial unit or self-contained dwelling unit that is advertised or otherwise in any way represented as being available for occupancy by a tenant, or

a) soit refuser de louer à une personne ou à une catégorie de personnes un local commercial ou un logement individuel annoncé ou par ailleurs offert en location;

(b) discriminate against any person or class of persons with respect to any term or condition of the tenancy of any commercial unit or self-contained dwelling units,

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'une catégorie de personnes relativement aux conditions de location d'un local commercial ou d'un logement individuel.

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status of that person or class of persons or of any other person or class of persons.

7(1) No employer shall

(a) refuse to employ or refuse to continue to employ any person, or

(b) discriminate against any person with regard to employment or any term or condition of employment, because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry, place of origin, family status or source of income of that person or of any other person.

(2) Subsection (1) as it relates to age and marital status does not affect the operation of any bona fide retirement or pension plan or the terms or conditions of any bona fide group or employee insurance plan.

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a refusal, limitation, specification or preference based on a bona fide occupational requirement.

8(1) No person shall use or circulate any form of application for employment or publish any advertisement in connection with employment or prospective employment or make any written or oral inquiry of an applicant

(a) that expresses either directly or indirectly any limitation, specification or preference indicating discrimination on the basis of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry, place of origin, family status or source of income of any person, or

(b) that requires an applicant to furnish any information concerning race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry, place of origin, family status or source of income.

7(1) Nul employeur ne doit sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de la situation familiale ou de la source de revenu d'une personne ni de quiconque:

a) soit refuser d'employer ou refuser de continuer d'employer cette personne;

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard de cette personne en matière d'emploi ou de conditions d'emploi.

(2) En ce qui concerne l'âge et l'état matrimonial, le paragraphe (1) est sans effet sur l'application de tout régime de retraite légitime ou des modalités de tout régime d'assurance collective ou d'employés légitime.

(3) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux restrictions, aux conditions, aux préférences ni aux refus fondés sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée.

8(1) Nul ne doit utiliser ou mettre en circulation une formule de demande d'emploi, publier une annonce relative à un poste, existant ou éventuel, ni adresser par écrit ou de vive voix à un candidat une demande de renseignements qui:

a) soit comporte, directement ou indirectement, une restriction, une condition ou une préférence exprimant une discrimination fondée sur la race, les croyances religieuses, la couleur, le sexe, la déficience physique ou mentale, l'état matrimonial, l'âge, l'ascendance, le lieu d'origine, la situation familiale ou la source de revenu de qui que ce soit;

b) soit oblige le candidat à fournir de l'information relative à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'état matrimonial, à l'âge, à l'ascendance, au lieu d'origine, à la situation familiale ou à la source de revenu.

(2) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a refusal, limitation, specification or preference based on a bona fide occupational requirement.

10 No trade union, employers' organization or occupational association shall

(a) exclude any person from membership in it,

(b) expel or suspend any member of it, or

(c) discriminate against any person or member,

because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry, place of origin, family status or source of income of that person or member.

11.1 A contravention of this Act shall be deemed not to have occurred if the person who is alleged to have contravened the Act shows that the alleged contravention was reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances.

16(1) It is the function of the Commission

(a) to forward the principle that all persons are equal in: dignity, rights and responsibilities without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status,

(b) to promote awareness and appreciation of and respect for the multicultural heritage of Alberta society,

(c) to promote an environment in which all Albertans can participate in and contribute to the cultural, social, economic and political life of Alberta,

(d) to encourage all sectors of Alberta society to provide equality of opportunity,

(e) to research, develop and conduct educational programs designed to eliminate discriminatory practices related to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry, place of origin, marital status, source of income or family status,

(2) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux restrictions, aux conditions, aux préférences ni aux refus fondés sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée.

10 Nul syndicat, organisme professionnel et nulle association patronale, ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance, du lieu d'origine, de la situation familiale ou de la source de revenu d'une personne ou d'un adhérent:

a) exclure une personne de ses rangs;

b) expulser ou suspendre un adhérent;

c) exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne ou d'un adhérent.

11.1 La personne à qui l'on reproche d'avoir enfreint la Loi est réputée ne pas y avoir contrevenu si elle établit que les actes reprochés étaient raisonnables et justifiables dans les circonstances.

16(1) La commission a les attributions suivantes:

a) promouvoir le principe selon lequel tous sont égaux en ce qui concerne la dignité, les droits et les obligations, sans égard à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance, au lieu d'origine, à l'état matrimonial, à la source de revenu ou à la situation familiale;

b) promouvoir la sensibilisation au patrimoine multiculturel de la société albertaine, sa valorisation et son respect;

c) promouvoir un milieu où tous les Albertains peuvent participer et contribuer à la vie culturelle, sociale, économique et politique de l'Alberta;

d) inciter tous les secteurs de la société albertaine à offrir l'égalité des chances;

e) faire de la recherche, ainsi que concevoir et mettre en œuvre des programmes d'éducation en vue de la suppression des pratiques discriminatoires fondées sur la race, les croyances religieuses, la couleur, le sexe, la déficience physique ou mentale, l'âge, l'ascendance, le lieu d'origine, l'état matrimonial, la source de revenu ou la situation familiale;

(f) to promote an understanding of, acceptance of and compliance with this Act,

(g) to encourage and co-ordinate both public and private human rights programs and activities, and

(h) to advise the Minister on matters related to this Act.

Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms

1. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society.

15. (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

24. (1) Anyone whose rights or freedoms, as guaranteed by this Charter, have been infringed or denied may apply to a court of competent jurisdiction to obtain such remedy as the court considers appropriate and just in the circumstances.

32. (1) This Charter applies

(a) to the Parliament and government of Canada in respect of all matters within the authority of Parliament including all matters relating to the Yukon Territory and Northwest Territories; and (b) to the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province.

Constitution Act, 1982

52.(1) The Constitution of Canada is the supreme law of Canada, and any law that is inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution is, to the extent of the inconsistency, of no force or effect.

III. Decisions Below

A. Alberta Court of Queen's Bench (1994), 152 A.R. 1

f) promouvoir la compréhension, l'acceptation et le respect de la présente loi;

g) encourager et coordonner la mise en œuvre de programmes et d'activités publics et privés en matière de droits de la personne;

h) conseiller le ministre sur les questions se rapportant à la présente loi.

Charte canadienne des droits et libertés

1. La Charte canadienne des droits et libertés garantit les droits et libertés qui y sont énoncés. Ils ne peuvent être restreints que par une règle de droit, dans des limites qui soient raisonnables et dont la justification puisse se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique.

15. (1) La loi ne fait acception de personne et s'applique également à tous, et tous ont droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination, notamment des discriminations fondées sur la race, l'origine nationale ou ethnique, la couleur, la religion, le sexe, l'âge ou les déficiences mentales ou physiques.

24. (1) Toute personne, victime de violation ou de négation des droits ou libertés qui lui sont garantis par la présente charte, peut s'adresser à un tribunal compétent pour obtenir la réparation que le tribunal estime convenable et juste eu égard aux circonstances.

32. (1) La présente charte s'applique:

a) au Parlement et au gouvernement du Canada, pour tous les domaines relevant du Parlement, y compris ceux qui concernent le territoire du Yukon et les territoires du Nord-Ouest;

b) à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature.

Loi constitutionnelle de 1982

52. (1) La Constitution du Canada est la loi suprême du Canada; elle rend inopérantes les dispositions incompatibles de toute autre règle de droit.

III. Les décisions des tribunaux d'instance inférieure

A. Cour du Banc de la Reine de l'Alberta (1994), 152 A.R. 1

The appellants applied to Russell J., as she then was, for an order (1) declaring that ss. 2(1), 3, 4 and 7(1) of the IRPA are inconsistent with s. 15(1) of the Charter and infringe the appellants' rights, as a result of the absence of sexual orientation from the list of proscribed grounds of discrimination; (2) that Vriend has the right to file a complaint under the IRPA alleging discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation; and (3) that lesbians and gays have the right to the protections of the IRPA.

At the outset she found that the appellants had standing to challenge s. 10 as well as the other sections.

Russell J. was satisfied that the discrimination homosexuals suffer "is so notorious that [she could] take judicial notice of it without evidence" (p. 6). She went on to consider whether homosexuals are a discrete and insular minority entitled to protection under s. 15(1) of the Charter, and concluded that sexual orientation is properly considered an analogous ground under s. 15(1). This issue has since been resolved by the decision in Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513, which held that sexual orientation is an analogous ground.

Next, Russell J. considered whether the omission of sexual orientation under the IRPA constitutes discrimination under s. 15 of the Charter. She noted that it has been established that a discriminatory distinction in a law can arise from either a commission or an omission. The Ontario Court of Appeal in Haig v. Canada (1992), 9 O.R. (3d) 495, found that, considering the larger social, political and legal context, the omission of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act constituted discrimination offending s. 15(1) of the Charter. Russell J. agreed with this conclusion. She took note of the obiter comments of L'Heureux-Dubé J. in McKinney v. University of Guelph, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 229, at p. 436, that the provinces could prohibit discrimination on some Les appelants ont demandé au juge Russell, maintenant juge à la Cour d'appel, de rendre un jugement déclaratoire portant 1) que les art. 3 et 4 ainsi que les par. 2(1) et 7(1) de l'IRPA sont incompatibles avec le par. 15(1) de la Charte et violent leurs droits en raison de l'omission de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite, 2) que M. Vriend a le droit de formuler, en application de l'IRPA, une plainte pour discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle et 3) que les homosexuels ont droit à la protection de l'IRPA. 11

Tout d'abord, le juge Russell a conclu que les appelants avaient qualité pour contester la validité de l'art. 10 de même que celle des autres dispositions. 12

Elle s'est dite convaincue que la discrimination exercée contre les homosexuels [TRADUCTION] «est si notoire qu'il y aurait lieu, pour le tribunal, d'en prendre connaissance d'office, à l'exclusion de tout élément de preuve» (p. 6). Elle a examiné ensuite la question de savoir si les homosexuels constituaient une minorité distincte et isolée ayant droit à la protection prévue au par. 15(1) de la Charte et elle a conclu que l'orientation sexuelle est à juste titre considérée comme un motif analogue à ceux énumérés au par. 15(1). Cette question a été depuis lors tranchée dans l'arrêt Egan c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 513, où notre Cour a statué que l'orientation sexuelle constitue un motif analogue. 13

Le juge Russell s'est ensuite demandé si l'omission dans l'IRPA de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite constituait une discrimination en application de l'art. 15 de la Charte. Elle a rappelé qu'une distinction discriminatoire établie par la loi pouvait résulter soit d'une action, soit d'une omission. Dans l'arrêt Haig c. Canada (1992), 9 O.R. (3d) 495, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario, tenant compte du contexte social, politique et juridique plus général, a conclu que l'omission de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite dans la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne constituait une discrimination contraire au par. 15(1) de la Charte. Le juge Russell a souscrit à cette conclusion. Elle a pris note des remarques incidentes du juge L'Heureux-Dubé 14 grounds but not others without violating the Charter. However, in her opinion sexual orientation was related to sex or gender as a prohibited ground and "[w]hile there is no obligation on the Province to legislate to prohibit sexual discrimination, when it does so it must provide even-handed protection in a nondiscriminatory manner, or justify the exclusion" (p. 13).

dans l'arrêt McKinney c. Université de Guelph, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 229, à la p. 436, selon lesquelles les provinces pouvaient interdire la discrimination fondée sur certains motifs et non sur d'autres, sans violer pour autant la Charte. Toutefois, selon elle, l'orientation sexuelle est liée au sexe comme motif de distinction illicite et, [TRADUCTION] «[b]ien qu'elle n'ait pas l'obligation de légiférer pour interdire la discrimination sexuelle, lorsqu'elle le fait, la province doit garantir une protection égale de manière non discriminatoire, ou justifier l'exclusion» (p. 13).

15 Russell J. noted also that discrimination does not depend on a finding of invidious intent, and concluded (at pp. 13-14):

> Regardless of whether there was any intent to discriminate, the effect of the decision to deny homosexuals recognition under the legislation is to reinforce negative stereotyping and prejudice thereby perpetuating and implicitly condoning its occurrence. The facts in this case demonstrate that the legislation had a differential impact on the applicant Vriend. When his employment was terminated because of his personal characteristics he was denied a legal remedy available to other similarly disadvantaged groups. That constitutes discrimination contrary to s. 15(1) of the Charter.

Le juge Russell a fait remarquer par ailleurs qu'il n'était pas nécessaire de conclure à l'existence d'une intention d'exercer une discrimination odieuse pour qu'il y ait discrimination et elle a ajouté (aux pp. 13 et 14):

> [TRADUCTION] Peu importe qu'il y ait eu ou non intention d'exercer une discrimination, la décision du législateur de ne pas reconnaître les homosexuels dans la Loi a pour effet de renforcer les stéréotypes et préjugés négatifs et, par conséquent, de les perpétuer et de les tolérer tacitement. Il ressort des faits de cette affaire que la loi a eu un effet particulier sur l'appelant, M. Vriend. Lorsqu'il a été congédié sur la base de ses caractéristiques personnelles, il s'est vu privé du recours légal conféré aux membres d'autres groupes qui sont défavorisés de façon similaire. Il s'agit d'une discrimination portant atteinte au par. 15(1) de la Charte.

16 Turning to the s. 1 justification test, Russell J. held that since the Crown had failed to present any rationale to show that the violation was justified, it had failed to meet the requirements of s. 1. Even if the Crown were not required to show justification, she would have concluded that the violation was not justifiable. She found that the limitation was inconsistent with the objective and principles embodied in the preamble to the IRPA, and therefore, there was no legislative objective of pressing and substantial concern justifying the limitation. Russell J. further held that the denial of remedies provided by the IRPA was not rationally connected to the objective of protecting individual rights, and that, since the omission was complete, it did not represent minimal impairment.

En ce qui concerne la justification sous le régime de l'article premier, le juge Russell a conclu que le ministère public n'avait pas satisfait aux exigences de cette disposition, n'ayant présenté aucun élément susceptible de justifier la violation. Même si le ministère public n'avait pas été tenu d'établir la justification, elle aurait conclu que la violation n'était pas justifiable. Elle est arrivée à la conclusion que la limitation était incompatible avec l'objectif et les principes énoncés dans le préambule de l'IRPA, de sorte qu'aucun objectif législatif se rapportant à une préoccupation urgente et réelle ne la justifiait. Elle a conclu en outre que la négation des recours prévus par l'IRPA n'avait aucun lien rationnel avec l'objectif de protéger les droits individuels et que, l'omission étant totale, il ne s'agissait pas d'une atteinte minimale.

Russell J. reviewed the possible remedies under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982 that were set out in Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, and concluded that the only options in this case were striking down the legislation, with or without a suspension of the declaration of invalidity, or reading in. She decided that in this case, as in Haig, reading in was the most appropriate remedy. The omission was precisely defined and could be readily filled by reading in. As well, reading in was preferable because it left the objective of the legislation intact, was less intrusive than striking down, and would not have so great a budgetary impact as to substantially change the legislative scheme. Russell J. therefore ordered that the relevant sections of the Act be "interpreted, applied and administered as though they contained the words 'sexual orientation'" (p. 19).

Le juge Russell a examiné les mesures correctives possibles en vertu de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982 qui ont été énoncées dans l'arrêt Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 679, et elle a conclu que les seules solutions qui s'offraient en l'espèce étaient soit l'annulation des dispositions de la Loi, avec ou sans suspension de la déclaration d'invalidité, soit l'interprétation large. Elle a statué que, tout comme dans l'affaire Haig, l'interprétation large était la réparation la plus appropriée en l'espèce. L'omission était définie de manière précise et pouvait facilement être corrigée au moyen de l'interprétation large. Au surplus, cette dernière solution était préférable parce qu'elle préservait l'objectif de la Loi, empiétait moins que l'invalidation et n'avait pas de répercussions financières aussi importantes qu'une modification substantielle du texte législatif. Le juge Russell a donc ordonné que les dispositions pertinentes de la Loi soient [TRADUCTION] «interprétées et appliquées comme si les mots "orientation sexuelle" y figuraient» (p. 19). 17

B. Alberta Court of Appeal (1996), 181 A.R. 16

B. Cour d'appel de l'Alberta (1996), 181 A.R. 16

1. McClung J.A.

1. Le juge McClung

McClung J.A. held that the first question to be resolved was whether the IRPA is "answerable, as it stands" to the Charter (at p. 22). He was of the opinion that the omission of "sexual orientation" from the discrimination provisions of the IRPA does not amount to governmental action for the purpose of s. 32(1) of the Charter. In his view the provisions of the Charter could not force the legislature to enact a provision dealing with a "divisive" issue if it has chosen not to do so. He concluded that the province had not exercised its authority with respect to a matter so as to come within s. 32(1)(b) of the Charter.

Le juge McClung a conclu que la première question à trancher était de savoir si l'IRPA [TRADUCTION] «dans sa version actuelle, était visée» par la Charte (à la p. 22). Il s'est dit d'avis que l'omission de l'«orientation sexuelle» comme motif de distinction illicite n'équivalait pas à une action gouvernementale pour l'application du par. 32(1) de la Charte. Selon lui, les dispositions de la Charte ne pouvaient obliger la législature à adopter une disposition portant sur une question «controversée» lorsqu'elle avait décidé de ne pas le faire. Il a conclu que la province n'avait pas exercé son pouvoir dans un domaine de façon à être assujettie à l'al. 32(1)b) de la Charte. 18

McClung J.A. criticized the reasons of Russell J. as proceeding from the proposition that human rights legislation must perfectly "mirror" the Charter. He noted the existence of some variation among provinces with respect to the prohibited grounds of discrimination included in rights legislation, and stated that provinces must have latitude

Le juge McClung a critiqué les motifs du juge Russell parce qu'ils s'appuient sur la proposition voulant que les dispositions des lois sur les droits de la personne doivent «refléter» exactement celles de la Charte. Il a signalé l'existence de certaines différences entre les provinces pour ce qui concerne les motifs de distinction illicites prévus dans 19 in implementing their powers under s. 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867. To require all legislation to be consistent with the Charter would be a "debacle for the autonomy of provincial law-making" (p. 24).

20 Even if the omission by the legislature is subject to Charter scrutiny under s. 32(1), McClung J.A. found no violation of s. 15(1). In his opinion the IRPA neither drew any distinction between homosexuals and heterosexuals nor resulted in the imposition of burdens, limitations or disadvantages or the denial of benefits or opportunities with respect to homosexuals. He found that any inequality that may exist between homosexuals and heterosexuals exists independently of the IRPA; the statute is neutral and "neither confers nor denies benefits to, or withdraws protection from, any Canadian" (p. 29).

21 Although he found no violation of the Charter, McClung J.A. considered what the appropriate remedy would have been had there been a violation of the Charter. He disagreed with Russell J.'s decision to use the remedy of "reading in" and stated that the preferable response was to declare the Act unconstitutional and invalid, with a stay of the declaration to "permit legislative, not judicial, repair" (p. 29). McClung J.A. suggested that "reading up" constitutes an intrusion of the judiciary into the legislative domain which should be avoided whenever possible. Therefore, he would have, if necessary, declared the Act ultra vires, suspending this judgment for a period of one year to allow the legislature to address the defects in the IRPA. However, based on his reasons set out earlier he allowed the appeal.

2. O'Leary J.A.

22 O'Leary J.A. agreed with McClung J.A. that the appeal should be allowed but for different reasons. He assumed that the Charter applied to the IRPA les lois sur les droits de la personne, et il a dit que les provinces devaient avoir une marge de manœuvre dans l'exercice des pouvoirs que leur confère l'art. 92 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1867. Exiger que toute loi soit compatible avec la Charte [TRADUCTION] «sonnerait le glas de l'autonomie législative provinciale» (p. 24).

Même si l'omission du législateur pouvait faire l'objet d'un examen fondé sur la Charte en application du par. 32(1), le juge McClung a conclu qu'il n'y avait pas violation du par. 15(1). Selon lui, l'IRPA n'établissait pas de distinction entre les homosexuels et les hétérosexuels non plus qu'elle ne créait de fardeaux, de limitations ou d'inconvénients pour les homosexuels ni ne les privait d'avantages ou de possibilités. Il a conclu que toute inégalité pouvant exister entre homosexuels et hétérosexuels existait indépendamment de l'IRPA car cette dernière était neutre, et [TRADUCTION] «n'accordait ni ne refusait d'avantage à personne et ne privait aucun Canadien de sa protection» (p. 29).

Bien qu'il ait conclu à l'absence de violation de la Charte, le juge McClung s'est demandé quelle aurait été la réparation appropriée s'il y avait eu non-respect de la Charte. Il s'est dit en désaccord avec la décision du juge Russell de recourir à l'interprétation large et il a estimé qu'il était préférable de déclarer la Loi inconstitutionnelle et invalide, puis de suspendre la déclaration afin de [TRADUCTION] «permettre au législateur, plutôt qu'aux tribunaux, de corriger la situation» (p. 29). Le juge McClung a laissé entendre que l'interprétation large constituait un empiétement du pouvoir judiciaire sur le domaine législatif qui devait être évité dans la mesure du possible. Par conséquent, il aurait plutôt déclaré la Loi ultra vires et aurait suspendu ce jugement pour une période d'un an afin de permettre à la législature de remédier aux lacunes de l'IRPA. Cependant, pour les motifs indiqués précédemment, il a accueilli l'appel.

2. Le juge O'Leary

À l'instar du juge McClung, le juge O'Leary a conclu que l'appel devait être accueilli, mais pour des motifs différents. Il a tenu pour acquis que la and rested his conclusion on a finding that the IRPA does not create a distinction based on sexual orientation. In his opinion, therefore, there was no violation of s. 15(1).

Charte s'appliquait à l'IRPA et il a fondé sa décision sur le fait que, selon lui, la Loi n'établissait pas une distinction fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. À son avis, il n'y avait donc aucune violation du par. 15(1).

O'Leary J.A. looked at the "initial hurdle" of the s. 15(1) analysis, which is to show that "there are one or more provisions in the legislation which create, expressly or by 'adverse effect', a distinction between individuals which is contrary to s. 15(1)" (p. 40). This state of affairs is to be distinguished from one in which the social circumstances exist independently of the provision. According to O'Leary J.A. the IRPA's silence with respect to sexual orientation means that the Act makes no distinction between individuals on the basis of sexual orientation.

23 Le juge O'Leary s'est penché sur l'«obstacle initial» de l'analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) qui consiste à établir qu' [TRADUCTION] «une ou plusieurs dispositions de la loi créent entre des personnes, expressément ou en raison d'un "effet préjudiciable", une distinction qui est contraire au par. 15(1)» (p. 40). Il y a lieu de ne pas confondre avec une situation sociale dont l'existence n'a rien à voir avec l'adoption d'une disposition. Selon le juge O'Leary, en raison du silence de la l'IRPA au sujet de l'orientation sexuelle, aucune distinction n'était établie entre des personnes sur le fondement de l'orientation sexuelle.

He found that the IRPA only distinguishes between "the specified prohibited grounds of discrimination and the various potential grounds (including sexual orientation) which could be included but are not" (p. 42) and that this cannot be called a distinction on the basis of sexual orientation. As a result, O'Leary J.A. would allow the appeal and set aside the declaration made by the trial judge, on the basis that the IRPA does not create a distinction that offends s. 15(1).

24 Il a conclu que l'IRPA ne créait une distinction qu'entre [TRADUCTION] «les motifs de distinction illicites qu'elle prévoyait et les divers motifs qui auraient pu être interdits, mais ne l'étaient pas (dont l'orientation sexuelle)» (p. 42), et qu'il ne pouvait donc s'agir d'une distinction fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Par conséquent, le juge O'Leary était d'avis d'accueillir l'appel et d'annuler le jugement déclaratoire rendu par le juge de première instance, pour le motif que l'IRPA n'établissait aucune distinction contraire au par. 15(1).

3. Hunt J.A. (dissenting)

3. Le juge Hunt (dissidente)

Hunt J.A. partially agreed with the decision of Russell J., finding that ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10 of the IRPA violate s. 15(1) and are not saved by s. 1, but she found that reading in was not the appropriate remedy. With respect to the s. 15 violation, she reached the same conclusion as Russell J. but on slightly different reasoning, in part due to the decisions in Egan, supra, Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418, and Thibaudeau v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 627, which had by then been released.

25 Le juge Hunt était en partie d'accord avec la décision du juge Russell, et elle a conclu que les par. 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que l'art. 10 de l'IRPA violaient le par. 15(1) et n'étaient pas sauvegardés par l'article premier. Elle a estimé toutefois que l'interprétation large ne constituait pas la réparation appropriée. En ce qui concerne la violation de l'art. 15, elle est arrivée à la même conclusion que le juge Russell, mais à l'issue d'un raisonnement légèrement différent, en partie en raison des arrêts Egan, précité, Miron c. Trudel, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 418, et Thibaudeau c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 627, qui avaient alors été rendus.

26 At the outset, Hunt J.A. dismissed the argument that s. 15(1) was not applicable in this case because it concerned private activity. It is an Act of the legislature which is being attacked in this case, not private activity, and provincial legislation is clearly subject to the Charter.

27 Hunt J.A. disagreed with Russell J.'s characterization of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation as being "directly associated" with discrimination on the basis of gender and her analogy between this case and the cases of Re Blainey and Ontario Hockey Association (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 513 (C.A.), leave to appeal refused, [1986] 1 S.C.R. xii, and McKinney, supra, where protection was offered from discrimination on the basis of gender and age but only in a limited way.

28 She went on to examine the context and purpose of the law as well as its impact upon those to whom it applies and those whom it excludes. She found that the IRPA is a law that is dedicated to achieving equal treatment for all citizens of Alberta. The context is one of existing discrimination against a group which has suffered from historical disadvantage. Hunt J.A. concluded (at p. 58) that "[g]iven these considerations and the context here, it is my opinion that the failure to extend protection to homosexuals under the IRPA can be seen as a form of government action that is tantamount to approving ongoing discrimination against homosexuals. Thus, in this case, legislative silence results in the drawing of a distinction".

29 Therefore, Hunt J.A. would have concluded that there was a distinction drawn sufficient to find a potential violation of s. 15(1). In her opinion it was then "easy to conclude" (p. 59) that this distinction resulted in homosexuals as a group being denied equal benefit and protection of the law, since they are denied access to the IRPA's protection and enforcement process.

D'entrée de jeu, le juge Hunt a écarté l'argument voulant que le par. 15(1) ne s'applique pas en l'espèce parce qu'il était question d'une activité privée. C'était une loi de la législature et non une activité privée qui était contestée dans la présente affaire et la législation provinciale était clairement assujettie à la Charte.

Le juge Hunt n'est pas d'accord avec le juge Russell pour dire que la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle est «directement liée» à la discrimination fondée sur le sexe et qu'une analogie devait être faite entre la présente espèce et les arrêts Re Blainey and Ontario Hockey Association (1986), 54 O.R. (2d) 513 (C.A.), autorisation de pourvoi refusée, [1986] 1 R.C.S. xii, et McKinney, précité, où une protection était offerte contre la discrimination fondée sur le sexe et l'âge, mais seulement de façon limitée.

Elle a examiné ensuite le contexte et l'objet de l'IRPA, de même que son incidence sur les personnes auxquelles elle s'applique et sur celles qui sont exclues de son champ d'application. Elle a conclu que la Loi visait à assurer à tous les citoyens de l'Alberta un traitement égal et que le contexte était celui de l'existence d'une discrimination contre un groupe qui avait de tout temps été défavorisé. Le juge Hunt est arrivée à la conclusion suivante (à la p. 58): [TRADUCTION] «compte tenu de ces éléments et du contexte en l'espèce, je suis d'avis que le fait de ne pas accorder la protection de l'IRPA aux homosexuels peut être considéré comme une forme d'action gouvernementale qui équivaut à approuver qu'une discrimination continue d'être exercée contre les homosexuels. Ainsi, en l'espèce, le silence de la loi établit une distinction».

Le juge Hunt aurait donc statué que la distinction établie était suffisante pour conclure à la violation potentielle du par. 15(1). Selon elle, il était dès lors [TRADUCTION] «facile de conclure» (p. 59) que cette distinction niait aux homosexuels, en tant que groupe, le droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi, étant donné qu'ils ne pouvaient pas invoquer la protection de l'IRPA ni recourir au mécanisme prévu pour la faire respecter.

The next question was whether this distinction results in discrimination. Hunt J.A. found that according to any of the approaches set out in Egan, discrimination could be found in this case. The denial of the equal protection and benefit of the law here is purely on the basis of sexual orientation, not merit or need, and reinforces the stereotype that homosexuals are less deserving of protection and therefore less worthy of value as human beings. Even taking into account the relevance of the distinction to the goals of the legislation, it is "impossible to see how a statute based upon notions of the inherent dignity of all can have as a relevant legislative goal the unequal treatment of some members of society" on the grounds of their membership in a group (at p. 60). This is a case in which the functional values underlying the omission are themselves discriminatory.

30 La question qui se posait ensuite était de savoir si cette distinction engendrait une discrimination. Selon le juge Hunt, l'application de l'une ou l'autre des méthodes énoncées dans l'arrêt Egan permettait de conclure à l'existence d'une discrimination en l'espèce. La négation du droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi était, dans la présente affaire, purement fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, et non sur les mérites ou les besoins, et elle renforçait le stéréotype voulant que les homosexuels méritent moins d'être protégés et soient moins dignes d'être valorisés en tant qu'êtres humains. Même en analysant la pertinence de la distinction en fonction des objectifs de la loi, il est [TRADUCTION] «impossible de voir comment une loi fondée sur la notion de la dignité inhérente de chacun peut avoir, comme objectif législatif pertinent, le traitement inégal de certains membres de la société» en raison de leur appartenance à un groupe (à la p. 60). Il s'agit en l'espèce d'un cas où les valeurs fonctionnelles qui sous-tendent l'omission sont elles-mêmes discriminatoires.

Turning to s. 1 of the Charter, Hunt J.A. noted that the Crown had not presented any evidence concerning justification under s. 1. Hunt J.A. found the material in the Crown's factum inadequate to conduct a s. 1 analysis and thought that the paucity of the Crown's case on this matter would, of itself, support the conclusion of the trial judge that s. 1 justification had not been established. In any case, the omission could not satisfy the Oakes test for justification.

31 Relativement à l'article premier de la Charte, le juge Hunt a fait observer que le ministère public n'avait présenté aucune preuve pour justifier l'omission conformément à cette disposition. Elle a conclu que les éléments compris dans le mémoire du ministère public ne permettaient pas de procéder à une analyse fondée sur l'article premier et elle a estimé que le caractère ténu de la preuve du ministère public à cet égard appuyait en soi la conclusion du juge de première instance selon laquelle il n'a pas été établi que les dispositions incriminées sont justifiées conformément à l'article premier. De toute façon, l'omission ne pouvait satisfaire au critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Oakes en matière de justification.

Although she found an unjustifiable violation of s. 15(1), Hunt J.A. disagreed with the trial judge's choice of remedy. Hunt J.A. was of the opinion that the remedy should be limited to the situation presented in this case and the provisions most closely related to it, i.e. discrimination in employment (s. 7), employment notices (s. 8) and union membership (s. 10), respectively.

32 Bien qu'elle ait estimé injustifiable la violation du par. 15(1), le juge Hunt n'était pas d'accord avec la réparation accordée par le juge de première instance. Elle privilégiait plutôt une réparation ne s'appliquant qu'à la situation considérée en l'espèce et aux dispositions les plus directement visées, soit la discrimination liée à l'emploi (art. 7), les avis en matière d'emploi (art. 8) et l'activité syndicale (art. 10), respectivement.

33 While there were some arguments here in favour of reading in, Hunt J.A. was concerned whether reading in could be accomplished with sufficient precision, and about the possible impact of reading in on s. 7(2) of the IRPA, which concerns retirement, pension and insurance plans.

34 Hunt J.A. therefore concluded that the preferable remedy was to declare invalid ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10 of the IRPA to the extent of their inconsistency with the Charter. Since an immediate declaration of invalidity would remove protection from everyone, contrary to the Charter's objectives, she would have suspended the declaration of invalidity for a period of one year to allow the Legislature time to bring the IRPA into line with the Charter.

C. Alberta Court of Appeal Supplementary Reasons Regarding Costs (1996), 184 A.R. 351

35 O'Leary J.A. (McClung J.A. concurring) held that the circumstances in this case did not justify deviating from the customary rule of awarding costs to the successful party. O'Leary J.A. acknowledged that the court had discretion in awarding costs and that the public interest character of litigation could be used as an argument for depriving the successful litigant of costs. He noted, however, that such arguments had been rejected in some cases.

36 He therefore awarded the costs of the appeal on a party-and-party basis to the Crown, to include all reasonable disbursements except travelling and accommodation expenses, and including a fee in respect of its written submission on the issue of costs and a second counsel fee.

37 Hunt J.A. dissented. She noted that the decision of the Court of Appeal had involved a 2-1 split with three separate reasons for judgment, and that an important and novel point of law was at issue. She also noted several cases in which the courts

Malgré l'existence de certains éléments militant en faveur du recours à l'interprétation large, le juge Hunt s'est demandé si cette technique permettait une précision suffisante et quelle serait l'incidence possible de l'interprétation large sur le par. 7(2) de l'IRPA, qui porte sur les régimes de retraite, de pension et d'assurance.

Le juge Hunt est donc arrivée à la conclusion qu'il était préférable de déclarer invalides les par. 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que l'art. 10 de l'IRPA dans la mesure où ils sont incompatibles avec la Charte. Comme une déclaration d'invalidité d'application immédiate priverait tous les citoyens de protection, contrairement aux objectifs de la Charte, elle aurait suspendu l'application de la déclaration d'invalidité pour une période d'un an afin de permettre à la législature d'harmoniser la Loi avec la Charte.

C. Motifs supplémentaires de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta concernant les dépens (1996), 184 A.R. 351

Le juge O'Leary (avec l'appui du juge McClung) a statué que les circonstances de l'espèce ne justifiaient pas une entorse à la règle habituelle consistant à adjuger les dépens à la partie qui a gain de cause. Il a reconnu que la Cour d'appel avait un pouvoir discrétionnaire en la matière et que le caractère d'intérêt public de l'affaire pouvait être invoqué pour ne pas accorder les dépens à la partie qui a gain de cause. Il a fait cependant remarquer que cette avenue avait été écartée dans certaines affaires.

Il a donc adjugé au ministère public les dépens de l'appel sur la base des frais entre parties, ce qui inclut tous les débours raisonnables, sauf les frais de déplacement et d'hébergement, ainsi que les honoraires pour la présentation d'observations écrites sur la question des dépens et celle des honoraires d'un deuxième avocat.

Le juge Hunt, dissidente, a fait observer que la décision de la Cour d'appel était partagée à deux contre un, que les trois juges avaient rédigé des motifs distincts et qu'une question de droit à la fois importante et nouvelle était en cause. Elle a égale-have made no costs award, including Dickason v. University of Alberta, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 1103, B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 S.C.R. 315, and Canadian Council of Churches v. Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration), [1992] 1 S.C.R. 236.

ment relevé plusieurs affaires où aucuns dépens n'ont été adjugés, dont Dickason c. Université de l'Alberta, [1992] 2 R.C.S. 1103, B. (R.) c. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, [1995] 1 R.C.S. 315, et Conseil canadien des Églises c. Canada (Ministre de l'Emploi et de l'Immigration), [1992] 1 R.C.S. 236.

Hunt J.A. agreed that governments should not be assumed to have limitless resources, and that relative resources of the parties is not the critical factor. She also noted, however, that there is no program in Alberta to subsidize the pursuit of important Charter litigation, as there is at the federal level. This case was not only novel but was also one that could "truly be described as a test case", where the impact of the rule on the parties is of secondary importance to the settlement of the rule itself (at p. 358). Hunt J.A. was of the opinion that there was a "heavy public interest component" to the legal question (at p. 358).

38 Le juge Hunt a convenu que les ressources de l'État ne devaient pas être tenues pour illimitées et que les ressources relatives des parties ne constituaient pas le facteur déterminant. Elle a fait aussi valoir que, contrairement au niveau fédéral, l'Alberta n'était pas dotée d'un programme d'appui financier aux personnes qui saisissent les tribunaux de questions importantes liées à l'application de la Charte. Il s'agissait en l'espèce non seulement d'une affaire sans précédent, mais également d'une affaire qui pouvait [TRADUCTION] «véritablement être qualifiée de cause type», c'est-à-dire que l'établissement de la règle elle-même avait plus d'importance que son incidence sur les parties (à la p. 358). Selon le juge Hunt, la question juridique soulevée comportait un [TRADUCTION] «important volet d'intérêt public» (à la p. 358).

As a result of all of these factors, Hunt J.A. concluded that she would have awarded costs against the respondents (appellants in the Court of Appeal), notwithstanding their success on the appeal. However since the appellants (respondents in the Court of Appeal) in this case merely sought a no costs order that is the order she would have made.

39 Étant donné tous ces facteurs, le juge Hunt a conclu qu'il conviendrait de condamner les intimés (les appelants en cour d'appel) aux dépens, même s'ils avaient eu gain de cause en appel. Cependant, les appelants (intimés en cour d'appel) en l'espèce n'ayant demandé qu'une ordonnance sans frais, telle est l'ordonnance qu'elle aurait rendue.

IV. Issues

The constitutional questions which have been stated by this Court are:

1. Do (a) decisions not to include sexual orientation or (b) the non-inclusion of sexual orientation, as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, as am., now called the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. H-11.7,

IV. Les questions en litige

40 Les questions constitutionnelles énoncées par notre Cour sont les suivantes:

1. Est-ce que a) soit la décision de ne pas inclure l'orientation sexuelle, b) soit la non-inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle, en tant que motif de discrimination illicite dans le préambule et dans les art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 et 16(1) de l'Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, et ses modifications, intitulée maintenant Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. H-11.7, a pour effet de nier les droits garantis par infringe or deny the rights guaranteed by s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

2. If the answer to Question 1 is "yes", is the infringement or denial demonstrably justified as a reasonable limit pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

41 The parties have also raised issues with respect to standing, the application of the Charter and the appropriate remedy.

V. Analysis

A. Standing

42 The appellants seek to challenge the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA. The respondents on this appeal submitted that the appellants should have standing to challenge only the sections of the IRPA relating to employment, namely ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10, since the factual background of the case involves discrimination in employment. The Attorney General of Canada goes even further by arguing that the only provision at issue in this case is s. 7(1), which specifically addresses discrimination in employment practices.

43 The originating notice of motion filed by the appellants in the Court of Queen's Bench referred to ss. 2(1), 3, 4 and 7(1) of the IRPA. At trial, they were allowed to amend their application to include s. 10, which had been omitted as the result of an oversight. In making this decision, Russell J. applied the test for public interest standing from Canadian Council of Churches, supra, and concluded that the appellants had standing to challenge s. 10 as well. The way in which she articulated this conclusion implies that the appellants also had standing to challenge the other sections of the Act referred to in the originating notice. There is no reason to disagree with this assessment.

le par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou d'y porter atteinte?

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est «oui», est-ce que la négation ou l'atteinte peut être justifiée en tant que limite raisonnable au sens de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Les parties ont également soulevé certaines questions relativement à la qualité pour agir, à l'application de la Charte et à la réparation appropriée.

V. L'analyse

A. La qualité pour agir

Les appelants contestent la validité du préambule ainsi que celle des art. 3, 4 et 10 ainsi que des par. 2(1), 7(1), 8(1) et 16(1) de l'IRPA. Les intimés dans le cadre du présent pourvoi font valoir que les appelants ne devraient avoir qualité pour agir qu'à l'égard des dispositions de l'IRPA qui se rapportent à l'emploi, savoir les par. 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que l'art. 10, étant donné que les faits de l'affaire concernent la discrimination dans l'emploi. Le procureur général du Canada va même plus loin en soutenant que la seule disposition pertinente en l'espèce est le par. 7(1), qui vise expressément la discrimination dans les pratiques en matière d'emploi.

L'avis de requête introductive d'instance produit par les appelants au greffe de la Cour du Banc de la Reine renvoie aux art. 3 et 4 ainsi qu'aux par. 2(1) et 7(1) de l'IRPA. Pendant l'instruction, les appelants ont été autorisés à modifier leur demande afin d'y ajouter l'art. 10 qui avait été omis par inadvertance. Pour rendre cette décision, le juge Russell a appliqué le critère établi dans l'arrêt Conseil canadien des Églises, précité, pour déterminer s'il y avait lieu de reconnaître la qualité pour agir dans l'intérêt public, et elle a conclu que les appelants avaient aussi qualité pour contester l'art. 10. La formulation de cette conclusion donne à penser que les appelants avaient également qualité pour contester les autres dispositions de la Loi mentionnées dans l'avis de requête introductive d'instance. Aucun motif ne justifie une remise en question de cette évaluation.

In Canadian Council of Churches (at p. 253), it was stated that three aspects should be considered:

> First, is there a serious issue raised as to the invalidity of legislation in question? Second, has it been established that the plaintiff is directly affected by the legislation or if not does the plaintiff have a genuine interest in its validity? Third, is there another reasonable and effective way to bring the issue before the court?

It is my opinion that these criteria are met with respect to all of the provisions named by the appellants (the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1)).

A serious issue as to constitutional validity is raised with respect to all of these provisions. The issue is substantially the same for all of the provisions from which sexual orientation is excluded as a prohibited ground of discrimination. There is nothing in particular about s. 7(1) or ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10 that makes their validity any more questionable than the other provisions dealing with discrimination. The respondents argue that there is no serious issue as to the constitutional validity of the preamble and s. 16 (which sets out the functions of the Human Rights Commission), because those provisions do not confer any specific benefit or protection. Although neither of these two provisions directly confers a benefit or protection, arguably they do so indirectly. An omission from those provisions could well have at least some of the same effects as the omission of these rights from the other sections and therefore raises a serious issue of constitutional validity.

Further Vriend and the other appellants have a genuine and valid interest in all of the provisions they seek to challenge. Both Vriend as an individual and the appellant organizations have a direct interest in the exclusion of sexual orientation from all forms of discrimination. What is at issue here is the exclusion of sexual orientation as a protected ground from the IRPA and its procedures for the protection of human rights. This is not a case about employment discrimination as distinct from any other form of discrimination that occurs within the

Dans l'arrêt Conseil canadien des Églises (à la p. 253), notre Cour a dit que trois aspects devaient être considérés: 44

> Premièrement, la question de l'invalidité de la loi en question se pose-t-elle sérieusement? Deuxièmement, a-t-on démontré que le demandeur est directement touché par la loi ou qu'il a un intérêt véritable quant à sa validité? Troisièmement, y a-t-il une autre manière raisonnable et efficace de soumettre la question à la cour?

Je suis d'avis que ces critères sont respectés pour chacune des dispositions énumérées par les appelants (le préambule, les art. 3, 4 et 10, ainsi que les par. 2(1), 7(1), 8(1) et 16(1)).

Une question sérieuse est soulevée quant à la validité constitutionnelle de chacune de ces dispositions. La question se pose substantiellement de la même façon pour toutes les dispositions où l'orientation sexuelle est exclue des motifs de distinction illicites. La validité constitutionnelle du par. 7(1) ou des par. 7(1) et 8(1), ainsi que de l'art. 10, n'est pas davantage contestable que celle des autres dispositions relatives à la discrimination. Les intimés prétendent qu'aucune question sérieuse n'est soulevée quant à la validité constitutionnelle du préambule et de l'art. 16 (qui énonce les attributions de la Human Rights Commission), car ceux-ci ne confèrent aucune protection ni aucun avantage précis. Certes, ces dispositions ne confèrent pas directement un avantage ou une protection, mais on peut soutenir qu'elles le font de façon indirecte. Une omission dans ces dispositions pourrait bien avoir à tout le moins certains des effets d'une omission dans les autres dispositions, de sorte qu'elle soulève une question sérieuse sur le plan de la validité constitutionnelle. 45

En outre, M. Vriend et les autres appelants ont un intérêt véritable et valable à l'égard de l'ensemble des dispositions qu'ils cherchent à contester. Monsieur Vriend, en tant que particulier, et les organisations appelantes ont un intérêt direct à l'égard de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'ensemble des formes de discrimination. La question en litige en l'occurrence est l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif ouvrant droit à la protection de la Loi et aux recours que celle-ci prévoit pour la protection des droits de la per- 46 private sphere and is covered by provincial human rights legislation. Insofar as the particular situation and factual background of the appellant Vriend is relevant to establishing the issues on appeal, it is the denial of access to the complaint procedures of the Alberta Human Rights Commission that is the essential element of this case and not his dismissal from King's College. The particular issues relating to his loss of employment would be for the Human Rights Commission to resolve and do not form part of this appeal. It must also be remembered that Vriend is only one of four appellants. The other three are organizations which are generally concerned with the rights of gays and lesbians and their protection from discrimination in all areas of their lives. There is nothing to restrict their involvement in this appeal to matters of employment.

sonne. Il ne s'agit pas d'un cas de discrimination dans l'emploi par opposition aux autres formes de discrimination exercées dans le secteur privé et visées par les dispositions législatives provinciales sur les droits de la personne. Dans la mesure où la situation particulière de l'appelant M. Vriend et les faits de l'espèce sont pertinents pour établir quelles sont les questions soulevées par le pourvoi, c'est le non-accès à la procédure relative aux plaintes présentées à l'Alberta Human Rights Commission qui est l'élément essentiel de la présente affaire, et non le congédiement de l'appelant par le King's College. Il appartient à la Human Rights Commission d'examiner les questions relatives au congédiement, lesquelles sont étrangères au présent pourvoi. Il convient aussi de rappeler que M. Vriend n'est que l'un des quatre appelants. Les trois autres sont des organisations qui s'intéressent généralement aux droits des homosexuels et à leur protection contre la discrimination dans tous les domaines. Rien ne limite leur participation au présent pourvoi aux questions liées à l'emploi.

47 With respect to the third criterion, the only other way the issue could be brought before the Court with respect to the other sections would be to wait until someone is discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation in housing, goods and services, etc. and challenge the validity of the provision in each appropriate case. This would not only be wasteful of judicial resources, but also unfair in that it would impose burdens of delay, cost and personal vulnerability to discrimination for the individuals involved in those eventual cases. This cannot be a satisfactory result.

Pour ce qui concerne le troisième critère, la seule autre façon dont notre Cour pourrait être saisie de la question relativement aux autres dispositions serait d'attendre qu'une personne soit victime de discrimination fondée sur son orientation sexuelle en matière d'habitation, de consommation et de services, etc. et qu'elle conteste la validité de la disposition pertinente. Ce serait non seulement peu rentable sur le plan des ressources judiciaires, mais également injuste pour les personnes en cause, parce qu'elles auraient à surmonter les obstacles que sont les délais, les frais et la vulnérabilité personnelle face à la discrimination. Ce résultat ne saurait donner satisfaction.

48 As well it is important to recall that all of the provisions are very similar and do not depend on any particular factual context in order to resolve their constitutional status. The fact that homosexuals have suffered discrimination in all aspects of their lives was accepted in Egan, supra. It follows that there is really no need to adduce additional evidence regarding the provisions concerned with discrimination in areas other than employment.

Aussi, il importe de rappeler que toutes les dispositions se ressemblent beaucoup et que leur constitutionnalité ne dépend pas d'un contexte factuel particulier. Le fait que les homosexuels ont été victimes de discrimination dans tous les aspects de leur vie est reconnu dans l'arrêt Egan, précité. Il n'est donc vraiment pas nécessaire de produire des éléments de preuve supplémentaires quant aux dispositions relatives à la discrimination dans les autres domaines que l'emploi.

Therefore, the appellants have standing to challenge the validity of all of the provisions named in the constitutional questions, namely the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA.

B. Application of the Charter

1. Application of the Charter to a Legislative Omission

Does s. 32 of the Charter prohibit consideration of a s. 15 violation when that issue arises from a legislative omission?

The respondents (appellants on the cross-appeal) argue on their cross-appeal that because this case concerns a legislative omission, s. 15 of the Charter should not apply pursuant to s. 32. This submission cannot be accepted.

This issue is resolved simply by determining whether the subject of the challenge in this case is one to which the Charter applies pursuant to s. 32. Questions relating to the nature of the legislature's decision, its effect, and whether it is neutral, are relevant instead to the s. 15 analysis. The threshold test demands only that there is some "matter within the authority of the legislature" which is the proper subject of a Charter analysis. At this preliminary stage no judgment should be made as to the nature or validity of this "matter" or subject. Undue emphasis should not be placed on the threshold test since this could result in effectively and unnecessarily removing significant matters from a full Charter analysis.

Further confusion results when arguments concerning the respective roles of the legislature and the judiciary are introduced into the s. 32 analysis. These arguments put forward the position that courts must defer to a decision of the legislature not to enact a particular provision, and that the scope of Charter review should be restricted so that such decisions will be unchallenged. I cannot accept this position. Apart from the very problematic distinction it draws between legislative action

En conséquence, les appelants ont qualité pour contester la validité de toutes les dispositions mentionnées dans les questions constitutionnelles, soit le préambule, les art. 3, 4 et 10 ainsi que les par. 2(1), 7(1), 8(1) et 16(1) de l'IRPA. 49

B. L'application de la Charte

1. Application de la Charte à l'omission du législateur

L'article 32 de la Charte soustrait-il l'omission du législateur à l'application de l'art. 15? 50

Les intimés (les appelants dans le cadre du pourvoi incident) font valoir que, parce qu'il s'agit en l'espèce d'une omission du législateur, l'art. 15 de la Charte ne devrait pas s'appliquer en vertu de l'art. 32. Cette prétention ne saurait être acceptée. 51

Cette question est donc tranchée simplement en déterminant si l'objet de la contestation en l'espèce en est un auquel la Charte s'applique en vertu de l'art. 32. Les questions relatives à la nature de la décision prise par le législateur, à l'effet de cette décision et à son caractère neutre concernent plutôt l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 15. Le critère préliminaire exige seulement qu'il s'agisse d'un «domaine relevant de [la] législature» lequel est le véritable sujet de l'analyse fondée sur la Charte. À ce stade initial, aucune conclusion ne doit être tirée concernant la nature ou la validité de ce «domaine» ou de ce sujet. Il ne faut pas accorder une trop grande importance à l'application du critère préliminaire, car cela pourrait bien soustraire inutilement des domaines importants à une véritable analyse fondée sur la Charte. 52

Une confusion supplémentaire résulte des arguments avancés relativement aux rôles respectifs du législateur et des tribunaux dans le cadre de l'analyse afférente à l'art. 32. Selon ces arguments, les tribunaux doivent respecter la décision du législateur de ne pas adopter une disposition en particulier, et la portée de l'examen fondé sur la Charte devrait être limitée de façon qu'une telle décision ne puisse être contestée. Je ne peux accepter cette thèse. Outre la distinction très problématique faite 53

and inaction, this argument seeks to substantially alter the nature of considerations of legislative deference in Charter analysis. The deference very properly due to the choices made by the legislature will be taken into account in deciding whether a limit is justified under s. 1 and again in determining the appropriate remedy for a Charter breach. My colleague Iacobucci J. deals with these considerations at greater length more fully in his reasons.

54 The notion of judicial deference to legislative choices should not, however, be used to completely immunize certain kinds of legislative decisions from Charter scrutiny. McClung J.A. in the Alberta Court of Appeal criticized the application of the Charter to a legislative omission as an encroachment by the courts on legislative autonomy. He objected to what he saw as judges dictating provincial legislation under the pretext of constitutional scrutiny. In his view, a choice by the legislature not to legislate with respect to a particular matter within its jurisdiction, especially a controversial one, should not be open to review by the judiciary: "When they choose silence provincial legislatures need not march to the Charter drum. In a constitutional sense they need not march at all. . . . The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms was not adopted by the provinces to promote the federal extraction of subsidiary legislation from them but only to police it once it is proclaimed — if it is proclaimed" (pp. 25 and 28).

55 There are several answers to this position. The first is that in this case, the constitutional challenge concerns the IRPA, legislation that has been proclaimed. The fact that it is the underinclusiveness of the Act which is at issue does not alter the fact that it is the legislative act which is the subject of Charter scrutiny in this case. Furthermore, the language of s. 32 does not limit the application of the Charter merely to positive actions encroaching on rights or the excessive exercise of authority, as entre l'action et l'inaction du législateur, cet argument vise à modifier substantiellement la nature des considérations relatives au respect dû au législateur dans le cadre d'une analyse fondée sur la Charte. La retenue exercée à juste titre à l'égard des choix du législateur sera prise en compte d'abord pour décider si une limite est justifiée conformément à l'article premier et à nouveau pour déterminer la réparation qu'il convient d'accorder pour remédier à une violation de la Charte. Mon collègue le juge Iacobucci approfondit ces questions dans ses motifs.

La notion de retenue judiciaire envers les choix du législateur ne devrait cependant pas servir à soustraire certains types de décisions d'ordre législatif à tout examen fondé sur la Charte. Le juge McClung de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a critiqué l'application de la Charte à l'omission du législateur, qu'il voit comme un empiétement du pouvoir judiciaire sur le pouvoir législatif. Il s'est dit opposé à ce que les juges dictent les lois provinciales sous prétexte d'examen constitutionnel. À son avis, la décision du législateur de ne pas légiférer dans un domaine qui relève de sa compétence, spécialement un domaine controversé, devrait échapper à tout examen judiciaire: [TRADUCTION] «La législature provinciale qui opte pour le silence n'a pas à suivre la ligne tracée par la Charte. Sur le plan constitutionnel, elle n'a pas à suivre du tout.[. . .] Les provinces n'ont pas souscrit à la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés pour autoriser le gouvernement fédéral à établir des lois en leur lieu et place, mais seulement pour assujettir celles-ci à certaines exigences une fois qu'elles sont promulguées — si toutefois elles le sont» (pp. 25 et 28).

Plusieurs éléments peuvent être avancés pour réfuter cette proposition. Premièrement, la contestation constitutionnelle vise en l'espèce une loi dûment promulguée. Que la portée trop limitative de l'IRPA soit en cause ne change rien au fait qu'en l'occurence, l'examen fondé sur la Charte porte sur l'acte législatif. En outre, le libellé de l'art. 32 n'a pas pour effet de limiter l'application de la Charte aux actions positives qui empiètent sur des droits ou à l'exercice abusif d'un pouvoir, McClung J.A. seems to suggest. These issues will be dealt with shortly. Yet at this point it must be observed that McClung J.A.'s reasons also imply a more fundamental challenge to the role of the courts under the Charter, which must also be answered. This issue is addressed in the reasons of my colleague Iacobucci J. below, and that discussion need not be repeated here. However, at the present stage of the analysis it may be useful to clarify the role of the judiciary in responding to a legislative omission which is challenged under the Charter.

comme le juge McClung semble le laisser entendre. Je reviendrai sur ces questions un peu plus loin. Je tiens à signaler à ce stade-ci que les motifs du juge McClung impliquent également une remise en question plus fondamentale du rôle des tribunaux sous le régime de la Charte, à laquelle il faut réagir. Mon collègue le juge Iacobucci se penche sur la question dans ses motifs, et il n'y a pas lieu de reprendre ici l'analyse qu'il en fait. Toutefois, il peut être utile, à ce moment-ci, de clarifier le rôle des tribunaux appelés à se prononcer sur une omission du législateur contestée sur le fondement de la Charte.

It is suggested that this appeal represents a contest between the power of the democratically elected legislatures to pass the laws they see fit, and the power of the courts to disallow those laws, or to dictate that certain matters be included in those laws. To put the issue in this way is misleading and erroneous. Quite simply, it is not the courts which limit the legislatures. Rather, it is the Constitution, which must be interpreted by the courts, that limits the legislatures. This is necessarily true of all constitutional democracies. Citizens must have the right to challenge laws which they consider to be beyond the powers of the legislatures. When such a challenge is properly made, the courts must, pursuant to their constitutional duty, rule on the challenge. It is said, however, that this case is different because the challenge centres on the legislature's failure to extend the protection of a law to a particular group of people. This position assumes that it is only a positive act rather than an omission which may be scrutinized under the Charter. In my view, for the reasons that will follow, there is no legal basis for drawing such a distinction. In this as in other cases, the courts have a duty to determine whether the challenge is justified. It is not a question, as McClung J.A. suggested, of the courts imposing their view of "ideal" legislation, but rather of determining whether the challenged legislative act or omission is constitutional or not.

56 On prétend que le présent pourvoi constitue un affrontement entre le pouvoir des législatures démocratiquement élues d'adopter les lois qu'elles jugent appropriées et celui des tribunaux d'invalider ces lois ou de prescrire l'intégration de certains éléments à celles-ci. Il s'agit d'une façon trompeuse et erronée de présenter le litige. Ce ne sont tout simplement pas les tribunaux qui imposent des limites au législateur, mais bien la Constitution, que les tribunaux doivent interpréter. Il en est nécessairement ainsi dans toutes les démocraties constitutionnelles. Les citoyens doivent avoir le droit de contester les lois qui outrepassent à leur avis les pouvoirs d'une législature. Lorsqu'un tel recours est dûment exercé, les tribunaux sont constitutionnellement tenus de trancher. On prétend toutefois que la présente affaire se distingue parce que la contestation porte essentiellement sur le fait que le législateur n'a pas accordé la protection d'une loi à un groupe de personnes en particulier. Les tenants de cette théorie tiennent pour acquis que seule l'action positive, par opposition à l'omission, peut faire l'objet d'un examen fondé sur la Charte. Pour les motifs exposés ci-après, j'estime qu'une telle distinction n'a aucun fondement juridique. Dans toute affaire, y compris en l'espèce, les tribunaux ont l'obligation de déterminer si la contestation est justifiée. Contrairement à ce qu'a laissé entendre le juge McClung, il ne s'agit pas pour les tribunaux d'imposer leur vision de la législation «idéale», mais bien de déterminer la constitutionnalité de l'action ou de l'omission du législateur qui est attaquée.

57 McClung J.A.'s position that judicial interference is inappropriate in this case is based on the assumption that the legislature's "silence" in this case is "neutral". Yet, questions which raise the issue of neutrality can only be dealt with in the context of the s. 15 analysis itself. Unless that analysis is undertaken, it is impossible to say whether the omission is indeed neutral or not. Neutrality cannot be assumed. To do so would remove the omission from the scope of judicial scrutiny under the Charter. The appellants have challenged the law on the ground that it violates the Constitution of Canada, and the courts must hear and consider that challenge. If, as alleged, the IRPA excludes some people from receiving benefits and protection it confers on others in a way that contravenes the equality guarantees in the Charter, then the courts have no choice but to say so. To do less would be to undermine the Constitution and the rule of law.

La proposition du juge McClung selon laquelle l'intervention des tribunaux est inopportune en l'espèce s'appuie sur le postulat voulant que le «silence» du législateur soit «neutre» en l'occurrence. Or, les questions que soulève la prétendue neutralité ne peuvent être analysées que dans le contexte de l'art.15, à défaut de quoi on ne saurait dire si l'omission est neutre ou non. La neutralité ne peut être présumée, sinon l'omission échapperait à l'examen judiciaire fondé sur la Charte. Les appelants ont contesté la loi pour le motif qu'elle viole la Constitution du Canada, et les tribunaux doivent statuer sur leurs allégations. Si, comme le soutiennent les appelants, l'IRPA prive certaines personnes des avantages et de la protection qu'elle accorde à d'autres et ce, d'une façon qui va à l'encontre des droits à l'égalité garantis par la Charte, les tribunaux n'ont d'autre choix que de rendre un jugement en ce sens. Se soustraire à cette obligation compromettrait la Constitution et la primauté du droit.

58 Let us now consider the substance of the respondents' position on this issue.

Examinons maintenant les points essentiels de la thèse des intimés sur la question.

59 The respondents contend that a deliberate choice not to legislate should not be considered government action and thus does not attract Charter scrutiny. This submission should not be accepted. They assert that there must be some "exercise" of "s. 32 authority" to bring the decision of the legislature within the purview of the Charter. Yet there is nothing either in the text of s. 32 or in the jurisprudence concerned with the application of the Charter which requires such a narrow view of the Charter's application.

Les intimés prétendent que le choix délibéré de ne pas légiférer ne doit pas être assimilé à une action gouvernementale et, par conséquent, ne peut faire l'objet d'un examen fondé sur la Charte. Cette thèse ne saurait être retenue. Les intimés font valoir qu'il doit y avoir un certain «exercice» du pouvoir dans un «domaine visé à l'art. 32» pour que la Charte s'applique à la décision de la législature. Or, ni le libellé de l'art. 32 ni la jurisprudence relative à l'application de la Charte n'exigent une telle limitation du champ d'application de la Charte.

60 The relevant subsection, s. 32(1)(b), states that the Charter applies to "the legislature and government of each province in respect of all matters within the authority of the legislature of each province". There is nothing in that wording to suggest that a positive act encroaching on rights is required; rather the subsection speaks only of matters within the authority of the legislature. Dianne Pothier has correctly observed that s. 32 is "worded broadly enough to cover positive obligations on a legislature such that the Charter will be L'alinéa 32(1)b) dit que la Charte s'applique «à la législature et au gouvernement de chaque province, pour tous les domaines relevant de cette législature». Rien n'indique qu'une action positive empiétant sur des droits soit nécessaire; en fait, l'alinéa parle uniquement des domaines relevant de cette législature. Dianne Pothier a fait remarquer à juste titre que l'art. 32 est [TRADUCTION] «rédigé d'une manière assez générale pour viser les obligations positives du législateur, de telle sorte que la Charte s'appliquera même lorsque le engaged even if the legislature refuses to exercise its authority" ("The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application when the Legislature Declines to Speak" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 113, at p. 115). The application of the Charter is not restricted to situations where the government actively encroaches on rights.

The IRPA is being challenged as unconstitutional because of its failure to protect Charter rights, that is to say its underinclusiveness. The mere fact that the challenged aspect of the Act is its underinclusiveness should not necessarily render the Charter inapplicable. If an omission were not subject to the Charter, underinclusive legislation which was worded in such a way as to simply omit one class rather than to explicitly exclude it would be immune from Charter challenge. If this position was accepted, the form, rather than the substance, of the legislation would determine whether it was open to challenge. This result would be illogical and more importantly unfair. Therefore, where, as here, the challenge concerns an Act of the legislature that is underinclusive as a result of an omission, s. 32 should not be interpreted as precluding the application of the Charter.

It might also be possible to say in this case that the deliberate decision to omit sexual orientation from the provisions of the IRPA is an "act" of the Legislature to which the Charter should apply. This argument is strengthened and given a sense of urgency by the considered and specific positive actions taken by the government to ensure that those discriminated against on the grounds of sexual orientation were excluded from the protective procedures of the Human Rights Commission. However, it is not necessary to rely on this position in order to find that the Charter is applicable.

It is also unnecessary to consider whether a government could properly be subjected to a challenge under s. 15 of the Charter for failing to act at all, in contrast to a case such as this where it acted in an underinclusive manner. It has been held that certain provisions of the Charter, for example those dealing with minority language rights (s. 23), législateur refuse d'exercer son pouvoir» («The Sounds of Silence: Charter Application when the Legislature Declines to Speak» (1996), 7 Forum constitutionnel 113, à la p. 115). L'application de la Charte n'est pas limitée aux cas où par son action le gouvernement empiète sur des droits.

61 La constitutionnalité de l'IRPA est contestée pour le motif qu'elle ne protège pas des droits garantis par la Charte, c'est-à-dire en raison de sa portée trop limitative. Le seul fait que la Loi soit contestée pour sa portée trop limitative ne devrait pas nécessairement rendre la Charte inapplicable. Si l'omission n'était pas assujettie à la Charte, la loi trop limitative, rédigée de façon à simplement omettre une catégorie plutôt qu'à l'exclure expressément, serait à l'abri de toute contestation fondée sur la Charte. Si ce point de vue était jugé valable, la forme et non le fond déterminerait si la loi peut être contestée, ce qui serait illogique, mais surtout injuste. Par conséquent, lorsque, comme en l'espèce, la contestation vise une loi adoptée par la législature qui est trop limitative en raison d'une omission, l'art. 32 ne devrait pas être interprété comme faisant obstacle à l'application de la Charte.

62 L'on pourrait également soutenir, en l'espèce, que la décision délibérée d'omettre l'orientation sexuelle dans les dispositions de l'IRPA est un «acte» du législateur à laquelle la Charte devrait s'appliquer. Les mesures concrètes et réfléchies que le gouvernement a prises pour faire en sorte que les victimes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle ne puissent présenter une plainte à la Human Rights Commission étayent cet argument qui n'en est que plus convaincant. Cependant, il n'est pas nécessaire de l'invoquer pour arriver à la conclusion que la Charte s'applique.

63 Il est également inutile de se demander si un gouvernement pourrait à juste titre faire l'objet d'une contestation fondée sur l'art. 15 de la Charte parce qu'il n'a pas agi du tout, par opposition à un cas où, comme en l'espèce, il a agi d'une manière trop limitative. Notre Cour a statué que certaines dispositions de la Charte, notamment celles qui do indeed require a government to take positive actions to ensure that those rights are respected (see Mahe v. Alberta, [1990] 1 S.C.R. 342, at p. 393; Reference re Public Schools Act (Man.), s. 79(3), (4) and (7), [1993] 1 S.C.R. 839, at pp. 862-63 and 866).

64 It has not yet been necessary to decide in other contexts whether the Charter might impose positive obligations on the legislatures or on Parliament such that a failure to legislate could be challenged under the Charter. Nonetheless, the possibility has been considered and left open in some cases. For example, in McKinney, Wilson J. made a comment in obiter that "[i]t is not self-evident to me that government could not be found to be in breach of the Charter for failing to act" (p. 412). In Haig v. Canada, [1993] 2 S.C.R. 995, at p. 1038, L'Heureux-Dubé J., speaking for the majority and relying on comments made by Dickson C.J. in Reference re Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alta.), [1987] 1 S.C.R. 313, suggested that in some situations, the Charter might impose affirmative duties on the government to take positive action. Finally, in Eldridge v. British Columbia (Attorney General), [1997] 3 S.C.R. 624, La Forest J., speaking for the Court, left open the question whether the Charter might oblige the state to take positive actions (at para. 73). However, it is neither necessary nor appropriate to consider that broad issue in this case.

2. Application of the Charter to Private Activity

65 The respondents further argue that the effect of applying the Charter to the IRPA would be to regulate private activity. Since it has been held that the Charter does not apply to private activity (RWDSU v. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 S.C.R. 573; Tremblay v. Daigle, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 530; McKinney, supra), it is said that the application of the Charter in this case would not be appropriate.

portent sur les droits d'une minorité linguistique (art. 23), imposent en effet à un gouvernement l'obligation positive de prendre des mesures pour assurer le respect de ces droits (voir Mahe c. Alberta, [1990] 1 R.C.S. 342, à la p. 393, et Renvoi relatif à la Loi sur les écoles publiques (Man.), art. 79(3), (4) et (7), [1993] 1 R.C.S. 839, aux pp. 862, 863 et 866).

Il n'a pas été nécessaire jusqu'ici de déterminer si dans d'autres contextes la Charte pouvait faire peser sur le législateur provincial ou fédéral, des obligations positives, de telle sorte que le fait de ne pas légiférer pourrait être contesté en vertu de la Charte. Cette possibilité a cependant été envisagée, sans être écartée, dans certaines affaires. Par exemple, dans l'arrêt McKinney, le juge Wilson a fait la remarque incidente suivante: «il n'est pas évident en soi que le gouvernement ne pourrait être reconnu coupable de violation de la Charte pour avoir omis d'agir» (p. 412). Dans l'arrêt Haig c. Canada, [1993] 2 R.C.S. 995, à la p. 1038, s'exprimant au nom de la majorité et s'appuyant sur les observations du juge en chef Dickson dans l'arrêt Renvoi relatif à la Public Service Employee Relations Act (Alb.), [1987] 1 R.C.S. 313, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé laisse entendre que la Charte pourrait, dans certaines situations, imposer au gouvernement l'obligation positive de prendre des mesures concrètes. Enfin, dans l'arrêt Eldridge c. Colombie-Britannique (Procureur général), [1997] 3 R.C.S. 624, s'exprimant au nom de notre Cour, le juge La Forest laisse sans réponse la question de savoir si la Charte pourrait obliger l'État à prendre des mesures concrètes (au par. 73). Toutefois, il n'est ni nécessaire ni opportun d'examiner cette vaste question en l'espèce.

2. L'application de la Charte à l'activité privée

Les intimés soutiennent en outre qu'appliquer la Charte à l'IRPA ce serait réglementer une activité privée. Comme il a été décidé que la Charte ne s'applique pas aux activités privées (SDGMR c. Dolphin Delivery Ltd., [1986] 2 R.C.S. 573; Tremblay c. Daigle, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 530; McKinney, précité), les intimés font valoir qu'il serait inapproprié d'appliquer la Charte en l'espèce. Cet argu-

This argument cannot be accepted. The application of the Charter to the IRPA does not amount to applying it to private activity. It is true that the IRPA itself targets private activity and as a result will have an "effect" upon that activity. Yet it does not follow that this indirect effect should remove the IRPA from the purview of the Charter. It would lead to an unacceptable result if any legislation that regulated private activity would for that reason alone be immune from Charter scrutiny.

The respondents' submission has failed to distinguish between "private activity" and "laws that regulate private activity". The former is not subject to the Charter, while the latter obviously is. It is the latter which is at issue in this appeal. This case can be compared to McKinney, where La Forest J., speaking for the majority, stated that "[t]here is no question that, the [Human Rights] Code being a law, the Charter applies to it" (p. 290). Those words are applicable to the situation presented in this case. The constitutional challenge here concerns the IRPA, an Act of the Alberta Legislature. It does not concern the acts of King's College or any other private entity or person. This, I think, is sufficient to dispose of the respondents' submissions on this point.

C. Section 15(1)

1. Approach to Section 15(1)

The rights enshrined in s. 15(1) of the Charter are fundamental to Canada. They reflect the fondest dreams, the highest hopes and finest aspirations of Canadian society. When universal suffrage was granted it recognized to some extent the importance of the individual. Canada by the broad scope and fundamental fairness of the provisions of s. 15(1) has taken a further step in the recognition of the fundamental importance and the innate dignity of the individual. That it has done so is not only praiseworthy but essential to achieving the magnificent goal of equal dignity for all. It is the means of giving Canadians a sense of pride. In order to achieve equality the intrinsic worthiness and importance of every individual must be recognized regardless of the age, sex, colour, origins, or ment ne peut être accepté. Appliquer la Charte à l'IRPA ce n'est pas appliquer la Charte à une activité privée. Il est vrai que l'IRPA vise des activités privées et, par conséquent, elle a une «incidence» sur de telles activités. Mais il ne s'ensuit pas que cette incidence indirecte devrait soustraire l'IRPA à l'application de la Charte. Il serait inacceptable qu'une loi échappe à l'examen fondé sur la Charte pour le seul motif qu'elle régit des activités privées.

66 L'argumentation des intimés ne fait aucune distinction entre l'«activité privée» et la «loi qui régit l'activité privée». La première n'est pas assujettie à la Charte, mais la seconde l'est manifestement. Le présent pourvoi porte sur une loi qui régit des activités privées. Il s'apparente à l'affaire McKinney, où le juge La Forest, au nom de la majorité de notre Cour, a dit qu'«[i]l n'y a aucun doute que puisque le [Human Rights] Code est une loi, la Charte s'y applique» (p. 290). Cette conclusion s'applique à la situation considérée en l'espèce. La présente contestation constitutionnelle porte sur l'IRPA, qui a été adoptée par la législature albertaine, et non sur les actes du King's College ou d'une autre personne ou entité privée, ce qui, selon moi, est suffisant pour rejeter les prétentions des intimés à cet égard.

C. Le paragraphe 15(1)

1. Façon d'appliquer le par. 15(1)

67 Les droits garantis par le par. 15(1) de la Charte sont fondamentaux pour le Canada. Ils reflètent les rêves les plus chers, les espérances les plus élevées et les aspirations les plus nobles de la société canadienne. L'adoption du suffrage universel a eu pour effet de reconnaître, jusqu'à un certain point, l'importance de l'individu. En adoptant le par. 15(1), dont les dispositions ont une large portée et se caractérisent par un grand souci de justice fondamentale, le Canada a franchi une autre étape dans la reconnaissance de l'importance fondamentale et de la dignité inhérente de chacun. Cette démarche est non seulement louable, mais essentielle à la réalisation d'un objectif admirable: le droit de chacun à la dignité. C'est le moyen d'inspirer aux Canadiens un sentiment de fierté. Pour qu'il y ait other characteristics of the person. This in turn should lead to a sense of dignity and worthiness for every Canadian and the greatest possible pride and appreciation in being a part of a great nation.

égalité, la valeur et l'importance intrinsèques de chaque individu doivent être reconnues sans égard à l'âge, au sexe, à la couleur, aux origines ou à d'autres caractéristiques de la personne. Cette reconnaissance devrait alors susciter chez tous les Canadiens un sentiment de dignité et de valorisation tout en leur inspirant la plus grande fierté et la satisfaction d'appartenir à une grande nation.

68 The concept and principle of equality is almost intuitively understood and cherished by all. It is easy to praise these concepts as providing the foundation for a just society which permits every individual to live in dignity and in harmony with all. The difficulty lies in giving real effect to equality. Difficult as the goal of equality may be it is worth the arduous struggle to attain. It is only when equality is a reality that fraternity and harmony will be achieved. It is then that all individuals will truly live in dignity.

Presque intuitivement, tous comprennent la notion et le principe de l'égalité et y sont attachés. Il est facile de louer l'égalité comme le fondement d'une société juste qui permet à chacun de vivre dans la dignité et l'harmonie au sein de la collectivité. La difficulté consiste à la réaliser concrètement. Si difficile soit-il, cet objectif mérite qu'on livre une rude bataille pour l'atteindre. Ce n'est que dans un contexte d'égalité réelle que la fraternité et l'harmonie peuvent exister. C'est alors que chacun peut véritablement vivre dans la dignité.

69 It is easy to say that everyone who is just like "us" is entitled to equality. Everyone finds it more difficult to say that those who are "different" from us in some way should have the same equality rights that we enjoy. Yet so soon as we say any enumerated or analogous group is less deserving and unworthy of equal protection and benefit of the law all minorities and all of Canadian society are demeaned. It is so deceptively simple and so devastatingly injurious to say that those who are handicapped or of a different race, or religion, or colour or sexual orientation are less worthy. Yet, if any enumerated or analogous group is denied the equality provided by s. 15 then the equality of every other minority group is threatened. That equality is guaranteed by our constitution. If equality rights for minorities had been recognized, the all too frequent tragedies of history might have been avoided. It can never be forgotten that discrimination is the antithesis of equality and that it is the recognition of equality which will foster the dignity of every individual.

Il est facile de dire que quiconque «nous» ressemble a droit à l'égalité. Chacun de vous trouve cependant plus difficile de soutenir que les gens «différents», sous un aspect ou un autre, doivent jouir des mêmes droits à l'égalité que nous. Pourtant, dès que nous affirmons qu'un groupe énuméré au par. 15(1) ou un groupe analogue ne mérite pas la même protection et le même bénéfice de la loi, ou n'en est pas digne, toutes les minorités et toute la société canadienne se trouvent avilies. Il est si simple, en apparence, mais tellement préjudiciable, de dire de ceux qui ont une déficience ou dont la race, la religion, la couleur ou l'orientation sexuelle est différente qu'ils sont moins dignes d'estime. Or, lorsque l'égalité prévue à l'art. 15 est niée à un groupe visé ou à un groupe analogue, c'est l'égalité de chacune des autres minorités qui est menacée. Notre Constitution garantit le droit à l'égalité. La reconnaissance de ce droit aux minorités aurait pu, dans le passé, éviter les trop nombreuses tragédies qui ont ponctué l'histoire. Il ne faut jamais oublier que la discrimination est l'antithèse de l'égalité et que c'est la reconnaissance de l'égalité qui assure la dignité de chacun.

70 How then should the analysis of s. 15 proceed? In Egan the two-step approach taken in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R.

Comment, dès lors, l'analyse fondée sur l'art. 15 doit-elle être effectuée? Dans l'arrêt Egan, la méthode comportant deux étapes employée dans 143, and R. v. Turpin, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1296, was summarized and described in this way (at paras. 130-31):

The first step is to determine whether, due to a distinction created by the questioned law, a claimant's right to equality before the law, equality under the law, equal protection of the law or equal benefit of the law has been denied. During this first step, the inquiry should focus upon whether the challenged law has drawn a distinction between the claimant and others, based on personal characteristics.

Not every distinction created by legislation gives rise to discrimination. Therefore, the second step must be to determine whether the distinction created by the law results in discrimination. In order to make this determination, it is necessary to consider first, whether the equality right was denied on the basis of a personal characteristic which is either enumerated in s. 15(1) or which is analogous to those enumerated, and second, whether that distinction has the effect on the claimant of imposing a burden, obligation or disadvantage not imposed upon others or of withholding or limiting access to benefits or advantages which are available to others.

A similar approach was taken by McLachlin J. in Miron (at para. 128):

The analysis under s. 15(1) involves two steps. First, the claimant must show a denial of "equal protection" or "equal benefit" of the law, as compared with some other person. Second, the claimant must show that the denial constitutes discrimination. At this second stage, in order for discrimination to be made out, the claimant must show that the denial rests on one of the grounds enumerated in s. 15(1) or an analogous ground and that the unequal treatment is based on the stereotypical application of presumed group or personal characteristics.

In Miron and Egan, Lamer C.J. and La Forest, Gonthier and Major JJ. articulated a qualification which, as described in Benner v. Canada (Secretary of State), [1997] 1 S.C.R. 358 (at para. 64), "focuses on the relevancy of a distinction to the purpose of the legislation where that purpose is not itself discriminatory and recognizes that certain distinctions are outside the scope of s. 15". This les arrêts Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143, et R. c. Turpin, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1296, est résumée et décrite comme suit (aux par. 130 et 131):

La première [étape] consiste à déterminer si, en raison de la distinction créée par la disposition contestée, il y a eu violation du droit d'un plaignant à l'égalité devant la loi, à l'égalité dans la loi, à la même protection de la loi et au même bénéfice de la loi. À cette étape de l'analyse, il s'agit principalement de vérifier si la disposition contestée engendre, entre le plaignant et d'autres personnes, une distinction fondée sur des caractéristiques personnelles.

Les distinctions créées par les lois n'emportent pas toutes discrimination. C'est pourquoi il faut, à la seconde étape, déterminer si la distinction ainsi créée donne lieu à une discrimination. À cette fin, il faut se demander, d'une part, si le droit à l'égalité a été enfreint sur le fondement d'une caractéristique personnelle qui est soit énumérée au par. 15(1), soit analogue à celles qui y sont énumérées et, d'autre part, si la distinction a pour effet d'imposer au plaignant des fardeaux, des obligations ou des désavantages non imposés à d'autres ou d'empêcher ou de restreindre l'accès aux bénéfices et aux avantages offerts à d'autres.

Le juge McLachlin adopte une méthode semblable dans l'arrêt Miron (au par. 128):

L'analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) comporte deux étapes. Premièrement, le demandeur doit démontrer qu'il y a eu négation de son droit «à la même protection» ou «au même bénéfice» de la loi qu'une autre personne. Deuxièmement, le demandeur doit démontrer que cette négation constitue une discrimination. À cette seconde étape, pour établir qu'il y a discrimination, le demandeur doit prouver que la négation repose sur l'un des motifs de discrimination énumérés au par. 15(1) ou sur un motif analogue et que le traitement inégal est fondé sur l'application stéréotypée de présumées caractéristiques personnelles ou de groupe.

71 Dans les arrêts Miron et Egan, le juge en chef Lamer et les juges La Forest, Gonthier et Major ont apporté un tempérament dont l'arrêt Benner c. Canada (Secrétaire d'État), [1997] 1 R.C.S. 358 (au par. 64), dit qu'il «met l'accent sur la pertinence d'une distinction par rapport à l'objet du texte de loi, lorsque cet objet n'est pas lui-même discriminatoire, et elle reconnaît que certaines dis-approach is, to a certain extent, compatible with the notion that discrimination commonly involves the attribution of stereotypical characteristics to members of an enumerated or analogous group.

72 It has subsequently been explained, however, that it is not only through the "stereotypical application of presumed group or personal characteristics" that discrimination can occur, although this may be common to many instances of discrimination. As stated by Sopinka J. in Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 241, at paras. 66-67:

> . . . the purpose of s. 15(1) of the Charter is not only to prevent discrimination by the attribution of stereotypical characteristics to individuals, but also to ameliorate the position of groups within Canadian society who have suffered disadvantage by exclusion from mainstream society as has been the case with disabled persons.
>
> The principal object of certain of the prohibited grounds is the elimination of discrimination by the attribution of untrue characteristics based on stereotypical attitudes relating to immutable conditions such as race or sex. . . . The other equally important objective seeks to take into account the true characteristics of this group which act as headwinds to the enjoyment of society's benefits and to accommodate them.

73 These approaches to the analysis of s. 15(1) have been summarized and adopted in subsequent cases, e.g. Eaton (at para. 62), Benner (at para. 69) and, most recently, Eldridge. In Eldridge, La Forest J., writing for the unanimous Court, stated (at para. 58):

> While this Court has not adopted a uniform approach to s. 15(1), there is broad agreement on the general analytic framework; see Eaton v. Brant County Board of Education, [1997] 1 S.C.R. 241, at para. 62, Miron, supra, and Egan, supra. A person claiming a violation of s. 15(1) must first establish that, because of a distinction drawn between the claimant and others, the claimant has been denied "equal protection" or "equal benefit" of the law. Secondly, the claimant must show that the denial constitutes discrimination on the basis of one tinctions ne sont pas visées par l'art. 15». Cette méthode est dans une certaine mesure compatible avec l'idée que la discrimination comporte habituellement l'attribution de caractéristiques stéréotypées aux membres d'un groupe énuméré ou analogue.

Toutefois, notre Cour a par la suite précisé que la discrimination ne résulte pas seulement de «l'application stéréotypée de présumées caractéristiques personnelles ou de groupe», bien que celle-ci puisse être observée dans de nombreux cas de discrimination. Comme le dit le juge Sopinka dans l'arrêt Eaton c. Conseil scolaire du comté de Brant, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 241, aux par. 66 et 67:

> . . . le par. 15(1) de la Charte a non seulement pour objet d'empêcher la discrimination par l'attribution de caractéristiques stéréotypées à des particuliers, mais également d'améliorer la position de groupes qui, dans la société canadienne, ont subi un désavantage en étant exclus de l'ensemble de la société ordinaire comme ce fut le cas pour les personnes handicapées.
>
> Certains des motifs illicites visent principalement à éliminer la discrimination par l'attribution de caractéristiques fausses fondées sur des attitudes stéréotypées se rapportant à des conditions immuables comme la race ou le sexe. [. . .] L'autre objectif, tout aussi important, vise à tenir compte des véritables caractéristiques de ce groupe qui l'empêchent de jouir des avantages de la société, et à les accommoder en conséquence.

Ces méthodes préconisées relativement à l'analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) ont été résumées et adoptées dans des arrêts ultérieurs, p. ex. Eaton, précité (au par. 62), Benner, précité (au par. 69), et plus récemment, Eldridge. Dans ce dernier arrêt, le juge La Forest a dit ce qui suit au nom de notre Cour (au par. 58):

> Bien que notre Cour n'ait pas adopté une approche uniforme à l'égard de cette disposition, il y a un large accord général sur le cadre d'analyse général: voir Eaton c. Conseil scolaire du comté de Brant, [1997] 1 R.C.S. 241, au par. 62, Miron et Egan, précités. La personne qui allègue une violation du par. 15(1) doit d'abord établir que, en raison d'une distinction faite entre elle et d'autres personnes, elle est privée de la «même protection» ou du «même bénéfice» de la loi. En deuxième lieu, elle doit démontrer que cette privation of the enumerated grounds listed in s. 15(1) or one analogous thereto.

In this case, as in Eaton, Benner and Eldridge, any differences that may exist in the approach to s. 15(1) would not affect the result, and it is therefore not necessary to address those differences. The essential requirements of all these cases will be satisfied by enquiring first, whether there is a distinction which results in the denial of equality before or under the law, or of equal protection or benefit of the law; and second, whether this denial constitutes discrimination on the basis of an enumerated or analogous ground.

2. The IRPA Creates a Distinction Between the Claimant and Others Based on a Personal Characteristic, and Because of That Distinction, It Denies the Claimant Equal Protection or Equal Benefit of the Law

(a) Does the IRPA Create a Distinction?

The respondents have argued that because the IRPA merely omits any reference to sexual orientation, this "neutral silence" cannot be understood as creating a distinction. They contend that the IRPA extends full protection on the grounds contained within it to heterosexuals and homosexuals alike, and therefore there is no distinction and hence no discrimination. It is the respondents' position that if any distinction is made on the basis of sexual orientation that distinction exists because it is present in society and not because of the IRPA.

These arguments cannot be accepted. They are based on that "thin and impoverished" notion of equality referred to in Eldridge (at para. 73). It has been repeatedly held that identical treatment will not always constitute equal treatment (see for example Andrews, supra, at p. 164). It is also clear that the way in which an exclusion is worded should not disguise the nature of the exclusion so as to allow differently drafted exclusions to be constitue une discrimination fondée sur l'un des motifs énumérés au par. 15(1) ou sur un motif analogue.

74 Dans la présente espèce, comme dans les affaires Eaton, Benner et Eldridge, toute différence pouvant exister quant à la méthode à employer relativement au par. 15(1) ne modifie en rien le résultat, de sorte qu'il n'est pas nécessaire de s'y attarder. Les exigences essentielles établies dans ces affaires sont respectées si l'on se demande premièrement s'il y a une distinction entraînant la négation du droit à l'égalité devant la loi ou dans la loi ou la négation du droit à la même protection ou au même bénéfice de la loi et, deuxièmement, si cette négation constitue une discrimination fondée sur un motif énuméré au par. 15(1) ou sur un motif analogue.

2. L'IRPA établit une distinction entre le plaignant et d'autres personnes sur le fondement d'une caractéristique personnelle et, à cause de cette distinction, elle prive le plaignant du droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi treated differently. For example Schachter, at p. 698, discussed this point in the context of remedies, and quoted Knodel v. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991), 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 356 (S.C.), at pp. 384-85:

a) L'IRPA établit-elle une distinction?

75 Les intimés prétendent que, l'IRPA omettant simplement de mentionner l'orientation sexuelle, on ne peut conclure que ce «silence neutre» crée une distinction. Ils font valoir que l'IRPA assure tant aux hétérosexuels qu'aux homosexuels une protection entière contre la discrimination fondée sur les motifs qu'elle prévoit de sorte qu'aucune distinction n'est établie et, partant, aucune discrimination n'est exercée. Selon eux, si une distinction est établie sur le fondement de l'orientation sexuelle, elle est imputable à la société, et non à l'IRPA.

76 Ces arguments ne peuvent être acceptés. Ils sont fondés sur la notion «étroite et peu généreuse» de l'égalité que mentionne Eldridge (au par. 73). Il est bien établi qu'un traitement identique ne constitue pas toujours un traitement égal (voir notamment l'arrêt Andrews, précité, à la p. 164). Il est également clair que la formulation d'une exclusion ne devrait pas en masquer la nature de telle sorte que des exclusions libellées différemment soient trai-

> Where the state makes a distinction between two classes of individuals, A and B, . . . the manner in which the legislative provision or law is drafted is irrelevant for constitutional purposes; i.e., it is immaterial whether the subject law states: (1) A benefits; or (2) Everyone benefits except B. In both cases, the impact upon the individual within group B is the same.

77 The respondents concede that if homosexuals were excluded altogether from the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they were not protected from discrimination on any grounds, this would be discriminatory. Clearly that would be discrimination of the most egregious kind. It is true that gay and lesbian individuals are not entirely excluded from the protection of the IRPA. They can claim protection on some grounds. Yet that certainly does not mean that there is no discrimination present. For example, the fact that a lesbian and a heterosexual woman are both entitled to bring a complaint of discrimination on the basis of gender does not mean that they have equal protection under the Act. Lesbian and gay individuals are still denied protection under the ground that may be the most significant for them, discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

78 The respondents also seek to distinguish this case from McKinney, supra, and Blainey, supra. In Blainey, the Ontario human rights legislation prohibited discrimination on the basis of gender, but expressly allowed it in athletic organizations. Similarly, in McKinney, the impugned legislation prohibited discrimination on the basis of age, but in circumstances of employment, "age" was defined as 18 to 65, thereby depriving elderly workers of a benefit under the statute on the basis of their age. In both cases the legislation was found to violate s. 15(1).

tées différemment. Par exemple, dans l'arrêt Schachter, à la p. 698, cette question est examinée dans le contexte de la réparation à accorder et l'arrêt Knodel c. British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991), 58 B.C.L.R. (2d) 356 (C.S.), est cité, aux pp. 384 et 385:

> [TRADUCTION] Lorsque l'État établit une distinction entre deux catégories de personnes, A et B,[. . .] la façon dont la disposition législative ou la loi est rédigée n'est pas pertinente sur le plan constitutionnel; c.-à-d. qu'il importe peu que la loi visée dispose: (1) A a droit aux bénéfices ou (2) tous ont droit aux bénéfices, sauf B. Dans les deux cas, le résultat est le même pour les membres du groupe B.

Les intimés concèdent que si les homosexuels étaient complètement exclus de la protection de l'IRPA, c'est-à-dire si elle ne les protégeait contre aucun des motifs de distinction qu'elle énumère, il y aurait discrimination. Manifestement, il s'agirait d'une discrimination des plus insignes. Il est vrai que les homosexuels ne sont pas entièrement exclus de la protection de l'IRPA. Ils peuvent en effet réclamer cette protection pour certains motifs. Cela ne veut pas dire pour autant qu'il n'y a pas de discrimination. Par exemple, le fait qu'une homosexuelle et qu'une hétérosexuelle aient toutes deux le droit de déposer une plainte de discrimination fondée sur le sexe ne signifie pas qu'elles jouissent d'une protection égale sous le régime de la Loi. Les homosexuels sont toujours privés de protection contre la discrimination fondée sur le motif le plus susceptible de revêtir pour eux la plus grande importance, soit l'orientation sexuelle.

Les intimés tentent également d'établir une distinction entre la présente espèce et les arrêts McKinney et Blainey, précités. Dans Blainey, la loi ontarienne sur les droits de la personne interdisait la discrimination fondée sur le sexe, mais l'autorisait expressément au sein des organisations sportives. De même, dans McKinney, la loi incriminée interdisait la discrimination fondée sur l'âge, mais en matière d'emploi; l'«âge» était défini comme étant la période comprise entre 18 et 65 ans, ce qui privait les travailleurs âgés du bénéfice de la loi en raison de leur âge. Dans les deux cas, le tribunal a conclu que la loi violait le par. 15(1).

The respondents suggest that because the government in those cases had decided to provide protection, it had to do so in a non-discriminatory manner, but that the present case is distinguishable because the IRPA remains silent with respect to sexual orientation. The fact that the legislation explicitly places limits on protection (to some within a category as in McKinney, or excluding a particular area of discrimination as in Blainey) cannot provide the sole basis for determining whether a distinction has been drawn by the legislation. This case too is one of partial protection although the exclusion or limit on protection takes a different form from that presented in McKinney and Blainey. Protection from discrimination is provided by the Government, by means of the IRPA, but only to some groups.

79 Selon les intimés, dans ces cas, le gouvernement ayant décidé d'assurer une protection, il devait le faire d'une façon non discriminatoire, mais en l'espèce, il y a lieu d'établir une distinction puisque l'IRPA est muette au sujet de l'orientation sexuelle. Le fait que le texte législatif limite explicitement la protection prévue (en l'accordant à certaines personnes au sein d'une catégorie, comme dans McKinney, ou en excluant un type particulier de discrimination, comme dans Blainey) ne permet à lui seul de déterminer si la loi établit une distinction. En l'espèce aussi, une protection partielle est accordée, bien que l'exclusion ou la limitation du régime de protection revête une forme différente de celles considérées dans les arrêts McKinney et Blainey. La protection contre la discrimination est assurée par le gouvernement, au moyen de l'IRPA, mais seulement à certains groupes.

If the mere silence of the legislation was enough to remove it from s. 15(1) scrutiny then any legislature could easily avoid the objects of s. 15(1) simply by drafting laws which omitted reference to excluded groups. Such an approach would ignore the recognition that this Court has given to the principle that discrimination can arise from underinclusive legislation. This principle was expressed with great clarity by Dickson C.J. in Brooks v. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 S.C.R. 1219, at p. 1240. There he stated: "Underinclusion may be simply a backhanded way of permitting discrimination".

80 Si le simple silence de l'IRPA suffisait à la soustraire à l'examen fondé sur le par. 15(1), le législateur pourrait facilement contourner les objectifs de cette disposition en rédigeant des textes législatifs qui ne mentionne pas à dessein les groupes exclus. Ce serait faire fi de la reconnaissance, par notre Cour, du principe voulant qu'une loi trop limitative puisse être discriminatoire, lequel a été énoncé très clairement par le juge en chef Dickson dans l'arrêt Brooks c. Canada Safeway Ltd., [1989] 1 R.C.S. 1219, à la p. 1240. S'exprimant au nom de la Cour, il a dit: «La couverture sélective constitue peut-être simplement un moyen détourné de permettre la discrimination».

It is clear that the IRPA, by reason of its underinclusiveness, does create a distinction. The distinction is simultaneously drawn along two different lines. The first is the distinction between homosexuals, on one hand, and other disadvantaged groups which are protected under the Act, on the other. Gays and lesbians do not even have formal equality with reference to other protected groups, since those other groups are explicitly included and they are not.

81 Il est évident que l'IRPA, en raison de sa portée trop limitative, établit effectivement une distinction et ce, sous deux rapports différents simultanément. Premièrement, une distinction est créée entre les homosexuels, d'une part, et les autres groupes défavorisés qui bénéficient de la protection de l'IRPA, d'autre part. Les homosexuels ne jouissent même pas d'une égalité formelle par rapport aux groupes protégés, puisque, ceux-ci sont explicitement inclus alors que les homosexuels ne le sont pas.

The second distinction, and, I think, the more fundamental one, is between homosexuals and heterosexuals. This distinction may be more diffi-

82 Deuxièmement, une distinction encore plus fondamentale, selon moi, est créée entre homosexuels et hétérosexuels. Elle peut être plus difficile à cult to see because there is, on the surface, a measure of formal equality: gay or lesbian individuals have the same access as heterosexual individuals to the protection of the IRPA in the sense that they could complain to the Commission about an incident of discrimination on the basis of any of the grounds currently included. However, the exclusion of the ground of sexual orientation, considered in the context of the social reality of discrimination against gays and lesbians, clearly has a disproportionate impact on them as opposed to heterosexuals. Therefore the IRPA in its underinclusive state denies substantive equality to the former group. This was well expressed by W. N. Renke, "Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Discrimination, Burdens of Proof, and Judicial Notice" (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 925, at pp. 942-43:

> If both heterosexuals and homosexuals equally suffered discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, neither might complain of unfairness if the IRPA extended no remedies for discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. A person belonging to one group would be treated like a person belonging to the other. Where, though, discrimination is visited virtually exclusively against persons with one type of sexual orientation, an absence of legislative remedies for discrimination based on sexual orientation has a differential impact. The absence of remedies has no real impact on heterosexuals, since they have no complaints to make concerning sexual orientation discrimination. The absence of remedies has a real impact on homosexuals, since they are the persons discriminated against on the basis of sexual orientation. Furthermore, a heterosexual has recourse to all the currently available heads of discrimination, should a complaint be necessary. A homosexual, it is true, may also have recourse to those heads of discrimination, but the only type of discrimination he or she may suffer may be sexual orientation discrimination. He or she would have no remedy for this type of discrimination. Seen in this way, the IRPA does distinguish between homosexuals and heterosexuals.

See also Pothier, supra, at p. 119. It is possible that a heterosexual individual could be discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation. Yet this is far less likely to occur than discrimination against a homosexual or lesbian on that same ground. It thus is apparent that there is a clear disdéceler parce qu'il y a en apparence une certaine égalité formelle: les homosexuels ont un même droit à la protection de l'IRPA que les hétérosexuels dans la mesure où ils peuvent saisir la commission d'une plainte de discrimination fondée sur l'un des motifs actuellement énumérés. Cependant, compte tenu de la réalité sociale de la discrimination exercée contre les homosexuels, l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle a de toute évidence un effet disproportionné sur ces derniers par comparaison avec les hétérosexuels. En raison de son caractère trop limitatif, l'IRPA nie donc aux homosexuels le droit à l'égalité réelle. Cela est fort bien expliqué par W. N. Renke dans «Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Discrimination, Burdens of Proof, and Judicial Notice» (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 925, aux pp. 942 et 943:

> [TRADUCTION] Si hétérosexuels et homosexuels étaient également victimes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, ni les uns ni les autres ne pourraient se plaindre d'injustice si l'IRPA ne conférait aucun recours à l'égard de la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Les personnes appartenant à un groupe seraient traitées comme celles faisant partie de l'autre. Cependant, lorsque la discrimination est exercée presque exclusivement contre les personnes ayant une orientation sexuelle donnée, l'absence de recours légaux dans le cas de la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle a un effet différent. L'absence de recours n'a aucune incidence réelle sur les hétérosexuels, puisqu'ils n'ont aucun motif de plainte concernant l'orientation sexuelle. Elle a par contre un effet véritable sur les homosexuels, car ils sont les victimes de la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. En outre, l'hétérosexuel peut, au besoin, invoquer tous les motifs de discrimination actuellement énumérés dans la Loi. Il est vrai que c'est également le cas pour l'homosexuel, mais il se peut que la seule discrimination exercée contre lui soit la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Il n'aurait aucun recours contre ce type de discrimination. Dans cette optique, l'IRPA établit bel et bien une distinction entre homosexuels et hétérosexuels.

Voir également Pothier, loc. cit., à la p. 119. Il est possible qu'un hétérosexuel soit victime de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Mais cela risque beaucoup moins de se produire que la discrimination contre un homosexuel pour le même motif. Il appert donc qu'une nette distinctinction created by the disproportionate impact which arises from the exclusion of the ground from the IRPA.

This case is similar in some respects to the recent case of Eldridge, supra. There the Charter's requirement of substantive, not merely formal, equality was unanimously affirmed. It was, as well, recognized that substantive equality may be violated by a legislative omission. At paras. 60-61 the principle was explained in this way:

> The only question in this case, then, is whether the appellants have been afforded "equal benefit of the law without discrimination" within the meaning of s. 15(1) of the Charter. On its face, the medicare system in British Columbia applies equally to the deaf and hearing populations. It does not make an explicit "distinction" based on disability by singling out deaf persons for different treatment. Both deaf and hearing persons are entitled to receive certain medical services free of charge. The appellants nevertheless contend that the lack of funding for sign language interpreters renders them unable to benefit from this legislation to the same extent as hearing persons. Their claim, in other words, is one of "adverse effects" discrimination.
>
> This Court has consistently held that s. 15(1) of the Charter protects against this type of discrimination. . . . Section 15(1), the Court held [in Andrews], was intended to ensure a measure of substantive, not merely formal equality.

Finally, the respondents' contention that the distinction is not created by law, but rather exists independently of the IRPA in society, cannot be accepted. It is, of course, true that discrimination against gays and lesbians exists in society. The reality of this cruel and unfortunate discrimination was recognized in Egan. Indeed it provides the context in which the legislative distinction challenged in this case must be analysed. The reality of society's discrimination against lesbians and gay men demonstrates that there is a distinction drawn in the IRPA which denies these groups equal protection of the law by excluding lesbians and gay men from its protection, the very protection they so urgently need because of the existence of dis-tion est créée par l'effet disproportionné qu'a l'exclusion de ce motif dans l'IRPA.

La présente espèce s'apparente à certains égards à la récente affaire Eldridge, précitée, où notre Cour a confirmé à l'unanimité que l'égalité doit être réelle, et non seulement formelle. Cet arrêt établit également qu'une omission du législateur peut porter atteinte à l'égalité réelle. Le principe est expliqué comme suit aux par. 60 et 61: 83

> La seule question à trancher en l'espèce est donc de savoir si les appelants ont droit au «même bénéfice de la loi, indépendamment de toute discrimination» aux termes du par. 15(1) de la Charte. À première vue, le régime d'assurance-maladie de la Colombie-Britannique s'applique d'une manière égale aux entendants et aux personnes atteintes de surdité. Il ne fait pas de «distinction» explicite fondée sur la déficience en accordant un traitement différent aux personnes atteintes de surdité. Tant ces dernières que les entendants ont droit de recevoir certains services médicaux gratuitement. Les appelants prétendent néanmoins que l'absence de financement pour les services d'interprètes gestuels les empêche de bénéficier du régime établi par la loi dans la même mesure que les entendants. Autrement dit, ils invoquent la discrimination découlant d'«effets préjudiciables».
>
> Notre Cour a statué de façon constante que le par. 15(1) de la Charte protège contre ce type de discrimination. [. . .] Le paragraphe 15(1), a statué la Cour [dans Andrews], vise à assurer une certaine égalité matérielle et non simplement formelle.

Enfin, la prétention des intimés selon laquelle la distinction n'est pas établie par la loi, mais existe en fait indépendamment de celle-ci dans la société, ne peut être acceptée. Il est évidemment vrai que les homosexuels sont victimes de discrimination dans la société. La réalité de cette discrimination cruelle et déplorable est reconnue dans l'arrêt Egan. Cet état de fait fournit le contexte dans lequel la distinction législative contestée en l'espèce doit être analysée. La réalité de la discrimination sociale dont les homosexuels sont victimes montre que l'IRPA établit une distinction qui nie à ces personnes le droit à la même protection de la loi en les excluant alors même qu'elles ont un pressant besoin de protection à cause de la discri- 84 crimination against them in society. It is not necessary to find that the legislation creates the discrimination existing in society in order to determine that it creates a potentially discriminatory distinction.

85 Although the respondents try to distinguish this case from Bliss v. Attorney General of Canada, [1979] 1 S.C.R. 183, the reasoning they put forward is very much reminiscent of the approach taken in that case. (See S. K. O'Byrne and J. F. McGinnis, "Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Plessy Revisited: Lesbian and Gay Rights in the Province of Alberta" (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 892, at pp. 920-22.) There it was held that a longer qualifying period for unemployment benefits relating to pregnancy was not discriminatory because it applied to all pregnant individuals, and that if this category happened only to include women, that was a distinction created by nature, not by law. This reasoning has since been emphatically rejected (see e.g. Brooks). Eldridge also emphatically rejected an argument that underinclusive legislation did not discriminate because the inequality existed independently of the benefit provided by the state (at paras. 68-69).

86 The omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground in the IRPA creates a distinction on the basis of sexual orientation. The "silence" of the IRPA with respect to discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not "neutral". Gay men and lesbians are treated differently from other disadvantaged groups and from heterosexuals. They, unlike gays and lesbians, receive protection from discrimination on the grounds that are likely to be relevant to them.

(b) Denial of Equal Benefit and Protection of the Law

87 It is apparent that the omission from the IRPA creates a distinction. That distinction results in a denial of the equal benefit and equal protection of the law. It is the exclusion of sexual orientation from the list of grounds in the IRPA which denies mination exercée contre elles dans la société. Il n'est pas nécessaire de conclure que la loi crée la discrimination qui a cours dans la société pour déterminer qu'elle établit une distinction potentiellement discriminatoire.

Les intimés tentent de distinguer la présente espèce de l'arrêt Bliss c. Procureur général du Canada, [1979] 1 R.C.S. 183, mais le raisonnement qu'ils avancent rappelle beaucoup le point de vue adopté dans cette affaire. (Voir S. K. O'Byrne et J. F. McGinnis, «Case Comment: Vriend v. Alberta: Plessy Revisited: Lesbian and Gay Rights in the Province of Alberta» (1996), 34 Alta. L. Rev. 892, aux pp. 920 à 922.) Dans cet arrêt, il a été décidé que la fixation d'une période de référence plus longue pour l'obtention des prestations d'assurance-chômage en cas de grossesse n'était pas discriminatoire, car elle s'appliquait à toutes les personnes enceintes, et le fait que cette catégorie n'inclut que des femmes était attribuable à une distinction établie par la nature, non par la loi. Ce raisonnement a été rejeté catégoriquement depuis lors (voir, p. ex., l'arrêt Brooks). Dans l'arrêt Eldridge, elle a aussi rejeté de manière énergique l'argument voulant qu'une loi trop limitative ne soit pas discriminatoire parce que l'inégalité existe indépendamment de l'avantage que confère l'État (aux par. 68 et 69).

L'omission de l'orientation sexuelle dans les motifs de distinction interdits par l'IRPA crée une distinction fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Ce «silence» de l'IRPA en ce qui concerne la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle n'est pas «neutre». Les homosexuels sont traités différemment d'autres groupes défavorisés et des hétérosexuels. Ceux-ci, contrairement aux homosexuels, sont protégés contre la discrimination fondée sur des motifs susceptibles de les concerner.

b) La négation du droit au même bénéfice et à la même protection de la loi

Il appert que l'omission du législateur crée une distinction et que cette distinction emporte la négation du droit au même bénéfice et à la même protection de la loi. C'est l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs de distinction interdits par lesbians and gay men the protection and benefit of the Act in two important ways. They are excluded from the government's statement of policy against discrimination, and they are also denied access to the remedial procedures established by the Act.

l'IRPA qui prive les homosexuels du droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la Loi et ce, de deux manières importantes. Les homosexuels ne sont pas visés par l'énoncé de politique du gouvernement contre la discrimination, et on leur refuse l'accès aux recours permettant d'obtenir réparation en application de la Loi.

Therefore, the IRPA, by its omission or underinclusiveness, denies gays and lesbians the equal benefit and protection of the law on the basis of a personal characteristic, namely sexual orientation.

88 Par conséquent, en raison de l'omission du législateur ou de la portée trop limitative de l'IRPA, celle-ci nie aux homosexuels le droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi sur le fondement d'une caractéristique personnelle, à savoir l'orientation sexuelle.

3. The Denial of Equal Benefit and Equal Protection Constitutes Discrimination Contrary to Section 15(1)

3. La négation du droit au même bénéfice et à la même protection de la loi constitue une discrimination contraire au par. 15(1)

In Egan, it was said that there are two aspects which are relevant in determining whether the distinction created by the law constitutes discrimination. First, "whether the equality right was denied on the basis of a personal characteristic which is either enumerated in s. 15(1) or which is analogous to those enumerated". Second "whether that distinction has the effect on the claimant of imposing a burden, obligation or disadvantage not imposed upon others or of withholding or limiting access to benefits or advantages which are available to others" (para. 131). A discriminatory distinction was also described as one which is "capable of either promoting or perpetuating the view that the individual adversely affected by this distinction is less capable, or less worthy of recognition or value as a human being or as a member of Canadian society, equally deserving of concern, respect, and consideration" (Egan, at para. 56, per L'Heureux-Dubé J.). It may as well be appropriate to consider whether the unequal treatment is based on "the stereotypical application of presumed group or personal characteristics" (Miron, at para. 128, per McLachlin J.).

89 Dans l'arrêt Egan, notre Cour a dit que deux aspects sont pertinents aux fins de déterminer si la distinction créée par une loi constitue une discrimination. Premièrement, il faut se demander «si le droit à l'égalité a été enfreint sur le fondement d'une caractéristique personnelle qui est soit énumérée au par. 15(1), soit analogue à celles qui y sont énumérées». Deuxièmement, il faut se demander si «la distinction a pour effet d'imposer au plaignant des fardeaux, des obligations ou des désavantages non imposés à d'autres ou d'empêcher ou de restreindre l'accès aux bénéfices et aux avantages offerts à d'autres» (par. 131). Notre Cour a également dit qu'une distinction est discriminatoire lorsqu'elle est «susceptible de favoriser ou de perpétuer l'opinion que les individus lésés par cette distinction sont moins capables ou moins dignes d'être reconnus ou valorisés en tant qu'êtres humains ou en tant que membres de la société canadienne qui méritent le même intérêt, le même respect et la même considération» (Egan, au par. 56, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé). On peut également se demander si le traitement inégal se fonde sur «l'application stéréotypée de présumées caractéristiques personnelles ou de groupe» (Miron, au par. 128, le juge McLachlin).

(a) The Equality Right is Denied on the Basis of a Personal Characteristic Which Is Analogous to Those Enumerated in Section 15(1)

90 In Egan, it was held, on the basis of "historical social, political and economic disadvantage suffered by homosexuals" and the emerging consensus among legislatures (at para. 176), as well as previous judicial decisions (at para. 177), that sexual orientation is a ground analogous to those listed in s. 15(1). Sexual orientation is "a deeply personal characteristic that is either unchangeable or changeable only at unacceptable personal costs" (para. 5). It is analogous to the other personal characteristics enumerated in s. 15(1); and therefore this step of the test is satisfied.

91 It has been noted, for example by Iacobucci J. in Benner, at para. 69, that:

> Where the denial is based on a ground expressly enumerated in s. 15(1), or one analogous to them, it will generally be found to be discriminatory, although there may, of course, be exceptions: see, e.g., Weatherall v. Canada (Attorney General), [1993] 2 S.C.R. 872.

It could therefore be assumed that a denial of the equal protection and benefit of the law on the basis of the analogous ground of sexual orientation is discriminatory. Yet in this case there are other factors present which support this conclusion.

(b) The Distinction Has the Effect of Imposing a Burden or Disadvantage Not Imposed on Others and Withholds Benefits or Advantages Which Are Available to Others

(i) Discriminatory Purpose

92 It was submitted by the appellants and several of the interveners that the purpose of the Alberta Government in excluding sexual orientation was itself discriminatory. The appellants suggest that the purpose behind the deliberate choice of the Government not to include sexual orientation as a protected ground is to deny that homosexuals are or were disadvantaged by discrimination, or alternatively to deny that homosexuals are worthy of protection against that discrimination. This, they

a) Le droit à l'égalité est nié sur le fondement d'une caractéristique personnelle analogue à celles énumérées au par. 15(1)

Dans l'arrêt Egan, il a été décidé, en raison des «désavantages sociaux, politiques et économiques» dont souffrent les homosexuels, de l'émergence d'un consensus législatif (au par. 176) et des décisions judiciaires antérieures (au par. 177), que l'orientation sexuelle constitue un motif analogue à ceux énumérés au par. 15(1). L'orientation sexuelle est «une caractéristique profondément personnelle qui est soit immuable, soit susceptible de n'être modifiée qu'à un prix personnel inacceptable» (par. 5). Elle est analogue aux autres caractéristiques personnelles énumérées au par. 15(1), de sorte que ce volet du critère est respecté.

Il a été souligné, par exemple, par le juge Iacobucci dans l'arrêt Benner, au par. 69:

> Lorsque la négation du droit en cause est fondée sur l'un des motifs expressément énumérés au par. 15(1) ou sur un motif analogue, elle sera généralement jugée discriminatoire, bien qu'il puisse évidemment y avoir des exceptions: voir, par exemple, Weatherall c. Canada (Procureur général), [1993] 2 R.C.S. 872.

Pourrait donc être tenue pour discriminatoire la négation du droit à la même protection et au même bénéfice de la loi fondée sur le motif analogue de l'orientation sexuelle. Cependant, d'autres facteurs appuient en l'espèce cette conclusion.

b) La distinction a pour effet d'imposer des fardeaux ou des désavantages non imposés à d'autres et d'empêcher l'accès aux avantages offerts à d'autres.

(i) Objet discriminatoire

Les appelants et plusieurs des intervenants font valoir que l'objet que cherchait à atteindre le gouvernement albertain en excluant l'orientation sexuelle est lui-même discriminatoire. Les appelants prétendent qu'en décidant délibérément de ne pas prévoir l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite le gouvernement cherchait à nier que les homosexuels sont ou ont été victimes de discrimination ou, subsidiairement, à nier que les homosexuels soient dignes d'être protégés contre contend, is a discriminatory purpose. The respondents, on the other hand, argued that there is insufficient evidence of a deliberate discriminatory intent on the part of the Government.

la discrimination. Il s'agit selon eux d'un objet discriminatoire. Pour leur part, les intimés font valoir l'insuffisance de la preuve concernant l'intention discriminatoire délibérée du gouvernement.

It is, however, unnecessary to decide whether there is evidence of a discriminatory purpose on the part of the provincial government. It is well-established that a finding of discrimination does not depend on an invidious, discriminatory intent (see e.g. Turpin, supra, and more recently Eldridge, at para. 62). Even unintentional discrimination may violate the Charter. In any Charter case either an unconstitutional purpose or an unconstitutional effect is sufficient to invalidate the challenged legislation (R. v. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 S.C.R. 295, at p. 331). Therefore a finding of a discriminatory purpose in this case would merely provide another ground for the conclusion that the law is discriminatory, but is not necessary for that conclusion. In this case, the discriminatory effects of the legislation are sufficient in themselves to establish that there is discrimination in this case.

93 Il n'est pas nécessaire, toutefois, de statuer sur l'existence d'une preuve établissant l'objet discriminatoire que cherche à réaliser le gouvernement provincial. Il est bien établi que la preuve d'une intention discriminatoire odieuse n'est pas nécessaire pour conclure à l'existence d'une discrimination (voir, p. ex., Turpin, précité, et, plus récemment, l'arrêt Eldridge, au par. 62). Même une discrimination involontaire peut contrevenir à la Charte. Dans toute affaire relative à l'application de celle-ci, un objet inconstitutionnel ou un effet inconstitutionnel peuvent l'un et l'autre suffire à rendre la loi contestée invalide (R. c. Big M Drug Mart Ltd., [1985] 1 R.C.S. 295, à la p. 331). Par conséquent, la preuve qu'un objet discriminatoire était poursuivi en l'espèce fournirait simplement un motif supplémentaire de conclure que la loi est discriminatoire, elle ne serait pas nécessaire pour fonder une telle conclusion. Dans la présente affaire, les effets discriminatoires de la loi considérée suffisent en eux-mêmes pour établir l'existence de la discrimination.

(ii) Discriminatory Effects of the Exclusion

(ii) Effets discriminatoires de l'exclusion

94 The effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the protected grounds listed in the IRPA must be understood in the context of the nature and purpose of the legislation. The IRPA is a broad, comprehensive scheme for the protection of individuals from discrimination in the private sector. The preamble of the IRPA sets out the purposes and principles underlying the legislation in this manner:

94 Les effets de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs ouvrant droit à la protection prévue par l'IRPA doivent être considérés dans le contexte de la nature et de l'objet du texte législatif. L'IRPA crée un régime général et complet pour la protection des individus contre la discrimination dans le secteur privé. Son préambule énumère comme suit les objets et les principes qui la sous-tendent:

[TRADUCTION]

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

ATTENDU QUE la reconnaissance de la dignité inhérente et des droits égaux et inaliénables de chacun constitue le fondement de la liberté, de la justice et de la paix dans le monde;

WHEREAS it is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and as a matter of public policy that all persons are equal in dignity and rights without regard to race,

ATTENDU QUE l'Alberta reconnaît qu'il est fondamental et dans l'intérêt public que chacun jouisse de la même dignité et des mêmes droits sans égard à la race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin; and

WHEREAS it is fitting that this principle be affirmed by the Legislature of Alberta in an enactment whereby those rights of the individual may be protected . . . .

95 The commendable goal of the legislation, then, is to affirm and give effect to the principle that all persons are equal in dignity and rights. It prohibits discrimination in a number of areas and with respect to an increasingly expansive list of grounds.

96 The comprehensive nature of the Act must be taken into account in considering the effect of excluding one ground from its protection. It is not as if the Legislature had merely chosen to deal with one type of discrimination. In such a case it might be permissible to target only that specific type of discrimination and not another. This is, I believe, the type of case to which L'Heureux-Dubé J. was referring in the comments she made in obiter in her dissenting reasons in McKinney (at p. 436): "in my view, if the provinces chose to enact human rights legislation which only prohibited discrimination on the basis of sex, and not age, this legislation could not be held to violate the Charter". McClung J.A. in the Alberta Court of Appeal was of the opinion that these comments were binding on the court and compelled the allowance of the appeal. With respect I believe he was mistaken. Those comments contemplated a type of legislation different from that at issue in this case, namely, legislation which seeks to address one specific problem or type of discrimination. The case at bar presents a very different situation. It is concerned with legislation that purports to provide comprehensive protection from discrimination for all individuals in Alberta. The selective exclusion of one group from that comprehensive protection therefore has a very different effect.

97 The first and most obvious effect of the exclusion of sexual orientation is that lesbians or gay men who experience discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation are denied recourse to the mechanisms set up by the IRPA to make a formal aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance ou au lieu d'origine;

ATTENDU QU'il est opportun que ce principe soit consacré par la législature de l'Alberta au moyen d'un texte législatif garantissant ces droits de la personne . . .

L'objectif louable de la loi est donc d'affirmer et de mettre en œuvre le principe selon lequel chacun jouit de la même dignité et des mêmes droits. La discrimination est interdite dans un certain nombre de domaines et sur le fondement de motifs de plus en plus nombreux.

Le fait que la Loi établit un régime complet doit être pris en considération dans l'analyse de l'effet qu'a l'exclusion d'un motif de distinction illicite. Ce n'est pas comme si la législature avait simplement choisi de s'attaquer à un type de discrimination en particulier. En pareil cas, il aurait pu être acceptable de ne viser que ce type de discrimination, et pas les autres. C'est la situation à laquelle fait allusion, je crois, le juge L'Heureux-Dubé dans les remarques incidentes formulées dans son opinion dissidente dans l'arrêt McKinney (à la p. 436): «j'estime que si les provinces choisissaient d'adopter des lois sur les droits de la personne qui n'interdisent que la discrimination fondée sur le sexe et non sur l'âge, on ne pourrait dire que ces lois violent la Charte». Le juge McClung de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta a estimé que ces remarques liaient la cour et l'obligeaient à accueillir l'appel. En toute déférence, je crois qu'il a été induit en erreur. Ces remarques avaient trait à une loi d'un caractère différent de celle qui est contestée en l'espèce, savoir une loi visant un problème ou type particulier de discrimination. Les faits de la présente espèce sont très différents. Le texte législatif incriminé vise à assurer à chacun une protection complète contre la discrimination en Alberta. L'exclusion sélective d'un groupe en particulier de cette protection complète a donc un effet très différent.

Le premier effet, et le plus évident, de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle est que les homosexuels victimes de discrimination fondée sur leur orientation sexuelle n'ont pas accès à la procédure établie par l'IRPA pour le dépôt d'une plainte officomplaint of discrimination and seek a legal remedy. Thus, the Alberta Human Rights Commission could not hear Vriend's complaint and cannot consider a complaint or take any action on behalf of any person who has suffered discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation. The denial of access to remedial procedures for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation must have dire and demeaning consequences for those affected. This result is exacerbated both because the option of a civil remedy for discrimination is precluded and by the lack of success that lesbian women and gay men have had in attempting to obtain a remedy for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation by complaining on other grounds such as sex or marital status. Persons who are discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation, unlike others protected by the Act, are left without effective legal recourse for the discrimination they have suffered.

cielle et l'obtention d'une réparation. Ainsi, l'Alberta Human Rights Commission n'a pu connaître de la plainte de M. Vriend et ne peut être saisie de la plainte d'une victime de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle ni prendre quelque mesure que ce soit pour le compte d'une telle personne. Les conséquences tragiques et infamantes que ne peut manquer d'avoir le non-accès des victimes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle aux recours prévus par la Loi sont exacerbées tant par l'exclusion de tout recours au civil que par le peu de succès qu'ont eu les homosexuels qui ont tenté d'obtenir réparation pour une discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle en invoquant d'autres motifs comme le sexe ou l'état matrimonial. Contrairement aux personnes protégées par l'IRPA, les victimes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle sont privées de tout recours juridique efficace à cet égard.

It may at first be difficult to recognize the significance of being excluded from the protection of human rights legislation. However it imposes a heavy and disabling burden on those excluded. In Romer v. Evans, 116 S.Ct. 1620 (1996), the U.S. Supreme Court observed, at p. 1627:

98

Il peut être difficile de saisir d'emblée l'importance d'être exclu de la protection assurée par une loi sur les droits de la personne. Il en résulte cependant un fardeau lourd qui réduit la capacité des personnes touchées par cette exclusion. Comme l'a fait observer la Cour suprême des États-Unis dans Romer c. Evans, 116 S.Ct. 1620 (1996), à la p. 1627:

. . . the [exclusion] imposes a special disability upon those persons alone. Homosexuals are forbidden the safeguards that others enjoy or may seek without constraint. . . . These are protections taken for granted by most people either because they already have them or do not need them; these are protections against exclusion from an almost limitless number of transactions and endeavors that constitute ordinary civic life in a free society.

[TRADUCTION] . . . en raison de l'exclusion une incapacité particulière frappe ces seules personnes. Les homosexuels se voient refuser les garanties accordées aux autres ou que les autres peuvent revendiquer sans contrainte. [. . .] Il s'agit d'une protection que la plupart des gens tiennent pour acquise parce qu'ils en bénéficient déjà ou qu'ils n'en ont pas besoin; il s'agit d'une protection contre l'exclusion à l'égard d'un nombre presque illimité de rapports et d'activités dont est faite la vie du citoyen ordinaire dans une société libre.

While that case concerned an explicit exclusion and prohibition of protection from discrimination, the effect produced by the legislation in this case is similar. The denial by legislative omission of protection to individuals who may well be in need of it is just as serious and the consequences just as grave as that resulting from explicit exclusion.

Bien que cette affaire porte sur un cas explicite d'exclusion du régime de protection contre la discrimination, l'effet de la loi est semblable en l'espèce. Le refus, par la voie d'une omission du législateur, d'accorder la protection à des personnes fort susceptibles d'en avoir besoin est tout aussi grave que l'exclusion explicite du régime de protection, et ses conséquences sont toutes aussi sérieuses.

99 Apart from the immediate effect of the denial of recourse in cases of discrimination, there are other effects which, while perhaps less obvious, are at least as harmful. In Haig, the Ontario Court of Appeal based its finding of discrimination on both the "failure to provide an avenue for redress for prejudicial treatment of homosexual members of society" and "the possible inference from the omission that such treatment is acceptable" (p. 503). It can be reasonably inferred that the absence of any legal recourse for discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation perpetuates and even encourages that kind of discrimination. The respondents contend that it cannot be assumed that the "silence" of the IRPA reinforces or perpetuates discrimination, since governments "cannot legislate attitudes". However, this argument seems disingenuous in light of the stated purpose of the IRPA, to prevent discrimination. It cannot be claimed that human rights legislation will help to protect individuals from discrimination, and at the same time contend that an exclusion from the legislation will have no effect.

Outre l'effet immédiat de la privation de tout recours en cas de discrimination, il existe d'autres répercussions qui, bien qu'elles puissent être moins évidentes, sont à tout le moins aussi préjudiciables. Dans l'arrêt Haig, la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario a conclu à l'exercice d'une discrimination sur le fondement à la fois [TRADUCTION] «de l'omission de prévoir une voie de recours au bénéfice des homosexuels qui sont victimes d'actes préjudiciables» et «du fait que l'omission permet de conclure que de tels actes sont acceptables» (p. 503). Il est plausible que l'absence de tout recours légal en cas de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle perpétue, voire encourage, ce genre de discrimination. Les intimés soutiennent qu'on ne peut supposer que le «silence» de l'IRPA renforce ou perpétue la discrimination, étant donné que l'État «ne peut régir les mentalités». Toutefois, cet argument semble captieux étant donné que l'IRPA vise expressément à empêcher la discrimination. On ne peut dire qu'une loi sur les droits de la personne contribuera à protéger les individus contre la discrimination et, en même temps, prétendre qu'une exclusion du bénéfice de la loi n'aura aucun effet.

100 However, let us assume, contrary to all reasonable inferences, that exclusion from the IRPA's protection does not actually contribute to a greater incidence of discrimination on the excluded ground. Nonetheless that exclusion, deliberately chosen in the face of clear findings that discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation does exist in society, sends a strong and sinister message. The very fact that sexual orientation is excluded from the IRPA, which is the Government's primary statement of policy against discrimination, certainly suggests that discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation is not as serious or as deserving of condemnation as other forms of discrimination. It could well be said that it is tantamount to condoning or even encouraging discrimination against lesbians and gay men. Thus this exclusion clearly gives rise to an effect which constitutes discrimination.

Cependant, supposons, malgré toutes les conclusions qu'il est raisonnable de tirer, que l'exclusion d'un motif ouvrant droit à la protection prévue par l'IRPA n'a pas pour effet d'accroître la discrimination fondée sur ce motif. Cette exclusion, établie délibérément dans un contexte où il est évident que la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle existe dans la société, transmet néanmoins un message à la fois clair et sinistre. Le fait même que l'orientation sexuelle ne soit pas un motif de distinction illicite aux termes de l'IRPA, laquelle constitue le principal énoncé de politique du gouvernement contre la discrimination, laisse certainement entendre que la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle n'est pas aussi grave ou condamnable que les autres formes de discrimination. On pourrait même soutenir que cela équivaut à tolérer ou même à encourager la discrimination contre les homosexuels. En conséquence, cette exclusion a manifestement un effet qui constitue de la discrimination.

The exclusion sends a message to all Albertans that it is permissible, and perhaps even acceptable, to discriminate against individuals on the basis of their sexual orientation. The effect of that message on gays and lesbians is one whose significance cannot be underestimated. As a practical matter, it tells them that they have no protection from discrimination on the basis of their sexual orientation. Deprived of any legal redress they must accept and live in constant fear of discrimination. These are burdens which are not imposed on heterosexuals.

L'exclusion envoie à tous les Albertains le message qu'il est permis et, peut-être même, acceptable d'exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne sur le fondement de son orientation sexuelle. On ne saurait sous-estimer l'ampleur des répercussions d'un tel message sur les homosexuels. Sur le plan pratique, ce message leur dit qu'ils ne sont pas protégés contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle. Privés de tout recours légal, ils doivent accepter la discrimination et craindre constamment d'en être victimes. Il s'agit là de fardeaux que n'ont pas à porter les hétérosexuels. 101

Perhaps most important is the psychological harm which may ensue from this state of affairs. Fear of discrimination will logically lead to concealment of true identity and this must be harmful to personal confidence and self-esteem. Compounding that effect is the implicit message conveyed by the exclusion, that gays and lesbians, unlike other individuals, are not worthy of protection. This is clearly an example of a distinction which demeans the individual and strengthens and perpetrates the view that gays and lesbians are less worthy of protection as individuals in Canada's society. The potential harm to the dignity and perceived worth of gay and lesbian individuals constitutes a particularly cruel form of discrimination.

La souffrance psychologique est peut-être le préjudice le plus important dans de telles circonstances. La crainte d'être victime de discrimination mènera logiquement à la dissimulation de son identité véritable, ce qui nuit certainement à la confiance en soi et à l'estime de soi. S'ajoute à cet effet le message tacite découlant de l'exclusion, savoir que les homosexuels, contrairement aux autres personnes, ne méritent aucune protection. Il s'agit clairement d'une distinction qui avilit la personne et qui renforce et perpétue l'idée voulant que les homosexuels soient des personnes moins dignes de protection au sein de la société canadienne. L'atteinte potentielle à la dignité des homosexuels et à la valeur qu'on leur reconnaît constitue une forme particulièrement cruelle de discrimination. 102

Even if the discrimination is experienced at the hands of private individuals, it is the state that denies protection from that discrimination. Thus the adverse effects are particularly invidious. This was recognized in the following statement from Egan (at para. 161):

> The law confers a significant benefit by providing state recognition of the legitimacy of a particular status. The denial of that recognition may have a serious detrimental effect upon the sense of self-worth and dignity of members of a group because it stigmatizes them . . . . Such legislation would clearly infringe s. 15(1) because its provisions would indicate that the excluded groups were inferior and less deserving of benefits.

Même si la discrimination est le fait de particuliers, c'est l'État qui nie toute protection aux victimes. Ainsi, les répercussions défavorables sont particulièrement odieuses. C'est ce qui a été reconnu dans l'extrait suivant de l'arrêt Egan (au par. 161): 103

> La loi confère un avantage considérable en attribuant la reconnaissance de l'État à la légitimité d'un statut particulier. Le refus d'une telle reconnaissance risque d'avoir un effet gravement préjudiciable sur le sentiment de valeur personnelle et de dignité des membres d'un groupe car, même s'ils ne subissent aucune perte financière, ils s'en trouvent stigmatisés. [. . .] Une telle loi porterait clairement atteinte au par. 15(1) parce que ses dispositions feraient croire que les groupes exclus sont inférieurs et ne sont pas aussi dignes que les autres de bénéficier des avantages.

This reasoning applies a fortiori in a case such as this where the denial of recognition involves something as fundamental as the right to be free from discrimination.

104 In excluding sexual orientation from the IRPA's protection, the Government has, in effect, stated that "all persons are equal in dignity and rights", except gay men and lesbians. Such a message, even if it is only implicit, must offend s. 15(1), the "section of the Charter, more than any other, which recognizes and cherishes the innate human dignity of every individual" (Egan, at para. 128). This effect, together with the denial to individuals of any effective legal recourse in the event they are discriminated against on the ground of sexual orientation, amount to a sufficient basis on which to conclude that the distinction created by the exclusion from the IRPA constitutes discrimination.

4. "Mirror" Argument

105 The respondents take the position that if the appellants are successful, the result will be that human rights legislation will always have to "mirror" the Charter by including all of the enumerated and analogous grounds of the Charter. This would have the undesirable result of unduly constraining legislative choice and allowing the Charter to indirectly regulate private conduct, which should be left to the legislatures.

106 It is true that if the appellants' position is accepted, the result might be that the omission of one of the enumerated or analogous grounds from key provisions in comprehensive human rights legislation would always be vulnerable to constitutional challenge. It is not necessary to deal with the question since it is simply not true that human rights legislation will be forced to "mirror" the Charter in all cases. By virtue of s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982, the Charter is part of the "supreme law of Canada", and so, human rights legislation, like all other legislation in Canada, must conform to its requirements. However, the Ce raisonnement s'applique à plus forte raison dans le cas où, comme en l'espèce, le refus de reconnaissance porte sur quelque chose d'aussi fondamental que le droit d'être protégé contre la discrimination.

En soustrayant à l'application de l'IRPA la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, le gouvernement a, dans les faits, affirmé que «chacun joui[t] de la même dignité et des mêmes droits», sauf les homosexuels. Un tel message, même s'il n'est que tacite, ne peut que violer le par. 15(1), la «disposition de la Charte, plus que toute autre, qui reconnaît et défend la dignité humaine innée de chacun» (Egan, au par. 128). Cet effet, combiné à la privation de tout recours juridique efficace en cas de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, suffit pour conclure que la distinction créée par l'exclusion de l'IRPA constitue une discrimination.

4. L'argument relatif au «reflet»

Les intimés font valoir que si les appelants ont gain de cause, toute loi sur les droits de la personne devra toujours être le «reflet» de la Charte et prévoir tous les motifs énumérés dans celle-ci, de même que les motifs analogues. Un tel résultat n'est pas souhaitable selon eux parce que ce serait restreindre indûment les choix du législateur et permettre que la Charte régisse indirectement l'activité privée, laquelle devrait continuer de ressortir aux législatures.

Il est vrai que si les prétentions des appelants sont acceptées, l'omission de l'un des motifs énumérés au par. 15(1) ou des motifs analogues dans les dispositions clés d'une loi d'ensemble sur les droits de la personne serait toujours susceptible d'être contestée sur le plan constitutionnel. Toutefois, il n'est pas nécessaire d'examiner la question car il n'est tout simplement pas exact de dire que les dispositions sur les droits de la personne devront toujours être l'exact «reflet» de la Charte. Aux termes de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982, la Charte fait partie de la «loi suprême du Canada», de sorte que les dispositions relatives aux notion of "mirroring" is too simplistic. Whether an omission is unconstitutional must be assessed in each case, taking into account the nature of the exclusion, the type of legislation, and the context in which it was enacted. The determination of whether a particular exclusion complies with s. 15 of the Charter would not be made through the mechanical application of any "mirroring" principle, but rather, as in all other cases, by determining whether the exclusion was proven to be discriminatory in its specific context and whether the discrimination could be justified under s. 1. If a provincial legislature chooses to take legislative measures which do not include all of the enumerated and analogous grounds of the Charter, deference may be shown to this choice, so long as the tests for justification under s. 1, including rational connection, are satisfied.

droits de la personne, à l'instar de toute autre loi au Canada, doivent se conformer à ses exigences. Cependant, la notion de «reflet» est trop simpliste. La constitutionnalité d'une omission doit être évaluée en fonction des faits de chaque espèce, compte tenu de la nature de l'exclusion et de la loi en cause, ainsi que du contexte dans lequel cette dernière a été adoptée. La détermination de la conformité d'une exclusion donnée à l'art. 15 de la Charte ne consiste pas à appliquer, de façon mécanique, un principe de reflet, mais plutôt, comme c'est le cas pour toute autre mesure, à se demander si l'exclusion s'avère discriminatoire dans son contexte particulier et si la discrimination peut être justifiée conformément à l'article premier. Les tribunaux pourront faire preuve de retenue à l'égard du choix d'un législateur provincial qui décide de prendre des mesures législatives qui n'incluent pas tous les motifs énumérés de la Charte ou les motifs analogues dans la mesure où il est satisfait aux critères de justification de l'article premier, y compris le critère du lien rationnel.

5. Conclusion Regarding Section 15

In summary, this Court has no choice but to conclude that the IRPA, by reason of the omission of sexual orientation as a protected ground, clearly violates s. 15 of the Charter. The IRPA in its underinclusive state creates a distinction which results in the denial of the equal benefit and protection of the law on the basis of sexual orientation, a personal characteristic which has been found to be analogous to the grounds enumerated in s. 15. This, in itself, would be sufficient to conclude that discrimination is present and therefore there is a violation of s. 15. The serious discriminatory effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act reinforce this conclusion. As a result, it is clear that the IRPA, as it stands, violates the equality rights of the appellant Vriend and of other gays and lesbians. It is therefore necessary to determine whether this violation can be justified under s. 1. This analysis will be undertaken by my colleague.

5. Conclusion concernant l'art. 15

107 En résumé, notre Cour n'a d'autre choix que de conclure qu'étant donné l'omission de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite, l'IRPA viole manifestement l'art. 15 de la Charte. De par sa portée trop limitative, l'IRPA crée une distinction qui conduit à la négation du droit au même bénéfice et à la même protection de la loi sur le fondement de l'orientation sexuelle, caractéristique personnelle reconnue comme étant analogue aux motifs énumérés à l'art. 15. En soi, cela suffirait pour conclure qu'il y a discrimination et, partant, violation de l'art. 15. Les effets discriminatoires graves de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de la Loi renforcent cette conclusion. En conséquence, l'IRPA, dans sa version actuelle, viole de toute évidence les droits à l'égalité de l'appelant Vriend et des autres homosexuels. Il est donc nécessaire de décider si cette violation peut être justifiée conformément à l'article premier, analyse à laquelle procédera mon collègue.

IACOBUCCI J.

I. Analysis

A. Section 1 of the Charter

108 Section 1 of the Charter guarantees the rights and freedoms set out therein, but allows for Charter infringements provided that the state can establish that they are reasonably justifiable in a free and democratic society. The analytical framework for determining whether a statutory provision is a reasonable limit on a Charter right or freedom has been set out many times since it was first established in R. v. Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103. It was recently restated in Egan, supra, at para. 182, which was quoted with approval in Eldridge, supra, at para. 84:

> A limitation to a constitutional guarantee will be sustained once two conditions are met. First, the objective of the legislation must be pressing and substantial. Second, the means chosen to attain this legislative end must be reasonable and demonstrably justifiable in a free and democratic society. In order to satisfy the second requirement, three criteria must be satisfied: (1) the rights violation must be rationally connected to the aim of the legislation; (2) the impugned provision must minimally impair the Charter guarantee; and (3) there must be a proportionality between the effect of the measure and its objective so that the attainment of the legislative goal is not outweighed by the abridgement of the right. In all s. 1 cases the burden of proof is with the government to show on a balance of probabilities that the violation is justifiable.

1. Pressing and Substantial Objective

109 The appellants note that the jurisprudence is somewhat divided with respect to the proper focus of the analysis at this stage of the s. 1 inquiry. While some authorities have examined the purpose of the legislation in its entirety (see e.g. Miron, supra; Egan, supra), others have considered only the purpose of the limitation that allegedly infringes the Charter (see e.g. RJR-MacDonald Inc. v. Canada (Attorney General), [1995] 3 S.C.R. 199, per McLachlin J.; McKinney, supra).

LE JUGE IACOBUCCI

I. Analyse

A. L'article premier de la Charte

L'article premier de la Charte garantit les droits et libertés énoncés dans ce texte de loi, mais prévoit qu'il peut y être porté atteinte dans la mesure où l'État peut démontrer que la violation est raisonnable et justifiable dans une société libre et démocratique. Le cadre analytique servant à déterminer si une disposition législative constitue une limite raisonnable apportée à une liberté ou à un droit garantis par la Charte a été exposé à maintes reprises depuis qu'il a été énoncé la première fois dans l'arrêt R. c. Oakes, [1986] 1 R.C.S. 103. Le dernier exposé qui en a été fait dans l'arrêt Egan, précité, au par. 182, a été cité et approuvé dans l'arrêt Eldridge, précité, au par. 84:

> L'atteinte à une garantie constitutionnelle sera valide à deux conditions. Dans un premier temps, l'objectif de la loi doit se rapporter à des préoccupations urgentes et réelles. Dans un deuxième temps, le moyen utilisé pour atteindre l'objectif législatif doit être raisonnable et doit pouvoir se justifier dans une société libre et démocratique. Cette seconde condition appelle trois critères: (1) la violation des droits doit avoir un lien rationnel avec l'objectif législatif; (2) la disposition contestée doit porter le moins possible atteinte au droit garanti par la Charte, et (3) il doit y avoir proportionnalité entre l'effet de la mesure et son objectif de sorte que l'atteinte au droit garanti ne l'emporte pas sur la réalisation de l'objectif législatif. Dans le contexte de l'article premier, il incombe toujours au gouvernement de prouver selon la prépondérance des probabilités que la violation peut se justifier.

1. Objectif urgent et réel

Les appelants font observer que la jurisprudence paraît quelque peu divisée sur la portée de l'examen qu'il convient d'effectuer à cette étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier. Dans certaines décisions, en effet, la Cour a examiné l'objet de la loi prise dans son ensemble (notamment dans les arrêts Miron et Egan, précités), tandis que dans d'autres, seul l'objectif de la disposition limitative censée enfreindre la Charte a fait l'objet d'un examen (voir, par ex., les arrêts RJR-MacDonald Inc.

In my view, where, as here, a law has been found to violate the Charter owing to underinclusion, the legislation as a whole, the impugned provisions, and the omission itself are all properly considered.

c. Canada (Procureur général), [1995] 3 R.C.S 199, le juge McLachlin, et McKinney, précité). À mon avis, lorsque, comme en l'espèce, une loi est jugée contraire à la Charte en raison de sa portée trop limitative, c'est tout à la fois la loi considérée dans son ensemble, les dispositions contestées ainsi que l'omission elle-même qu'il y a lieu de prendre en compte.

Section 1 of the Charter states that it is the limits on Charter rights and freedoms that must be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society. It follows that under the first part of the Oakes test, the analysis must focus upon the objective of the impugned limitation, or in this case, the omission. Indeed, in Oakes, supra, at p. 138, Dickson C.J. noted that it was the objective "which the measures responsible for a limit on a Charter right or freedom are designed to serve" (emphasis added) that must be pressing and substantial.

110 L'article premier de la Charte dispose que ce sont les restrictions apportées aux droits et libertés qui y sont garantis dont la justification doit pouvoir se démontrer dans le cadre d'une société libre et démocratique. Il s'ensuit que suivant la première partie du critère de l'arrêt Oakes, l'analyse doit être axée sur l'objectif de la restriction contestée ou, en l'occurrence, de l'omission. De fait, dans l'arrêt Oakes, précité, à la p. 138, le juge en chef Dickson a souligné que c'était l'objectif «que visent à servir les mesures qui apportent une restriction à un droit ou à une liberté garantis par la Charte» (je souligne) qui devait être urgent et réel.

However, in my opinion, the objective of the omission cannot be fully understood in isolation. It seems to me that some consideration must also be given to both the purposes of the Act as a whole and the specific impugned provisions so as to give the objective of the omission the context that is necessary for a more complete understanding of its operation in the broader scheme of the legislation.

111 À mon avis, toutefois, on ne peut appréhender pleinement l'objectif visé par l'omission si on l'analyse isolément. Il me semble qu'il faut prendre également en considération tant les objets de la Loi dans son ensemble que les dispositions particulières contestées, de façon à situer l'objectif de l'omission dans un contexte permettant d'en mieux saisir le sens eu égard à l'économie générale de la loi.

Applying these principles to the case at bar, the preamble of the IRPA suggests that the object of the Act in its entirety is the recognition and protection of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of Albertans through the elimination of discriminatory practices. Clearly, the protection of human rights in our society is a laudable goal and is aptly described as pressing and substantial. As to the impugned provisions, their objective can generally be described as the protection against discrimination for Albertans belonging to specific groups in various settings, for example, employment and accommodation. This too is properly regarded as a pressing and substantial objective.

112 Appliquons ces principes à la présente espèce. Le préambule de l'IRPA donne à entendre que, dans son ensemble, la Loi vise à reconnaître et à protéger la dignité inhérente et les droits inaliénables des citoyens de l'Alberta par l'élimination des pratiques discriminatoires. Dans notre société, la protection des droits de la personne est certainement un objectif louable qu'on peut à bon droit qualifier d'urgent et de réel. Pour ce qui est des dispositions contestées, on peut dire que de manière générale leur objectif est la protection des Albertains appartenant à des groupes déterminés contre la discrimination exercée dans divers domaines, tel l'emploi et l'hébergement. Cet objectif peut à juste titre être également considéré comme un objectif urgent et réel.

113 Against this backdrop, what can be said of the objective of the omission? The respondents submit that only the overall goal of the Act need be examined and offer no direct submissions in answer to this question. In the Court of Appeal, absent any evidence on this point, Hunt J.A. relied on the factum of the respondents from which she gleaned several possible reasons why, when the matter was debated by the Alberta Legislature in 1985 and considered at various other times, a decision was made not to add sexual orientation to the IRPA. Some of these same reasons appear in the factum that the respondents have submitted to this Court and include the following:

- The IRPA is inadequate to address some of the concerns expressed by the homosexual community (e.g. parental acceptance) (paragraph 57);
- Attitudes cannot be changed by order of the Human Rights Commission (paragraph 57);
- Despite the Minister asking for examples which would be ameliorated by the inclusion of sexual orientation in the IRPA (e.g. employment), only a few illustrations were provided (paragraph 57);
- Codification of marginal grounds which affect few persons raises objections from larger numbers of others, adding to the number of exemptions that would have been needed to satisfy both groups (paragraph 66).

114 In my view, although these statements go some distance toward explaining the Legislature's choice to exclude sexual orientation from the IRPA, this is not the type of evidence required under the first step of the Oakes test. At the first stage of that test, the government is asked to demonstrate that the "objective" of the omission is pressing and substantial. An "objective", being a goal or a purpose to be achieved, is a very different concept from an "explanation" which makes plain that which is not immediately obvious. In my opin-

Avec cette toile de fond, que dire de l'objectif de l'omission? Les intimés soutiennent qu'il ne faut examiner que l'objectif d'ensemble de la Loi, et leur argumentation ne permet pas de répondre directement à cette question. En cour d'appel, faute de preuve sur ce point, le juge Hunt s'est fondée sur le mémoire des intimés. Elle en a dégagé plusieurs raisons pouvant expliquer pourquoi, lorsque la question a été débattue par la législature de l'Alberta en 1985 et examinée à diverses autres occasions, on a décidé de ne pas ajouter l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA. Les intimés ont repris certaines de ces raisons dans le mémoire qu'ils ont présenté à notre Cour, dont les suivantes:

- L'IRPA n'offre pas le cadre approprié pour répondre à certaines des préoccupations exprimées par la communauté homosexuelle (par ex. l'acceptation parentale) (paragraphe 57);
- Ce n'est pas une ordonnance de la Commission des droits de la personne qui peut changer les attitudes (paragraphe 57);
- Bien que le ministre ait demandé qu'on lui donne des exemples de cas où l'inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA (par ex. en matière d'emploi) pourrait apporter une amélioration, seuls quelques cas lui ont été fournis (paragraphe 57);
- La codification de motifs marginaux touchant un petit nombre de personnes soulève des objections de la part de groupes numériquement supérieurs, ce qui ajoute au nombre des exemptions qui seraient nécessaires pour satisfaire les deux groupes (paragraphe 66).

Bien que ces énoncés contribuent, dans une certaine mesure, à expliquer le choix du législateur d'exclure l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA, ce n'est pas, à mon sens, le type de preuve qu'il faut faire dans le cadre de la première étape du critère de Oakes. À cette première étape, le gouvernement doit démontrer que l'«objectif» de l'omission est urgent et réel. Or, la notion d'«objectif», savoir un but ou un objet à atteindre, est très différente de la notion d'«explication», qui signifie rendre clair ce qui n'apparaît pas évident d'emblée. À mon avis, ion, the above statements fall into the latter category and hence are of little help.

In his reasons for judgment, McClung J.A. alludes to "moral" considerations that likely informed the Legislature's choice. However, even if such considerations could be said to amount to a pressing and substantial objective (a position which I find difficult to accept in this case), I note that it is well established that the onus of justifying a Charter infringement rests on the government (see e.g. Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, supra). In the absence of any submissions regarding the pressing and substantial nature of the objective of the omission, the respondents have failed to discharge their evidentiary burden, and thus, I conclude that their case must fail at this first stage of the s. 1 analysis.

Often, the objective of an omission is discernible from the Act as a whole. Where it is not, one can look to the effects of the omission. Even if I were to put the evidentiary burden aside in an attempt to discover an objective for the omission from the provisions of the IRPA, in my view, the result would be the same. As I noted above, the overall goal of the IRPA is the protection of the dignity and rights of all persons living in Alberta. The exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act effectively denies gay men and lesbians such protection. In my view, where, as here, a legislative omission is on its face the very antithesis of the principles embodied in the legislation as a whole, the Act itself cannot be said to indicate any discernible objective for the omission that might be described as pressing and substantial so as to justify overriding constitutionally protected rights. Thus, on either analysis, the respondents' case fails at the initial step of the Oakes test.

2. Proportionality Analysis

(a) Rational Connection

On the basis of my conclusion above, it is not necessary to analyse the second part of the Oakes test to dispose of this appeal. However, to deal les énoncés susmentionnés relèvent de la dernière catégorie et ne sont donc pas d'un grand secours.

115 Dans ses motifs, le juge McClung fait allusion aux considérations «morales» qui ont vraisemblablement guidé le choix du législateur. Toutefois, même si ces considérations pouvaient être qualifiées d'urgentes et réelles (opinion difficilement acceptable à mon sens en l'espèce), je souligne que, selon une jurisprudence constante, c'est au gouvernement qu'incombe la responsabilité de justifier la violation de la Charte (voir par ex. Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, précité). Vu l'absence d'observations quant à la nature urgente et réelle de l'objectif de l'omission, les intimés ne se sont pas déchargés de leur fardeau de preuve et j'en conclus qu'ils n'ont pas réussi à franchir cette première étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier.

116 L'objectif d'une omission se dégage souvent de la Loi considérée dans son ensemble. Dans le cas contraire, l'on peut examiner les effets de l'omission. Toutefois, même si j'écartais la question du fardeau de la preuve pour tenter de discerner l'objectif de l'omission dans les dispositions de l'IRPA, le résultat serait à mon avis le même. Comme je l'ai indiqué précédemment, le but général de l'IRPA est la protection de la dignité et des droits de tous les habitants de l'Alberta. Or, l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle nie de fait cette protection aux homosexuels. À mon sens, lorsque, comme en l'espèce, une omission du législateur est à première vue l'antithèse des principes qu'incarne le texte dans son ensemble, on ne peut dire que l'omission correspond à un objectif qui ressort de la Loi elle-même et qui serait urgent et réel, de telle sorte que soit justifiée une dérogation à des droits constitutionnellement protégés. Donc, suivant l'une ou l'autre analyse, les intimés échouent à l'étape initiale du critère de l'arrêt Oakes.

2. Évaluation de la proportionnalité

a) Lien rationnel

117 Compte tenu de la conclusion que je viens de tirer, il n'est pas nécessaire d'analyser la seconde partie du critère de l'arrêt Oakes pour trancher le with this matter more fully, I will go on to consider the remainder of the test. I will assume, solely for the sake of the analysis, that the respondents correctly argued that where the objective of the whole of the legislation is pressing and substantial, this is sufficient to satisfy the first stage of the inquiry under s. 1 of the Charter.

présent pourvoi. Toutefois, pour analyser cette question plus avant, j'examinerai les autres aspects du critère. Je présume, uniquement aux fins de l'analyse, que les intimés ont prétendu à bon droit que lorsque le texte législatif dans son ensemble vise un objectif urgent et réel, cela suffit à satisfaire à la première étape de l'analyse fondée sur l'article premier de la Charte.

118 At the second stage of the Oakes test, the preliminary inquiry is a consideration of the rationality of the impugned provisions (Oakes, supra, at p. 141). The party invoking s. 1 must demonstrate that a rational connection exists between the objective of the provisions under attack and the measures that have been adopted. Thus, in the case at bar, it falls to the Legislature to show that there is a rational connection between the goal of protection against discrimination for Albertans belonging to specific groups in various settings, and the exclusion of gay men and lesbians from the impugned provisions of the IRPA.

À la seconde étape du critère de l'arrêt Oakes, l'examen préliminaire porte sur la rationalité des dispositions contestées (Oakes, précité, à la p. 141). La partie invoquant l'article premier doit établir qu'il existe un lien rationnel entre l'objectif des dispositions attaquées et les mesures qui ont été adoptées. En l'espèce, il incombe donc au législateur de prouver qu'il y a un lien rationnel entre d'une part le but à atteindre, soit la protection des Albertains appartenant à des groupes déterminés contre la discrimination exercée dans divers domaines, et d'autre part l'exclusion des homosexuels des dispositions contestées de l'IRPA.

119 Far from being rationally connected to the objective of the impugned provisions, the exclusion of sexual orientation from the Act is antithetical to that goal. Indeed, it would be nonsensical to say that the goal of protecting persons from discrimination is rationally connected to, or advanced by, denying such protection to a group which this Court has recognized as historically disadvantaged (see Egan, supra).

Loin d'être rationnellement liée à l'objectif des dispositions contestées, l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle en est l'antithèse. Il serait absurde, en vérité, d'affirmer qu'il existe un lien rationnel entre la protection contre la discrimination et le refus d'accorder cette même protection à un groupe qui, d'après la jurisprudence de notre Cour, a été victime d'un désavantage historique (voir l'arrêt Egan, précité), ou de soutenir que l'objectif de protection peut être atteint de cette façon.

120 However, relying on the reasons of Sopinka J. in Egan, the respondents submit that a rational connection to the purpose of a statute can be achieved through the use of incremental means which, over time, expand the scope of the legislation to all those whom the legislature determines to be in need of statutory protection. The respondents further suggest that the legislative history of the IRPA demonstrates a pattern of progressive incrementalism sufficient to meet the Government's onus under the rational connection stage of the Oakes

Les intimés, toutefois, s'appuyant sur les motifs du juge Sopinka dans l'arrêt Egan, soutiennent que le lien rationnel peut s'établir de façon graduelle, par élargissement progressif de la portée de la loi, de façon que celle-ci s'applique avec le temps à tous ceux qui, d'après le législateur, ont besoin de protection législative. Les intimés affirment en outre que l'historique de l'IRPA montre l'existence d'un élargissement progressif permettant au gouvernement de s'acquitter du fardeau de la preuve qui lui incombe à l'étape relative au lien rationnel test. In my view, this argument cannot be sustained.

The incrementalism approach was advocated in Egan by Sopinka J. in a context very different from that in the case at bar. Firstly, in Egan, where the concern was the exclusion of same-sex couples from the Old Age Security Act's definition of the term "spouse", the Attorney General took the position that more acceptable arrangements could be worked out over time. In contrast, in the present case, the inclusion of sexual orientation in the IRPA has been repeatedly rejected by the Alberta Legislature. Thus, it is difficult to see how any form of "incrementalism" is being applied with regard to the protection of the rights of gay men and lesbians. Secondly, in Egan there was considerable concern regarding the financial impact of extending a benefits scheme to a previously excluded group. Including sexual orientation in the IRPA does not give rise to the same concerns. Indeed, the trial judge, despite the absence of evidence on this matter, assumed that the budgetary impact on the Human Rights Commission would not be substantial enough to change the scheme of the legislation. Having not heard anything persuasive to the contrary, I am prepared to make this same assumption.

In addition, in Egan, writing on behalf of myself and Cory J., I took the position that the need for governmental incrementalism was an inappropriate justification for Charter violations. I remain convinced that this approach is generally not suitable for that purpose, especially where, as here, the statute in issue is a comprehensive code of human rights provisions. In my opinion, groups that have historically been the target of discrimination cannot be expected to wait patiently for the protection of their human dignity and equal rights while governments move toward reform one step at a time. If the infringement of the rights and freedoms of these groups is permitted to persist while governments fail to pursue equality diligently, then the de l'application du critère établi dans l'arrêt Oakes. Selon moi, cet argument n'est pas fondé.

121 Le contexte ayant amené le juge Sopinka à préconiser la formule graduelle dans l'arrêt Egan diffère passablement de la présente situation. Premièrement, dans cette affaire portant sur l'exclusion des couples de même sexe de la définition du terme «conjoint» énoncée dans la Loi sur la sécurité de la vieillesse, le procureur général avait soutenu qu'il était possible de parvenir, avec le temps, à des solutions plus acceptables. En l'espèce, par contre, la législature de l'Alberta a refusé à maintes reprises d'ajouter l'orientation sexuelle aux motifs de discrimination interdits par l'IRPA. Il est difficile d'y voir une progression graduelle de la protection des droits des homosexuels. Deuxièmement, on s'était beaucoup intéressé, dans l'affaire Egan, à la question des répercussions financières qu'entraînerait l'application d'un régime de prestations à un groupe auparavant exclu. L'ajout de l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA ne suscite pas les mêmes préoccupations. En fait, le juge de première instance a tenu pour acquis, malgré l'absence de preuve sur ce point, que les conséquences de cet ajout sur le budget de la Human Rights Commission ne seraient pas assez importantes pour modifier l'économie de la Loi. Comme on ne m'a pas convaincu du contraire, j'incline à tirer la même conclusion.

122 En outre, j'ai exprimé l'opinion, dans les motifs que j'ai exposés en mon nom et au nom du juge Cory dans l'arrêt Egan, que la nécessité pour le gouvernement de procéder par étape ne pouvait justifier une violation de la Charte. Je demeure convaincu que cette approche ne convient pas en général, surtout lorsque la loi en cause est, comme en l'espèce, un code complet des droits de la personne. À mon avis, on ne peut demander à des groupes qui sont depuis longtemps victimes de discrimination d'attendre patiemment que les gouvernements en viennent, étape par étape, à protéger leur dignité et leur droit à l'égalité. Si on tolère que les atteintes aux droits et aux libertés de ces groupes se poursuivent pendant que les gouverne-guarantees of the Charter will be reduced to little more than empty words.

(b) Minimal Impairment

123 The respondents contend that an IRPA which is silent as to sexual orientation minimally impairs the appellants' s. 15 rights. The IRPA is alleged to be the type of social policy legislation that requires the Alberta Legislature to mediate between competing groups. It is suggested that the competing interests in the present case are religious freedom and homosexuality. Relying upon Sopinka J.'s reasons in Egan, the respondents advocate judicial deference in these circumstances. I reject these submissions for several reasons.

124 To begin, I cannot accede to the suggestion that the Alberta Legislature has been cast in the role of mediator between competing groups. To the extent that there may be a conflict between religious freedom and the protection of gay men and lesbians, the IRPA contains internal mechanisms for balancing these rival concerns. Section 11.1 of the IRPA provides a defence where the discrimination was "reasonable and justifiable in the circumstances". In addition, ss. 7(3) and 8(2) excuse discrimination which can be linked to a bona fide occupational requirement. The balancing provisions ensure that no conferral of rights is absolute. Rather, rights are recognized in tandem, with no one right being automatically paramount to another.

125 Given the presence of the internal balancing mechanisms, the argument that the Government's choices regarding the conferral of rights are constrained by its role as mediator between competing concerns cannot be sustained. The Alberta Legislature is not being asked to abandon the role of mediator. Rather, by virtue of the provisions of the IRPA, this is a task which is carried out as the Act is applied on a case-by-case basis in specific factual contexts. Thus, in the present case it is no answer to say that rights cannot be conferred upon one group because of a conflict with the rights of ments négligent de prendre des mesures diligentes pour réaliser l'égalité, les garanties inscrites dans la Charte ne seront guère plus que des vœux pieux.

b) Atteinte minimale

Les intimés prétendent que l'IRPA, qui ne fait pas mention de l'orientation sexuelle, porte le moins possible atteinte aux droits des appelants garantis par l'art. 15. Selon eux, l'IRPA est un instrument législatif de politique sociale qui requiert de la législature de l'Alberta qu'elle agisse comme arbitre des revendications de groupes opposés. Ils affirment que les intérêts opposés en cause sont la liberté de religion et l'homosexualité. Invoquant les motifs du juge Sopinka dans l'arrêt Egan, les intimés exhortent la Cour à faire preuve de retenue judiciaire. Plusieurs raisons s'opposent à ce que je me rende à leurs arguments.

D'abord, je ne puis souscrire à l'opinion selon laquelle la législature de l'Alberta assume un rôle d'arbitre entre des groupes opposés. Si tant est qu'il y ait conflit entre la liberté de religion et la protection des homosexuels, l'IRPA renferme des mécanismes permettant de pondérer ces intérêts rivaux. En effet, l'art. 11.1 de l'IRPA prévoit un moyen de défense lorsque la discrimination est [TRADUCTION] «raisonnable et justifiable dans les circonstances», et les par. 7(3) et 8(2) excusent la discrimination lorsqu'elle se rattache à une exigence professionnelle justifiée. Ces dispositions de pondération font en sorte qu'aucun des droits conférés n'est absolu. Les droits sont reconnus les uns par rapport aux autres, et aucun n'a automatiquement préséance sur un autre.

Étant donné l'existence de ces mécanismes internes de pondération, l'argument voulant que le rôle d'arbitre entre des intérêts opposés que joue le gouvernement réduit les options qui lui sont ouvertes en matière d'octroi de droits ne saurait être retenu. Il ne s'agit pas de demander à la législature de l'Alberta de renoncer à son rôle de médiateur. En vertu de l'IRPA, cette tâche doit plutôt être accomplie, au cas par cas, en fonction des faits de chaque affaire. En l'espèce, par conséquent, il n'est pas fondé d'affirmer que des droits ne peuvent être conférés à un groupe en raison others. A complete solution to any such conflict already exists within the legislation.

In any event, although this Court has recognized that the Legislatures ought to be accorded some leeway when making choices between competing social concerns (see e.g. Irwin Toy Ltd. v. Quebec (Attorney General), [1989] 1 S.C.R. 927; Egan, supra, per Sopinka J.), judicial deference is not without limits. In Eldridge, supra, La Forest J. quoted with approval from his reasons in Tétreault-Gadoury v. Canada (Employment and Immigration Commission), [1991] 2 S.C.R. 22, at p. 44, wherein he stated that "the deference that will be accorded to the government when legislating in these matters does not give them an unrestricted licence to disregard an individual's Charter rights". This position was echoed by McLachlin J. in RJR-MacDonald, supra, at para. 136:

> . . . care must be taken not to extend the notion of deference too far. Deference must not be carried to the point of relieving the government of the burden which the Charter places upon it of demonstrating that the limits it has imposed on guaranteed rights are reasonable and justifiable. Parliament has its role: to choose the appropriate response to social problems within the limiting framework of the Constitution. But the courts also have a role: to determine, objectively and impartially, whether Parliament's choice falls within the limiting framework of the Constitution. The courts are no more permitted to abdicate their responsibility than is Parliament. To carry judicial deference to the point of accepting Parliament's view simply on the basis that the problem is serious and the solution is difficult, would be to diminish the role of the courts in the constitutional process and to weaken the structure of rights upon which our constitution and our nation is founded.

In the present case, the Government of Alberta has failed to demonstrate that it had a reasonable basis for excluding sexual orientation from the IRPA. Gay men and lesbians do not have any, much less equal, protection against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation under the IRPA. The exclusion constitutes total, not minimal, impairment of the Charter guarantee of equality.

d'un conflit avec les droits des autres. La Loi prévoit déjà la façon de régler de tels conflits.

126 Quoi qu'il en soit, même si notre Cour a reconnu que le législateur doit jouir d'une certaine latitude lorsqu'il fait des choix entre des intérêts sociaux divergents (voir les arrêts Irwin Toy Ltd. c. Québec (Procureur général), [1989] 1 R.C.S. 927, et Egan, précité, le juge Sopinka), le principe de la retenue judiciaire n'est pas sans limite. Dans l'arrêt Eldridge, précité, le juge La Forest a repris les motifs qu'il avait prononcés dans l'arrêt Tétreault-Gadoury c. Canada (Commission de l'emploi et de l'immigration), [1991] 2 R.C.S. 22, à la p. 44, et dans lesquels il affirmait que «la retenue dont il sera fait preuve à l'égard du gouvernement qui légifère en ces matières ne lui permet pas d'enfreindre en toute impunité les droits dont bénéficie un individu en vertu de la Charte». Le juge McLachlin a fait écho à cette position dans l'arrêt RJR-MacDonald, précité, au par. 136:

> . . . il faut prendre soin de ne pas pousser trop loin la notion du respect. Le respect porté ne doit pas aller jusqu'au point de libérer le gouvernement de l'obligation que la Charte lui impose de démontrer que les restrictions qu'il apporte aux droits garantis sont raisonnables et justifiables. Le Parlement a son rôle: choisir la réponse qui convient aux problèmes sociaux dans les limites prévues par la Constitution. Cependant, les tribunaux ont aussi un rôle: déterminer de façon objective et impartiale si le choix du Parlement s'inscrit dans les limites prévues par la Constitition. Les tribunaux n'ont pas plus le droit que le Parlement d'abdiquer leur responsabilité. Les tribunaux se trouveraient à diminuer leur rôle à l'intérieur du processus constitutionnel et à affaiblir la structure des droits sur lesquels notre constitution et notre nation sont fondées, s'ils portaient le respect jusqu'au point d'accepter le point de vue du Parlement simplement pour le motif que le problème est sérieux et la solution difficile.

127 En l'espèce, le gouvernement de l'Alberta n'a pas démontré qu'il avait un motif raisonnable d'exclure l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA. Cette loi ne confère aux homosexuels aucune protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, et encore moins une protection égale. Une telle exclusion constitue une atteinte intégrale, et non minimale, à la garantie d'égalité énoncée

In these circumstances, the call for judicial deference is inappropriate.

(c) Proportionality Between the Effect of the Measure and the Objective of the Legislation

128 The respondents did not address this third element of the proportionality requirement. However, in my view, the deleterious effects of the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA, as noted by Cory J., are numerous and clear. As the Alberta Government has failed to demonstrate any salutary effect of the exclusion in promoting and protecting human rights, I cannot accept that there is any proportionality between the attainment of the legislative goal and the infringement of the appellants' equality rights. I conclude that the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA does not meet the requirements of the Oakes test and accordingly, it cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter.

II. Remedy

A. Introduction: The Relationship Between the Legislatures and the Courts Under the Charter

129 Having found the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA to be an unjustifiable violation of the appellants' equality rights, I now turn to the question of remedy under s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982. Before discussing the jurisprudence on remedies, I believe it might be helpful to pause to reflect more broadly on the general issue of the relationship between legislatures and the courts in the age of the Charter.

130 Much was made in argument before us about the inadvisability of the Court interfering with or otherwise meddling in what is regarded as the proper role of the legislature, which in this case was to decide whether or not sexual orientation would be added to Alberta's human rights legislation. Indeed, it seems that hardly a day goes by without some comment or criticism to the effect that under par la Charte. Dans ces circonstances, il ne convient pas d'invoquer le principe de la retenue judiciaire.

c) Proportionnalité entre l'effet de la mesure et l'objectif de la loi

Les intimés n'ont pas abordé ce troisième élément de l'exigence relative à la proportionnalité. J'estime toutefois que les effets néfastes de l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA sont, ainsi que le juge Cory l'a mentionné, nombreux et clairs. Comme le gouvernement de l'Alberta n'a pas établi quels bienfaits cette exclusion apportait à la promotion et à la protection des droits de la personne, je ne puis conclure à l'existence d'une quelconque proportionnalité entre l'atteinte de l'objectif législatif et la violation des droits à l'égalité des appelants. Je suis donc d'avis que l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA ne satisfait pas aux exigences du critère énoncé dans l'arrêt Oakes et qu'elle ne peut, en conséquence, être justifiée en vertu de l'article premier.

II. Réparation

A. Introduction: la relation entre le législateur et les tribunaux sous le régime de la Charte

Vu ma conclusion selon laquelle l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA contrevient de façon injustifiable aux droits des appelants à l'égalité, j'aborde maintenant la question de la réparation à accorder sous le régime de l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982. Il pourrait être utile, avant d'analyser la jurisprudence en cette matière, d'approfondir la question plus générale de la relation existant entre le législateur et les tribunaux à l'ère de la Charte.

On a soutenu avec insistance, au cours de l'argumentation, qu'il n'était pas souhaitable que la Cour intervienne ou s'immisce autrement dans ce qui est considéré comme le rôle propre du législateur, savoir, en l'espèce, trancher la question de l'ajout de l'orientation sexuelle au nombre des motifs de discrimination interdits par la loi albertaine relative aux droits de la personne. De fait, il the Charter courts are wrongfully usurping the role of the legislatures. I believe this allegation misunderstands what took place and what was intended when our country adopted the Charter in 1981-82.

When the Charter was introduced, Canada went, in the words of former Chief Justice Brian Dickson, from a system of Parliamentary supremacy to constitutional supremacy ("Keynote Address", in The Cambridge Lectures 1985 (1985), at pp. 3-4). Simply put, each Canadian was given individual rights and freedoms which no government or legislature could take away. However, as rights and freedoms are not absolute, governments and legislatures could justify the qualification or infringement of these constitutional rights under s. 1 as I previously discussed. Inevitably disputes over the meaning of the rights and their justification would have to be settled and here the role of the judiciary enters to resolve these disputes. Many countries have assigned the important role of judicial review to their supreme or constitutional courts (for an excellent analysis on these developments see D. M. Beatty, ed., Human Rights and Judicial Review: A Comparative Perspective (1994); B. Ackerman, "The Rise of World Constitutionalism" (1997), 83 Va. L. Rev. 771).

We should recall that it was the deliberate choice of our provincial and federal legislatures in adopting the Charter to assign an interpretive role to the courts and to command them under s. 52 to declare unconstitutional legislation invalid.

However, giving courts the power and commandment to invalidate legislation where necessary has not eliminated the debate over the "legitimacy" of courts taking such action. As eloquently put by A. M. Bickel in his outstanding work The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (2nd ed. 1986), "it thwarts the will of representatives of the . . . people" (p. 17). So judicial review, it is alleged, is illegitimate se passe rarement une journée, semble-t-il, sans qu'on entende des commentaires ou des critiques selon lesquels la Charte permet aux tribunaux d'usurper le rôle du législateur. Je crois que ces propos reflètent une méconnaissance de ce qui s'est passé et de ce que l'on cherchait à accomplir quand notre pays a adopté la Charte en 1981-1982.

131 Lorsque la Charte a été introduite, le Canada est passé du système de la suprématie parlementaire à celui de la suprématie constitutionnelle, pour reprendre les propos de l'ancien juge en chef Brian Dickson («Keynote Address», dans The Cambridge Lectures 1985 (1985), aux pp. 3 et 4). Plus simplement, chaque citoyen canadien a reçu des droits et des libertés qu'aucun gouvernement ni aucune législature ne pouvait lui reprendre. Ces droits et libertés n'étant pas absolus, toutefois, les gouvernements et les législatures pouvaient justifier la restriction ou la violation de ces droits constitutionnels en conformité avec l'article premier, ainsi que je l'ai déjà expliqué. Il était inévitable que surgissent des litiges concernant la portée des droits et leur justification et que les tribunaux soient appelés à les régler. Dans de nombreux pays, l'importante tâche de la révision judiciaire a été confiée à la cour suprême ou à la cour constitutionnelle (pour une excellente analyse de cette tendance nouvelle, voir D. M. Beatty, dir., Human Rights and Judicial Review: A Comparative Perspective (1994); B. Ackerman, «The Rise of World Constitutionalism» (1997), 83 Va. L. Rev. 771).

132 Souvenons-nous que les législatures provinciales et le Parlement ont volontairement décidé, en adoptant la Charte, de confier un rôle interprétatif aux tribunaux et de leur prescrire, sous le régime de l'art. 52, de déclarer invalides les lois inconstitutionnelles.

133 Toutefois, le fait de conférer aux tribunaux le pouvoir et l'obligation d'invalider des lois lorsque cela était nécessaire n'a pas éliminé le débat entourant la «légitimité» d'une telle action par les tribunaux. Comme A. M. Bickel l'exprime éloquemment dans son remarquable ouvrage The Least Dangerous Branch: The Supreme Court at the Bar of Politics (2e éd. 1986), [TRADUCTION] «cela contredit la volonté des représentants du peuple» because it is anti-democratic in that unelected officials (judges) are overruling elected representatives (legislators) (see e.g. A. A. Peacock, ed., Rethinking the Constitution: Perspectives on Canadian Constitutional Reform, Interpretation, and Theory (1996); R. Knopff and F. L. Morton, Charter Politics (1992); M. Mandel, The Charter of Rights and the Legalization of Politics in Canada (1994), c. 2).

(p. 17). Ainsi, les tenants de cette opinion soutiennent que la révision judiciaire est illégitime parce qu'elle permet à des personnes qui n'ont pas été élues (les juges) d'infirmer les décisions des élus (le législateur), ce qui est antidémocratique (voir par ex. A. A. Peacock, dir., Rethinking the Constitution: Perspectives on Canadian Constitutional Reform, Interpretation, and Theory (1996); R. Knopff et F. L. Morton, Charter Politics (1992); M. Mandel, La Charte des droits et libertés et la judiciarisation du politique au Canada (1996), ch. 2).

134 To respond, it should be emphasized again that our Charter's introduction and the consequential remedial role of the courts were choices of the Canadian people through their elected representatives as part of a redefinition of our democracy. Our constitutional design was refashioned to state that henceforth the legislatures and executive must perform their roles in conformity with the newly conferred constitutional rights and freedoms. That the courts were the trustees of these rights insofar as disputes arose concerning their interpretation was a necessary part of this new design.

Pour répondre à ces arguments, il faut, encore une fois, insister sur le fait que, par le truchement de ses élus, le peuple canadien a choisi, dans le cadre de la redéfinition de la démocratie canadienne, d'adopter la Charte et, par suite, de donner au tribunaux un rôle correctif à jouer. Notre Constitution a été réaménagée de façon à déclarer que dorénavant le pouvoir législatif et le pouvoir exécutif devront exercer leurs fonctions dans le respect des libertés et droits constitutionnels nouvellement reconnus. La dévolution aux tribunaux du rôle de fiduciaires à l'égard de ces droits en cas de litiges quant à leur interprétation constituait un élément nécessaire de ce nouveau régime.

135 So courts in their trustee or arbiter role must perforce scrutinize the work of the legislature and executive not in the name of the courts, but in the interests of the new social contract that was democratically chosen. All of this is implied in the power given to the courts under s. 24 of the Charter and s. 52 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

Il s'ensuit obligatoirement qu'en leur qualité de fiduciaires ou d'arbitres, les tribunaux doivent examiner les actes du pouvoir législatif et du pouvoir exécutif, non en leur nom propre mais pour l'exécution du nouveau contrat social démocratiquement conclu. Ce rôle découle implicitement du pouvoir conféré aux tribunaux par l'art. 24 de la Charte et l'art. 52 de la Loi constitutionnelle de 1982.

136 Because the courts are independent from the executive and legislature, litigants and citizens generally can rely on the courts to make reasoned and principled decisions according to the dictates of the constitution even though specific decisions may not be universally acclaimed. In carrying out their duties, courts are not to second-guess legislatures and the executives; they are not to make value judgments on what they regard as the proper policy choice; this is for the other branches. Rather, the courts are to uphold the Constitution

Parce que les tribunaux sont indépendants des pouvoirs exécutif et législatif, les justiciables et les citoyens en général peuvent habituellement s'attendre à ce qu'ils rendent des décisions motivées et étayées, conformes aux prescriptions constitutionnelles, même si certaines d'entre elles peuvent ne pas faire l'unanimité. Les tribunaux n'ont pas, pour accomplir leurs fonctions, à se substituer après coup aux législatures ou aux gouvernements; ils ne doivent pas passer de jugement de valeur sur ce qu'ils considèrent comme les politiques à adopand have been expressly invited to perform that role by the Constitution itself. But respect by the courts for the legislature and executive role is as important as ensuring that the other branches respect each others' role and the role of the courts.

ter; cette tâche appartient aux autres organes de gouvernement. Il incombe plutôt aux tribunaux de faire respecter la Constitution, et c'est la Constitution elle-même qui leur confère expressément ce rôle. Toutefois, il est tout aussi important, pour les tribunaux, de respecter eux-mêmes les fonctions du pouvoir législatif et de l'exécutif que de veiller au respect, par ces pouvoirs, de leur rôle respectif et de celui des tribunaux.

This mutual respect is in some ways expressed in the provisions of our constitution as shown by the wording of certain of the constitutional rights themselves. For example, s. 7 of the Charter speaks of no denial of the rights therein except in accordance with the principles of fundamental justice, which include the process of law and legislative action. Section 1 and the jurisprudence under it are also important to ensure respect for legislative action and the collective or societal interests represented by legislation. In addition, as will be discussed below, in fashioning a remedy with regard to a Charter violation, a court must be mindful of the role of the legislature. Moreover, s. 33, the notwithstanding clause, establishes that the final word in our constitutional structure is in fact left to the legislature and not the courts (see P. Hogg and A. Bushell, "The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures" (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75).

137 Ce respect mutuel ressort d'une certaine façon de l'énoncé même de certains droits constitutionnels dans notre Constitution. Par exemple, l'art. 7 de la Charte énonce qu'il ne peut être porté atteinte aux droits qui y sont énumérés qu'en conformité avec les principes de justice fondamentale, lesquels comprennent l'application régulière de la loi et l'action législative. L'article premier et la jurisprudence qui s'y rapporte revêtent également une grande importance pour le respect de l'action législative et des intérêts collectifs et sociétaux que représente la législation. De plus, comme nous le verrons plus loin, lorsqu'un tribunal se prononce sur une mesure visant à corriger une contravention à la Charte, il ne doit jamais oublier le rôle du législateur. En outre, la disposition de dérogation — l'art. 33 — a pour effet, dans notre régime constitutionnel, de laisser le dernier mot au législateur et non aux tribunaux (voir P. Hogg et A. Bushell, «The Charter Dialogue Between Courts and Legislatures» (1997), 35 Osgoode Hall L.J. 75).

As I view the matter, the Charter has given rise to a more dynamic interaction among the branches of governance. This interaction has been aptly described as a "dialogue" by some (see e.g. Hogg and Bushell, supra). In reviewing legislative enactments and executive decisions to ensure constitutional validity, the courts speak to the legislative and executive branches. As has been pointed out, most of the legislation held not to pass constitutional muster has been followed by new legislation designed to accomplish similar objectives (see Hogg and Bushell, supra, at p. 82). By doing this, the legislature responds to the courts; hence the dialogue among the branches.

138 À mon avis, la Charte a suscité une interaction plus dynamique entre les organes du gouvernement, que d'aucuns ont qualifiée, à juste titre, de «dialogue» (voir par exemple Hogg et Bushell, loc. cit.). En examinant la validité constitutionnelle de textes de loi ou de décisions de l'exécutif, les tribunaux parlent au législatif et à l'exécutif. Comme il en a été fait mention, la plupart des dispositions législatives qui n'ont pas résisté à un examen constitutionnel ont été suivies de nouvelles dispositions visant des objectifs similaires (voir Hogg et Bushell, loc. cit., à la p. 82). Le législateur, de cette façon, répond aux tribunaux, d'où l'analogie du dialogue entre les différents organes du gouvernement.

139 To my mind, a great value of judicial review and this dialogue among the branches is that each of the branches is made somewhat accountable to the other. The work of the legislature is reviewed by the courts and the work of the court in its decisions can be reacted to by the legislature in the passing of new legislation (or even overarching laws under s. 33 of the Charter). This dialogue between and accountability of each of the branches have the effect of enhancing the democratic process, not denying it.

La révision judiciaire et ce dialogue sont précieux, selon moi, parce qu'ils obligent en quelque sorte les divers organes du gouvernement à se rendre mutuellement des comptes. Les tribunaux examinent le travail du législateur, et le législateur réagit aux décisions des tribunaux en adoptant d'autres textes de loi (ou même en se prévalant de l'art. 33 de la Charte pour les soustraire à la Charte). Ce dialogue et ce processus de reddition de compte entre organes du gouvernement, loin de nuire au processus démocratique, l'enrichissent.

140 There is also another aspect of judicial review that promotes democratic values. Although a court's invalidation of legislation usually involves negating the will of the majority, we must remember that the concept of democracy is broader than the notion of majority rule, fundamental as that may be. In this respect, we would do well to heed the words of Dickson C.J. in Oakes, supra, at p. 136:

Un autre aspect de la révision judiciaire contribue à la promotion des valeurs démocratiques. Même si l'invalidation judiciaire d'une disposition législative contredit habituellement la volonté de la majorité, il ne faut pas perdre de vue que l'idée de démocratie transcende la règle de la majorité, toute fondamentale que soit cette dernière. Il serait bon, à cet égard, de ne pas oublier les propos suivants du juge en chef Dickson dans l'arrêt Oakes, précité, à la p. 136:

> The Court must be guided by the values and principles essential to a free and democratic society which I believe to embody, to name but a few, respect for the inherent dignity of the human person, commitment to social justice and equality, accommodation of a wide variety of beliefs, respect for cultural and group identity, and faith in social and political institutions which enhance the participation of individuals and groups in society.

> Les tribunaux doivent être guidés par des valeurs et des principes essentiels à une société libre et démocratique, lesquels comprennent, selon moi, le respect de la dignité inhérente de l'être humain, la promotion de la justice et de l'égalité sociales, l'acceptation d'une grande diversité de croyances, le respect de chaque culture et de chaque groupe et la foi dans les institutions sociales et politiques qui favorisent la participation des particuliers et des groupes dans la société.

141 So, for example, when a court interprets legislation alleged to be a reasonable limitation in a free and democratic society as stated in s. 1 of the Charter, the court must inevitably delineate some of the attributes of a democratic society. Although it is not necessary to articulate the complete list of democratic attributes in these remarks, Dickson C.J.'s comments remain instructive (see also: R. v. Keegstra, [1990] 3 S.C.R. 697, per Dickson C.J.; B. (R.) v. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, supra, per La Forest J.).

Ainsi, par exemple, le tribunal qui interprète une disposition législative présentée comme une limite raisonnable dans une société libre et démocratique au sens de l'article premier de la Charte, doit inévitablement définir certaines caractéristiques d'une société démocratique. Bien qu'il ne soit pas nécessaire d'évoquer toutes les caractéristiques démocratiques énumérées dans ces remarques, le commentaire du juge en chef Dickson demeure pertinent (voir également: R. c. Keegstra, [1990] 3 R.C.S. 697, le juge en chef Dickson; B. (R.) c. Children's Aid Society of Metropolitan Toronto, précité, le juge La Forest).

142 Democratic values and principles under the Charter demand that legislators and the executive take these into account; and if they fail to do so, courts should stand ready to intervene to protect these democratic values as appropriate. As others have so forcefully stated, judges are not acting undemocratically by intervening when there are indications that a legislative or executive decision was not reached in accordance with the democratic principles mandated by the Charter (see W. Black, "Vriend, Rights and Democracy" (1996), 7 Constitutional Forum 126; D. M. Beatty, "Law and Politics" (1996), 44 Am. J. Comp. L. 131, at p. 149; M. Jackman, "Protecting Rights and Promoting Democracy: Judicial Review Under Section 1 of the Charter" (1996), 34 Osgoode Hall L.J. 661).

Le pouvoir législatif et le pouvoir exécutif ont l'obligation de tenir compte des valeurs et des principes démocratiques reconnus dans la Charte

et, s'ils ne le font pas, les tribunaux doivent être prêts à intervenir pour protéger comme il se doit ces valeurs et principes. Comme certains auteurs l'ont affirmé avec vigueur, les juges n'agissent pas de façon antidémocratique en intervenant lorsque des décisions d'ordre législatif ou exécutif ne semblent pas avoir été prises en conformité avec les principes démocratiques prescrits par la Charte (voir W. Black, «Vriend, Rights and Democracy» (1996), 7 Forum constitutionnel 126; D. M. Beatty, «Law and Politics» (1996), 44 Am. J. Comp. L. 131, à la p. 149; M. Jackman, «Protecting Rights and Promoting Democracy: Judicial Review Under Section 1 of the Charter» (1996), 34 Osgoode Hall L.J. 661).

With this background in mind, I now turn to discuss the jurisprudence on the specific question of the choice of the appropriate remedy that should apply in this appeal. 143

Ayant tendu cette toile de fond, je passe maintenant à l'examen de la jurisprudence portant précisément sur le choix de la mesure corrective à appliquer en l'espèce.

B. Remedial Principles

B. Principes applicables en matière de mesures correctives

The leading case on constitutional remedies is Schachter, supra. Writing on behalf of the majority in Schachter, Lamer C.J. stated that the first step in selecting a remedial course under s. 52 is to define the extent of the Charter inconsistency which must be struck down. In the present case, that inconsistency is the exclusion of sexual orientation from the protected grounds of the IRPA. As I have concluded above, this exclusion is an unjustifiable infringement upon the equality rights guaranteed in s. 15 of the Charter. 144

L'arrêt de principe pour ce qui est des mesures correctives constitutionnelles est Schachter, précité. S'exprimant au nom des juges majoritaires, le juge en chef Lamer a dit que la première étape à suivre pour choisir une mesure corrective sous le régime de l'art. 52 consiste à déterminer l'étendue de l'incompatibilité avec la Charte qui doit être annulée. En l'espèce, cette incompatibilité est l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs ouvrant droit à la protection de l'IRPA. Cette exclusion constitue, suivant la conclusion à laquelle je suis parvenu plus haut, une atteinte injustifiable aux droits à l'égalité garantis par l'art. 15 de la Charte.

Once the Charter inconsistency has been identified, the next step is to determine which remedy is appropriate. In Schachter, this Court noted that, depending upon the circumstances, there are several remedial options available to a court in dealing with a Charter violation that was not saved by s. 1. These include striking down the legislation, severance of the offending sections, striking down or severance with a temporary suspension of the 145

Une fois l'incompatibilité précisée, l'étape suivante consiste à déterminer quelle est la mesure corrective appropriée. Dans l'arrêt Schachter, notre Cour a signalé que, tout dépendant des circonstances, un tribunal peut choisir entre plusieurs mesures correctives lorsqu'il conclut à l'existence d'une violation de la Charte non justifiée en vertu de l'article premier. Il peut notamment annuler la loi, retrancher les dispositions fautives, ordonner l'annulation ou la dissociation assortie d'une suspension temporaire de la déclaration d'invalidité, declaration of invalidity, reading down, and reading provisions into the legislation.

146 Because the Charter violation in the instant case stems from an omission, the remedy of reading down is simply not available. Further, I note that given the considerable number of sections at issue in this case and the important roles they play in the scheme of the IRPA as a whole, severance of these sections from the remainder of the Act would be akin to striking down the entire Act.

147 The appellants suggest that the circumstances of this case warrant the reading in of sexual orientation into the offending sections of the IRPA. However, in the Alberta Court of Appeal, O'Leary J.A. and Hunt J.A. agreed that the appropriate remedy would be to declare the relevant provisions of the IRPA unconstitutional and to suspend that declaration for a period of time to allow the Legislature to address the matter. McClung J.A. would have gone further and declared the IRPA invalid in its entirety. With respect, for the reasons that follow, I cannot agree with either remedy chosen by the Court of Appeal.

148 In Schachter, Lamer C.J. noted that when determining whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate, courts must have regard to the "twin guiding principles", namely, respect for the role of the legislature and respect for the purposes of the Charter, which I have discussed generally above. Turning first to the role of the legislature, Lamer C.J. stated at p. 700 that reading in is an important tool in "avoiding undue intrusion into the legislative sphere. . . . [T]he purpose of reading in is to be as faithful as possible within the requirements of the Constitution to the scheme enacted by the Legislature."

149 He went on to quote the following passage from Carol Rogerson in "The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness", in R. J. Sharpe, ed., Charter Litigation (1987), 233, at p. 288:

recourir à l'interprétation atténuée ou inclure des dispositions par interprétation large.

Parce que la violation de la Charte découle d'une omission en l'espèce, l'interprétation atténuée n'est pas une option. En outre, je constate que, vu le grand nombre de dispositions en cause et le rôle important qu'elles jouent dans l'économie générale de l'IRPA, la dissociation équivaudrait à l'annulation de la totalité de la Loi.

Les appelants affirment qu'il est justifié, compte tenu des circonstances de la présente espèce, d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle, par interprétation large, dans les dispositions fautives de l'IRPA. Les juges O'Leary et Hunt de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta, toutefois, ont tous deux estimé qu'il convenait de déclarer inconstitutionnelles les dispositions visées et de suspendre cette déclaration de façon à permettre à la législature de corriger la situation. Le juge McClung serait allé plus loin: il aurait déclaré invalide la totalité de l'IRPA. En toute déférence, je ne puis, pour les motifs suivants, me rallier à aucune des mesures choisies par la Cour d'appel.

Dans l'arrêt Schachter, le juge en chef Lamer a fait remarquer que les tribunaux, lorsqu'ils examinent s'il convient d'adopter une interprétation large, doivent tenir compte des «deux principes directeurs» que j'ai précédemment abordés de façon générale, savoir le respect du rôle du législateur et le respect des objets de la Charte. Relativement au rôle du législateur, le juge en chef Lamer a affirmé, à la p. 700, que l'interprétation large est un moyen important d'«empêcher un empiétement injustifié sur le domaine législatif. [. . .] [L]'objet de l'interprétation large est d'être aussi fidèle que possible, dans le cadre des exigences de la Constitution, au texte législatif adopté par le législateur.»

Il a ensuite cité le passage suivant du texte de Carol Rogerson, «The Judicial Search for Appropriate Remedies Under the Charter: The Examples of Overbreadth and Vagueness», dans R. J. Sharpe, dir., Charter Litigation (1987), 233, à la p. 288:

Courts should certainly go as far as required to protect rights, but no further. Interference with legitimate legislative purposes should be minimized and laws serving such purposes should be allowed to remain operative to the extent that rights are not violated. Legislation which serves desirable social purposes may give rise to entitlements which themselves deserve some protection.

[TRADUCTION] Les tribunaux devraient certainement aller aussi loin que nécessaire pour assurer la protection des droits, mais pas davantage. L'empiétement sur les objets législatifs légitimes devrait être réduit au minimum et les lois devraient demeurer opérantes dans la mesure où il n'y a pas violation de droits. Une loi qui sert des fins sociales souhaitables peut être constitutive de droits qui méritent une certaine protection.

As I discussed above, the purpose of the IRPA is the recognition and protection of the inherent dignity and inalienable rights of Albertans through the elimination of discriminatory practices. It seems to me that the remedy of reading in would minimize interference with this clearly legitimate legislative purpose and thereby avoid excessive intrusion into the legislative sphere whereas striking down the IRPA would deprive all Albertans of human rights protection and thereby unduly interfere with the scheme enacted by the Legislature.

150 Comme je l'ai déjà dit, l'IRPA a pour objet de reconnaître et de protéger la dignité inhérente et les droits inaliénables des Albertains au moyen de l'élimination des pratiques discriminatoires. Je crois que le recours à l'interprétation large réduirait l'empiétement sur cet objet manifestement légitime et éviterait ainsi une ingérence excessive dans le domaine législatif, alors que l'annulation de l'IRPA priverait tous les Albertains de la protection des droits de la personne, ce qui modifierait indûment l'économie de la loi adoptée par le législateur.

I find support for my position in Haig, supra, where the Ontario Court of Appeal read the words "sexual orientation" into s. 3(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act, R.S.C., 1985, c. H-6. At p. 508, Krever J.A., writing for a unanimous court, stated that it was inconceivable . . . that Parliament would have preferred no human rights Act over one that included sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. To believe otherwise would be a gratuitous insult to Parliament.

151 L'arrêt de la Cour d'appel de l'Ontario Haig, précité, étaye mon point de vue. La Cour a ajouté les mots «orientation sexuelle», par interprétation large, au par. 3(1) de la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne, L.R.C. (1985), ch. H-6, et, à la p. 14, le juge Krever, exprimant l'avis unanime de la Cour, a écrit qu'il était

[TRADUCTION] inconcevable que le Parlement aurait préféré qu'il n'y ait pas de loi sur les droits de la personne plutôt que d'en avoir une qui ajoute l'orientation sexuelle à la liste des motifs de discrimination illicites. Conclure autrement serait un affront gratuit au Parlement.

Turning to the second of the twin guiding principles, the respondents suggest that the facts of this case are illustrative of a conflict between two grounds, namely, religion and sexual orientation. If sexual orientation were simply read into the IRPA, the respondents contend that this would undermine the ability of the IRPA to provide protection against discrimination based on religion, one of the fundamental goals of that legislation. This result is alleged to be "inconsistent with the deeper social purposes of the Charter".

152 Relativement au second principe directeur, les intimés plaident que les faits de l'espèce démontrent l'existence d'un conflit entre deux motifs de discrimination, savoir la religion et l'orientation sexuelle. Selon eux, la protection contre la discrimination religieuse, un objet fondamental de l'IRPA, serait affaiblie si l'on ajoutait, par interprétation large, l'orientation sexuelle aux motifs interdits. Ce résultat, soutiennent-ils, dérogerait [TRADUCTION] «aux objets sociaux fondamentaux de la Charte».

153 I concluded above that the internal balancing mechanisms of the IRPA were an adequate means of disposing of any conflict that might arise between religion and sexual orientation. Thus, I cannot accept the respondents' assertion that the reading in approach does not respect the purposes of the Charter. In fact, as I see the matter, reading sexual orientation into the IRPA as a further ground of prohibited discrimination can only enhance those purposes. The Charter, like the IRPA, is concerned with the promotion and protection of inherent dignity and inalienable rights. Thus, expanding the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA allows this Court to act in a manner which, consistent with the purposes of the Charter, would augment the scope of the IRPA's protections. In contrast, striking down or severing parts of the IRPA would deny all Albertans protection from marketplace discrimination. In my view, this result is clearly antithetical to the purposes of the Charter.

Puisque j'ai conclu que les mécanismes internes de pondération de l'IRPA permettent de régler tout conflit pouvant surgir entre la religion et l'orientation sexuelle, je ne puis recevoir l'argument des intimés selon lequel l'interprétation large ne respecterait pas les objets de la Charte. De fait, de mon point de vue, l'ajout par interprétation large de l'orientation sexuelle aux motifs de discrimination interdits par l'IRPA ne peut que servir ces objets. La Charte, tout comme la Loi, vise à promouvoir et à protéger la dignité inhérente et les droits inaliénables des citoyens. Ainsi, en allongeant la liste des motifs illicites de discrimination établie par l'IRPA, la Cour, en accord avec les objets de la Charte, élargirait la portée des protections offertes par la Loi. Si, par contre, elle annulait l'IRPA ou en retranchait des dispositions, elle priverait tous les Albertains de leur protection contre la discrimination du marché, ce qui me semble absolument contraire aux objets de la Charte.

154 In Schachter, supra, Lamer C.J. noted that the twin guiding principles can only be fulfilled if due consideration is given to several additional criteria which further inform the determination as to whether the remedy of reading in is appropriate. These include remedial precision, budgetary implications, effects on the thrust of the legislation, and interference with legislative objectives.

Dans l'arrêt Schachter, précité, le juge en chef Lamer a indiqué que, pour satisfaire aux deux principes directeurs susmentionnés, il faut examiner soigneusement plusieurs autres facteurs susceptibles de nous éclairer sur la pertinence de recourir à l'interprétation large, notamment la précision de la mesure corrective, les conséquences financières, les répercussions sur l'économie de la loi et l'empiétement sur les objectifs législatifs.

155 As to the first of the above listed criteria, the court must be able to define with a "sufficient degree of precision" how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. I do not believe that the present case is one in which this Court has been improperly called upon to fill in large gaps in the legislation. Rather, in my view, there is remedial precision insofar as the insertion of the words "sexual orientation" into the prohibited grounds of discrimination listed in the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the IRPA will, without more, ensure the validity of the legislation and remedy the constitutional wrong.

S'agissant du premier de ces facteurs, les tribunaux doivent être en mesure de déterminer avec «suffisamment de précision» dans quelle mesure il faut élargir la portée d'une loi afin de la rendre compatible avec la Constitution. Je ne crois pas que dans la présente espèce, notre Cour ait été appelée à tort à combler d'importantes lacunes de la Loi. J'estime plutôt que la mesure corrective est précise dans la mesure où l'inclusion des mots «orientation sexuelle» dans les motifs de discrimination illicites énumérés dans le préambule de l'IRPA ainsi qu'aux art. 3, 4 et 10, de même qu'aux par. 2(1), 7(1), 8(1) et 16(1) aura pour seul effet d'assurer la validité de la Loi et d'en corriger l'inconstitutionnalité.

In her reasons in this case, Hunt J.A. concluded that there was insufficient remedial precision to justify the remedy of reading in. She expressed two concerns. Firstly, she held that adequate precision likely would not be possible without a definition of the term "sexual orientation". With respect, I cannot agree. Although the term "sexual orientation" has been defined in the human rights legislation of the Yukon Territory, it appears undefined in the Canadian Human Rights Act, the human rights legislation of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, and s. 718.2(a)(i) of the Criminal Code, R.S.C., 1985, c. C-46, as amended by S.C. 1995, c. 22, s. 6. In addition, "sexual orientation" was not defined when it was recognized by this Court in Egan, supra, as an analogous ground under s. 15 of the Charter. In my opinion, "sexual orientation" is a commonly used term with an easily discernible common sense meaning.

156 Dans ses motifs, le juge Hunt de la Cour d'appel a conclu que la mesure corrective n'était pas assez précise pour justifier le recours à l'interprétation large, et ce, pour deux raisons. Premièrement, elle a estimé qu'il serait vraisemblablement impossible de parvenir à une précision suffisante sans définir l'expression «orientation sexuelle». Je ne puis, en toute déférence, souscrire à une telle opinion. Cette expression, même si elle est définie dans la loi du Yukon concernant les droits de la personne, est employée sans définition dans la Loi canadienne sur les droits de la personne et dans les lois relatives aux droits de la personne de la Nouvelle-Écosse, du Nouveau-Brunswick, du Québec, de l'Ontario, du Manitoba, de la Saskatchewan et de la Colombie-Britannique de même qu'au sous-al. 718.2*a*)(i) du Code criminel, L.R.C. (1985), ch. C-46, modifié par L.C. 1995, ch. 22, art. 6. Notre Cour non plus n'a pas défini l'expression quand, dans l'arrêt Egan, précité, elle a reconnu que l'orientation sexuelle constituait un motif analogue sous le régime de l'art. 15 de la Charte. À mon avis, les mots «orientation sexuelle» sont des mots usuels dont le sens courant se comprend aisément.

In addition, I concur with the comments of R. Khullar (in "Vriend: Remedial Issues for Unremedied Discrimination" (1998), 7 N.J.C.L. 221) who stated (at pp. 237-38) that,

> [i]f there is any ambiguity in the term "sexual orientation," it is no greater than that encompassed by terms such as "race," "ethnic origin" or "religion," all of which are undefined prohibited grounds of discrimination in the Charter which have not posed any undue difficulty for the courts or legislatures to understand and apply.

157 De plus, je souscris aux commentaires de R. Khullar (dans «Vriend: Remedial Issues for Unremedied Discrimination» (1998), 7 N.J.C.L. 221) qui a écrit (aux pp. 237 et 238):

> [TRADUCTION] Si tant est que l'expression «orientation sexuelle» soit ambiguë, elle ne l'est pas davantage que les mots «race», «origine ethnique» ou «religion», lesquels sont tous des motifs de discrimination interdits par la Charte qui ne sont pas définis et que les tribunaux ou les législatures n'ont eu aucune difficulté particulière à comprendre ou à appliquer.

Hunt J.A. was also troubled by the possible impact of reading in upon s. 7(2) of the IRPA. This section states that s. 7(1) (employment), as regards age and marital status, "does not affect the operation of any bona fide retirement or pension plan or the terms or conditions of any bona fide group or employee insurance plan". As the Court of Appeal heard no argument on this point and as there was no evidence before the court to explain the rationale behind this provision, Hunt J.A. held that, if the protections of the IRPA were to be extended to gay men and lesbians, it would be necessary to decide whether this group would be included or excluded from s. 7(2). She found that this was something the court was in no position to do. In light of this difficulty, Hunt J.A. was concerned that the reading in remedy "would engage the court in the kind of 'filling in of details' against which Lamer, C.J.C., cautions in Schachter [supra]" (p. 69).

158 Le juge Hunt s'inquiétait également des répercussions possibles de l'interprétation large sur le par. 7(2) de l'IRPA. Cette disposition énonce que le par. 7(1) (emploi) est, relativement à l'âge et à l'état matrimonial, [TRADUCTION] «sans effet sur l'application de tout régime de retraite légitime et des modalités de tout régime d'assurance collective ou d'employés légitime». Comme la Cour d'appel n'avait entendu aucun argument sur ce point et qu'aucune preuve n'avait été présentée

159 In my view, whether gay men and lesbians are included or excluded from s. 7(2) is a peripheral issue which does not deprive the reading in remedy of the requisite precision. I agree with K. Roach who noted that the legislature "can always subsequently intervene on matters of detail that are not dictated by the Constitution" (Constitutional Remedies in Canada (1994 (loose-leaf)), at p. 14-64.1). I therefore conclude on this point that, in the present case, there is sufficient remedial precision to justify the remedy of reading in.

160 Turning to budgetary repercussions, in the circumstances of the present appeal, such considerations are not sufficiently significant to warrant avoiding the reading in approach. On this issue, the trial judge stated (at p. 18):

> There will undoubtedly be some budgetary impact on the Human Rights Commission as a result of the addition of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. But, unlike Schachter [supra], it would not be substantial enough to change the nature of the scheme of the legislation.

Although the scope of this Court's review of the IRPA is considerably broader than that which the trial judge was asked to undertake, as I noted above, having not heard anything persuasive to the contrary, I am not prepared to interfere with the trial judge's findings on this matter.

161 As to the effects on the thrust of the legislation, it is difficult to see any deleterious impact. All persons covered under the current scope of the IRPA pour expliquer le fondement de cette disposition, le juge Hunt a conclu que si l'on étendait la protection de l'IRPA aux homosexuels, il serait nécessaire de décider si ce groupe était visé ou non par le par. 7(2). Elle a jugé que la Cour n'était pas en mesure de trancher une telle question. Cette difficulté faisait craindre au juge Hunt qu'en recourant à l'interprétation large [TRADUCTION] «la Cour ne soit amenée à "combler les lacunes" ce contre quoi le juge en chef Lamer mettait les tribunaux en garde dans l'arrêt Schachter [précité]» (p. 69).

Selon moi, la question de savoir si le par. 7(2) s'applique ou non aux homosexuels est secondaire et ne fait pas perdre à l'interprétation large le degré de précision requis. Je partage l'opinion de K. Roach, lequel estime que le législateur [TRADUCTION] «peut toujours revenir ensuite sur les détails qui ne sont pas dictés par la Constitution» (Constitutional Remedies in Canada (1994 (éd. feuilles mobiles)), à la p. 14-64.1). Je suis donc d'avis qu'en l'espèce, que la mesure corrective est suffisamment précise pour justifier le recours à l'interprétation large.

S'agissant des conséquences financières, elles ne revêtent pas, dans le présent pourvoi, une importance suffisante pour écarter l'interprétation large. Sur cette question, le juge de première instance a écrit (à la p. 18):

> [TRADUCTION] L'ajout de l'orientation sexuelle au nombre des motifs de discrimination illicites aura certainement des conséquences financières pour la Human Rights Commission. Mais contrairement à l'affaire Schachter [précitée], celles-ci ne sont pas assez importantes pour modifier la nature du régime prévu par la Loi.

Bien que l'examen de l'IRPA effectué par notre Cour a une portée beaucoup plus large que celle que le juge de première instance était appelée à effectuer, je ne suis pas disposé, comme je l'ai déjà mentionné, à modifier ses conclusions en cette matière puisqu'on ne m'a présenté aucune preuve convaincante du contraire.

Quant aux effets sur l'économie de la Loi, il est difficile de concevoir quelque conséquence néfaste. Toutes les personnes actuellement visées would continue to benefit from the protection provided by the Act in the same manner as they had before the reading in of sexual orientation. Thus, I conclude that it is reasonable to assume that, if the Legislature had been faced with the choice of having no human rights statute or having one that offered protection on the ground of sexual orientation, the latter option would have been chosen. As the inclusion of sexual orientation in the IRPA does not alter the legislation to any significant degree, it is reasonable to assume that the Legislature would have enacted it in any event.

par l'IRPA continueraient d'être protégées par ses dispositions de la même façon qu'elles l'étaient avant l'ajout de l'orientation sexuelle par interprétation large. Il est donc raisonnable de supposer que si le législateur avait eu le choix entre renoncer à faire passer une loi relative aux droits de la personne ou en adopter une qui interdit la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, il aurait opté pour la deuxième solution. Puisque l'inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA ne modifie pas substantiellement celle-ci, il est raisonnable de penser que le législateur l'aurait adoptée de toute façon.

In addition, in Schachter, supra, Lamer C.J. noted that, in cases where the issue is whether to extend benefits to a group excluded from the legislation, the question of the effects on the thrust of the legislation will sometimes focus on the size of the group to be added as compared to the group originally benefited. He quoted with approval from Knodel, supra, where Rowles J. extended the provision of benefits to spouses to include same-sex spouses. In her view, the remedy of reading in was far less intrusive to the intention of the legislature than striking down the benefits scheme because the group to be added was much smaller than the group already receiving the benefits.

162 En outre, le juge en chef Lamer, dans l'arrêt Schachter, précité, a signalé que lorsqu'il s'agit de savoir si l'on doit accorder des avantages à un groupe exclu de la loi, la question des effets de cette mesure sur l'économie du texte de loi sera quelquefois centrée sur la taille du groupe à ajouter par rapport à celle du groupe initial des bénéficiaires. Il a cité, en les approuvant, les motifs du juge Rowles dans la décision Knodel, précité, où le juge a étendu aux conjoints de même sexe le droit à des prestations pour conjoints. Selon elle, l'inclusion par interprétation large portait moins atteinte à l'intention législative que l'annulation du régime de prestations, parce que le groupe à ajouter était beaucoup plus petit que celui qui recevait les prestations.

Lamer C.J. went on to note that, "[w]here the group to be added is smaller than the group originally benefitted, this is an indication that the assumption that the legislature would have enacted the benefit in any case is a sound one" (p. 712). In the present case, gay men and lesbians are clearly a smaller group than those already benefited by the IRPA. Thus, in my view, reading in remains the less intrusive option.

163 Le juge en chef Lamer a ajouté: «[s]i le groupe à ajouter est numériquement moins important que le groupe initial de bénéficiaires, c'est une indication que la supposition que le législateur aurait de toute façon adopté le bénéfice est fondée» (p. 712). En l'espèce, les homosexuels forment indéniablement un groupe inférieur en nombre au groupe jouissant du bénéfice de l'IRPA. J'estime donc que l'interprétation large demeure la solution la moins attentatoire.

The final criterion to examine is interference with the legislative objective. In Schachter, Lamer C.J. commented upon this factor as follows (at pp. 707-8):

164 Le dernier facteur à examiner est celui de l'ingérence dans l'objectif législatif. Dans l'arrêt Schachter, précité, le juge en chef Lamer a fait le commentaire suivant au sujet de ce facteur (aux pp. 707 et 708):

The degree to which a particular remedy intrudes into the legislative sphere can only be determined by giving careful attention to the objective embodied in the legislation in question. . . . A second level of legislative intention may be manifest in the means chosen to pursue that objective.

Ce n'est qu'en examinant de près l'objectif de la loi en question que l'on peut déterminer le degré d'empiétement d'une réparation particulière sur le domaine législatif. [. . .] Un second niveau d'intention législative peut ressortir des moyens choisis pour atteindre cet objectif.

165 With regard to the first level of legislative intention, as I discussed above, it is clear that reading sexual orientation into the IRPA would not interfere with the objective of the legislation. Rather, in my view, it can only enhance that objective. However, at first blush, it appears that reading in might interfere with the second level of legislative intention identified by Lamer C.J.

Il est évident, comme je l'ai déjà indiqué, que relativement au premier niveau d'intention législative, l'ajout par interprétation large de l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA ne porterait pas atteinte à l'objectif du texte de loi; je suis même d'avis qu'il ne pourrait que servir cet objectif. À première vue, toutefois, il semble que l'interprétation large puisse empiéter sur le second niveau d'intention législative mis en lumière par le juge en chef Lamer.

166 As the Alberta Legislature has expressly chosen to exclude sexual orientation from the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in the IRPA, the respondents argue that reading in would unduly interfere with the will of the Government. McClung J.A. shares this view. In his opinion, the remedy of reading in will never be appropriate where a legislative omission reflects a deliberate choice of the legislating body. He states that if a statute is unconstitutional, "the preferred consequence should be its return to the sponsoring legislature for representative, constitutional overhaul" (p. 35). However, as I see the matter, by definition, Charter scrutiny will always involve some interference with the legislative will.

Les intimés soutiennent que, la législature de l'Alberta ayant expressément résolu d'exclure l'orientation sexuelle de la liste des motifs de discrimination interdits par l'IRPA, l'interprétation large constituerait un empiétement indu sur la volonté du gouvernement. Le juge McClung partage cet avis. Selon lui, le recours à l'interprétation large n'est jamais acceptable lorsque l'omission du législateur résulte d'un choix délibéré. Il affirme que si une loi est inconstitutionnelle, [TRADUCTION] «c'est l'option du renvoi à l'autorité législative compétente pour permettre aux élus de remédier au vice constitutionnel qu'il convient de retenir» (p. 35). De mon point de vue, cependant, l'examen fondé sur la Charte comportera toujours, par définition, une forme d'empiétement sur la volonté du législateur.

167 Where a statute has been found to be unconstitutional, whether the court chooses to read provisions into the legislation or to strike it down, legislative intent is necessarily interfered with to some extent. Therefore, the closest a court can come to respecting the legislative intention is to determine what the legislature would likely have done if it had known that its chosen measures would be found unconstitutional. As I see the matter, a deliberate choice of means will not act as a bar to reading in save for those circumstances in which the means chosen can be shown to be of such centrality to the aims of the legislature and so integral to Lorsqu'une loi est jugée inconstitutionnelle, que le tribunal choisisse d'avoir recours à l'interprétation large ou d'annuler la loi, il y a nécessairement une certaine ingérence dans l'intention du législateur. Par conséquent, la solution qui respecte le plus l'intention du législateur est celle qui consiste à se demander ce que le législateur aurait vraisemblablement fait s'il avait su que ses dispositions seraient jugées inconstitutionnelles. De mon point de vue, le choix délibéré des moyens n'empêche pas le recours à l'interprétation large, sauf dans les cas où l'on peut établir que les moyens choisis revêtent une importance à ce point centrale eu the scheme of the legislation, that the legislature would not have enacted the statute without them.

Indeed, as noted by the intervener Canadian Jewish Congress, if reading in is always deemed an inappropriate remedy where a government has expressly chosen a course of action, this amounts to the suggestion that whenever a government violates a Charter right, it ought to do so in a deliberate manner so as to avoid the remedy of reading in. In my view, this is a wholly unacceptable result.

In the case at bar, the means chosen by the legislature, namely, the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA, can hardly be described as integral to the scheme of that Act. Nor can I accept that this choice was of such centrality to the aims of the legislature that it would prefer to sacrifice the entire IRPA rather than include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, particularly for the reasons I will now discuss.

As mentioned by my colleague Cory J., in 1993, the Alberta Legislature appointed the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel to conduct a public review of the IRPA and the Alberta Human Rights Commission. The Panel issued a report making several recommendations including the inclusion of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination in all areas covered by the Act. The Government responded to this recommendation by deferring the decision to the judiciary: "This recommendation will be dealt with through the current court case Vriend v. Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Alberta and Her Majesty's Attorney General in and for the Province of Alberta" (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel, supra, at p. 21).

In my opinion, this statement is a clear indication that, in light of the controversy surrounding the protection of gay men and lesbians under the IRPA, it was the intention of the Alberta Legisla-égard aux buts poursuivis par le législateur et sont à ce point essentiels à l'économie de la loi que le législateur ne l'aurait pas adopter sans eux.

168 En effet, comme l'a souligné l'intervenant, le Congrès juif canadien, juger que l'interprétation large n'est jamais applicable à une ligne de conduite expressément choisie par un gouvernement équivaut à dire qu'un gouvernement n'a qu'à contrevenir de façon délibérée à un droit garanti par la Charte pour échapper à l'interprétation large. Selon moi, pareil résultat est tout à fait inacceptable.

169 Dans l'affaire qui nous occupe, on peut difficilement soutenir que les moyens choisis par le législateur, savoir l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA, sont essentiels à l'économie de la Loi. Je ne suis pas disposé non plus à reconnaître que ce choix revêtait une importance à ce point centrale eu égard aux buts poursuivis par le législateur que celui-ci aurait choisi de sacrifier l'ensemble de l'IRPA plutôt que d'intégrer l'orientation sexuelle au nombre des motifs de discrimination illicites, en particulier pour les motifs que j'expose ici.

170 Comme le juge Cory l'a indiqué, la législature de l'Alberta a créé l'Alberta Human Rights Review Panel, en 1993, et a chargé ce comité d'examiner l'IRPA ainsi que l'Alberta Human Rights Commission. Le comité, dans son rapport, a formulé plusieurs recommandations, dont celle d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle dans les motifs de discrimination illicites, pour tous les domaines visés par la Loi. Le gouvernement a répondu à cette recommandation en s'en remettant aux tribunaux: [TRADUCTION] «Les suites à donner à cette recommandation seront déterminées par l'issue de l'affaire Vriend c. Her Majesty the Queen in Right of Alberta and Her Majesty's Attorney General in and for the Province of Alberta» (Our Commitment to Human Rights: The Government's Response to the Recommendations of the Alberta Human Rights Review Panel, op. cit., à la p. 21).

171 À mon avis, cet énoncé indique clairement que la législature de l'Alberta, tenant compte de la controverse entourant la protection des homosexuels sous le régime de l'IRPA, a voulu s'en remettre à la ture to defer to the courts on this issue. Indeed, I interpret this statement to be an express invitation for the courts to read sexual orientation into the IRPA in the event that its exclusion from the legislation is found to violate the provisions of the Charter. Therefore, primarily because of this and contrary to the assertions of the respondents, I believe that, in these circumstances, the remedy of reading in is entirely consistent with the legislative intention.

décision des tribunaux sur cette question. J'y vois, en fait, une invitation expresse faite aux tribunaux d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA si l'exclusion de ce motif est jugée contraire à la Charte. C'est cela, principalement, qui me fait conclure, quoi qu'en dise les intimés, que, dans les circonstances, l'interprétation large est parfaitement compatible avec l'intention du législateur.

172 In addition to the comments which I outlined above, McClung J.A. also criticizes the remedy of reading in on a more fundamental level. He views the reading of provisions into a statute as an unacceptable intrusion of the courts into the legislative process. Commenting upon the trial judge's decision to read sexual orientation into the IRPA he stated (at pp. 29-30):

Le juge McLung de la Cour d'appel, en plus de faire le commentaire que j'ai cité plus haut, formule des critiques plus fondamentales concernant le recours à l'interprétation large. Il considère l'inclusion de dispositions dans une loi par interprétation large comme une ingérence inacceptable des tribunaux dans le processus législatif. Au sujet de la décision du juge de première instance d'ajouter l'orientation sexuelle aux motifs de discrimination interdits par l'IRPA, il s'exprime ainsi (aux pp. 29 et 30):

> To amend and extend it, by reading up to include "sexual orientation" was a sizeable judicial intervention into the affairs of the community and, at a minimum, an undesirable arrogation of legislative power by the court. . . . [T]o me it is an extravagant exercise for any s. 96 judge to use the enormous review power of his or her office in this way in order to wean competent legislatures from their "errors".

> [TRADUCTION] La modifier et en élargir la portée en l'interprétant comme incluant l'orientation sexuelle, c'est, pour un tribunal, s'immiscer considérablement dans les affaires publiques et, à tout le moins, empiéter de façon indésirable sur le pouvoir législatif [. . .] [J]'estime qu'un juge nommé en vertu de l'art. 96, qui se sert ainsi de l'énorme pouvoir de révision qui lui est conféré pour tirer l'autorité législative compétente de ses «erreurs», exerce ce pouvoir de façon excessive.

173 McClung J.A. goes on to suggest that, by reading in, the trial judge overrode the express will of the electors of the Province of Alberta who, speaking through their parliamentary representatives, have decided that sexual orientation is not to be included in the protected categories of the IRPA.

Le juge McClung poursuit en affirmant que le juge de première instance, en recourant à l'interprétation large, a passé outre à la volonté expresse des électeurs de la province de l'Alberta qui, s'exprimant par le truchement de leurs représentants parlementaires, ont décidé de ne pas inclure l'orientation sexuelle dans les catégories protégées par l'IRPA.

174 With respect, for the reasons outlined in the previous section of these reasons, I do not accept that extending the legislation in this case is an undemocratic exercise of judicial power. Rather, I concur with the comments of W. Black, who states (supra, at p. 128) that:

Pour les motifs que j'ai exposés précédemment, je ne puis, en toute déférence, voir dans l'élargissement de la portée de la Loi en l'espèce, un exercice non démocratique du pouvoir judiciaire. Je souscris plutôt aux vues de W. Black lorsqu'il affirme (loc. cit., à la p. 128):

. . . there is no conflict between judicial review and democracy if judges intervene where there are indications that a decision was not reached in accordance with democratic principles. Democracy requires that all citizens be allowed to participate in the democratic process, either directly or through equal consideration by their representatives. Parliamentary sovereignty is a means to this end, not an end in itself.

[TRADUCTION] . . . la révision judiciaire n'entre pas en conflit avec la démocratie lorsque l'intervention des tribunaux vise des décisions qui ne semblent pas avoir été prises en conformité avec les principes démocratiques. La démocratie exige que tous les citoyens aient la possibilité de prendre part au processus démocratique, directement ou par le truchement de représentants qui leur accordent une considération égale. La souveraineté parlementaire est un moyen de parvenir à cette fin et non une fin en soi.

In my view, the process by which the Alberta Legislature decided to exclude sexual orientation from the IRPA was inconsistent with democratic principles. Both the trial judge and all judges in the Court of Appeal agreed that the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA was a conscious and deliberate legislative choice. While McClung J.A. relies on this fact as a reason for the courts not to intervene, the theories of judicial review developed by several authors (see e.g. Black, supra; J. H. Ely, Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980); P. Monahan, "A Theory of Judicial Review Under the Charter", in Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada (1987), at pp. 97-138; D. M. Beatty, Constitutional Law in Theory and Practice (1995)) suggest the opposite conclusion.

175 À mon avis, le processus par lequel la législature de l'Alberta a décidé d'exclure l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA n'était pas conforme aux principes démocratiques. Le juge de première instance et les juges de la Cour d'appel ont convenu que l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de l'IRPA procédait d'un choix législatif conscient et délibéré. Bien que le juge McClung invoque ce fait pour justifier la non-intervention des tribunaux, plusieurs auteurs arrivent à la conclusion contraire dans les théories relatives à la révision judiciaire qu'ils ont élaborées (voir, par exemple, Black, loc. cit.; J. H. Ely, Democracy and Distrust: A Theory of Judicial Review (1980); P. Monahan, «A Theory of Judicial Review Under the Charter», dans Politics and the Constitution: The Charter, Federalism and the Supreme Court of Canada (1987), aux pp. 97 à 138; D. M. Beatty, Constitutional Law in Theory and Practice (1995)).

As I have already discussed, the concept of democracy means more than majority rule as Dickson C.J. so ably reminded us in Oakes, supra. In my view, a democracy requires that legislators take into account the interests of majorities and minorities alike, all of whom will be affected by the decisions they make. Where the interests of a minority have been denied consideration, especially where that group has historically been the target of prejudice and discrimination, I believe that judicial intervention is warranted to correct a democratic process that has acted improperly (see Black, supra; Jackman, supra, at p. 680).

176 Je le répète, la notion de démocratie ne se limite pas à la règle de la majorité, ainsi que nous l'a si bien rappelé le juge en chef Dickson dans l'arrêt Oakes, précité. À mon avis, la démocratie suppose que le législateur tienne compte des intérêts de la majorité comme de ceux des minorités, car ses décisions toucheront tout le monde. Si le législateur néglige de prendre en considération les intérêts d'une minorité, en particulier si cette minorité a été historiquement victime de préjugés et de discrimination, j'estime que le pouvoir judiciaire est justifié d'intervenir et de rectifier le processus démocratique faussé (voir Black, loc. cit; Jackman, loc. cit., à la p. 680).

At p. 35 of his reasons, McClung J.A. states:

177 Le juge McClung écrit, à la p. 35 de ses motifs:

Allowing judicial, and basically final, proclamation of legislative change ignores our adopted British parliamentary safeguards, historic in themselves, and which are the practical bulkheads that protect representative government. When unelected judges choose to legislate, parliamentary checks, balances and conventions are simply shelved.

[TRADUCTION] Permettre au pouvoir judiciaire d'apporter à des dispositions législatives des modifications pra-

tiquement définitives c'est méconnaître les garanties parlementaires britanniques, elles-mêmes historiques, que nous avons fait nôtres et qui constituent de fait le rampart du gouvernement représentatif. Lorsque des juges non élus choisissent de légiférer, le système de poids, de contrepoids et de conventions parlementaires est tout simplement écarté.

178 With respect, I do not agree. When a court remedies an unconstitutional statute by reading in provisions, no doubt this constrains the legislative process and therefore should not be done needlessly, but only after considered examination. However, in my view, the "parliamentary safeguards" remain. Governments are free to modify the amended legislation by passing exceptions and defences which they feel can be justified under s. 1 of the Charter. Thus, when a court reads in, this is not the end of the legislative process because the legislature can pass new legislation in response, as I outlined above (see also Hogg and Bushell, supra). Moreover, the legislators can always turn to s. 33 of the Charter, the override provision, which in my view is the ultimate "parliamentary safeguard".

En toute déférence, je ne puis souscrire à cette opinion. Le recours par un tribunal à l'interprétation large pour corriger une loi inconstitutionnelle contraint certainement le processus législatif. En conséquence, il convient de ne pas retenir inutilement cette solution et de ne le faire qu'après mûre réflexion. Toutefois, les «garanties parlementaires» ne disparaissent pas, à mon avis, car les gouvernements demeurent libres de revenir sur la loi modifiée et d'y inclure les exceptions et les moyens de défense qui, d'après eux, peuvent se justifier sous le régime de l'article premier de la Charte. Ainsi, lorsqu'un tribunal recourt à l'interprétation large, il ne met pas un terme au processus législatif puisque le législateur peut en réponse adopter une nouvelle loi, comme je l'ai signalé plus haut (voir également Hogg et Bushell, loc. cit.). De plus, le législateur peut toujours invoquer l'art. 33 de la Charte, la disposition de dérogation, laquelle constitue, selon moi, la «garantie parlementaire» par excellence.

179 On the basis of the foregoing analysis, I conclude that reading sexual orientation into the impugned provisions of the IRPA is the most appropriate way of remedying this underinclusive legislation. The appellants suggest that this remedy should have immediate effect. I agree. There is no risk in the present case of harmful unintended consequences upon private parties or public funds (see e.g. Egan, supra). Further, the mechanisms to deal with complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation are already in place and require no significant adjustment. I find additional support for my position in both Haig, supra, and Newfoundland (Human Rights Commission) v. Newfoundland (Minister of Employment and Labour Relations) (1995), 127 D.L.R. (4th) 694 (Nfld. S.C.), where sexual orientation was read into the impugned statutes without a suspension of the remedy. There is no evidence before this Court to suggest that any harm resulted from the immediate operation of the remedy in those cases.

L'analyse qui précède m'amène à conclure que l'inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle dans l'IRPA par le recours à l'interprétation large est la meilleure façon de corriger la portée trop limitative de ce texte de loi. Les appelants soutiennent que la mesure corrective devrait prendre effet immédiatement. Je partage leur avis. Cette mesure ne risque pas d'entraîner des conséquences néfastes imprévues sur des particuliers ni sur les fonds publics (voir par ex. Egan, précité). En outre, les mécanismes permettant l'examen de plaintes de discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle existent déjà et ne nécessitent aucun aménagement important. L'arrêt Haig, précité, et la décision Newfoundland (Human Rights Commission) c. Newfoundland (Minister of Employment and Labour Relations) (1995), 127 D.L.R. (4th) 694 (C.S.T.-N.), me confortent dans cette position. Dans les deux cas, la décision d'ajouter l'orientation

III. Conclusions and Disposition

For the reasons outlined by Cory J., I conclude that the exclusion of sexual orientation from the protected grounds of discrimination in the IRPA violates s. 15 of the Charter. In addition, for the reasons set out above, the impugned legislation cannot be saved under s. 1 of the Charter. Accordingly, I would allow the appeal, dismiss the cross-appeal, and set aside the judgment of the Alberta Court of Appeal with party-and-party costs throughout.

I would answer the constitutional questions as follows:

1. Do (a) decisions not to include sexual orientation or (b) the non-inclusion of sexual orientation, as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the preamble and ss. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 and 16(1) of the Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2, as am., now called the Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. H-11.7, infringe or deny the rights guaranteed by s. 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: Yes.

2. If the answer to Question 1 is "yes", is the infringement or denial demonstrably justified as a reasonable limit pursuant to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms?

Answer: No.

The following are the reasons delivered by

L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ J. — I am in general agreement with the results reached by my colleagues, Cory and Iacobucci JJ. While I agree with Iacobucci J.'s approach to s. 1 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, I wish to reiterate sexuelle à la loi contestée n'était assortie d'aucune suspension. Aucun élément de preuve n'a été présenté à la Cour pour établir que l'application immédiate de la mesure corrective a causé un quelconque préjudice dans ces affaires.

III. Conclusions et dispositif

180 Pour les motifs exposés par le juge Cory, je conclus que l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs de discrimination interdits par l'IRPA enfreint l'art. 15 de la Charte. En outre, pour les motifs précédemment énoncés, la loi contestée ne peut être sauvegardée par application de l'article premier de la Charte. En conséquence, je suis d'avis d'accueillir le pourvoi principal, de rejeter le pourvoi incident et d'annuler le jugement de la Cour d'appel de l'Alberta avec dépens sur la base de frais entre parties devant toutes les cours.

181 Je suis d'avis de répondre de la façon suivante aux questions constitutionnelles:

1. Est-ce que a) soit la décision de ne pas inclure l'orientation sexuelle, b) soit la non-inclusion de l'orientation sexuelle, en tant que motif de discrimination illicite dans le préambule et dans les art. 2(1), 3, 4, 7(1), 8(1), 10 et 16(1) de l'Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2, et ses modifications, intitulée maintenant Human Rights, Citizenship and Multiculturalism Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. H-11.7, a pour effet de nier les droits garantis par le par. 15(1) de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés, ou d'y porter atteinte?

Réponse: Oui.

2. Si la réponse à la question 1 est «oui», est-ce que la négation ou l'atteinte peut être justifiée en tant que limite raisonnable au sens de l'article premier de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés?

Réponse: Non.

Version française des motifs rendus par

182 LE JUGE L'HEUREUX-DUBÉ — Je suis d'accord pour l'essentiel avec les résultats auxquels parviennent mes collègues les juges Cory et Iacobucci. Bien que je souscrive à l'analyse du juge Iacobucci en ce qui concerne l'article premier de la Charte

the position which I have maintained throughout with respect to the approach to be taken to s. 15(1).

183 In my view, s. 15(1) of the Charter is first and foremost an equality provision. In Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 S.C.R. 143, at p. 171, this Court unanimously accepted s. 15's primary mission as "the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as human beings equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration". In Egan v. Canada, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 513, at para. 39, I articulated the approach to equality in a similar vein:

> [A]t the heart of s. 15 is the promotion of a society in which all are secure in the knowledge that they are recognized at law as equal human beings, equally capable, and equally deserving. A person or group of persons has been discriminated against within the meaning of s. 15 of the Charter when members of that group have been made to feel, by virtue of the impugned legislative distinction, that they are less capable, or less worthy of recognition or value as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally deserving of concern, respect, and consideration. These are the core elements of a definition of "discrimination" — a definition that focuses on impact (i.e. discriminatory effect) rather than on constituent elements (i.e. the grounds of the distinction). [Emphasis in original.]

Integral to the inquiry into whether a legislative distinction is in fact discriminatory within the meaning of s. 15(1) is an appreciation of both the social vulnerability of the affected individual or group, and the nature of the interest which is affected in terms of its importance to human dignity and personhood.

184 Given this purpose, every legislative distinction (including, as in this case, a legislative omission) which negatively impacts on an individual or group who has been found to be disadvantaged in our society, the impact of which deprives the individual or group of the law's protection or benefit in a way which negatively affects their human dignity and personhood, does not treat these persons canadienne des droits et libertés, je tiens à réitérer l'approche que j'ai toujours préconisée en ce qui a trait au par. 15(1).

À mon avis, le par. 15(1) de la Charte est une disposition qui porte d'abord et avant tout sur l'égalité. Dans l'arrêt Andrews c. Law Society of British Columbia, [1989] 1 R.C.S. 143, à la p. 171, notre Cour a décidé à l'unanimité que l'art. 15 a pour objet principal de «favoriser l'existence d'une société où tous ont la certitude que la loi les reconnaît comme des êtres humains qui méritent le même respect, la même déférence et la même considération». Dans l'arrêt Egan c. Canada, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 513, au par. 39, j'ai exposé de façon similaire la façon dont il convient d'aborder l'égalité:

> [A]u cœur de l'art. 15 se situe la promotion d'une société où tous ont la certitude que la loi les reconnaît en tant qu'êtres humains égaux, tous aussi capables et méritants les uns que les autres. Une personne ou un groupe de personnes est victime de discrimination au sens de l'art. 15 de la Charte si, du fait de la distinction législative contestée, les membres de ce groupe ont l'impression d'être moins capables ou de moins mériter d'être reconnus ou valorisés en tant qu'êtres humains ou en tant que membres de la société canadienne qui méritent le même intérêt, le même respect et la même considération. Ce sont là les éléments essentiels de la définition de la «discrimination» — une définition qui insiste davantage sur l'impact (c'est-à-dire l'effet discriminatoire) que sur les éléments constitutifs (c'est-à-dire les motifs de la distinction). [Souligné dans l'original.]

L'un des éléments essentiels de l'examen permettant de déterminer si une distinction législative est, de fait, discriminatoire au sens du par. 15(1), porte tant sur la vulnérabilité sociale de l'individu ou du groupe concerné que sur la nature du droit auquel il est porté atteinte quant à son importance pour la dignité humaine et la personnalité.

Compte tenu de cet objectif, toute distinction législative (y compris, comme en l'espèce, une omission du législateur) qui a un impact négatif sur une personne ou un groupe considéré comme désavantagé dans notre société et prive la personne ou le groupe de la protection et du bénéfice de la loi en portant atteinte à leur dignité humaine et à leur personnalité, n'accorde pas à ces personnes ou à or groups with "equal concern, respect and consideration". Consequently, s. 15(1) of the Charter is engaged. At this point, the burden shifts to the legislature to justify such an infringement of s. 15(1) under s. 1. It is at this stage only that the relevancy of the distinction to the legislative objective, among other factors, may be pertinent.

ces groupes «le même respect, la même déférence et la même considération». Le paragraphe 15(1) de la Charte est dès lors engagé. Il incombe alors au législateur de justifier une telle violation du par. 15(1) en application de l'article premier. C'est seulement à cette étape que d'autres facteurs, entre autres la pertinence de la distinction au regard de l'objectif législatif, peuvent être appropriés.

I do not agree with the centrality of enumerated and analogous grounds in Cory J.'s approach to s. 15(1). Although the presence of enumerated or analogous grounds may be indicia of discrimination, or may even raise a presumption of discrimination, it is in the appreciation of the nature of the individual or group who is being negatively affected that they should be examined. Of greatest significance to a finding of discrimination is the effect of the legislative distinction on that individual or group. As McIntyre J. stated for the Court in Andrews, supra, at p. 165:

185 Je ne suis pas d'accord avec l'approche du juge Cory qui met l'accent sur les motifs énumérés et les motifs analogues dans son analyse du par. 15(1). Quoique ces motifs puissent être des indices de discrimination ou puissent même donner naissance à une présomption de discrimination, c'est dans l'appréciation de la nature de la personne ou du groupe lésé qu'ils doivent être examinés. Lorsqu'il s'agit de déterminer s'il y a discrimination, c'est l'effet de la distinction législative sur cette personne ou ce groupe qui revêt la plus haute importance. Comme le juge McIntyre l'a exprimé au nom de la Cour dans l'arrêt Andrews, précité, à la p. 165:

> To approach the ideal of full equality before and under the law . . . the main consideration must be the impact of the law on the individual or the group concerned. [Emphasis added.]

> Pour s'approcher de l'idéal d'une égalité complète et entière devant la loi et dans la loi [. . .] la principale considération doit être l'effet de la loi sur l'individu ou le groupe concerné. [Je souligne.]

The s. 15(1) analysis should properly focus on uncovering and understanding the negative impacts of a legislative distinction on the affected individual or group, rather than on whether the distinction has been made on an enumerated or analogous ground. In my view, to instead make the presence of an enumerated or analogous ground a precondition to the search for discriminatory effects is inconsistent with a liberal and purposive approach to Charter interpretation generally, and specifically, to a Charter guarantee which is at the heart of our aspirations as a society that everyone be treated equally.

L'analyse fondée sur le par. 15(1) devrait principalement viser à détecter et à comprendre les incidences négatives de la distinction législative sur la personne ou le groupe concerné plutôt qu'à déterminer si la distinction en cause a été établie sur le fondement d'un motif énuméré ou d'un motif analogue. À mon avis, faire de la présence d'un motif énuméré ou d'un motif analogue une condition préalable à la recherche des effets discriminatoires est incompatible, de façon générale, avec une interprétation de la Charte qui soit libérale et fondée sur l'objet visé et, en particulier, avec cette promesse de la Charte qui est au cœur même de nos aspirations, en tant que société: l'égalité pour tous.

As a final comment, I wish to stress that I cannot agree with Cory J.'s incorporation of La Forest J.'s narrow approach to defining analogous grounds. At para. 90 of his reasons, Cory J. concludes that sexual orientation is an analogous 186 En dernier lieu, je tiens à souligner que je ne puis donner mon adhésion à la reprise par le juge Cory de la définition stricte du juge La Forest en ce qui concerne les motifs analogues. Au paragraphe 90 de ses motifs, le juge Cory conclut que ground because it is, in La Forest J.'s words from Egan, supra, at para. 5, "a deeply personal characteristic that is either unchangeable or changeable only at unacceptable personal costs". La Forest J. in Egan, at the end of para. 5, also restrictively characterized analogous grounds as being those based on "innate" characteristics. As demonstrated by McLachlin J., writing for the majority in Miron v. Trudel, [1995] 2 S.C.R. 418, this Court has endorsed a much more varied and comprehensive approach to the determination of whether a particular basis for discrimination is analogous to those grounds enumerated in s. 15(1). At paras. 148-49, she explained that:

One indicator of an analogous ground may be that the targeted group has suffered historical disadvantage, independent of the challenged distinction: Andrews, supra, at p. 152 per Wilson J.; Turpin, supra, at pp. 1331-32. Another may be the fact that the group constitutes a "discrete and insular minority": Andrews, supra, at p. 152 per Wilson J. and at p. 183 per McIntyre J.; Turpin, supra, at p. 1333. Another indicator is a distinction made on the basis of a personal characteristic; as McIntyre J. stated in Andrews, "(d)istinctions based on personal characteristics attributed to an individual solely on the basis of association with a group will rarely escape the charge of discrimination, while those based on an individual's merits and capacities will rarely be so classed" (pp. 174-75). By extension, it has been suggested that distinctions based on personal and immutable characteristics must be discriminatory within s. 15(1): Andrews, supra, at p. 195 per La Forest J. Additional assistance may be obtained by comparing the ground at issue with the grounds enumerated, or from recognition by legislators and jurists that the ground is discriminatory: see Egan v. Canada, supra, per Cory J.

All of these may be valid indicators in the inclusionary sense that their presence may signal an analogous ground. But the converse proposition — that any or all of them must be present to find an analogous ground — is invalid. As Wilson J. recognized in Turpin (at l'orientation sexuelle est un motif analogue parce qu'il s'agit, comme l'a dit le juge La Forest dans l'arrêt Egan, précité, au par. 5, d'«une caractéristique profondément personnelle qui est soit immuable, soit susceptible de n'être modifiée qu'à un prix personnel inacceptable». Le juge La Forest, dans l'arrêt Egan, à la fin du par. 5, a également qualifié de façon restrictive les motifs analogues lorsqu'il a dit qu'il s'agissait de motifs fondés sur des caractéristiques «innées». Comme l'a démontré le juge McLachlin, au nom de la majorité dans l'arrêt Miron c. Trudel, [1995] 2 R.C.S. 418, notre Cour a adopté une méthode beaucoup plus nuancée et compréhensive pour déterminer si un motif particulier de discrimination est analogue aux motifs énumérés au par. 15(1). Aux paragraphes 148 et 149, elle a expliqué:

Un indice de motif analogue pourrait être le fait que le groupe visé a subi un désavantage historique, indépendamment de la distinction contestée: Andrews, précité, à la p. 152, le juge Wilson, et Turpin, précité, aux pp. 1331 et 1332. Un autre pourrait être que le groupe constitue une «minorité discrète et isolée»: Andrews, précité, à la p. 152, le juge Wilson, et à la p. 183, le juge McIntyre; Turpin, précité, à la p. 1333. Un autre indice serait le cas où une distinction est fondée sur une caractéristique personnelle; comme l'affirme le juge McIntyre dans l'arrêt Andrews, «[l]es distinctions fondées sur des caractéristiques personnelles attribuées à un seul individu en raison de son association avec un groupe sont presque toujours taxées de discriminatoires, alors que celles fondées sur les mérites et capacités d'un individu le sont rarement» (pp. 174 et 175). Par extension, on a soutenu que des distinctions fondées sur des caractéristiques personnelles et immuables doivent être discriminatoires au sens du par. 15(1): Andrews, précité, à la p. 195, le juge La Forest. Une comparaison entre le motif soulevé et les motifs énumérés peut également être utile, de même que la reconnaissance que les législateurs et les juristes considèrent que le motif en question est discriminatoire: voir Egan c. Canada, précité, le juge Cory.

Tous ces éléments peuvent être des indices valides au sens où leur présence peut constituer un signe de l'existence d'un motif analogue. Cependant, n'est pas valide la proposition contraire — selon laquelle un ou l'ensemble de ces éléments doivent être présents si l'on veut

p. 1333), they are but "analytical tools" which may be "of assistance". [Emphasis in original.]

This being said, I agree with Cory and Iacobucci JJ. to allow the appeal and dismiss the cross-appeal with costs

The following are the reasons delivered by

MAJOR J. (dissenting in part) — The Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, c. I-2 ("IRPA" or "the Act"), provided at the relevant time in its preamble among other things that the purpose of that human rights Act is to recognize the principle that all persons are equal in dignity and rights and to provide protection of those rights to all individuals in Alberta. It stated:

WHEREAS recognition of the inherent dignity and the equal and inalienable rights of all persons is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world; and

WHEREAS it is recognized in Alberta as a fundamental principle and as a matter of public policy that all persons are equal in dignity and rights without regard to race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, age, ancestry or place of origin; and

WHEREAS it is fitting that this principle be affirmed by the Legislature of Alberta in an enactment whereby those rights of the individual may be protected . . . .

Section 7 of the IRPA stated:

7(1) No employer or person acting on behalf of an employer shall

(a) refuse to employ or refuse to continue to employ any person, or

(b) discrimination against any person with regard to employment or any term or condition of employment, because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, conclure à l'existence d'un motif analogue. Comme l'a reconnu le juge Wilson dans l'arrêt Turpin (à la p. 1333), ils ne sont qu'«un moyen analytique» utilisé pour «déterminer» une question. [Souligné dans l'original.]

Cela dit, je suis d'accord avec les juges Cory et Iacobucci pour accueillir le pourvoi principal et rejeter le pourvoi incident avec dépens. 187

Version française des motifs rendus par

LE JUGE MAJOR (dissident en partie) — Le préambule de l'Individual's Rights Protection Act, R.S.A. 1980, ch. I-2 («l'IRPA» ou la «Loi»), énonçait à l'époque en cause notamment que cette loi sur les droits de la personne visait à reconnaître le principe que chacun jouit de la même dignité et des mêmes droits et à garantir à chacun l'exercice de ces droits en Alberta. Il était conçu ainsi: 188

[TRADUCTION]

ATTENDU QUE la reconnaissance de la dignité inhérente et des droits égaux et inaliénables de chacun constitue le fondement de la liberté, de la justice et de la paix dans le monde;

ATTENDU QUE l'Alberta reconnaît qu'il est fondamental et dans l'intérêt public que chacun jouisse de la même dignité et des mêmes droits sans égard à la race, aux croyances religieuses, à la couleur, au sexe, à la déficience physique ou mentale, à l'âge, à l'ascendance ou au lieu d'origine;

ATTENDU QU'il est opportun que ce principe soit consacré par la législature de l'Alberta au moyen d'un texte législatif garantissant ces droits de la personne . . .

L'article 7 de la Loi prévoyait:

[TRADUCTION]

7(1) Nul employeur ni quiconque agissant pour son compte ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine:

a) soit refuser d'employer une personne ou refuser de continuer de l'employer;

b) soit exercer une discrimination à l'égard d'une personne en matière d'emploi ou de conditions d'emploi.

ancestry or place of origin of that person or of any other person.

. . .

(3) Subsection (1) does not apply with respect to a refusal, limitation, specification or preference based on a bona fide occupational requirement.

Section 33 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms provides:

33. (1) Parliament or the legislature of a province may expressly declare in an Act of Parliament or of the legislature, as the case may be, that the Act or a provision thereof shall operate notwithstanding a provision included in section 2 or sections 7 to 15 of this Charter.

(2) An Act or a provision of an Act in respect of which a declaration made under this section is in effect shall have such operation as it would have but for the provision of this Charter referred to in the declaration.

(3) A declaration made under subsection (1) shall cease to have effect five years after it comes into force or on such earlier date as may be specified in the declaration.

(4) Parliament or the legislature of a province may re-enact a declaration made under subsection (1).

(5) Subsection (3) applies in respect of a re-enactment made under subsection (4).

Analysis

189 In the preamble of the IRPA the Province of Alberta makes it clear that the purpose of the legislation is to recognize the principle that all persons are equal in dignity and rights, and to provide protection of those rights to all individuals in Alberta through the elimination of discriminatory practices.

190 Section 7 provides that no employer shall discriminate against any person with respect to employment because of the race, religious beliefs, colour, gender, physical disability, mental disability, marital status, age, ancestry or place of origin of that person or of any other person. The absence of sexual orientation from the enumerated grounds gave rise to the litigation resulting in this appeal.

. . .

(3) Le paragraphe (1) ne s'applique pas aux restrictions, aux conditions, aux préférences ni aux refus fondés sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée.

L'article 33 de la Charte canadienne des droits et libertés prévoit:

33. (1) Le Parlement ou la législature d'une province peut adopter une loi où il est expressément déclaré que celle-ci ou une de ses dispositions a effet indépendamment d'une disposition donnée de l'article 2 ou des articles 7 à 15 de la présente charte.

(2) La loi ou la disposition qui fait l'objet d'une déclaration conforme au présent article et en vigueur a l'effet qu'elle aurait sauf la disposition en cause de la charte.

(3) La déclaration visée au paragraphe (1) cesse d'avoir effet à la date qui y est précisée ou, au plus tard, cinq ans après son entrée en vigueur.

(4) Le Parlement ou une législature peut adopter de nouveau une déclaration visée au paragraphe (1).

(5) Le paragraphe (3) s'applique à toute déclaration adoptée sous le régime du paragraphe (4).

Analyse

Dans le préambule, la province de l'Alberta dit clairement que la Loi vise à reconnaître le principe que chacun jouit de la même dignité et des mêmes droits et à garantir à chacun la jouissance de ces droits en Alberta par la suppression des pratiques discriminatoires.

L'article 7 prévoit que nul employeur ne doit, sur le fondement de la race, des croyances religieuses, de la couleur, du sexe, de la déficience physique ou mentale, de l'état matrimonial, de l'âge, de l'ascendance ou du lieu d'origine, exercer une discrimination contre une personne en matière d'emploi. L'absence de l'orientation sexuelle des motifs énumérés est à l'origine du litige donnant lieu au présent pourvoi.

The Province of Alberta was invited to but declined at the appeal to explain how people with different sexual orientation were not part of the phrase "all persons are equal in dignity and rights". As well, the Province of Alberta failed to demonstrate how the exclusion of sexual orientation from the IRPA accords with its legislative purpose. It is puzzling that the Legislature, having enacted comprehensive human rights legislation that applies to everyone in the province, would then selectively deny the protection of the Act to certain groups of individuals. No explanation was given, and none is apparent from the evidence filed by the Province.

191 La province de l'Alberta a été invitée, dans le cadre du présent pourvoi, à expliquer comment il se faisait que les personnes ayant une orientation sexuelle différente n'étaient pas visées par l'expression «chacun jouisse de la même dignité et des mêmes droits», ce qu'elle a refusé de faire. En outre, elle n'a pas établi en quoi l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle de la Loi s'harmonisait avec l'objectif de celle-ci. Il est curieux de constater que la législature, après avoir adopté une loi d'ensemble sur les droits de la personne qui s'applique à toutes les personnes dans la province, voudrait priver de la protection de la Loi certains groupes de personnes ciblés. Aucune explication n'a été fournie ni ne ressort de la preuve déposée par la province.

The inescapable conclusion is that there is no reason to exclude that group from s. 7 and I agree with Justices Cory and Iacobucci that to do so is discriminatory and offends their constitutional rights.

192 On doit inévitablement conclure qu'il n'existe aucune raison d'exclure de l'art. 7 le groupe visé, et je suis d'accord avec les juges Cory et Iacobucci qu'une telle exclusion est discriminatoire et porte atteinte aux droits constitutionnels des personnes faisant partie de ce groupe.

While a number of submissions related to the appellant's employment as a teacher this appeal will not be determinative of the matter between the appellant Vriend and his former employer, King's College. Extension of the legislation, either by the Court or by the Legislature, to include protection from discrimination based on sexual orientation will provide the first step in allowing the appellant to have his complaint heard by the Alberta Human Rights Commission. The ultimate success of that action, however, will depend in part on whether the College can demonstrate that its refusal to continue to employ Vriend was based on a bona fide occupational requirement, pursuant to s. 7(3) of the IRPA. The issue of whether a private fundamentalist Christian college can legitimately refuse to employ a homosexual teacher will be for the Alberta Human Rights Commission, and not this Court, to decide.

193 Même si certains des arguments avancés portaient sur l'emploi de l'appelant à titre d'enseignant, le présent pourvoi ne saurait trancher le litige opposant l'appelant Vriend et son ancien employeur, le King's College. La modification de la Loi, par la Cour ou la législature, de manière à ce qu'elle inclue la protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle constituera une première étape permettant à l'appelant de présenter sa plainte à l'Alberta Human Rights Commission. En bout de ligne, cependant, le succès de cette action dépendra en partie de la question de savoir si le King's College peut établir que son refus de continuer de l'employer était fondé sur une exigence professionnelle justifiée, conformément au par. 7(3) de la Loi. Il appartiendra à l'Alberta Human Rights Commission, et non à notre Cour, de trancher la question de savoir si un collège chrétien privé fondamentaliste peut légitimement refuser d'employer un enseignant homosexuel.

With respect to remedy, Iacobucci J. relies on the reasoning in Schachter v. Canada, [1992] 2 S.C.R. 679, to support his conclusion that the words "sexual orientation" ought to be read into the IRPA. In my view, the analysis in Schachter with respect to reading in is not compelling here. The Court there decided that the appropriate remedy was to strike down the relevant legislation but temporarily suspend the declaration of invalidity. The directions on "reading in" were not as the Chief Justice stated at p. 719, intended "as hard and fast rules to be applied regardless of factual context".

194 En ce qui concerne la réparation appropriée, le juge Iacobucci se fonde sur le raisonnement de la Cour dans l'arrêt Schachter c. Canada, [1992] 2

195 In my opinion, Schachter did not contemplate the circumstances that pertain here, that is, where the Legislature's opposition to including sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination is abundantly clear on the record. Reading in may be appropriate where it can be safely assumed that the legislature itself would have remedied the underinclusiveness by extending the benefit or protection to the previously excluded group. That assumption cannot be made in this appeal.

196 The issue may be that the Legislature would prefer no human rights Act over one that includes sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, or the issue may be how the legislation ought to be amended to bring it into conformity with the Charter. That determination is best left to the Legislature. As was stated in Hunter v. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145, at p. 169:

> While the courts are guardians of the Constitution and of individuals' rights under it, it is the legislature's responsibility to enact legislation that embodies appropriate safeguards to comply with the Constitution's requirements. It should not fall to the courts to fill in the details that will render legislative lacunae constitutional. [Emphasis added.]

197 There are numerous ways in which the legislation could be amended to address the underinclusiveness. Sexual orientation may be added as a prohibited ground of discrimination to each of the R.C.S. 679, pour étayer sa conclusion que la Loi devrait être interprétée comme si les mots «orientation sexuelle» y figuraient. À mon avis, l'analyse faite dans l'arrêt Schachter en ce qui concerne l'interprétation large ne s'impose pas en l'espèce. Dans cette affaire, la Cour avait conclu que la réparation appropriée consistait à annuler la disposition en cause, mais à suspendre temporairement l'effet de la déclaration d'invalidité. Comme l'a dit le Juge en chef à la p. 719, les instructions concernant l'«interprétation large» ne se voulaient pas «des règles rigides qui doivent être appliquées indépendamment des faits».

À mon avis, la Cour, dans l'arrêt Schachter, n'avait pas envisagé les circonstances de la présente affaire, soit le refus de la législature d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite, comme en fait foi très clairement le dossier. L'interprétation large peut être appropriée lorsque l'on peut supposer sans risque d'erreur que la législature elle-même aurait remédié à la nature trop limitative de la Loi en étendant le bénéfice ou la protection en question au groupe antérieurement exclu. Une telle supposition ne peut être faite dans le présent pourvoi.

Il se peut que la législature préfère ne pas adopter de loi en matière de droits de la personne plutôt que d'en adopter une qui comprenne l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite, ou il s'agit peut-être de déterminer comment il faudrait modifier la Loi pour la rendre conforme à la Charte. Il vaut mieux laisser à la législature le soin de trancher cette question. Comme il a été dit dans l'arrêt Hunter c. Southam Inc., [1984] 2 R.C.S. 145, à la p. 169:

> Même si les tribunaux sont les gardiens de la Constitution et des droits qu'elle confère aux particuliers, il incombe à la législature d'adopter des lois qui contiennent les garanties appropriées permettant de satisfaire aux exigences de la Constitution. Il n'appartient pas aux tribunaux d'ajouter les détails qui rendent constitutionnelles les lacunes législatives. [Je souligne.]

Il existe de nombreuses façons de modifier la Loi afin de remédier à sa nature trop limitative. L'orientation sexuelle pourrait être ajoutée comme motif de distinction illicite à chacune des disposiimpugned provisions. In so doing, the Legislature may choose to define the term "sexual orientation", or it may devise constitutional limitations on the scope of protection provided by the IRPA. As an alternative, the Legislature may choose to override the Charter breach by invoking s. 33 of the Charter, which enables Parliament or a legislature to enact a law that will operate notwithstanding the rights guaranteed in s. 2 and ss. 7 to 15 of the Charter. Given the persistent refusal of the Legislature to protect against discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, it may be that it would choose to invoke s. 33 in these circumstances. In any event it should lie with the elected Legislature to determine this issue. They are answerable to the electorate of that province and it is for them to choose the remedy whether it is changing the legislation or using the notwithstanding clause. That decision in turn will be judged by the voters.

tions contestées. La législature pourrait alors décider de définir l'expression «orientation sexuelle», ou encore poser des limites constitutionnelles à la portée de la protection qu'accorde la Loi. Par ailleurs, la législature pourrait décider de protéger les dispositions qui portent atteinte à la Charte, en invoquant l'art. 33, lequel permet au Parlement ou à la législature d'une province d'adopter une loi qui aura effet indépendamment des droits garantis aux art. 2 et 7 à 15 de la Charte. Vu qu'elle persiste dans son refus d'accorder une protection contre la discrimination fondée sur l'orientation sexuelle, la législature pourrait décider d'invoquer l'art. 33. De toute façon, il incombe à la législature, dont les membres ont été élus, de trancher cette question. En effet, ces derniers sont responsables devant l'électorat de la province et c'est à eux de choisir quelle voie prendre, qu'ils décident de modifier la loi ou encore d'invoquer la disposition de dérogation. Leur décision sera ensuite évaluée par les électeurs.

The responsibility of enacting legislation that accords with the rights guaranteed by the Charter rests with the legislature. Except in the clearest of cases, courts should not dictate how underinclusive legislation must be amended. Obviously, the courts have a role to play in protecting Charter rights by deciding on the constitutionality of legislation. Deference and respect for the role of the legislature come into play in determining how unconstitutional legislation will be amended where various means are available.

198 La responsabilité d'adopter des dispositions législatives qui s'harmonisent avec les droits garantis par la Charte incombe à la législature. Sauf dans les cas les plus manifestes, les tribunaux ne devraient pas imposer la façon dont une disposition de nature trop limitative doit être modifiée. Il va de soi que les tribunaux ont un rôle à jouer dans la protection des droits garantis par la Charte, rôle qui consiste à déterminer si les dispositions législatives adoptées par la législature sont valides sur le plan constitutionnel. Cependant, ils doivent faire preuve de retenue et respecter le rôle de la législature lorsqu'il existe plusieurs façons de modifier une disposition législative inconstitutionnelle.

Given the apparent legislative opposition to including sexual orientation in the IRPA, I conclude that this is not an appropriate case for reading in. It is preferable to declare the offending sections invalid and provide the Legislature with an opportunity to rectify them. I would restrict the declaration of invalidity to the employment-related provisions of the IRPA, that is ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10. While the same conclusions may apply to the remaining provisions of the IRPA, this Court has stated that Charter cases should not be considered in a factual vacuum: see MacKay v. Manitoba, [1989] 2 S.C.R. 357, at p. 361.

199 Étant donné que la législature refuse manifestement d'inclure l'orientation sexuelle dans la Loi, je conclus que la présente affaire ne se prête pas à l'application de l'interprétation large. Il est préférable de déclarer invalides les dispositions fautives et de permettre à la législature de les rectifier. Je limiterais la déclaration d'invalidité aux dispositions de la Loi en matière d'emploi, soit les par. 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que l'art. 10. Bien que les mêmes conclusions puissent s'appliquer aux autres dispositions de la Loi, notre Cour a déjà dit que les

200 The only remaining issue is whether the declaration of invalidity ought to be temporarily suspended. In Schachter, Lamer C.J. stated that a declaration of invalidity may be temporarily suspended where the legislation is deemed unconstitutional because of underinclusiveness rather than overbreadth, and striking down the legislation would result in the deprivation of benefits from deserving persons without thereby benefitting the individual whose rights have been violated.

201 There is no intention to deprive individuals in Alberta of the protection afforded by the IRPA, but only to ensure that the legislation is brought into conformity with the Charter while simultaneously respecting the role of the legislature. I would therefore order that the declaration of invalidity be suspended for one year to allow the Legislature an opportunity to bring the impugned provisions into line with its constitutional obligations.

Conclusion

202 I agree with my colleagues that the exclusion of sexual orientation as a protected ground of discrimination from ss. 7(1), 8(1) and 10 of the IRPA violates s. 15 of the Charter and cannot be saved under s. 1. I would declare these sections unconstitutional but suspend the declaration of invalidity for a period of one year.

Appeal allowed with costs, MAJOR J. dissenting in part. Cross-appeal dismissed with costs.

Solicitors for the appellants: Chivers Greckol & Kanee, Edmonton.

Solicitors for the respondents: Miles Davison McCarthy, Calgary.

causes fondées sur la Charte ne doivent pas être examinées dans un vide factuel: voir MacKay c. Manitoba, [1989] 2 R.C.S. 357, à la p. 361.

La seule question litigieuse qui reste à trancher est de savoir si la déclaration d'invalidité devrait être temporairement suspendue. Dans l'arrêt Schachter, le juge en chef Lamer a dit que la déclaration d'invalidité pouvait être temporairement suspendue lorsque la loi est jugée inconstitutionnelle en raison de sa portée trop restreinte plutôt que trop large, et que l'annulation de la loi priverait de bénéfices les personnes admissibles sans profiter à la personne dont les droits ont été violés.

La Cour n'a pas l'intention de priver les personnes vivant en Alberta de la protection de la Loi; elle veut uniquement s'assurer que la Loi soit rendue conforme à la Charte, tout en respectant le rôle de la législature. Je suis donc d'avis de suspendre la déclaration d'invalidité pour une période d'un an afin de permettre à la législature de modifier les dispositions contestées de façon à les rendre conformes à ses obligations constitutionnelles.

Conclusion

Je suis d'accord avec mes collègues que l'exclusion de l'orientation sexuelle comme motif de distinction illicite des par. 7(1) et 8(1) ainsi que de l'art. 10 de la Loi viole l'art. 15 de la Charte et ne peut être justifiée conformément à l'article premier. Je suis d'avis de déclarer inconstitutionnelles ces dispositions, mais de suspendre la déclaration d'invalidité pour une période d'un an.

Pourvoi principal accueilli avec dépens, le juge MAJOR est dissident en partie. Pourvoi incident rejeté avec dépens.

Procureurs des appelants: Chivers Greckol & Kanee, Edmonton.

Procureurs des intimés: Miles Davison McCarthy, Calgary.

Solicitors for the intervener the Attorney General of Canada: Brian Saunders and James Hendry, Ottawa.

Procureurs de l'intervenant le procureur général du Canada: Brian Saunders et James Hendry, Ottawa.

Solicitor for the intervener the Attorney General for Ontario: The Ministry of the Attorney General, Toronto.

Procureur de l'intervenant le procureur général de l'Ontario: Le ministère du Procureur général, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Alberta Civil Liberties Association: Pundit & Chotalia, Edmonton.

Procureurs de l'intervenante l'Alberta Civil Liberties Association: Pundit & Chotalia, Edmonton.

Solicitors for the intervener Equality for Gays and Lesbians Everywhere (EGALE): Nelligan Power, Ottawa.

Procureurs de l'intervenant Égalité pour les gais et les lesbiennes (EGALE): Nelligan Power, Ottawa.

Solicitor for the intervener Women's Legal Education and Action Fund (LEAF): Claire Klassen, Toronto.

Procureur de l'intervenant le Fonds d'action et d'éducation juridiques pour les femmes (FAEJ): Claire Klassen, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Foundation for Equal Families: Scott & Aylen, Toronto.

Procureurs de l'intervenante la Foundation for Equal Families: Scott & Aylen, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian Human Rights Commission: William F. Pentney and Patricia Lawrence, Ottawa.

Procureurs de l'intervenante la Commission canadienne des droits de la personne: William F. Pentney et Patricia Lawrence, Ottawa.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian Labour Congress: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

Procureurs de l'intervenant le Congrès du travail du Canada: Sack Goldblatt Mitchell, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian Bar Association — Alberta Branch: McCarthy Tétrault, Calgary.

Procureurs de l'intervenante l'Association du Barreau canadien — Division de l'Alberta: McCarthy Tétrault, Calgary.

Solicitor for the intervener the Canadian Association of Statutory Human Rights Agencies (CASHRA): Thomas S. Kuttner, Fredericton.

Procureur de l'intervenante l'Association canadienne des commissions et conseils des droits de la personne (ACCDP): Thomas S. Kuttner, Fredericton.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian AIDS Society: Elliott, Rodrigues, Toronto.

Procureurs de l'intervenante la Société canadienne du SIDA: Elliott, Rodrigues, Toronto.

Solicitors for the intervener the Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada: Dale Gibson Associates, Edmonton.

Procureurs de l'intervenante l'Alberta and Northwest Conference of the United Church of Canada: Dale Gibson Associates, Edmonton.

Solicitors for the intervener the Canadian Jewish Congress: Witten Binder, Edmonton.

Procureurs de l'intervenant le Congrès juif canadien: Witten Binder, Edmonton.

Solicitors for the intervener Christian Legal Fellowship: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

Solicitor for the intervener the Alberta Federation of Women United for Families: Dallas K. Miller Law Office, Medicine Hat.

Solicitors for the intervener the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

Solicitors for the intervener Focus on the Family (Canada) Association: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

Procureurs de l'intervenant le Christian Legal Fellowship: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

Procureur de l'intervenante l'Alberta Federation of Women United for Families: Dallas K. Miller Law Office, Medicine Hat.

Procureurs de l'intervenant l'Evangelical Fellowship of Canada: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

Procureurs de l'intervenante la Focus on the Family (Canada) Association: Milner Fenerty, Calgary.

2003 PENSIONS LAW REPORTS 125

KUTZ-BAUER

v

FREIE UND HANSESTADT HAMBURG

European Court of Justice, 20 March 2003

Equal treatment — Article 2 and 5 Council Directive 76/207/EEC — Scheme of part-time work for older employees — Relationship with retirement pension

Facts

- Ms Kutz-Bauer was entitled to take advantage of a provision under a collective agreement applicable to public servants which allowed male and female employees to access a scheme of part-time work for older employees.
- The problem was that the ability to continue in part-time employment of this type applied only until the date on which the person concerned first became eligible for retirement pension at the full rate under the statutory old-age insurance scheme.
- The class of persons eligible for a pension at the age of 60 consisted almost exclusively of women whereas the class of persons entitled to receive such a pension only from the age of 65 consisted almost exclusively of men. Accordingly, Ms Kutz-Bauer was restricted in the practical effect of the exercise of her right in a way that a man would not be.

Decision

- In the absence of any objective criteria unrelated to any discrimination on the grounds of sex the terms concerned were contrary to the relevant Directive. Accordingly, the relevant provisions of the collective agreement needed to be set aside by the national court (which would also have been the case had the agreement concerned been introduced by legislative provision as opposed to by collective agreement).

Cases referred to:

- Amministrazione delle finanze dello Stato v Simmenthal Case 106/77 [1978] ECR 629
- De Weerd nee Roks & ors v Bestuur van de Bedrijfsvereniging voor de Gezondheid, Geestelijke en Maatschappelijke Belangen & ors Case C-343/92 [1994] ECR I-571
- Foster & ors v British Gas Case C-188/89 [1990] PLR 189
- Hill & Stapleton v The Revenue Commissioners and Department of Finance Case C-243/95 [1998] ECR I-3739
- Jørgensen Case C-226/98 [2000] ECR I-2447
- Kowalska v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg Case C-33/89 [1990] ECR I-2591
- Kuratorium für Dialyse und Nierentransplantation v Lewark [1996] Case C-457/93 ECR I-243
- Marshall v Southampton and South-West Hampshire Area Health Authority Case 152/84 [1986] ECR 723
- Nimz v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg Case C-184/89 [1991] ECR I-297
- Rinner-Kühn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung Case 171/88 [1989] ECR 2743
- Secretary of State for Social Security v Thomas & ors Case C-328/91 [1993] ECR I-1247
- Seymour-Smith & Perez Case C-167/97 [1999] ECR I-623

Legislation referred to:

- EC Directive 76/207 of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion and working conditions (OJ 1976 L39).

Judgment

Language of the case: German

(Social policy – Equal treatment for men and women – Scheme of part-time work for older employees – Directive 76/207/EEC – Indirect discrimination – Objective justification)

In Case C-187/00,

REFERENCE to the Court under Article 234 EC by the Arbeitsgericht Hamburg (Germany) for a preliminary ruling in the proceedings pending before that court between

Helga Kutz-Bauer

and

Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg,

on the interpretation of Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (OJ 1976 L 39, p40),

THE COURT,

composed of: R Schintgen, President of the Second Chamber, acting for the President of the Sixth Chamber, C Gulmann, V Skouris, F Macken (Rapporteur) and JN Cunha Rodrigues, Judges, Advocate General: A Tizzano,

Registrar: L. Hewlett, Principal Administrator, after considering the written observations submitted on behalf of:

Ms Kutz-Bauer, by K Bertelsmann, Rechtsanwalt,

Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg, by T Scholle, Rechtsanwalt, the German Government, by W-D Plessing and T Jürgensen, acting as Agents, the Commission of the European Communities, by J Sack, acting as Agent, having regard to the Report for the Hearing, after hearing the oral observations of Ms Kutz-Bauer, of Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg, of the German Government and of the Commission at the hearing on 23 October 2001, after hearing the Opinion of the Advocate General at the sitting on 5 February 2002, gives the following

JUDGMENT

1 By decision of 3 May 2000 and a further decision of 29 June 2000, received at the Court on 19 May and 4 July 2000 respectively, the Arbeitsgericht Hamburg (Labour Court, Hamburg) referred to the Court for a preliminary ruling under Article 234 EC two questions on the interpretation of Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions (OJ 1976 L 39, p40).

2 Those questions were raised in proceedings between Ms Kutz-Bauer and Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg (the City of Hamburg) concerning Ms Kutz-Bauer's exclusion from a scheme of part-time work for older employees under a collective agreement applicable to the public service.

Community legislation

Directive 76/207

3 Article 1(1) of Directive 76/207 states that the purpose of that directive is to put into effect in the member states the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, including promotion, and to vocational training and as regards working conditions and, on the conditions referred to in Article 1(2), social security.

4 Article 2(1) of Directive 76/207 provides:

> 1. For the purposes of the following provisions, the principle of equal treatment shall mean that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on grounds of sex either directly or indirectly by reference in particular to marital or family status.

5 Article 5 of Directive 76/207 provides:

> 1. Application of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on grounds of sex.
>
> 2. To this end, member states shall take the measures necessary to ensure that:
>
> (a) any laws, regulations and administrative provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment shall be abolished;
>
> (b) any provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment which are included in collective agreements, individual contracts of employment, internal rules of undertakings or in rules governing the independent occupations and professions shall be, or may be declared, null and void or may be amended;
>
> (c) those laws, regulations and administrative provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment when the concern for protection which originally inspired them is no longer well founded shall be revised; and that where similar provisions are included in collective agreements labour and management shall be requested to undertake the desired revision.

Directive 79/7/EEC

6 Article 3(1) of Council Directive 79/7/EEC of 19 December 1978 on the progressive implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in matters of social security (OJ 1979 L 6, p24) provides:

> This Directive shall apply to:

(a) statutory schemes which provide protection against the following risks:

- sickness,

- invalidity,

- old age,

- accidents at work and occupational diseases,

- unemployment;

(b) social assistance, in so far as it is intended to supplement or replace the schemes referred to in (a).

7 Article 4(1) of Directive 79/7 provides that the principle of equal treatment means that there is to be no discrimination whatsoever on ground of sex either directly, or indirectly by reference in particular to marital or family status.

8 Article 7(1)(a) of Directive 79/7 provides that that directive is to apply without prejudice to the right of member states to exclude from its scope the determination of pensionable age for the purposes of granting old-age and retirement pensions and the possible consequences thereof for other benefits.

German legislation

9 In Germany, the retirement pensions scheme and the scheme of part-time work for older employees are regulated at federal and regional level. They are also covered by collective agreements.

German provisions on retirement

10 The conditions for the grant of a statutory old-age pension at the full rate are defined in Book VI of the Sozialgesetzbuch (German Social Code, the SGB VI).

11 Paragraph 35 of the SGB VI, on the ordinary old-age pension, provides:

> Insured persons shall be entitled to a retirement pension where:
>
> 1. they reach the age of 65 years; and
>
> 2. they have completed the normal qualifying period.

12 Paragraph 38 of the SGB VI, in the version in force until 31 December 1999, governed the old-age pension in the case of unemployment or following part-time work for older employees. It provided that insured persons were entitled to an old-age pension where, in particular, they had reached the age of 60, been employed under a scheme of part-time work for older employees for 24 calendar months and completed a qualifying period of 15 years.

13 Paragraph 39 of the SGB VI, in the version in force until 31 December 1999, provided that female insured persons were to be entitled to an old-age pension where, in particular, they had reached the age of 60.

14 Under the Hamburgisches Ruhegeldgesetz (Land of Hamburg Law on retirement pensions), male workers must work up to the age of 65 in order to be eligible for an occupational retirement pension under the statutory scheme, whereas female workers are entitled to such pension at the full rate from the age of 60.

15 The Hamburgisches Ruhegeldgesetz provides that the fact that a woman receives an old-age pension at the full rate as soon as she is entitled to do so does not entail a reduction in or suspension of her supplementary pension.

German provisions on part-time work for older employees

16 The scheme of part-time work for older employees is regulated by the Altersteilzeitgesetz (Law on part-time work for older employees) of 23 July 1996 (the AltTZG) (BGBl 1996 I, p1078).

17 It is apparent from para 1(1) of the AltTZG that the purpose of that law is to make it easier for workers who have reached a certain age to make a gradual transition from active life to retirement.

18 Under para 1(2) of the AltTZG, the Bundesanstalt für Arbeit (Federal Labour Authority) provides financial support, by means of the benefits provided for in that law, for part-time work for workers who, by no later than 31 July 2004, reduce their working hours once they have reached the age of 55 and thus make it possible to recruit workers who would otherwise be unemployed.

19 In accordance with the provisions of the AltTZG, part-time work for older employees may take the form of either a uniform reduction in working hours throughout the relevant period or 'block' working, where a period of full-time work is followed by a period during which the worker retains his status as an employee even though he ceases work.

20 Under para 2(1)(1) and (2) of the AltTZG, benefits are granted for workers who have reached the age of 55 and who have concluded an agreement with their employer covering at least the period up to the time when they are entitled to a retirement pension and under which their working hours are reduced.

21 Under para 3(1)(2) and (3) of the AltTZG, an employer is required to recruit an unemployed person to work either alongside the worker placed on the scheme of part-time work for older employees or, if the worker has taken advantage of the 'block' part-time working scheme, after the worker has retired.

22 Incentives to take up the scheme of part-time work for older employees are provided, first, in the form of enhanced remuneration, equal to at least 70 per cent of the net full-time salary, pursuant to para 3(1)(1)(a) of the AltTZG.

23 Furthermore, under para 4 of that law, the Bundesanstalt für Arbeit reimburses the expenditure which the employer has incurred in paying the enhanced remuneration for part-time work and the increased retirement insurance contributions.

24 However, these costs are not reimbursed if the employer does not fulfil the conditions relating to the recruitment of an unemployed person set out at para 3(1)(2) and (3) of the AltTZG. Furthermore, under para 8(2) of that law, an employer is not relieved of his obligation to pay the worker the enhanced remuneration provided for at para 3(1)(1)(a) of the AltTZG where the employer no longer satisfies the conditions for reimbursement by the Bundesanstalt für Arbeit.

25 It follows from para 5(1) of the AltTZG that the financial support provided by the Bundesanstalt für Arbeit ceases, inter alia, where the worker reaches the age of 65 or at the age at which he becomes entitled to an old-age pension at the full rate.

26 The Tarifvertrag zur Regelung der Altersteilzeit (collective agreement on part-time work for older employees) of 5 May 1998 (the TV ATZ) was the collective agreement on part-time work for older employees applicable to the public service at the material time. It was concluded in consideration of the opportunities provided by the AltTZG.

27 The preamble to the TV ATZ is worded as follows:

> The parties to the agreement intend, by means of that agreement, to allow employees who have reached a certain age to make a smooth transition from active life to retirement and thus to create opportunities for the recruitment of trainee employees (apprentices) and the unemployed.

28 Paragraph 2(1) and (2) of the TV ATZ provides:

> 1. The employer may agree with full-time employees who have reached the age of 55 and completed a period of employment ... of five years and who during the last five years have worked the normal weekly working hours on at least 1,080 calendar days to change the employment relationship to a relationship of part-time work for older employees on the basis of [the AltTZG] ...
>
> 2. Employees who have reached the age of 60 and who satisfy the other conditions laid down in subpara 1 shall be entitled to conclude a contract on part-time work for older employees ...

29 Under paras 4(1) and 5(1) and (2) of the TV ATZ, the remuneration payable is equal to the remuneration for part-time work plus 20 per cent of that amount. In any event, a person taking advantage of the scheme of part-time work for older employees is guaranteed to receive remuneration equal to 83 per cent of the net remuneration which would be payable if he worked full time.

30 Paragraph 9(1) and (2) of the TV ATZ provides:

> 1. The employment relationship shall terminate on the date stated in the agreement on part-time work for older employees.
>
> 2. Without prejudice to the other conditions of termination provided for in collective agreements ..., the employment relationship shall terminate:
>
> (a) at the end of the calendar month preceding that from which the employee can claim a retirement pension on the ground of his age or, where he is exempt from obligatory membership of the general retirement scheme, a comparable payment provided by a retirement or insurance institution or by an insurance company; this rule shall not apply to pensions which can be claimed before the insured person reaches the relevant retirement age; or

(b) at the beginning of the calendar month from which the employee receives a retirement pension, a miner's compensation benefit, a similar benefit governed by public law or, where he is not subject to compulsory insurance under the statutory social security scheme, a comparable benefit provided by a retirement or insurance institution or by an insurance company.

Main proceedings and questions referred to the Court

31 Ms Kutz-Bauer was born on 21 August 1939 and is employed by the City of Hamburg as director of the Landeszentrale für politische Bildung (Public Office for Political Education).

32 She requested her employer to enter into an agreement under which she would be eligible for the scheme of part-time work for older employees in accordance with the 'block' working formula during the period 1 September 1999 to 31 August 2004, when she would have reached the age of 65. According to that formula, she would have worked full-time for two and a half years and not worked for the remainder of that five-year period.

33 The City of Hamburg considered her request and rejected it by letter of 21 December 1998. Ms Kutz-Bauer would have fulfilled the personal criteria granting entitlement to part-time work for older employees in accordance with para 2 of the TV ATZ; however, under para 9(2) of the TV ATZ, an agreement on part-time work for older employees between the parties to the main proceedings would have had the consequence of immediately terminating their employment relationship.

34 Ms Kutz-Bauer submitted a second request, which was rejected by letter from the City of Hamburg dated 6 July 1999, on the ground that although she would have been entitled to an agreement on part-time work for older employees once she had reached the age of 60, the employment relationship would automatically cease on the same date pursuant to para 9 of the TV ATZ, since, on the basis of the Hamburgisches Ruhegeldgesetz, her supplementary pension would not be reduced.

35 Before the national court, Ms Kutz-Bauer claimed that the refusal to recognise her entitlement to part-time work for older employees constituted indirect discrimination on grounds of sex, contrary to Directive 76/207.

36 Taking the view that the outcome of the dispute before it requires the interpretation of the provisions of Directive 76/207, the Arbeitsgericht Hamburg decided to stay proceedings and to refer the following questions to the Court for a preliminary ruling:

1. Does a provision of a collective agreement for the public service which allows male and female employees to take advantage of a scheme of part-time work for older employees infringe Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC of 9 February 1976 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions, if under that provision the scheme of part-time work applies only until the time when the person concerned first becomes eligible for a full pension under the statutory old-age insurance scheme, and if the class of persons entitled to draw a full pension at the age of 60 consists almost exclusively of women, while the class entitled to draw a full pension only from the age of 65 consists almost exclusively of men?

2. Are national courts empowered, where provisions of collective agreements and legislative provisions are in breach of Directive 76/207/EEC or Directive 79/7/EEC, to apply the corresponding provisions in favour of the disadvantaged class, disregarding the restrictions which are contrary to Community law, until non-discriminatory rules are made by the parties to the collective agreement and/or the legislature?

First question

37 By its first question, the national court is asking whether Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207 must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a provision of a collective agreement applicable to the public service which allows male and female employees to take advantage of the scheme of part-time work for older employees where under that provision the right to participate in the scheme of part-time work applies only until the date on which the person concerned first becomes eligible for a retirement pension at the full rate under the statutory old-age insurance scheme and where the class of persons eligible for such a pension at the age of 60 consists almost exclusively of women whereas the class of persons entitled to receive such a pension only from the age of 65 consists almost exclusively of men.

Observations submitted to the Court

38 Both Ms Kutz-Bauer and the Commission maintain that the unequal treatment of male and female workers introduced by the TV ATZ into the scheme of part-time work for older employees falls within the scope of Directive 76/207, in particular Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of that directive, in so far as the scheme affects the working conditions referred to in Article 5(1).

39 The Commission submits that an agreement defining a scheme of part-time work for older employees does not form part of the statutory schemes which provide protection against the risk of old age and to which Directive 79/7 applies pursuant to Article 3. It therefore maintains that there is no need to consider whether the provisions of Directive 79/7 might restrict the scope of Article 2(1) of Directive 76/207.

40 The Commission further submits that Article 7(1) of Directive 79/7 can naturally apply only to social security benefits and that the arguments put forward by the City of Hamburg cannot prevent the application of Articles 2 and 5 of Directive 76/207. The first question must therefore be answered in the affirmative.

41 On the other hand, the German Government contends that, regard being had to the purpose and structure of the scheme of part-time work for older employees at issue in the main proceedings, the measure applicable to that scheme is Directive 79/7. The scheme is intended, first, to make it easier for older workers to make the gradual transition from work to retirement and, second, to provide young workers with recruitment opportunities by making posts available.

42 Furthermore, in the German Government's submission, the conditions laid down by the Court in Case C-328/91 Thomas & ors [1993] ECR I-1247 for the application of the derogation provided for in Article 7(1) of Directive 79/7 are fulfilled in the present case. The German rules on part-time work for older employees tend to ensure coherence between the scheme of financial support for such work and the retirement scheme. In order to avoid any overlap between the unemployment insurance and retirement insurance schemes, it is necessary to ensure that employees who are already entitled to a retirement pension at the full rate do not also benefit from financial support provided by the Bundesanstalt für Arbeit.

Reply of the Court

43 In order to provide an answer of use to the national court, it is necessary to ascertain at the outset whether the scheme of part-time work for older employees at issue in the main proceedings is governed by Directive 76/207 or whether, as the German Government submits, it is governed by Directive 79/7.

44 In that regard, the scheme of part-time work for older employees is intended to reduce the normal working time, either by reducing the working hours at a uniform rate throughout the entire period concerned, or by allowing the person concerned to cease work at an earlier date. In each case the scheme affects the exercise of the occupation of the workers concerned by adjusting their working time.

45 The Court therefore finds that the scheme at issue in the main proceedings established rules relating to working conditions for the purposes of Article 5(1) of Directive 76/207.

46 Contrary to the German Government's contention, that conclusion cannot be disturbed by the fact that the collective agreement at issue in the main proceedings was intended to allow employees who have reached a certain age to make a smooth transition from work to retirement and thus to create opportunities for the recruitment of trainee workers and the unemployed. The fact that the agreement pursued those two aims does not suffice to bring the scheme at issue in the main proceedings within the scope of Directive 79/7.

47 The first question therefore correctly refers to the interpretation of Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207.

48 It is clear from the first question that the class of persons entitled to receive a full retirement pension at the age of 60 under the statutory old-age insurance scheme consists almost exclusively of women while the class of persons eligible for such a pension only from the age of 65 consists almost exclusively of men.

49 It follows from the documents in the file that while both female and male workers may benefit from the scheme of part-time working from the age of 55 with the employer's consent, the great majority of workers entitled to benefit from the scheme for a period of five years from the age of 60 are male.

50 In those circumstances, provisions of the kind at issue in the main proceedings result in discrimination against female workers by comparison with male workers and must in principle be treated as contrary to Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207. It would be otherwise only if the difference of treatment found to exist between the two categories of worker were justified by objective factors unrelated to any discrimination based on sex (see, in that regard, Case 171/88 Rinner-Kühn [1989] ECR 2743, para 12; Case C-457/93 Lewark [1996] ECR I-243, para 31; Case C-243/95 Hill & Stapleton [1998] ECR I-3739, para 34; and Case C-226/98 Jørgensen [2000] ECR I-2447, para 29).

51 It is for the national court, which alone has jurisdiction to assess the facts and to interpret the national legislation, to determine whether that is so. It is necessary in that regard to ascertain, in the light of all the relevant factors and taking into account the possibility of achieving by other means the aims pursued by the provisions in question, whether such aims appear to be unrelated to any discrimination based on sex and whether those provisions, as a means to the achievement of certain aims, are capable of advancing those aims (see, in that regard, Case C-167/97 Seymour-Smith & Perez [1999] ECR I-623, para 72).

52 However, although in preliminary ruling proceedings it is for the national court to establish whether such objective reasons exist in the particular case before it, the Court of Justice, which is called on to provide answers of use to the national court, may provide guidance based on the documents in the file and on the written and oral observations which have been submitted to it, in order to enable the national court to give judgment (see Hill & Stapleton, cited above, para 36, and Seymour-Smith & Perez, cited above, para 68).

53 In that regard, the Court observes that, as pointed out at paras 9 and 26 of this judgment, part-time work for older employees is governed in Germany at federal and regional level and also by collective agreements and that the TV ATZ was concluded in consideration of the opportunities offered by the AltTZG.

54 The German Government submits that one of the aims pursued by a scheme such as the one at issue in the main proceedings is to combat unemployment by offering the maximum incentives for workers who are not yet eligible to retire to do so and thus making posts available. To allow a worker who has already acquired entitlement to a retirement pension at the full rate to benefit from the scheme of part-time work for older employees implies, first, that a post which the scheme intends to allocate to an unemployed person would continue to be occupied and, second, that the social security scheme would bear the additional costs, which would divert certain resources from other objectives.

55 As regards the argument which the German Government derives from the encouragement of recruitment, it is for the member states to choose the measures capable of achieving the aims which they pursue in employment matters. The Court has recognised that the member states have a broad margin of discretion in exercising that power (see Seymour-Smith & Perez, para 74).

56 Furthermore, as the Court stated at para 71 of its judgment in Seymour-Smith & Perez, it cannot be disputed that the encouragement of recruitment constitutes a legitimate aim of social policy.

57 However, the fact remains that the broad margin of discretion which the member states enjoy in matters of social policy cannot have the effect of frustrating the implementation of a fundamental principle of Community law such as that of equal treatment for men and women (see Seymour-Smith & Perez, para 75).

58 It follows from the rule referred to at para 51 of this judgment that mere generalisations concerning the capacity of a specific measure to encourage recruitment are not enough to show that the aim of the disputed provisions is unrelated to any discrimination based on sex or to provide evidence on the basis of which it could reasonably be considered that the means chosen are or could be suitable for achieving that aim.

59 As regards the German Government's argument concerning the additional burden associated with allowing female workers to take advantage of the scheme at issue in the main proceedings even where they have acquired entitlement to a retirement pension at the full rate, the Court observes that although budgetary considerations may underlie a member state's choice of social policy and influence the nature or scope of the social protection measures which it wishes to adopt, they do not in themselves constitute an aim pursued by that policy and cannot therefore justify discrimination against one of the sexes (Case C-343/92 De Weerd & ors [1994] ECR I-571, para 35).

60 Moreover, to concede that budgetary considerations may justify a difference in treatment between men and women which would otherwise constitute indirect discrimination on grounds of sex would mean that the application and scope of a rule of Community law as fundamental as that of equal treatment between men and women might vary in time and place according to the state of the public finances of member states (De Weerd & ors, cited above, para 36, and Jørgensen, cited above, para 39).

61 Nor can the City of Hamburg, whether as a public authority or as an employer, justify discrimination arising from a scheme of part-time work for older employees solely because avoidance of such discrimination would involve increased costs (see, to that effect, Hill & Stapleton, para 40).

62 It is therefore for the City of Hamburg to prove to the national court that the difference in treatment arising from the scheme of part-time work for older employees at issue in the main proceedings is justified by objective reasons unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex. Should it succeed in doing so, the mere fact that the provisions of that scheme which preclude access by workers who have acquired entitlement to a retirement pension at the full rate affect a considerably higher percentage of female workers than of male workers could not be regarded as infringing Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207.

63 In the light of the foregoing considerations, the answer to the first question must be that Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Directive 76/207 must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a provision of a collective agreement applicable to the public service which allows male and female employees to take advantage of a scheme of part-time work for older employees where under that provision the right to participate in the scheme of part-time work applies only until the date on which the person concerned first becomes eligible for a retirement pension at the full rate under the statutory old-age insurance scheme and where the class of persons eligible for such a pension at the age of 60 consists almost exclusively of women whereas the class of persons entitled to receive such a pension only from the age of 65 consists almost exclusively of men, unless that provision is justified by objective criteria unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

Second question

64 By its second question, the national court is essentially asking whether, in the case of a breach of Directive 76/207 by legislative provisions or by provisions of a collective agreement which introduce discrimination contrary to that directive, the national courts are required to set aside that discrimination by applying those provisions for the benefit of the class placed at a disadvantage, and are not required to request or await the prior setting aside of those provisions by the legislature, by collective negotiation or otherwise.

Observations submitted to the Court

65 Ms Kutz-Bauer submits that a national court must apply the legislative provisions and the provisions arising under corresponding collective agreements by setting aside the restrictions contrary to Community law and unfavourable to female workers.

66 The Commission maintains that, under Article 5(2) of Directive 76/207, it is for the national legislature to draw the legal inferences from a breach of the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions and, in particular, to provide effective measures in order to enable any person affected to rely on his rights in proceedings before a court. In the Commission's submission, this rule may mean that, in certain circumstances, it is necessary to confer retroactive effect on the abolition or amendment of discriminatory rules and even, should that not prove possible, to provide suitable compensation for workers who have suffered discrimination. Should the national legislature fail to take the appropriate steps, workers who have suffered discrimination could rely, as against the state in its capacity as employer, on Article 5 of Directive 76/207 in order to preclude the application of any national provision contrary to that article.

67 As regards the answer to the second question, the City of Hamburg merely refers to the judgment in Case C-184/89 Nimz [1991] ECR I-297, which also concerned the consequences of a finding by a national court that a collective agreement was incompatible with Community law, namely, in that case, Article 119 of the EC Treaty (Articles 117 to 120 of the EC Treaty have been replaced by Articles 136 EC to 143 EC).

Reply of the Court

68 The Court recalls, first of all, that under Article 5(2)(a) and (b) of Directive 76/207, member states are to take the measures necessary to ensure that:

(a) any laws, regulations and administrative provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment shall be abolished;

(b) any provisions contrary to the principle of equal treatment which are included in collective agreements, ... shall be, or may be declared, null and void or may be amended.

69 Furthermore, the Court has consistently held that wherever the provisions of a directive appear, as far as their subject-matter is concerned, to be unconditional and sufficiently precise, those provisions may be relied upon by individuals as against the member state before the national court (see, in particular, Case C-188/89 Foster & ors [1990] ECR I-3313, para 16)(sic).

70 With regard to Article 5(1) of Directive 76/207, which prohibits any discrimination on grounds of sex with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, the Court has already held it to be sufficiently precise to be relied upon by an individual as against the state and applied by a national court in order to prevent the application of any national provision which is inconsistent with Article 5(1) (see Case 152/84 Marshall [1986] ECR 723, paras 52 and 56 (Marshall I), and Seymour-Smith & Perez, para 40).

71 Furthermore, a person such as Ms Kutz-Bauer would be able to rely on Article 5(1) of Directive 76/207 as against a public authority such as the City of Hamburg (see, in that regard, Marshall I, para 49, and Case C-188/89 Foster & ors [1990] ECR I-3133, paras 19 and 21)(sic).

72 The Court has also held that, in a case of indirect discrimination in a provision of a collective agreement, the members of the class of persons placed at a disadvantage must be treated in the same way as other workers (see, to that effect, Case C-33/89 Kowalska [1990] ECR I-2591, para 19, and Nimz, para 18).

73 According to the Court's case law (see, in particular, Case 106/77 Simmenthal [1978] ECR 629, para 24), a national court which is called upon, within the limits of its jurisdiction, to apply provisions of Community law is under a duty to give full effect to those provisions, if necessary refusing of its own motion to apply any conflicting provision of national legislation, and it is not necessary for the court to request or await the prior setting aside of such provision by legislative or other constitutional means.

74 It is equally necessary to apply such considerations to the case where the provision at variance with Community law is derived from a collective agreement. It would be incompatible with the very nature of Community law if the court having jurisdiction to apply that law were to be precluded at the time of such application from being able to take all necessary steps to set aside the provisions of a collective agreement which might constitute an obstacle to the full effectiveness of Community rules (see Nimz, para 20).

75 In the light of those considerations, the answer to the second question must be that, in the case of a breach of Directive 76/207 by legislative provisions or by provisions of collective agreements introducing discrimination contrary to that directive, the national courts are required to set aside that discrimination, using all the means at their disposal, and in particular by applying those provisions for the benefit of the class placed at a disadvantage, and are not required to request or await the setting aside of the provisions by the legislature, by collective negotiation or otherwise.

Costs

76 The costs incurred by the German Government and by the Commission, which have submitted observations to the Court, are not recoverable. Since these proceedings are, for the parties to the main proceedings, a step in the proceedings pending before the national court, the decision on costs is a matter for that court.

On those grounds,

THE COURT,

in answer to the questions referred to it by the Arbeitsgericht Hamburg by decision of 3 May and 29 June 2000, hereby rules:

1. Articles 2(1) and 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions, must be interpreted as meaning that they preclude a provision of a collective agreement applicable to the public service which allows male and female employees to take advantage of a scheme of part-time work for older employees where under that provision the right to participate in the scheme of part-time work applies only until the date on which the person concerned first becomes eligible for a retirement pension at the full rate under the statutory old-age insurance scheme and where the class of persons eligible for such a pension at the age of 60 consists almost exclusively of women whereas the class of persons entitled to receive such a pension only from the age of 65 consists almost exclusively of men, unless that provision is justified by objective criteria unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex.

2. In the case of a breach of Directive 76/207 by legislative provisions or by provisions of collective agreements introducing discrimination contrary to that directive, the national courts are required to set aside that discrimination, using all the means at their disposal, and in particular by applying those provisions for the benefit of the class placed at a disadvantage, and are not required to request or await the setting aside of the provisions by the legislature, by collective negotiation or otherwise.

Comment

- This case may well illustrate the growing impatience of the European Court of Justice in dealing with exceptions to the general rule that discrimination between men and women should not be allowed unless objectively justified. In this case the possibility of the matter being justified as something needed to accommodate the relevant statutory retirement rules was given short shrift.

● ISSN 0959-8014 ● A law report to which s115 of the Courts and Legal Services Act 1990 applies ●

Printed by Prontaprint, 20 Long Lane, London EC1A 9HL

REPORTABLE

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF INDIA

CIVIL ORIGINAL JURISDICTION

WRIT PETITION (CIVIL) NO.400 OF 2012

National Legal Services Authority ...

Petitioner

Versus

Union of India and others ...

Respondents

WITH

WRIT PETITION (CIVIL) NO.604 OF 2013

J U D G M E N T

K.S. Radhakrishnan, J.

1. Seldom, our society realizes or cares to realize the trauma, agony and pain which the members of Transgender community undergo, nor appreciates the innate feelings of the members of the Transgender community, especially of those whose mind and body disown their biological sex. Our society often ridicules and abuses the Transgender community and in public places like railway stations, bus stands, schools, workplaces, malls, theatres, hospitals, they are sidelined and treated as untouchables, forgetting the fact that the moral failure lies in the society's unwillingness to contain or embrace different gender identities and expressions, a mindset which we have to change.

2. We are, in this case, concerned with the grievances of the members of Transgender Community (for short 'TG community') who seek a legal declaration of their gender identity than the one assigned to them, male or female, at the time of birth and their prayer is that non-recognition of their gender identity violates Articles 14 and 21 of the Constitution of India. Hijras/Eunuchs, who also fall in that group, claim legal status as a third gender with all legal and constitutional protection.

3. The National Legal Services Authority, constituted under the Legal Services Authority Act, 1997, to provide free legal services to the weaker and other marginalized sections of the society, has come forward to advocate their cause, by filing Writ Petition No. 400 of 2012. Poojaya Mata Nasib Kaur Ji Women Welfare Society, a registered association, has also preferred Writ Petition No. 604 of 2013, seeking similar reliefs in respect of Kinnar community, a TG community.

4. Laxmi Narayan Tripathy, claimed to be a Hijra, has also got impleaded so as to effectively put across the cause of the members of the transgender community and Tripathy's life experiences also for recognition of their identity as a third gender, over and above male and female. Tripathy says that non-recognition of the identity of Hijras, a TG community, as a third gender, denies them the right of equality before the law and equal protection of law guaranteed under Article 14 of the Constitution and violates the rights guaranteed to them under Article 21 of the Constitution of India.

5. Shri Raju Ramachandran, learned senior counsel appearing for the petitioner – the National Legal Services Authority, highlighted the traumatic experiences faced by the members of the TG community and submitted that every person of that community has a legal right to decide their sex orientation and to espouse and determine their identity. Learned senior counsel has submitted that since the TGs are neither treated as male or female, nor given the status of a third gender, they are being deprived of many of the rights and privileges which other persons enjoy as citizens of this country. TGs are deprived of social and cultural participation and hence restricted access to education, health care and public places which deprives them of the Constitutional guarantee of equality before law and equal protection of laws. Further, it was also pointed out that the community also faces discrimination to contest election, right to vote, employment, to get licences etc. and, in effect, treated as an outcast and untouchable. Learned senior counsel also submitted that the State cannot discriminate them on the ground of gender, violating Articles 14 to 16 and 21 of the Constitution of India.

6. Shri Anand Grover, learned senior counsel appearing for the Intervener, traced the historical background of the third gender identity in India and the position accorded to them in the Hindu Mythology, Vedic and Puranic literatures, and the prominent role played by them in the royal courts of the Islamic world etc. Reference was also made to the repealed Criminal Tribes Act, 1871 and explained the inhuman manner by which they were treated at the time of the British Colonial rule. Learned senior counsel also submitted that various International Forums and U.N. Bodies have recognized their gender identity and referred to the Yogyakarta Principles and pointed out that those principles have been recognized by various countries around the world. Reference was also made to few legislations giving recognition to the trans-sexual persons in other countries. Learned senior counsel also submitted that non-recognition of gender identity of the transgender community violates the fundamental rights guaranteed to them, who are citizens of this country.

7. Shri T. Srinivasa Murthy, learned counsel appearing in I.A. No. 2 of 2013, submitted that transgender persons have to be declared as a socially and educationally backward classes of citizens and must be accorded all benefits available to that class of persons, which are being extended to male and female genders. Learned counsel also submitted that the right to choose one's gender identity is integral to the right to lead a life with dignity, which is undoubtedly guaranteed by Article 21 of the Constitution of India. Learned counsel, therefore, submitted that, subject to such rules/regulations/protocols, transgender persons may be afforded the right of choice to determine whether to opt for male, female or transgender classification.

8. Shri Sanjeev Bhatnagar, learned counsel appearing for the petitioner in Writ Petition No.604 of 2013, highlighted the cause of the Kinnar community and submitted that they are the most deprived group of transgenders and calls for constitutional as well as legal protection for their identity and for other socio-economic benefits, which are otherwise extended to the members of the male and female genders in the community.

9. Shri Rakesh K. Khanna, learned Additional Solicitor General, appearing for the Union of India, submitted that the problems highlighted by the transgender community is a sensitive human issue, which calls for serious attention. Learned ASG pointed out that, under the aegis of the Ministry of Social Justice and Empowerment (for short "MOSJE"), a Committee, called "Expert Committee on Issues relating to Transgender", has been constituted to conduct an in-depth study of the problems relating to transgender persons to make appropriate recommendations to MOSJE. Shri Khanna also submitted that due representation would also be given to the applicants, appeared before this Court in the Committee, so that their views also could be heard.

10. We also heard learned counsel appearing for various States and Union Territories who have explained the steps they have taken to improve the conditions and status of the members of TG community in their respective States and Union Territories. Laxmi Narayan Tripathy, a Hijra, through a petition supported by an affidavit, highlighted the trauma undergone by Tripathy from Tripathy's birth. Rather than explaining the same by us, it would be appropriate to quote in Tripathy's own words:

> "That the Applicant has born as a male. Growing up as a child, she felt different from the boys of her age and was feminine in her ways. On account of her femininity, from an early age, she faced repeated sexual harassment, molestation and sexual abuse, both within and outside the family. Due to her being different, she was isolated and had no one to talk to or express her feelings while she was coming to terms with her identity. She was constantly abused by everyone as a 'chakka' and 'hijra'. Though she felt that there was no place for her in society, she did not succumb to the prejudice. She started to dress and appear in public in women's clothing in her late teens but she did not identify as a woman. Later, she joined the Hijra community in Mumbai as she identified with the other hijras and for the first time in her life, she felt at home.
>
> That being a hijra, the Applicant has faced serious discrimination throughout her life because of her gender identity. It has been clear to the Applicant that the complete non-recognition of the identity of hijras/transgender persons by the State has resulted in the violation of most of the fundamental rights guaranteed to them under the Constitution of India…."

Siddarth Narrain, eunuch, highlights Narrain's feeling, as follows:

”Ever since I can remember, I have always identified myself as a woman. I lived in Namakkal, a small town in Tamil Nadu. When I was in the 10th standard I realized that the only way for me to be comfortable was to join the hijra community. It was then that my family found out that I frequently met hijras who lived in the city. One day, when my father was away, my brother, encouraged by my mother, started beating me with a cricket bat. I locked myself in a room to escape from the beatings. My mother and brother then tried to break into the room to beat me up further. Some of my relatives intervened and brought me out of the room. I related my ordeal to an uncle of mine who gave me Rs.50 and asked me to go home. Instead, I took the money and went to live with a group of hijras in Erode.”

Sachin, a TG, expressed his experiences as follows:

“My name is Sachin and I am 23 years old. As a child I always enjoyed putting make-up like ‘vibhuti’ or ‘kum kum’ and my parents always saw me as a girl. I am male but I only have female feelings. I used to help my mother in all the housework like cooking, washing and cleaning. Over the years, I started assuming more of the domestic responsibilities at home. The neighbours starting teasing me. They would call out to me and ask: ‘Why don’t you go out and work like a man?’ or ‘Why are you staying at home like a girl?’ But I liked being a girl. I felt shy about going out and working. Relatives would also mock and scold me on this score. Every day I would go out of the house to bring water. And as I walked back with the water I would always be teased. I felt very ashamed. I even felt suicidal. How could I live like that? But my parents never protested. They were helpless.”

We have been told and informed of similar life experiences faced by various others who belong to the TG community.

11. Transgender is generally described as an umbrella term for persons whose gender identity, gender expression or behavior does not conform to their biological sex. TG may also takes in persons who do not identify with their sex assigned at birth, which include Hijras/Eunuchs who, in this writ petition, describe themselves as “third gender” and they do not identify as either male or female. Hijras are not men by virtue of anatomy appearance and psychologically, they are also not women, though they are like women with no female reproduction organ and no menstruation. Since Hijras do not have reproduction capacities as either men or women, they are neither men nor women and claim to be an institutional “third gender”. Among Hijras, there are emasculated (castrated, nirvana) men, non-emasculated men (not castrated/akva/akka) and inter-sexed persons (hermaphrodites). TG also includes persons who intend to undergo Sex Re-Assignment Surgery (SRS) or have undergone SRS to align their biological sex with their gender identity in order to become male or female. They are generally called transsexual persons. Further, there are persons who like to cross-dress in clothing of opposite gender, i.e transvestites. Resultantly, the term "transgender", in contemporary usage, has become an umbrella term that is used to describe a wide range of identities and experiences, including but not limited to pre-operative, post-operative and non-operative transsexual people, who strongly identify with the gender opposite to their biological sex; male and female.

HISTORICAL BACKGROUND OF TRANSGENDERS IN INDIA:

12. TG Community comprises of Hijras, eunuchs, Kothis, Aravanis, Jogappas, Shiv-Shakthis etc. and they, as a group, have got a strong historical presence in our country in the Hindu mythology and other religious texts. The Concept of tritiya prakrti or napunsaka has also been an integral part of vedic and puranic literatures. The word 'napunsaka' has been used to denote absence of procreative capability.

13. Lord Rama, in the epic Ramayana, was leaving for the forest upon being banished from the kingdom for 14 years, turns around to his followers and asks all the 'men and women' to return to the city. Among his followers, the hijras alone do not feel bound by this direction and decide to stay with him. Impressed with their devotion, Rama sanctions them the power to confer blessings on people on auspicious occasions like childbirth and marriage, and also at inaugural functions which, it is believed set the stage for the custom of badhai in which hijras sing, dance and confer blessings.

14. Aravan, the son of Arjuna and Nagakanya in Mahabharata, offers to be sacrificed to Goddess Kali to ensure the victory of the Pandavas in the Kurukshetra war, the only condition that he made was to spend the last night of his life in matrimony. Since no woman was willing to marry one who was doomed to be killed, Krishna assumes the form of a beautiful woman called Mohini and marries him. The Hijras of Tamil Nadu consider Aravan their progenitor and call themselves Aravanis.

15. Jain Texts also make a detailed reference to TG which mentions the concept of 'psychological sex'. Hijras also played a prominent role in the royal courts of the Islamic world, especially in the Ottaman empires and the Mughal rule in the Medieval India. A detailed analysis of the historical background of the same finds a place in the book of Gayatri Reddy, "With Respect to Sex: Negotiating Hijra Identity in South India" – Yoda Press (2006).

16. We notice that even though historically, Hijras/transgender persons had played a prominent role, with the onset of colonial rule from the 18th century onwards, the situation had changed drastically. During the British rule, a legislation was enacted to supervise the deeds of Hijras/TG community, called the Criminal Tribes Act, 1871, which deemed the entire community of Hijras persons as innately 'criminal' and 'addicted to the systematic commission of non-bailable offences'. The Act provided for the registration, surveillance and control of certain criminal tribes and eunuchs and had penalized eunuchs, who were registered, and appeared to be dressed or ornamented like a woman, in a public street or place, as well as those who danced or played music in a public place. Such persons also could be arrested without warrant and sentenced to imprisonment up to two years or fine or both. Under the Act, the local government had to register the names and residence of all eunuchs residing in that area as well as of their properties, who were reasonably suspected of kidnapping or castrating children, or of committing offences under Section 377 of the IPC, or of abetting the commission of any of the said offences. Under the Act, the act of keeping a boy under 16 years in the charge of a registered eunuch was made an offence punishable with imprisonment up to two years or fine and the Act also denuded the registered eunuchs of their civil rights by prohibiting them from acting as guardians to minors, from making a gift deed or a will, or from adopting a son. Act has, however, been repealed in August 1949.

17. Section 377 of the IPC found a place in the Indian Penal Code, 1860, prior to the enactment of Criminal Tribles Act that criminalized all penile-non-vaginal sexual acts between persons, including anal sex and oral sex, at a time when transgender persons were also typically associated with the prescribed sexual practices. Reference may be made to the judgment of the Allahabad High Court in Queen Empress v. Khairati (1884) ILR 6 All 204, wherein a transgender person was arrested and prosecuted under Section 377 on the suspicion that he was a 'habitual sodomite' and was later acquitted on appeal. In that case, while acquitting him, the Sessions Judge stated as follows:

> "This case relates to a person named Khairati, over whom the police seem to have exercised some sort of supervision, whether strictly regular or not, as a eunuch. The man is not a eunuch in the literal sense, but he was called for by the police when on a visit to his village, and was found singing dressed as a woman among the women of a certain family. Having been subjected to examination by the Civil Surgeon (and a subordinate medical man), he is shown to have the characteristic mark of a habitual catamite – the distortion of the orifice of the anus into the shape of a trumpet and also to be affected with syphilis in the same region in a > manner which distinctly points to unnatural intercourse within the last few months."

18. Even though, he was acquitted on appeal, this case would demonstrate that Section 377, though associated with specific sexual acts, highlighted certain identities, including Hijras and was used as an instrument of harassment and physical abuse against Hijras and transgender persons. A Division Bench of this Court in Suresh Kumar Koushal and another v. Naz Foundation and others [(2014) 1 SCC 1] has already spoken on the constitutionality of Section 377 IPC and, hence, we express no opinion on it since we are in these cases concerned with an altogether different issue pertaining to the constitutional and other legal rights of the transgender community and their gender identity and sexual orientation.

GENDER IDENTITY AND SEXUAL ORIENTATION

19. Gender identity is one of the most-fundamental aspects of life which refers to a person's intrinsic sense of being male, female or transgender or transsexual person.

A person's sex is usually assigned at birth, but a relatively small group of persons may born with bodies which incorporate both or certain aspects of both male and female physiology. At times, genital anatomy problems may arise in certain persons, their innate perception of themselves, is not in conformity with the sex assigned to them at birth and may include pre and post-operative transsexual persons and also persons who do not choose to undergo or do not have access to operation and also include persons who cannot undergo successful operation. Countries, all over the world, including India, are grappled with the question of attribution of gender to persons who believe that they belong to the opposite sex. Few persons undertake surgical and other procedures to alter their bodies and physical appearance to acquire gender characteristics of the sex which conform to their perception of gender, leading to legal and social complications since official record of their gender at birth is found to be at variance with the assumed gender identity. Gender identity refers to each person's deeply felt internal and individual experience of gender, which may or may not correspond with the sex assigned at birth, including the personal sense of the body which may involve a freely chosen, modification of bodily appearance or functions by medical, surgical or other means and other expressions of gender, including dress, speech and mannerisms. Gender identity, therefore, refers to an individual's self-identification as a man, woman, transgender or other identified category.

20. Sexual orientation refers to an individual's enduring physical, romantic and/or emotional attraction to another person. Sexual orientation includes transgender and gender-variant people with heavy sexual orientation and their sexual orientation may or may not change during or after gender transmission, which also includes homo-sexuals, bysexuals, heterosexuals, asexual etc. Gender identity and sexual orientation, as already indicated, are different concepts. Each person's self-defined sexual orientation and gender identity is integral to their personality and is one of the most basic aspects of self-determination, dignity and freedom and no one shall be forced to undergo medical procedures, including SRS, sterilization or hormonal therapy, as a requirement for legal recognition of their gender identity.

UNITED NATIONS AND OTHER HUMAN RIGHTS BODIES – ON GENDER IDENTITY AND SEXUAL ORIENTATION

21. United Nations has been instrumental in advocating the protection and promotion of rights of sexual minorities, including transgender persons. Article 6 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948 and Article 16 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 (ICCPR) recognize that every human being has the inherent right to live and this right shall be protected by law and that no one shall be arbitrarily denied of that right. Everyone shall have a right to recognition, everywhere as a person before the law. Article 17 of the ICCPR states that no one shall be subjected to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation and that everyone has the right to protection of law against such interference or attacks. International Commission of Jurists and the International Service for Human Rights on behalf of a coalition of human rights organizations, took a project to develop a set of international legal principles on the application of international law to human rights violations based on sexual orientation and sexual identity to bring greater clarity and coherence to State's human rights obligations. A distinguished group of human rights experts has drafted, developed, discussed and reformed the principles in a meeting held at Gadjah Mada University in Yogyakarta, Indonesia from 6 to 9 November, 2006, which is unanimously adopted the Yogyakarta Principles on the application of International Human Rights Law in relation to Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity. Yogyakarta Principles address a broad range of human rights standards and their application to issues of sexual orientation gender identity. Reference to few Yogyakarta Principles would be useful.

YOGYAKARTA PRINCIPLES:

22. Principle 1 which deals with the right to the universal enjoyment of human rights, reads as follows :-

> "1. THE RIGHT TO THE UNIVERSAL ENJOYMENT OF HUMAN RIGHTS
>
> All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. Human beings of all sexual orientations and gender identities are entitled to the full enjoyment of all human rights.
>
> States shall:
>
> A. Embody the principles of the universality, interrelatedness, interdependence and indivisibility of all human rights in their national constitutions or other appropriate legislation and ensure the practical realisation of the universal enjoyment of all human rights;
>
> B. Amend any legislation, including criminal law, to ensure its consistency with the universal enjoyment of all human rights;
>
> C. Undertake programmes of education and awareness to promote and enhance the full enjoyment of all human rights by all persons, irrespective of sexual orientation or gender identity;
>
> D. Integrate within State policy and decision-making a pluralistic approach that recognises and affirms the interrelatedness and indivisibility of all aspects of human identity including sexual orientation and gender identity.
>
> 2. THE RIGHTS TO EQUALITY AND NON-DISCRIMINATION

Everyone is entitled to enjoy all human rights without discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity. Everyone is entitled to equality before the law and the equal protection of the law without any such discrimination whether or not the enjoyment of another human right is also affected. The law shall prohibit any such discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against any such discrimination.

Discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity includes any distinction, exclusion, restriction or preference based on sexual orientation or gender identity which has the purpose or effect of nullifying or impairing equality before the law or the equal protection of the law, or the recognition, enjoyment or exercise, on an equal basis, of all human rights and fundamental freedoms. Discrimination based on sexual orientation or gender identity may be, and commonly is, compounded by discrimination on other grounds including gender, race, age, religion, disability, health and economic status.

States shall:

A. Embody the principles of equality and non-discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity in their national constitutions or other appropriate legislation, if not yet incorporated therein, including by means of amendment and interpretation, and ensure the effective realisation of these principles;

B. Repeal criminal and other legal provisions that prohibit or are, in effect, employed to prohibit consensual sexual activity among people of the same sex who are over the age of consent, and ensure that an equal age of consent applies to both same-sex and different- sex sexual activity;

C. Adopt appropriate legislative and other measures to prohibit and eliminate discrimination in the public and private spheres on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity;

D. Take appropriate measures to secure adequate advancement of persons of diverse sexual orientations and gender identities as may be necessary to ensure such groups or individuals equal enjoyment or exercise of human rights. Such measures shall not be deemed to be discriminatory;

E. In all their responses to discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity, take account of the manner in which such discrimination may intersect with other forms of discrimination;

F. Take all appropriate action, including programmes of education and training, with a view to achieving the elimination of prejudicial or discriminatory attitudes or behaviours which are related to the idea of the inferiority or the superiority of any sexual orientation or gender identity or gender expression.

3. THE RIGHT TO RECOGNITION BEFORE THE LAW

Everyone has the right to recognition everywhere as a person before the law. Persons of diverse sexual orientations and gender identities shall enjoy legal capacity in all aspects of life. Each person's self-defined sexual orientation and gender identity is integral to their personality and is one of the most basic aspects of self-determination, dignity and freedom. No one shall be forced to undergo medical procedures, including sex reassignment surgery, sterilisation or hormonal therapy, as a requirement for legal recognition of their gender identity. No status, such as marriage or parenthood, may be invoked as such to prevent the legal recognition of a person's gender identity. No one shall be subjected to pressure to conceal, suppress or deny their sexual orientation or gender identity.

States shall:

A. Ensure that all persons are accorded legal capacity in civil matters, without discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity, and the opportunity to exercise that capacity, including equal rights to conclude contracts, and to administer, own, acquire (including through inheritance), manage, enjoy and dispose of property;

B. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to fully respect and legally recognise each person's self-defined gender identity;

C. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure that procedures exist whereby all State-issued identity papers which indicate a person's gender/sex — including birth certificates, passports, electoral records and other documents — reflect the person's profound self-defined gender identity;

D. Ensure that such procedures are efficient, fair and non-discriminatory, and respect the dignity and privacy of the person concerned;

E. Ensure that changes to identity documents will be recognised in all contexts where the identification or disaggregation of persons by gender is required by law or policy;

F. Undertake targeted programmes to provide social support for all persons experiencing gender transitioning or reassignment.

4. THE RIGHT TO LIFE

Everyone has the right to life. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of life, including by reference to considerations of sexual orientation or gender identity. The death penalty shall not be imposed on any person on the basis of consensual sexual activity among persons who are over the age of consent or on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity.

States shall:

A. Repeal all forms of crime that have the purpose or effect of prohibiting consensual sexual activity among persons of the same sex who are over the age of consent and, until such provisions are repealed, never impose the death penalty on any person convicted under them;

B. Remit sentences of death and release all those currently awaiting execution for crimes relating to consensual sexual activity among persons who are over the age of consent;

C. Cease any State-sponsored or State-condoned attacks on the lives of persons based on sexual orientation or gender identity, and ensure that all such attacks, whether by government officials or by any individual or group, are vigorously investigated, and that, where appropriate evidence is found, those responsible are prosecuted, tried and duly punished.

6. THE RIGHT TO PRIVACY

Everyone, regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity, is entitled to the enjoyment of privacy without arbitrary or unlawful interference, including with regard to their family, home or correspondence as well as to protection from unlawful attacks on their honour and reputation. The right to privacy ordinarily includes the choice to disclose or not to disclose information relating to one's sexual orientation or gender identity, as well as decisions and choices regarding both one's own body and consensual sexual and other relations with others.

States shall:

A. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure the right of each person, regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity, to enjoy the private sphere, intimate decisions, and human relations, including consensual sexual activity among persons who are over the age of consent, without arbitrary interference;

B. Repeal all laws that criminalise consensual sexual activity among persons of the same sex who are over the age of consent, and ensure that an equal age of consent applies to both same-sex and different-sex sexual activity;

C. Ensure that criminal and other legal provisions of general application are not applied to de facto criminalise consensual sexual activity among persons of the same sex who are over the age of consent;

D. Repeal any law that prohibits or criminalises the expression of gender identity, including through dress, speech or mannerisms, or that denies to individuals the opportunity to change their bodies as a means of expressing their gender identity;

E. Release all those held on remand or on the basis of a criminal conviction, if their detention is related to consensual sexual activity among persons who are over the age of consent, or is related to gender identity;

F. Ensure the right of all persons ordinarily to choose when, to whom and how to disclose information pertaining to their sexual orientation or gender identity, and protect all persons from arbitrary or unwanted disclosure, or threat of disclosure of such information by others

9. THE RIGHT TO TREATMENT WITH HUMANITY WHILE IN DETENTION

Everyone deprived of liberty shall be treated with humanity and with respect for the inherent dignity of the human person. Sexual orientation and gender identity are integral to each person's dignity.

States shall:

A. Ensure that placement in detention avoids further marginalising persons on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity or subjecting them to risk of violence, ill-treatment or physical, mental or sexual abuse;

B. Provide adequate access to medical care and counselling appropriate to the needs of those in custody, recognising any particular needs of persons on the basis of their sexual orientation or gender identity, including with regard to reproductive health, access to HIV/AIDS information and therapy and access to hormonal or other therapy as well as to gender-reassignment treatments where desired;

C. Ensure, to the extent possible, that all prisoners participate in decisions regarding the place of detention appropriate to their sexual orientation and gender identity;

D. Put protective measures in place for all prisoners vulnerable to violence or abuse on the basis of their sexual orientation, gender identity or gender expression and ensure, so far as is reasonably practicable, that such protective measures involve no greater restriction of their rights than is experienced by the general prison population;

E. Ensure that conjugal visits, where permitted, are granted on an equal basis to all prisoners and detainees, regardless of the gender of their partner;

F. Provide for the independent monitoring of detention facilities by the State as well as by non-governmental organisations including organisations working in the spheres of sexual orientation and gender identity;

G. Undertake programmes of training and awareness-raising for prison personnel and all other officials in the public and private sector who are engaged in detention facilities, regarding international human rights standards and principles of equality and non-discrimination, including in relation to sexual orientation and gender identity.

18. PROTECTION FROM MEDICAL ABUSES

No person may be forced to undergo any form of medical or psychological treatment, procedure, testing, or be confined to a medical facility, based on sexual orientation or gender identity. Notwithstanding any classifications to the contrary, a person's sexual orientation and gender identity are not, in and of themselves, medical conditions and are not to be treated, cured or suppressed.

States shall:

A. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure full protection against harmful medical practices based on sexual orientation or gender identity, including on the basis of stereotypes, whether derived from culture or otherwise, regarding conduct, physical appearance or perceived gender norms;

B. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure that no child's body is irreversibly altered by medical procedures in an attempt to impose a gender identity without the full, free and informed consent of the child in accordance with the age and maturity of the child and guided by the principle that in all actions concerning children, the best interests of the child shall be a primary consideration;

C. Establish child protection mechanisms whereby no child is at risk of, or subjected to, medical abuse;

D. Ensure protection of persons of diverse sexual orientations and gender identities against unethical or involuntary medical procedures or research, including in relation to vaccines, treatments or microbicides for HIV/AIDS or other diseases;

E. Review and amend any health funding provisions or programmes, including those of a development-assistance nature, which may promote, facilitate or in any other way render possible such abuses;

F. Ensure that any medical or psychological treatment or counselling does not, explicitly or implicitly, treat sexual orientation and gender identity as medical conditions to be treated, cured or suppressed.

19. THE RIGHT TO FREEDOM OF OPINION AND EXPRESSION

Everyone has the right to freedom of opinion and expression, regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity. This includes the expression of identity or personhood through speech, deportment, dress, bodily characteristics, choice of name, or any other means, as well as the freedom to seek, receive and impart information and ideas of all kinds, including with regard to human rights, sexual orientation and gender identity, through any medium and regardless of frontiers.

States shall:

A. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure full enjoyment of freedom of opinion and expression, while respecting the rights and freedoms of others, without discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity, including the receipt and imparting of information and ideas concerning sexual orientation and gender identity, as well as related advocacy for legal rights, publication of materials, broadcasting, organisation of or participation in conferences, and dissemination of and access to safer-sex information;

B. Ensure that the outputs and the organisation of media that is State-regulated is pluralistic and non-discriminatory in respect of issues of sexual orientation and gender identity and that the personnel recruitment and promotion policies of such organisations are non-discriminatory on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity;

C. Take all necessary legislative, administrative and other measures to ensure the full enjoyment of the right to express identity or personhood, including through speech, deportment, dress, bodily characteristics, choice of name or any other means;

D. Ensure that notions of public order, public morality, public health and public security are not employed to restrict, in a discriminatory manner, any exercise of freedom of opinion and expression that affirms diverse sexual orientations or gender identities;

E. Ensure that the exercise of freedom of opinion and expression does not violate the rights and freedoms of persons of diverse sexual orientations and gender identities;

F. Ensure that all persons, regardless of sexual orientation or gender identity, enjoy equal > access to information and ideas, as well as to participation in public debate."

23. UN bodies, Regional Human Rights Bodies, National Courts, Government Commissions and the Commissions for Human Rights, Council of Europe, etc. have endorsed the Yogyakarta Principles and have considered them as an important tool for identifying the obligations of States to respect, protect and fulfill the human rights of all persons, regardless of their gender identity. United Nations Committee on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights in its Report of 2009 speaks of gender orientation and gender identity as follows:-

> "Sexual orientation and gender identity
> 'Other status' as recognized in article 2, paragraph 2, includes sexual orientation. States parties should ensure that a person's sexual orientation is not a barrier to realizing Covenant rights, for example, in accessing survivor's pension rights. In addition, gender identity is recognized as among the prohibited grounds of discrimination, for example, persons who are transgender, transsexual or intersex, often face serious human rights violations, such as harassment in schools or in the workplace."

24. In this respect, reference may also be made to the General Comment No.2 of the Committee on Torture and Article 2 of the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhuman or Degrading Treatment or Punishment in 2008 and also the General Comment No.20 of the Committee on Elimination of Discrimination against Woman, responsible for the implementation of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Woman, 1979 and 2010 report.

SRS and Foreign Judgments

25. Various countries have given recognition to the gender identity of such persons, mostly, in cases where transsexual persons started asserting their rights after undergoing SRS of their re-assigned sex. In Corbett v. Corbett (1970) 2 All ER 33, the Court in England was concerned with the gender of a male to female transsexual in the context of the validity of a marriage. Ormrod, J. in that case took the view that the law should adopt the chromosomal, gonadal and genital tests and if all three are congruent, that should determine a person's sex for the purpose of marriage. Learned Judge expressed the view that any operative intervention should be ignored and the biological sexual constitution of an individual is fixed at birth, at the latest, and cannot be changed either by the natural development of organs of the opposite sex or by medical or surgical means. Later, in R v. Tan (1983) QB 1053, 1063-1064, the Court of Appeal applied Corbett approach in the context of criminal law. The Court upheld convictions which were imposed on Gloria Greaves, a post-operative male to female transsexual, still being in law, a man.

26. Corbett principle was not found favour by various other countries, like New Zealand, Australia etc. and also attracted much criticism, from the medical profession. It was felt that the application of the Corbett approach would lead to a substantial different outcome in cases of a post operative inter-sexual person and a post operative transsexual person. In New Zealand in Attorney-General v. Otahuhu Family Court (1995) 1 NZLR 603, Justice Ellis noted that once a transsexual person has undergone surgery, he or she is no longer able to operate in his or her original sex. It was held that there is no social advantage in the law for not recognizing the validity of the marriage of a transsexual in the sex of reassignment. The Court held that an adequate test is whether the person in question has undergone surgical and medical procedures that have effectively given the person the physical conformation of a person of a specified sex. In Re Kevin (Validity of Marriage of Transsexual) (2001) Fam CA 1074, in an Australian case, Chisholm J., held that there is no 'formulaic solution' to determine the sex of an individual for the purpose of the law of marriage. It was held that all relevant matters need to be considered, including the person's life experiences and self-perception. Full Court of the Federal Family Court in the year 2003 approved the above-mentioned judgment holding that in the relevant Commonwealth marriage statute the words 'man' and 'woman' should be given their ordinary, everyday contemporary meaning and that the word 'man' includes a post operative female to male transsexual person. The Full Court also held that there was a biological basis for transsexualism and that there was no reason to exclude the psyche as one of the relevant factors in determining sex and gender. The judgment Attorney-General for the Commonwealth & "Kevin and Jennifer" & Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission is reported in (2003) Fam CA 94.

27. Lockhart, J. in Secretary, Department of Social Security v. "SRA", (1993) 43 FCR 299 and Mathews, J. in R v. Harris & McGuiness (1988) 17 NSWLR 158, made an exhaustive review of the various decisions with regard to the question of recognition to be accorded by Courts to the gender of a transsexual person who had undertaken a surgical procedure. The Courts generally in New Zealand held that the decision in Corbett v. Corbett (supra) and R v. Tan (supra) which applied a purely biological test, should not be followed. In fact, Lockhart. J. in SRA observed that the development in surgical and medical techniques in the field of sexual reassignment, together with indications of changing social attitudes towards transsexuals, would indicate that generally they should not be regarded merely as a matter of chromosomes, which is purely a psychological question, one of self-perception, and partly a social question, how society perceives the individual.

28. A.B. v. Western Australia (2011) HCA 42 was a case concerned with the Gender Reassignment Act, 2000. In that Act, a person who had undergone a reassignment procedure could apply to Gender Reassignment Board for the issue of a recognition certificate. Under Section 15 of that Act, before issuing the certificate, the Board had to be satisfied, inter alia, that the applicant believed his or her true gender was the person's reassigned gender and had adopted the lifestyle and gender characteristics of that gender. Majority of Judges agreed with Lockhart, J. in SRA that gender should not be regarded merely as a matter of chromosomes, but partly a psychological question, one of self-perception, and partly a social question, how society perceives the individual.

29. The House of Lords in Bellinger v. Bellinger (2003) 2 All ER 593 was dealing with the question of a transsexual. In that case, Mrs. Bellinger was born on 7th September, 1946. At birth, she was correctly classified and registered as male. However, she felt more inclined to be a female. Despite her inclinations, and under some pressure, in 1967 she married a woman and at that time she was 21 years old. Marriage broke down and parties separated in 1971 and got divorce in the year 1975. Mrs. Bellinger dressed and lived like a woman and when she married Mr. Bellinger, he was fully aware of her background and throughout had been supportive to her. Mr. and Mrs. Bellinger since marriage lived happily as husband and wife and presented themselves in that fashion to the outside world. Mrs. Bellinger's primary claim was for a declaration under Section 55 of the Family Law Act, 1986 that her marriage to Mr. Bellinger in 1981 was "at its inception valid marriage". The House of Lords rejected the claim and dismissed the appeal. Certainly, the "psychological factor" has not been given much prominence in determination of the claim of Mrs. Bellinger.

30. The High Court of Kuala Lumpur in Re JG, JG v. Pengarah Jabatan Pendaftaran Negara (2006) 1 MLJ

90, was considering the question as to whether an application to amend or correct gender status stated in National Registration Identity Card could be allowed after a person has undergone SRS. It was a case where the plaintiff was born as a male, but felt more inclined to be a woman. In 1996 at Hospital Siroros she underwent a gender reassignment and got the surgery done for changing the sex from male to female and then she lived like a woman. She applied to authorities to change her name and also for a declaration of her gender as female, but her request was not favourably considered, but still treated as a male. She sought a declaration from the Court that she be declared as a female and that the Registration Department be directed to change the last digit of her identity card to a digit that reflects a female gender. The Malaysian Court basically applied the principle laid down in Corbett (supra), however, both the prayers sought for were granted, after noticing that the medical men have spoken that the plaintiff is a female and they have considered the sex change of the plaintiff as well as her "psychological aspect". The Court noticed that she feels like a woman, lives like one, behaves as one, has her physical body attuned to one, and most important of all, her "psychological thinking" is that of a woman.

31. The Court of Appeal, New South Wales was called upon to decide the question whether the Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages has the power under the Births, Deaths and Marriages Act, 1995 to register a change of sex of a person and the sex recorded on the register to "non-specific" or "non-specified". The appeal was allowed and the matter was remitted back to the Tribunal for a fresh consideration in accordance with law, after laying down the law on the subject. The judgment is reported as Norrie v. NSW Registrar of Births, Deaths and Marriages (2013) NSWCA 145. While disposing of the appeal, the Court held as follows:-

> "The consequence is that the Appeal Panel (and the Tribunal and the Registrar) were in error in construing the power in S.32DC(1) as limiting the Registrar to registering a person's change of sex as only male or female. An error in the construction of the statutory provision granting the power to register a person's > change of sex is an error on a question of law. Collector of Customs v. Pozzolanic Enterprises Pty. Ltd. [1993] FCA 322; (1993) 43 FCR 280 at 287. This is so notwithstanding that the determination of the common understanding of a general word used in the statutory provision is a question of fact. The Appeal Panel (and the Tribunal and the Registrar) erred in determining that the current ordinary meaning of the word "sex" is limited to the character of being either male or female. That involved an error on a question of fact. But the Appeal Panel's error in arriving at the common understanding of the word "sex" was associated with its error in construction of the effect of the statutory provision of S.32DC (and also of S.32DA), and accordingly is of law: Hope v. Bathurst City Council [1980] HCA 16, (1980) 144 CLR 1 at 10."

32. In Christine Goodwin v. United Kingdom (Application No.28957/95 - Judgment dated 11th July, 2002), the European Court of Human Rights examined an application alleging violation of Articles 8, 12, 13 and 14 of the Convention for Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 1997 in respect of the legal status of transsexuals in UK and particularly their treatment in the sphere of employment, social security, pensions and marriage. Applicant in that case had a tendency to dress as a woman from early childhood and underwent aversion therapy in 1963-64. In the mid-1960s she was diagnosed as a transsexual. Though she married a woman and they had four children, her inclination was that her "brain sex" did not fit her body. From that time until 1984 she dressed as a man for work but as a woman in her free time. In January, 1985, the applicant began treatment at the Gender Identity Clinic. In October, 1986, she underwent surgery to shorten her vocal chords. In August, 1987, she was accepted on the waiting list for gender re-assignment surgery and later underwent that surgery at a National Health Service hospital. The applicant later divorced her former wife. She claimed between 1990 and 1992 she was sexually harassed by colleagues at work, followed by other human rights violations. The Court after referring to various provisions and Conventions held as follows:-

> "Nonetheless, the very essence of the Convention is respect for human dignity and human freedom. Under Article 8 of the Convention in particular, where the notion of personal autonomy is an important principle underlying the interpretation of its guarantees, > protection is given to the personal sphere of each individuals, including the right to establish details of their identity as individual human beings (see, inter alia, Pretty v. the United Kingdom no.2346/02, judgment of 29 April 2002, 62, and Mikulic v. Croatia, no.53176/99, judgment of 7 February 2002, 53, both to be published in ECHR 2002...). In the twenty first century the right of transsexuals to personal development and to physical and moral security in the full sense enjoyed by others in society cannot be regarded as a matter of controversy requiring the lapse of time to cast clearer light on the issues involved. In short, the unsatisfactory situation in which post-operative transsexuals live in an intermediate zone as not quite one gender or the other is no longer sustainable."

33. The European Court of Human Rights in the case of Van Kuck v. Germany (Application No.35968/97 – Judgment dated 12.9.2003) dealt with the application alleging that German Court's decisions refusing the applicant's claim for reimbursement of gender reassignment measures and the related proceedings were in breach of her rights to a fair trial and of her right to respect for her private life and that they amounted to discrimination on the ground of her particular "psychological situation". Reliance was placed on Articles 6, 8, 13 and 14 of the Convention for Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, 1997. The Court held that the concept of "private life" covers the physical and psychological integrity of a person, which can sometimes embrace aspects of an individual's physical and social identity. For example, gender identifications, name and sexual orientation and sexual life fall within the personal sphere protected by Article 8. The Court also held that the notion of personal identity is an important principle underlying the interpretation of various guaranteed rights and the very essence of the Convention being respect for human dignity and human freedom, protection is given to the right of transsexuals to personal development and to physical and moral security.

34. Judgments referred to above are mainly related to transsexuals, who, whilst belonging physically to one sex, feel convinced that they belong to the other, seek to achieve a more integrated unambiguous identity by undergoing medical and surgical operations to adapt their physical characteristic to their psychological nature. When we examine the rights of transsexual persons, who have undergone SRS, the test to be applied is not the "Biological test", but the "Psychological test", because psychological factor and thinking of transsexual has to be given primacy than binary notion of gender of that person. Seldom people realize the discomfort, distress and psychological trauma, they undergo and many of them undergo "Gender Dysphoria' which may lead to mental disorder. Discrimination faced by this group in our society, is rather unimaginable and their rights have to be protected, irrespective of chromosomal sex, genitals, assigned birth sex, or implied gender role. Rights of transgenders, pure and simple, like Hijras, eunuchs, etc. have also to be examined, so also their right to remain as a third gender as well as their physical and psychological integrity. Before addressing those aspects further, we may also refer to few legislations enacted in other countries recognizing their rights.

LEGISLATIONS IN OTHER COUNTRIES ON TGs

35. We notice, following the trend, in the international human rights law, many countries have enacted laws for recognizing rights of transsexual persons, who have undergone either partial/complete SRS, including United Kingdom, Netherlands, Germany, Australia, Canada, Argentina, etc. United Kingdom has passed the General Recommendation Act, 2004, following the judgment in Christine Goodwin (supra) passed by the European Courts of Human Rights. The Act is all encompassing as not only does it provide legal recognition to the acquired gender of a person, but it also lays down provisions highlighting the consequences of the newly acquired gender status on their legal rights and entitlements in various aspects such as marriage, parentage, succession, social security and pensions etc. One of the notable features of the Act is that it is not necessary that a person needs to have undergone or in the process of undergoing a SRS to apply under the Act. Reference in this connection may be made to the Equality Act, 2010 (UK) which has consolidated, repealed and replaced around nine different anti-discrimination legislations including the Sex Discrimination Act, 1986. The Act defines certain characteristics to be “protected characteristics” and no one shall be discriminated or treated less favourably on grounds that the person possesses one or more of the "protected characteristics". The Act also imposes duties on Public Bodies to eliminate all kinds of discrimination, harassment and victimization. Gender reassignment has been declared as one of the protected characteristics under the Act, of course, only the transsexuals i.e. those who are proposing to undergo, is undergoing or has undergone the process of the gender reassignment are protected under the Act.

36. In Australia, there are two Acts dealing with the gender identity, (1) Sex Discrimination Act, 1984; and (ii) Sex Discrimination Amendment (Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Intersex Status) Act, 2013 (Act 2013). Act 2013 amends the Sex Discrimination Act, 1984. Act 2013 defines gender identity as the appearance or mannerisms or other gender-related characteristics of a person (whether by way of medical intervention or not) with or without regard to the person's designated sex at birth.

Sections 5(A), (B) and (C) of the 2013 Act have some relevance and the same are extracted hereinbelow:-

> "5A Discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation
>
> (1) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's sexual orientation if, by reason of:
>
> (a) the aggrieved person's sexual orientation; or
> (b) a characteristic that appertains generally to persons who have the same sexual orientation as the aggrieved person; or
> (c) a characteristic that is generally imputed to persons who have the same sexual orientation as the aggrieved person;
>
> the discriminator treats the aggrieved person less favourably than, in circumstances that are the same or are not materially different, the discriminator treats or would treat a person who has a different sexual orientation.
>
> (2) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's sexual orientation if the discriminator imposes, or proposes to impose, a condition, requirement or practice that has, or is likely to have, the effect of disadvantaging persons who have the same sexual orientation as the aggrieved person.
>
> (3) This section has effect subject to sections 7B and 7D.

5B Discrimination on the ground of gender identity

(1) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's gender identity if, by reason of:

(a) the aggrieved person's gender identity; or

(b) a characteristic that appertains generally to persons who have the same gender identity as the aggrieved person; or

(c) a characteristic that is generally imputed to persons who have the same gender identity as the aggrieved person;

the discriminator treats the aggrieved person less favourably than, in circumstances that are the same or are not materially different, the discriminator treats or would treat a person who has a different gender identity.

(2) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's gender identity if the discriminator imposes, or proposes to impose, a condition, requirement or practice that has, or is likely to have, the effect of disadvantaging persons who have the same gender identity as the aggrieved person.

(3) This section has effect subject to sections 7B and 7D.

5C Discrimination on the ground of intersex status

(1) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's intersex status if, by reason of:

(a) the aggrieved person's intersex status; or

(b) a characteristic that appertains generally to persons of intersex status; or

(c) a characteristic that is generally imputed to persons of intersex status;

the discriminator treats the aggrieved person less favourably than, in circumstances that are the same or are not materially different, the discriminator treats or would treat a person who is not of intersex status.

(2) For the purposes of this Act, a person (the discriminator) discriminates against another person (the aggrieved person) on the ground of the aggrieved person's intersex status if the discriminator imposes, or proposes to impose, a condition, requirement or practice that has, or is likely to have, the effect of disadvantaging persons of intersex status.

(3) This section has effect subject to sections 7B and 7D."

Various other precautions have also been provided under the Act.

37. We may in this respect also refer to the European Union Legislations on transsexuals. Recital 3 of the Preamble to the Directive 2006/54/EC of European Parliament and the Council of 5 July 2006 makes an explicit reference to discrimination based on gender reassignment for the first time in European Union Law. Recital 3 reads as under :-

> "The Court of Justice has held that the scope of the principle of equal treatment for men and women cannot be confined to the prohibition of discrimination based on the fact that a person is of one or other sex. In view of this purpose and the nature of the rights which it seeks to safeguard, it also applies to discrimination arising from the gender reassignment of a person."

38. European Parliament also adopted a resolution on discrimination against transsexuals on 12th September, 1989 and called upon the Member States to take steps for the protection of transsexual persons and to pass legislation to further that end. Following that Hungary has enacted Equal Treatment and the Promotion of Equal Opportunities Act, 2003, which includes sexual identity as one of the grounds of discrimination. 2010 paper on 'Transgender Persons' Rights in the EU Member States prepared by the Policy Department of the European Parliament presents the specific situation of transgender people in 27 Member States of the European Union. In the United States of America some of the laws enacted by the States are inconsistent with each other. The Federal Law which provides protection to transgenders is The Matthew Shepard and James Byrd. Jr. Hate Crimes Prevention Act, 2009, which expands the scope of the 1969 United States Federal Hate-crime Law by including offences motivated by actual or perceived gender identity. Around 15 States and District of Colombia in the United States have legislations which prohibit discrimination on grounds of gender identity and expression. Few States have issued executive orders prohibiting discrimination.

39. The Parliament of South Africa in the year 2003, enacted Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act, 2003, which permits transgender persons who have undergone gender reassignment or people whose sexual characteristics have evolved naturally or an intersexed person to apply to the Director General of the National Department of Home Affairs for alteration of his/her sex description in the birth register, though the legislation does not contemplate a more inclusive definition of transgenders.

40. The Senate of Argentina in the year 2012 passed a law on Gender Identity that recognizes right by all persons to the recognition of their gender identity as well as free development of their person according to their gender identity and can also request that their recorded sex be amended along with the changes in first name and image, whenever they do not agree with the self-perceived gender identity. Not necessary that they seemed to prove that a surgical procedure for total or partial genital reassignment, hormonal therapies or any other psychological or medical treatment had taken place. Article 12 deals with dignified treatment, respecting the gender identity adopted by the individual, even though the first name is different from the one recorded in their national identity documents. Further laws also provide that whenever requested by the individual, the adopted first name must be used for summoning, recording, filing, calling and any other procedure or service in public and private spaces.

41. In Germany, a new law has come into force on 5th November, 2013, which allows the parents to register the sex of the children as 'not specified' in the case of children with intersex variation. According to Article 22, Section 3 of the German Civil Statutes Act reads as follows:-

> "If a child can be assigned to neither the female nor the male sex then the child has to be named without a specification"

42. The law has also added a category of X, apart from "M" and "F" under the classification of gender in the passports.

Indian Scenario

43. We have referred exhaustively to the various judicial pronouncements and legislations on the international arena to highlight the fact that the recognition of "sex identity gender" of persons, and "guarantee to equality and non-discrimination" on the ground of gender identity or expression is increasing and gaining acceptance in international law and, therefore, be applied in India as well.

44. Historical background of Transgenders in India has already been dealth in the earlier part of this Judgment indicating that they were once treated with great respect, at least in the past, though not in the present. We can perceive a wide range of transgender related identities, cultures or experiences which are generally as follows:

> "Hijras: Hijras are biological males who reject their 'masculine' identity in due course of time to identify either as women, or "not-men", or "in-between man and woman", or "neither man nor woman". Hijras can be considered as the western equivalent of transgender/transsexual (male-to-female) persons but Hijras have a long tradition/culture and have strong social ties formalized through a ritual called "reet" (becoming a member of Hijra community). There are regional variations in the use of terms referred to Hijras. For example, Kinnars (Delhi) and Aravanis (Tamil Nadu). Hijras may earn through their traditional work: 'Badhai' (clapping their hands and asking for alms), blessing new-born babies, or dancing in ceremonies. Some proportion of Hijras engage in sex work for lack of other job opportunities, while some may be self-employed or work for non-governmental organisations." (See UNDP India Report (December, 2010).
>
> Eunuch: Eunuch refers to an emasculated male and intersexed to a person whose genitals are ambiguously male-like at birth, but this is discovered the child previously assigned to the male sex, would be recategorized as intesexexd – as a Hijra.

"Aravanis and 'Thirunangi' – Hijras in Tamil Nadu identify as "Aravani". Tamil Nadu Aravanigal Welfare Board, a state government's initiative under the Department of Social Welfare defines Aravanis as biological males who self-identify themselves as a woman trapped in a male's body. Some Aravani activists want the public and media to use the term 'Thirunangi' to refer to Aravanis.

Kothi – Kothis are a heterogeneous group. 'Kothis' can be described as biological males who show varying degrees of 'femininity' – which may be situational. Some proportion of Kothis have bisexual behavior and get married to a woman. Kothis are generally of lower socioeconomic status and some engage in sex work for survival. Some proportion of Hijra-identified people may also identify themselves as 'Kothis'. But not all Kothi identified people identify themselves as transgender or Hijras.

Jogtas/Jogappas: Jogtas or Jogappas are those persons who are dedicated to and serve as a servant of goddess Renukha Devi (Yellamma) whose temples are present in Maharashtra and Karnataka. 'Jogta' refers to male servant of that Goddess and 'Jogti' refers to female servant (who is also sometimes referred to as 'Devadasi'). One can become a 'Jogta' (or Jogti) if it is part of their family tradition or if one finds a 'Guru' (or 'Pujari') who accepts him/her as a 'Chela' or 'Shishya' (disciple). Sometimes, the term 'Jogti Hijras' is used to denote those male-to-female transgender persons who are devotees/servants of Goddess Renukha Devi and who are also in the Hijra communities. This term is used to differentiate them from 'Jogtas' who are heterosexuals and who may or may not dress in woman's attire when they worship the Goddess. Also, that term differentiates them from 'Jogtis' who are biological females dedicated to the Goddess. However, 'Jogti Hijras' may refer to themselves as 'Jogti' (female pronoun) or Hijras, and even sometimes as 'Jogtas'.

Shiv-Shakthis: Shiv-Shakthis are considered as males who are possessed by or particularly close to a goddess and who have feminine gender expression. Usually, Shiv-Shakthis are inducted into the Shiv-Shakti community by senior gurus, who teach them the norms, customs, and rituals to be observed by them. In a ceremony, Shiv-Shakthis are married to a sword that represents male power or Shiva (deity). Shiv-Shakthis thus become the bride of the sword. Occasionally, Shiv-Shakthis cross-dress and use accessories and ornaments that are generally/socially meant for women. Most people in this community belong to lower socio-economic status and earn for their living as astrologers, soothsayers, and spiritual healers; some also seek alms." (See Serena Nanda, Wadsworth Publishing Company, Second Edition (1999)

45. Transgender people, as a whole, face multiple forms of oppression in this country. Discrimination is so large and pronounced, especially in the field of health care, employment, education, leave aside social exclusion. A detailed study was conducted by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP – India) and submitted a report in December, 2010 on Hijras/transgenders in India:

"HIV Human Rights and Social Exclusion". The Report states that the HIV Human Immunodeficiency Virus and Sexually Transmitted Infections (STI) is now increasingly seen in Hijras/transgenders population. The estimated size of men who have sex with men (MSM) and male sex workers population in India (latter presumably includes Hijras/TG communities) is 2,352,133 and 235,213 respectively. It was stated that no reliable estimates are available for Hijras/TG women. HIV prevalence among MSM population was 7.4% against the overall adult HIV prevalence of 0.36%. It was stated recently Hijras/TG people were included under the category of MSM in HIV sentinel serosurveillance. It is also reported in recent studies that Hijras/TG women have indicated a very high HIV prevalence (17.5% to 41%) among them. Study conducted by NACO also highlights a pathetic situation. Report submitted by NACI, NACP IV Working Group Hijras TG dated 5.5.2011 would indicate that transgenders are extremely vulnerable to HIV. Both the reports highlight the extreme necessity of taking emergent steps to improve their sexual health, mental health and also address the issue of social exclusion. The UNDP in its report has made the following recommendations, which are as under:

> "Multiple problems are faced by Hijras/TG, which necessitate a variety of solutions and actions. While some actions require immediate implementation such as introducing Hijra/TG-specific social welfare schemes, some actions need to be taken on a long-term basis changing the negative attitude of the general public and increasing accurate knowledge about Hijra/TG communities. The required changes need to be reflected in policies and laws; attitude of the government, general public and health care providers; and health care systems and practice. Key recommendations include the following:
>
> 1. Address the gape in NACP-III: establish HIV sentinel serosurveillance sites for Hijras/TG at strategic locations; conduct operations research to design and fine-tune culturally-relevant package of HIV prevention and care interventions for Hijras/TG; provide financial support for the formation of CBOs run by Hijras/TG; and build the capacity of CBOs to implement effective rogrammes.
>
> 2. Move beyond focusing on individual-level HIV prevention activities to address the structural determinants of risks and mitigate the impact of risks. For example, mental health counseling, crisis intervention (crisis in relation to suicidal tendencies, police harassment and arrests, support following sexual and physical violence), addressing alcohol and drug abuse, and connecting to livelihood programs all need to be part of the HIV interventions.

3. Train health care providers to be competent and sensitive in providing health care services (including STI and HIV-related services) to Hijras/TG as well as develop and monitor implementation of guidelines related to gender transition and sex reassignment surgery (SRS).

4. Clarify the ambiguous legal status of sex reassignment surgery and provide gender transition and SRS services (with proper pre- and post-operation/transition counseling) for free in public hospitals in various parts in India.

5. Implement stigma and discrimination reduction measures at various settings through a variety of ways: mass media awareness for the general public to focused training and sensitization for police and health care providers.

6. Develop action steps toward taking a position on legal recognition of gender identity of Hijras/TG need to be taken in consultation with Hijras/TG and other key stakeholders. Getting legal recognition and avoiding ambiguities in the current procedures that issue identity documents to Hijras/TGs are required as they are connected to basic civil rights such as access to health and public services, right to vote, right to contest elections, right to education, inheritance rights, and marriage and child adoption.

7. Open up the existing Social Welfare Schemes for needy Hijras/TG and create specific welfare schemes to address the basic needs of Hijras/TG including housing and employment needs.

8. Ensure greater involvement of vulnerable communities including Hijras/TG women in policy formulation and program development."

46. Social exclusion and discrimination on the ground of gender stating that one does not conform to the binary gender (male/female) does prevail in India. Discussion on gender identity including self-identification of gender of male/female or as transgender mostly focuses on those persons who are assigned male sex at birth, whether one talks of Hijra transgender, woman or male or male to female transgender persons, while concern voiced by those who are identified as female to male trans-sexual persons often not properly addressed. Female to male unlike Hijra/transgender persons are not quite visible in public unlike Hijra/transgender persons. Many of them, however, do experience violence and discrimination because of their sexual orientation or gender identity.

INDIA TO FOLLOW INTERNATIONAL CONVENTIONS

47. International Conventions and norms are significant for the purpose of interpretation of gender equality.

Article 1 of the Universal declaration on Human Rights, 1948, states that all human-beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. Article 3 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights states that everyone has a right to life, liberty and security of person. Article 6 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 affirms that every human-being has the inherent right to life, which right shall be protected by law and no one shall be arbitrarily deprived of his life. Article 5 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 7 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provide that no one shall be subjected to torture or to cruel inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment. United Nations Convention against Torture and Other Cruel Inhuman and Degrading Treatment or Punishment (dated 24th January, 2008) specifically deals with protection of individuals and groups made vulnerable by discrimination or marginalization. Para 21 of the Convention states that States are obliged to protect from torture or ill-treatment all persons regardless of sexual orientation or transgender identity and to prohibit, prevent and provide redress for torture and ill-treatment in all contests of State custody or control. Article 12 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and Article 17 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights state that no one shall be subjected to "arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence".

48. Above-mentioned International Human Rights instruments which are being followed by various countries in the world are aimed to protect the human rights of transgender people since it has been noticed that transgenders/transsexuals often face serious human rights violations, such as harassment in work place, hospitals, places of public conveniences, market places, theaters, railway stations, bus stands, and so on.

49. Indian Law, on the whole, only recognizes the paradigm of binary genders of male and female, based on a person's sex assigned by birth, which permits gender system, including the law relating to marriage, adoption, inheritance, succession and taxation and welfare legislations. We have exhaustively referred to various articles contained in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, 1966, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 as well as the Yogyakarta principles. Reference was also made to legislations enacted in other countries dealing with rights of persons of transgender community. Unfortunately we have no legislation in this country dealing with the rights of transgender community. Due to the absence of suitable legislation protecting the rights of the members of the transgender community, they are facing discrimination in various areas and hence the necessity to follow the International Conventions to which India is a party and to give due respect to other non-binding International Conventions and principles. Constitution makers could not have envisaged that each and every human activity be guided, controlled, recognized or safeguarded by laws made by the legislature. Article 21 has been incorporated to safeguard those rights and a constitutional Court cannot be a mute spectator when those rights are violated, but is expected to safeguard those rights knowing the pulse and feeling of that community, though a minority, especially when their rights have gained universal recognition and acceptance.

50. Article 253 of the Constitution of India states that the Parliament has the power to make any law for the whole or any part of the territory of India for implementing any treaty, agreement or convention. Generally, therefore, a legislation is required for implementing the international conventions, unlike the position in the United States of America where the rules of international law are applied by the municipal courts on the theory of their implied adoption by the State, as a part of its own municipal law. Article VI, Cl. (2) of the U.S. Constitution reads as follows:

> ".....all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the united States, shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the Constitution or laws of any State to the contrary not-withstanding."

51. In the United States, however, it is open to the courts to supersede or modify international law in its application or it may be controlled by the treaties entered into by the United States. But, till an Act of Congress is passed, the Court is bound by the law of nations, which is part of the law of the land. Such a 'supremacy clause' is absent in our Constitution. Courts in India would apply the rules of International law according to the principles of comity of Nations, unless they are overridden by clear rules of domestic law. See: Gramophone Company of India Ltd. v. Birendra Bahadur Pandey (1984) 2 SCC 534 and Tractor Export v. Tarapore & Co. (1969) 3 SCC 562, Mirza Ali Akbar Kashani v. United Arab Republic (1966) 1 SCR 391. In the case of Jolly George Varghese v. Bank of Cochin (1980) 2 SCC 360, the Court applied the above principle in respect of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 as well as in connection with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. India has ratified the above mentioned covenants, hence, those covenants can be used by the municipal courts as an aid to the Interpretation of Statutes by applying the Doctrine of Harmonization. But, certainly, if the Indian law is not in conflict with the International covenants, particularly pertaining to human rights, to which India is a party, the domestic court can apply those principles in the Indian conditions. The Interpretation of International Conventions is governed by Articles 31 and 32 of the Vienna Convention on the Law of Treaties of 1969.

52. Article 51 of the Directive Principles of State Policy, which falls under Part IV of the Indian Constitution, reads as under:

> "Art. 51. The State shall endeavour to –
>
> (a) promote international peace and security;
>
> (b) maintain just and honourable relations between nations;
>
> (c) Foster respect for international law and treaty obligation in the dealings of organised peoples with one another; and
>
> (d) Encourage settlement of international disputes by arbitration."

53. Article 51, as already indicated, has to be read along with Article 253 of the Constitution. If the parliament has made any legislation which is in conflict with the international law, then Indian Courts are bound to give effect to the Indian Law, rather than the international law. However, in the absence of a contrary legislation, municipal courts in India would respect the rules of international law. In His Holiness Kesavananda Bharati Sripadavalvaru v. State of Kerala (1973) 4 SCC 225, it was stated that in view of Article 51 of the Constitution, the Court must interpret language of the Constitution, if not intractable, in the light of United Nations Charter and the solemn declaration subscribed to it by India. In Apparel Export Promotion Council v. A. K. Chopra (1999) 1 SCC 759, it was pointed out that domestic courts are under an obligation to give due regard to the international conventions and norms for construing the domestic laws, more so, when there is no inconsistency between them and there is a void in domestic law. Reference may also be made to the Judgments of this Court in Githa Hariharan (Ms) and another v. Reserve Bank of India and another (1999) 2 SCC 228, R.D. Upadhyay v. State of Andhra Pradesh and others (2007) 15 SCC 337 and People's Union for Civil Liberties v. Union of India and another (2005) 2 SCC 436. In Vishaka and others v. State of Rajasthan and Others (1997) 6 SCC 241, this Court under Article 141 laid down various guidelines to prevent sexual harassment of women in working places, and to enable gender equality relying on Articles 11, 24 and general recommendations 22, 23 and 24 of the Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women. Any international convention not inconsistent with the fundamental rights and in harmony with its spirit must be read into those provisions, e.g., Articles 14, 15, 19 and 21 of the Constitution to enlarge the meaning and content thereof and to promote the object of constitutional guarantee. Principles discussed hereinbefore on TGs and the International Conventions, including Yogyakarta principles, which we have found not inconsistent with the various fundamental rights guaranteed under the Indian Constitution, must be recognized and followed, which has sufficient legal and historical justification in our country.

ARTICLE 14 AND TRANSGENDERS

54. Article 14 of the Constitution of India states that the State shall not deny to “any person” equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India. Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedom. Right to equality has been declared as the basic feature of the Constitution and treatment of equals as unequals or unequals as equals will be violative of the basic structure of the Constitution. Article 14 of the Constitution also ensures equal protection and hence a positive obligation on the State to ensure equal protection of laws by bringing in necessary social and economic changes, so that everyone including TGs may enjoy equal protection of laws and nobody is denied such protection. Article 14 does not restrict the word 'person' and its application only to male or female. Hijras/transgender persons who are neither male/female fall within the expression 'person' and, hence, entitled to legal protection of laws in all spheres of State activity, including employment, healthcare, education as well as equal civil and citizenship rights, as enjoyed by any other citizen of this country.

55. Petitioners have asserted as well as demonstrated on facts and figures supported by relevant materials that despite constitutional guarantee of equality, Hijras/transgender persons have been facing extreme discrimination in all spheres of the society. Non-recognition of the identity of Hijras/transgender persons denies them equal protection of law, thereby leaving them extremely vulnerable to harassment, violence and sexual assault in public spaces, at home and in jail, also by the police. Sexual assault, including molestation, rape, forced anal and oral sex, gang rape and stripping is being committed with impunity and there are reliable statistics and materials to support such activities. Further, non-recognition of identity of Hijras /transgender persons results in them facing extreme discrimination in all spheres of society, especially in the field of employment, education, healthcare etc. Hijras/transgender persons face huge discrimination in access to public spaces like restaurants, cinemas, shops, malls etc. Further, access to public toilets is also a serious problem they face quite often. Since, there are no separate toilet facilities for Hijras/transgender persons, they have to use male toilets where they are prone to sexual assault and harassment. Discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation or gender identity, therefore, impairs equality before law and equal protection of law and violates Article 14 of the Constitution of India.

ARTICLES 15 & 16 AND TRANSGENDERS

56. Articles 15 and 16 prohibit discrimination against any citizen on certain enumerated grounds, including the ground of 'sex'. In fact, both the Articles prohibit all forms of gender bias and gender based discrimination.

57. Article 15 states that the State shall not discriminate against any citizen, inter alia, on the ground of sex, with regard to

(a) access to shops, public restaurants, hotels and places of public entertainment; or

(b) use of wells, tanks, bathing ghats, roads and places of public resort maintained wholly or partly out of State funds or dedicated to the use of the general public.

The requirement of taking affirmative action for the advancement of any socially and educationally backward classes of citizens is also provided in this Article.

58. Article 16 states that there shall be equality of opportunities for all the citizens in matters relating to employment or appointment to any office under the State. Article 16 (2) of the Constitution of India reads as follows :

> "16(2). No citizen shall, on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, descent, place of birth, residence or any of them, be ineligible for, or discriminated against in respect or, any employment or office under the State."

Article 16 not only prohibits discrimination on the ground of sex in public employment, but also imposes a duty on the State to ensure that all citizens are treated equally in matters relating to employment and appointment by the State.

59. Articles 15 and 16 sought to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sex, recognizing that sex discrimination is a historical fact and needs to be addressed. Constitution makers, it can be gathered, gave emphasis to the fundamental right against sex discrimination so as to prevent the direct or indirect attitude to treat people differently, for the reason of not being in conformity with stereotypical generalizations of binary genders. Both gender and biological attributes constitute distinct components of sex. Biological characteristics, of course, include genitals, chromosomes and secondary sexual features, but gender attributes include one's self image, the deep psychological or emotional sense of sexual identity and character. The discrimination on the ground of 'sex' under Articles 15 and 16, therefore, includes discrimination on the ground of gender identity. The expression 'sex' used in Articles 15 and 16 is not just limited to biological sex of male or female, but intended to include people who consider themselves to be neither male or female.

60. TGs have been systematically denied the rights under Article 15(2) that is not to be subjected to any disability, liability, restriction or condition in regard to access to public places. TGs have also not been afforded special provisions envisaged under Article 15(4) for the advancement of the socially and educationally backward classes (SEBC) of citizens, which they are, and hence legally entitled and eligible to get the benefits of SEBC. State is bound to take some affirmative action for their advancement so that the injustice done to them for centuries could be remedied. TGs are also entitled to enjoy economic, social, cultural and political rights without discrimination, because forms of discrimination on the ground of gender are violative of fundamental freedoms and human rights. TGs have also been denied rights under Article 16(2) and discriminated against in respect of employment or office under the State on the ground of sex. TGs are also entitled to reservation in the matter of appointment, as envisaged under Article 16(4) of the Constitution. State is bound to take affirmative action to give them due representation in public services.

61. Articles 15(2) to (4) and Article 16(4) read with the Directive Principles of State Policy and various international instruments to which Indian is a party, call for social equality, which the TGs could realize, only if facilities and opportunities are extended to them so that they can also live with dignity and equal status with other genders.

ARTICLE 19(1)(a) AND TRANSGENDERS

62. Article 19(1) of the Constitution guarantees certain fundamental rights, subject to the power of the State to impose restrictions from exercise of those rights. The rights conferred by Article 19 are not available to any person who is not a citizen of India. Article 19(1) guarantees those great basic rights which are recognized and guaranteed as the natural rights inherent in the status of the citizen of a free country. Article 19(1) (a) of the Constitution states that all citizens shall have the right to freedom of speech and expression, which includes one's right to expression of his self-identified gender. Self-identified gender can be expressed through dress, words, action or behavior or any other form. No restriction can be placed on one's personal appearance or choice of dressing, subject to the restrictions contained in Article 19(2) of the Constitution.

63. We may, in this connection, refer to few judgments of the US Supreme Courts on the rights of TG's freedom of expression. The Supreme Court of the State of Illinois in the City of Chicago v. Wilson et al., 75 Ill.2d 525(1978) struck down the municipal law prohibiting cross-dressing, and held as follows "-

> "the notion that the State can regulate one's personal appearance, unconfined by any constitutional strictures whatsoever, is fundamentally inconsistent with "values of privacy, self-identity, autonomy and personal integrity that ..... the Constitution was designed to protect."

64. In Doe v. Yunits et al., 2000 WL33162199 (Mass. Super.), the Superior Court of Massachusetts, upheld the right of a person to wear school dress that matches her gender identity as part of protected speech and expression and observed as follows :-

> "by dressing in clothing and accessories traditionally associated with the female gender, she is expressing her identification with the gender. In addition, plaintiff's ability to express herself and her gender identity through dress is important for her health and well-being. Therefore, plaintiff's expression is not merely a personal preference but a necessary symbol of her identity."

65. Principles referred to above clearly indicate that the freedom of expression guaranteed under Article 19(1)(a) includes the freedom to express one's chosen gender identity through varied ways and means by way of expression, speech, mannerism, clothing etc.

66. Gender identity, therefore, lies at the core of one's personal identity, gender expression and presentation and, therefore, it will have to be protected under Article 19(1)(a) of the Constitution of India. A transgender's personality could be expressed by the transgender's behavior and presentation. State cannot prohibit, restrict or interfere with a transgender's expression of such personality, which reflects that inherent personality. Often the State and its authorities either due to ignorance or otherwise fail to digest the innate character and identity of such persons. We, therefore, hold that values of privacy, self-identity, autonomy and personal integrity are fundamental rights guaranteed to members of the transgender community under Article 19(1)(a) of the Constitution of India and the State is bound to protect and recognize those rights.

ARTICLE 21 AND THE TRANSGENDERS

67. Article 21 of the Constitution of India reads as follows:

> "21. Protection of life and personal liberty – No person shall be deprived of his life or personal liberty except according to procedure established by law."

Article 21 is the heart and soul of the Indian Constitution, which speaks of the rights to life and personal liberty. Right to life is one of the basic fundamental rights and not even the State has the authority to violate or take away that right. Article 21 takes all those aspects of life which go to make a person's life meaningful. Article 21 protects the dignity of human life, one's personal autonomy, one's right to privacy, etc. Right to dignity has been recognized to be an essential part of the right to life and accrues to all persons on account of being humans. In Francis Coralie Mullin v. Administrator, Union Territory of Delhi (1981) 1 SCC

608 (paras 7 and 8), this Court held that the right to dignity forms an essential part of our constitutional culture which seeks to ensure the full development and evolution of persons and includes "expressing oneself in diverse forms, freely moving about and mixing and comingling with fellow human beings".

68. Recognition of one's gender identity lies at the heart of the fundamental right to dignity. Gender, as already indicated, constitutes the core of one's sense of being as well as an integral part of a person's identity. Legal recognition of gender identity is, therefore, part of right to dignity and freedom guaranteed under our Constitution.

69. Article 21, as already indicated, guarantees the protection of "personal autonomy" of an individual. In Anuj Garg v. Hotel Association of India (2008) 3 SCC 1 (paragraphs 34-35), this Court held that personal autonomy includes both the negative right of not to be subject to interference by others and the positive right of individuals to make decisions about their life, to express themselves and to choose which activities to take part in. Self-determination of gender is an integral part of personal autonomy and self-expression and falls within the realm of personal liberty guaranteed under Article 21 of the Constitution of India.

LEGAL RECOGNITION OF THIRD/TRANSGENDER IDENTITY

70. Self-identified gender can be either male or female or a third gender. Hijras are identified as persons of third gender and are not identified either as male or female. Gender identity, as already indicated, refers to a person's internal sense of being male, female or a transgender, for example Hijras do not identify as female because of their lack of female genitalia or lack of reproductive capability. This distinction makes them separate from both male and female genders and they consider themselves neither man nor woman, but a "third gender". Hijras, therefore, belong to a distinct socio-religious and cultural group and have, therefore, to be considered as a "third gender", apart from male and female. State of Punjab has treated all TGs as male which is not legally sustainable. State of Tamil Nadu has taken lot of welfare measures to safeguard the rights of TGs, which we have to acknowledge. Few States like Kerala, Tripura, Bihar have referred TGs as "third gender or sex". Certain States recognize them as "third category". Few benefits have also been extended by certain other States. Our neighbouring countries have also upheld their fundamental rights and right to live with dignity.

71. The Supreme Court of Nepal in Sunil Babu Pant & Ors. v. Nepal Government (Writ Petition No.917 of 2007 decided on 21st December, 2007), spoke on the rights of Transgenders as follows:-

> "the fundamental rights comprised under Part II of the Constitution are enforceable fundamental human rights guaranteed to the citizens against the State. For this reason, the fundamental rights stipulated in Part III are the rights similarly vested in the third gender people as human beings. The homosexuals and third gender people are also human beings as other men and women are, and they are the citizens of this country as well.... Thus, the people other than 'men' and 'women', including the people of 'third gender' cannot be discriminated. The > State should recognize the existence of all natural persons including the people of third gender other than the men and women. And it cannot deprive the people of third gender from enjoying the fundamental rights provided by Part III of the Constitution."

72. The Supreme Court of Pakistan in Dr. Mohammad Aslam Khaki & Anr. V. Senior Superintendent of Police (Operation) Rawalpindi & Ors. (Constitution Petition No.43 of 2009) decided on 22nd March, 2011, had occasion to consider the rights of eunuchs and held as follows:-

> "Needless to observe that eunuchs in their rights are citizens of this country and subject to the Constitution of the Islamic Republic of Pakistan, 1973, their rights, obligations including right to life and dignity are equally protected. Thus no discrimination, for any reason, is possible against them as far as their rights and obligations are concerned. The Government functionaries both at federal and provincial levels are bound to provide them protection of life and property and secure their dignity as well, as is done in case of other citizens."

73. We may remind ourselves of the historical presence of the third gender in this country as well as in the neighbouring countries.

74. Article 21, as already indicated, protects one's right of self-determination of the gender to which a person belongs. Determination of gender to which a person belongs is to be decided by the person concerned. In other words, gender identity is integral to the dignity of an individual and is at the core of "personal autonomy" and "self-determination". Hijras/Eunuchs, therefore, have to be considered as Third Gender, over and above binary genders under our Constitution and the laws.

75. Articles 14, 15, 16, 19 and 21, above discussion, would indicate, do not exclude Hijras/Transgenders from its ambit, but Indian law on the whole recognize the paradigm of binary genders of male and female, based on one's biological sex. As already indicated, we cannot accept the Corbett principle of "Biological Test", rather we prefer to follow the psyche of the person in determining sex and gender and prefer the "Psychological Test" instead of "Biological Test". Binary notion of gender reflects in the Indian Penal Code, for example, Section 8, 10, etc. and also in the laws related to marriage, adoption, divorce, inheritance, succession and other welfare legislations like NAREGA, 2005, etc. Non-recognition of the identity of Hijras/Transgenders in the various legislations denies them equal protection of law and they face wide-spread discrimination.

76. Article 14 has used the expression "person" and the Article 15 has used the expression "citizen" and "sex" so also Article 16. Article 19 has also used the expression "citizen". Article 21 has used the expression "person". All these expressions, which are "gender neutral" evidently refer to human-beings. Hence, they take within their sweep Hijras/Transgenders and are not as such limited to male or female gender. Gender identity as already indicated forms the core of one's personal self, based on self identification, not on surgical or medical procedure. Gender identity, in our view, is an integral part of sex and no citizen can be discriminated on the ground of gender identity, including those who identify as third gender.

77. We, therefore, conclude that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation or gender identity includes any discrimination, exclusion, restriction or preference, which has the effect of nullifying or transposing equality by the law or the equal protection of laws guaranteed under our Constitution, and hence we are inclined to give various directions to safeguard the constitutional rights of the members of the TG community.

.....J
(K.S. Radhakrishnan)

A.K. SIKRI,J.

78. I have carefully, and with lot of interest, gone through the perspicuous opinion of my brother Radhakrishnan,J. I am entirely in agreement with the discussion contained in the said judgment on all the cardinal issues that have arisen for consideration in these proceedings. At the same time, having regard to the fact that the issues involved are of seminal importance, I am also inclined to pen down my thoughts.

79. As is clear, these petitions essentially raise an issue of "Gender Identity", which is the core issue. It has two facets, viz.:

> "(a) Whether a person who is born as a male with predominantly female orientation (or vice-versa), has a right to get himself to be recognized as a female as per his choice moreso, when such a person after having undergone operational procedure, changes his/her sex as well;
> (b) Whether transgender (TG), who are neither males nor females, have a right to be identified and categorized as a "third gender"?

80. We would hasten to add that it is the second issue with which we are primarily concerned in these petitions though in the process of discussion, first issue which is somewhat inter-related, has also popped up.

81. Indubitably, the issue of choice of gender identify has all the trappings of a human rights. That apart, as it becomes clear from the reading of the judgment of my esteemed Brother Radhakrishnan,J., the issue is not limited to the exercise of choice of gender/sex. Many rights which flow from this choice also come into play, inasmuch not giving them the status of a third gender results in depriving the community of TGs of many of their valuable rights and privileges which other persons enjoy as citizens of this Country. There is also deprivation of social and cultural participation which results into eclipsing their access to education and health services. Radhakrishnan,J. has exhaustively described the term 'Transgender' as an umbrella term which embraces within itself a wide range of identities and experiences including but not limited to pre-operative/post-operative trans sexual people who strongly identify with the gender opposite to their biological sex i.e. male/ female. Therein, the history of transgenders in India is also traced and while doing so, there is mention of upon the draconian legislation enacted during the British Rule, known as Criminal Tribes Act, 1871 which treated, per se, the entire community of Hizra persons as innately 'criminals', 'addicted to the systematic commission of non-bailable offences'.

82. With these introductory remarks, I revert to the two facets of pivotal importance mentioned above. Before embarking on the discussion, I may clarify that my endeavour would be not to repeat the discussion contained in the judgment of my Brother Radhakrishnan, J., as I agree with every word written therein. However, at times, if some of the observations are re-narrated, that would be only with a view to bring continuity in the thought process.

(1) Re: Right of a person to have the gender of his/her choice.

When a child is born, at the time of birth itself, sex is assigned to him/her. A child would be treated with that sex thereafter, i.e. either a male or a female. However, as explained in detail in the accompanying judgment, some persons, though relatively very small in number, may born with bodies which incorporate both or certain aspects of both male or female physiology. It may also happen that though a person is born as a male, because of some genital anatomy problems his innate perception may be that of a female and all his actions would be female oriented. The position may be exactly the opposite wherein a person born as female may behave like a male person.

83. In earlier times though one could observe such characteristics, at the same time the underlying rationale or reason behind such a behavior was not known. Over a period of time, with in depth study and research of such physical and psychological factors bevaviour, the causes of this behaviour have become discernable which in turn, has led to some changes in societal norms. Society has starting accepting, though slowly, these have accepted the behavioral norms of such persons without treating it as abnormal. Further, medical science has leaped forward to such an extent that even physiology appearance of a person can be changed through surgical procedures, from male to female and vice-versa. In this way, such persons are able to acquire the body which is in conformity with the perception of their gender/gender characteristics. In order to ensure that law also keeps pace with the aforesaid progress in medical science, various countries have come out with Legislation conferring rights on such persons to recognize their gender identity based on reassigned sex after undergoing Sex Re-Assignment Surgery (SRS). Law and judgments given by the courts in other countries have been exhaustively and grandiloquently traversed by my learned Brother in his judgment, discussing amongst others, the Yogyakarta principles, the relevant provisions of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 and highlighting the statutory framework operating in those countries.

84. The genesis of this recognition lies in the acknowledgment of another fundamental and universal principal viz. “right of choice” given to an individual which is the inseparable part of human rights. It is a matter of historical significance that the 20th Century is often described as “the age of rights”.

85. The most important lesson which was learnt as a result of Second World War was the realization by the Governments of various countries about the human dignity which needed to be cherished and protected. It is for this reason that in the U.N.Charter, 1945, adopted immediately after the Second World War, dignity of the individuals was mentioned as of core value. The almost contemporaneous Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) echoed same sentiments.

86. The underlined message in the aforesaid documents is the acknowledgment that human rights are individual and have a definite linkage of human development, both sharing common vision and with a common purpose. Respect for human rights is the root for human development and realization of full potential of each individual, which in turn leads to the augmentation of human resources with progress of the nation. Empowerment of the people through human development is the aim of human rights.

87. There is thus a universal recognition that human rights are rights that “belong” to every person, and do not depend on the specifics of the individual or the relationship between the right-holder and the right-grantor. Moreover, human rights exist irrespective of the question whether they are granted or recognized by the legal and social system within which we live. They are devices to evaluate these existing arrangements: ideally, these arrangements should not violate human rights. In other words, human rights are moral, pre-legal rights. They are not granted by people nor can they be taken away by them.

88. In international human rights law, equality is found upon two complementary principles: non-discrimination and reasonable differentiation. The principle of non-discrimination seeks to ensure that all persons can equally enjoy and exercise all their rights and freedoms. Discrimination occurs due to arbitrary denial of opportunities for equal participation. For example, when public facilities and services are set on standards out of the reach of the TGs, it leads to exclusion and denial of rights. Equality not only implies preventing discrimination (example, the protection of individuals against unfavourable treatment by introducing anti- discrimination laws), but goes beyond in remedying discrimination against groups suffering systematic discrimination in society. In concrete terms, it means embracing the notion of positive rights, affirmative action and reasonable accommodation.

89. Nevertheless, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights recognizes that all human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights and, since the Covenant's provisions apply fully to all members of society, persons with disabilities are clearly entitled to the full range of rights recognized in the Covenant. Moreover, the requirement contained in Article 2 of the Covenant that the rights enunciated will be exercised without discrimination of any kind based on certain specified grounds or other status clearly applies to cover persons with disabilities.

90. India attained independence within two years of adoption of the aforesaid U.N.Charter and it was but natural that such a Bill of Rights would assume prime importance insofar as thinking of the members of the Constituent Assembly goes. It in fact did and we found chapter on fundamental rights in Part-III of the Constitution. It is not necessary for me, keeping in view the topic of today's discussion, to embark on detailed discussion on Chapter-III. Some of the provisions relevant for our purposes would be Article 14, 15,16 and 21 of the Constitution which have already been adverted to in detail in the accompanying judgment. At this juncture it also needs to be emphasized simultaneously is that in addition to the fundamental rights, Constitution makers also deemed it proper to impose certain obligations on the State in the form of "Directive Principles of State Policy" (Part-IV) as a mark of good governance. It is this part which provides an ideal and purpose to our Constitution and delineates certain principles which are fundamental in the governance of the country. Dr.Ambedkar had explained the purpose of these Directive Principles in the following manner (See Constituent Assembly debates):

> "The Directive Principles are like the Instruments of Instructions which were issued to the Governor-General and the Governors of Colonies, and to those of India by the British Government under the 1935 Government of India Act. What is called > "Directive Principles" is merely another name for the Instrument of Instructions. The only difference is that they are instructions to the legislature and the executive. Whoever capture power will not be free to do what he likes with it. In the exercise of it he will have to respect these instruments of instructions which are called Directive Principles".

91. The basic spirit of our Constitution is to provide each and every person of the nation equal opportunity to grow as a human being, irrespective of race, caste, religion, community and social status. Granville Austin while analyzing the functioning of Indian Constitution in first 50 years ha described three distinguished strands of Indian Constitution: (i)protecting national unity and integrity, (ii)establishing the institution and spirit of democracy; and (iii) fostering social reforms. The Strands are mutually dependent, and inextricably intertwined in what he elegantly describes as "a seamless web". And there cannot be social reforms till it is ensured that each and every citizen of this country is able to exploit his/her potentials to the maximum. The Constitution, although drafted by the Constituent Assembly, was meant for the people of India and that is why it is given by the people to themselves as expressed in the opening words “We the People”. What is the most important gift to the common person given by this Constitution is “fundamental rights” which may be called Human Rights as well.

92. The concept of equality in Article 14 so also the meaning of the words ‘life’, ‘liberty’ and ‘law’ in Article 21 have been considerably enlarged by judicial decisions. Anything which is not ‘reasonable, just and fair’ is not treated to be equal and is, therefore, violative of Article 14.

93. Speaking for the vision of our founding fathers, in State of Karnataka v. Rangnatha Reddy (AIR 1978 SC 215), this Court speaking through Justice Krishna Iyer observed:

> “The social philosophy of the Constitution shapes creative judicial vision and orientation. Our nation has, as its dynamic doctrine, economic democracy sans which political democracy is chimerical. We say so because our Constitution, in Parts III and IV and elsewhere, > ensouls such a value system, and the debate in this case puts precisely this soul in peril....Our thesis is that the dialectics of social justice should not be missed if the synthesis of Parts III and Part IV is to influence State action and court pronouncements. Constitutional problems cannot be studied in a socio-economic vacuum, since socio-cultural changes are the source of the new values, and sloughing off old legal thought is part of the process the new equity-loaded legality. A judge is a social scientist in his role as constitutional invigilator and fails functionally if he forgets this dimension in his complex duties."

94. While interpreting Art. 21, this Court has comprehended such diverse aspects as children in jail entitled to special treatment (Sheela Barse vs. Union of India [(1986)3 SCC 596], health hazard due to pollution (Mehta M.C. v. Union of India [(1987) 4 SCC 463], beggars interest in housing (Kalidas Vs. State of J&K [(1987) 3 SCC 430] health hazard from harmful drugs (Vincent Panikurlangara Vs. Union of India AIR 1987 SC 990), right of speedy trial (Reghubir Singh Vs. State of Bihar, AIR 1987 SC 149), handcuffing of prisoners(Aeltemesh Rein Vs. Union of India, AIR 1988 SC 1768), delay in execution of death sentence, immediate medical aid to injured persons(Parmanand Katara Vs. Union of India, AIR 1989 SC 2039), starvation deaths(Kishen Vs. State of Orissa, AIR 1989 SC 677), the right to know(Reliance Petrochemicals Ltd. Vs. Indian Express Newspapers Bombay Pvt. Ltd. AIR 1989 SC 190), right to open trial(Kehar Singh Vs. State (Delhi Admn.) AIR 1988 SC 1883), inhuman conditions an after-care home(Vikram Deo Singh Tomar Vs. State of Bihar, AIR 1988 SC 1782).

95. A most remarkable feature of this expansion of Art.21 is that many of the non-justiciable Directive Principles embodied in Part IV of the Constitution have now been resurrected as enforceable fundamental rights by the magic wand of judicial activism, playing on Art.21 e.g.

(a) Right to pollution-free water and air (Subhash Kumar Vs. State of Bihar, AIR 1991 SC 420).

(b) Right to a reasonable residence (Shantistar Builders Vs. Narayan Khimalal Totame AIR 1990 SC 630).

(c) Right to food (Supra note 14), clothing, decent environment (supra note 20) and even protection of cultural heritage (Ram Sharan Autyanuprasi Vs. UOI, AIR 1989 SC 549) .

(d) Right of every child to a full development (Shantistar Builders Vs. Narayan Khimalal Totame AIR 1990 SC 630).

(e) Right of residents of hilly-areas to access to roads(State of H.P. Vs. Umed Ram Sharma, AIR 1986 SC 847).

(f) Right to education (Mohini Jain Vs. State of Karnataka, AIR 1992 SC 1858), but not for a professional degree (Unni Krishnan J.P. Vs. State of A.P., AIR 1993 SC 2178).

96. A corollary of this development is that while so long the negative language of Art.21 and use of the word ‘deprived’ was supposed to impose upon the State the negative duty not to interfere with the life or liberty of an individual without the sanction of law, the width and amplitude of this provision has now imposed a positive obligation (Vincent Panikurlangara Vs. UOI AIR 1987 SC 990) upon the State to take steps for ensuring to the individual a better enjoyment of his life and dignity, e.g. –

(i) Maintenance and improvement of public health (Vincent Panikurlangara Vs. UOI AIR 1987 SC 990).

(ii) Elimination of water and air pollution (Mehta M.C. Vs. UOI (1987) 4 SCC 463).

(iii) Improvement of means of communication (State of H.P. Vs. Umed Ram Sharma AIR 1986 SC 847).

(iv) Rehabilitation of bonded labourers (Bandhuva Mukti Morcha Vs. UOI, AIR 1984 SC 802).

(v) Providing human conditions if prisons (Sher Singh Vs. State of Punjab AIR 1983 SC 465) and protective homes (Sheela Barse Vs. UOI (1986) 3 SCC 596).

(vi) Providing hygienic condition in a slaughter-house (Buffalo Traders Welfare Ass. Vs. Maneka Gandhi (1994) Suppl (3) SCC 448) .

97. The common golden thread which passes through all these pronouncements is that Art.21 guarantees enjoyment of life by all citizens of this country with dignity, viewing this human rights in terms of human development.

98. The concepts of justice social, economic and political, equality of status and of opportunity and of assuring dignity of the individual incorporated in the Preamble, clearly recognize the right of one and all amongst the citizens of these basic essentials designed to flower the citizen's personality to its fullest. The concept of equality helps the citizens in reaching their highest potential.

99. Thus, the emphasis is on the development of an individual in all respects. The basic principle of the dignity and freedom of the individual is common to all nations, particularly those having democratic set up. Democracy requires us to respect and develop the free spirit of human being which is responsible for all progress in human history. Democracy is also a method by which we attempt to raise the living standard of the people and to give opportunities to every person to develop his/her personality. It is founded on peaceful co-existence and cooperative living. If democracy is based on the recognition of the individuality and dignity of man, as a fortiori we have to recognize the right of a human being to choose his sex/gender identity which is integral his/her personality and is one of the most basic aspect of self-determination dignity and freedom. In fact, there is a growing recognition that the true measure of development of a nation is not economic growth; it is human dignity.

100. More than 225 years ago, Immanuel Kant propounded the doctrine of free will, namely the free willing individual as a natural law ideal. Without going into the detail analysis of his aforesaid theory of justice (as we are not concerned with the analysis of his jurisprudence) what we want to point out is his emphasis on the "freedom" of human volition. The concepts of volition and freedom are "pure", that is not drawn from experience. They are independent of any particular body of moral or legal rules. They are presuppositions of all such rules, valid and necessary for all of them.

101. Over a period of time, two divergent interpretations of the Kantian criterion of justice came to be discussed. One trend was an increasing stress on the maximum of individual freedom of action as the end of law. This may not be accepted and was criticized by the protagonist of 'hedonist utilitarianism', notably Benthem. This school of thoughts laid emphasis on the welfare of the society rather than an individual by propounding the principle of maximum of happiness to most of the people. Fortunately, in the instant case, there is no such dichotomy between the individual freedom/liberty we are discussing, as against public good. On the contrary, granting the right to choose gender leads to public good. The second tendency of Kantian criterion of justice was found in re-interpreting "freedom" in terms not merely of absence of restraint but in terms of attainment of individual perfection. It is this latter trend with which we are concerned in the present case and this holds good even today. As pointed out above, after the Second World War, in the form of U.N.Charter and thereafter there is more emphasis on the attainment of individual perfection. In that united sense at least there is a revival of natural law theory of justice. Blackstone, in the opening pages in his 'Vattelian Fashion' said that the principal aim of society "is to protect individuals in the enjoyment of those absolute rights which were vested in them by the immutable laws of nature……"

102. In fact, the recognition that every individual has fundamental right to achieve the fullest potential, is founded on the principle that all round growth of an individual leads to common public good. After all, human beings are also valuable asset of any country who contribute to the growth and welfare of their nation and the society. A person who is born with a particular sex and his forced to grow up identifying with that sex, and not a sex that his/her psychological behavior identifies with, faces innumerable obstacles in growing up. In an article appeared in the magazine "Eye" of the Sunday Indian Express (March 9-15, 2014) a person born as a boy but with trappings of female (who is now a female after SRS) has narrated these difficulties in the following manner:

> "The other children treated me as a boy, but I preferred playing with girls. Unfortunately, grown-ups consider that okay only as long as you are a small child. The constant inner conflict made things difficult for me and, as I grew up, I began to dread social interactions".

103. Such a person, carrying dual entity simultaneously, would encounter mental and psychological difficulties which would hinder his/her normal mental and even physical growth. It is not even easy for such a person to take a decision to undergo SRS procedure which requires strong mental state of affairs. However, once that is decided and the sex is changed in tune with psychological behavior, it facilitates spending the life smoothly. Even the process of transition is not smooth. The transition from a man to a woman is not an overnight process. It is a "painfully" long procedure that requires a lot of patience. A person must first undergo hormone therapy and, if possible, live as a member of the desired sex for a while. To be eligible for hormone therapy, the person needs at least two psychiatrists to certify that he or she is mentally sound, and schizophrenia, depression and transvestism have to be ruled out first. The psychiatric evaluation involved a serious a questions on how Sunaina felt, when she got to know of her confusion and need for sex change, whether she is a recluse, her socio-economic condition, among other things.

104. In the same article appearing in the "Eye" referred to above, the person who had undergone the operation and became a complete girl, Sunaina (name changed) narrates the benefit which ensued because of change in sex, in harmony with her emotional and psychological character, as is clear from the following passage in that article:

> "Like many other single people in the city, she can spend hours watching Friends, and reading thrillers and Harry Potter. A new happiness has taken seed in her and she says it does not feel that she ever had a male body. "I am a person who likes to laugh. Till my surgery, behind every smile of mine, there was a struggle. Now it's about time that I laughed for real. I have never had a relationship in my life, because somewhere, I always wanted to be treated as a girl. Now, that I am a woman, I am open to a new life, new relationships. I don't have to hide anymore, I don't feel trapped anymore. I love coding and my job. I love cooking. I > am learning French and when my left foot recovers fully, I plan to learn dancing. And, for the first time this year, I will vote with my new name. I am looking forward to that," she says.

105. If a person has changed his/her sex in tune with his/her gender characteristics and perception ,which has become possible because of the advancement in medical science, and when that is permitted by in medical ethics with no legal embargo, we do not find any impediment, legal or otherwise, in giving due recognition to the gender identity based on the reassign sex after undergoing SRS.

106. For these reasons, we are of the opinion that even in the absence of any statutory regime in this country, a person has a constitutional right to get the recognition as male or female after SRS, which was not only his/her gender characteristic but has become his/her physical form as well.

(2) Re: Right of TG to be identified and categorized as "third gender".

107. At the outset, it may be clarified that the term ‘transgender’ is used in a wider sense, in the present age. Even Gay, Lesbian, bisexual are included by the descriptor ‘transgender’. Etymologically, the term ‘transgender’ is derived from two words, namely ‘trans’ and ‘gender’. Former is a Latin word which means ‘across’ or ‘beyond’. The grammatical meaning of ‘transgender’, therefore, is across or beyond gender. This has come to be known as umbrella term which includes Gay men, Lesbians, bisexuals, and cross dressers within its scope. However, while dealing with the present issue we are not concerned with this aforesaid wider meaning of the expression transgender.

108. It is to be emphasized that Transgender in India have assumed distinct and separate class/category which is not prevalent in other parts of the World except in some neighbouring countries . In this country, TG community comprise of Hijaras, enunch, Kothis, Aravanis, Jogappas, Shiv-Shakthis etc. In Indian community transgender are referred as Hizra or the third gendered people. There exists wide range of transgender-related identities, cultures, or experience –including Hijras, Aravanis, Kothis, jogtas/Jogappas, and Shiv-Shakthis (Hijras: They are biological males who reject their masculinity identity in due course of time to identify either as women, or 'not men'. Aravanis: Hijras in Tamil Nadu identify as 'Aravani'. Kothi: Kothis are heterogeneous group. Kothis can be described as biological males who show varying degrees of 'feminity'. Jogtas/Jogappas: They are those who are dedicated to serve as servant of Goddess Renukha Devi whose temples are present in Maharashtra and Karnataka. Sometimes, Jogti Hijras are used to denote such male-to-female transgender persons who are devotees of Goddess Renukha and are also from the Hijra community. Shiv-Shakthis: They are considered as males who are possessed by or particularly close to a goddess and who have feminine gender expression). The way they behave and acts differs from the normative gender role of a men and women. For them, furthering life is far more difficult since such people are neither categorized as men nor women and this deviation is unacceptable to society's vast majority. Endeavour to live a life with dignity is even worse. Obviously transvestites, the hijra beg from merchants who quickly, under threat of obscene abuse, respond to the silent demands of such detested individuals. On occasion, especially festival days, they press their claims with boisterous and ribald singing and dancing.(A Right to Exist: Eunuchs and the State in Nineteenth-Century India Laurence W. Preston Modern Asian Studies, Vol.21,No.2 (1987), pp.371-387).

109. Therefore, we make it clear at the outset that when we discuss about the question of conferring distinct identity, we are restrictive in our meaning which has to be given to TG community i.e. hijra etc., as explained above.

110. Their historical background and individual scenario has been stated in detail in the accompanying judgment rendered by my learned Brother. Few things which follow from this discussion are summed up below:

> "(a) Though in the past TG in India was treated with great respect, that does not remain the scenario any longer. Attrition in their status was triggered with the passing of the Criminal Tribes Act, 1871 which deemed the entire community of Hijara persons as innately ‘criminal’ and ‘adapted to the systematic commission of non-bailable offences’. This dogmatism and indoctrination of Indian people with aforesaid presumption, was totally capricious and nefarious. There could not have been more harm caused to this community with the passing of the aforesaid brutal Legislation during British Regime with the vicious and savage this mind set. To add insult to the irreparable injury caused, Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code was misused and abused as there was a tendency, in British period, to arrest and prosecute TG persons under Section 377 merely on suspicion. To undergo this sordid historical harm caused to TGs of India, there is a need for incessant efforts with effervescence.

(b) There may have been marginal improvement in the social and economic condition of TGs in India. It is still far from satisfactory and these TGs continue to face different kinds of economic blockade and social degradation. They still face multiple forms of oppression in this country. Discrimination qua them is clearly discernable in various fields including health care, employment, education, social cohesion etc.

(c) The TGs are also citizens of this country. They also have equal right to achieve their full potential as human beings. For this purpose, not only they are entitled to proper education, social assimilation, access to public and other places but employment opportunities as well. The discussion above while dealing with the first issue, therefore, equally applies to this issue as well.

111. We are of the firm opinion that by recognizing such TGs as third gender, they would be able to enjoy their human rights, to which they are largely deprived of for want of this recognition. As mentioned above, the issue of transgender is not merely a social or medical issue but there is a need to adopt human right approach towards transgenders which may focus on functioning as an interaction between a person and their environment highlighting the role of society and changing the stigma attached to them. TGs face many disadvantages due to various reasons, particularly for gender abnormality which in certain level needs to physical and mental disability. Up till recently they were subjected to cruelty, pity or charity.

Fortunately, there is a paradigm shift in thinking from the aforesaid approach to a rights based approach. Though, this may be the thinking of human rights activist, the society has not kept pace with this shift. There appears to be limited public knowledge and understanding of same-sex sexual orientation and people whose gender identity and expression are incongruent with their biological sex. As a result of this approach, such persons are socially excluded from the mainstream of the society and they are denied equal access to those fundamental rights and freedoms that the other people enjoy freely.(See, Hijras/Transgender Women in India: HIV, Human Rights and Social Exclusion, UNDP report on India Issue: December, 2010).

112. Some of the common and reported problem that transgender most commonly suffer are: harassment by the police in public places, harassment at home, police entrapment, rape, discriminations, abuse in public places et.al. The other major problems that the transgender people face in their daily life are discrimination, lack of educational facilities, lack of medical facilities, homelessness, unemployment, depression, hormone pill abuse, tobacco and alcohol abuse, and problems related to marriage and adoption. In spite of the adoption of Universal Declaration of Human Rights (UDHR) in the year 1948, the inherent dignity, equality, respect and rights of all human beings throughout the world, the transgender are denied basic human rights. This denial is premised on a prevalent juridical assumption that the law should target discrimination based on sex (i.e., whether a person is anatomically male or female), rather than gender (i.e., whether a person has qualities that society consider masculine or feminine (Katherine M.Franke, The Central Mistake of Sex Discrimination Law: the Disaggregation of Sex from Gender, 144 U.Pa.Rev.1,3 (1995) (arguing that by defining sex in biological terms, the law has failed to distinguish sex from gender, and sexual differentiation from sex discrimination). Transgender people are generally excluded from the society and people think transgenderism as a medical disease. Much like the disability, which in earlier times was considered as an illness but later on looked upon as a right based approach. The question whether transgenderism is a disease is hotly debated in both the transgender and medical-psychiatric communities. But a prevalent view regarding this is that transgenderism is not a disease at all, but a benign normal variant of the human experience akin to left-handedness.

113. Therefore, gender identification becomes very essential component which is required for enjoying civil rights by this community. It is only with this recognition that many rights attached to the sexual recognition as 'third gender' would be available to this community more meaningfully viz. the right to vote, the right to own property, the right to marry, the right to claim a formal identity through a passport and a ration card, a driver's license, the right to education, employment, health so on.

114. Further, there seems to be no reason why a transgender must be denied of basic human rights which includes Right to life and liberty with dignity, Right to Privacy and freedom of expression, Right to Education and Empowerment, Right against violence, Right against Exploitation and Right against Discrimination. Constitution has fulfilled its duty of providing rights to transgenders. Now it's time for us to recognize this and to extend and interpret the Constitution in such a manner to ensure a dignified life of transgender people. All this can be achieved if the beginning is made with the recognition that TG as third gender.

115. In order to translate the aforesaid rights of TGs into reality, it becomes imperative to first assign them their proper 'sex'. As is stated earlier, at the time of birth of a child itself, sex is assigned. However, it is either male or female. In the process, the society as well as law, has completely ignored the basic human right of TGs to give them their appropriate sex categorization. Up to now, they have either been treated as male or female. This is not only improper as it is far from truth, but indignified to these TGs and violates their human rights.

116. Though there may not be any statutory regime recognizing 'third gender' for these TGs. However, we find enough justification to recognize this right of theirs in natural law sphere. Further, such a justification can be traced to the various provisions contained in Part III of the Constitution relating to 'Fundamental Rights'. In addition to the powerful justification accomplished in the accompanying opinion of my esteemed Brother, additional raison d'etre for this conclusion is stated hereinafter.

117. We are in the age of democracy, that too substantive and liberal democracy. Such a democracy is not based solely on the rule of people through their representatives' namely formal democracy. It also has other percepts like Rule of Law, human rights, independence of judiciary, separation of powers etc.

118. There is a recognition to the hard realty that without protection for human rights there can be no democracy and no justification for democracy. In this scenario, while working within the realm of separation of powers (which is also fundamental to the substantive democracy), the judicial role is not only to decide the dispute before the Court, but to uphold the rule of law and ensure access to justice to the marginalized section of the society. It cannot be denied that TGs belong to the unprivileged class which is a marginalized section.

119. The role of the Court is to understand the central purpose and theme of the Constitution for the welfare of the society. Our Constitution, like the law of the society, is a living organism. It is based on a factual and social realty that is constantly changing. Sometimes a change in the law precedes societal change and is even intended to stimulate it. Sometimes, a change in the law is the result in the social realty. When we discuss about the rights of TGs in the constitutional context, we find that in order to bring about complete paradigm shift, law has to play more pre-dominant role. As TGs in India, are neither male nor female, treating them as belonging to either of the aforesaid categories, is the denial of these constitutional rights. It is the denial of social justice which in turn has the effect of denying political and economic justice.

120. In Dattatraya Govind Mahajan vs. State of Maharashtra (AIR 1977 SC 915) this Court observed:

> "Our Constitution is a tryst with destiny, preamble with luscent solemnity in the words 'Justice – social, economic and political.' The three great branches of Government, as creatures of the Constitution, must remember this promise in their fundamental role and forget it at their peril, for to do so will be a betrayal of chose high values and goals which this nation set for itself in its objective Resolution and whose elaborate summation appears in Part IV of the Paramount Parchment. The history of our country's struggle for independence was the story of a battle between the forces of socio-economic exploitation and the masses of deprived people of varying degrees and the Constitution sets the new sights of the nation.....Once we grasp the dharma of the Constitution, the new orientation of the karma of adjudication becomes clear. Our founding fathers, aware of our social realities, forged our fighting faith and integrating justice in its social, economic and political aspects. While contemplating the meaning of the Articles of the Organic Law, the Supreme Court shall not disown Social Justice."

121. Oliver Wendlle Holmes said: "the life of law has been logical; it has been experience". It may be added that 'the life of law is not just logic or experience. The life of law is renewable based on experience and logic, which adapted law to the new social realty'. Recognizing this fact, the aforesaid provisions of the Constitution are required to be given new and dynamic meaning with the inclusion of rights of TGs as well. In this process, the first and foremost right is to recognize TGs as 'third gender' in law as well. This is a recognition of their right of equality enshrined in Art.14 as well as their human right to life with dignity, which is the mandate of the Art.21 of the Constitution. This interpretation is in consonance with new social needs. By doing so, this Court is only bridging the gap between the law and life and that is the primary role of the Court in a democracy. It only amounts to giving purposive interpretation to the aforesaid provisions of the Constitution so that it can adapt to the changes in realty. Law without purpose has no raison d'etre. The purpose of law is the evolution of a happy society. As Justice Iyer has aptly put:

> "The purpose of law is the establishment of the welfare of society "and a society whose members enjoy welfare and happiness may be described as a just society. It is a negation of > justice to say that some members, some groups, some minorities, some individuals do not have welfare: on the other hand they suffer from ill-fare. So it is axiomatic that law, if it is to fulfil itself, must produce a contented, dynamic society which is at once meting out justice to its members."

122. It is now very well recognized that the Constitution is a living character; its interpretation must be dynamic. It must be understood in a way that intricate and advances modern realty. The judiciary is the guardian of the Constitution and by ensuring to grant legitimate right that is due to TGs, we are simply protecting the Constitution and the democracy inasmuch as judicial protection and democracy in general and of human rights in particular is a characteristic of our vibrant democracy.

123. As we have pointed out above, our Constitution inheres liberal and substantive democracy with rule of law as an important and fundamental pillar. It has its own internal morality based on dignity and equality of all human beings. Rule of law demands protection of individual human rights. Such rights are to be guaranteed to each and every human being. These TGs, even though insignificant in numbers, are still human beings and therefore they have every right to enjoy their human rights.

124. In National Human Rights Commission vs. State of Arunachal Pradesh (AIR 1996 SC 1234), This Court observed:

> "We are a country governed by the Rule of Law. Our Constitution confers certain rights on every human being and certain other rights on citizens. Every person is entitled to equality before the law and equal protection of the laws."

125. The rule of law is not merely public order. The rule of law is social justice based on public order. The law exists to ensure proper social life. Social life, however, is not a goal in itself but a means to allow the individual to life in dignity and development himself. The human being and human rights underlie this substantive perception of the rule of law, with a proper balance among the different rights and between human rights and the proper needs of society. The substantive rule of law "is the rule of proper law, which balances the needs of society and the individual." This is the rule of law that strikes a balance between society's need for political independence, social equality, economic development, and internal order, on the one hand, and the needs of the individual, his personal liberty, and his human dignity on the other. It is the duty of the Court to protect this rich concept of the rule of law.

126. By recognizing TGs as third gender, this Court is not only upholding the rule of law but also advancing justice to the class, so far deprived of their legitimate natural and constitutional rights. It is, therefore, the only just solution which ensures justice not only to TGs but also justice to the society as well. Social justice does not mean equality before law in papers but to translate the spirit of the Constitution, enshrined in the Preamble, the Fundamental Rights and the Directive Principles of State Policy into action, whose arms are long enough to bring within its reach and embrace this right of recognition to the TGs which legitimately belongs to them.

127. Aristotle opined that treating all equal things equal and all unequal things unequal amounts to justice. Kant was of the view that at the basis of all conceptions of justice, no matter which culture or religion has inspired them, lies the golden rule that you should treat others as you would want everybody to treat everybody else, including yourself. When Locke conceived of individual liberties, the individuals he had in mind were independently rich males. Similarly, Kant thought of economically self-sufficient males as the only possible citizens of a liberal democratic state. These theories may not be relevant in today's context as it is perceived that the bias of their perspective is all too obvious to us. In post-traditional liberal democratic theories of justice, the background assumption is that humans have equal value and should, therefore, be treated as equal, as well as by equal laws. This can be described as 'Reflective Equilibrium'. The method of Reflective Equilibrium was first introduced by Nelson Goodman in 'Fact, Fiction and Forecast' (1955). However, it is John Rawls who elaborated this method of Reflective Equilibrium by introducing the conception of 'Justice as Fairness'. In his 'Theory of Justice', Rawls has proposed a model of just institutions for democratic societies. Herein he draws on certain pre-theoretical elementary moral beliefs ('considered judgments'), which he assumes most members of democratic societies would accept. "[Justice as fairness [….] tries to draw solely upon basic intuitive ideas that are embedded in the political institutions of a constitutional democratic regime and the public traditions of their interpretations. Justice as fairness is a political conception in part because it starts from within a certain political tradition. Based on this preliminary understanding of just institutions in a democratic society, Rawls aims at a set of universalistic rules with the help of which the justice of present formal and informal institutions can be assessed. The ensuing conception of justice is called 'justice as fairness'. When we combine Rawls's notion of Justice as Fairness with the notions of Distributive Justice, to which Noble Laureate Prof. Amartya Sen has also subscribed, we get jurisprudential basis for doing justice to the Vulnerable Groups which definitely include TGs. Once it is accepted that the TGs are also part of vulnerable groups and marginalized section of the society, we are only bringing them within the fold of aforesaid rights recognized in respect of other classes falling in the marginalized group. This is the minimum riposte in an attempt to assuage the insult and injury suffered by them so far as to pave way for fast tracking the realization of their human rights.

128. The aforesaid, thus, are my reasons for treating TGs as 'third gender' for the purposes of safeguarding and enforcing appropriately their rights guaranteed under the Constitution. These are my reasons in support of our Constitution to the two issues in these petitions.

.....J.
(A.K.Sikri)

129. We, therefore, declare:

(1) Hijras, Eunuchs, apart from binary gender, be treated as "third gender" for the purpose of safeguarding their rights under Part III of our Constitution and the laws made by the Parliament and the State Legislature.

(2) Transgender persons' right to decide their self-identified gender is also upheld and the Centre and State Governments are directed to grant legal recognition of their gender identity such as male, female or as third gender.

(3) We direct the Centre and the State Governments to take steps to treat them as socially and educationally backward classes of citizens and extend all kinds of reservation in cases of admission in educational institutions and for public appointments.

(4) Centre and State Governments are directed to operate separate HIV Sero-survellance Centres since Hijras/ Transgenders face several sexual health issues.

(5) Centre and State Governments should seriously address the problems being faced by Hijras/Transgenders such as fear, shame, gender dysphoria, social pressure, depression, suicidal tendencies, social stigma, etc. and any insistence for SRS for declaring one's gender is immoral and illegal.

(6) Centre and State Governments should take proper measures to provide medical care to TGs in the hospitals and also provide them separate public toilets and other facilities.

(7) Centre and State Governments should also take steps for framing various social welfare schemes for their betterment.

(8) Centre and State Governments should take steps to create public awareness so that TGs will feel that they are also part and parcel of the social life and be not treated as untouchables.

(9) Centre and the State Governments should also take measures to regain their respect and place in the society which once they enjoyed in our cultural and social life.

130. We are informed an Expert Committee has already been constituted to make an in-depth study of the problems faced by the Transgender community and suggest measures that can be taken by the Government to ameliorate their problems and to submit its report with recommendations within three months of its constitution. Let the recommendations be examined based on the legal declaration made in this Judgment and implemented within six months.

131. Writ Petitions are, accordingly, allowed, as above.

.....J.
(K.S. Radhakrishnan)

.....J.
(A.K. Sikri)

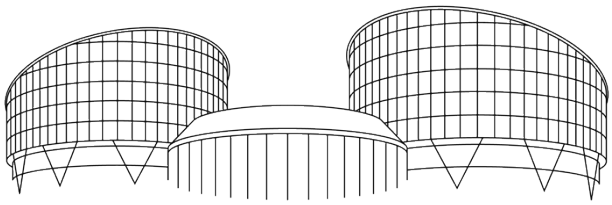
New Delhi,
April 15, 2014.



EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS
COUR EUROPÉENNE DES DROITS DE L'HOMME

THIRD SECTION

CASE OF B.S. v. SPAIN

(Application no. 47159/08)

JUDGMENT
[Extracts]

STRASBOURG

24 July 2012

FINAL

24/10/2012

This judgment has become final under Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

.

In the case of B.S. v. Spain,

The European Court of Human Rights (Third Section), sitting as a Chamber composed of:

Josep Casadevall, President,
Corneliu Bîrsan,
Alvina Gyulumyan,
Egbert Myjer,
Ineta Ziemele,
Luis López Guerra,
Nona Tsotsoria, judges, and Marialena Tsirli, Section Deputy Registrar,

Having deliberated in private on 3 July 2012,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on that date:

PROCEDURE

1. The case originated in an application (no. 47159/08) against the Kingdom of Spain lodged with the Court under Article 34 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by Ms B.S. ("the applicant"), on 29 September 2008.

2. The President of the Chamber decided, of his own motion, not to disclose the identity of the applicant (Rule 47 § 3 of the Rules of Court).

3. The applicant was represented by Ms V. Waisman, a lawyer practising in Madrid. The Spanish Government ("the Government") were represented by their Agent, Mr F. Irurzun Montoro, State Counsel.

4. On 25 May 2010 the Court decided to give notice of the application to the Government. It was also decided that the Chamber would rule on the admissibility and merits at the same time (Article 29 § 1 of the Convention).

5. Both the applicant and the Government filed written observations. Observations were also received from the European Social Research Unit (ESRH) at the Research Group on Exclusion and Social Control (GRECS) at the University of Barcelona and from the AIRE Centre, which had been given leave by the President to take part in the proceedings as third-party interveners (Article 36 § 2 of the Convention and Rule 44 § 2).

THE FACTS

I. THE CIRCUMSTANCES OF THE CASE

6. The applicant, who is of Nigerian origin, was born in 1977 and has been lawfully resident in Spain since 2003.

A. 1st episode: events of 15 and 21 July 2005

7. On 15 July 2005 the applicant was on the public highway in the El Arenal district near Palma de Mallorca, where she worked as a prostitute, when two officers of the national police force asked to see her identity and then ordered her to leave the premises, which she did immediately.

8. The applicant alleged that later the same day, after returning to the same place, she had noticed the same police officers coming towards her and had attempted to flee. The police officers had caught up with her, struck her on the left thigh and on her wrists with a truncheon and again demanded to see her identity papers. She alleged that during the altercation, which had been witnessed by a number of people including two taxi drivers and the security guards of a nearby discotheque, one of the police officers had insulted her, saying things like "get out of here you black whore". She was released after presenting her papers to the police officers.

9. Again according to the applicant, on 21 July 2005 the same police officers stopped her again and one of them hit her on the left hand with his truncheon.

10. That day the applicant lodged a formal verbal complaint with Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 8 and went to hospital to have her injuries treated. The doctors observed inflammation and mild bruising of the left hand.

11. The file was allocated to Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9, who decided to open a judicial investigation and requested an incident report from the police headquarters. In his report of 11 October 2005 the chief of police of the Balearic Islands explained that police patrols were common in the district concerned on account of the numerous complaints of theft or physical attacks regularly received from the local residents and the resulting damage done to the district's image. He added that foreign female citizens present in the area often attempted to escape from the police because the latter's presence hindered them in their work. In the present case the applicant had attempted to avoid inspection by the police but had been stopped by the officers, who had asked her to show her papers without at any time making any humiliating remarks or using physical force. With regard to the identity of the officers, the head of police indicated that the ones who had stopped and questioned the applicant the first time were from the patrol formed by the police officers Rayo 98 and Rayo 93 (code names given to the officers). Contrary to the applicant's assertions, those who had stopped her on 21 July 2005 belonged to a different patrol, called Luna 10.

12. In a decision of 17 October 2005 Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9 issued a provisional discharge order and decided to discontinue the proceedings on the ground that there was insufficient evidence that an offence had been committed.

13. That decision was served on the applicant or her representative on 23 April 2007, at the latter's request.

14. The applicant applied to Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9 to have the decision reversed, and subsequently appealed. She complained of the discriminatory attitude of the police officers and requested that various evidence-gathering measures be taken, such as identification of the officers in question and taking witness statements from the persons who had been present during the incidents. In a decision of 10 June 2007, investigating judge no. 9 refused to reverse his decision on the grounds that the applicant's allegations had not been corroborated by objective evidence in the file. The judge observed that > "the medical report [provided by the applicant] contains no date and, in any event ... mentions only inflammation and bruising of the hand, with no mention of any injury to the thigh.

>
> [The facts submitted] merely show that the applicant repeatedly failed to obey police orders given in the course of their duties, designed to prevent the shameful spectacle of prostitution on the public highway."

15. An appeal by the applicant was examined by the Balearic Islands Audiencia Provincial, which gave a decision on 16 October 2007 allowing the appeal in part, setting aside the discharge order and ordering proceedings for a minor criminal offence to be instituted before the investigating judge against the two police officers, who had been identified on the basis of the information contained in the report drawn up by the police headquarters.

16. In the context of those proceedings the applicant asked to be able to identify the officers through a two-way mirror. Her request was rejected on the grounds that this was an unreliable method of identification given the length of time that had already elapsed since the incidents and the fact that the officers in question had been wearing helmets throughout, as the applicant had acknowledged. No evidence against the accused was taken during the trial.

17. On 11 March 2008 investigating judge no. 9 gave judgment at the end of a public hearing during which evidence was heard from the police officers charged, who were not formally identified by the applicant. In his judgment the judge observed that during the judicial investigation an incident report had been requested from the police headquarters according to which the officers involved had stated that no incident had occurred when they had stopped and questioned the applicant. The judge drew attention to the fact that the medical report provided by the applicant did not specify the date on which it had been drawn up. Furthermore, the findings in the report were not conclusive as to the cause of the injuries. Lastly, the judge reproduced verbatim the grounds of the decision of 10 June 2007 relating to the applicant's conduct and the purpose of the intervention by the police and concluded that her allegations were not objectively corroborated. In the light of those arguments, the judge acquitted the police officers.

18. The applicant appealed. She challenged the refusal to allow her to identify the perpetrators through a two-way mirror and criticised the fact that the only investigative measure taken by the investigating judge in response to her complaint had been to request a report from the police headquarters.

19. In a judgment of 6 April 2009, the Palma de Mallorca Audiencia Provincial dismissed her appeal and upheld the investigating judge's judgment. It pointed out that the right to use a range of evidence-gathering measures did not include the right to have each and every proposed measure accepted by a court. In the instant case identification through a two-way mirror would not have added anything to the evidence on the file.

20. Relying on Articles 14 (prohibition of discrimination), 15 (protection of physical integrity) and 24 (right to a fair trial) of the Constitution, the applicant lodged an amparo appeal with the Constitutional Court. In a decision of 22 December 2009, the Constitutional Court dismissed the appeal on grounds of a lack of constitutional basis for the complaints raised.

B. 2nd episode: events of 23 July 2005

21. The applicant was stopped and questioned again on 23 July 2005. On the same day she went to the casualty department of a public medical centre, where the doctor observed abdominal pain and bruising on the hand and knee.

22. On 25 July 2005 she lodged a criminal complaint with Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 2, alleging that one of the police officers had struck her on the hand and knee with a truncheon and that the officers had singled her out on account of her racial origin and had not stopped and questioned other women carrying on the same activity. She also stated that she had subsequently been taken to the police station, where she had refused to sign a statement drawn up by the police saying that she admitted having resisted police orders. Referring to the incidents that had occurred during the first episode, the applicant requested the removal of the police officer who had assaulted her and that her complaint be joined to the one previously lodged with investigating judge no. 8. Neither of her requests was granted.

23. The case was allocated to Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 11, who decided to open a judicial investigation. The applicant requested certain evidence-gathering measures, including obtaining from the police the identification numbers of the officers who had been on duty on 15 and 23 July. In the alternative, should that information not permit identification of the police officers responsible, the applicant requested that all the police officers who had patrolled the area during those days be summoned so that they could be identified through a two-way mirror. Her request was rejected.

24. In the course of the judicial investigation, investigating judge no. 11 requested an incident report from the police headquarters.

25. A report by the Balearic Islands chief of police dated 28 December 2005 explained, firstly, that the applicant had admitted working as a prostitute in the area in question, which was an activity that had given rise to numerous complaints from local residents. In that connection he considered that the sole purpose of the applicant's complaints (including the one of 15 July) had been to allow her to pursue her occupation unhindered by the police. With regard to the identity of the officers in question, the chief of police observed that the computer records had not registered any intervention on 23 July; only those of 15 and 21 July had been recorded in respect of that area.

26. On 22 February 2006 investigating judge no.11 issued a provisional discharge order and decided to discontinue the proceedings on the grounds that there was insufficient evidence that an offence had been committed.

27. The applicant sought to have that decision reversed by the judge and subsequently appealed. The judge dismissed her request by a decision of 31 July 2006. Subsequently, the Palma de Mallorca Audiencia Provincial dismissed her appeal on 7 March 2007. The Audiencia referred both to the report of the police headquarters in which there was no record of an intervention by the police on the alleged date and the statements in the report regarding the applicant's true motives in lodging her complaints. It also considered that the medical report supplied by the applicant did not enable the cause of the injuries to be unequivocally established.

28. Relying on Articles 10 (right to dignity), 14 (prohibition of discrimination), 15 (right to physical and mental integrity) and 24 (right to a fair trial) of the Constitution, the applicant lodged an amparo appeal with the Constitutional Court. In a decision of 14 April 2008, the Constitutional Court dismissed the appeal on grounds of a lack of constitutional basis for the complaints raised.

...

THE LAW

I. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 3 OF THE CONVENTION

29. The applicant complained, firstly, that the national police had both verbally and physically abused her when they had stopped and questioned her. She alleged that she had been discriminated against on account of her skin colour and her gender, whereas other women with a "European phenotype" carrying on the same activity in the same area had not been approached by police. The applicant also complained about the language used by Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9, who, in his decision of 10 June 2007, had referred to the "shameful spectacle of prostitution on the public highway". Relying on the provisions of Article 3, the applicant alleged that the domestic courts' investigation of the events had been inadequate.

30. The provisions relied on are worded as follows:

Article 3

"No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment."

Article 14

"The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

...

B. The merits

1. Effectiveness of the investigations carried out by the national authorities

a) The parties' submissions

i. The Government

31. The Government disputed, at the outset, the seriousness of the injuries sustained by the applicant and pointed out that their cause had not been proved.

32. The Government also submitted that the police interventions in the area in question had not in any way targeted the applicant personally or discriminated against her, but had been preventive security measures designed to respond to public alarm caused by prostitution and to combat networks operating in the Balearic Islands which exploited immigrant women, in particular in the El Arenal district in which the applicant carried on her activity. The Ministry of the Interior had already implemented measures to combat such networks under Institutional Law no. 1/1992 on the protection of urban security. The Government observed in that connection that whilst prostitution was not in itself a criminal offence in Spain, forced prostitution was an offence under the Criminal Code.

33. With regard to the incidents of 15 and 21 July 2005, the Government noted that the applicant's allegations had been the subject of a judicial investigation by Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9, during which the only investigative measure requested by the applicant had been an identity parade of the police officers behind a two-way mirror. Besides the fact that the applicant had not lodged a complaint against the officers, the rejection of her request was justified, in the Government's submission, on the grounds that the officers had already been identified by the police authorities. Those proceedings had been concluded by the judgment of 11 March 2008, delivered after a public hearing, acquitting the officers in question.

34. With regard to the second episode – of 23 July 2005 – the Government observed that this had been examined by Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 11. After assessing the police and medical reports provided, the judge had decided to discontinue the proceedings for want of sufficient evidence. That decision had been upheld by the Audiencia Provincial.

35. The Government pointed out that the procedural obligation imposed on the States with regard to Article 3 of the Convention was an obligation of means and not of result. In their submission, the investigative procedures brought before the two investigating judges were sufficient to consider that the Spanish State had fulfilled its obligations, irrespective of the fact that the police officers were ultimately not convicted.

ii. The applicant

36. The applicant considered that the manner in which the investigation had been carried out before the domestic courts amounted to a breach of the State's procedural obligations under Article 3. In her submission, the courts had not adequately dealt with her request for certain investigative measures regarding the incidents she had alleged, such as an identity parade of the officers behind a two-way mirror which would have enabled her to recognise the police officers involved. The applicant complained that the State shifted the obligation to investigate on to her and imposed the burden of proving the alleged offence on her, whereas according to the Strasbourg Court's case-law, it was incumbent on the State to prove that particular treatment was not discriminatory.

37. The applicant added that she had not lodged a complaint against the police officers who had appeared before the courts because they were not the officers who had stopped and questioned her; this showed that the investigation had been ineffective as it had not enabled the officers responsible to be identified and, if appropriate, punished. In that connection she complained that she had not been informed of the means used to identify the officers in question. Further confirmation of the lack of an effective investigation could be seen in the fact that the only measure taken by the domestic courts to identify the perpetrators had been a request for a report from the Balearic Islands chief of police, who was the immediate superior of the persons involved. That had clearly been insufficient.

38. Lastly, the applicant pointed out that the United Nations Human Rights Committee had already found a violation by Spain on grounds of discrimination, which was proof that discrimination against immigrant black women was a structural problem in the country. In the present case she considered that the attitude and conduct of both the police and the courts had clearly been motivated by their prejudices and complained about the comments of Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9, which she regarded as clearly discriminatory in their reference to the "shameful spectacle of prostitution" and to the fact that the applicant's complaint was based on "fallacious" grounds in that her conduct had merely reflected her repeated failure to obey orders given by the police in the course of their duties.

b) The Court's assessment

39. The Court considers that where an individual makes a credible assertion that he has suffered treatment infringing Article 3 at the hands of the police or other similar agents of the State, that provision, read in conjunction with the State's general duty under Article 1 of the Convention to "secure to everyone within their jurisdiction the rights and freedoms defined in ... [the] Convention", requires by implication that there should be an effective official investigation. Such an investigation, as with one under Article 2, should be capable of leading to the identification and punishment of those responsible (see, regarding Article 2 of the Convention, McCann and Others v. the United Kingdom, 27 September 1995, § 161, Series A no. 324; Kaya v. Turkey, 19 February 1998, § 86, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1998-I; Yasa v. Turkey, 2 September 1998, § 98, Reports 1998-VI; and Dikme v. Turkey, no. 20869/92, § 101, ECHR 2000-VIII). Otherwise, the general legal prohibition of torture and inhuman and degrading treatment and punishment would, despite its fundamental importance, be ineffective in practice and it would be possible in some cases for agents of the State to abuse the rights of those within their control with virtual impunity (see Assenov and Others v. Bulgaria, 28 October 1998, § 102, Reports 1998-VIII).

40. The Court considers it necessary to rule first on the question of the applicability of Article 3 of the Convention to the facts of the case and in particular to address the Government's argument debating the severity of the injuries in the present case. The Court reiterates that the assessment of the minimum level of severity is, in the nature of things, relative; it depends on all the circumstances of the case, such as the duration of the treatment, its physical or mental effects and, in some instances, the sex, age and state of health of the victim (see Labita v. Italy [GC], no. 26772/95, § 120, ECHR 2000-IV). In that connection the Court notes that the presence of injuries was recorded on the applicant's person. The medical reports revealed the presence of a number of bruises and inflammation of the hands and knee. Those findings are consistent with the allegations made by the applicant to the police in her complaints of 21 and 23 July 2005. Added to this are the alleged racist and degrading remarks made to her. Accordingly, the Court is of the view that the conduct in question falls within the scope of Article 3 of the Convention.

41. With regard to the investigation procedure before the domestic courts, the Court notes that in the present case the applicant complained twice of having suffered ill-treatment: firstly on 21 July 2005, when she lodged a formal verbal complaint with Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 8, and secondly on 25 July 2005, when she complained to Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 2 of being hit on the hand and knee with a truncheon by one of the police officers during the incidents of 23 July 2005.

42. The Court observes that the applicant's complaints were indeed investigated. It remains to be assessed whether the investigation was carried out diligently and whether it was "effective". With regard to the investigations carried out by the authorities following the allegations of ill-treatment, the Court observes that, according to the information provided, the applicant requested a number of evidence-gathering measures, namely, organisation of an identity parade of the officers responsible using a two-way mirror or obtaining from the police the identification numbers of the officers who had been on duty on 15 and 23 July. When examining those requests, investigating judges nos. 9 and 11, who had jurisdiction to examine the criminal complaints lodged by the applicant, merely requested incident reports from the police headquarters and based themselves exclusively on the report by the headquarters when issuing a discharge order. The Court observes in that connection that the report had been prepared by the Balearic Islands chief of police, who was the immediate superior of the officers in question.

43. The Court also refers to the proceedings for a minor criminal offence instituted before Palma de Mallorca investigating judge no. 9 against the two police officers who, according to the information contained in the report of the police headquarters, had stopped and questioned the applicant on 15 and 21 July 2005 (see paragraphs 14 and 15 above). In that connection it notes that during the public hearing on 11 March 2008 the defendants were not formally identified by the applicant. In the Court's view, that hearing cannot be regarded as sufficient to satisfy the requirements of Article 3 of the Convention, as it did not succeed in identifying the officers involved. The domestic courts dismissed the applicant's requests for an identity parade to be held behind a two-way mirror on account of the time that had elapsed since the altercations and the fact that it would be very difficult to recognise the officers because they had been wearing helmets at the time. In the Court's opinion, the applicant's request was not a superfluous one in identifying the police involved in the incidents and establishing who was responsible, as required by the Court's case-law (see, among other authorities, Krastanov v. Bulgaria, no. 50222/99, § 48, 30 September 2004; Çamdereli v. Turkey, no. 28433/02, §§ 28-29, 17 July 2008; and Vladimir Romanov v. Russia, no. 41461/02, §§ 79 and 81, 24 July 2008)

44. The Court notes, further, that the medical reports provided by the applicant refer to inflammation and bruising on the left hand following the first incident and to abdominal pain and bruising to the hand and knee regarding the incident of 23 July 2005. Neither investigating judge no. 9 nor no. 11 nor the Audiencia Provincial investigated that point further, but simply disregarded the reports on the grounds that they were undated or not conclusive as to the cause of the injuries. The Court considers that the information contained in those reports called for investigative measures to be carried out by the judicial authorities.

45. Furthermore, the investigating judges did not take any measures to identify or hear evidence from witnesses who had been present during the altercations; nor did they investigate the applicant's allegations regarding her transfer to the police station, where the police had allegedly attempted to make her sign a statement admitting that she had resisted orders.

46. The Court also considers that the Government's submission that the incidents had taken place in the context of the implementation of preventive measures designed to combat networks trafficking in immigrant women in the area cannot justify treatment contrary to Article 3 of the Convention.

47. In the light of the foregoing factors, the Court is not satisfied that the investigations carried out in the present case were sufficiently thorough and effective to satisfy the aforementioned requirements of Article 3. In conclusion, the Court considers that there has been a violation of Article 3 of the Convention under its procedural limb.

...

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 14 TAKEN IN CONJUNCTION WITH ARTICLE 3 OF THE CONVENTION

48. The applicant also alleged that she had been discriminated against as evidenced by the racist remarks made by the police officers, namely, "get out of here you black whore". She submitted that other women in the same area carrying on the same activity but with a "European phenotype" had not been stopped by the police. Article 14 of the Convention provides:

> "The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in [the] Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status."

49. The Government disputed that submission.

A. Admissibility

50. The Court observes that the complaint is not manifestly ill-founded within the meaning of Article 35 § 3 of the Convention. It finds, moreover, that no other ground for declaring it inadmissible has been established. It must therefore be declared admissible.

B. Merits

1. The parties' submissions

a) The Government

51. The Government disputed that submission, arguing that the applicant had not provided a shred of evidence to support her allegation that she had been discriminated against on account of being a prostitute or the fact that she was of African origin. They observed that the police operations in the district in question targeted, without distinction, all prostitutes working in the area, extending equally to women of European origin.

b) The applicant

52. The applicant, for her part, submitted that her position as a black woman working as a prostitute made her particularly vulnerable to discriminatory attacks and that those factors could not be considered separately but should be taken into account in their entirety, their interaction being essential for an examination of the facts of the case.

53. In the applicant's submission, it was clear that the repeated inspections to which she had been subjected and the racist and sexist insults made against her and the response of the domestic courts to her complaints proved that there had been discrimination and a failure by the State to comply with its positive obligation to carry out an effective investigation.

54. The applicant considered that the State had exercised its public-security powers improperly and degradingly and that their actions had been disproportionate in nature. Both their actions and the decisions of the domestic courts had been discriminatory.

55. In conclusion, the applicant considered that she had been the victim of structural problems of discrimination present in the Spanish judicial system, as a result of which there had been no effective investigation of her complaints.

c) The third-party interveners

56. The European Social Research Unit (ESRH) at the Research Group on Exclusion and Social Control (GRECS) at the University of Barcelona referred to studies that had been carried out into intersectional discrimination, that is, discrimination based on several different grounds such as race, gender or social origin. Those studies showed that an analysis of the facts taking account of only one of the grounds was approximate and failed to reflect the reality of the situation. The ESRH gave examples of a number of initiatives taken at European level to obtain recognition of multiple discrimination; however, a binding legal text – though strongly recommended – did not yet exist.

57. The AIRE Centre, for their part, invited the Court to recognise the phenomenon of intersectional discrimination, which required a multiple-grounds approach that did not examine each factor separately. It gave an overview of the innovations in this area in the European Union and in various States such as the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada.

2. The Court's assessment

58. The Court considers that where the State authorities investigate violent incidents, they have an additional obligation to take all reasonable measures to identify whether there were racist motives and to establish whether or not ethnic hatred or prejudice may have played a role in the events. Admittedly, proving racial motivation will often be extremely difficult in practice. The respondent State's obligation to investigate possible racist overtones to a violent act is an obligation to use best endeavours and not absolute. The authorities must do what is reasonable in the circumstances to collect and secure the evidence, explore all practical means of discovering the truth and deliver fully reasoned, impartial and objective decisions, without omitting suspicious facts that may be indicative of racially induced violence (see, mutatis mutandis, Nachova and Others v. Bulgaria [GC], nos. 43577/98 and 43579/98, § 160, ECHR 2005-VII). Lastly, the Court reiterates that the onus is on the Government to produce evidence establishing facts that cast doubt on the victim's account (see Turan Cakir v. Belgium, no. 44256/06, § 54, 10 March 2009, and Sonkaya v. Turkey, no. 11261/03, § 25, 12 February 2008).

59. Furthermore, the authorities' duty to investigate the existence of a possible link between racist attitudes and an act of violence is an aspect of their procedural obligations arising under Article 3 of the Convention, but may also be seen as implicit in their responsibilities under Article 14 of the Convention to secure respect without discrimination for the fundamental value enshrined in Article 3. Owing to the interplay of the two provisions, issues such as those in the present case may fall to be examined under one of the two provisions only, with no separate issue arising under the other, or may require examination under both Articles. This is a question to be decided in each case on its facts and depending on the nature of the allegations made (see Nachova and Others, cited above, § 161).

60. In the instant case the Court has already observed that the Spanish authorities violated Article 3 of the Convention by failing to carry out an effective investigation into the incident. It considers that it must examine separately the complaint that there was also a failure to investigate a possible causal link between the alleged racist attitudes and the violent acts allegedly perpetrated by the police against the applicant (see, mutatis mutandis, Turan Cakir v. Belgium, cited above, § 79).

61. The Court notes that in her complaints of 21 and 25 July 2005 the applicant mentioned the racist remarks allegedly made to her by the police, such as "get out of here you black whore", and submitted that the officers had not stopped and questioned other women carrying on the same activity but having a "European phenotype". Those submissions were not examined by the courts dealing with the case, which merely adopted the contents of the reports by the Balearic Islands chief of police without carrying out a more thorough investigation into the alleged racist attitudes.

62. In the light of the evidence submitted in the present case, the Court considers that the decisions made by the domestic courts failed to take account of the applicant's particular vulnerability inherent in her position as an African woman working as a prostitute. The authorities thus failed to comply with their duty under Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 3 to take all possible steps to ascertain whether or not a discriminatory attitude might have played a role in the events.

63. There has accordingly been a violation of Article 14 of the Convention taken in conjunction with Article 3 in its procedural aspect.

...

IV. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 41 OF THE CONVENTION

64. Article 41 of the Convention provides:

> "If the Court finds that there has been a violation of the Convention or the Protocols thereto, and if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made, the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. Damage

65. The applicant claimed 30,000 euros (EUR) for the non-pecuniary damage which she had sustained as a result of being humiliated by the ill-treatment she had complained of. The applicant also asked the Court to compel the Government to draw up a check-list that the domestic courts would be obliged to follow in the event of allegations of discrimination such as hers. Lastly, in accordance with the principle of restitutio in integrum, she requested that the proceedings be reopened before the Spanish courts.

66. The Government challenged that claim on the grounds that a finding of a violation was sufficient. With regard to drawing up a check-list, the Government reiterated that, in accordance with the Court's case-law, the member States were free to choose the measures they considered the most appropriate to redress a finding of a violation.

67. With regard to the specific measures requested by the applicant, the Court reiterates that its judgments are essentially declaratory in nature and that, in general, it is primarily for the State concerned to choose, subject to supervision by the Committee of Ministers, the means to be used in its domestic legal order in order to discharge its obligation under Article 46 of the Convention (see, among other authorities, Assanidze v. Georgia [GC], no. 71503/01, § 202, ECHR 2004-II; Scozzari and Giunta v. Italy [GC], nos. 39221/98 and 41963/98, § 249, ECHR 2000-VIII; and Brumărescu v. Romania (just satisfaction) [GC], no. 28342/95, § 20, ECHR 2001). The Court considers that the present case is not one of those in which, exceptionally, with a view to helping the respondent State to fulfil its obligations under Article 46, the Court will seek to indicate the type of measure that might be taken in order to put an end to a systemic situation it has found to exist and in which it may propose various options and leave the choice of measure and its implementation to the discretion of the State concerned (see Broniowski v. Poland [GC], no. 31443/96, § 194, ECHR 2004-V).

68. With regard to the claim in respect of non-pecuniary damage, the Court considers that, having regard to the violations found in the present case, the applicant should be awarded compensation for non-pecuniary damage. Ruling on an equitable basis, as required by Article 41 of the Convention, it decides to award the sum claimed, namely, EUR 30,000.

B. Costs and expenses

69. The applicant also claimed EUR 31,840.50 for the total costs and expenses incurred before the domestic courts and before the Court. The supporting documents submitted accounted for only EUR 1,840.50.

70. The Government asked the Court to reject the claim.

71. According to the Court's case-law, an award can be made in respect of costs and expenses only in so far as they have been actually and necessarily incurred by the applicant and are reasonable as to quantum. In the instant case, and having regard to the documents available to it and to its case-law, the Court considers the sum of EUR 1,840.50 in respect of all costs and expenses to be reasonable and awards that amount to the applicant.

C. Default interest

72. The Court considers it appropriate that the default interest rate should be based on the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank, to which should be added three percentage points.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT UNANIMOUSLY

...

2. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 3 under its procedural limb;

...

4. Holds that there has been a violation of Article 14 taken in conjunction with Article 3 of the Convention;

...

6. Holds

(a) that the respondent State is to pay the applicant, within three months from the date on which the judgment becomes final in accordance with Article 44 § 2 of the Convention, the following amounts:

(i) EUR 30,000. (thirty thousand euros), plus any tax that may be chargeable, in respect of non-pecuniary damage;

(ii) EUR 1,840.50 (one thousand eight hundred and forty euros and fifty centimes), plus any tax that may be chargeable to the applicant, in respect of costs and expenses;

(b) that from the expiry of the above-mentioned three months until settlement simple interest shall be payable on the above amounts at a rate equal to the marginal lending rate of the European Central Bank during the default period plus three percentage points;

7. Dismisses the remainder of the applicant's claim for just satisfaction.

Done in French, and notified in writing on 24 July 2012, pursuant to Rule 77 §§ 2 and 3 of the Rules of Court.

Marielena Tsirli
Deputy Registrar

Josep Casadevall
President

Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence Against Women of Color

Kimberle Crenshaw*

INTRODUCTION

Over the last two decades, women have organized against the almost routine violence that shapes their lives.[1] Drawing from the strength of shared experience, women have recognized that the political demands of millions speak more powerfully than the pleas of a few isolated voices. This politicization in turn has transformed the way we understand violence against women. For example, battering and rape, once seen as private (family matters) and aberrational (errant sexual aggression), are now largely recognized as part of a broad-scale system of domination that affects women as a class.[2] This process of recognizing as social and systemic what was for-

 Professor of Law, University of California, Los Angeles. B.A. Cornell University, 1981; J.D. Harvard Law School, 1984; LL.M. University of Wisconsin, 1985.

I am indebted to a great many people who have pushed this project along. For their kind assistance in facilitating my field research for this article, I wish to thank Maria Blanco, Margaret Cambrick, Joan Creer, Estelle Cheung, Nilda Rimonte and Fred Smith. I benefitted from the comments of Taunya Banks, Mark Barenberg, Darcy Calkins, Adrienne Davis, Gina Dent, Brent Edwards, Paul Gewirtz, Lani Guinier, Neil Gotanda, Joel Handler, Duncan Kennedy, Henry Monaghan, Elizabeth Schneider and Kendall Thomas. A very special thanks goes to Gary Peller and Richard Yarborough. Jayne Lee, Paula Puryear, Yancy Garrido, Eugenia Gifford and Leti Volpp provided valuable research assistance. I gratefully acknowledge the support of the Academic Senate of UCLA, Center for Afro-American Studies at UCLA, the Reed Foundation and Columbia Law School. Earlier versions of this article were presented to the Critical Race Theory Workshop and the Yale Legal Theory Workshop.

This article is dedicated to the memory of Denise Carty-Bennia and Mary Joe Frug.

1. Feminist academics and activists have played a central role in forwarding an ideological and institutional challenge to the practices that condone and perpetuate violence against women. See generally SUSAN BROWNMILLER, AGAINST OUR WILL: MEN, WOMEN AND RAPE (1975); LORENNE M.G. CLARK & DEBRA J. LEWIS, RAPE: THE PRICE OF COERCIVE SEXUALITY (1977); R. EMERSON DOBASH & RUSSELL DOBASH, VIOLENCE AGAINST WIVES: A CASE AGAINST THE PATRIARCHY (1979); NANCY GAGER & CATHLEEN SCHURR, SEXUAL ASSAULT: CONFRONTING RAPE IN AMERICA (1976); DIANA E.H. RUSSELL, THE POLITICS OF RAPE: THE VICTIM'S PERSPECTIVE (1974); ELIZABETH ANNE STANKO, INTIMATE INTRUSIONS: WOMEN'S EXPERIENCE OF MALE VIOLENCE (1985); LENORE E. WALKER, TERRIFYING LOVE: WHY BATTERED WOMEN KILL AND HOW SOCIETY RESPONDS (1989); LENORE E. WALKER, THE BATTERED WOMAN SYNDROME (1984); LENORE E. WALKER, THE BATTERED WOMAN (1979).

2. See, e.g., SUSAN SCHECHTER, WOMEN AND MALE VIOLENCE: THE VISIONS AND STRUGGLES OF THE BATTERED WOMEN'S MOVEMENT (1982) (arguing that battering is a means of maintaining women's subordinate position); S. BROWNMILLER, supra note 1 (arguing that rape is a merly perceived as isolated and individual has also characterized the identity politics of African Americans, other people of color, and gays and lesbians, among others. For all these groups, identity-based politics has been a source of strength, community, and intellectual development.

The embrace of identity politics, however, has been in tension with dominant conceptions of social justice. Race, gender, and other identity categories are most often treated in mainstream liberal discourse as vestiges of bias or domination—that is, as intrinsically negative frameworks in which social power works to exclude or marginalize those who are different. According to this understanding, our liberatory objective should be to empty such categories of any social significance. Yet implicit in certain strands of feminist and racial liberation movements, for example is the view that the social power in delineating difference need not be the power of domination; it can instead be the source of social empowerment and reconstruction.

The problem with identity politics is not that it fails to transcend difference, as some critics charge, but rather the opposite—that it frequently conflates or ignores intragroup differences. In the context of violence against women, this elision of difference in identity politics is problematic, fundamentally because the violence that many women experience is often shaped by other dimensions of their identities, such as race and class. Moreover, ignoring difference within groups contributes to tension among groups, another problem of identity politics that bears on efforts to politicize violence against women. Feminist efforts to politicize experiences of women and antiracist efforts to politicize experiences of people of color have frequently proceeded as though the issues and experiences they each detail occur on mutually exclusive terrains. Although racism and sexism readily intersect in the lives of real people, they seldom do in feminist and antiracist practices. And so, when the practices expound identity as woman or person of color as an either/or proposition, they relegate the identity of women of color to a location that resists telling.

My objective in this article is to advance the telling of that location by exploring the race and gender dimensions of violence against women of color.[3] Contemporary feminist and antiracist discourses have failed to con-patriarchal practice that subordinates women to men); Elizabeth Schneider, The Violence of Privacy, 23 CONN. L. REV. 973, 974 (1991) (discussing how "concepts of privacy permit, encourage and reinforce violence against women"); Susan Estrich, Rape, 95 YALE L.J. 1087 (1986) (analyzing rape law as one illustration of sexism in criminal law); see also CATHARINE A. MACKINNON, SEXUAL HARASSMENT OF WORKING WOMEN: A CASE OF SEX DISCRIMINATION 143-213 (1979) (arguing that sexual harassment should be redefined as sexual discrimination actionable under Title VII, rather than viewed as misplaced sexuality in the workplace).

3. This article arises out of and is inspired by two emerging scholarly discourses. The first is critical race theory. For a cross-section of what is now a substantial body of literature, see PATRICIA J. WILLIAMS, THE ALCHEMY OF RACE AND RIGHTS (1991); Robin D. Barnes, Race Consciousness: The Thematic Content of Racial Distinctiveness in Critical Race Scholarship, 103 HARV. L. REV. 1864 (1990); John O. Calmore, Critical Race Theory, Archie Shepp, and Fire Music: Securing an Authentic Intellectual Life in a Multicultural World, 65 S. CAL. L. REV. 2129 (1992); Anthony E. Cook, Beyond Critical Legal Studies: The Reconstructive Theology of Dr. Martin Luther King, 103 HARV. L. REV. 985 (1990); Kimberle Williams Crenshaw, Race, Reform and Retrenchment: Transformation and Legitimation in Antidiscrimination Law, 101 HARV. L. REV. 1331 (1988); Richard sider intersectional identities such as women of color.[4] Focusing on two dimensions of male violence against women—battering and rape—I consider how the experiences of women of color are frequently the product of intersecting patterns of racism and sexism,[5] and how these experiences tend not

---

Delgado, When a Story is Just a Story: Does Voice Really Matter?, 76 VA. L. REV. 95 (1990); Neil Gotanda, A Critique of "Our Constitution is Colorblind," 44 STAN. L. REV. 1 (1991) Mari J. Matsuda, Public Response to Racist Speech: Considering the Victim's Story, 87 MICH. L. REV. 2320 (1989); Charles R. Lawrence III, The Id, the Ego, and Equal Protection: Reckoning with Unconscious Racism, 39 STAN. L. REV. 317 (1987); Gerald Torres, Critical Race Theory: The Decline of the Universalist Ideal and the Hope of Plural Justice—Some Observations and Questions of an Emerging Phenomenon, 75 MINN. L. REV. 993 (1991). For a useful overview of critical race theory, see Calmore, supra, at 2160-2168.

A second, less formally linked body of legal scholarship investigates the connections between race and gender. See, e.g., Regina Austin, Sapphire Bound!, 1989 WIS. L. REV. 539; Crenshaw, supra; Angela P. Harris, Race and Essentialism in Feminist Legal Theory, 42 STAN. L. REV. 581 (1990); Marlee Kline, Race, Racism and Feminist Legal Theory, 12 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 115 (1989); Dorothy E. Roberts, Punishing Drug Addicts Who Have Babies: Women of Color, Equality and the Right of Privacy, 104 HARV. L. REV. 1419 (1991); Cathy Scarborough, Conceptualizing Black Women's Employment Experiences, 98 YALE L.J. 1457 (1989) (student author); Peggie R. Smith, Separate Identities: Black Women, Work and Title VII, 14 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 21 (1991); Judy Scales-Trent, Black Women and the Constitution: Finding Our Place, Asserting Our Rights, 24 HARV. C.R-C.L. L. REV. 9 (1989); Judith A. Winston, Mirror, Mirror on the Wall: Title VII, Section 1981, and the Intersection of Race and Gender in the Civil Rights Act of 1990, 79 CAL. L. REV. 775 (1991). This work in turn has been informed by a broader literature examining the interactions of race and gender in other contexts. See, e.g., PATRICIA HILL COLLINS, BLACK FEMINIST THOUGHT: KNOWLEDGE, CONSCIOUSNESS, AND THE POLITICS OF EMPOWERMENT (1990); ANGELA DAVIS, WOMEN, RACE AND CLASS (1981); BELL HOOKS, AIN'T I A WOMAN? BLACK WOMEN AND FEMINISM (1981); ELIZABETH V. SPELMAN, INESSENTIAL WOMAN: PROBLEMS OF EXCLUSION IN FEMINIST THOUGHT (1988); Frances Beale, Double Jeopardy: To Be Black and Female, in THE BLACK WOMAN 90 (Toni Cade ed. 1970); Kink-Kok Cheung, The Woman Warrior versus The Chinaman Pacific: Must a Chinese American Critic Choose between Feminism and Heroism?, in CONFLICTS IN FEMINISM 234 (Marianne Hirsch & Evelyn Fox Keller eds. 1990); Deborah H. King, Multiple Jeopardy, Multiple Consciousness: The Context of a Black Feminist Ideology, 14 SIGNS 42 (1988); Diane K. Lewis, A Response to Inequality: Black Women, Racism and Sexism, 3 SIGNS 339 (1977); Deborah E. McDowell, New Directions for Black Feminist Criticism, in THE NEW FEMINIST CRITICISM: ESSAYS ON WOMEN, LITERATURE AND THEORY 186 (Elaine Showalter ed. 1985); Valerie Smith, Black Feminist Theory and the Representation of the "Other", in CHANGING OUR OWN WORDS: ESSAYS ON CRITICISM, THEORY AND WRITING BY BLACK WOMEN 38 (Cheryl A. Wall ed. 1989).

4. Although the objective of this article is to describe the intersectional location of women of color and their marginalization within dominant resistance discourses, I do not mean to imply that the disempowerment of women of color is singularly or even primarily caused by feminist and antiracist theorists or activists. Indeed, I hope to dispell any such simplistic interpretations by capturing, at least in part, the way that prevailing structures of domination shape various discourses of resistance. As I have noted elsewhere, "People can only demand change in ways that reflect the logic of the institutions they are challenging. Demands for change that do not reflect . . . dominant ideology . . . will probably be ineffective." Crenshaw, supra note 3, at 1367. Although there are significant political and conceptual obstacles to moving against structures of domination with an intersectional sensibility, my point is that the effort to do so should be a central theoretical and political objective of both antiracism and feminism.

5. Although this article deals with violent assault perpetrated by men against women, women are also subject to violent assault by women. Violence among lesbians is a hidden but significant problem. One expert reported that in a study of 90 lesbian couples, roughly 46% of lesbians have been physically abused by their partners. Jane Garcia, The Cost of Escaping Domestic Violence: Fear of Treatment in a Largely Homophobic Society May Keep Lesbian Abuse Victims from Calling for Help, L.A. Times, May 6, 1991, at 2; see also NAMING THE VIOLENCE: SPEAKING OUT ABOUT LESIBIAN BATTERING (Kerry Lobel ed. 1986); Ruthann Robson, Lavender Bruises: Intralesbian Violence, Law and Lesbian Legal Theory, 20 GOLDEN GATE U.L. REV. 567 (1990). There are clear parallels between violence against women in the lesbian community and violence against women in to be represented within the discourses of either feminism or antiracism. Because of their intersectional identity as both women and of color within discourses that are shaped to respond to one or the other, women of color are marginalized within both.

In an earlier article, I used the concept of intersectionality to denote the various ways in which race and gender interact to shape the multiple dimensions of Black[6] women's employment experiences.[7] My objective there was to illustrate that many of the experiences Black women face are not subsumed within the traditional boundaries of race or gender discrimination as these boundaries are currently understood, and that the intersection of racism and sexism factors into Black women's lives in ways that cannot be captured wholly by looking at the race or gender dimensions of those experiences separately. I build on those observations here by exploring the various ways in which race and gender intersect in shaping structural, political, and representational aspects of violence against women of color.[8]

I should say at the outset that intersectionality is not being offered here as some new, totalizing theory of identity. Nor do I mean to suggest that violence against women of color can be explained only through the specific frameworks of race and gender considered here.[9] Indeed, factors I address communities of color. Lesbian violence is often shrouded in secrecy for similar reasons that have suppressed the exposure of heterosexual violence in communities of color—fear of embarassing other members of the community, which is already stereotyped as deviant, and fear of being ostracized from the community. Despite these similarities, there are nonetheless distinctions between male abuse of women and female abuse of women that in the context of patriarchy, racism and homophobia, warrants more focused analysis than is possible here.

6. I use "Black" and "African American" interchangeably throughout this article. I capitalize "Black" because "Blacks, like *A*sians, *L*atinos, and other 'minorities,' constitute a specific cultural group and, as such, require denotation as a proper noun." Crenshaw, supra note 3, at 1332 n.2 (citing Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism, Marxism, Method, and the State: An Agenda for Theory, 7 SIGNS 515, 516 (1982)). By the same token, I do not capitalize "white," which is not a proper noun, since whites do not constitute a specific cultural group. For the same reason I do not capitalize "women of color."

7. Kimberle Crenshaw, Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex, 1989 U. CHI. LEGAL F. 139.

8. I explicitly adopt a Black feminist stance in this survey of violence against women of color. I do this cognizant of several tensions that such a position entails. The most significant one stems from the criticism that while feminism purports to speak for women of color through its invocation of the term "woman," the feminist perspective excludes women of color because it is based upon the experiences and interests of a certain subset of women. On the other hand, when white feminists attempt to include other women, they often add our experiences into an otherwise unaltered framework. It is important to name the perspective from which one constructs her analysis; and for me, that is as a Black feminist. Moreover, it is important to acknowledge that the materials that I incorporate in my analysis are drawn heavily from research on Black women. On the other hand, I see my own work as part of a broader collective effort among feminists of color to expand feminism to include analyses of race and other factors such as class, sexuality, and age. I have attempted therefore to offer my sense of the tentative connections between my analysis of the intersectional experiences of Black women and the intersectional experiences of other women of color. I stress that this analysis is not intended to include falsely nor to exclude unnecessarily other women of color.

9. I consider intersectionality a provisional concept linking contemporary politics with postmodern theory. In mapping the intersections of race and gender, the concept does engage dominant assumptions that race and gender are essentially separate categories. By tracing the categories to their intersections, I hope to suggest a methodology that will ultimately disrupt the tendencies to see race and gender as exclusive or separable. While the primary intersections that I explore here are only in part or not at all, such as class or sexuality, are often as critical in shaping the experiences of women of color. My focus on the intersections of race and gender only highlights the need to account for multiple grounds of identity when considering how the social world is constructed.[10]

I have divided the issues presented in this article into three categories. In Part I, I discuss structural intersectionality, the ways in which the location of women of color at the intersection of race and gender makes our actual experience of domestic violence, rape, and remedial reform qualitatively different than that of white women. I shift the focus in Part II to political intersectionality, where I analyze how both feminist and antiracist politics have, paradoxically, often helped to marginalize the issue of violence against women of color. Then in Part III, I discuss representational intersectionality, by which I mean the cultural construction of women of color. I consider how controversies over the representation of women of color in popular culture can also elide the particular location of women of color, and thus become yet another source of intersectional disempowerment. Finally, I address the implications of the intersectional approach within the broader scope of contemporary identity politics.

I. STRUCTURAL INTERSECTIONALITY

A. Structural Intersectionality and Battering

I observed the dynamics of structural intersectionality during a brief field study of battered women's shelters located in minority communities in Los Angeles.[11] In most cases, the physical assault that leads women to these shelters is merely the most immediate manifestation of the subordination they experience. Many women who seek protection are unemployed or underemployed, and a good number of them are poor. Shelters serving these women cannot afford to address only the violence inflicted by the batterer; they must also confront the other multilayered and routinized forms of domination that often converge in these women's lives, hindering their ability to create alternatives to the abusive relationships that brought them to shelters in the first place. Many women of color, for example, are burdened by poverty, child care responsibilities, and the lack of job skills.[12] These burdens, between race and gender, the concept can and should be expanded by factoring in issues such as class, sexual orientation, age, and color.

---

10. Professor Mari Matsuda calls this inquiry "asking the other question." Mari J. Matsuda, Beside My Sister, Facing the Enemy: Legal Theory Out of Coalition, 43 STAN. L. REV. 1183 (1991). For example, we should look at an issue or condition traditionally regarded as a gender issue and ask, "Where's the racism in this?"

11. During my research in Los Angeles, California, I visited Jenessee Battered Women's Shelter, the only shelter in the Western states primarily serving Black women, and Everywoman's Shelter, which primarily serves Asian women. I also visited Estelle Chueng at the Asian Pacific Law Foundation, and I spoke with a representative of La Casa, a shelter in the predominantly Latino community of East L.A.

12. One researcher has noted, in reference to a survey taken of battered women's shelters, that "many Caucasian women were probably excluded from the sample, since they are more likely to have available resources that enable them to avoid going to a shelter. Many shelters admit only women with few or no resources or alternatives." MILDRED DALEY PAGELOW, WOMAN-BAT-largely the consequence of gender and class oppression, are then compounded by the racially discriminatory employment and housing practices women of color often face,[13] as well as by the disproportionately high unemployment among people of color that makes battered women of color less able to depend on the support of friends and relatives for temporary shelter.[14]

Where systems of race, gender, and class domination converge, as they do in the experiences of battered women of color, intervention strategies based solely on the experiences of women who do not share the same class or race backgrounds will be of limited help to women who because of race and class face different obstacles.[15] Such was the case in 1990 when Congress amended the marriage fraud provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act to protect immigrant women who were battered or exposed to extreme cruelty by the United States citizens or permanent residents these women

---

TERING: VICTIMS AND THEIR EXPERIENCES 97 (1981). On the other hand, many middle- and upper-class women are financially dependent upon their husbands and thus experience a diminution in their standard of living when they leave their husbands.

13. Together they make securing even the most basic necessities beyond the reach of many. Indeed one shelter provider reported that nearly 85 percent of her clients returned to the battering relationships, largely because of difficulties in finding employment and housing. African Americans are more segregated than any other racial group, and this segregation exists across class lines. Recent studies in Washington, D.C., and its suburbs show that 64% of Blacks trying to rent apartments in white neighborhoods encountered discrimination. Tracy Thompson, Study Finds 'Persistent' Racial Bias in Area's Rental Housing, Wash. Post, Jan. 31, 1991, at D1. Had these studies factored gender and family status into the equation, the statistics might have been worse.

14. More specifically, African Americans suffer from high unemployment rates, low incomes, and high poverty rates. According to Dr. David Swinton, Dean of the School of Business at Jackson State University in Mississippi, African Americans "receive three-fifths as much income per person as whites and are three times as likely to have annual incomes below the Federally defined poverty level of $12,675 for a family of four." Urban League Urges Action, N.Y. Times, Jan. 9, 1991, at A14. In fact, recent statistics indicate that racial economic inequality is "higher as we begin the 1990s than at any other time in the last 20 years." David Swinton, The Economic Status of African Americans: "Permanent" Poverty and Inequality, in THE STATE OF BLACK AMERICA 1991, at 25 (1991).

The economic situation of minority women is, expectedly, worse than that of their male counterparts. Black women, who earn a median of $7,875 a year, make considerably less than Black men, who earn a median income of $12,609 a year, and white women, who earn a median income of $9,812 a year. Id. at 32 (Table 3). Additionally, the percentage of Black female-headed families living in poverty (46.5%) is almost twice that of white female-headed families (25.4%). Id. at 43 (Table 8). Latino households also earn considerably less than white households. In 1988, the median income of Latino households was $20,359 and for white households, $28,340—a difference of almost $8,000. HISPANIC AMERICANS: A STATISTICAL SOURCEBOOK 149 (1991). Analyzing by origin, in 1988, Puerto Rican households were the worst off, with 34.1% earning below $10,000 a year and a median income for all Puerto Rican households of $15,447 per year. Id. at 155. 1989 statistics for Latino men and women show that women earned an average of $7,000 less than men. Id. at 169.

15. See text accompanying notes 61-66 (discussing shelter's refusal to house a Spanish-speaking woman in crisis even though her son could interpret for her because it would contribute to her disempowerment). Racial differences marked an interesting contrast between Jenesee's policies and those of other shelters situated outside the Black community. Unlike some other shelters in Los Angeles, Jenessee welcomed the assistance of men. According to the Director, the shelter's policy was premised on a belief that given African American's need to maintain healthy relations to pursue a common struggle against racism, anti-violence programs within the African American community cannot afford to be antagonistic to men. For a discussion of the different needs of Black women who are battered, see Beth Richie, Battered Black Women: A Challenge for the Black Community, BLACK SCHOLAR, Mar./Apr. 1985, at 40.

immigrated to the United States to marry. Under the marriage fraud provisions of the Act, a person who immigrated to the United States to marry a United States citizen or permanent resident had to remain "properly" married for two years before even applying for permanent resident status,[16] at which time applications for the immigrant's permanent status were required of both spouses.[17] Predictably, under these circumstances, many immigrant women were reluctant to leave even the most abusive of partners for fear of being deported.[18] When faced with the choice between protection from their batterers and protection against deportation, many immigrant women chose the latter.[19] Reports of the tragic consequences of this double subordination put pressure on Congress to include in the Immigration Act of 1990 a provision amending the marriage fraud rules to allow for an explicit waiver for hardship caused by domestic violence.[20] Yet many immigrant women, par-

16. 8 U.S.C. § 1186a (1988). The Marriage Fraud Amendments provide that an alien spouse "shall be considered, at the time of obtaining the status of an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence, to have obtained such status on a conditional basis subject to the provisions of this section." § 1186a(a)(1). An alien spouse with permanent resident status under this conditional basis may have her status terminated if the Attorney General finds that the marriage was "improper," § 1186a(b)(1), or if she fails to file a petition or fails to appear at the personal interview. § 1186a(c)(2)(A).

17. The Marriage Fraud Amendments provided that for the conditional resident status to be removed, "the alien spouse and the petitioning spouse (if not deceased) jointly must submit to the Attorney General . . . a petition which requests the removal of such conditional basis and which states, under penalty of perjury, the facts and information." § 1186a(b)(1)(A) (emphasis added). The Amendments provided for a waiver, at the Attorney General's discretion, if the alien spouse was able to demonstrate that deportation would result in extreme hardship, or that the qualifying marriage was terminated for good cause. § 1186a(c)(4). However, the terms of this hardship waiver have not adequately protected battered spouses. For example, the requirement that the marriage be terminated for good cause may be difficult to satisfy in states with no-fault divorces. Eileen P. Lynsky, Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendments of 1986: Till Congress Do Us Part, 41 U. MIAMI L. REV. 1087, 1095 n.47 (1987) (student author) (citing Jerome B. Ingber & R. Leo Prischet, The Marriage Fraud Amendments, in THE NEW SIMPSON-RODINO IMMIGRATION LAW OF 1986, at 564-65 (Stanley Mailman ed. 1986)).

18. Immigration activists have pointed out that "[t]he 1986 Immigration Reform Act and the Immigration Marriage Fraud Amendment have combined to give the spouse applying for permanent residence a powerful tool to control his partner." Jorge Banales, Abuse Among Immigrants; As Their Numbers Grow So Does the Need for Services, Wash. Post, Oct. 16, 1990, at E5. Dean Ito Taylor, executive director of Nihonmachi Legal Outreach in San Francisco, explained that the Marriage Fraud Amendments "bound these immigrant women to their abusers." Deanna Hodgin, 'Mail-Order' Brides Marry Pain to Get Green Cards, Wash. Times, Apr. 16, 1991, at E1. In one egregious instance described by Beckie Masaki, executive director of the Asian Women's Shelter in San Francisco, the closer the Chinese bride came to getting her permanent residency in the United States, the more harshly her Asian-American husband beat her. Her husband, kicking her in the neck and face, warned her that she needed him, and if she did not do as he told her, he would call immigration officials. Id.

19. As Alice Fernandez, head of the Victim Services Agency at the Bronx Criminal Court, explained, " 'Women are being held hostage by their landlords, their boyfriends, their bosses, their husbands. . . . The message is: If you tell anybody what I'm doing to you, they are going to ship your ass back home. And for these women, there is nothing more terrible than that . . . . Sometimes their response is: I would rather be dead in this country than go back home.' " Vivienne Walt, Immigrant Abuse: Nowhere to Hide; Women Fear Deportation, Experts Say, Newsday, Dec. 2, 1990, at 8.

20. Immigration Act of 1990, Pub. L. No. 101-649, 104 Stat. 4978. The Act, introduced by Representative Louise Slaughter (D-N.Y.), provides that a battered spouse who has conditional permanent resident status can be granted a waiver for failure to meet the requirements if she can show that "the marriage was entered into in good faith and that after the marriage the alien spouse was ticularly immigrant women of color, have remained vulnerable to battering because they are unable to meet the conditions established for a waiver. The evidence required to support a waiver "can include, but is not limited to, reports and affidavits from police, medical personnel, psychologists, school officials, and social service agencies."[21] For many immigrant women, limited access to these resources can make it difficult for them to obtain the evidence needed for a waiver. And cultural barriers often further discourage immigrant women from reporting or escaping battering situations. Tina Shum, a family counselor at a social service agency, points out that "[t]his law sounds so easy to apply, but there are cultural complications in the Asian community that make even these requirements difficult. . . . Just to find the opportunity and courage to call us is an accomplishment for many."[22] The typical immigrant spouse, she suggests, may live "[i]n an extended family where several generations live together, there may be no privacy on the telephone, no opportunity to leave the house and no understanding of public phones."[23] As a consequence, many immigrant women are wholly dependent on their husbands as their link to the world outside their homes.[24]

Immigrant women are also vulnerable to spousal violence because so many of them depend on their husbands for information regarding their legal status.[25] Many women who are now permanent residents continue to suffer abuse under threats of deportation by their husbands. Even if the threats are unfounded, women who have no independent access to information will still be intimidated by such threats.[26] And even though the domes-battered by or was subjected to extreme mental cruelty by the U.S. citizen or permanent resident spouse." H.R. REP. No. 723(I), 101st Cong., 2d Sess. 78 (1990), reprinted in 1990 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6710, 6758; see also 8 C.F.R. § 216.5(3) (1992) (regulations for application for waiver based on claim of having been battered or subjected to extreme mental cruelty).

---

21. H.R. REP. No. 723(I), supra note 20, at 79, reprinted in 1990 U.S.C.C.A.N. 6710, 6759.

22. Hodgin, supra note 18.

23. Id.

24. One survey conducted of battered women "hypothesized that if a person is a member of a discriminated minority group, the fewer the opportunities for socioeconomic status above the poverty level and the weaker the English language skills, the greater the disadvantage." M. PAGELOW, supra note 12, at 96. The 70 minority women in the study "had a double disadvantage in this society that serves to tie them more strongly to their spouses." Id.

25. A citizen or permanent resident spouse can exercise power over an alien spouse by threatening not to file a petition for permanent residency. If he fails to file a petition for permanent residency, the alien spouse continues to be undocumented and is considered to be in the country illegally. These constraints often restrict an alien spouse from leaving. Dean Ito Taylor tells the story of "one client who has been hospitalized—she's had him arrested for beating her—but she keeps coming back to him because he promises he will file for her . . . . He holds that green card over her head." Hodgin, supra note 18. Other stories of domestic abuse abound. Maria, a 50-year-old Dominican woman, explains that " 'One time I had eight stitches in my head and a gash on the other side of my head, and he broke my ribs . . . . He would bash my head against the wall while we had sex. He kept threatening to kill me if I told the doctor what happened.' " Maria had a "powerful reason for staying with Juan through years of abuse: a ticket to permanent residence in the United States." Walt, supra note 19.

26. One reporter explained that "Third-world women must deal with additional fears, however. In many cases, they are afraid of authority, government institutions and their abusers' threat of being turned over to immigration officials to be deported." Banales, supra note 18.

tic violence waiver focuses on immigrant women whose husbands are United States citizens or permanent residents, there are countless women married to undocumented workers (or who are themselves undocumented) who suffer in silence for fear that the security of their entire families will be jeopardized should they seek help or otherwise call attention to themselves.[27]

Language barriers present another structural problem that often limits opportunities of non-English-speaking women to take advantage of existing support services.[28] Such barriers not only limit access to information about shelters, but also limit access to the security shelters provide. Some shelters turn non-English-speaking women away for lack of bilingual personnel and resources.[29]

These examples illustrate how patterns of subordination intersect in women's experience of domestic violence. Intersectional subordination need not be intentionally produced; in fact, it is frequently the consequence of the imposition of one burden that interacts with preexisting vulnerabilities to create yet another dimension of disempowerment. In the case of the marriage fraud provisions of the Immigration and Nationality Act, the imposition of a policy specifically designed to burden one class—immigrant spouses seeking permanent resident status—exacerbated the disempowerment of those already subordinated by other structures of domination. By failing to take into account the vulnerability of immigrant spouses to domestic vio-

27. Incidents of sexual abuse of undocumented women abound. Marta Rivera, director of the Hostos College Center for Women's and Immigrant's Rights, tells of how a 19-year-old Dominican woman had "arrived shaken . . . after her boss raped her in the women's restroom at work." The woman told Rivera that "70 to 80 percent of the workers [in a Brooklyn garment factory] were undocumented, and they all accepted sex as part of the job . . . . She said a 13-year-old girl had been raped there a short while before her, and the family sent her back to the Dominican Republic." Walt, supra note 19. In another example, a "Latin American woman, whose husband's latest attack left her with two broken fingers, a swollen face and bruises on her neck and chest, refused to report the beating to police." She returned to her home after a short stay in a shelter. She did not leave the abusive situation because she was "an undocumented, illiterate laborer whose children, passport and money are tightly controlled by her husband." Although she was informed of her rights, she was not able to hurdle the structural obstacles in her path. Banales, supra note 18.

28. For example, in a region with a large number of Third-World immigrants, "the first hurdle these [battered women's shelters] must overcome is the language barrier." Banales, supra note 18.

29.

> There can be little question that women unable to communicate in English are severely handicapped in seeking independence. Some women thus excluded were even further disadvantaged because they were not U.S. citizens and some were in this country illegally. For a few of these, the only assistance shelter staff could render was to help reunite them with their families of origin.

M. PAGELOW, supra note 12, at 96-97. Non-English speaking women are often excluded even from studies of battered women because of their language and other difficulties. A researcher qualified the statistics of one survey by pointing out that "an unknown number of minority group women were excluded from this survey sample because of language difficulties." Id. at 96. To combat this lack of appropriate services for women of color at many shelters, special programs have been created specifically for women from particular communities. A few examples of such programs include the Victim Intervention Project in East Harlem for Latina women, Jenesee Shelter for African American women in Los Angeles, Apna Gar in Chicago for South Asian women, and, for Asian women generally, the Asian Women's Shelter in San Francisco, the New York Asian Women's Center, and the Center for the Pacific Asian Family in Los Angeles. Programs with hotlines include Sakhi for South Asian Women in New York, and Manavi in Jersey City, also for South Asian women, as well as programs for Korean women in Philadelphia and Chicago.

lence, Congress positioned these women to absorb the simultaneous impact of its anti-immigration policy and their spouses' abuse.

The enactment of the domestic violence waiver of the marriage fraud provisions similarly illustrates how modest attempts to respond to certain problems can be ineffective when the intersectional location of women of color is not considered in fashioning the remedy. Cultural identity and class affect the likelihood that a battered spouse could take advantage of the waiver. Although the waiver is formally available to all women, the terms of the waiver make it inaccessible to some. Immigrant women who are socially, culturally, or economically privileged are more likely to be able to marshall the resources needed to satisfy the waiver requirements. Those immigrant women least able to take advantage of the waiver—women who are socially or economically the most marginal—are the ones most likely to be women of color.

B. Structural Intersectionality and Rape

Women of color are differently situated in the economic, social, and political worlds. When reform efforts undertaken on behalf of women neglect this fact, women of color are less likely to have their needs met than women who are racially privileged. For example, counselors who provide rape crisis services to women of color report that a significant proportion of the resources allocated to them must be spent handling problems other than rape itself. Meeting these needs often places these counselors at odds with their funding agencies, which allocate funds according to standards of need that are largely white and middle-class.[30] These uniform standards of need ignore the fact that different needs often demand different priorities in terms of resource allocation, and consequently, these standards hinder the ability of counselors to address the needs of nonwhite and poor women.[31] A case in point: women of color occupy positions both physically and culturally marginalized within dominant society, and so information must be targeted directly to them in order to reach them.[32] Accordingly, rape crisis centers

30. For example, the Rosa Parks Shelter and the Compton Rape Crisis Hotline, two shelters that serve the African-American community, are in constant conflict with funding sources over the ratio of dollars and hours to women served. Interview with Joan Greer, Executive Director of Rosa Parks Shelter, in Los Angeles, California (April 1990).

31. One worker explained:

> For example, a woman may come in or call in for various reasons. She has no place to go, she has no job, she has no support, she has no money, she has no food, she's been beaten, and after you finish meeting all those needs, or try to meet all those needs, then she may say, by the way, during all this, I was being raped. So that makes our community different than other communities. A person wants their basic needs first. It's a lot easier to discuss things when you are full.

Nancy Anne Matthews, Stopping Rape or Managing its Consequences? State Intervention and Feminist Resistance in the Los Angeles Anti-Rape Movement, 1972-1987, at 287 (1989) (Ph.D dissertation, University of California, Los Angeles) (chronicling the history of the rape crisis movement, and highlighting the different histories and dilemmas of rape crisis hotlines run by white feminists and those situated in the minority communities).

32.

> Typically, more time must be spent with a survivor who has fewer personal resources.

must earmark more resources for basic information dissemination in communities of color than in white ones.

Increased costs are but one consequence of serving people who cannot be reached by mainstream channels of information. As noted earlier, counselors in minority communities report spending hours locating resources and contacts to meet the housing and other immediate needs of women who have been assualted. Yet this work is only considered "information and referral" by funding agencies and as such, is typically underfunded, notwithstanding the magnitude of need for these services in minority communities.[33] The problem is compounded by expectations that rape crisis centers will use a significant portion of resources allocated to them on counselors to accompany victims to court,[34] even though women of color are less likely to have their cases pursued in the criminal justice system.[35] The resources expected to be set aside for court services are misdirected in these communities.

The fact that minority women suffer from the effects of multiple subordination, coupled with institutional expectations based on inappropriate nonintersectional contexts, shapes and ultimately limits the opportunities for meaningful intervention on their behalf. Recognizing the failure to consider intersectional dynamics may go far toward explaining the high levels of failure, frustration, and burn-out experienced by counselors who attempt to meet the needs of minority women victims.

II. POLITICAL INTERSECTIONALITY

The concept of political intersectionality highlights the fact that women

---

These survivors tend to be ethnic minority women. Often, a non-assimilated ethnic minority survivor requires translating and interpreting, transportation, overnight shelter for herself and possibly children, and counseling to significant others in addition to the usual counseling and advocacy services. So, if a rape crisis center serves a predominantly ethnic minority population, the "average" number of hours of service provided to each survivor is much higher than for a center that serves a predominantly white population.

Id. at 275 (quoting position paper of the Southern California Rape Hotline Alliance).

33. Id. at 287-88.

34. The Director of Rosa Parks reported that she often runs into trouble with her funding sources over the Center's lower than average number of counselors accompanying victims to court. Interview with Joan Greer, supra note 30.

35.

Even though current statistics indicate that Black women are more likely to be victimized than white women, Black women are less likely to report their rapes, less likely to have their cases come to trial, less likely to have their trials result in convictions, and, most disturbing, less likely to seek counseling and other support services.

PATRICIA HILL COLLINS, BLACK FEMINIST THOUGHT: KNOWLEDGE, CONSCIOUSNESS AND THE POLITICS OF EMPOWERMENT 178-79 (1990); accord HUBERT S. FEILD & LEIGH B. BIENEN, JURORS AND RAPE: A STUDY IN PSYCHOLOGY AND LAW 141 (1980) (data obtained from 1,056 citizens serving as jurors in simulated legal rape cases generally showed that "the assailant of the black woman was given a more lenient sentence than the white woman's assailant"). According to Fern Ferguson, an Illinois sex abuse worker, speaking at a Women of Color Institute conference in Knoxville, Tennessee, 10% of rapes involving white victims end in conviction, compared with 4.2% for rapes involving non-white victims (and 2.3% for the less-inclusive group of Black rape victims). UPI, July 30, 1985. Ferguson argues that myths about women of color being promiscuous and wanting to be raped encourage the criminal justice system and medical professionals as well to treat women of color differently than they treat white women after a rape has occurred. Id.

of color are situated within at least two subordinated groups that frequently pursue conflicting political agendas. The need to split one's political energies between two sometimes opposing groups is a dimension of intersectional disempowerment that men of color and white women seldom confront. Indeed, their specific raced and gendered experiences, although intersectional, often define as well as confine the interests of the entire group. For example, racism as experienced by people of color who are of a particular gender—male—tends to determine the parameters of antiracist strategies, just as sexism as experienced by women who are of a particular race—white—tends to ground the women's movement. The problem is not simply that both discourses fail women of color by not acknowledging the "additional" issue of race or of patriarchy but that the discourses are often inadequate even to the discrete tasks of articulating the full dimensions of racism and sexism. Because women of color experience racism in ways not always the same as those experienced by men of color and sexism in ways not always parallel to experiences of white women, antiracism and feminism are limited, even on their own terms.

Among the most troubling political consequences of the failure of antiracist and feminist discourses to address the intersections of race and gender is the fact that, to the extent they can forward the interest of "people of color" and "women," respectively, one analysis often implicitly denies the validity of the other. The failure of feminism to interrogate race means that the resistance strategies of feminism will often replicate and reinforce the subordination of people of color, and the failure of antiracism to interrogate patriarchy means that antiracism will frequently reproduce the subordination of women. These mutual elisions present a particularly difficult political dilemma for women of color. Adopting either analysis constitutes a denial of a fundamental dimension of our subordination and precludes the development of a political discourse that more fully empowers women of color.

A. The Politicization of Domestic Violence

That the political interests of women of color are obscured and sometimes jeopardized by political strategies that ignore or suppress intersectional issues is illustrated by my experiences in gathering information for this article. I attempted to review Los Angeles Police Department statistics reflecting the rate of domestic violence interventions by precinct because such statistics can provide a rough picture of arrests by racial group, given the degree of racial segregation in Los Angeles.[36] L.A.P.D., however, would not release the statistics. A representative explained that one reason the statistics were not released was that domestic violence activists both within and outside the Department feared that statistics reflecting the extent of domestic violence in minority communities might be selectively interpreted and publicized so as to undermine long-term efforts to force the Department to address domestic violence as a serious problem. I was told that activists were worried that the statistics might permit opponents to dismiss domestic violence as a minoirty problem and, therefore, not deserving of aggressive action.

36. Most crime statistics are classified by sex or race but none are classified by sex and race. Because we know that most rape victims are women, the racial breakdown reveals, at best, rape rates for Black women. Yet, even given this head start, rates for other non-white women are difficult to collect. While there are some statistics for Latinas, statistics for Asian and Native American women are virtually non-existent. Cf. G. Chezia Carraway, Violence Against Women of Color, 43 STAN. L. REV. 1301 (1993).

The informant also claimed that representatives from various minority communities opposed the release of these statistics. They were concerned, apparently, that the data would unfairly represent Black and Brown communities as unusually violent, potentially reinforcing stereotypes that might be used in attempts to justify oppressive police tactics and other discriminatory practices. These misgivings are based on the familiar and not unfounded premise that certain minority groups—especially Black men—have already been stereotyped as uncontrollably violent. Some worry that attempts to make domestic violence an object of political action may only serve to confirm such stereotypes and undermine efforts to combat negative beliefs about the Black community.

This account sharply illustrates how women of color can be erased by the strategic silences of antiracism and feminism. The political priorities of both were defined in ways that suppressed information that could have facilitated attempts to confront the problem of domestic violence in communities of color.

1. Domestic violence and antiracist politics.

Within communities of color, efforts to stem the politicization of domestic violence are often grounded in attempts to maintain the integrity of the community. The articulation of this perspective takes different forms. Some critics allege that feminism has no place within communities of color, that the issues are internally divisive, and that they represent the migration of white women's concerns into a context in which they are not only irrelevant but also harmful. At its most extreme, this rhetoric denies that gender violence is a problem in the community and characterizes any effort to politicize gender subordination as itself a community problem. This is the position taken by Shahrazad Ali in her controversial book, The Blackman's Guide to Understanding the Blackwoman.[37] In this stridently antifeminist tract, Ali draws a positive correlation between domestic violence and the liberation of African Americans. Ali blames the deteriorating conditions within the Black community on the insubordination of Black women and on the failure of Black men to control them.[38] Ali goes so far as to advise Black men to physically chastise Black women when they are "disrespectful."[39] While she cautions that Black men must use moderation in disciplining "their" women, she argues that Black men must sometimes resort to physical force to reestablish the authority over Black women that racism has disrupted.[40]

37. SHAHRAZAD ALI, THE BLACKMAN'S GUIDE TO UNDERSTANDING THE BLACKWOMAN (1989). Ali's book sold quite well for an independently published title, an accomplishment no doubt due in part to her appearances on the Phil Donahue, Oprah Winfrey, and Sally Jesse Raphael television talk shows. For public and press reaction, see Dorothy Gilliam, Sick, Distorted Thinking, Wash. Post, Oct. 11, 1990, at D3; Lena Williams, Black Woman's Book Starts a Predictable Storm, N.Y. Times, Oct. 2, 1990, at C11; see also PEARL CLEAGUE, MAD AT MILES: A BLACK WOMAN'S GUIDE TO TRUTH (1990). The title clearly styled after Ali's, Mad at Miles responds not only to issues raised by Ali's book, but also to Miles Davis's admission in his autobiography, Miles: The Autobiography (1989), that he had physically abused, among other women, his former wife, actress Cicely Tyson.

Ali's premise is that patriarchy is beneficial for the Black community,[41] and that it must be strengthened through coercive means if necessary.[42] Yet

---

38. Shahrazad Ali suggests that the "[Blackwoman] certainly does not believe that her disrepect for the Blackman is destructive, nor that her opposition to him has deteriorated the Black nation." S. ALI, supra note 37, at viii. Blaming the problems of the community on the failure of the Black woman to accept her "real definition," Ali explains that "[n]o nation can rise when the natural order of the behavior of the male and the female have been altered against their wishes by force. No species can survive if the female of the genus disturbs the balance of her nature by acting other than herself." Id. at 76.

39. Ali advises the Blackman to hit the Blackwoman in the mouth, "[b]ecause it is from that hole, in the lower part of her face, that all her rebellion culminates into words. Her unbridled tongue is a main reason she cannot get along with the Blackman. She often needs a reminder." Id. at 169. Ali warns that "if [the Blackwoman] ignores the authority and superiority of the Blackman, there is a penalty. When she crosses this line and becomes viciously insulting it is time for the Blackman to soundly slap her in the mouth." Id.

40. Ali explains that, "[r]egretfully some Blackwomen want to be physically controlled by the Blackman." Id. at 174. "The Blackwoman, deep inside her heart," Ali reveals, "wants to surrender but she wants to be coerced." Id. at 72. "[The Blackwoman] wants [the Blackman] to stand up and defend himself even if it means he has to knock her out of the way to do so. This is necessary whenever the Blackwoman steps out of the protection of womanly behavior and enters the dangerous domain of masculine challenge." Id. at 174.

41. Ali points out that "[t]he Blackman being number 1 and the Blackwoman being number 2 is another absolute law of nature. The Blackman was created first, he has seniority. And the Blackwoman was created 2nd. He is first. She is second. The Blackman is the beginning and all others come from him. Everyone on earth knows this except the Blackwoman." Id. at 67.

42. In this regard, Ali's arguments bear much in common with those of neoconservatives who attribute many of the social ills plaguing Black America to the breakdown of patriarchal family values. See, e.g., William Raspberry, If We Are to Rescue American Families, We Have to Save the Boys, Chicago Trib., July 19, 1989, at C15; George F. Will, Voting Rights Won't Fix It, Wash. Post, Jan. 23, 1986, at A23; George F. Will, "White Racism" Doesn't Make Blacks Mere Victims of Fate, Milwaukee J., Feb. 21, 1986, at 9. Ali's argument shares remarkable similarities to the controversial "Moynihan Report" on the Black family, so called because its principal author was now-Senator Daniel P. Moynihan (D-N.Y.). In the infamous chapter entitled "The Tangle of Pathology," Moynihan argued that > the Negro community has been forced into a matriarchal structure which, because it is so out of line with the rest of American society, seriously retards the progress of the group as a whole, and imposes a crushing burden on the Negro male and, in consequence, on a great many Negro women as well.

OFFICE OF POLICY PLANNING AND RESEARCH, U.S. DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, THE NEGRO FAMILY: THE CASE FOR NATIONAL ACTION 29 (1965), reprinted in LEE RAINWATER & WILLIAM L. YANCEY, THE MOYNIHAN REPORT AND THE POLITICS OF CONTROVERSY 75 (1967). A storm of controversy developed over the book, although few commentators challenged the patriarchy embedded in the analysis. Bill Moyers, then a young minister and speechwriter for President Johnson, firmly believed that the criticism directed at Moynihan was unfair. Some 20 years later, Moyers resurrected the Moynihan thesis in a special television program, The Vanishing Family: Crisis in Black America (CBS television broadcast, Jan. 25, 1986). The show first aired in January 1986 and featured several African-American men and women who had become parents but were unwilling to marry. Arthur Unger, Hardhitting Special About Black Families, Christian Sci. Mon., Jan. 23, 1986, the violence that accompanies this will to control is devastating, not only for the Black women who are victimized, but also for the entire Black community.[43] The recourse to violence to resolve conflicts establishes a dangerous pattern for children raised in such environments and contributes to many other pressing problems.[44] It has been estimated that nearly forty percent of all homeless women and children have fled violence in the home,[45] and an estimated sixty-three percent of young men between the ages of eleven and twenty who are imprisoned for homicide have killed their mothers' batterers.[46] And yet, while gang violence, homicide, and other forms of Black-on-Black crime have increasingly been discussed within African-American politics, patriarchal ideas about gender and power preclude the recognition of domestic violence as yet another compelling incidence of Black-on-Black crime.

Efforts such as Ali's to justify violence against women in the name of Black liberation are indeed extreme.[47] The more common problem is that at 23. Many saw the Moyers show as a vindication of Moynihan. President Reagan took the opportunity to introduce an initiative to revamp the welfare system a week after the program aired. Michael Barone, Poor Children and Politics, Wash. Post, Feb. 10, 1986, at A1. Said one official, "Bill Moyers has made it safe for people to talk about this issue, the disintegrating black family structure." Robert Pear, President Reported Ready to Propose Overhaul of Social Welfare System, N.Y. Times, Feb. 1, 1986, at A12. Critics of the Moynihan/Moyers thesis have argued that it scapegoats the Black family generally and Black women in particular. For a series of responses, see Scapegoating the Black Family, NATION, July 24, 1989 (special issue, edited by Jewell Handy Gresham and Margaret B. Wilkerson, with contributions from Margaret Burnham, Constance Clayton, Dorothy Height, Faye Wattleton, and Marian Wright Edelman). For an analysis of the media's endorsement of the Moynihan/Moyers thesis, see CARL GINSBURG, RACE AND MEDIA: THE ENDURING LIFE OF THE MOYNIHAN REPORT (1989).

---

43. Domestic violence relates directly to issues that even those who subscribe to Ali's position must also be concerned about. The socioeconomic condition of Black males has been one such central concern. Recent statistics estimate that 25% of Black males in their twenties are involved in the criminal justice systems. See David G. Savage, Young Black Males in Jail or in Court Control Study Says, L.A. Times, Feb. 27, 1990, at A1; Newsday, Feb. 27, 1990, at 15; Study Shows Racial Imbalance in Penal System, N.Y. Times, Feb. 27, 1990, at A18. One would think that the linkages between violence in the home and the violence on the streets would alone persuade those like Ali to conclude that the African-American community cannot afford domestic violence and the patriarchal values that support it.

44. A pressing problem is the way domestic violence reproduces itself in subsequent generations. It is estimated that boys who witness violence against women are ten times more likely to batter female partners as adults. Women and Violence: Hearings Before the Senate Comm. on the Judiciary on Legislation to Reduce the Growing Problem of Violent Crime Against Women, 101st Cong., 2d Sess., pt. 2, at 89 (1991) [hereinafter Hearings on Violent Crime Against Women] (testimony of Charlotte Fedders). Other associated problems for boys who witness violence against women include higher rates of suicide, violent assault, sexual assault, and alcohol and drug use. Id., pt. 2, at 131 (statement of Sarah M. Buel, Assistant District Attorney, Massachusetts, and Supervisor, Harvard Law School Battered Women's Advocacy Project).

45. Id. at 142 (statement of Susan Kelly-Dreiss) (discussing several studies in Pennsylvania linking homelessness to domestic violence).

46. Id. at 143 (statement of Susan Kelly-Dreiss).

47. Another historical example includes Eldridge Cleaver, who argued that he raped white women as an assault upon the white community. Cleaver "practiced" on Black women first. ELDRIDGE CLEAVER, SOUL ON ICE 14-15 (1968). Despite the appearance of misogyny in both works, each professes to worship Black women as "queens" of the Black community. This "queenly subservience" parallels closely the image of the "woman on a pedestal" against which white feminists have railed. Because Black women have been denied pedestal status within dominant society, the image of the African queen has some appeal to many African-American women. Although it is not a the political or cultural interests of the community are interpreted in a way that precludes full public recognition of the problem of domestic violence. While it would be misleading to suggest that white Americans have come to terms with the degree of violence in their own homes, it is nonetheless the case that race adds yet another dimension to why the problem of domestic violence is suppressed within nonwhite communities. People of color often must weigh their interests in avoiding issues that might reinforce distorted public perceptions against the need to acknowledge and address intracommunity problems. Yet the cost of suppression is seldom recognized in part because the failure to discuss the issue shapes perceptions of how serious the problem is in the first place.

The controversy over Alice Walker's novel The Color Purple can be understood as an intracommunity debate about the political costs of exposing gender violence within the Black community.[48] Some critics chastised Walker for portraying Black men as violent brutes.[49] One critic lambasted Walker's portrayal of Celie, the emotionally and physically abused protagonist who finally triumphs in the end. Walker, the critic contended, had created in Celie a Black woman whom she couldn't imagine existing in any Black community she knew or could conceive of.[50]

The claim that Celie was somehow an unauthentic character might be read as a consequence of silencing discussion of intracommunity violence. Celie may be unlike any Black woman we know because the real terror experienced daily by minority women is routinely concealed in a misguided (though perhaps understandable) attempt to forestall racial stereotyping. Of course, it is true that representations of Black violence—whether statistical or fictional—are often written into a larger script that consistently portrays Black and other minority communities as pathologically violent. The problem, however, is not so much the portrayal of violence itself as it is the absence of other narratives and images portraying a fuller range of Black experience. Suppression of some of these issues in the name of antiracism imposes real costs. Where information about violence in minority communifeminist position, there are significant ways in which the promulgation of the image directly counters the intersectional effects of racism and sexism that have denied African-American women a perch in the "gilded cage."

---

48. ALICE WALKER, THE COLOR PURPLE (1982). The most severe criticism of Walker developed after the book was filmed as a movie. Donald Bogle, a film historian, argued that part of the criticism of the movie stemmed from the one-dimensional portrayal of Mister, the abusive man. See Jacqueline Trescott, Passions Over Purple; Anger and Unease Over Film's Depiction of Black Men, Wash. Post, Feb. 5, 1986, at C1. Bogle argues that in the novel, Walker linked Mister's abusive conduct to his oppression in the white world—since Mister "can't be himself, he has to assert himself with the black woman." The movie failed to make any connection between Mister's abusive treatment of Black women and racism, and thereby presented Mister only as an "insensitive, callous man." Id.

49. See, e.g., Gerald Early, Her Picture in the Papers: Remembering Some Black Women, ANTAEUS, Spring 1988, at 9; Daryl Pinckney, Black Victims, Black Villains, N.Y. REVIEW OF BOOKS, Jan. 29, 1987, at 17; Trescott, supra note 48.

50. Trudier Harris, On the Color Purple, Stereotypes, and Silence, 18 BLACK AM. LIT. F. 155, 155 (1984).

ties is not available, domestic violence is unlikely to be addressed as a serious issue.

The political imperatives of a narrowly focused antiracist strategy support other practices that isolate women of color. For example, activists who have attempted to provide support services to Asian- and African-American women report intense resistance from those communities.[51] At other times, cultural and social factors contribute to suppression. Nilda Rimonte, director of Everywoman's Shelter in Los Angeles, points out that in the Asian community, saving the honor of the family from shame is a priority.[52] Unfortunately, this priority tends to be interpreted as obliging women not to scream rather than obliging men not to hit.

Race and culture contribute to the suppression of domestic violence in other ways as well. Women of color are often reluctant to call the police, a hesitancy likely due to a general unwillingness among people of color to subject their private lives to the scrutiny and control of a police force that is frequently hostile. There is also a more generalized community ethic against public intervention, the product of a desire to create a private world free from the diverse assaults on the public lives of racially subordinated people. The home is not simply a man's castle in the patriarchal sense, but may also function as a safe haven from the indignities of life in a racist society. However, but for this "safe haven" in many cases, women of color victimized by violence might otherwise seek help.

There is also a general tendency within antiracist discourse to regard the problem of violence against women of color as just another manifestation of racism. In this sense, the relevance of gender domination within the community is reconfigured as a consequence of discrimination against men. Of

51. The source of the resistance reveals an interesting difference between the Asian-American and African-American communities. In the African-American community, the resistance is usually grounded in efforts to avoid confirming negative stereotypes of African-Americans as violent; the concern of members in some Asian-American communities is to avoid tarnishing the model minority myth. Interview with Nilda Rimonte, Director of the Everywoman Shelter, in Los Angeles, California (April 19, 1991).

52. Nilda Rimonte, A Question of Culture: Cultural Approval of Violence Against Women in the Pacific-Asian Community and the Cultural Defense, 43 STAN. L. REV. 1311 (1991); see also Nilda Rimonte, Domestic Violence Against Pacific Asians, in MAKING WAVES: AN ANTHOLOGY OF WRITINGS BY AND ABOUT ASIAN AMERICAN WOMEN 327, 328 (Asian Women United of California ed. 1989) ("Traditionally Pacific Asians conceal and deny problems that threaten group pride and may bring on shame. Because of the strong emphasis on obligations to the family, a Pacific Asian woman will often remain silent rather than admit to a problem that might disgrace her family."). Additionally, the possibility of ending the marriage may inhibit an immigrant woman from seeking help. Tina Shum, a family counselor, explains that a " 'divorce is a shame on the whole family. . . . The Asian woman who divorces feels tremendous guilt.' " Of course, one could, in an attempt to be sensitive to cultural difference, stereotype a culture or defer to it in ways that abandon women to abuse. When—or, more importantly, how—to take culture into account when addressing the needs of women of color is a complicated issue. Testimony as to the particularities of Asian "culture" has increasingly been used in trials to determine the culpability of both Asian immigrant women and men who are charged with crimes of interpersonal violence. A position on the use of the "cultural defense" in these instances depends on how "culture" is being defined as well as on whether and to what extent the "cultural defense" has been used differently for Asian men and Asian women. See Leti Volpp, (Mis)Identifying Culture: Asian Women and the "Cultural Defense," (unpublished manuscript) (on file with the Stanford Law Review).

course, it is probably true that racism contributes to the cycle of violence, given the stress that men of color experience in dominant society. It is therefore more than reasonable to explore the links between racism and domestic violence. But the chain of violence is more complex and extends beyond this single link. Racism is linked to patriarchy to the extent that racism denies men of color the power and privilege that dominant men enjoy. When violence is understood as an acting-out of being denied male power in other spheres, it seems counterproductive to embrace constructs that implicitly link the solution to domestic violence to the acquisition of greater male power. The more promising political imperative is to challenge the legitimacy of such power expectations by exposing their dysfunctional and debilitating effect on families and communities of color. Moreover, while understanding links between racism and domestic violence is an important component of any effective intervention strategy, it is also clear that women of color need not await the ultimate triumph over racism before they can expect to live violence-free lives.

2. Race and the domestic violence lobby.

Not only do race-based priorities function to obscure the problem of violence suffered by women of color; feminist concerns often suppress minority experiences as well. Strategies for increasing awareness of domestic violence within the white community tend to begin by citing the commonly shared assumption that battering is a minority problem. The strategy then focuses on demolishing this strawman, stressing that spousal abuse also occurs in the white community. Countless first-person stories begin with a statement like, "I was not supposed to be a battered wife." That battering occurs in families of all races and all classes seems to be an ever-present theme of anti-abuse campaigns.[53] First-person anecdotes and studies, for example, consistently assert that battering cuts across racial, ethnic, economic, educational, and religious lines.[54] Such disclaimers seem relevant only in the presence of an

53. See, e.g., Hearings on Violent Crime Against Women, supra note 44, pt. 1, at 101 (testimony of Roni Young, Director of Domestic Violence Unit, Office of the State's Attorney for Baltimore City, Baltimore, Maryland) ("The victims do not fit a mold by any means."); Id. pt. 2, at 89 (testimony of Charlotte Fedders) ("Domestic violence occurs in all economic, cultural, racial, and religious groups. There is not a typical woman to be abused."); Id. pt. 2 at 139 (statement of Susan Kelly-Dreiss, Executive Director, Pennsylvania Coalition Against Domestic Violence) ("Victims come from a wide spectrum of life experiences and backgrounds. Women can be beaten in any neighborhood and in any town.").

54. See, e.g., LENORE F. WALKER, TERRIFYING LOVE: WHY BATTERED WOMEN KILL AND HOW SOCIETY RESPONDS 101-02 (1989) ("Battered women come from all types of economic, cultural, religious, and racial backgrounds. . . . They are women like you. Like me. Like those whom you know and love."); MURRAY A. STRAUS, RICHARD J. GELLES, SUZANNE K. STEINMETZ, BEHIND CLOSED DOORS: VIOLENCE IN THE AMERICAN FAMILY 31 (1980) ("Wife-beating is found in every class, at every income level."); Natalie Loder Clark, Crime Begins At Home: Let's Stop Punishing Victims and Perpetuating Violence, 28 WM. & MARY L. REV. 263, 282 n.74 (1987) ("The problem of domestic violence cuts across all social lines and affects 'families regardless of their economic class, race, national origin, or educational background.' Commentators have indicated that domestic violence is prevalent among upper middle-class families.") (citations omitted); Kathleen Waits, The Criminal Justice System's Response to Battering: Understanding the Problem, Forging the Solutions, 60 WASH. L. REV. 267, 276 (1985) ("It is important to emphasize that wife abuse is prevalent initial, widely held belief that domestic violence occurs primarily in minority or poor families. Indeed some authorities explicitly renounce the "stereotypical myths" about battered women.[55] A few commentators have even transformed the message that battering is not exclusively a problem of the poor or minority communities into a claim that it equally affects all races and classes.[56] Yet these comments seem less concerned with exploring domestic abuse within "stereotyped" communities than with removing the stereotype as an obstacle to exposing battering within white middle- and upper-class communities.[57]

Efforts to politicize the issue of violence against women challenge beliefs that violence occurs only in homes of "others." While it is unlikely that advocates and others who adopt this rhetorical strategy intend to exclude or ignore the needs of poor and colored women, the underlying premise of this seemingly univeralistic appeal is to keep the sensibilities of dominant social throughout our society. Recently collected data merely confirm what people working with victims have long known: battering occurs in all social and economic groups.") (citations omitted); Liza G. Lerman, Mediation of Wife Abuse Cases: The adverse Impact of Informal Dispute Resolution on Women, 7 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 57, 63 (1984) ("Battering occurs in all racial, economic, and religious groups, in rural, urban, and suburban settings.") (citation omitted); Steven M. Cook, Domestic Abuse Legislation in Illinois and Other States: A Survey and Suggestions for Reform, 1983 U. ILL. L. REV. 261, 262 (1983) (student author) ("Although domestic violence is difficult to measure, several studies suggest that spouse abuse is an extensive problem, one which strikes families regardless of their economic class, race, national origin, or educational background.") (citations omitted).

---

55. For example, Susan Kelly-Dreiss states:

> The public holds many myths about battered women—they are poor, they are women of color, they are uneducated, they are on welfare, they deserve to be beaten and they even like it. However, contrary to common misperceptions, domestic violence is not confined to any one socioeconomic, ethnic, religious, racial or age group.

Hearings on Violent Crime Against Women, supra note 44, pt. 2, at 139 (testimony of Susan Kelly-Dreiss, Executive Director, Pa. Coalition Against Domestic Violence). Kathleen Waits offers a possible explanation for this misperception:

> It is true that battered women who are also poor are more likely to come to the attention of governmental officials than are their middle- and upper-class counterparts. However, this phenomenon is caused more by the lack of alternative resources and the intrusiveness of the welfare state than by any significantly higher incidence of violence among lower-class families.

Waits, supra note 54, at 276-77 (citations omitted).

56. However, no reliable statistics support such a claim. In fact, some statistics suggest that there is a greater frequency of violence among the working classes and the poor. See M. STRAUS, R. GELLES, & S. STEINMETZ, supra note 54, at 31. Yet these statistics are also unreliable because, to follow Waits's observation, violence in middle- and upper-class homes remains hidden from the view of statisticians and governmental officials alike. See note 55 supra. I would suggest that assertions that the problem is the same across race and class are driven less by actual knowledge about the prevalence of domestic violence in different communities than by advocates' recognition that the image of domestic violence as an issue involving primarily the poor and minorities complicates efforts to mobilize against it.

57. On January 14, 1991, Senator Joseph Biden (D-Del.) introduced Senate Bill 15, the Violence Against Women Act of 1991, comprehensive legislation addressing violent crime confronting women. S. 15, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. (1991). The bill consists of several measures designed to create safe streets, safe homes, and safe campuses for women. More specifically, Title III of the bill creates a civil rights remedy for crimes of violence motivated by the victim's gender. Id. § 301. Among the findings supporting the bill were "(1) crimes motivated by the victim's gender constitute bias crimes in violation of the victim's right to be free from discrimination on the basis of gender" and "(2) current law [does not provide a civil rights remedy] for gender crimes committed on the street or in the home." S. REP. NO. 197, 102d Cong., 1st Sess. 27 (1991).

groups focused on the experiences of those groups. Indeed, as subtly suggested by the opening comments of Senator David Boren (D-Okla.) in support of the Violence Against Women Act of 1991, the displacement of the "other" as the presumed victim of domestic violence works primarily as a political appeal to rally white elites. Boren said, > Violent crimes against women are not limited to the streets of the inner cities, but also occur in homes in the urban and rural areas across the country.

>
> Violence against women affects not only those who are actually beaten and brutalized, but indirectly affects all women. Today, our wives, mothers, daughters, sisters, and colleagues are held captive by fear generated from these violent crimes—held captive not for what they do or who they are, but solely because of gender.[58]

Rather than focusing on and illuminating how violence is disregarded when the home is "othered," the strategy implicit in Senator Boren's remarks functions instead to politicize the problem only in the dominant community. This strategy permits white women victims to come into focus, but does little to disrupt the patterns of neglect that permitted the problem to continue as long as it was imagined to be a minority problem. The experience of violence by minority women is ignored, except to the extent it gains white support for domestic violence programs in the white community.

Senator Boren and his colleagues no doubt believe that they have provided legislation and resources that will address the problems of all women victimized by domestic violence. Yet despite their universalizing rhetoric of "all" women, they were able to empathize with female victims of domestic violence only by looking past the plight of "other" women and by recognizing the familiar faces of their own. The strength of the appeal to "protect our women" must be its race and class specificity. After all, it has always been someone's wife, mother, sister, or daughter that has been abused, even when the violence was stereotypically Black or Brown, and poor. The point here is not that the Violence Against Women Act is particularistic on its own terms, but that unless the Senators and other policymakers ask why violence remained insignificant as long as it was understood as a minority problem, it is unlikely that women of color will share equally in the distribution of resources and concern. It is even more unlikely, however, that those in power will be forced to confront this issue. As long as attempts to politicize domestic violence focus on convincing whites that this is not a "minority" problem but their problem, any authentic and sensitive attention to the

58. 137 Cong. Rec. S611 (daily ed. Jan. 14, 1991) (statement of Sen. Boren). Senator William Cohen (D-Me.) followed with a similar statement, noting that rapes and domestic assaults > are not limited to the streets of our inner cities or to those few highly publicized cases that we read about in the newspapers or see on the evening news. Women throughout the country, in our Nation's urban areas and rural communities, are being beaten and brutalized in the streets and in their homes. It is our mothers, wives, daughters, sisters, friends, neighbors, and coworkers who are being victimized; and in many cases, they are being victimized by family members, friends, and acquaintances.

Id. (statement of Sen. Cohen).

experiences of Black and other minority women probably will continue to be regarded as jeopardizing the movement.

While Senator Boren's statement reflects a self-consciously political presentation of domestic violence, an episode of the CBS news program 48 Hours[59] shows how similar patterns of othering nonwhite women are apparent in journalistic accounts of domestic violence as well. The program presented seven women who were victims of abuse. Six were interviewed at some length along with their family members, friends, supporters, and even detractors. The viewer got to know something about each of these women. These victims were humanized. Yet the seventh woman, the only nonwhite one, never came into focus. She was literally unrecognizable throughout the segment, first introduced by photographs showing her face badly beaten and later shown with her face electronically altered in the videotape of a hearing at which she was forced to testify. Other images associated with this woman included shots of a bloodstained room and blood-soaked pillows. Her boyfriend was pictured handcuffed while the camera zoomed in for a close-up of his bloodied sneakers. Of all the presentations in the episode, hers was the most graphic and impersonal. The overall point of the segment "featuring" this woman was that battering might not escalate into homicide if battered women would only cooperate with prosecutors. In focusing on its own agenda and failing to explore why this woman refused to cooperate, the program diminished this woman, communicating, however subtly, that she was responsible for her own victimization.

Unlike the other women, all of whom, again, were white, this Black woman had no name, no family, no context. The viewer sees her only as victimized and uncooperative. She cries when shown pictures. She pleads not to be forced to view the bloodstained room and her disfigured face. The program does not help the viewer to understand her predicament. The possible reasons she did not want to testify—fear, love, or possibly both—are never suggested.[60] Most unfortunately, she, unlike the other six, is given no epilogue. While the fates of the other women are revealed at the end of the episode, we discover nothing about the Black woman. She, like the "others" she represents, is simply left to herself and soon forgotten.

I offer this description to suggest that "other" women are silenced as much by being relegated to the margin of experience as by total exclusion. Tokenistic, objectifying, voyeuristic inclusion is at least as disempowering as complete exclusion. The effort to politicize violence against women will do little to address Black and other minority women if their images are retained simply to magnify the problem rather than to humanize their experiences. Similarly, the antiracist agenda will not be advanced significantly by forcibly suppressing the reality of battering in minority communities. As the 48 Hours episode makes clear, the images and stereotypes we fear are readily available and are frequently deployed in ways that do not generate sensitive understanding of the nature of domestic violence in minority communities.

59. 48 Hours: Till Death Do Us Part (CBS television broadcast, Feb. 6, 1991).

60. See Christine A. Littleton, Women's Experience and the Problem of Transition: Perspectives on Male Battering of Women, 1989 U. CHI. LEGAL F. 23.

3. Race and domestic violence support services.

Women working in the field of domestic violence have sometimes reproduced the subordination and marginalization of women of color by adopting policies, priorities, or strategies of empowerment that either elide or wholly disregard the particular intersectional needs of women of color. While gender, race, and class intersect to create the particular context in which women of color experience violence, certain choices made by "allies" can reproduce intersectional subordination within the very resistance strategies designed to respond to the problem.

This problem is starkly illustrated by the inaccessibility of domestic violence support services to many non-English-speaking women. In a letter written to the deputy commissioner of the New York State Department of Social Services, Diana Campos, Director of Human Services for Programas de Ocupaciones y Desarrollo Económico Real, Inc. (PODER), detailed the case of a Latina in crisis who was repeatedly denied accomodation at a shelter because she could not prove that she was English-proficient. The woman had fled her home with her teenaged son, believing her husband's threats to kill them both. She called the domestic violence hotline administered by PODER seeking shelter for herself and her son. Because most shelters would not accommodate the woman with her son, they were forced to live on the streets for two days. The hotline counselor was finally able to find an agency that would take both the mother and the son, but when the counselor told the intake coordinator at the shelter that the woman spoke limited English, the coordinator told her that they could not take anyone who was not English-proficient. When the woman in crisis called back and was told of the shelter's "rule," she replied that she could understand English if spoken to her slowly. As Campos explains, Mildred, the hotline counselor, told Wendy, the intake coordinator > that the woman said that she could communicate a little in English. Wendy told Mildred that they could not provide services to this woman because they have house rules that the woman must agree to follow. Mildred asked her, "What if the woman agrees to follow your rules? Will you still not take her?" Wendy responded that all of the women at the shelter are required to attend [a] support group and they would not be able to have her in the group if she could not communicate. Mildred mentioned the severity of this woman's case. She told Wendy that the woman had been wandering the streets at night while her husband is home, and she had been mugged twice. She also reiterated the fact that this woman was in danger of being killed by either her husband or a mugger. Mildred expressed that the woman's safety was a priority at this point, and that once in a safe place, receiving counseling in a support group could be dealt with.[61]

61. Letter of Diana M. Campos, Director of Human Services, PODER, to Joseph Semidei,

The intake coordinator restated the shelter's policy of taking only English-speaking women, and stated further that the woman would have to call the shelter herself for screening. If the woman could communicate with them in English, she might be accepted. When the woman called the PODER hotline later that day, she was in such a state of fear that the hotline counselor who had been working with her had difficulty understanding her in Spanish.[62] Campos directly intervened at this point, calling the executive director of the shelter. A counselor called back from the shelter. As Campos reports,

> Marie [the counselor] told me that they did not want to take the woman in the shelter because they felt that the woman would feel isolated. I explained that the son agreed to translate for his mother during the intake process. Furthermore, that we would assist them in locating a Spanish-speaking battered women's advocate to assist in counseling her. Marie stated that utilizing the son was not an acceptable means of communication for them, since it further victimized the victim. In addition, she stated that they had similar experiences with women who were non-English-speaking, and that the women eventually just left because they were not able to communicate with anyone. I expressed my extreme concern for her safety and reiterated that we would assist them in providing her with the necessary services until we could get her placed someplace where they had bilingual staff.[63]

After several more calls, the shelter finally agreed to take the woman. The woman called once more during the negotiation; however, after a plan was in place, the woman never called back. Said Campos, "After so many calls, we are now left to wonder if she is alive and well, and if she will ever have enough faith in our ability to help her to call us again the next time she is in crisis."[64]

Despite this woman's desperate need, she was unable to receive the protection afforded English-speaking women, due to the shelter's rigid commitment to exclusionary policies. Perhaps even more troubling than the shelter's lack of bilingual resources was its refusal to allow a friend or relative to translate for the woman. This story illustrates the absurdity of a feminist approach that would make the ability to attend a support group without a translator a more significant consideration in the distribution of resources than the risk of physical harm on the street. The point is not that the shelter's image of empowerment is empty, but rather that it was imposed without regard to the disempowering consequences for women who didn't match the kind of client the shelter's administrators imagined. And thus they failed to accomplish the basic priority of the shelter movement—to get the woman out of danger.

Deputy Commissioner, New York State Department of Social Services (Mar. 26, 1992) [hereinafter PODER Letter].

62. The woman had been slipping back into her home during the day when her husband was at work. She remained in a heightened state of anxiety because he was returning shortly and she would be forced to go back out into the streets for yet another night.

63. PODER Letter, supra note 61 (emphasis added).

64. Id.

Here the woman in crisis was made to bear the burden of the shelter's refusal to anticipate and provide for the needs of non-English-speaking women. Said Campos, "It is unfair to impose more stress on victims by placing them in the position of having to demonstrate their proficiency in English in order to receive services that are readily available to other battered women."[65] The problem is not easily dismissed as one of well-intentioned ignorance. The specific issue of monolingualism and the monistic view of women's experience that set the stage for this tragedy were not new issues in New York. Indeed, several women of color reported that they had repeatedly struggled with the New York State Coalition Against Domestic Violence over language exclusion and other practices that marginalized the interests of women of color.[66] Yet despite repeated lobbying, the Coalition did not act to incorporate the specific needs of nonwhite women into its central organizing vision.

Some critics have linked the Coalition's failure to address these issues to the narrow vision of coalition that animated its interaction with women of color in the first place. The very location of the Coalition's headquarters in Woodstock, New York—an area where few people of color live—seemed to guarantee that women of color would play a limited role in formulating policy. Moreover, efforts to include women of color came, it seems, as something of an afterthought. Many were invited to participate only after the Coalition was awarded a grant by the state to recruit women of color. However, as one "recruit" said, "they were not really prepared to deal with us or our issues. They thought that they could simply incorporate us into their organization without rethinking any of their beliefs or priorities and that we would be happy."[67] Even the most formal gestures of inclusion were not to be taken for granted. On one occasion when several women of color attended a meeting to discuss a special task force on women of color, the group debated all day over including the issue on the agenda.[68]

The relationship between the white women and the women of color on the Board was a rocky one from beginning to end. Other conflicts developed over differing definitions of feminism. For example, the Board decided to hire a Latina staffperson to manage outreach programs to the Latino community, but the white members of the hiring committee rejected candidates favored by Latina committee members who did not have recognized feminist

65. Id.

66. Roundtable Discussion on Racism and the Domestic Violence Movement (April 2, 1992) (transcript on file with the Stanford Law Review). The participants in the discussion—Diana Campos, Director, Bilingual Outreach Project of the New York State Coalition Against Domestic Violence; Elsa A. Rios, Project Director, Victim Intervention Project (a community-based project in East Harlem, New York, serving battered women); and Haydee Rosario, a social worker with the East Harlem Council for Human Services and a Victim Intervention Project volunteer—recounted conflicts relating to race and culture during their association with the New York State Coalition Against Domestic Violence, a state oversight group that distributed resources to battered women's shelters throughout the state and generally set policy priorities for the shelters that were part of the Coalition.

67. Id.

68. Id.

credentials. As Campos pointed out, by measuring Latinas against their own biographies, the white members of the Board failed to recognize the different circumstances under which feminist consciousness develops and manifests itself within minority communities. Many of the women who interviewed for the position were established activists and leaders within their own community, a fact in itself suggesting that these women were probably familiar with the specific gender dynamics in their communities and were accordingly better qualified to handle outreach than other candidates with more conventional feminist credentials.[69]

The Coalition ended a few months later when the women of color walked out.[70] Many of these women returned to community-based organizations, preferring to struggle over women's issues within their communities rather than struggle over race and class issues with white middle-class women. Yet as illustrated by the case of the Latina who could find no shelter, the dominance of a particular perspective and set of priorities within the shelter community continues to marginalize the needs of women of color.

The struggle over which differences matter and which do not is neither an abstract nor an insignificant debate among women. Indeed, these conflicts are about more than difference as such; they raise critical issues of power. The problem is not simply that women who dominate the antiviolence movement are different from women of color but that they frequently have power to determine, either through material or rhetorical resources, whether the intersectional differences of women of color will be incorporated at all into the basic formulation of policy. Thus, the struggle over incorporating these differences is not a petty or superficial conflict about who gets to sit at the head of the table. In the context of violence, it is sometimes a deadly serious matter of who will survive—and who will not.[71]

B. Political Intersectionalities in Rape

In the previous sections, I have used intersectionality to describe or frame various relationships between race and gender. I have used intersectionality as a way to articulate the interaction of racism and patriarchy generally. I have also used intersectionality to describe the location of women of color both within overlapping systems of subordination and at the margins of feminism and antiracism. When race and gender factors are examined in the context of rape, intersectionality can be used to map the ways in which racism and patriarchy have shaped conceptualizations of rape, to describe the unique vulnerability of women of color to these converging systems of domination, and to track the marginalization of women of color within antiracist and antirape discourses.[72]

69. Id.

70. Ironically, the specific dispute that led to the walk-out concerned the housing of the Spanish-language domestic violence hotline. The hotline was initially housed at the Coalition's headquarters, but languished after a succession of coordinators left the organization. Latinas on the Coalition board argued that the hotline should be housed at one of the community service agencies, while the board insisted on maintaining control of it. The hotline is now housed at PODER. Id.

71. Said Campos, "It would be a shame that in New York state a battered woman's life or death were dependent upon her English language skills." PODER Letter, supra note 61.

1. Racism and sexism in dominant conceptualizations of rape.

Generations of critics and activists have criticized dominant conceptualizations of rape as racist and sexist. These efforts have been important in revealing the way in which representations of rape both reflect and reproduce race and gender hierarchies in American society.[73] Black women, as both women and people of color, are situated within both groups, each of which has benefitted from challenges to sexism and racism, respectively, and yet the particular dynamics of gender and race relating to the rape of Black women have received scant attention. Although antiracist and antisexist assaults on rape have been politically useful to Black women, at some level, the monofocal antiracist and feminist critiques have also produced a political discourse that disserves Black women.

Historically, the dominant conceptualization of rape as quintessentially Black offender/white victim has left Black men subject to legal and extralegal violence. The use of rape to legitimize efforts to control and discipline the Black community is well established, and the casting of all Black men as potential threats to the sanctity of white womanhood was a familiar construct that antiracists confronted and attempted to dispel over a century ago.

Feminists have attacked other dominant, essentially patriarchal, conceptions of rape, particularly as represented through law. The early emphasis of rape law on the property-like aspect of women's chastity resulted in less solicitude for rape victims whose chastity had been in some way devalued. Some of the most insidious assumptions were written into the law, including the early common-law notion that a woman alleging rape must be able to show that she resisted to the utmost in order to prove that she was raped, rather than seduced. Women themselves were put on trial, as judge and jury scrutinized their lives to determine whether they were innocent victims or women who essentially got what they were asking for. Legal rules thus functioned to legitimize a good woman/bad woman dichotomy in which women who lead sexually autonomous lives were usually least likely to be vindicated if they were raped.

72. The discussion in following section focuses rather narrowly on the dynamics of a Black/white sexual hierarchy. I specify African Americans in part because given the centrality of sexuality as a site of racial domination of African Americans, any generalizations that might be drawn from this history seem least applicable to other racial groups. To be sure, the specific dynamics of racial oppression experienced by other racial groups are likely to have a sexual componant as well. Indeed, the repertoire of racist imagery that is commonly associated with different racial groups each contain a sexual stereotype as well. These images probably influence the way that rapes involving other minority groups are perceived both internally and in society-at-large, but they are likely to function in different ways.

73. For example, the use of rape to legitimize efforts to control and discipline the Black community is well established in historical literature on rape and race. See JOYCE E. WILLIAMS & KAREN A. HOLMES, THE SECOND ASSAULT: RAPE AND PUBLIC ATTITUDES 26 (1981) ("Rape, or the threat of rape, is an important tool of social control in a complex system of racial-sexual stratification.").

Today, long after the most egregious discriminatory laws have been eradicated, constructions of rape in popular discourse and in criminal law continue to manifest vestiges of these racist and sexist themes. As Valerie Smith notes, "a variety of cultural narratives that historically have linked sexual violence with racial oppression continue to determine the nature of public response to [interracial rapes]."[74] Smith reviews the well-publicized case of a jogger who was raped in New York's Central Park[75] to expose how the public discourse on the assault "made the story of sexual victimization inseparable from the rhetoric of racism."[76] Smith contends that in dehumanizing the rapists as "savages," "wolves," and "beasts," the press "shaped the discourse around the event in ways that inflamed pervasive fears about black men."[77] Given the chilling parallels between the media representations of the Central Park rape and the sensationalized coverage of similar allegations that in the past frequently culminated in lynchings, one could hardly be surprised when Donald Trump took out a full page ad in four New York newspapers demanding that New York "Bring Back the Death Penalty, Bring Back Our Police."[78]

Other media spectacles suggest that traditional gender-based stereotypes that are oppressive to women continue to figure in the popular construction of rape. In Florida, for example, a controversy was sparked by a jury's acquittal of a man accused of a brutal rape because, in the jurors' view, the woman's attire suggested that she was asking for sex.[79] Even the press cov-

74. Valerie Smith, Split Affinities: The Case of Interracial Rape, in CONFLICTS IN FEMINISM 271, 274 (Marianne Hirsch & Evelyn Fox Keller eds. 1990).

75. On April 18, 1989, a young white woman, jogging through New York's Central Park, was raped, severely beaten, and left unconscious in an attack by as many as 12 Black youths. Craig Wolff, Youths Rape and Beat Central Park Jogger, N.Y. Times, Apr. 21, 1989, at B1.

76. Smith, supra note 74, at 276-78.

77. Smith cites the use of animal images to characterize the accused Black rapists, including descriptions such as: " 'a wolfpack of more than a dozen young teenagers' and '[t]here was a full moon Wednesday night. A suitable backdrop for the howling of wolves. A vicious pack ran rampant through Central Park. . . . This was bestial brutality.' " An editorial in the New York Times was entitled "The Jogger and the Wolf Pack." Id. at 277 (citations omitted).

Evidence of the ongoing link between rape and racism in American culture is by no means unique to media coverage of the Central Park jogger case. In December 1990, the George Washington University student newspaper, The Hatchet, printed a story in which a white student alleged that she had been raped at knifepoint by two Black men on or near the campus. The story caused considerable racial tension. Shortly after the report appeared, the woman's attorney informed the campus police that his client had fabricated the attack. After the hoax was uncovered, the woman said that she hoped the story "would highlight the problems of safety for women." Felicity Banger, False Rape Report Upsetting Campus, N.Y. Times, Dec. 12, 1990, at A2; see also Les Payne, A Rape Hoax Stirs Up Hate, Newsday, Dec. 16, 1990, at 6.

78. William C. Troft, Deadly Donald, UPI, Apr. 30 1989. Donald Trump explained that he spent $85,000 to take out these ads because "I want to hate these muggers and murderers. They should be forced to suffer and, when they kill, they should be executed for their crimes." Trump Calls for Death to Muggers, L.A. Times, May 1, 1989, at A2. But cf. Leaders Fear 'Lynch' Hysteria in Response to Trump Ads, UPI, May 6, 1989 (community leaders feared that Trump's ads would fan "the flames of racial polarization and hatred"); Cynthia Fuchs Epstein, Cost of Full-Page Ad Could Help Fight Causes of Urban Violence, N.Y. Times, May 15, 1989, at A18 ("Mr. Trump's proposal could well lead to further violence.").

79. Ian Ball, Rape Victim to Blame, Says Jury, Daily Telegraph, Oct. 6, 1989, at 3. Two months after the acquittal, the same man pled guilty to raping a Georgia woman to whom he said, erage of William Kennedy Smith's rape trial involved a considerable degree of speculation regarding the sexual history of his accuser.[80]

The racism and sexism written into the social construction of rape are merely contemporary manifestations of rape narratives emanating from a historical period when race and sex hierarchies were more explicitly policed. Yet another is the devaluation of Black women and the marginalization of their sexual victimizations. This was dramatically shown in the special attention given to the rape of the Central Park jogger during a week in which twenty-eight other cases of first-degree rape or attempted rape were reported in New York.[81] Many of these rapes were as horrific as the rape in Central Park, yet all were virtually ignored by the media. Some were gang rapes,[82] and in a case that prosecutors described as was "one of the most brutal in recent years," a woman was raped, sodomized and thrown fifty feet off the top of a four-story building in Brooklyn. Witnesses testified that the victim "screamed as she plunged down the air shaft. . . . She suffered fractures of both ankles and legs, her pelvis was shattered and she suffered extensive internal injuries."[83] This rape survivor, like most of the other forgotten victims that week, was a woman of color.

In short, during the period when the Central Park jogger dominated the headlines, many equally horrifying rapes occurred. None, however, elicited the public expressions of horror and outrage that attended the Central Park rape.[84] To account for these different responses, Professor Smith suggests a

---

"It's your fault. You're wearing a skirt." Roger Simon, Rape: Clothing is Not the Criminal, L.A. Times, Feb. 18, 1990, at E2.

80. See Barbara Kantrowitz, Naming Names, NEWSWEEK, Apr. 29, 1991, at 26 (discussing the tone of several newspaper investigations into the character of the woman who alleged that she was raped by William Kennedy Smith). There were other dubious assumptions animating the coverage. One article described Smith as an "unlikely candidate for the rapist's role." Boy's Night Out in Palm Beach, TIME, Apr. 22, 1991, at 82. But see Hillary Rustin, Letters: The Kennedy Problem, TIME, May 20, 1991, at 7 (criticizing authors for perpetuating stereotypical images of the who is or is not a "likely" rapist). Smith was eventually acquitted.

81. The New York Times pointed out that "[n]early all the rapes reported during that April week were of black or Hispanic women. Most went unnoticed by the public." Don Terry, In Week of an Infamous Rape, 28 Other Victims Suffer, N.Y. Times, May 29, 1989, at B25. Nearly all of the rapes occurred between attackers and victims of the same race: "Among the victims were 17 blacks, 7 Hispanic women, 3 whites, and 2 Asians." Id.

82. In Glen Ridge, an affluent New Jersey suburb, five white middle-class teenagers allegedly gang-raped a retarded white woman with a broom handle and a miniature baseball bat. See Robert Hanley, Sexual Assault Splits a New Jersey Town, N.Y. Times, May 26, 1989, at B1; Derrick Z. Jackson, The Seeds of Violence, Boston Globe, June 2, 1989, at 23; Bill Turque, Gang Rape in the Suburbs, NEWSWEEK, June 5, 1989, at 26.

83. Robert D. McFadden, 2 Men Get 6 to 18 Years for Rape in Brooklyn, N.Y. Times, Oct. 2, 1990, at B2. The woman "lay, half naked, moaning and crying for help until a neighbor heard her" in the air shaft. Community Rallies to Support Victim of Brutal Brooklyn Rape, N.Y. Daily News, June 26, 1989, at 6. The victim "suffered such extensive injuries that she had to learn to walk again. . . . She faces years of psychological counseling . . . ." McFadden, supra.

84. This differential response was epitomized by public reaction to the rape-murder of a young Black woman in Boston on October 31, 1990. Kimberly Rae Harbour, raped and stabbed more than 100 times by eight members of a local gang, was an unwed mother, an occasional prostitute, and a drug-user. The Central Park victim was a white, upper-class professional. The Black woman was raped and murdered intraracially. The white woman was raped and left for dead interracially. The Central Park rape became a national rallying cause against random (read Black male) violence; the sexual hierarchy in operation that holds certain female bodies in higher regard than others.[85] Statistics from prosecution of rape cases suggest that this hierarchy is at least one significant, albeit often overlooked factor in evaluating attitudes toward rape.[86] A study of rape dispositions in Dallas, for example, showed that the average prison term for a man convicted of raping a Black woman was two years,[87] as compared to five years for the rape of a Latina and ten years for the rape of an Anglo woman.[88] A related issue is the fact that African-American victims of rape are the least likely to be believed.[89] The Dallas study and others like it also point to a more subtle problem: neither the antirape nor the antiracist political agenda has focused on the Black rape victim. This inattention stems from the way the problem of rape is conceptualized within antiracist and antirape reform discourses. Although the rhetoric of both agendas formally includes Black women, racism is generally not problematized in feminism, and sexism, not problematized in antiracist discourses. Consequently, the plight of Black women is relegated to a secondary importance: The primary beneficiaries of policies supported by feminists and others concerned about rape tend to be white women; the primary beneficiaries of the Black community's concern over racism and rape, Black men. Ultimately, the reformist and rhetorical strategies that have grown out of antiracist and feminist rape reform movements have been ineffective in politicizing the treatment of Black women.

2. Race and the antirape lobby.

Feminist critiques of rape have focused on the way rape law has reflected rape of Kimberly Rae Harbour was written into a local script highlighted by the Boston Police Department's siege upon Black men in pursuit of the "fictional" Carol Stuart murderer. See John Ellement, 8 Teen-agers Charged in Rape, Killing of Dorchester Woman, Boston Globe, Nov. 20, 1990, at 1; James S. Kunen, Homicide No. 119, PEOPLE, Jan. 14, 1991, at 42. For a comparison of the Stuart and Harbour murders, see Christopher B. Daly, Scant Attention Paid Victim as Homicides Reach Record in Boston, Wash. Post, Dec. 5, 1990, at A3.

---

85. Smith points out that "[t]he relative invisibility of black women victims of rape also reflects the differential value of women's bodies in capitalist societies. To the extent that rape is constructed as a crime against the property of privileged white men, crimes against less valuable women—women of color, working-class women, and lesbians, for example—mean less or mean differently than those against white women from the middle and upper classes." Smith, supra note 74, at 275-76.

86. "Cases involving black offenders and black victims were treated the least seriously." GARY D. LAFREE, RAPE AND CRIMINAL JUSTICE: THE SOCIAL CONSTRUCTION OF SEXUAL ASSAULT (1989). LaFree also notes, however, that "the race composition of the victim-offender dyad" was not the only predictor of case dispositions. Id. at 219-20.

87. Race Tilts the Scales of Justice. Study: Dallas Punishes Attacks on Whites More Harshly, Dallas Times Herald, Aug. 19, 1990, at A1. A study of 1988 cases in Dallas County's criminal justice system concluded that rapists whose victims were white were punished more severely than those whose victims were Black or Hispanic. The Dallas Times Herald, which had commissioned the study, reported that "[t]he punishment almost doubled when the attacker and victim were of different races. Except for such interracial crime, sentencing disparities were much less pronounced . . . ." Id.

88. Id. Two criminal law experts, Iowa law professor David Baldus and Carnegie-Mellon University professor Alfred Blumstein "said that the racial inequities might be even worse than the figures suggest." Id.

89. See G. LAFREE, supra note 86, at 219-20 (quoting jurors who doubted the credibility of Black rape survivors); see also H. FEILD & L. BIENEN, supra note 35, at 117-18.

dominant rules and expectations that tightly regulate the sexuality of women. In the context of the rape trial, the formal definition of rape as well as the evidentiary rules applicable in a rape trial discriminate against women by measuring the rape victim against a narrow norm of acceptable sexual conduct for women. Deviation from that norm tends to turn women into illegitimate rape victims, leading to rejection of their claims.

Historically, legal rules dictated, for example, that rape victims had to have resisted their assailants in order for their claims to be accepted. Any abatement of struggle was interpreted as the woman's consent to the intercourse under the logic that a real rape victim would protect her honor virtually to the death. While utmost resistance is not formally required anymore, rape law continues to weigh the credibility of women against narrow normative standards of female behavior. A woman's sexual history, for example, is frequently explored by defense attorneys as a way of suggesting that a woman who consented to sex on other occasions was likely to have consented in the case at issue. Past sexual conduct as well as the specific circumstances leading up to the rape are often used to distinguish the moral character of the legitimate rape victim from women who are regarded as morally debased or in some other way responsible for their own victimization.

This type of feminist critique of rape law has informed many of the fundamental reform measures enacted in antirape legislation, including increased penalties for convicted rapists[90] and changes in evidentiary rules to preclude attacks on the woman's moral character.[91] These reforms limit the tactics attorneys might use to tarnish the image of the rape victim, but they operate within preexisting social constructs that distinguish victims from nonvictims on the basis of their sexual character. And so these reforms, while beneficial, do not challenge the background cultural narratives that undermine the credibility of Black women.

Because Black women face subordination based on both race and gender, reforms of rape law and judicial procedures that are premised on narrow conceptions of gender subordination may not address the devaluation of Black women. Much of the problem results from the way certain gender expectations for women intersect with certain sexualized notions of race, no-

90. For example, Title I of the Violence Against Women Act creates federal penalties for sex crimes. See 137 CONG. REC. S597, S599-600 (daily ed. Jan. 14, 1991). Specifically, section 111 of the Act authorizes the Sentencing Commission to promulgate guidelines to provide that any person who commits a violation after a prior conviction can be punished by a term of imprisonment or fines up to twice of what is otherwise provided in the guidelines. S. 15, supra note 57, at 8. Additionally section 112 of the Act authorizes the Sentencing Commission to amend its sentencing guidelines to provide that a defendant convicted of rape or aggravated rape, "shall be assigned a base offense . . . that is at least 4 levels greater than the base offense level applicable to such offenses." Id. at 5.

91. Title I of the Act also creates new evidentiary rules for the introduction of sexual history in criminal and civil cases. Id. Sections 151 and 152 amend Fed. R. Evid. 412 by prohibiting "reputation or opinion evidence of the past sexual behavior of an alleged victim" from being admitted, and limiting other evidence of past sexual behavior. Id. at 39-44. Similarly, section 153 amends the rape shield law. Id. at 44-45. States have also either enacted or attempted to enact rape shield law reforms of their own. See Harriet R. Galvin, Shielding Rape Victims in the State and Federal Courts: A Proposal for the Second Decade, 70 MINN. L. REV. 763 (1986); Barbara Fromm, Sexual Battery: Mixed-Signal Legislation Reveals Need for Further Reform, 18 FLA. ST. U. L. REV. 579 (1991).

tions that are deeply entrenched in American culture. Sexualized images of African Americans go all the way back to Europeans' first engagement with Africans. Blacks have long been portrayed as more sexual, more earthy, more gratification-oriented. These sexualized images of race intersect with norms of women's sexuality, norms that are used to distinguish good women from bad, the madonnas from the whores. Thus Black women are essentially prepackaged as bad women within cultural narratives about good women who can be raped and bad women who cannot. The discrediting of Black women's claims is the consequence of a complex intersection of a gendered sexual system, one that constructs rules appropriate for good and bad women, and a race code that provides images defining the allegedly essential nature of Black women. If these sexual images form even part of the cultural imagery of Black women, then the very representation of a Black female body at least suggests certain narratives that may make Black women's rape either less believable or less important. These narratives may explain why rapes of Black women are less likely to result in convictions and long prison terms than rapes of white women.[92]

Rape law reform measures that do not in some way engage and challenge the narratives that are read onto Black women's bodies are unlikely to affect the way cultural beliefs oppress Black women in rape trials. While the degree to which legal reform can directly challenge cultural beliefs that shape rape trials is limited,[93] the very effort to mobilize political resources toward addressing the sexual oppression of Black women can be an important first step in drawing greater attention to the problem. One obstacle to such an effort has been the failure of most antirape activists to analyze specifically the consequences of racism in the context of rape. In the absence of a direct attempt to address the racial dimensions of rape, Black women are simply presumed to be represented in and benefitted by prevailing feminist critiques.

3. Antiracism and rape.

Antiracist critiques of rape law focus on how the law operates primarily to condemn rapes of white women by Black men.[94] While the heightened

92. See note 35 supra.

93. One can imagine certain trial-based interventions that might assist prosecutors in struggling with these beliefs. For example, one might consider expanding the scope of voir dire to examine jurors' attitudes toward Black rape victims. Moreover, as more is learned about Black women's response to rape, this information may be deemed relevant in evaluating Black women's testimony and thus warrant introduction through expert testimony. In this regard, it is worth noting that the battered women's syndrome and the rape trauma syndrome are both forms of expert testimony that frequently function in the context of a trial to counter stereotypes and other dominant narratives that might otherwise produce a negative outcome for the woman "on trial." These interventions, probably unimaginable a short while ago, grew out of efforts to study and somehow quantify women's experience. Similar interventions that address the particular dimensions of the experiences of women of color may well be possible. This knowledge may grow out of efforts to map how women of color have fared under standard interventions. For an example of an intersectional critique of the battered women's syndrome, see Sharon A. Allard, Rethinking Battered Woman Syndrome: A Black Feminist Perspective, 1 U.C.L.A. WOMEN'S L.J. 191 (1991) (student author).

94. See Smith, supra note 74 (discussing media sensationalization of the Central Park jogger case as consistent with historical patterns of focusing almost exclusively on Black male/white female concern with protecting white women against Black men has been primarily criticized as a form of discrimination against Black men,[95] it just as surely reflects devaluation of Black women.[96] This disregard for Black women results from an exclusive focus on the consequences of the problem for Black men.[97] Of course, rape accusations historically have provided a justification for white terrorism against the Black community, generating a legitimating power of such strength that it created a veil virtually impenetrable to appeals based on either humanity or fact.[98] Ironically, while the fear of the Black rapist was exploited to legitimate the practice of lynching, rape was not even alleged in most cases.[99] The well-developed fear of Black sexuality served primarily to increase white tolerance for racial terrorism as a prophylactic measure to keep Blacks under control.[100] Within the African-American community, cases involving race-based accusations against Black men have stood as hallmarks of racial injustice. The prosecution of the Scottsboro boys[101] and the Emmett Till[102] tragedy, for example, triggered African-dyads.); see also Terry, supra note 81 (discussing the 28 other rapes that occurred during the same week, but that were not given the same media coverage). Although rape is largely an intraracial crime, this explanation for the disparate coverage given to nonwhite victims is doubtful, however, given the findings of at least one study that 48% of those surveyed believed that most rapes involved a Black offender and a white victim. See H. FEILD & L. BIENEN, supra note 35, at 80. Ironically, Feild and Bienen include in their book-length study of rape two photographs distributed to the subjects in their study depicting the alleged victim as white and the alleged assailant as Black. Given the authors' acknowledgment that rape was overwhelmingly intraracial, the appearance of these photos was particularly striking, especially because they were the only photos included in the entire book.

95. See, e.g., G. LAFREE, supra note 86, at 237-39.

96. For a similar argument that race-of-victim discrimination in the administration of the death penalty actually represents the devalued status of Black victims rather than discrimination against Black offenders, see Randall L. Kennedy, McCleskey v. Kemp: Race, Capital Punishment, and the Supreme Court, 101 HARV. L. REV. 1388 (1988).

97. The statistic that 89% of all men executed for rape in this country were Black is a familiar one. Furman v. Georgia, 408 U.S. 238, 364 (1972) (Marshall, J., concurring). Unfortunately, the dominant analysis of racial discrimination in rape prosecutions generally does not discuss whether any of the rape victims in these cases were Black. See Jennifer Wriggins, Rape, Racism, and the Law, 6 HARV. WOMEN'S L.J. 103, 113 (1983) (student author).

98. Race was frequently sufficient to fill in facts that were unknown or unknowable. As late as 1953, the Alabama Supreme Court ruled that a jury could take race into account in determining whether a Black man was guilty of "an attempt to commit an assault with an attempt to rape." See McQuirter v. State, 63 So. 2d. 388, 390 (Ala. 1953). According to the "victim's" testimony, the man stared at her and mumbled something unintelligible as they passed. Id. at 389.

99. Ida Wells, an early Black feminist, investigated every lynching she could for about a decade. After researching 728 lynchings, she concluded that "[o]nly a third of the murdered Blacks were even accused of rape, much less guilty of it." PAULA GIDDINGS, WHEN AND WHERE I ENTER: THE IMPACT OF BLACK WOMEN ON RACE AND SEX IN AMERICA 28 (1984) (quoting Wells).

100. See Jacquelyn Dowd Hall, "The Mind That Burns in Each Body": Women, Rape, and Racial Violence, in POWERS OF DESIRE: THE POLITICS OF SEXUALITY 328, 334 (Ann Snitow, Christine Stansell, & Sharon Thompson eds. 1983).

101. Nine Black youths were charged with the rape of two white women in a railroad freight car near Scottsboro, Alabama. Their trials occurred in a heated atmosphere. Each trial was completed in a single day, and the defendants were all convicted and sentenced to death. See DAN T. CARTER, SCOTTSBORO: A TRAGEDY OF THE AMERICAN SOUTH (1976). The Supreme Court reversed the defendants' convictions and death sentences, holding that they were unconstitutionally denied the right to counsel. Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45, 65 (1932). However, the defendants were retried by an all-white jury after the Supreme Court reversed their convictions.

102. Emmett Till was a 14-year-old Black boy from Chicago visiting his relatives near Money,

American resistance to the rigid social codes of white supremacy.[103] To the extent rape of Black women is thought to dramatize racism, it is usually cast as an assault on Black manhood, demonstrating his inability to protect Black women. The direct assault on Black womanhood is less frequently seen as an assault on the Black community.[104]

The sexual politics that this limited reading of racism and rape engenders continues to play out today, as illustrated by the Mike Tyson rape trial. The use of antiracist rhetoric to mobilize support for Tyson represented an ongoing practice of viewing with considerable suspicion rape accusations against Black men and interpreting sexual racism through a male-centered frame. The historical experience of Black men has so completely occupied the dominant conceptions of racism and rape that there is little room to squeeze in the experiences of Black women. Consequently, racial solidarity was continually raised as a rallying point on behalf of Tyson, but never on behalf of Desiree Washington, Tyson's Black accuser. Leaders ranging from Benjamin Hooks to Louis Farrakhan expressed their support for Tyson,[105] yet no established Black leader voiced any concern for Washington. The fact that Black men have often been falsely accused of raping white women underlies the antiracist defense of Black men accused of rape even when the accuser herself is a Black woman.

As a result of this continual emphasis on Black male sexuality as the core issue in antiracist critiques of rape, Black women who raise claims of rape against Black men are not only disregarded but also sometimes vilified within the African-American community. One can only imagine the alienation experienced by a Black rape survivor such as Desiree Washington when the accused rapist is embraced and defended as a victim of racism while she is, at best, disregarded, and at worst, ostracized and ridiculed. In contrast, Tyson was the beneficiary of the longstanding practice of using antiracist rhetoric to deflect the injury suffered by Black women victimized by Black men. Some defended the support given to Tyson on the ground that all Afri-

---

Mississippi. On a dare by local boys, he entered a store and spoke to a white woman. Several days later, Emmett Till's body was found in the Tallahatchie River. "The barbed wire holding the cottongin fan around his neck had became snagged on a tangled river root." After the corpse was discovered, the white woman's husband and his brother-in-law were charged with Emmett Till's murder. JUAN WILLIAMS, EYES ON THE PRIZE 39-43 (1987). For a historical account of the Emmett Till tragedy, see STEPHEN J. WHITFIELD, A DEATH IN THE DELTA (1988).

103. Crenshaw, supra note 7, at 159 (discussing how the generation of Black activists who created the Black Liberation Movement were contemporaries of Emmett Till).

104.

> Until quite recently, for example, when historians talked of rape in the slavery experience they often bemoaned the damage this act did to the Black male's sense of esteem and respect. He was powerless to protect his woman from white rapists. Few scholars probed the effect that rape, the threat of rape, and domestic violence had on the psychic development of the female victims.

Darlene Clark Hine, Rape and the Inner Lives of Black Women in the Middle West: Preliminary Thoughts on the Culture of Dissemblance, in UNEQUAL SISTERS: A MULTI-CULTURAL READER IN U.S. WOMEN'S HISTORY (Ellen Carol Dubois & Vicki L. Ruiz eds. 1990).

105. Michael Madden, No Offensive from Defense, Boston Globe, Feb. 1, 1992, at 33 (Hooks); Farrakhan Backs Calls for Freeing Tyson, UPI, July 10, 1992.

can Americans can readily imagine their sons, fathers, brothers, or uncles being wrongly accused of rape. Yet daughters, mothers, sisters, and aunts also deserve at least a similar concern, since statistics show that Black women are more likely to be raped than Black men are to be falsely accused of it. Given the magnitude of Black women's vulnerability to sexual violence, it is not unreasonable to expect as much concern for Black women who are raped as is expressed for the men who are accused of raping them.

Black leaders are not alone in their failure to empathize with or rally around Black rape victims. Indeed, some Black women were among Tyson's staunchest supporters and Washington's harshest critics.[106] The media widely noted the lack of sympathy Black women had for Washington; Barbara Walters used the observation as a way of challenging Washington's credibility, going so far as to press Washington for a reaction.[107] The most troubling revelation was that many of the women who did not support Washington also doubted Tyson's story. These women did not sympathize with Washington because they believed that Washington had no business in Tyson's hotel room at 2:00 a.m. A typical response was offered by one young Black woman who stated, "She asked for it, she got it, it's not fair to cry rape."[108]

Indeed, some of the women who expressed their disdain for Washington acknowledged that they encountered the threat of sexual assault almost daily.[109] Yet it may be precisely this threat—along with the relative absence of rhetorical strategies challenging the sexual subordination of Black women—that animated their harsh criticism. In this regard, Black women who condemned Washington were quite like all other women who seek to distance themselves from rape victims as a way of denying their own vulnerability. Prosecutors who handle sexual assault cases acknowledge that they often exclude women as potential jurors because women tend to empathize the least with the victim.[110] To identify too closely with victimization may reveal their own vulnerability.[111] Consequently, women often look for evi-

106. See Megan Rosenfeld, After the Verdict, The Doubts: Black Women Show Little Sympathy for Tyson's Accuser, Wash. Post, Feb. 13, 1992, at D1; Allan Johnson, Tyson Rape Case Strikes a Nerve Among Blacks, Chicago Trib., Mar. 29, 1992, at C1; Suzanne P. Kelly, Black Women Wrestle with Abuse Issue: Many Say Choosing Racial Over Gender Loyalty Is Too Great a Sacrifice, Star Trib., Feb. 18, 1992, at A1.

107. 20/20 (ABC television broadcast, Feb. 21, 1992).

108. Id.

109. According to a study by the Bureau of Justice, Black women are significantly more likely to be raped than white women, and women in the 16-24 age group are 2 to 3 times more likely to be victims of rape or attempted rape than women in any other age group. See Ronald J. Ostrow, Typical Rape Victim Called Poor, Young, L.A. Times, Mar. 25, 1985, at 8.

110. See Peg Tyre, What Experts Say About Rape Jurors, Newsday, May 19, 1991, at 10 (reporting that "researchers had determined that jurors in criminal trials side with the complainant or defendant whose ethnic, economic and religious background most closely resembles their own. The exception to the rule . . . is the way women jurors judge victims of rape and sexual assault."). Linda Fairstein, a Manhattan prosecutor, states, "(T)oo often women tend to be very critical of the conduct of other women, and they often are not good jurors in acquaintance-rape cases." Margaret Carlson, The Trials of Convicting Rapists, TIME, Oct. 14, 1991, at 11.

111. As sex crimes prosecutor Barbara Eganhauser notes, even young women with contemporary lifestyles often reject a woman's rape accusation out of fear. "To call another woman the victim dence that the victim brought the rape on herself, usually by breaking social rules that are generally held applicable only to women. And when the rules classify women as dumb, loose, or weak on the one hand, and smart, discriminating, and strong on the other, it is not surprising that women who cannot step outside the rules to critique them attempt to validate themselves within them. The position of most Black women on this issue is particularly problematic, first, because of the extent to which they are consistently reminded that they are the group most vulnerable to sexual victimization, and second, because most Black women share the African-American community's general resistance to explicitly feminist analysis when it appears to run up against long-standing narratives that construct Black men as the primary victims of sexual racism.

C. Rape and Intersectionality in Social Science

The marginalization of Black women's experiences within the antiracist and feminist critiques of rape law are facilitated by social science studies that fail to examine the ways in which racism and sexism converge. Gary LaFree's Rape and Criminal Justice: The Social Construction of Sexual Assault[112] is a classic example. Through a study of rape prosecutions in Minneapolis, LaFree attempts to determine the validity of two prevailing claims regarding rape prosecutions. The first claim is that Black defendants face significant racial discrimination.[113] The second is that rape laws serve to regulate the sexual conduct of women by withholding from rape victims the ability to invoke sexual assault law when they have engaged in nontraditional behavior.[114] LaFree's compelling study concludes that law constructs rape in ways that continue to manifest both racial and gender domination.[115] Although Black women are positioned as victims of both the racism and the sexism that LaFree so persuasively details, his analysis is less illuminating than might be expected because Black women fall through the cracks of his dichotomized theoretical framework.

1. Racial domination and rape.

LaFree confirms the findings of earlier studies that show that race is a significant determinant in the ultimate disposition of rape cases. He finds that Black men accused of raping white women were treated most harshly, while Black offenders accused of raping Black women were treated most leniently.[116] These effects held true even after controlling for other factors of rape is to acknowledge the vulnerability in yourself. They go out at night, they date, they go to bars, and walk alone. To deny it is to say at the trial that women are not victims." Tyre, supra note 110.

---

112. G. LAFREE, supra note 86.

113. Id. at 49-50.

114. Id. at 50-51.

115. Id. at 237-40.

116. LaFree concludes that recent studies finding no discriminatory effect were inconclusive because they analyzed the effects of the defendant's race independently of the race of victim. The differential race effects in sentencing are often concealed by combining the harsher sentences given to such as injury to the victim and acquaintance between victim and assailant.

> Compared to other defendants, blacks who were suspected of assaulting white women received more serious charges, were more likely to have their cases filed as felonies, were more likely to receive prison sentences if convicted, were more likely to be incarcerated in the state penitentiary (as opposed to a jail or minimum-security facility), and received longer sentences on the average.[117]

LaFree's conclusions that Black men are differentially punished depending on the race of the victim do not, however, contribute much to understanding the plight of Black rape victims. Part of the problem lies in the author's use of "sexual stratification" theory, which posits both that women are differently valued according to their race and that there are certain "rules of sexual access" governing who may have sexual contact with whom in this sexually stratified market.[118] According to the theory, Black men are discriminated against in that their forced "access" to white women is more harshly penalized than their forced "access" to Black women.[119] LaFree's analysis focuses on the harsh regulation of access by Black men to white women, but is silent about the relative subordination of Black women to

---

Black men accused of raping white women with the more lenient treatment of Black men accused of raping Black women. Id. at 117, 140. Similar results were found in another study. See Anthony Walsh, The Sexual Stratification Hypothesis and Sexual Assault in Light of the Changing Conceptions of Race, 25 CRIMINOLOGY 153, 170 (1987) ("sentence severity mean for blacks who assaulted whites, which was significantly in excess of mean for whites who assaulted whites, was masked by the lenient sentence severity mean for blacks who assaulted blacks").

117. G. LAFREE, supra note 86, at 139-40.

118. Sexual stratification, according to LaFree, refers to the differential valuation of women according to their race and to the creation of "rules of sexual access" governing who may have contact with whom. Sexual stratification also dictates what the penalty will be for breaking these rules: The rape of a white woman by a Black man is seen as a trespass on the valuable property rights of white men and is punished most severely. Id. at 48-49.

The fundamental propositions of the sexual stratification thesis have been summarized as follows:

> (1) Women are viewed as the valued and scarce property of the men of their own race.
>
> (2) White women, by virtue of membership in the dominant race, are more valuable than black women.
>
> (3) The sexual assault of a white by a black threatens both the white man's "property rights" and his dominant social position. This dual threat accounts for the strength of the taboo attached to interracial sexual assault.
>
> (4) A sexual assault by a male of any race upon members of the less valued black race is perceived as nonthreatening to the status quo and therefore less serious.
>
> (5) White men predominate as agents of social control. Therefore, they have the power to sanction differentially according to the perceived threat to their favored social position.

Walsh, supra note 116, at 155.

119. I use the term "access" guardedly because it is an inapt euphemism for rape. On the other hand, rape is conceptualized differently depending on whether certain race-specific rules of sexual access are violated. Although violence is not explicitly written into the sexual stratification theory, it does work itself into the rules, in that sexual intercourse that violates the racial access rules is presumed to be coercive rather that voluntary. See, e.g., Sims v. Balkam, 136 S.E. 2d 766, 769 (Ga. 1964) (describing the rape of a white woman by a Black man as "a crime more horrible than death"); Story v. State, 59 So. 480 (Ala. 1912) ("The consensus of public opinion, unrestricted to either race, is that a white woman prostitute is yet, though lost of virtue, above the even greater sacrifice of the voluntary submission of her person to the embraces of the other race."); Wriggins, supra note 97, at 125, 127.

white women. The emphasis on differential access to women is consistent with analytical perspectives that view racism primarily in terms of the inequality between men. From this prevailing viewpoint, the problem of discrimination is that white men can rape Black women with relative impunity while Black men cannot do the same with white women.[120] Black women are considered victims of discrimination only to the extent that white men can rape them without fear of significant punishment. Rather than being viewed as victims of discrimination in their own right, they become merely the means by which discrimination against Black men can be recognized. The inevitable result of this orientation is that efforts to fight discrimination tend to ignore the particularly vulnerable position of Black women, who must both confront racial bias and challenge their status as instruments, rather than beneficiaries, of the civil rights struggle.

Where racial discrimination is framed by LaFree primarily in terms of a contest between Black and white men over women, the racism experienced by Black women will only be seen in terms of white male access to them. When rape of Black women by white men is eliminated as a factor in the analysis, whether for statistical or other reasons, racial discrimination against Black women no longer matters, since LaFree's analysis involves comparing the "access" of white and Black men to white women.[121] Yet Black women are not discriminated against simply because white men can rape them with little sanction and be punished less than Black men who rape white women, or because white men who rape them are not punished the same as white men who rape white women. Black women are also discriminated against because intraracial rape of white women is treated more seriously than intraracial rape of Black women. But the differential protection that Black and white women receive against intraracial rape is not seen as racist because intraracial rape does not involve a contest between Black and white men. In other words, the way the criminal justice system treats rapes of Black women by Black men and rapes of white women by white men is not seen as raising issues of racism because Black and white men are not involved with each other's women.

In sum, Black women who are raped are racially discriminated against because their rapists, whether Black or white, are less likely to be charged with rape, and when charged and convicted, are less likely to receive significant jail time than the rapists of white women. And while sexual stratification theory does posit that women are stratified sexually by race, most applications of the theory focus on the inequality of male agents of rape rather than on the inequality of rape victims, thus marginalizing the racist

120. This traditional approach places Black women in a position of denying their own victimization, requiring Black women to argue that it is racist to punish Black men more harshly for raping white women than for raping Black women. However, in the wake of the Mike Tyson trial, it seems that many Black women are prepared to do just that. See notes 106-109 supra and accompanying text.

121. In fact, critics and commentators often use the term "interracial rape" when they are actually talking only about Black male/white female rape.

treatment of Black women by consistently portraying racism in terms of the relative power of Black and white men.

In order to understand and treat the victimization of Black women as a consequence of racism and sexism, it is necessary to shift the analysis away from the differential access of men and more toward the differential protection of women. Throughout his analysis, LaFree fails to do so. His sexual stratification thesis—in particular, its focus on the comparative power of male agents of rape—illustrates how the marginalization of Black women in antiracist politics is replicated in social science research. Indeed, the thesis leaves unproblematized the racist subordination of less valuable objects (Black women) to more valuable objects (white women), and it perpetuates the sexist treatment of women as property extensions of "their" men.

2. Rape and gender subordination.

Although LaFree does attempt to address gender-related concerns of women in his discussion of rape and the social control of women, his theory of sexual stratification fails to focus sufficiently on the effects of stratification on women.[122] LaFree quite explicitly uses a framework that treats race and gender as separate categories, giving no indication that he understands that Black women may fall in between or within both. The problem with LaFree's analysis lies not in its individual observations, which can be insightful and accurate, but in his failure to connect them and develop a broader, deeper perspective. His two-track framework makes for a narrow interpretation of the data because it leaves untouched the possibility that these two tracks may intersect. And it is those who reside at the intersection of gender and race discrimination—Black women—that suffer from this fundamental oversight.

LaFree attempts to test the feminist hypothesis that "the application of law to nonconformist women in rape cases may serve to control the behavior of all women."[123] This inquiry is important, he explains, because "if women who violate traditional sex roles and are raped are unable to obtain justice through the legal system, then the law may be interpreted as an institutional arrangement for reinforcing women's gender-role conformity."[124] He finds that "acquittals were more common and final sentences were shorter when nontraditional victim behavior was alleged."[125] Thus LaFree concludes that the victim's moral character was more important than victim injury, and was second only to the defendant's character. Overall, 82.3 percent of the traditional victim cases resulted in convictions and average sentences of

122. G. LAFREE, supra note 86, at 148. LaFree's transition between race and gender suggests that the shift might not loosen the frame enough to permit discussion of the combined effects of race and gender subordination on Black women. LaFree repeatedly separates race from gender, treating them as wholly distinguishable issues. See, e.g., id. at 147.

123. Id.

124. Id. at 151. LaFree interprets nontraditional behavior to include drinking, drug use, extramarital sex, illegitimate children, and "having a reputation as a 'partier,' a 'pleasure seeker' or someone who stays out late at night." Id. at 201.

125. Id. at 204.

43.38 months.[126] Only 50 percent of nontraditional victim cases led to convictions, with an average term of 27.83 months.[127] The effects of traditional and nontraditional behavior by Black women are difficult to determine from the information given and must be inferred from LaFree's passing comments. For example, LaFree notes that Black victims were evenly divided between traditional and nontraditional gender roles. This observation, together with the lower rate of conviction for men accused of raping Blacks, suggests that gender role behavior was not as significant in determining case disposition as it was in cases involving white victims. Indeed, LaFree explicitly notes that "the victim's race was . . . an important predictor of jurors' case evaluations."[128]

> Jurors were less likely to believe in a defendant's guilt when the victim was black. Our interviews with jurors suggested that part of the explanation for this effect was that jurors . . . were influenced by stereotypes of black women as more likely to consent to sex or as more sexually experienced and hence less harmed by the assault. In a case involving the rape of a young black girl, one juror argued for acquittal on the grounds that a girl her age from 'that kind of neighborhood' probably wasn't a virgin anyway.[129]

---

126. Id.

127. Id.

128. Id. at 219 (emphasis added). While there is little direct evidence that prosecutors are influenced by the race of the victim, it is not unreasonable to assume that since race is an important predictor of conviction, prosecutors determined to maintain a high conviction rate might be less likely to pursue a case involving a Black victim than a white one. This calculus is probably reinforced when juries fail to convict in strong cases involving Black victims. For example, the acquittal of three white St. John's University athletes for the gang rape of a Jamaican schoolmate was interpreted by many as racially influenced. Witnesses testified that the woman was incapacitated during much of the ordeal, having ingested a mixture of alcohol given to her by a classmate who subsequently initiated the assault. The jurors insisted that race played no role in their decision to acquit. "There was no race, we all agreed to it," said one juror; "They were trying to make it racial but it wasn't," said another. Jurors: 'It Wasn't Racial,' Newsday, July 25, 1991, at 4. Yet it is possible that race did influence on some level their belief that the woman consented to what by all accounts, amounted to dehumanizing conduct. See, e.g., Carole Agus, Whatever Happened to 'The Rules', Newsday, July 28, 1991, at 11 (citing testimony that at least two of the assailants hit the victim in the head with their penises). The jury nonetheless thought, in the words of its foreman, that the defendants' behavior was "obnoxious" but not criminal. See Sydney H. Schanberg, Those 'Obnoxious' St. John's Athletes, Newsday, July 30, 1991, at 79. One can imagine a different outcome had the races of the parties only been reversed.

Representative Charles Rangel (D-N.Y.) called the verdict "a rerun of what used to happen in the South." James Michael Brodie, The St. John's Rape Acquittal: Old Wounds That Just Won't Go Away, BLACK ISSUES IN HIGHER EDUC., Aug. 15, 1991, at 18. Denise Snyder, executive director of the D.C. Rape Crisis Center, commented:

> It's a historical precedent that white men can assault black women and get away with it. Woe be to the black man who assaults white women. All the prejudices that existed a hundred years ago are dormant and not so dormant, and they rear their ugly heads in situations like this. Contrast this with the Central Park jogger who was an upper-class white woman.

Judy Mann, New Age, Old Myths, Wash. Post, July 26, 1991, at C3 (quoting Snyder); see Kristin Bumiller, Rape as a Legal Symbol: An Essay on Sexual Violence and Racism, 42 U. MIAMI L. REV. 75, 88 ("The cultural meaning of rape is rooted in a symbiosis of racism and sexism that has tolerated the acting out of male aggression against women and, in particular, black women.").

129. Id. at 219-20 (citations omitted). Anecdotal evidence suggests that this attitude exists among some who are responsible for processing rape cases. Fran Weinman, a student in my seminar on race, gender, and the law, conducted a field study at the Rosa Parks Rape Crisis Center. During LaFree also notes that "[o]ther jurors were simply less willing to believe the testimony of black complainants."[130] One white juror is quoted as saying, "Negroes have a way of not telling the truth. They've a knack for coloring the story. So you know you can't believe everything they say."[131]

Despite explicit evidence that the race of the victim is significant in determining the disposition of rape cases, LaFree concludes that rape law functions to penalize nontraditional behavior in women.[132] LaFree fails to note that racial identification may itself serve as a proxy for nontraditional behavior. Rape law, that is, serves not only to penalize actual examples of nontraditional behavior but also to diminish and devalue women who belong to groups in which nontraditional behavior is perceived as common. For the Black rape victim, the disposition of her case may often turn less on her behavior than on her identity. LaFree misses the point that although white and Black women have shared interests in resisting the madonna/whore dichotomy altogether, they nevertheless experience its oppressive power differently. Black women continue to be judged by who they are, not by what they do.

3. Compounding the marginalizations of rape.

LaFree offers clear evidence that the race/sex hierarchy subordinates Black women to white women, as well as to men—both Black and white. However, the different effects of rape law on Black women are scarcely mentioned in LaFree's conclusions. In a final section, LaFree treats the devaluation of Black women as an aside—one without apparent ramifications for rape law. He concludes: "The more severe treatment of black offenders who rape white women (or, for that matter, the milder treatment of black offenders who rape black women) is probably best explained in terms of racial discrimination within a broader context of continuing social and physical segregation between blacks and whites."[133] Implicit throughout LaFree's her study, she counseled and accompanied a 12-year-old Black rape survivor who became pregnant as a result of the rape. The girl was afraid to tell her parents, who discovered the rape after she became depressed and began to slip in school. Police were initially reluctant to interview the girl. Only after the girl's father threatened to take matters into his own hands did the police department send an investigator to the girl's house. The City prosecutor indicated that the case wasn't a serious one, and was reluctant to prosecute the defendant for statutory rape even though the girl was underage. The prosecutor reasoned, "After all, she looks 16." After many frustrations, the girl's family ultimately decided not to pressure the prosecutor any further and the case was dropped. See Fran Weinman, Racism and the Enforcement of Rape Law, 13-30 (1990) (unpublished manuscript) (on file with the Stanford Law Review).

130. G. LAFREE, supra note 86, at 220.

131. Id.

132. Id. at 226.

133. Id. at 239 (emphasis added). The lower conviction rates for those who rape Black women may be analogous to the low conviction rates for acquaintance rape. The central issue in many rape cases is proving that the victim did not consent. The basic presumption in the absence of explicit evidence of lack of consent is that consent exists. Certain evidence is sufficient to disprove that presumption, and the quantum of evidence necessary to prove nonconsent increases as the presumptions warranting an inference of consent increases. Some women—based on their character, identity, or dress—are viewed as more likely to consent than other women. Perhaps it is the combination of the sexual stereotypes about Black people along with the greater degree of familiarity presumed to study is the assumption that Blacks who are subjected to social control are Black men. Moreover, the social control to which he refers is limited to securing the boundaries between Black males and white females. His conclusion that race differentials are best understood within the context of social segregation as well as his emphasis on the interracial implications of boundary enforcement overlook the intraracial dynamics of race and gender subordination. When Black men are leniently punished for raping Black women, the problem is not "best explained" in terms of social segregation but in terms of both the race- and gender-based devaluation of Black women. By failing to examine the sexist roots of such lenient punishment, LaFree and other writers sensitive to racism ironically repeat the mistakes of those who ignore race as a factor in such cases. Both groups fail to consider directly the situation of Black women.

Studies like LaFree's do little to illuminate how the interaction of race, class and nontraditional behavior affects the disposition of rape cases involving Black women. Such an oversight is especially troubling given evidence that many cases involving Black women are dismissed outright.[134] Over 20 percent of rape complaints were recently dismissed as "unfounded" by the Oakland Police Department, which did not even interview many, if not most, of the women involved.[135] Not coincidentally, the vast majority of the complainants were Black and poor; many of them were substance abusers or prostitutes.[136] Explaining their failure to pursue these complaints, the police remarked that "those cases were hopelessly tainted by women who are transient, uncooperative, untruthful or not credible as witnesses in court."[137] exist between Black men and Black women that leads to the conceptualization of such rapes as existing somewhere between acquaintance rape and stranger rape.

---

134. See, e.g., Candy J. Cooper, Nowhere to Turn for Rape Victims: High Proportion of Cases Tossed Aside by Oakland Police, S.F. Examiner, Sept. 16, 1990, at A1 [hereinafter Cooper, Nowhere to Turn]. The most persuasive evidence that the images and beliefs that Oakland police officers hold toward rape victims influence the disposition of their cases is represented in two follow-up stories. See Candy J. Cooper, A Rape Victim Vindicated, S.F. Examiner, Sept. 17, 1990, at A1; Candy J. Cooper, Victim of Rape, Victim of the System, S.F. Examiner, Sept. 17, 1990, at A10. These stories contrasted the experiences of two Black women, both of whom had been raped by an acquaintance after smoking crack. In the first case, although there was little physical evidence and the woman was initially reluctant to testify, her rapist was prosecuted and ultimately convicted. In the second case, the woman was severely beaten by her assailant. Despite ample physical evidence and corroboration, and a cooperative victim, her case was not pursued. The former case was handled by the Berkeley, California, police department while the latter was handled by the Oakland police department. Perhaps the different approaches producing these disparate results can best be captured by the philosophies of the investigators. Officers in Berkeley "take every woman's case so seriously that not one [in 1989] was found to be false." See Candy J. Cooper, Berkeley Unit Takes All Cases as Legitimate, S.F. Examiner, Sept. 16, 1990, at A16. The same year, 24.4% of Oakland's rape cases were classified as "unfounded." Cooper, Nowhere to Turn, supra.

135. Cooper, Nowhere to Turn, supra note 134, at A10.

136. Id. ("Police, prosecutors, victims and rape crisis workers agree that most of the dropped cases were reported by women of color who smoked crack or were involved in other criminal, high-risk behavior, such as prostitution.").

137. Id. Advocates point out that because investigators work from a profile of the kind of case likely to get a conviction, people left out of that profile are people of color, prostitutes, drug users and people raped by acquaintances. This exclusion results in "a whole class of women . . . systematically being denied justice. Poor women suffer the most." Id.

The effort to politicize violence against women will do little to address the experiences of Black and other nonwhite women until the ramifications of racial stratification among women are acknowledged. At the same time, the antiracist agenda will not be furthered by suppressing the reality of intraracial violence against women of color. The effect of both these marginalizations is that women of color have no ready means to link their experiences with those of other women. This sense of isolation compounds efforts to politicize sexual violence within communities of color and permits the deadly silence surrounding these issues.

D. Implications

With respect to the rape of Black women, race and gender converge in ways that are only vaguely understood. Unfortunately, the analytical frameworks that have traditionally informed both antirape and antiracist agendas tend to focus only on single issues. They are thus incapable of developing solutions to the compound marginalization of Black women victims, who, yet again, fall into the void between concerns about women's issues and concerns about racism. This dilemma is complicated by the role that cultural images play in the treatment of Black women victims. That is, the most critical aspects of these problems may revolve less around the political agendas of separate race- and gender-sensitive groups, and more around the social and cultural devaluation of women of color. The stories our culture tells about the experience of women of color present another challenge—and a further opportunity—to apply and evaluate the usefulness of the intersectional critique.

III. Representational Intersectionality

With respect to the rape of Black women, race and gender converge so that the concerns of minority women fall into the void between concerns about women's issues and concerns about racism. But when one discourse fails to acknowledge the significance of the other, the power relations that each attempts to challenge are strengthened. For example, when feminists fail to acknowledge the role that race played in the public response to the rape of the Central Park jogger, feminism contributes to the forces that produce disproportionate punishment for Black men who rape white women, and when antiracists represent the case solely in terms of racial domination, they belittle the fact that women particularly, and all people generally, should be outraged by the gender violence the case represented.

Perhaps the devaluation of women of color implicit here is linked to how women of color are represented in cultural imagery. Scholars in a wide range of fields are increasingly coming to acknowledge the centrality of issues of representation in the reproduction of racial and gender hierarchy in the United States. Yet current debates over representation continually elide the intersection of race and gender in the popular culture's construction of images of women of color. Accordingly, an analysis of what may be termed "representational intersectionality" would include both the ways in which these images are produced through a confluence of prevalent narratives of race and gender, as well as a recognition of how contemporary critiques of racist and sexist representation marginalize women of color.

In this section I explore the problem of representational intersectionality—in particular, how the production of images of women of color and the contestations over those images tend to ignore the intersectional interests of women of color—in the context of the controversy over 2 Live Crew, the Black rap group that was the subject of an obscenity prosecution in Florida in 1990. I oppose the obscenity prosecution of 2 Live Crew, but not for the same reasons as those generally offered in support of 2 Live Crew, and not without a sense of sharp internal division, of dissatisfaction with the idea that the "real issue" is race or gender, inertly juxtaposed. An intersectional analysis offers both an intellectual and political response to this dilemma. Aiming to bring together the different aspects of an otherwise divided sensibility, an intersectional analysis argues that racial and sexual subordination are mutually reinforcing, that Black women are commonly marginalized by a politics of race alone or gender alone, and that a political response to each form of subordination must at the same time be a political response to both.

A. The 2 Live Crew Controversy

In June 1990, the members of 2 Live Crew were arrested and charged under a Florida obscenity statute for their performance in an adults-only club in Hollywood, Florida. The arrests came just two days after a federal court judge ruled that the sexually explicit lyrics in 2 Live Crew's album, As Nasty As They Wanna Be,[138] were obscene.[139] Although the members of 2 Live Crew were eventually acquitted of charges stemming from the live performance, the federal court determination that Nasty is obscene still stands. This obscenity judgment, along with the arrests and subsequent trial, prompted an intense public controversy about rap music, a controversy that merged with a broader debate about the representation of sex and violence in popular music, about cultural diversity, and about the meaning of freedom of expression.

Two positions dominated the debate over 2 Live Crew. Writing in Newsweek, political columnist George Will staked out a case for the prosecu-

138. 2 LIVE CREW, AS NASTY AS THEY WANNA BE (Luke Records 1989).

139. In June 1990, a federal judge ruled that 2 Live Crew's lyrics referring to sodomy and sexual intercourse were obscene. Skywalker Records, Inc. v. Navarro, 739 F. Supp. 578, 596 (S.D. Fla. 1990). The court held that the recording appealed to the prurient interest, was patently offensive as defined by state law, and taken as a whole, lacked serious literary, artistic or political value. Id. at 591-96. However, the court also held that the sheriff's office had subjected the recording to unconstitutional prior restraint and consequently granted 2 Live Crew permanent injunctive relief. Id. at 596-604. Two days after the judge declared the recording obscene, 2 Live Crew members were charged with giving an obscene performance at a club in Hollywood, Florida. Experts Defend Live Crew Lyrics, UPI, Oct. 19, 1990. Deputy sheriffs also arrested Charles Freeman, a merchant who was selling copies of the Nasty recording. See Gene Santoro, How 2 B Nasty, NATION, July 2, 1990, at 4. The 11th Circuit reversed the conviction, Luke Records, Inc. v. Navarro, 960 F.2d 134 (11th Cir. 1992).

tion.[140] Will argued that Nasty was misogynistic filth and characterized 2 Live Crew's performance as a profoundly repugnant "combination of extreme infantilism and menace" that objectified Black women and represented them as suitable targets of sexual violence.[141] The most prominent defense of 2 Live Crew was advanced by Henry Louis Gates, Jr., Harvard professor and expert on African-American literature. In a New York Times op-ed piece and in testimony at the criminal trial, Gates contended that 2 Live Crew's members were important artists operating within and inventively elaborating upon distinctively African-American forms of cultural expression.[142] According to Gates, the characteristic exaggeration featured in 2 Live Crew's lyrics served a political end: to explode popular racist stereotypes in a comically extreme form.[143] Where Will saw a misogynistic assault on Black women by social degenerates, Gates found a form of "sexual carnivalesque" with the promise to free us from the pathologies of racism.[144]

Unlike Gates, there are many who do not simply "bust out laughing" upon first hearing 2 Live Crew.[145] One does a disservice to the issue to describe the images of women in Nasty as simply "sexually explicit."[146] Listening to Nasty, we hear about "cunts" being "fucked" until backbones are cracked, "asses" being "busted," "dicks" rammed down throats, and semen

140. See George F. Will, America's Slide into the Sewer, NEWSWEEK, July 30, 1990, at 64.

141. Id.

142. Henry Louis Gates, 2 Live Crew, Decoded, N.Y. Times, June 19, 1990, at A23. Professor Gates, who testified on behalf of 2 Live Crew in the criminal proceeding stemming from their live performance, pointed out that the members of 2 Live Crew were expressing themselves in coded messages, and were engaging in parody. "For centuries, African-Americans have been forced to develop coded ways of communicating to protect them from danger. Allegories and double meanings, words redefined to mean their opposites . . . have enabled blacks to share messages only the initiated understood." Id. Similarly, parody is a component of "the street tradition called 'signifying' or 'playing the dozens,' which has generally been risqué, and where the best signifier or 'rapper' is the one who invents the most extravagant images, the biggest 'lies,' as the culture says." Id.

143. Testifying during 2 Live Crew's prosecution for obscenity, Gates argued that, "[o]ne of the brilliant things about these four songs is they embrace that stereotype [of blacks having overly large sexual organs and being hypersexed individuals]. They name it and they explode it. You can have no reaction but to bust out laughing. The fact that they're being sung by four virile young black men is inescapable to the audience." Laura Parker, Rap Lyrics Likened to Literature; Witness in 2 Live Crew Trial Cites Art, Parody, Precedents, Wash. Post, Oct. 20, 1990, at D1.

144. Compare Gates, supra note 142 (labeling 2 Live Crew's braggadocio as "sexual carnivalesque") with Will, supra note 140 (characterizing 2 Live Crew as "lower animals").

145. See note 143 supra.

146. Although I have elected to print some of the actual language from Nasty, much of the debate about this case has proceeded without any specific discussion of the lyrics. There are reasons one might avoid repeating such sexually explicit material. Among the more compelling ones is the concern that presenting lyrics outside of their fuller musical context hampers a complex understanding and appreciation of the art form of rap itself. Doing so also essentializes one dimension of the art work—its lyrics—to stand for the whole. Finally, focusing on the production of a single group may contribute to the impression that that group—here, 2 Live Crew—fairly represents all rappers.

Recognizing these risks, I believe that it is nonetheless important to incorporate excerpts from the Crew's lyrics into this analysis. Not only are the lyrics legally relevant in any substantive discussion of the obscenity prosecution, but also their inclusion here serves to reveal the depth of misogyny many African-American women must grapple with in order to defend 2 Live Crew. This is particularly true for African-American women who have been sexually abused by men in their lives. Of course, it is also the case that many African-American women who are troubled by the sexual degradation of Black women in some rap music can and do enjoy rap music generally.

splattered across faces. Black women are "cunts," "bitches," and all-purpose "hos."[147]

This is no mere braggadocio. Those who are concerned about high rates of gender violence in our communities must be troubled by the possible connections between these images and the tolerance for violence against women. Children and teenagers are listening to this music, and one cannot but be concerned that the range of acceptable behavior is being broadened by the constant propagation of misogynistic imagery. One must worry as well about young Black women who, like young men, are learning that their value lies between their legs. But the sexual value of women, unlike that of men, is a depletable commodity; boys become men by expending theirs, while girls become whores.

Nasty is misogynist, and an intersectional analysis of the case against 2 Live Crew should not depart from a full acknowledgement of that misogyny. But such an analysis must also consider whether an exclusive focus on issues of gender risks overlooking aspects of the prosecution of 2 Live Crew that raise serious questions of racism.

B. The Obscenity Prosecution of 2 Live Crew

An initial problem with the obscenity prosecution of 2 Live Crew was its apparent selectivity.[148] Even the most superficial comparison between 2 Live Crew and other mass-marketed sexual representations suggests the likelihood that race played some role in distinguishing 2 Live Crew as the first group ever to be prosecuted for obscenity in connection with a musical recording, and one of a handful of recording artists to be prosecuted for a live performance. Recent controversies about sexism, racism, and violence in popular culture point to a vast range of expression that might have provided targets for censorship, but was left untouched. Madonna has acted out masturbation, portrayed the seduction of a priest, and insinuated group sex on stage,[149] but she has never been prosecuted for obscenity. While 2 Live Crew was performing in Hollywood, Florida, Andrew Dice Clay's recordings were being sold in stores and he was performing nationwide on HBO.

147. See generally 2 LIVE CREW, supra note 138; N.W.A., STRAIGHT OUTTA COMPTON (Priority Records, Inc. 1988); N.W.A., N.W.A. & THE POSSE (Priority Records, Inc. 1989).

148. There is considerable support for the assertion that prosecution of 2 Live Crew and other rap groups is a manifestation of selective repression of Black expression which is no more racist or sexist than expression by non-Black groups. The most flagrant example is Geffen Records' decision not to distribute an album by the rap act, the Geto Boys. Geffen explained that "the extent to which the Geto Boys album glamorizes and possibly endorses violence, racism, and misogyny compels us to encourage Def American (the group's label) to select a distributor with a greater affinity for this musical expression." Greg Ket, No Sale, Citing Explicit Lyrics, Distributor Backs Away From Geto Boys Album, Chicago Trib., Sept. 13, 1990, § 5, at 9. Geffen apparently has a greater affinity for the likes of Andrew Dice Clay and Guns 'N Roses, non-Black acts which have come under fire for racist and sexist comments. Despite criticism of Guns 'N Roses for lyrics which include "niggers" and Clay's "joke" about Native Americans (see note 150 infra), Geffen continued to distribute their recordings. Id.

149. See Derrick Z. Jackson, Why Must Only Rappers Take the Rap?, Boston Globe, June 17, 1990, at A17.

Well-known for his racist "humor," Clay is also comparable to 2 Live Crew in sexual explicitness and misogyny. In his show, for example, Clay offers, "Eenie, meenie, minee, mo / Suck my [expletive] and swallow slow," and "Lose the bra, bitch."[150] Moreover, graphic sexual images—many of them violent—were widely available in Broward County where the performance and trial took place. According to the testimony of a Broward County vice detective, "nude dance shows and adult bookstores are scattered throughout the county where 2 Live Crew performed."[151] Given the availability of other forms of sexually explicit "entertainment" in Broward County, Florida, one might wonder how 2 Live Crew could have been seen as uniquely obscene by the lights of the "community standards" of the county.[152] After all, patrons of certain Broward County clubs "can see women dancing with at least their breasts exposed," and bookstore patrons can "view and purchase films and magazines that depict vaginal, oral and anal sex, homosexual sex and group sex."[153] In arriving at its finding of obscenity, the court placed little weight on the available range of films, magazines, and live shows as evidence of the community's sensibilities. Instead, the court apparently accepted the sheriff's testimony that the decision to single out Nasty was based on the number of complaints against 2 Live Crew "communicated by telephone calls, anonymous messages, or letters to the police."[154]

Evidence of this popular outcry was never substantiated. But even if it

150. Id. at A20. Not only does Clay exhibit sexism comparable to, if not greater than, that of 2 Live Crew, he also intensifies the level of hatred by flaunting racism: " 'Indians, bright people, huh? They're still livin' in [expletive] tepees. They deserved it. They're dumb as [expletive].' " Id. (quoting Clay).

One commentator asked, "What separates Andrew Dice Clay and 2 Live Crew? Answer: Foulmouthed Andrew Dice Clay is being chased by the producers of 'Saturday Night Live.' Foulmouthed 2 Live Crew are being chased by the police." Id. at A17. When Clay did appear on Saturday Night Live, a controversy was sparked because cast member Nora Dunn and musical guest Sinead O'Connor refused to appear. Jean Seligmann, Dicey Problem, NEWSWEEK, May 21, 1990, at 95.

151. Jane Sutton, Untitled, 2 Live Crew, UPI, Oct. 18, 1990.

152. Prosecuting 2 Live Crew but not Clay might be justified by the argument that there is a distinction between "obscenity," defined as expressions of prurient interests, and "pornography" or "racist speech," defined as expressions of misogyny and race hatred, respectively. 2 Live Crew's prurient expressions could be prosecuted as constitutionally unprotected obscenity while Clay's protected racist and misogynistic expressions could not. Such a distinction has been subjected to critical analysis. See Catharine A. MacKinnon, Not A Moral Issue, 2 YALE L. & POL'Y REV. 321 (1984). The distinction does not explain why other expressions which appeal more directly to "prurient interests" are not prosecuted. Further, 2 Live Crew's prurient appeal is produced, at least in part, through the degradation of women. Accordingly, there can be no compelling distinction between the appeal Clay makes and that of 2 Live Crew.

153. Sutton, supra note 151.

154. Skywalker Records, Inc. v. Navarro, 739 F. Supp. 578, 589 (S.D. Fla 1990). The court rejected the defendants' argument that "admission of other sexually explicit works" is entitled to great weight in determining community standards and held that "this type of evidence does not even have to be considered even if the comparable works have been found to be nonobscene." Id. (citing Hamling v. United States, 418 U.S. 82, 126-27 (1974)). Although the court gave "some weight" to sexually explicit writings in books and magazines, Eddie Murphy's audio tape of Raw, and Andrew Dice Clay's tape recording, it did not explain why these verbal messages "analogous to the format in the Nasty recording" were not obscene as well. Id.

were, the case for selectivity would remain.[155] The history of social repression of Black male sexuality is long, often violent, and all too familiar.[156] Negative reactions to the sexual conduct of Black men have traditionally had racist overtones, especially where that conduct threatens to "cross over" into the mainstream community.[157] So even if the decision to prosecute did reflect a widespread community perception of the purely prurient character of 2 Live Crew's music, that perception itself might reflect an established pattern of vigilante attitudes directed toward the sexual expression of Black men.[158] In short, the appeal to community standards does not undercut a

155. One report suggested that the complaint came from a lawyer, Jack Thompson. Thompson has continued his campaign, expanding his net to include rap artists the Geto Boys and Too Short. Sara Rimer, Obscenity or Art? Trial on Rap Lyrics Opens, N.Y. Times, Oct. 17, 1990, at A1. Despite the appearance of selective enforcement, it is doubtful that any court would be persuaded that the requisite racial motivation was proved. Even evidence of racial disparity in the heaviest of criminal penalties—the death sentence—is insufficient to warrant relief absent specific evidence of discrimination in the defendant's case. See McClesky v. Kemp, 481 U. S. 279 (1987).

156. See notes 101-104 supra and accompanying text.

157. Some critics speculate that the prosecution of 2 Live Crew has less to do with obscenity than with the traditional policing of Black males, especially as it relates to sexuality. Questioning whether 2 Live Crew is more obscene than Andrew Dice Clay, Gates states, "Clearly, this rap group is seen as more threatening than others that are just as sexually explicit. Can this be completely unrelated to the specter of the young black male as a figure of sexual and social disruption, the very stereotypes that 2 Live Crew seems determined to undermine?" Gates, supra note 142. Clarence Page makes a similar point, speculating that "2 Live Crew has become the scapegoat for widespread frustration shared by many blacks and whites over a broad range of social problems that seem to have gotten out of control." Clarence Page, Culture, Taste and Standard-Setting, Chicago Trib., Oct. 7, 1990, § 4, at 3. Page implies, however, that this explanation is something more than or different from racism. "Could it be (drumroll, please) racism? Or could it be fear?" Id. (emphasis added). Page's definition of racism apparently does not include the possibility that it is racist to attach one's societal fears and discomforts to a subordinated and highly stigmatized "other." In other words, scapegoating, at least in this country, has traditionally been, and still is, considered racist, whatever the source of the fear.

158. Even in the current era, this vigilantism is sometimes tragically expressed. Yusef Hawkins became a victim of it in New York on August 23, 1989, when he was killed by a mob of white men who believed themselves to be protecting "their" women from being taken by Black men. UPI, May 18, 1990. Jesse Jackson called Hawkins's slaying a "racially and sexually motivated lynching" and compared it to the 1955 murder of black Mississippi youth Emmett Till, who was killed by men who thought he whistled at a white woman. Id. Even those who denied the racial overtones of Hawkins's murder produced alternative explanations that were part of the same historical narrative. Articles about the Hawkins incident focused on Gina Feliciano as the cause of the incident, attacking her credibility. See, e.g., Lorrin Anderson, Cracks in the Mosaic, NAT'L REV., June 25, 1990, at 36. "Gina instigated the trouble . . . . Gina used drugs and apparently still does. She dropped out of a rehabilitation program before testifying for the prosecution at trial" and was later picked up by the police and "charged with possession of cocaine—15 vials of crack fell out of her purse, police said, and she had a crack pipe in her bra." Id. at 37. At trial, defense attorney Stephen Murphy claimed that Feliciano "lied, . . . perjured herself . . . . She divides, polarizes eight million people . . . . It's despicable what she did, making this a racial incident." Id. (quoting Murphy). But feminists attacked the "scapegoating" of Feliciano, one stating, "Not only are women the victims of male violence, they're blamed for it." Alexis Jetter, Protesters Blast Scapegoat Tactics, Newsday, Apr. 3, 1990, at 29 (quoting Francoise Jacobsohn, president of the New York chapter of the National Organization for Women). According to Merle Hoffman, founder of the New York Pro-Choice Coalition, "Gina's personal life has nothing to do with the crime, . . . [b]ut rest assured, they'll go into her sexual history. . . . It's all part of the 'she made me do it' idea." Id. (quoting Hoffman). And New York columnist Ilene Barth observed that > Gender . . . has a role in New York's race war. Fingers were pointed in Bensonhurst last week at a teenage girl . . . [who] never harmed anyone . . . . Word of her invitation offended local studs, sprouting macho-freaks determined to own local turf and the young concern about racism; rather, it underscores that concern.

A second troubling dimension of the case brought against 2 Live Crew was the court's apparent disregard for the culturally rooted aspects of 2 Live Crew's music. Such disregard was essential to a finding of obscenity given the third prong of the Miller test requiring that material judged obscene must, taken as a whole, lack literary, artistic, or political value.[159] 2 Live Crew argued that this criterion of the Miller test was not met in the case of Nasty since the recording exemplified such African-American cultural modes as "playing the dozens," "call and response," and "signifying."[160] The court denied each of the group's claims of cultural specificity, recharacterizing in more generic terms what 2 Live Crew contended was distinctly African American. According to the court, "playing the dozens" is "commonly seen in adolescents, especially boys, of all ages"; "boasting" appears to be "part of the universal human condition"; and the cultural origins of "call and response"—featured in a song on Nasty about fellatio in which competing groups chanted "less filling" and "tastes great"—were to be found in a Miller beer commercial, not in African-American cultural tradition.[161] The possibility that the Miller beer commercial may have itself evolved from an African-American cultural tradition was apparently lost on the court.

In disregarding the arguments made on behalf of 2 Live Crew, the court denied that the form and style of Nasty and, by implication, rap music in general had any artistic merit. This disturbing dismissal of the cultural attributes of rap and the effort to universalize African-American modes of expression are a form of colorblindness that presumes to level all significant racial and ethnic differences in order to pass judgment on intergroup conflicts. The court's analysis here also manifests a frequently encountered strategy of cultural appropriation. African-American contributions that have been accepted by the mainstream culture are eventually absorbed as females in their ethnic group. . . . [W]omen have not made the headlines as part of marauding bands intent on racial assault. But they number among their victims."

---

Ilene Barth, Let the Women of Bensonhurst Lead Us in a Prayer Vigil, Newsday, Sept. 3, 1989, at 10.

159. The Supreme Court articulated its standard for obscenity in Miller v. California, 413 U.S. 15 (1973), reh'g denied, 414 U.S. 881 (1973). The Court held that the basic guidelines for the trier of fact were (a) "whether the 'average person, applying contemporary community standards' would find that the work, taken as a whole, appeals to the prurient interest"; (b) "whether the work depicts or describes, in a patently offensive way, sexual conduct specifically defined by the applicable state law"; and (c) "whether the work, taken as a whole, lacks serious literary, artistic, political, or scientific value." Id. at 24 (citations omitted).

160. See Gates, supra note 142.

161. Skywalker Records, Inc., v. Navarro, 739 F. Supp. 578, 595 (S.D. Fla. 1990). The commercial appropriation of rap is readily apparent in pop culture. Soft drink and fast food commercials now feature rap even though the style is sometimes presented without its racial/cultural face. Dancing McDonald's french fries and the Pillsbury Doughboy have gotten into the rap act. The crossover of rap is not the problem; instead, it is the tendency, represented in Skywalker, to reject the cultural origins of language and practices which are disturbing. This is part of an overall pattern of cultural appropriation that predates the rap controversy. Most starkly illustrated in music and dance, cultural trailblazers like Little Richard and James Brown have been squeezed out of their place in popular consciousness to make room for Elvis Presley, Mick Jagger, and others. The meteoric rise of white rapper Vanilla Ice is a contemporary example.

simply "American" or found to be "universal." Other modes associated with African-American culture that resist absorption remain distinctive and are either neglected or dismissed as "deviant."

The court apparently rejected as well the possibility that even the most misogynistic rap may have political value as a discourse of resistance. The element of resistance found in some rap is in making people uncomfortable, thereby challenging received habits of thought and action. Such challenges are potentially political, as are more subversive attempts to contest traditional rules by becoming what is most feared.[162] Against a historical backdrop in which the Black male as social outlaw is a prominent theme, "gangsta' rap" might be taken as a rejection of a conciliatory stance aimed at undermining fear through reassurance, in favor of a more subversive form of opposition that attempts to challenge the rules precisely by becoming the very social outlaw that society fears and attempts to proscribe. Rap representations celebrating an aggressive Black male sexuality can be easily construed as discomforting and oppositional. Not only does reading rap in this way preclude a finding that Nasty lacks political value, it also defeats the court's assumption that the group's intent was to appeal solely to prurient interests. To be sure, these considerations carry greater force in the case of other rap artists, such as N.W.A., Too Short, Ice Cube, and The Geto Boys, all of whose standard fare includes depictions of violent assault, rape, rape-murder, and mutilation.[163] In fact, had these other groups been targeted rather than the comparatively less offensive 2 Live Crew, they might have successfully defeated prosecution. The graphic violence in their representations militate against a finding of obscenity by suggesting an intent not to appeal to prurient interests but instead to more expressly political ones. So long as violence is seen as distinct from sexuality, the prurient interest requirement may provide a shield for the more violent rap artists. However, even this somewhat formalistic dichotomy may provide little solace to such rap artists given the historical linkages that have been made between Black

162. Gates argues that 2 Live Crew is undermining the "specter of the young black male as a figure of sexual and social disruption." Gates, supra note 142. Faced with "racist stereotypes about black sexuality," he explains, "you can do one of two things: you can disavow them or explode them with exaggeration." Id. 2 Live Crew, Gates suggests, has chosen to burst the myth by parodying exaggerations of the "oversexed black female and male." Id.

163. Other rap acts that have been singled out for their violent lyrics include Ice Cube, the Geto Boys, and Too Short. See, e.g., ICE CUBE, KILL AT WILL (Gangsta Boogie Music (ASCAP)/ UJAMA Music, Inc. 1990); GETO BOYS, THE GETO BOYS (N-The-Water Music, Inc. (ASCAP) 1989); TOO SHORT, SHORT DOG'S IN THE HOUSE (RCA Records 1990). Not all rap lyrics are misogynist. Moreover, even misogynist acts also express a political world view. The differences among rap groups and the artistic value of the medium is sometimes overlooked by mainstream critics. See, e.g., Jerry Adler, The Rap Attitude, NEWSWEEK, Mar. 19, 1990, at 56, 57 (labeling rap as a "bombastic, self-aggrandizing" by-product of the growing "Culture of Attitude"). Adler's treatment of rap set off a storm of responses. See, e.g., Patrick Goldstein, Pop Eye: Rappers Don't Have Time For Newsweek's Attitude, L.A. Times, Mar. 25, 1990, at 90 (Magazine). Said Russell Simmons, chairman of Def-Jam Records, rap's most successful label, "Surely the moral outrage in [Adler's] piece would be better applied to contemporary American crises in health care, education, homelessness .... Blaming the victims—in this case America's black working class and underclass—is never a very useful approach to problem-solving." Id. (quoting Simmons).

male sexuality and violence. Indeed, it has been the specter of violence that surrounds images of Black male sexuality that presented 2 Live Crew as an acceptable target of an obscenity prosecution in a field that included Andrew Dice Clay and countless others.

The point here is not that the distinction between sex and violence should be rigorously maintained in determining what is obscene or, more specifically, that rap artists whose standard fare is more violent ought to be protected. To the contrary, these more violent groups should be much more troubling than 2 Live Crew. My point instead is to suggest that obscenity prosecutions of rap artists do nothing to protect the interests of those most directly implicated in rap—Black women. On the one hand, prevailing notions of obscenity separate out sexuality from violence, which has the effect of shielding the more violently misogynistic groups from prosecution; on the other, historical linkages between images of Black male sexuality and violence permit the singling out of "lightweight" rappers for prosecution among all other purveyors of explicit sexual imagery.

C. Addressing the Intersectionality

Although Black women's interests were quite obviously irrelevant in the 2 Live Crew obscenity judgment, their images figured prominently in the public case supporting the prosecution. George Will's Newsweek essay provides a striking example of how Black women's bodies were appropriated and deployed in the broader attack against 2 Live Crew. Commenting on "America's Slide into the Sewers," Will laments that > America today is capable of terrific intolerance about smoking, or toxic waste that threatens trout. But only a deeply confused society is more concerned about protecting lungs than minds, trout than black women. We legislate against smoking in restaurants; singing "Me So Horny" is a constitutional right. Secondary smoke is carcinogenic; celebration of torn vaginas is "mere words."[164]

Lest one be misled into thinking that Will has become an ally of Black women, Will's real concern is suggested by his repeated references to the Central Park jogger assault. Will writes, "Her face was so disfigured a friend took 15 minutes to identify her. 'I recognized her ring.' Do you recognize the relevance of 2 Live Crew?"[165] While the connection between the threat of 2 Live Crew and the image of the Black male rapist was suggested subtly in the public debate, it is blatant throughout Will's discussion. Indeed, it bids to be the central theme of the essay. "Fact: Some members of a particular age and societal cohort—the one making 2 Live Crew rich—stomped and raped the jogger to the razor edge of death, for the fun of it."[166] Will directly indicts 2 Live Crew in the Central Park jogger rape through a fictional dialogue between himself and the defendants. Responding to one defendant's alleged confession that the rape was fun, Will asks, "Where can you get the idea that sexual violence against women is fun? From a music store, through Walkman earphones, from boom boxes blaring forth the rap lyrics of 2 Live Crew."[167] Since the rapists were young Black males and Nasty presents Black men celebrating sexual violence, 2 Live Crew was in Central Park that night, providing the underlying accompaniment to a vicious assault. Ironically, Will rejected precisely this kind of argument in the context of racist speech on the ground that efforts to link racist speech to racist violence presume that those who hear racist speech will mindlessly act on what they hear.[168] Apparently, the certain "social cohort" that produces and consumes racist speech is fundamentally different from the one that produces and consumes rap music.

164. See Will, supra note 140.
165. Id.
166. Id.

Will invokes Black women—twice—as victims of this music. But if he were really concerned with the threat of 2 Live Crew to Black women, why does the Central Park jogger figure so prominently in his argument? Why not the Black woman in Brooklyn who was gang-raped and then thrown down an airshaft? In fact, Will fails even to mention Black victims of sexual violence, which suggests that Black women simply function for Will as stand-ins for white women. Will's use of the Black female body to press the case against 2 Live Crew recalls the strategy of the prosecutor in Richard Wright's novel Native Son. Bigger Thomas, Wright's Black male protagonist, is on trial for killing Mary Dalton, a white woman. Because Bigger burned her body, it cannot be established whether Bigger had sexually assaulted her, so the prosecutor brings in the body of Bessie, a Black woman raped by Bigger and left to die, in order to establish that Bigger had raped Mary Dalton.[169]

These considerations about selectivity, about the denial of cultural specificity, and about the manipulation of Black women's bodies convince me that race played a significant, if not determining, role in the shaping of the case against 2 Live Crew. While using antisexist rhetoric to suggest a concern for women, the attack on 2 Live Crew simultaneously endorses traditional readings of Black male sexuality. The fact that the objects of these violent sexual images are Black women becomes irrelevant in the representation of the threat in terms of the Black rapist/white victim dyad. The Black male becomes the agent of sexual violence and the white community becomes his potential victim. The subtext of the 2 Live Crew prosecution thus becomes a re-reading of the sexualized racial politics of the past.

---

167. Id.

168. See George F. Will, On Campuses, Liberals Would Gag Free Speech, Newsday, Nov. 6, 1989, at 62.

169. RICHARD WRIGHT, NATIVE SON 305-08 (Perennial Library ed. 1989) (1940). Wright wrote, > Though he had killed a black girl and a white girl, he knew that it would be for the death of the white girl that he would be punished. The black girl was merely "evidence." And under it all he knew that white people did not really care about Bessie's being killed. White people never searched for Negroes who killed other Negroes.

Id. at 306-07.

While concerns about racism fuel my opposition to the obscenity prosecution of 2 Live Crew, the uncritical support for, and indeed celebration of, 2 Live Crew by other opponents of the prosecution is extremely troubling as well. If the rhetoric of antisexism provided an occasion for racism, so, too, the rhetoric of antiracism provided an occasion for defending the misogyny of 2 Live Crew. That defense took two forms, one political, the other cultural, both advanced prominently by Henry Louis Gates. Gates's political defense argues that 2 Live Crew advances the antiracist agenda by exaggerating stereotypes of Black male sexuality "to show how ridiculous [they] are."[170] The defense contends that by highlighting to the extreme the sexism, misogyny, and violence stereotypically associated with Black male sexuality, 2 Live Crew represents a postmodern effort to "liberate" us from the racism that perpetuates these stereotypes.[171]

Gates is right to contend that the reactions of Will and others confirm that the racial stereotypes still exist, but even if 2 Live Crew intended to explode these stereotypes, their strategy was misguided. Certainly, the group wholly miscalculated the reaction of their white audience, as Will's polemic amply illustrates. Rather than exploding stereotypes, as Gates suggests, 2 Live Crew, it seems most reasonable to argue, was simply (and unsuccessfully) trying to be funny. After all, trading in sexual stereotypes has long been a means to a cheap laugh, and Gates's cultural defense of 2 Live Crew recognizes as much in arguing the identification of the group with a distinctly African-American cultural tradition of the "dozens" and other forms of verbal boasting, raunchy jokes, and insinuations of sexual prowess, all of which were meant to be laughed at and to gain for the speaker respect for his word wizardry, and not to disrupt conventional myths of Black sexuality.[172] Gates's cultural defense of 2 Live Crew, however, recalls similar efforts on behalf of racist humor, which has sometimes been defended as antiracist—an effort to poke fun at or to show the ridiculousness of racism.

---

170. Gates, supra note 142. Gates's defense of 2 Live Crew portrayed the group as engaging in postmodern guerrilla warfare against racist stereotypes of Black sexuality. Says Gates, "2 Live Crew's music exaggerates stereotypes of black men and women to show how ridiculous those portrayals are. One of the brilliant things about these songs is that they embrace the stereotypes . . . . It's ridiculous. That's why we laugh about them. That is one of the things I noticed in the audience's reaction. There is no undertone of violence. There's laughter, there's joy." Id. Gates repeats the celebratory theme elsewhere, linking 2 Live Crew to Eddie Murphy and other Black male performers because > they're saying all the things that we couldn't say even in the 1960's about our own excesses, things we could only whisper in dark rooms. They're saying we're going to explode all these sacred cows. It's fascinating, and it's upsetting everybody—not just white people but black people. But it's a liberating moment.

John Pareles, An Album is Judged Obscene; Rap: Slick, Violent, Nasty and, Maybe Hopeful, N. Y. Times, June 17, 1990, at 1 (quoting Gates). For a cogent intersectional analysis of Eddie Murphy's popular appeal, see Herman Beavers, The Cool Pose: Intersectionality, Masculinity and Quiescence in the Comedy and Films of Richard Pryor and Eddie Murphy (unpublished manuscript) (on file with the Stanford Law Review).

171. Gates and others who defend 2 Live Crew as postmodern comic heroes tend to dismiss or downplay the misogyny represented in their rap. Said Gates, "Their sexism is so flagrant, however, that it almost cancels itself out in a hyperbolic war between the sexes." Gates, supra note 142.

172. See note 142 supra.

More simply, racist humor has often been excused as "just joking"—even racially motivated assaults have been defended as simple pranks. Thus the racism of an Andrew Dice Clay could be defended in either mode as an attempt to explode racist stereotypes or as simple humor not meant to be taken seriously. Implicit in these defenses is the assumption that racist representations are injurious only if they are intended to injure, or to be taken literally, or are devoid of some other nonracist objective. It is highly unlikely that this rationale would be accepted by Blacks as a persuasive defense of Andrew Dice Clay. Indeed, the Black community's historical and ongoing criticism of such humor suggests widespread rejection of these arguments.

The claim that a representation is meant simply as a joke may be true, but the joke functions as humor within a specific social context in which it frequently reinforces patterns of social power. Though racial humor may sometimes be intended to ridicule racism, the close relationship between the stereotypes and the prevailing images of marginalized people complicates this strategy. And certainly, the humorist's positioning vis-á-vis a targeted group colors how the group interprets a potentially derisive stereotype or gesture. Although one could argue that Black comedians have broader license to market stereotypically racist images, that argument has no force here. 2 Live Crew cannot claim an in-group privilege to perpetuate misogynist humor against Black women: the members of 2 Live Crew are not Black women, and more importantly, they enjoy a power relationship over them.

Humor in which women are objectified as packages of bodily parts to serve whatever male-bonding/male-competition needs men please subordinates women in much the same way that racist humor subordinates African Americans. Claims that incidences of such humor are just jokes and are not meant to injure or to be taken literally do little to blunt their demeaning quality—nor, for that matter, does the fact that the jokes are told within an intragroup cultural tradition.

The notion that sexism can serve antiracist ends has proponents ranging from Eldridge Cleaver[173] to Shahrazad Ali,[174] all of whom seem to expect Black women to serve as vehicles for the achievement of a "liberation" that functions to perpetuate their own subordination.[175] Claims of cultural specificity similarly fail to justify toleration of misogyny.[176] While the cultural 173. See note 47 supra.

174. See notes 37-42 supra and accompanying text.

175. Gates occasionally claims that both Black male and Black female images are exploded by 2 Live Crew. Even if Gates's view holds true for Black male images, the strategy does not work—and was not meant to work—for Black women. Black women are not the actors in 2 Live Crew's strategy; they are acted upon. To challenge the images of Black women, Black women themselves would have to embrace them, not simply permit Black men to "act out" on them. The only Black female rap groups that might conceivably claim such a strategy are Bytches With Problems and Hoes With Attitudes. Yet, having listened to the music of these Black female rap groups, I am not sure that exploding racist images is either their intent or effect. This is not to say, of course, that all Black female rap is without its strategies of resistance. See note 179 infra.

176. It is interesting that whether those judging the 2 Live Crew case came out for or against, defense of 2 Live Crew has the virtue of recognizing merit in a form of music common to the Black community, something George Will and the court that convicted 2 Live Crew were all too glib in dismissing, it does not eliminate the need to question both the sexism within the tradition it defends and the objectives to which the tradition has been pressed. The fact that playing the dozens, say, is rooted in the Black cultural tradition, or that themes represented by mythic folk heroes such as "Stackolee" are African American does not settle the question of whether such practices oppress Black women.[177] Whether these practices are a distinctive part of the African-American cultural tradition is decidedly beside the point. The real question is how subordinating aspects of these practices play out in the lives of people in the community, people who share the benefits as well as the burdens of a common culture. With regard to 2 Live Crew, while it may be true that the Black community has accepted the cultural forms that have evolved into rap, that acceptance should not preclude discussion of whether the misogyny within rap is itself acceptable.

With respect to Gates's political and cultural defenses of 2 Live Crew, then, little turns on whether the "word play" performed by the Crew is a postmodern challenge to racist sexual mythology or simply an internal group practice that crossed over into mainstream America. Both defenses are problematic because they require Black women to accept misogyny and its attendant disrespect and exploitation in the service of some broader group objective, whether it be pursuing an antiracist political agenda or maintaining the cultural integrity of the Black community. Neither objective obligates Black women to tolerate such misogyny.

Likewise, the superficial efforts of the anti-2 Live Crew movement to link all seemed to reject the notion that race has anything to do with their analysis. See Skywalker Records, Inc. v. Navarro, 739 F. Supp. 578, 594-96 (S.D. Fla 1990) (rejecting defense contention that 2 Live Crew's Nasty had artistic value as Black cultural expression); see also Sara Rimer, Rap Band Members Found Not Guilty in Obscenity Trial, N.Y. Times, Oct. 21, 1990, at A30 ("Jurors said they did not agree with the defense's assertion that the 2 Live Crew's music had to be understood in the context of black culture. They said they thought race had nothing to do with it."). Clarence Page also rejects the argument that 2 Live Crew's NASTY must be valued as Black cultural expression: "I don't think 2 Live Crew can be said to represent black culture any more than, say, Andrew Dice Clay can be said to represent white culture. Rather, I think both represent a lack of culture." See Page, supra note 157.

---

177. Gay men are also targets of homophobic humor that might be defended as culturally specific. Consider the homophobic humor of such comedians as Eddie Murphy, Arsenio Hall, and Damon Wayans and David Alan Grier, the two actors who currently portray Black gay men on the television show In Living Color. Critics have linked these homophobic representations of Black gay men to patterns of subordination within the Black community. Black gay filmmaker Marlon Riggs has argued that such caricatures discredit Black gay men's claim to Black manhood, presenting them as "game for play, to be used, joked about, put down, beaten, slapped, and bashed, not just by illiterate homophobic thugs in the night, but by black American culture's best and brightest." Marlon Riggs, Black Macho Revisited: Reflections of a SNAP! Queen, in BROTHER TO BROTHER: NEW WRITINGS BY BLACK GAY MEN 253, 254 (Essex Hemphill ed. 1991); see also Blair Fell, Gayface/Blackface: Parallels of Oppression, NYQ, Apr. 5, 1992, at 32 (drawing parallels between gayface and blackface and arguing that "gayfaced contemporary comedy . . . serves as a tool to soothe the guilty consciences and perpetuate the injustices of gay-bashing America. After all, laughing at something barely human is easier than dealing with flying bullets, split skulls, dying bodies and demands for civil rights.").

the prosecution of the Crew to the victimization of Black women had little to do with Black women's lives. Those who deployed Black women in the service of condemning 2 Live Crew's misogynist representations did not do so in the interest of empowering Black women; rather, they had other interests in mind, the pursuit of which was racially subordinating. The implication here is not that Black feminists should stand in solidarity with the supporters of 2 Live Crew. The spirited defense of 2 Live Crew was no more about defending the entire Black community than the prosecution was about defending Black women. After all, Black women whose very assault is the subject of the representation can hardly regard the right to be represented as bitches and whores as essential to their interest. Instead, the defense primarily functions to protect 2 Live Crew's prerogative to be as misogynistic as they want to be.[178]

Within the African-American political community, Black women will have to make it clear that patriarchy is a critical issue that negatively affects the lives not only of Black women, but of Black men as well. Doing so would help reshape traditional practices so that evidence of racism would not constitute sufficient justification for uncritical rallying around misogynistic politics and patriarchal values. Although collective opposition to racist practice has been and continues to be crucially important in protecting Black interests, an empowered Black feminist sensibility would require that the terms of unity no longer reflect priorities premised upon the continued marginalization of Black women.

---

178. Although much of the sexism that is voiced in rap pervades the industry, Black female rappers have gained a foothold and have undertaken various strategies of resistance. For some, their very presence in rap challenges prevailing assumptions that rap is a Black male tradition. See Tricia Rose, One Queen, One Tribe, One Destiny, VILLAGE VOICE ROCK & ROLL QUARTERLY, Spring 1990, at 10 (profiling Queen Latifah, widely regarded as one of the best female rappers). Although Latifah has eschewed the head-on approach, her rap and videos are often women-centered, as exemplified by her single, "Ladies First." QUEEN LATIFAH, ALL HAIL THE QUEEN (Tommy Boy 1989). The "Ladies First" video featured other female rappers, "showing a depth of women's solidarity never seen before." Rose, supra, at 16. Rappers like Yo-Yo, "hip-hop's first self-proclaimed feminist activist," take a more confrontational line; for example, Yo-Yo duels directly with rapper Ice Cube in "It's a Man's World." Joan Morgan, Throw the 'F', Village Voice, June 11, 1991, at 75.

Some female rappers, such as Bytches With Problems, have attempted to subvert the categories of bitches and whores by taking on the appellations and infusing them with power. As Joan Morgan observes, > It's common practice for oppressed peoples to neutralize terms of disparagement by adopting and redefining them. Lyndah McCaskill and Tanisha Michelle Morgan's decision to define bitch "as a strong woman who doesn't take crap from anyone, male or female" and to encourage women to "wear the title as a badge of honor and keep getting yours" does not differ significantly from blacks opting to use the word nigger or gays embracing queer.

Id. However in the case of the Bytches, Joan Morgan ultimately found the attempt unsuccessful, in part because the subversion operated merely as an exception for the few ("Lynda and Tanisha Michelle are the only B-Y-T-C-H's here; all the other women they speak about, including the menstrual accident, the woman whose boyfriend Lyndah screws, and anyone else who doesn't like their style, are B-I-T-C-H's in the very male sense of the word") and because ultimately, their world view serves to reinscribe male power. Said Morgan, "It's a tired female rendition of age-old sexist, patriarchal thinking: the power is in the pistol or the penis." Id.

CONCLUSION

This article has presented intersectionality as a way of framing the various interactions of race and gender in the context of violence against women of color. Yet intersectionality might be more broadly useful as a way of mediating the tension between assertions of multiple identity and the ongoing necessity of group politics. It is helpful in this regard to distinguish intersectionality from the closely related perspective of antiessentialism, from which women of color have critically engaged white feminism for the absence of women of color on the one hand, and for speaking for women of color on the other. One rendition of this antiessentialist critique—that feminism essentializes the category woman—owes a great deal to the postmodernist idea that categories we consider natural or merely representational are actually socially constructed in a linguistic economy of difference.[179] While the descriptive project of postmodernism of questioning the ways in which meaning is socially constructed is generally sound, this critique sometimes misreads the meaning of social construction and distorts its political relevance.

One version of antiessentialism, embodying what might be called the vulgarized social construction thesis, is that since all categories are socially constructed, there is no such thing as, say, Blacks or women, and thus it makes no sense to continue reproducing those categories by organizing around them.[180] Even the Supreme Court has gotten into this act. In Metro Broadcasting, Inc. v. FCC,[181] the Court conservatives, in rhetoric that oozes vulgar constructionist smugness, proclaimed that any set-aside designed to increase the voices of minorities on the air waves was itself based on a racist assumption that skin color is in some way connected to the likely content of one's broadcast.[182]

But to say that a category such as race or gender is socially constructed is not to say that that category has no significance in our world. On the contrary, a large and continuing project for subordinated people—and indeed, one of the projects for which postmodern theories have been very helpful—is

179. I follow the practice of others in linking antiessentialism to postmodernism. See generally LINDA NICHOLSON, FEMINISM/POSTMODERNISM (1990).

180. I do not mean to imply that all theorists who have made antiessentialist critiques have lasped into vulgar constructionism. Indeed, antiessentialists avoid making these troubling moves and would no doubt be receptive to much of the critique set forth herein. I use the term vulgar constructionism to distinguish between those antiessentialist critiques that leave room for identity politics and those that do not.

181. 110 S. Ct. 2997 (1990).

182.

> The FCC's choice to employ a racial criterion embodies the related notions that a particular and distinct viewpoint inheres in certain racial groups and that a particular applicant, by virtue of race or ethnicity alone, is more valued than other applicants because the applicant is "likely to provide [that] distinct perspective." The policies directly equate race with belief and behavior, for they establish race as a necessary and sufficient condition of securing the preference. . . . The policies impermissibly value individuals because they presume that persons think in a manner associated with their race.

Id. at 3037 (O'Connor, J., joined by Rehnquist, C.J., and Scalia and Kennedy, J.J., dissenting) (internal citations omitted).

thinking about the way power has clustered around certain categories and is exercised against others. This project attempts to unveil the processes of subordination and the various ways those processes are experienced by people who are subordinated and people who are privileged by them. It is, then, a project that presumes that categories have meaning and consequences. And this project's most pressing problem, in many if not most cases, is not the existence of the categories, but rather the particular values attached to them and the way those values foster and create social hierarchies.

This is not to deny that the process of categorization is itself an exercise of power, but the story is much more complicated and nuanced than that. First, the process of categorizing—or, in identity terms, naming—is not unilateral. Subordinated people can and do participate, sometimes even subverting the naming process in empowering ways. One need only think about the historical subversion of the category "Black" or the current transformation of "queer" to understand that categorization is not a one-way street. Clearly, there is unequal power, but there is nonetheless some degree of agency that people can and do exert in the politics of naming. And it is important to note that identity continues to be a site of resistance for members of different subordinated groups. We all can recognize the distinction between the claims "I am Black" and the claim "I am a person who happens to be Black." "I am Black" takes the socially imposed identity and empowers it as an anchor of subjectivity. "I am Black" becomes not simply a statement of resistance but also a positive discourse of self-identification, intimately linked to celebratory statements like the Black nationalist "Black is beautiful." "I am a person who happens to be Black," on the other hand, achieves self-identification by straining for a certain universality (in effect, "I am first a person") and for a concommitant dismissal of the imposed category ("Black") as contingent, circumstantial, nondeterminant. There is truth in both characterizations, of course, but they function quite differently depending on the political context. At this point in history, a strong case can be made that the most critical resistance strategy for disempowered groups is to occupy and defend a politics of social location rather than to vacate and destroy it.

Vulgar constructionism thus distorts the possibilities for meaningful identity politics by conflating at least two separate but closely linked manifestations of power. One is the power exercised simply through the process of categorization; the other, the power to cause that categorization to have social and material consequences. While the former power facilitates the latter, the political implications of challenging one over the other matter greatly. We can look at debates over racial subordination throughout history and see that in each instance, there was a possibility of challenging either the construction of identity or the system of subordination based on that identity. Consider, for example, the segregation system in Plessy v. Ferguson.[183] At issue were multiple dimensions of domination, including categorization, the sign of race, and the subordination of those so labeled. There were at least two targets for Plessy to challenge: the construction of identity ("What is a Black?"), and the system of subordination based on that identity ("Can Blacks and whites sit together on a train?"). Plessy actually made both arguments, one against the coherence of race as a category, the other against the subordination of those deemed to be Black. In his attack on the former, Plessy argued that the segregation statute's application to him, given his mixed race status, was inappropriate. The Court refused to see this as an attack on the coherence of the race system and instead responded in a way that simply reproduced the Black/white dichotomy that Plessy was challenging. As we know, Plessy's challenge to the segregation system was not successful either. In evaluating various resistance strategies today, it is useful to ask which of Plessy's challenges would have been best for him to have won—the challenge against the coherence of the racial categorization system or the challenge to the practice of segregation?

183. 163 U.S. 537 (1896).

The same question can be posed for Brown v. Board of Education.[184] Which of two possible arguments was politically more empowering—that segregation was unconstitutional because the racial categorization system on which it was based was incoherent, or that segregation was unconstitutional because it was injurious to Black children and oppressive to their communities? While it might strike some as a difficult question, for the most part, the dimension of racial domination that has been most vexing to African Americans has not been the social categorization as such, but the myriad ways in which those of us so defined have been systematically subordinated. With particular regard to problems confronting women of color, when identity politics fail us, as they frequently do, it is not primarily because those politics take as natural certain categories that are socially constructed but rather because the descriptive content of those categories and the narratives on which they are based have privileged some experiences and excluded others.

Along these lines, consider the Clarence Thomas/Anita Hill controversy. During the Senate hearings for the confirmation of Clarence Thomas to the Supreme Court, Anita Hill, in bringing allegations of sexual harassment against Thomas, was rhetorically disempowered in part because she fell between the dominant interpretations of feminism and antiracism. Caught between the competing narrative tropes of rape (advanced by feminists) on the one hand and lynching (advanced by Thomas and his antiracist supporters) on the other, the race and gender dimensions of her position could not be told. This dilemma could be described as the consequence of antiracism's essentializing Blackness and feminism's essentializing womanhood. But recognizing as much does not take us far enough, for the problem is not simply linguistic or philosophical in nature. It is specifically political: the narratives of gender are based on the experience of white, middle-class women, and the narratives of race are based on the experience of Black men. The solution does not merely entail arguing for the multiplicity of identities or challenging essentialism generally. Instead, in Hill's case, for example, it would have been necessary to assert those crucial aspects of her location that were erased, even by many of her advocates—that is, to state what difference her difference made.

184. 397 U.S. 483 (1954).

If, as this analysis asserts, history and context determine the utility of identity politics, how then do we understand identity politics today, especially in light of our recognition of multiple dimensions of identity? More specifically, what does it mean to argue that gender identities have been obscured in antiracist discourses, just as race identities have been obscured in feminist discourses? Does that mean we cannot talk about identity? Or instead, that any discourse about identity has to acknowledge how our identities are constructed through the intersection of multiple dimensions? A beginning response to these questions requires that we first recognize that the organized identity groups in which we find ourselves in are in fact coalitions, or at least potential coalitions waiting to be formed.

In the context of antiracism, recognizing the ways in which the intersectional experiences of women of color are marginalized in prevailing conceptions of identity politics does not require that we give up attempts to organize as communities of color. Rather, intersectionality provides a basis for reconceptualizing race as a coalition between men and women of color. For example, in the area of rape, intersectionality provides a way of explaining why women of color have to abandon the general argument that the interests of the community require the suppression of any confrontation around intraracial rape. Intersectionality may provide the means for dealing with other marginalizations as well. For example, race can also be a coalition of straight and gay people of color, and thus serve as a basis for critique of churches and other cultural institutions that reproduce heterosexism.

With identity thus reconceptualized, it may be easier to understand the need for and to summon the courage to challenge groups that are after all, in one sense, "home" to us, in the name of the parts of us that are not made at home. This takes a great deal of energy and arouses intense anxiety. The most one could expect is that we will dare to speak against internal exclusions and marginalizations, that we might call attention to how the identity of "the group" has been centered on the intersectional identities of a few. Recognizing that identity politics takes place at the site where categories intersect thus seems more fruitful than challenging the possibility of talking about categories at all. Through an awareness of intersectionality, we can better acknowledge and ground the differences among us and negotiate the means by which these differences will find expression in constructing group politics.

PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION IN SOUTH AFRICA

Jason Brickhill
(Contributing Editor)

JUTA

First Published 2018

ISBN: 978-1-48512-816-8

The mural used on the front cover appears on a building in downtown Johannesburg, and is used with the permission of the artist, Faith XLVII

Set in 11 on 12 Point Times Roman Cover design by: Matthew Bubear-Craemer
Typesetting by: B Hopking
Printed and bound by:DJE Flexible Print Solutions

DEDICATION

For my mother and father, Joan and Jeremy, who taught me that every struggle depends on love, solidarity and comradeship, and good music, and who have always found my choice of law just a little strange.

8.5 CONCLUSION

South Africa is facing profound questions that will have an impact on the delivery of health care and other services. There is a lack of urgency in relation to the continued delivery of these. And many fear that both access to and quality of health care services will continue to deteriorate as the economic climate becomes more volatile and more difficult.

It is likely that there will be an increasing number of violations of the negative aspects of the right to health. This will have a knock-on effect on programmes that have been put in place to achieve incremental improvements in health care service delivery. In other words, both the building blocks of progressive realisation of the right to health, and the foundation on which they are built, may well become more unstable.

In addition to an economic recession, the current political climate brings with it a level of uncertainty. It highlights cases of erosion of accountability, respect for the rule of law and good governance. We see this conduct in decisions regarding the availability of health care services, in the award of tenders for the delivery of these services, and in the failure to hold to account those who act in breach of their obligations. In addition to violating the foundation on which our Constitution is built, these cases will affect the day-to-day living of millions of people.

As such, legal strategies to advance the right of access to health care services are not just about those health care services. It will likely not be enough to focus on progressive realisation of the right to health. It will also likely not suffice to address the positive and negative obligations arising from the right to health without addressing closely related issues such as corruption and financial mismanagement. Finally, it is necessary to hold all forms of power to account, in the public and private sectors, to ensure that health care users' rights come first.

Litigation on the realisation of the right to health care services therefore appears to be entering a different phase. The road towards access to quality health care services is a long one and will require sustained and concerted efforts to make health rights a reality.

Chapter 9

HAPPY (N)EVER AFTER? PUBLIC INTEREST LITIGATION FOR LGBTI EQUALITY

Kerry Williams and Melanie Judge[1]

9.1 INTRODUCTION

The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, promulgated in 1996, was the first in the world to entrench lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and intersex (LGBTI) equality through prohibiting unfair discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation.[2] This prompted almost a decade of legal victories and the incremental development of equality law for LGBTI people in post-apartheid South Africa, including the legalisation of same-sex marriage.[3] On paper, the [1] Melanie Judge acknowledges the support of the National Research Foundation's South African Research Chairs Initiative (SARCHI) Chair in Security and Justice, in the Faculty of Law at the University of Cape Town. The authors extend thanks to Kate Hofmeyr for her thoughtful comments on the chapter.

[2] Section 9(3) of the Constitution, commonly referred to as the equality clause, provides: 'The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.' Section 9(4) of the Constitution provides: 'No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.'

[3] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others [1998] ZACC 15; 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC) [NCGLE was the first applicant and CALS was admitted as amicus curiae, represented by Wits Law Clinic] (National Coalition I); Langemaat v Minister of Safety and Security 1998 (3) SA 312 (T); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others [1999] ZACC 17; 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC) [LRC acted for the applicant] (National Coalition II); Satchwell v The President of the Republic of South Africa and Another [2003] ZACC 2; 2003 (4) SA 266 (CC); Du Toit and Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development and Others [2002] ZACC 20; 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC) [Wits Law Clinic acted for the applicants and for Lesbian and Gay Equality Project, which was admitted as amicus curiae]; J and Another v Director General, Department of Home Affairs and Others [2003] ZACC 3; equal treatment of LGBTI people is affirmed, including their right to human dignity. However, over the last decade LGBTI public interest litigation (PIL) has confronted forms of institutionalised violence, inequality and discrimination that are difficult to address using the jurisprudence that developed out of the Constitution's protection and promotion of equality and dignity. PIL concerning LGBTI peoples' rights after the legalisation of same-sex marriage in South Africa has been primarily concerned with bringing seemingly intractable patterns of violence and exclusion before the courts. This approach, which seeks to bring the lived, embodied experiences of LGBTI people to the fore, has faced numerous socio-legal challenges. In trying to apply the law to the social spheres where pernicious forms of stigmatisation, prejudice and othering continue—despite legal protections against these—there has been an attempt, through LGBTI PIL, to prevent normalised forms of exclusion and discrimination that are often left undisturbed in the law's formal conferral of the right to dignity and equality.

This chapter will focus on PIL in the period after the legalisation of same-sex marriage, the social impact of which, we argue, was somewhat overestimated[4] despite the significant contribution of prior strategic litigation to expanding equality jurisprudence in South Africa.[5] The reasons for this overestimation are complex but include the following: (i) the achievement of marriage rights came to symbolise a consummation of sorts between the right to equality and LGBTI rights, (ii) as a legal gain, it came at the end of a period of (over) optimism about 2003 (5) SA 621 (CC) [LRC acted for the applicants]; Minister of Home Affairs and Another v Fourie and Another [2005] ZACC 19; 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC); Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and Eighteen Others v Minister of Home Affairs [2005] ZACC 20; 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC) [Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as an applicant and Doctors for Life International was admitted as first amicus curiae]. Also see, Jonathan Berger 'Getting to the Constitutional Court on time: A litigation history of same-sex marriage' in Melanie Judge, Anthony Manion & Shaun de Waal (eds) To Have and to Hold: The Making of Same-sex Marriage in South Africa (2008) 17–28; Steven Budlender, Gilbert Marcus SC & Nick Ferreira 'Public interest litigation and social change in South Africa: Strategies, tactics and lessons' The Atlantic Philanthropies (2014), last accessed on 24 October 2017 from <http://www.atlanticphilanthropies.org/app/uploads/2015/12/Public-interest-litigation-and-social-change-in-South-Africa.pdf>.

[4] This is by no means intended to underestimate the importance of the legalisation of same-sex marriage, including that equal marriage rights enable same-sex couples to access the same benefits and protections as married heterosexuals; that the right to marry is a civil right and therefore an entitlement of citizenship; and that the symbolic significance of extending marriage to same-sex couples has a positive impact on democratic inclusivity. For more on debates around marriage, see David Bilchitz & Melanie Judge 'For whom does the bell toll? The challenges and possibilities of the Civil Union Act for family law in South Africa' (2007) 23 SAJHR: Sexuality and the Law: Special Issue 466-99; Kerry Williams '"I do" or "We won't": Legalizing same-sex marriage in South Africa' (2004) 20 SAJHR 32–63.

[5] Former Deputy Chief Justice Moseneke puts it thus: 'I think I should just pay tribute to gay and lesbian structures that actually helped wittingly and unwittingly in the development of equality jurisprudence in this country. All those struggles around rights of gay and lesbian people have in many ways allowed the [Constitutional] Court and allowed our Constitution and many other people to be able to express themselves around issues of equality.' Dikgang Moseneke 'Opening of the 13th Out in Africa Gay and Lesbian Film Festival' [Audio file] Cape Town, South Africa 1 March 2007.

the extent of South Africa's transition from apartheid to democracy; and (iii) it relied on an assumption that formal legal advances constitute social advances for all LGBTI people in equal measure. Representing the 'grand prize'[6] of the strategic litigation process towards LGBTI formal equality, the marriage victory had tempted a happily-ever-after fate. Yet, after this point, LGBTI PIL became increasingly difficult as attention turned to the persistence of social discrimination and exclusion[7] facing LGBTI communities as social problems, rather than as formal legal problems (such as the unfair discriminations that are a product of unjust laws). So, while the law overall acknowledges the dignity of LGBTI people and no longer formally discriminates (or is no longer permitted to formally discriminate) against LGBTI people, it still falls short of enabling contextual understandings of the experiences of social discrimination and exclusion to be fully articulated through law.[8]

This failure partly has to do with the difficulty of framing forms of social discrimination and exclusion as breaches of the right to equality or dignity. It also points to how, amongst other reasons, the law as a social institution continues to reinforce LGBTI inferiorisation. The law at once opens space for marginalised groups to contest oppressive hegemonies, yet, in the same moment, the law reproduces the very relations of power on which such hegemonies turn. This violent side of law,[9] and in particular its implications for justice in the context of LGBTI identity politics,[10] has not been adequately considered in strategic litigation efforts. This is significant precisely because the continuities of colonialism and apartheid, and how these play out in present-day interpretations and practices of law,[11] form part and parcel of the contemporary realities that shape sexual and gendered realities.

[6] Berger (note 3 above).

[7] 'Social discrimination and exclusion' include reference to the structural and institutionalised modes through which LGBTI people are denied full access to, and expression of, social, economic and political life, frequently through various forms of violence. We are referring here to something different to direct discrimination in South African equality jurisprudence. Forms of social discrimination were evident in the three cases that are discussed in this chapter. Social discrimination involves forms of violence and exclusion that are not rooted in formal unequal or differential treatment of LGBTI people. Instead, social discrimination is about the experience of violence, exclusion, and oppression which is at the centre of the lived experience of inequality.

[8] South African equality jurisprudence (first set out in Harksen v Lane NO and Others [1997] ZACC 12; 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC) para 53) requires the isolation of differential treatment and then a determination as to whether such differential treatment amounts to unfair discrimination. If the differential treatment is on a ground listed in s 9(3) of the Constitution, then discrimination is established. Once discrimination is established it becomes necessary to embark upon a contextual analysis underpinning the discriminatory treatment to finally determine if the differential treatment is prohibited unfair discrimination. This contextual analysis looks at the impact on the complainant and others in the same situation.

[9] Walter Benjamin 'Critique of violence' in One-way Street and Other Writings (1978) 132–54; Robert M Cover 'Violence and the word' (1986) 95 Yale LJ 1601.

[10] Chandan Reddy Freedom with Violence: Race, Sexuality and the US State (2011).

[11] On this point, Cover (note 10 above) argues that 'legal interpretation takes place in a field of pain and death' in which the violent side of the law is implicated.

Consequently, there are multiple forms of violence directed at LGBTI communities, some of which are the focus of the PIL discussed in this chapter.[12] In sum, LGBTI people continue to experience severe physical violence, psychological violence and state violence.[13] Physical violence is usually criminal and involves LGBTI people being targeted because of their sexuality or gender. Psychological violence concerns the mental health of LGBTI individuals, and the negative impact of inferiorisation, stigmatisation and pathologisation on their well-being.[14] State violence is meted out through the systemic exclusion or marginalisation of LGBTI people within and through the various systems and apparatuses of state governance. By way of example, when LGBTI people encounter state machinery, they might face the denial of the full entitlements of citizenship by homophobic or transphobic officials who use bureaucratic and state-sanctioned power to stymie access to resources, recognition and rights. The experience of these forms of violence, as instrumental to how social discrimination and exclusion take effect, does not easily lend itself to framing a legal complaint as a formal breach of the right to either equality or dignity.

9.2 CRITICAL LITIGATION AND LITIGATING CRITICALLY

Between 1996 and 2005 there were numerous cases litigated in the name of LGBTI equality.[15] A number of these were spearheaded by the National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality which later became the Lesbian and Gay Equality Project. With the benefit of hindsight this course of legal action has been presented as a conscious and strategic approach to litigating LGBTI equality.[16] The result of these cases was almost full formal legal equality,[17] yet the so-called strategic [12] Vulnerabilities to violence are affected by race, class and gender differentials such that black and gender non-conforming LGBTI people are rendered disproportionately vulnerable.

[13] Juan Nel & Melanie Judge 'Exploring homophobic victimisation in Gauteng, South Africa: Issues, impacts and responses' (2008) 21 Acta Criminologica 19–36; Graeme Reid & Teresa Dirsuweit 'Understanding systemic violence: Homophobic attacks in Johannesburg and its surrounds' (2002) 13 Urban Forum 99–126; Helen Wells Overall research findings on levels of empowerment among LGBT people in KwaZulu-Natal (unpublished report, OUT LGBT Well-being, 2006).

[14] Juan Nel 'South African psychology can and should provide leadership in advancing understanding of sexual and gender diversity on the African continent: Editorial' (2014) 44 S Afr J Psychol 145 at 145–8; Juan Nel & Duncan Breen 'Victims of hate crime' in Robert Peacock (ed) Victimology in South Africa 2 ed (2013).

[15] Note 3 above.

[16] It has been described as a 'well-developed litigation strategy' purposefully designed around a 'shopping list' of law reform goals (See, Berger (note 3 above) 18), largely influenced by Cameron's application of constitutional rights to sexual orientation (Edwin Cameron 'Sexual orientation and the Constitution: A test case for human rights' (1993) 110 SALJ 450–72.

[17] The Civil Union Act 17 of 2006, in having introduced a separate piece of legislation that grants the same rights and obligations as the Marriage Act 25 of 1961, probably constitutes a constitutional infringement in establishing a 'separate but equal' legal marriage regime for same-sex couples who remain excluded from the Marriage Act.

LGBTI litigation has also been the subject of significant critique, in particular for not having adequately considered the interests of black and poor LGBTI people.[18] Since 2005 the focus of legal activism has shifted from challenging unequal laws to grappling with forms of violence that continue to delimit the possibilities of LGBTI people leading lives of equal value and worth in both private and public spheres. This has been challenging for PIL, raising a host of issues at the interface of law and society.

In exploring these challenges, we draw on three cases which have been litigated by Webber Wentzel on behalf of various parties,[19] and which all concern forms of physical, psychological and/or state violence directed at LGBTI people. We refer to these cases as Mazibuko, Qwelane and Semugoma, respectively. In summary, Mazibuko concerned a hate crime, in the form of assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm, against a young gay man, Deric Mazibuko, at a 'tavern' in a suburb on the East Rand of Gauteng. Mazibuko survived the attack by three men. Mazibuko was determined that the perpetrators be brought to justice, and approached OUT LGBT Well-being (OUT)[20] for assistance, which then in turn approached Webber Wentzel. Qwelane involved the publication of an article by Jon Qwelane, a journalist and political figure, in the Sunday Sun newspaper in which he expressed support for Robert Mugabe's views on gays;[21] Mugabe had said that being gay was unnatural and compared same-sex marriage to people marrying animals. In his article, Qwelane argued that gay and lesbian equality rights should be removed from the Constitution, prompting the South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) to seek an apology from him. The SAHRC instituted a claim against Qwelane, arguing that his words amounted to hate speech and harassment as defined in the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, 2000 (the Equality Act). The Psychological Society of [18] See Mary Hames 'Lesbians and the Civil Union Act: A critical reflection' in Melanie Judge, Anthony Manion & Shaun de Waal (eds) To Have and to Hold: The Making of Same-sex Marriage in South Africa (2008) 258–67; Natalie Oswin 'Producing homonormativity in neoliberal South Africa: Recognition, redistribution, and the Equality Project' (2007) 32 Signs 649–69.

[19] The co-authors of this chapter have variously been involved in the cases discussed in this chapter. Kerry Williams (together with Nurina Ally) was the attorney responsible for Qwelane and Mazibuko. Melanie Judge has been integrally involved in the Mazibuko and Qwelane matters on behalf of OUT and PsySSA, respectively. Tshego Phala, a partner at Webber Wentzel, was the attorney responsible for Semugoma. The chapter does not consider or examine other LGBTI PIL cases which may have been litigated in the period post 2005.

[20] OUT is a non-governmental organisation that provides health services for LGBTI people and communities.

[21] In his article, Qwelane wrote that 'there could be a few things I could take issue with Zimbabwean President Robert Mugabe, but his unflinching and unapologetic stance over homosexuals is definitely not among those'. Mugabe's views on homosexuality include referring to it as 'inhumane', and stating that 'gays have no human rights' and are 'worse than dogs and pigs'. See. Michael K Lavers 'Zimbabwe president describes homosexuality as "inhuman"' Washington Blade 28 March 2014, last accessed on 9 November 2016 from <http://www.washingtonblade.com/2014/03/28/zimbabwe-president-describes-homosexuality-inhuman/>.

South Africa (PsySSA)[22] was concerned with the effects that Qwelane's words had had on the psychological well-being of LGBTI people. The organisation believed it was important that the psychological impact should be the focus of the case brought by the SAHRC against Qwelane in the Equality Court. PsySSA accordingly approached Webber Wentzel to pursue an amicus application on their behalf. Semugoma involved the unlawful detention and threatened deportation by the Department of Home Affairs (DHA) of Paul Semugoma, a Ugandan national, to Uganda on his re-entry into South Africa. At the time Uganda was poised to pass the Anti-Homosexuality Bill and so there was a legitimate concern that Semugoma would be prosecuted as an openly gay man. Several South African non-profit organisations, together with Semugoma's partner, approached Webber Wentzel to act on his behalf. Each of these cases featured forms of physical, psychological and/or state violence, and their constructions as strategic legal interventions, as well as the course each took, offer valuable insights into what it means to conduct LGBTI PIL in South Africa at this time.

(a) Constructing the cases

Although LGBTI equality and dignity were at the centre of all these cases, an allegation that there was a breach of the right to equality or dignity was not. In Mazibuko, given that the trial was criminal in character, the room to raise breaches of Mazibuko's rights to equality and dignity was limited. The perpetrators were clearly deeply homophobic and targeted Mazibuko because he was gay. In choosing the most appropriate cause of action, it was apparent that the criminal conduct of the accused could not easily be framed in litigation as breaching Mazibuko's rights.[23] For this reason, it made strategic sense to allow the prosecutor to attain the criminal conviction and to then introduce the effects of the homophobic component of the crime in the sentencing phase of the trial.[24] It was [22] PsySSA is a non-profit organisation that represents psychology professionals in South Africa.

[23] It also would not have been possible to construct a case around developing the criminal law (which is common law) to accord with the protections the rights to equality and dignity offer, as the elements required to establish a crime do not call for such development. It is arguable that an appropriate development may be that the onus of proof should shift to the accused if it is alleged that a crime is accompanied by hate speech. However, this is where the formal offerings of constitutional law and the reality of practicing law and protecting the interests of clients, part ways: for Mazibuko to feel a sense of justice he wanted the accused to be punished for their conduct, which hurt him both physically and emotionally, rather than having the onus shifted. Interestingly, at a point in the litigation when the criminal trial was being delayed, he considered instituting a civil claim in delict for damages arising out of the assault, which would have more directly implicated the rights to dignity and equality. If pursued, this could have led to the development of the common law in ways which may accord with the protections the right to equality and dignity offer.

[24] These effects included: (i) the psychological impact of a hate crime on the victim: such victims are at risk of developing mental health problems including depression, anxiety and post-traumatic stress disorder; (ii) the secondary victimisation which follows a hate crime when the victim turns to service providers, such as the criminal justice officials or health care service providers, for support; (iii) that where a person is victimised as a result of his or her sexual orientation, the incident acts as a reminder that it is not safe to make his or her sexual orientation known, which may lead to internalised homophobia; (iv) the trauma of the victimisation on the basis of prejudice and stigmatisation has a significant impact on the victim's relationship with his or her family, including that the victim's family may fear for their own safety; (v) that hate crimes as message crimes have an effect on the community to which the victim belongs, including that other LGBTI people in the community understand that the crime sends a message that they too are unwelcome and unsafe in that community, which contributes to a climate of stress and fear.

believed (perhaps naively) that criminal law could ameliorate the way in which the crime undermined equality and thereby promote equality, albeit indirectly. The decision to intervene in the sentencing phase was intended to forefront the context in which the crime was perpetrated and give prominence to the lived experience of LGBTI people, including Mazibuko, so as to ensure that they and he were not left unseen nor unaccounted for in the criminal justice process despite its focus being on the acts of the accused.

In Qwelane, the emphasis was on the Equality Act, promulgated to, inter alia, prevent hate speech and harassment and give effect to the rights to equality and dignity. Although the claim instituted by the SAHRC did not directly involve an assertion that Qwelane had infringed LGBTI peoples' rights, it is clear that the Equality Act's prohibition of hate speech and harassment is intended to protect and promote equality and dignity through an acknowledgement that such conduct undermines equality and dignity. When the SAHRC instituted its claim, it was evident that its approach did not articulate the full nature of the harm caused by hate speech and harassment on LGBTI embodied experiences in a context where LGBTI people are already vulnerable to various forms of violence. As a result, PsySSA believed it imperative that this experience and context be placed before the court. This became all the more pressing when Qwelane challenged the constitutionality of the hate-speech provisions of the Equality Act, suggesting (incorrectly) that they infringed the right to freedom of expression and were vague and overbroad. With this came the risk that the case would centre on Qwelane's rights to express harmful words rather than their harmful effects. It appeared to PsySSA that without a court being fully apprised of the psychological and social effects of homophobic hate speech, it would not make a just decision in relation to the breach of the provisions nor their constitutionality.[25]

[25] PsySSA's intervention was therefore aimed at placing evidence before the court on the harm caused by Qwelane's article. The harms included evidence that hate speech directed at LGBTI people makes them significantly more vulnerable to a range of psychological harms such as depression, suicidal ideation (thoughts about suicide) and internalised homophobia Homophobic hate speech also affects the immediate community in that other LGBTI people in the community experience a lowered self-esteem and high levels of fear (which in turn creates a vulnerability to depression and anxiety) as a result of the hate speech. Finally, homophobic hate speech, like other forms of hate speech, has a detrimental impact on society at large as it actively polarises communities by reinforcing prejudice and existing divisions with the risk that it translates into animosity and sometimes even violence. PsySSA further argued that the Equality Act's prohibition of hate speech was a justifiable limitation on the right to freedom of expression as it was intended to protect the dignity and psychological integrity of those who had experienced historical disadvantage.

In the context of LGBTI PIL since the legalisation of same-sex marriage, it is not surprising that the strategies adopted for the cases relied neither on conventional breaches of the right to equality or dignity nor on the Equality Act's prohibition of unfair discrimination.

The wake of optimism left by the legalisation of same-sex marriage momentarily blinded LGBTI strategic litigators to the possibility of the Constitution, and laws developed by the Constitution, having limitations for the LGBTI community. Relying on criminal law and the Equality Act, and tangentially invoking the right to dignity,[26] were strategies intended to assist in addressing forms of social discrimination and exclusion. The hope was that criminal law and the Equality Act would do the work of LGBTI equality. With the benefit of hindsight, it appears that these legal mechanisms fall short for LGBTI people, demonstrating the difficulty of law[27] per se to address these forms of violence.

(b) Litigating from the margins

In both Mazibuko and Qwelane the key public interest litigants were amici curiae. In Mazibuko, one of the early challenges was to create new law to allow an amicus to intervene in a criminal trial in the Magistrates Court.[28] OUT intervened as an amicus in the sentencing phase of the criminal trial to place evidence before the court on the effects of homophobic hate crimes on the victim, the community and society at large, the purpose of which was to influence the court's assessment of an appropriate sentence for the accused. In Qwelane, PsySSA applied successfully to intervene as an amicus as the organisation was well-placed to put evidence before the court about the deleterious impact of homophobic hate speech on psychosocial well-being. In both these cases, conducting PIL as an amicus had significant implications for the experience of the litigants and the degree to which LGBTI interests could be centred in the trial proceedings. In Mazibuko there was a persistent anxiety about overstepping the 'proper role' of an amicus, conscious that in an adversarial system (as opposed to an inquisitorial system) criminal procedure is premised on the state's prosecution of those accused of crimes. The legitimacy of this system depends on the balance struck between the accused (the bearer of certain protective criminal justice rights) and the state (the bearer of inordinate power intended to protect the public through prosecution of criminals). Consequently, there was a clear intention not to upset this balance both in respecting the system and in recognising that any such upset might limit the ability [26] In Qwelane, PsySSA's evidence showed the impact of homophobic hate speech including the impact that such speech has on self-worth (which implicitly suggested that homophobic hate speech infringes LGBTI peoples' right to dignity). Additionally, PsySSA argued that the prohibition of hate speech in the Equality Act was constitutionally justified as it gives effect to the right to dignity.

[27] Here we refer to law in its broadest sense and to include the rules, systems, structures and practices of law in society.

[28] The magistrate admitted OUT as an amicus curiae in the criminal matter on the basis that rule 28 of the Magistrates' Courts Rules allows such admission.

of amici interventions in future cases. However, this required an exceptional degree of patience in Mazibuko, as it took just over four years for the accused to be brought to trial and convicted. At great cost, in both time and resources, OUT conducted a watching brief throughout this period, and then only when the accused were convicted did the organisation apply to intervene as an amicus.[29] This created further anxiety about whether this was an effective and efficient use of PIL resources. In Qwelane, PsySSA initially conducted itself like a conventional amicus. Having been admitted to give particular evidence before the court, the organisation followed the lead of the SAHRC as it conducted the litigation. However, following this lead became increasingly difficult over the years as the SAHRC failed to pursue the case with any urgency and Qwelane used procedural devices to effect inordinate and justice-denying delays. Eight years after having initiated legal proceedings, the SAHRC finally obtained a court date. However, on the eve of the commencement of the trial Qwelane brought an application to postpone his day in court on the basis of alleged ill-health. It was PsySSA's view that this application was effectively not for a postponement, but rather for a permanent stay as according to the evidence available to the Court, Qwelane's condition was presented as chronic and degenerative and therefore unlikely to improve.[30] Judge Moshidi granted Qwelane's postponement application without granting PsySSA or the SAHRC the opportunity to answer the application and put up evidence demonstrating that Qwelane was unlikely to recover. Had they been allowed to present this evidence, it would have shown that Qwelane's deteriorating medical condition was not a reason to postpone the trial but, rather, to start it with haste. PsySSA, as a result, decided to approach the Constitutional Court with an application for leave to appeal the High Court's postponement. The Constitutional Court declined to hear the appeal but in doing so issued a judgment which [29] The trial took over a year to commence, as initially the prosecuting authority decided not to prosecute the accused, arguing it was 'just a tavern fight'. OUT accordingly applied to the National Director of Public Prosecutions to internally review the decision not to prosecute in terms of s 179(5)(d) of the Constitution and s 22(2) of the National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998. The application was successful. Thereafter OUT conducted a watching brief from the moment the accused made their first appearance to the date of their conviction, in the hope that the court would act diligently as a result of being reminded of the LGBTI interests at stake.

[30] Qwelane's treating physician, Dr Seedat, indicated that Qwelane was hypoxaemic and chronically required oxygen. He also had a combination of Chronic Obstructive Pulmonary Disease (COPD) and pulmonary fibrosis with right heart failure. PsySSA's expert physician, Dr Richards, who considered Qwelane's medical report, indicated that his professional view was that Qwelane's condition 'will not improve' and 'his long term prognosis is also very poor . . . For hypoxaemix COPD alone, less than 70% of sufferers survive more than a year, and less that 20 to 40% survive up to 5 years . . . Dr Seedat's report however indicates that Mr Qwelane suffers not only from hypoxaemic COPD, but also pulmonary fibrosis and right heart failure and a co-existent vascular disease. These additional conditions make Mr Qwelane's prognosis of survival even lower'. (para 15 of PsySSA's application for leave to appeal, the order of the High Court postponing the trial, to the Constitutional Court, case no 226/16).

supported the matter finally proceeding in the High Court in March 2017.[31] The court further pointed out that postponements were 'not merely for the taking'[32] and had to be properly justified and that it was a denial of fair process when the High Court refused to hear PsySSA's evidence and granted the postponement.[33]

In both Mazibuko and Qwelane, the law taking its course had effectively marginalised the defence of LGBTI interests. An amicus plays a different role to an applicant and is by no means dominus litis. Much of the preoccupation of the amici parties in these cases was in grappling with how to enable LGBTI interests to be wholly considered, while litigating from the margins. This is undesirable as the LGBTI experience itself is frequently marginalised, and it is thus problematic when litigation against such marginality begins to mirror, rather than contradict, that positioning. In this sense the cases reflect somewhat of a double-margin: the amicus interventions were launched on behalf of a marginalised community appealing to the law for recourse against prejudice; at the same time these appeals are made from the margins in that amici occupy a relatively de-centred position from which to shape the interpretation and application of law in the legal process. Yet at the same time, and through these cases, LGBTI voices were brought before the law and the courts, through for example the giving of expert testimony on the embodied experiences of sexual and gender discrimination, thus serving to draw these material realities more firmly into the legal frame.

(c) Reproducing homophobia

In each of the cases, the manner in which the litigation unfolded exposed how law, the legal system, and those who enforce it (such as court officials), are implicated in the exercise of discriminatory power. This relates to the gendered, heteronormative and racialised dynamics that are embedded in the production and practice of law, and in relation to which, in complex ways, LGBTI people are both regulated and resistant.[34] As a result, the law and its apparatuses (including the systems and subjects that keep it in place) constitutively re-enact the sexual, gendered and racial marginalisations that LGBTI people face. An example of this is how, in response to the litigation in Mazibuko, Qwelane and Semugoma, the kinds of homophobic behaviour that the litigation was attempting to challenge, were reproduced during the legal proceedings.

This reproduction of homophobia was most notable in Mazibuko where one of the accused arrived in court wearing a t-shirt displaying the words 'Dip me in [31] Psychological Society of South Africa v Dubula Jonathan Qwelane and others [2016] ZACC 48; 2017 (8) BCLR 1039 (CC).

[32] Ibid para 30.

[33] Ibid para 39.

[34] See Ruthann Robson Lesbian Out Law: Survival Under the Rule of Law (1992); Catherine MacKinnon 'Difference and dominance: On sex discrimination' in Will Kymlicka (ed) Critiques and Alternatives (1992); Kimberlé Crenshaw 'Race, gender, and sexual harassment' (1992) 65 S Cal L Rev 1467–76.

chocolate and throw me to the lesbians'. This can be read as a brazen expression of the accused's non-repentance, a sentiment similarly expressed by Qwelane, who wrote in the article that was the subject of the case against him, '[B]y the way, please tell the Human Rights Commission that I totally refuse to withdraw or apologise for my views'. The presence of the t-shirt in court in Mazibuko can also be interpreted as a direct provocation toward gays and lesbians through a mocking display that, metaphorically, pushes the accused back onto 'the lesbians' in the form of a sexual threat. Astoundingly, the magistrate conducted the court proceedings making no mention of the t-shirt. This reflects the normalisation and a tacit legitimation of the exercise of hetero-patriarchy in the courtroom, the very kind of power that fuels violence against LGBTI people in the first instance.[35] The court was therefore complicit in exposing gays and lesbians to a renewed threat and provocation by the accused's wearing of the t-shirt, allowing its words to be publicly directed at the LGBTI bodies and interests in the courtroom. Fortunately, the complainant himself was not in court that day. However, a clear message was sent to his attorneys, and to everyone in court, that the legal system would not, in the course of justice, protect the complainant from revictimisation. The conduct of the accused and the magistrate on that day confirmed that the welfare of LGBTI people was overlooked in legal proceedings. In the sentencing phase of the trial, the amicus argued that the wearing of the t-shirt had demonstrated a clear lack of remorse and that this should be taken into account in sentencing the accused.[36] This argument was disregarded, reflecting the court's inability, perhaps unwillingness, to recognise and respond to its own perpetuation of prejudice. The magistrate handed down a sentence which was unduly lenient, and which included imposing an obligation on 'the LGBT group' (who remained unnamed and unspecified) to [35] See Nonhlanhla Mkhize et al The Country We Want to Live in: Hate Crimes and Homophobia in the Lives of Black Lesbians (2010); Andrew Martin et al 'Hate crimes: The rise of "corrective" rape in South Africa' ActionAid (2009).

[36] Advocate Kate Hofmeyr, representing Mazibuko, argued as follows: 'We submit that the wearing of that T-shirt represents a number of things, it represents a disdain for this process and a refusal to be remorseful about the conduct that accused 3 and indeed the other accused perpetrated. We submit that it is deeply offensive to wear such a T-shirt in this public setting where the purpose for us all gathering together is to assess the guilt of three men accused of brutally attacking a man because he was gay. It is also, we submit, a confirmation of the very prejudice that motivated that attack, it is a confirmation that those were not just words that crept into accused 3's mouth when he said, he is gay he does not deserve to live, those words were representative of a view that certain people are less worthy than others and that certain people do not deserve as much respect as others and the T-shirt simply confirmed that prejudice. We also submit that that representation of that prejudice was not confined to accused 3, none of his co-accused convinced him not to wear it or told him it was inappropriate, they acquiesced by their silence in the message that was sent to everyone in that courtroom and that was a message of intolerance' (pages 103–4 of the transcript of the trial on 27 January 2012).

provide 'awareness programmes' to the accused.[37] This is, symbolically speaking, yet another act of 'throwing' the accused back to the gays and lesbians. Moreover, the magistrate had made no contact with said 'LGBT groups' (presumed to be the amicus organisation itself) before formulating her order to consider if it was indeed implementable. Underlying the order was the dangerous and endangering assumption that it is appropriate for LGBTI organisations—established for the benefit of LGBTI people—to use their limited resources for the benefit and rehabilitation of homophobic criminals. This court-sanctioned directive, given effect to without the consent of the 'LGBT groups', does violence to them. It also absolves the state from its mandated responsibilities to punish and prevent violence in ways that work against, rather than in support of, secondary victimisation. Worse still, the accused never attended the so-called awareness programmes (read rehabilitative programmes) that had been fancifully imagined by the court as readily available to homophobic criminals from the very people towards whom their violent prejudice was directed in the first instance.[38]

Another feature of Mazibuko and Qwelane was the extraordinarily long duration of the matters: it took just over four years for the accused in Mazibuko to be convicted and sentenced and in Qwelane it took approximately nine years before the trial commenced in the High Court, his article having been published in 2008, the SAHRC having instituted its claim in December 2009, and the trial finally proceeding in 2017.[39] The inordinate length of both matters can primarily be attributed to the offending parties and their respective attorneys having used [37] The three accused were required to participate in 'awareness programmes of gays and lesbians' or 'awareness programmes of the LGBT group' for between two and three years, and to submit a certificate of attendance to the clerk of the Germiston Magistrates Court.

[38] The clerk of the Germiston Regional Magistrates Court confirmed that the accused did not place a certificate of attendance in the court file proving their attendance of the 'awareness programmes of gays and lesbians' (written correspondence between Webber Wentzel and the clerk of the Court, dated 19 October 2016, on file with authors).

[39] Some of the delay may be attributed to procedural complications arising out of Qwelane's decision to challenge the constitutionality of the Equality Act. In June 2012, while the matter was running in the Magistrates Court, he applied to the High Court for an order declaring s 10 of the Equality Act constitutionally invalid and requesting the Equality Court proceedings in the Magistrates Court be stayed pending the determination of his constitutional challenge in the High Court. In response the parties agreed that the Equality Court proceedings be transferred to the High Court and they jointly filed an application for transfer (the Magistrates Court then transferred the matter on 11 September 2012). However, Qwelane withdrew his constitutional challenge and then, 15 months later, changed course again. On 27 September 2013 he thus reinstituted his constitutional challenge, applying for an order declaring ss 10(1) and 11 of the Equality Act inconsistent with s 16 of the Constitution and sought a stay of the Equality Court proceedings (see, Psychological Society of South Africa v Qwelane and Others [2016] ZACC 48; 2017 (8) BCLR 1039 (CC) paras 6–8, which explains this history of the matter). As a result of the transfer of the Equality Court proceedings and Qwelane's constitutional challenge to the Equality Act, before the matter was able to proceed, the High Court was called upon to decide if it could hear both matters simultaneously (because there is no statutory provision enabling a High Court judge to hear Equality Court proceedings and High Court proceedings, in one consolidated case). The High Court on 21 November 2014 decided that it had inherent jurisdiction to hear both cases and ordered the cases be consolidated and be heard by a procedural tactics to delay matters, taking advantage of a lethargic legal system that does not function optimally at the best of times, and that systematically fails those who are socially vulnerable.[40] Additionally, in Mazibuko the prosecuting arm of the state initially refused to prosecute, and, when it finally did, it failed to pursue the matter with the type of vigour one might reasonably expect.[41] As previously mentioned, in Qwelane the SAHRC failed to pursue the matter with a sense of due importance. It appeared that internal to the organisation the case had been handled by numerous people over the years, without anyone owning the case or its issues. Regardless of the reasons for the delays, it sent a strong social message that LGBTI discrimination is neither taken seriously nor treated with the urgency and importance it demands. When Qwelane did not proceed[42] in the High Court on the allocated trial dates in 2016, the distinction between how the courts address homophobic hate speech in comparison to racist hate speech became starkly apparent. As Juan Nel,[43] PsySSA's President (as he then was) stated at the time:

> Recent cases of racist hate speech,[44] for example statements that have likened black people to animals, have been dealt with far more swiftly by our courts, and rightfully so. Failure to actively condemn harmful insult sends a strong social message that it is in fact acceptable to dehumanise gays and lesbians and to liken them to animals, as Qwelane wrote in his article.

single judge of the High Court who was also an Equality Court judge (Qwelane v Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development and Others [2014] ZAGPHC 334; 2015 (2) SA 493 (GJ) para 11).

[40] See Lisa Vetten et al 'Tracking justice: The attrition of rape cases through the criminal justice system in Gauteng' Tshwaranang Women's Legal Centre, Medical Research Council and the Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation (July 2008) last accessed on 13 March 2018 from <https://www.csvr.org.za/docs/tracking_justice.pdf>; Civil Society Prison Reform Initiative, Just Detention International & Lawyers for Human Rights 'Thematic alternate report on criminal justice and human rights in South Africa: Submitted to the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights in response to South Africa's Second Periodic Report under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, to be reviewed at the 58th Ordinary Session of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights' (March 2016), last accessed from <http://southafrica.justdetention.org/wp-content/uploads/2016/05/ACHPR-shadow-report-criminal-justice-FINAL.pdf> on 9 November 2016.

[41] The role that OUT played in reviewing the prosecutor's initial decision not to prosecute is described at note 29 above.

[42] On the eve of the court hearing, Qwelane presented himself in person at a police station to commission an affidavit applying for a postponement, arguing that, due to a progressively degenerative medical condition, he was unable to present himself in person in court.

[43] Juan Nel was also one of the expert witnesses in Mazibuko who gave expert testimony on the effects of homophobic hate crimes. In Qwelane he spearheaded PsySSA's application to intervene as amicus curiae and gave expert testimony on the effects of homophobic hate speech.

[44] Less than three months before the date set for the commencement of the Qwelane trial, a woman who had uttered hurtful words about black people, was found to have breached s 10 of the Equality Act. Within eight months of her public utterances, which drew unprecedented public attention to racist hate speech, the woman was fined R150 000 and ordered to issue a public apology, with which she complied. See ANC v Sparrow [2016] ZAEQC 1.

The symbolic violence[45] of state lethargy in regard to homophobic crimes and speech reinforces the social and legal conditions in which such crimes and speech continue, largely undisturbed.

The unintended and ironic consequence of this litigation was that the attempt at remedying homophobia had given rise to reproducing it instead. This is a difficult dynamic to navigate and requires that the attorneys working for LGBTI litigants take extra measures to protect their clients from further violence, be that physical, psychological or state-driven.

(d) A state of contradiction

A further feature of LGBTI PIL has been managing the contradictions of the state, which take various forms. Mention has already been made of the role of the prosecutor in Mazibuko and the SAHRC in Qwelane, pointing to: in the former, the support of the amicus curiae intervention with the simultaneous abdication of responsibility for pursuing the homophobic dimension of the crime; and in the latter, an inconsistent commitment to the case which contributed to the delayed hearing in the High Court. The High Court judgment in Qwelane[46] also displayed some contradictions. It was a stunning victory for the SAHRC, PsySSA and the LGBTI community in that it acknowledged, unequivocally, the context in which Qwelane's statements were made as well as the harm and hurt that they caused.[47] However, the judge opted for an overly narrow interpretation of s 10 of the Equality Act suggesting that to establish hate speech an applicant would have to show that the speech was hurtful, harmful (or incites harm) and promotes or [45] Symbolic violence refers to the processes by which existing relations of domination are produced and maintained through the exercise of symbolic power—Pierre Bourdieu 'Social space and symbolic power' (1989) 7 Sociological Theory 14–25. For how symbolic power operates in relation to gender-based violence see, Karen Morgan & Suruchi Thapar Björkert '"I'd rather you'd lay me on the floor and start kicking me": Understanding symbolic violence in everyday life' (2006) 29 Women's Studies International Forum 441–52.

[46] South African Human Rights Commission v Qwelane [2017] ZAGPJHC 218; 2018 (2) SA 149 (GJ) [FXI and Psychological Society of South Africa were admitted as amici curiae].

[47] At para 46 Moshidi J finds as follows: 'The offending statements uttered by the applicant, when evaluated objectively, in content and context, speaks ill of the gay and lesbian community, and went further by suggesting that the next step for South Africa will be allowing people to marry animals. It can never be acceptable, in the context and content of the legislation, and our democratic society, to equate human beings to bestiality or animals or suggest to them that they are "other" or "unnatural". It severely undermines their ability to feel that they belong and have support, which is essential to psychological health and well-being of all humans. . . . It is common knowledge from the evidence of Nel [PsySSA's expert witness] and the other witnesses of the [Human Rights] Commission that gay and lesbian people, who constitute a vulnerable group in society, and have been subject to societal discrimination purely on the ground of sexual orientation. They are a permanent minority in society and have suffered in the past from various patterns of disadvantage. . . . The evidence, in particular that of Mokoena and MN, showed convincingly that the offending statements were deeply hurtful and harmful to the victims and targeted group.' (para 49) propagates hatred[48] (a bar that limits the utility of the provision and undermines its potential to promote equality and dignity).[49]

Another striking contradiction is illustrated in encounters with the Department of Home Affairs' (the DHA) in responding to LGBTI-related litigation. The DHA is intimately involved in LGBTI lives: amongst other things, it registers births and regulates adoptions (and hence must acknowledge same-sex parents), it issues marriage certificates (and hence must acknowledge same-sex marriages or civil unions), it controls entry to and exit from South Africa (and its recognition of same-sex relationships is essential for this function), and it issues new identity documents for transgender people (and is therefore required to recognise sex and gender re-assignment).

In its response to LGBTI PIL, the DHA has adopted a variety of inconsistent positions.[50] In Semugoma particularly, the DHA's disregard for the rule of law demands scrutiny. Semugoma was detained by DHA officials on 17 February 2014 on the basis that his work permit had expired and that the official document the DHA had issued (allowing travel while work permits were being renewed), was not valid.[51] The DHA indicated that they intended deporting Semugoma to Uganda despite the very real threat of his prosecution under the Anti-Homosexuality Bill,[52] the passing of which was imminent at that time. As a result, an urgent application was launched on the day of Semugoma's detention, in response to [48] Ibid para 60.

[49] PsySSA argued that 'the prohibition in section 10(1) is aimed at combating three different and distinguishable effects hate speech may have. It may be "hurtful"; it may be "harmful or . . . incite harm" or it may "promote or propagate hatred". All three of these have subtly different meanings and engage different negative effects. We therefore support a disjunctive reading of s 10(1). If it is not read disjunctively, the prohibition would not address the variety of ways in which "hate speech" can and does impact a target group, including by way of (individual or communal) psychological or mental harm; societal marginalisation or rupture of the body politic' (Heads of argument in the Constitutional challenge, para 47).

[50] First, in National Coalition II (note 3 above) para 27 the DHA argued that it had an absolute discretion to exclude foreign nationals which meant that it could exclude foreign nationals who were in same-sex partnerships with South Africans without regard to the Constitution and its right to equality and dignity. Then in J and Another (note 4 above) para 11 the DHA decided not to argue that the statutory provisions, which denied recognition of same-sex parents who conceived by artificial insemination, constituted a justifiable limitation of constitutional rights. And finally, in Fourie (note 3 above) para 35, the DHA suggested that it was fair to exclude same-sex couples from being allowed to marry.

[51] The DHA officials who detained Semugoma and who corresponded with Webber Wentzel indicated there was a policy in place explaining that this document did not allow travel. They were, however, never able to produce the policy or explain why they issued the document in the first place with the explanation that it allowed travel.

[52] The Bill was enacted as the Anti-Homosexuality Act, 2014. The Act creates the criminal offences of 'homosexuality', 'aggravated homosexuality' and 'attempt to commit homosexuality' (amongst others) and makes offenders liable on conviction to life imprisonment.

which the High Court ordered his immediate release.[53] The DHA refused to comply with the court order and, instead, held Semugoma overnight at an unknown location, applied for leave to appeal the order, and continued threatening to deport him the following day. Finally, on the third day of Semugoma's detention, and when the application for leave to appeal was about to be heard, the DHA offered to settle. Even though a settlement offer was made, Semugoma's attorney was met with antagonism as the DHA's senior counsel suggested she should 'wipe the smirk off [her] face'. In another show of state resistance, when Semugoma's partner and his legal team went to collect him from the airport, they were initially refused access and only later able to secure his release.

The DHA, and more particularly its officials, has been similarly obstructionist in instances when transgender people have attempted to have their sex changed in terms of the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 (Sex Status Act).[54] South African law allows for transgender people to change their sex description both on birth registers and on identity documents.[55] However, the experience of submitting an application to the DHA is more often than not a humiliating affair characterised by bureaucratic obstacles designed to frustrate transgender and intersex people from accessing legal entitlements and thus constituting a violation of their rights.[56] Nadia Swanepoel, for example, went on a hunger strike in 2014 in order to try to force the DHA to comply with its own laws by issuing an identity document reflecting her sex as female. She had been waiting for an identity document for three years, and had faced consistent rejections, including suggestions that her application had been lost, and then finally a refusal to consider the application until she had genital surgery.[57]

[53] The urgency of the matter was such that Webber Wentzel and counsel did not have time to draft papers and approached a judge in chambers.

[54] The Act enables intersex persons to change their legal sex without having to undergo surgical or medical treatment.

[55] Section 2(1) of the Sex Status Act.

[56] The lack of proper administration of the Act has been attributed to a misreading of the legislation as requiring proof of genital surgery from applicants who wish to change their sex designation; the absence of national directives for the Act's implementation resulting in lengthy delays; no reasons being furnished when applications are denied; and the absence of measures to protect the marriages of transgender or intersex persons who change their sex descriptor after getting married. See Robert Hamblin & Mzikazi Nduna 'Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act and access to services for transgender people in South Africa' (2013) 9 New Voices in Psychology 50–62; Legal Resources Centre, Iranti-Org & Gender Dynamix 'Report on the civil, political and socio-economic rights of transgender and intersex persons in South Africa under the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights in response to the Second Combined Periodic Report of the Government of South Africa and the initial report under the Protocol to the African Charter on the Rights of Women in Africa' (April 2016), last accessed from <http://lrc.org.za/art_external/pdf/2016%2004%20ACHPR-Trans-gender-and-Intersex-Shadow-Report.pdf> on 12 March 2018.

[57] Sipho Kings 'Transgender woman goes on hunger strike over ID application' Mail & Guardian 9 October 2014, last accessed on 9 November 2016 from <http://mg.co.za/article/2014-10-09-transgender-goes-on-hunger-strike-over-id-application>.

Such disregard for court orders and the rule of law from a state department is condemnable, particularly given the recent public stance of senior DHA officials on LGBTI-related discriminations whereby constitutional commitments to equality were publicly endorsed and enforced.[58] These contradictions can be understood in a number of ways: first, the officials responsible for implementing laws have personal views and values that do not accord with the Constitution or the law.[59] Second, the DHA is engaged in both domestic and international politics, which means that positions for or against trans/homophobia are also pressure points for political manoeuvres. The paradoxical positions taken on LGBTI rights also reflect geopolitical dynamics in which contradictions between domestic and international stances reflect the state's double-game on sexual orientation and gender identity issues.[60]

9.3 CONCLUSION

The litigation experiences in the three cases discussed in this chapter illustrate the difficulties of using the law in promoting, defending and advancing equality and dignity for LGBTI people post the legalisation of same-sex marriage. Importantly, for the purpose of progressing LGBTI PIL, the constraints in the practice and application of law prompt the need for unconventional tactics when litigating with—and in some ways against—these realities. The cases also demonstrate the pernicious ways in which social discrimination and exclusion feature not only in the merits of a particular matter around which litigation is fashioned, but also in the very legal processes by which that litigation is then pursued. In this sense, the legal system is a contested terrain where LGBTI people use law to resist social injustices, yet are confronted, and at times defeated, by the injustices of law in practice. This raises various conundrums for litigation strategies related to the [58] In refusing Pastor Anderson, a renowned homophobe, entry into South Africa on the grounds that the Immigration Act 13 of 2002 prohibits admission of foreigners likely to promote hate speech or advocate social violence, the Minister of the DHA stated that, '[I]t is a constitutional imperative for organs of state and society at large to protect and jealously defend the rights of all people'. He also went on to concede that 'Home Affairs has also had instances in the past wherein our own officials had treated LGBTI persons in a manner that is inconsistent with our laws'. 'Minister Gigaba's statement at the media briefing on the decision on Pastor Anderson's visit to South Africa' Department of Home Affairs 13 September 2016, last accessed on 9 November 2016 from <http://www.dha.gov.za/index.php/statements-speeches/853-minister-gigaba-s-statement-at-the-media-briefing-on-the-decision-on-pastor-anderson-s-visit-to-south-africa>.

[59] Worryingly, the legalisation of same-sex marriage included a legislative sanction for officials holding personal views about homosexuality which entitles them to escape the obligation to solemnise same-sex civil unions. Section 6 of the Civil Union Act 17 of 2006 allows a marriage officer to object to solemnising a civil union between same-sex partners on the grounds of 'conscience, religion and belief' and to write to the Minister to inform him or her of this objection so as not to be required to effect same-sex civil marriages.

[60] Melanie Judge 'SA's abstinence on UN sexual and gender rights vote is reckless' Mail & Guardian 6 July 2016, last accessed on 9 November 2016 from <http://mg.co.za/article/2016-07-06-00-sa-reckless-on-un-gender-and-sexual-rights-vote/>.

pursuit of social justice. For one, the realisation of equality stretches far beyond the remit of law, and, in some instances, as we have argued, the practice of law might thwart its realisation. Also, when LGBTI people and the organisations that support them come before the legal system, prevailing prejudices frequently come into play. The experiences in the three cases suggest that LGBTI amici or applicants should plan for the systemic injustices and violence of the law in practice and develop principled approaches to guide appropriate litigious and political responses.

Moreover, PIL for LGBTI equality has largely been left over (or handed over) to LGBTI people and communities themselves. This reflects a broader context in which identity-based equality claims are dependent on specific claimants firmly defined by the very identities that are the basis of their claims. While this has been highly productive in furthering the rights of marginalised social groups (for example, people living with HIV and AIDS, refugees, the disabled), it can restrict rights-based legal struggles to singularised identities[61] amongst and between which, frequently, there is limited political solidarity. Identity-driven litigation can also be divisive as it appears to only protect the particular category of applicant around which the legal case is constructed. Viewing experiences of discrimination as intersectional[62]—as encompassing, for example, race, class, gender and sexual oppressions that are mutually reinforcing—requires legal strategies that take cognisance of how sexuality-based discrimination does not occur in isolation to other forms of discrimination. Consequently, litigation tactics ought to consider how multiple and intersecting forms of marginalisation produce uneven vulnerabilities to violence and injustice, and what the implications of this might be for litigation. For one, it might require the untangling of the discreet identity categories (that is, of sexuality and gender identity) on which many LGBTI equality cases have been so reliant. It might also require that LGBTI public interest cases be underpinned by facts that illustrate the diversity of LGBTI experiences across class, race, and health statuses, amongst other differentials, which may in turn invite the intervention of additional parties or amici. Future PIL will benefit from situating LGBTI experiences firmly in a social context, so that the sexual and gender dimensions of discrimination are but two of multiple dimensions to be pursued when litigating.

It might also mean that statutory bodies should be urged to play a more active role in PIL. Alongside the ongoing and necessary PIL spearheaded by non-[61] This refers to how a legal case against discrimination might be based on a person's sexual orientation, gender, nationality or health status as singular and unconnected identities, but rarely in combination, even though the discrimination they face might be as a result of more than one identity factor. For example, a black lesbian, who might also be a refugee, could be subject to prejudice linked to her race, sexual orientation and refugee status.

[62] Kimberlé Crenshaw 'Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, identity politics, and violence against women of color' (1991) 43 Stanf Law Rev 1241–99.

governmental organisations and LGBTI individuals, perhaps it is time to 'throw the gays and lesbians' to the Chapter 9 institutions, which despite a constitutional mandate, have, in recent years, done little to systematically pursue litigation that gives succour to the defence of formal rights and the promotion of substantive equality. This is particularly concerning given the significant powers of these statutory bodies to institute special investigations, public hearings, commissions of enquiry, and to litigate directly on constitutional rights.

Finally, the three cases demonstrate the weakness of relying on the common law or the Equality Act to bring the full weight of constitutional protections to bear on LGBTI-related claims in the post same-sex marriage period. It may well be necessary for strategic litigators to i) revisit the right to dignity and consider how to develop the jurisprudence underpinning this right; and ii) reconsider how to develop the jurisprudence underpinning the right to equality so that the protections offered by the Equality Act's prohibition of unfair discrimination may be expanded to address the multiple forms of violence, exclusion and discrimination faced by LGBTI people. In this regard, the focus of inequality or unfair discrimination claims in future should move away from an analysis of differential or discriminatory treatment and towards a demand for social and legal systems that accommodate and advance difference[63] and that are attuned to intersectional forms of oppression. The reflections provided in this chapter also call for critical engagements with the constraints of the law, and how to address these in the pursuit of justice within the legal system. This requires lawyers and activists to develop new tactics that are directed both at winning cases and at building legal processes that promote rather than undermine dignity and equality. Whatever form future litigation in the public interest might take, it is vital that the practice and application of law affirms LGBTI people as full and equal citizens within the legal system itself.

[63] Sachs J in Fourie (note 3 above) para 60 planted the seeds of this idea when he explained in a section entitled 'A right to be different' as follows:

> Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not presuppose the elimination or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply a levelling or homogenisation of behaviour or extolling one form as supreme, and another as inferior, but an acknowledgement and acceptance of difference. At the very least, it affirms that difference should not be the basis for exclusion, marginalisation and stigma. At best, it celebrates the vitality that difference brings to any society.

OXFORD

1806

Shreya Atrey

Intersectional Discrimination

Intersectional Discrimination

Intersectional Discrimination

SHREYA ATREY

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS

OXFORD
UNIVERSITY PRESS

Great Clarendon Street, Oxford, OX2 6DP,
United Kingdom

Oxford University Press is a department of the University of Oxford.
It furthers the University's objective of excellence in research, scholarship, and education by publishing worldwide. Oxford is a registered trade mark of Oxford University Press in the UK and in certain other countries

First Edition published in 2019

Impression: 1

Published in the United States of America by Oxford University Press
198 Madison Avenue, New York, NY 10016, United States of America

British Library Cataloguing in Publication Data

Data available

Library of Congress Control Number: 2019945374

ISBN 978–0–19–884895–0

Printed and bound by
CPI Group (UK) Ltd, Croydon, CR0 4YY

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey,
Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

To my mother, for her radical moral courage; and to my father, for being the ultimate feminist

Acknowledgements

I owe the greatest debt to Sandra Fredman for being my guru and intellectual guide for this project. Gautam Bhatia, Miles Jackson, Alison Pryce, and Raphaële Xenedis have been generous readers of significant parts of the book. Mark Bell, Meghan Campbell, Chris McConnachie, Michael Ford, Beth Gaze, Denise Réaume, Nazila Ghanea, Laura Hilly, Tarunabh Khaitan, Fiona de Londras, and Kate O'Regan have provided valuable input at various stages of this project. Alan Bogg, David Oppenheimer, and Tonia Novitz have been greatly supportive and enthusiastic in seeing this book through. The painstaking comments of two anonymous reviewers proved extremely useful in getting the book together. The Centre for Employment and Labour Relations Law at the Melbourne Law School provided a welcoming community and comfortable space for writing the final parts of the book. Members of the Berkeley Comparative Equality and Anti-Discrimination Law Study Group have done the same over many years.

My parents, Archana and Pradeep, have enabled my work by providing the necessary distance from it, through quality breaks and reminders to stay grounded. My sister, Vartika, and brother-in-law, Rohit, have managed a robust system of long-distance care for me. My partner, Felix, has been an exceptional sparring partner for critical thoughts explored in this book, in addition to offering unimaginable love and sustenance.

My heartfelt thanks to all.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

Contents

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

Table of Cases

NATIONAL COURTS

Canada

India

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

South Africa

UK

USA

INTERNATIONAL DECISIONS

CEDAW Committee

Court of Justice of the European Union

European Court of Human Rights

Human Rights Committee

Table of Statutes

CONSTITUTIONS

DOMESTIC LEGISLATION

Canada

EU

India

UK

US

EUROPEAN DIRECTIVES

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

INTERNATIONAL INSTRUMENTS

Abbreviations

AIR	All India Reports
BCHRT	British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal
BCLR	Butterworths Constitutional Law Reports
CEDAW	Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination Against Women
CNR	Canadian National Railway
CRPD	Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities
CUP	Cambridge University Press
DCLD	Discrimination Case Law Digest
DLT	Delhi Law Times
DUP	Duke University Press
ECHR	European Convention on Human Rights
ECtHR	European Court of Human Rights
ECR	European Court Reports
ETS	European Treaty Series
EWCA	England and Wales Court of Appeal
GPH	Gyan Publishing House
HL	House of Lords
HM	Her Majesty's
HRTO	Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario
HUP	Harvard University Press
ICR	Industrial Cases Reports
IRLR	Industrial Relations Law Reports
KTP	Kitchen Table Press
MEC	Member of the Executive Council
NASWP	National Association of Social Workers Press
NSR	Nova Scotia Reports
NYUP	New York University Press
OJ	Ontario Judgments
ONCA	Ontario Court of Appeal
OUP	Oxford University Press
PUP	Princeton University Press
RUP	Rutgers University Press
SA	South Africa
SACC	South African Constitutional Court
SC	Supreme Court
SCC	Supreme Court of Canada
SCR	Supreme Court Reports
SEP	South End Press
UKEAT	United Kingdom Employment Appeal Tribunal

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

UKET	United Kingdom Employment Tribunal
UKSC	United Kingdom Supreme Court
USCA	United States Court of Appeals
UUP	Uppsala University Press
WLR	Weekly Law Reports

Introduction

> The difficulty has been in finding a method to incorporate intersectionality into a legal framework premised upon the single dimension and zero sum logic. While there is clearly a will, a way has yet to be found.[1]

Iyiola Solanke makes a poignant statement. In the three decades since 1989, when the term 'intersectionality' was coined by Kimberlé Crenshaw,[2] two things have happened. First, as Solanke indicates, there has developed a clear will to address intersectionality. This is discernible in the way intersectionality has gained purchase over the years. It has become the go-to metaphor and theory for understanding the complexity of interaction between multiple forms of disadvantage based on race, colour, ethnicity, religion, caste, sex, gender, sexual orientation, disability, age, etc. Its historical arc spans from over two centuries of Black feminist thought to more contemporary fields of Critical Race Theory, Critical Race Feminism, and Postmodernism in the last thirty years. The idea has been widely explored across disciplines in history, literature, sociology, anthropology, psychology, and philosophy. The varied theoretical and practical engagements with intersectionality, along with its strident critiques, have transformed the idea into a field of its own. Yet, secondly, in spite of its long and rich intellectual trajectory, intersectionality remains largely exterior to its site of syntactic origin—discrimination law. In the intervening decades since 1989, intersectionality has seen slow growth within discrimination law around the world. Guarantees of equality and non-discrimination seldom refer to intersectional discrimination or discrimination based on more than one ground, and judges have resisted the idea of responding to such claims. The result is that discrimination continues to be conceived of and adjudicated along a single categorial axis of racism, sexism, casteism, homophobia, ageism, ableism, etc. at a time. The result persists despite the steady interest of discrimination lawyers in addressing complex forms of [1] Iyiola Solanke, Discrimination as Stigma: A Theory of Anti-discrimination Law (Hart 2016) 133.

[2] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

discrimination. Articles, even books, have been spent in finding ways of translating intersectionality theory into the precincts of discrimination law practice. Despite this, the framework of discrimination law has proven to be too resistant to have been able to transform the will to address intersectionality into a way of redressing it in discrimination law. Thus, the project of transforming the will into a way may be reimagined as the project of transforming discrimination law per se. Instead of having intersectionality awkwardly fit the single-axis model, discrimination law could be re-centred around intersectionality. If so, then how should non-discrimination guarantees be articulated and interpreted? Who should they protect? How should discrimination be defined? How should it be proven? Which remedies should be ordered? In other words, how can discrimination law practice be reimagined to realize intersectionality?

This is the subject of this book. It aims to find a way to transform intersectionality theory into discrimination law and transform discrimination law in turn. In particular, it seeks to close the gap between the prolific developments in intersectionality theory and the dominant single-axis model of discrimination law. To this end, it presents a conceptual and doctrinal account of 'intersectional discrimination', that is, the category of discrimination which incorporates the insights of intersectionality theory into discrimination law. The book refers to discrimination laws of some of the leading jurisdictions which have grappled with intersectionality (including the US, the UK, Canada, South Africa, and India), as well as the jurisprudence of the UN treaty bodies (in particular, the Human Rights Committee, the Committee on the Elimination of All forms of Discrimination Against Women, and the Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities) and the European courts—the Court of Justice of the European Union and the European Court of Human Rights. The comparative references help us to understand both why intersectionality remains at the fringes of discrimination law and how it can be effectively included in the discourse.

The central argument of the book is threefold. First, that the category of intersectional discrimination demands an appreciation of intersectionality theory as a framework representing: the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities understood as a whole, and in their full and relevant context, with the purpose of redressing and transforming them. Secondly, this category of intersectional discrimination can be qualitatively distinguished from other ways of understanding discrimination which have been developed by courts across jurisdictions, including single-axis discrimination and multiple, additive, and embedded forms of discrimination. Thirdly, in order for claims of intersectional discrimination to succeed, one would have to recalibrate each of the central tools of discrimination law, including the text of legislative and constitutional non-discrimination guarantees, the grounds of discrimination and test for identifying analogous grounds, the understanding of direct and indirect discrimination, the substantive meaning of discrimination, comparators, the standard of review, justifications, the burden of proof, and remedies. The appreciation of intersectionality in discrimination law thus requires both a theoretical framework and the comprehensive application of that framework to the doctrinal aspects of discrimination law.

In sum, the book advances the claim that no single manoeuvre can single-handedly make discrimination law respond to intersectionality. Instead, we should imagine the apparatus of discrimination law as a giant wheel composed of several interconnected cogwheels where each of the cogs will have to independently and simultaneously respond to a claim of intersectional discrimination (i.e. a multi-ground claim of discrimination which reflects intersectionality). Thus, the effort has to be comprehensive and concrete at the same time in order to make a difference. The ultimate purpose, or the difference this project hopes to make, is to challenge the traditional ways of thinking about discrimination, and opening up the field for understanding and addressing the structural and dynamic consequences of disadvantage which is multi-causal in the way it transpires.

The book is organized in four chapters. The first chapter, 'The Project: Realizing Intersectionality in Discrimination Law', outlines the journey the book seeks to undertake. It begins by setting out the current status of intersectionality across different jurisdictions. Although each jurisdiction's engagement with intersectionality has been unique, the survey concludes by pointing out the continuing legislative and judicial struggles in successfully claiming intersectional discrimination based on more than one ground. This prepares the stage for the current intervention. The chapter goes on to define the central argument of this work and the parameters within which it unfolds. In particular, it explains the choice of comparative jurisdictions and the wide range of materials employed in making a case for intersectional discrimination.

The next three chapters then set about the journey of translating intersectionality into discrimination law in three ways—theoretically, conceptually, and doctrinally.

At the outset, it is important to understand what intersectionality theory really is in order to understand how it shapes the category of intersectional discrimination. Chapter 2, 'The Theory: Outlining the Intersectional Framework', distils the theoretical framework of intersectionality for this purpose. It identifies the core of intersectionality as comprising several mutually reinforcing strands, which include the simultaneous focus on sameness and difference, interest in explicating patterns of group disadvantage, an appreciation of integrity of identity and context, and the final aim of transformation. In the process of delineating these key strands, the chapter responds to some of the most pertinent and persisting critiques of intersectionality theory. Taking the example of Dalit feminism in India, the chapter then goes on to illustrate the relevance of intersectionality theory in discursive spaces. With this, the chapter develops, defends, and applies the framework of intersectionality which helps unravel the distinct nature of intersectional discrimination.

Chapter 2 serves as the backbone of the book in that it is the framework developed therein that is referred to throughout the book when referring to intersectionality and the nature of intersectional discrimination. It is indeed this understanding that we want to see realized in discrimination law.

Chapter 3, 'The Concept: Understanding the Category of Intersectional Discrimination', turns to comparative doctrine to examine how the conceptual category of intersectional discrimination has been understood therein. The analysis reveals that courts across jurisdictions have understood complex claims of discrimination based on more than one ground not only as claims representing intersectionality (i.e. as a matter of intersectional discrimination) but also in various other ways, such as single-axis discrimination, multiple discrimination, additive discrimination, and embedded discrimination. The chapter explains how, while all these approaches capture one or another facet of the experience of intersectional discrimination, they fail to capture it in its entirety. It thus consolidates these different judicial responses along a spectrum and maps the qualitative differences between these categories as against the category of intersectional discrimination. It is argued that the differences matter diagnostically in that only the category of intersectional discrimination explains the causality in intersectional discrimination based on multiple grounds.

Chapter 4, 'The Practice: Establishing an Intersectional Claim', finally considers how this conceptual understanding of intersectional discrimination (chapter 3) based on the framework of intersectionality (chapter 2) transpires within discrimination law practice. That is, it asks how does one actually prove an intersectional claim? The argument here is that the conceptual grounding of intersectional discrimination is necessary but not sufficient for intersectional claims to succeed in discrimination law; much more is required. The chapter thus traverses the labyrinth of discrimination law doctrine to understand how each of its central features interacts with an intersectional claim. In particular, it considers the framing and interpretation of legislative and constitutional texts of non-discrimination guarantees, the test for identifying analogous grounds, the difference between direct and indirect intersectional discrimination, substantive touchstone(s) for wrongful intersectional discrimination, the use of comparison in establishing intersectional disadvantage, the standard of review and burden of proof employed, and lastly the choice of remedies to redress intersectional discrimination.

Comparative jurisprudence shows the intricate issues involved in resolving each of these debates. However, given the lack of 'model' examples of claims of intersectional discrimination in any jurisdiction, there is no easy doctrinal solution to be offered. This chapter then aims to unravel the issues to indicate where the points of resolution may lie at best. The doctrinal analysis thus points towards normative positions which may be preferred in respect of each of these central features, rather than provide normative positions in discrimination law definitely. It opens up academic, political, legislative, and judicial possibilities for future engagement with intersectionality in discrimination law in a much more considered and precise way.

The conclusion draws together the key insights from the book. In the final analysis, it reiterates that there is no magic bullet for transforming the discourse in discrimination law for the purposes of intersectionality. The effort has to be multidimensional, touching upon all aspects of both intersectionality theory and discrimination law practice. The book is one such attempt at a multidimensional effort.

1
The Project
Realizing Intersectionality in Discrimination Law

Introduction

This book is about making intersectionality visible and viable in discrimination law. It involves two parallel inquiries: first, how has intersectionality—an idea which explains the disadvantage suffered on the basis of two or more grounds of race, colour, ethnicity, caste, class, culture, religion, sex, gender, sexual orientation, disability, age, etc.—been conceived in discrimination law until now; and secondly, how should it be conceived in a way that truly represents its core principles. Both inquiries simultaneously and discursively feed into the central aim of drawing together an account of 'intersectional discrimination' which translates intersectionality theory into the practice of discrimination law.

This chapter introduces this project. It opens by taking stock of the engagements with intersectionality in international and comparative discrimination law. The survey reveals that the fate of intersectionality in discrimination law has been patchy. Discrimination law across jurisdictions remains largely single-axis. That does not mean that the effort to change this has been wanting or that the accomplishments have been small. In fact, three decades of dynamic effort have gone into trying to make intersectionality viable in discrimination law. It is these efforts, along with their successes and failures, which make challenging the single-axis paradigm plausible and ever more urgent. The chapter sets out this background, the terms of the project, and the main claims made in this book.

Section 1 outlines what intersectionality's foray into discrimination law has been like. The concepts of intersectionality or intersectional discrimination are not introduced in any meaningful way until the next chapter. Instead, this chapter uses the terms loosely to refer to developments in discrimination law beyond its single-axis model. At this stage, all that is being done is to expose the reader to the compounding issues which confront claimants and judges when they attempt to transcend the traditional mould of discrimination law in even the slightest way, let alone in a way intended to address intersectionality as we come to define later. For this purpose then, this section invites the reader to consider a hypothetical claim mentioned by Lord Phillips in R v JFS.[1] It takes the reader on an imaginary expedition through the discrimination laws of the US, UK, Canada, South Africa, India, EU, and Council of Europe, and the jurisprudence of the UN treaty bodies—to identify the array of conceptual and doctrinal issues involved in responding to the hypothetical claim. The sheer bulk of these issues highlights the relevance of this project in trying to systematize and respond to the challenges of reimagining discrimination law to suit intersectionality.

[1] [2009] UKSC 15.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

Section 2 then proceeds to consolidate these issues into three clusters—theoretical, categorial, and practical. First, the theoretical dimension relates to understanding what intersectionality itself is, in order to be translated into the category of intersectional discrimination. This involves identifying the key strands of intersectionality theory which have been developed and defended over time. Secondly, the conceptual dimension is about understanding how the category of intersectional discrimination transpires in discrimination law practice. The category is just one in the continuum of responses to discrimination claims. It is thus important to delineate it conceptually as distinct from other forms of discrimination, including single-axis, multiple, additive, and embedded discrimination. Thirdly, the practical dimension is about recalibrating the key concepts in discrimination law to relate to and redress claims of intersectional discrimination. These include—the construct of grounds, the test for analogous grounds, the concepts of direct and indirect discrimination, the substantive test of discrimination, proof and justification of discrimination, and remedies. The rest of the book is dedicated to exploring these dimensions successively in chapters 2, 3, and 4.

Section 3 defines the caveats which make this project possible. In particular, it explains some of the important choices made in pursuing this project which include—the choice of jurisdictions, the purpose and scope of comparative analysis, the focus on judicial thought, and the reference to an eclectic set of materials and sources.

1. Intersectionality in Discrimination Law

1.1 An Example

Since transitioning from the House of Lords, the UK Supreme Court decided its first discrimination claim, in fact its first case as the Supreme Court, on 16 December 2009. The then President, Lord Phillips, noted (in passing) a hypothetical situation to illustrate the difficulties in ascertaining the relevant ground in discrimination claims:

> A fat Black man goes into a shop to make a purchase. The shop-keeper says 'I do not serve people like you'. To appraise his conduct it is necessary to know what was the fact > that determined his refusal. Was it the fact that the man was fat or the fact that he was Black? In the former case the ground of his refusal was not racial; in the latter it was.[2]

Lord Phillips was interested in cracking the typical problem of causation in discrimination: given that a person was treated unfavourably, what was the cause or ground of such treatment? According to Lord Phillips the cause could only be connected to a single ground of discrimination at a time, that is, the person was denied purchase either because he was fat or because he was Black. This normative conception of discrimination signifies the either/or model of single-axis discrimination where multiple possibilities can only lead to discrimination based on either one ground or the other but never both or together. In couching the problem in these terms, Lord Phillips excluded intersectionality (i.e. the possibility that the man could have been discriminated against on the basis of both fatness and Blackness at the same time).

Intersectionality's troubles with discrimination law begin with this simple but settled normative idea of discrimination based on no more than a single ground. But the difficulties then start compounding. Even if Lord Phillips had admitted the possibility that discrimination in this case was multi-causal, he would have found no ground like weight, fattism, corpulence, or such in UK discrimination law. Under the atomized structure of the UK's discrimination law at the time, each ground was protected separately under dedicated legislation like the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 or the Race Relations Act 1976. The Equality Act 2010 consolidated these anti-discrimination statutes and recognized nine grounds or 'protected characteristics' though not including weight. Lord Phillips would have had considerable difficulty in imagining weight or its variants as grounds given the legislative silence on the matter. He would have found no precedent for recognizing an analogous ground for protection under the Equality Act either. Perhaps he would have set a new trend in this regard and found a way of reading in weight as part of another ground (say, disability). This would then have opened up the possibility of breaking through the barrier of single-axis discrimination and recognizing that discrimination could have been based on more than one ground. But he would have been stopped in his tracks discovering that Section 14 of the Equality Act, although it recognizes 'combined discrimination' based on two grounds including race and disability, has not been brought into force.[3] The lack of legislative will would have ultimately thwarted him in recognizing such a form of discrimination judicially.

[2] Ibid [21].

[3] Section 14 of the UK Equality Act 2010 provides that: 'A person (A) discriminates against another (B) if, because of a combination of two relevant protected characteristics, A treats B less favourably than A treats or would treat a person who does not share either of those characteristics.' In 2011, the government cited prohibitive costs of enforcing it, especially on businesses. Section 14 was thus dropped from consideration in the list of legislative provisions to be eventually brought into force. HM Treasury, 'The Plan for Growth' (March 2011) 53.

Assuming Section 14 was in fact in force, how would Lord Phillips have gone about establishing the claim then? In order to find for combination discrimination, he would have had to ask if the hypothetical claimant was treated less favourably than the shopkeeper treats or would treat others. He would have found several possibilities of comparing the claimant's treatment to lean Black men, lean white men, corpulent white men, lean Black women, corpulent Black women, lean white women, and corpulent white women. By which measure would he have picked one or more of these as appropriate comparators for establishing the claim? Would such comparison have helped in appreciating the substantive implications of being denied purchase by the shopkeeper? For example, did the treatment entrench historical patterns of group disadvantage suffered by those in the claimant's position? The claimant and the court would have had to go beyond the formal equality basis implied in 'less favourable treatment' as a standard of discrimination to a more substantive meaning of direct discrimination which speaks to a wider basis of violations in discrimination law. But then what burden of proof would the claimant have borne in proving such discrimination? What standard of review would the court have applied in turn? Could the shopkeeper have justified such discrimination nonetheless just like some other forms of direct discrimination, viz. based on disability under Section 15 of the Equality Act? Had the claimant still prevailed, what remedies could he have been entitled to—general remedies relating to Black and fat persons alike or specifically in relation to those who are both Black and fat like the claimant? Could he have claimed aggravated damages because the discrimination was based on more than one ground? And finally, would the answers to this trail of questions have changed if the case were one of indirect rather than direct discrimination?

The breathless account of concerns appears interminable. The concerns multiply and change form in different contexts. Applied in relation to individual grounds, peculiar legislative frameworks, and diverse doctrinal backgrounds across jurisdictions, intersectionality poses unique challenges in every given set of circumstances. In the specific case of the UK, the wilful unenforcement of Section 14 impedes any real consideration of intersectional discrimination by the courts. The UK Supreme Court has thus never explicitly considered an intersectional claim based on two or more grounds of discrimination under the Equality Act. One may argue that the Supreme Court has given an implicit nod to direct discrimination based on both race and sex in Hewage v Grampian Health Board (Scotland).[4] The Court decided the appeal in relation to two issues—the legality of using a white male comparator to establish a claim of direct discrimination against a British woman of Sri Lankan origin; and the reversal of burden of proof when a prima facie case is established by the claimant. While the Court did not precisely consider the claim as a matter of intersectional discrimination based on the grounds of race and sex, in confirming the use of a white male comparator to establish that the claimant was subjected to bullying and harassment because of her race and sex, it did not dispute the plausibility of such a claim. The implied assumption that such claims exist and can be effectively established even under different legislative provisions—at the time, under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and the Race Relations Act 1976—may encourage future litigants and courts to claim and find for intersectional discrimination respectively. The Employment Tribunal[5] and Employment Appeal Tribunal[6] have exploited this possibility in finding for discrimination under two or more grounds. The higher appellate courts have been rather inhibited though by the unenforced Section 14, despite the favourable implications of Hewage. The result being that the 2004 Court of Appeal decision in Bahl v The Law Society[7] remains the only decision to date which explicitly considered and denied a claim of intersectional discrimination based on race and sex. In Bahl, Peter Gibson LJ of the Court of Appeal had found that the Employment Tribunal had omitted to: 'identify what evidence goes to support a finding of race discrimination and what evidence goes to support a finding of sex discrimination' and that it would have been 'surprising if the evidence for each form of discrimination was the same'.[8] He insisted that for a claim of race and sex discrimination to succeed, the claimant should be able to prove both sex and race discrimination separately such that discrimination was based on 'either race or sex'.[9] The either/or approach to multi-ground discrimination established in Bahl has neither been overridden legislatively via Section 14 nor been challenged judicially in any considered way.

[4] [2012] UKSC 37.

The conceptual understanding of discrimination in terms of the either/or model has a knock-on effect on matters of proof when a claim is being argued on more than one ground. First off, there is no clarity over which comparators to use to establish each ground of discrimination. The implication of the either/or model seems to be that each ground must be established separately with respect to a comparator who does not share the relevant ground in question. This means that for establishing the ground of race in Bahl, Dr Bahl could have compared her treatment to a white woman, who did not share her race but was otherwise similarly situated, including with respect to her sex. However, the Court of Appeal instead chose to apply a hypothetical comparator of a white man for both the grounds of [5] O'Reilly v BBC [2010] UKET/2200423/2010; Ali v North East Centre for Diversity and Racial Equality [2005] UKET/2504529/03; Mackie v G & N Car Sales [2004] UKET/1806128/03; Acharee v Chubb Guarding Services [2000] DCLD 43 (UKET).

[6] Tilern de Bique v Ministry of Defence [2009] UKEAT/0075/11/SM; Perera v Civil Service Commission (No 2) [1982] ICR 350 (UKEAT).

[7] [2004] EWCA Civ 1070 (UK Court of Appeal).

[8] Ibid [137].

[9] Ibid [115]–[137].

race and sex equally. This was later confirmed by the Supreme Court in Hewage. However, the logic is clearly amiss when the same courts insist on establishing each ground separately. A white male comparator is certainly not the only comparator for someone like Dr Bahl who was both Black-Asian and female. If her race claim had to be established separately, she could have been compared to white women, as much as white men.[10]

Under the Bahl and Hewage approach to claims based on multiple grounds, it seems that our hypothetical claimant too would have to turn to a single comparator of a lean white man to establish his claim as based on race and weight separately. This raises serious issues of comparability when everyone looking to establish discrimination on more than one ground must compare themselves to the gold standard of a white male who is presumed to be privileged in every way possible and hence non-disabled, heterosexual, of a majority religion etc.[11] There is little by way of relatability for such a comparison to actually illuminate the ground or the particular disadvantage at play. Given that the burden of proof at this stage may be borne by the claimants themselves, the burden itself seems insurmountable in constructing a single comparator capable of establishing the claim on both grounds but separately. The standard of review of justifications in turn drops rather low in the absence of a formidable case from the claimant. Even when justifications are not permitted, say for direct discrimination in cases like that of the hypothetical claimant, the proof itself may be so arduous that justifications may ultimately creep into the discrimination analysis to defeat any possibility of making a plausible case of discrimination. This was in fact what transpired in Bahl when the case was rationalized as 'just her' and nothing really to do with the race or sex of the claimant. Ultimately, the question of remedies does not even arise given the diminished odds of winning. Though one may certainly wonder what remedies could have been awarded had the claim been established at all. For example, if the hypothetical claimant does win, can he be awarded aggravated damages if he succeeds in establishing his claim on multiple grounds in fact? Or should the remedies be naturally structural, sensitizing people to complex forms of discrimination and challenging the very stereotypes and prejudices which give rise to such discrimination? Should remedies relate to all grounds and disadvantaged groups (Black persons, fat persons, and fat Black persons) or just to the hypothetical claimant and those in his position (fat Black persons)? Rarely, if ever, have UK courts reached this point of consideration. The UK courts' tryst with intersectionality thus terminates prematurely given the characterization of multi-ground claims as limited to the either/or model of single-axis discrimination.

[10] Iyiola Solanke, 'Putting Race and Gender Together: A New Approach to Intersectionality' (2009) 72 Modern Law Review 723. See, also, Solanke's response to Peter Gibson LJ's disbelief that white women could potentially discriminate against other women at all, including Black women. Ibid 731, 735. The problem with comparators in intersectional claims is explored in detail in chapter 4, section 5.

[11] Sandra Fredman, Discrimination Law (2nd edn, OUP 2011) 11, 168.

1.2 A Survey

What about other jurisdictions? How would they respond to the hypothetical claimant's situation? What follows is an illustrative guide to the unique encounters the claimant may have in each jurisdiction. The purpose is to provide a taster of what discrimination law practice in courts looks like when it comes to actual or potential intersectional claims. This should help underscore the endemic nature of problems for intersectionality in discrimination law across jurisdictions.

It may be that intersectional claimants have it easier outside of the UK. This is certainly true of the US—the original site of asserting intersectionality in discrimination law. The equality guarantee under the US Constitution is open-ended and provides that no one shall be denied equal protection of the laws. Despite this expansive constitutional right, the bulk of the litigation has been at the statutory level under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act 1964 which prohibits employment discrimination on the basis of sex, race, colour, national origin, and religion. Whilst age and disability are protected separately under the Age Discrimination in Employment Act 1967 and Americans with Disabilities Act 1990, grounds like sexual orientation and weight are notably absent from statutory protection. Cases of intersectional discrimination have thus largely been limited to the grounds listed in Title VII rather than relying on grounds across legislation or reading analogous grounds into the existing legislation. The jurisprudence, much like in the UK, is limited to two grounds per discrimination claim. This has been the result of the decision in Jefferies v Harris County Community Action Association[12] which had interpreted intersectionality in a claim brought by Black women as a category of either 'race-plus' or 'sex-plus' discrimination. Jefferies was interpreted in Judge v Marsh[13] as limiting such discrimination to two grounds, ostensibly for preventing employment discrimination from turning into a 'many-headed Hydra' which splintered Title VII 'beyond use and recognition' by protecting 'subgroups . . . for every possible combination of race, color, sex, national origin and religion'.[14]

But even in this limited form, the US approach appears a step ahead of the either/or model in the UK in that it at least recognizes both grounds as forming the basis of discrimination. Though the US approach ultimately prioritizes one ground as the 'main' and the other as a 'plus' factor in discrimination, thus contradicting the stance that discrimination was in fact a result of two grounds equally. To wit, say the hypothetical claimant had evidence that the shopkeeper had just served his friend, a fat white man. His wife, a lean Black woman, had also been readily served in the past. So, it was not that the shopkeeper disliked fat people or that he was racist but that he particularly disliked those Blacks who were fat. A weight-plus or race-plus classification in this case misconstrues the causality as mainly triggered by one ground and only aided by another. The likelihood of success of the claim then depends on choosing between the two grounds in a way that makes it easier to prove discrimination as eventually having been caused by the main ground.

[12] 615 F2d 1025 (5th Cir 1980) (USCA) 1033.
[13] 649 F Supp 770 (1986) (United States District Court, District of Columbia).
[14] Ibid 780.

This strategic choice has been at the heart of the US jurisprudence which operates with its own conceptual limitation of two grounds in a race-plus or sex-plus format. Given this, the development of intersectional discrimination in the US has been largely fortuitous. Whilst some complex claims like discrimination suffered by Black men based on the stereotypes associated with their gender and race have been successful,[15] other, more straightforward claims brought by Black women continue to struggle.[16] As Catharine MacKinnon describes, the upshot of the US courts' engagement with intersectionality oscillates between 'truly getting it' and 'truly missing it'.[17] But much like the UK, the conceptual limitation in understanding what intersectionality means is not the only hurdle in the way of intersectional claims. The US courts are steadfastly committed to proving discrimination through the heuristic of comparison which has thrown up insurmountable barriers for claimants of intersectional discrimination.[18] Could the hypothetical claimant compare his treatment to the more favourable treatment meted out to his fat white friend, or his wife, a lean Black woman? Would the fact that one of the comparators, his wife, has a different gender make her an inappropriate comparator for discrimination based on weight? Or would the court insist on a comparator who shares none of the relevant personal characteristics of the claimant—of being Black and fat—and is similar in every other way, such that the only relevant comparator was a lean white man? All of these options have been explored in the US case law, with little consensus on the right approach to comparison in intersectional claims.[19]

The reception of intersectionality in Canada has met with similar challenges. The general equality guarantee—Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms ('Canadian Charter')—provides 'equality before and under law and equal protection and benefit of law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability'. Further, the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) under the heading 'multiple grounds of discrimination' prohibits discrimination 'based on one or more prohibited grounds of discrimination or on [15] Kimble v Wisconsin Department of Workforce Development 690 F Supp 2d 765 (2010) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Wisconsin).

[16] See DeGraffenreid v General Motors 413 F Supp 142 (1976) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri); Moore v Hughes Helicopters, Inc 708 F 2d 475 (9th Cir 1983) (USCA); Lewis v Bloomsburg Mills, Inc 773 F 2d 561 (4th Cir 1985) (USCA); Daniels v Church's Chicken 942 F Supp 533 (1996) (United States District Court, Southern Division of Alabama); Shazor v Professional Transit Management Ltd 744 F 3d 948 (6th Cir 2014) (USCA).

[17] Catharine A MacKinnon, 'Intersectionality as Method: A Note' (2013) 38 Signs 1019, 1022.

[18] Suzanne B Goldberg, 'Discrimination by Comparison' (2011) 120 Yale Law Journal 728.

[19] Ibid.

the effect of a combination of prohibited grounds'.[20] Although not as clear as the CHRA language of 'multiple grounds' and 'one or more prohibited grounds of discrimination', Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter seems general and broad enough to include intersectional claims based on multiple grounds. However, the Supreme Court of Canada has never adjudicated a discrimination claim based on multiple grounds, although it has alluded to the possibility under Section 15(1).[21] The record of other appellate courts is better. For example, the oft-cited case of Falkiner v Ontario[22] appears more advanced than the UK and the US position in finding that discrimination against single mothers on social assistance was based on a combination of grounds of marital status, receipt of social assistance, and sex. The hypothetical claimant in Lord Phillips' example may well succeed in arguing his claim as based on more than one ground. But once the hurdle of adding multiple grounds to a discrimination claim is crossed, the conceptual hurdle of understanding multiple grounds intersectionally emerges. In Falkiner, the Court went about establishing the claim by taking up evidence with respect to one ground at a time, thereby promoting an understanding that discrimination based on multiple grounds operated independently on each ground rather than interactively.[23] Thus, despite seeming intersectionality-friendly, Falkiner's understanding of an intersectional claim appears no more sophisticated than that of the UK courts per Bahl. Further, the Canadian courts have also encumbered intersectional claimants with a relatively higher burden of proof in comparison with those claiming on a single ground, applied too low a standard of review of justifications, and even used intersectionality as a defence or justification for discrimination.[24] The Supreme Court of Canada's uninterrupted view of Section 15(1) claims as based on a single ground alone is telling of the continuing struggles of intersectionality in an otherwise open and progressive anti-discrimination regime.

The South African story, though, appears genuinely promising. Section 9(3) of the South African Constitution prohibits both direct and indirect unfair discrimination 'on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth'. The explicit recognition of 'one or more' grounds allows for multi-ground claims to be argued. But as the US and the Canadian experiences have shown, multi-ground claims are often considered simply as multiple claims of single-ground discrimination. The South African Constitutional Court has been cognisant of not limiting multi-ground claims in [20] Canadian Human Rights Act (RSC, 1985, c H-6) [3.1].

[21] Mossop v Canada (Attorney General) [1993] 1 SCR 554 (SCC) 582; Withler v Canada [2011] 1 SCR 396 (SCC) [58].

[22] [2002] OJ No 1771 (Ontario Court of Appeal).

[23] Diana Majury, 'The Charter, Equality Rights, and Women: Equivocation and Celebration' (2002) 40 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 297, 334.

[24] See these arguments explored in reference to Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General) [2002] 4 SCR 429 (SCC), in chapter 4.

this way and has adopted many different approaches to such claims, including approaches which can be dubbed as truly intersectional. This conceptual shift has been possible due to the substantive developments in constitutional doctrine in South Africa. For example, to mention one significant development alone, the South African jurisprudence on what 'unfair discrimination' under Section 9(3) actually means in substantive terms has provided real depth to appreciating hard cases of discrimination. This includes intersectional cases like Hassam v Jacobs[25] where the exclusion of Muslim women in polygynous marriages from inheritance was deemed to be unfair discrimination on the basis of marital status, religion, and gender. The Constitutional Court explicated the complexity of discrimination in that case as being a result of intersecting patterns of group disadvantage associated with patriarchy, the lower status of polygynous marriages, and the historical discrimination against Muslims and Muslim culture and traditions. The elaborate perusal of historical, sociological, statistical, and economic evidence of discrimination helped appreciate such intersectional discrimination. The strides in understanding intersectional discrimination substantively are in turn aided by a doctrine which is well-equipped to transcend single-axis discrimination and cater to more complex cases. Thus, for example, the use of comparators in South African discrimination law—not only to identify the ground(s) of discrimination but also to appreciate the patterns of group disadvantage themselves by studying the comparison more closely and contextually—allows for intersectional discrimination to be established with far greater ease. For example, the use of a set of comparators proposed by the claimant in Hassam—widows married in terms of the Marriage Act, widows in monogamous Muslim marriages, and widows in polygynous customary marriages—revealed not only that discrimination against Muslim widows of polygynous marriages was based on religion, gender, and marital status but that such discrimination was both different from that faced by certain other similarly situated groups, but also in some ways familiar to them in as much as they too experienced forms of patriarchy, religious bias, or disadvantages from being outside of the traditional monogamous marriage.[26] What is clear is that the judicial strides made in addressing section 9 claims, both conceptually and practically, have provided useful cues for attending to intersectionality.

This is a particularly important lesson for jurisdictions like India, where intersectionality had, until recently, been defeated by judicial interpretation. The constitutional non-discrimination guarantee under Article 15(1)—'the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them'—has been understood as protection only from discrimination based on a single enumerated ground despite the concluding phrase 'or any of them'.[27] In fact, discrimination based on, for example, age and sex has been used as a justification for sex discrimination given that Article 15(1) has been interpreted as being limited to only the prohibition of sex discrimination and not discrimination which is based on sex 'and other considerations'.[28] This interpretation is aided both by the limited number of enumerated grounds, and the reluctance of courts to admit sexual orientation, disability, and age as analogous grounds of discrimination under Article 15(1).[29] As a result of this counterintuitive and rigid interpretation, Article 15 has contributed to, rather than alleviated, widespread discrimination against groups like Dalit women, Muslim women, and disabled women.[30] However, in the 2018 Supreme Court judgment which decriminalized sodomy,[31] the individual opinion of one of the justices finally admitted that: '[t]his narrow view of Article 15 strips the prohibition on discrimination of its essential content [because it] fails to take into account the intersectional nature of sex discrimination, which cannot be said to operate in isolation of other identities, especially from the socio-political and economic context'.[32] According to Chandrachud J, '[s]uch a formalistic view of the prohibition in Article 15, rejects the true operation of discrimination, which intersects varied identities and characteristics'.[33] This is a leap of faith. Only an intersectional claim may test the true resolve of such a statement which would require courts in India not only to read the constitutional text to include intersectional discrimination but also to supply that interpretation with doctrinal tools like the test for reading in analogous grounds. There is promise in the latest discrimination jurisprudence that this could be done.

[25] Hassam v Jacobs 2009 (5) SA 572 (SACC).
[26] See the discussion on use of comparators in Hassam (ibid) in chapter 4, section 5.
[27] Air India v Nargesh Meerza AIR 1981 SC 1829 (Supreme Court of India).

The hypothetical claimant may look beyond countries to international law for inspiration. Take, for example, the case of Dalit women in India who have vigorously pursued transnational activism as a means for having intersectional discrimination and violence based on their gender, caste, and class recognized and redressed at home.[34] They have thus participated at the Fourth World Conference on Women leading to the Beijing Declaration (1995), the First World Dalit Convention at Kuala Lumpur (1998), and the UN World Conference in Durban (2001); established the International Dalit Solidarity Network in Copenhagen (2000); and adopted the Hague Declaration on the Human Rights and Dignity of Dalit Women (2006). It is advocacy from groups like these that has led to the [28] Ibid. Cf Gautam Bhatia, The Transformative Constitution (HarperCollins 2019) ch 1 (arguing that there may be signs of recognition of multi-causal discrimination in early jurisprudence).

[29] Cf Navtej Singh Johar v Union of India (Writ Petition (Criminal) No 76 of 2016) (decided on 6 September 2018) (Supreme Court of India) (hereafter Navtej Johar); National Legal Services Authority v Union of India (2014) 5 Supreme Court Cases 438 (Supreme Court of India); Naz Foundation v Government of NCT (2009) 160 DLT 277 (High Court of Delhi).

[30] See for an extended analysis, Shreya Atrey, 'Through the Looking Glass of Intersectionality: Making Sense of Indian Discrimination Jurisprudence Under Article 15' (2016) 16 Equal Rights Review 160.

[31] Navtej Johar (n 29).

[32] Ibid [36] (Chandrachud J).

[33] Ibid.

[34] Upasana Mahanta, 'Social Movements in a Neo-Liberal Era' in Heidi Moksnes and Mia Melin (eds), Global Civil Society: Shifting Powers in a Shifting World (UUP 2012).

international recognition of multiple and intersecting forms of disadvantage that has progressively solidified within the UN treaty body jurisprudence.[35]

Intersectionality appears most distinctively in the text of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD).[36] The preamble recognizes that persons with disabilities suffer from 'multiple or aggravated forms of discrimination on the basis of race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national, ethnic, indigenous or social origin, property, birth, age or other status'. The CRPD further adopts a 'twin-track' approach which speaks of disabled persons generally throughout the text of the Convention and also specifically of women and girls with disabilities, children with disabilities, and disabled poor at specific points.[37] The diversity of disadvantage suffered by persons with disabilities is the bedrock of the meaning of discrimination in the CRPD. This is now recognized in unequivocal terms in General Comment No 6 on 'Equality and Non-discrimination' which adopts the most comprehensive and detailed twin-track approach to intersectional discrimination in international law.[38]

A less detailed engagement with intersectionality appears in the text of the UN Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) which declares that the 'eradication of apartheid, all forms of racism, racial discrimination, colonialism, neo-colonialism, aggression, foreign occupation and domination and interference in the internal affairs of States is essential to the full enjoyment of the rights of men and women'; and refers specifically to pregnant women, mothers, rural women, and married women at various places.[39] Yet, the CEDAW Committee's record on intersectionality has been impressive, going beyond the limited text of the CEDAW and recognizing intersectional discrimination in its General Recommendations. For example, in General Recommendation No 28, the CEDAW Committee has declared that: '[i]ntersectionality is a basic [35] See esp Report by the Secretary-General, 'Integrating the Gender Perspective into the Work of United Nations Human Rights Treaty Bodies', 14–18 September 1998, HRI/MC/1998/6.

[36] United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (opened for signature 30 March 2007, entered into force 3 May 2008) 2515 UNTS 3.

[37] Ibid pmbl, arts 6, 7, 18(2), 24(3), 28(2), 30(5).

[38] CRPD Committee, General Comment No 6 on equality and non-discrimination, UN Doc CRPD/C/GC/6 (2018). See for example, para 19 which declares that '"Intersectional discrimination" occurs when a person with a disability or associated to disability suffers discrimination of any form on the basis of disability, combined with, colour, sex, language, religion, ethnic, gender or other status . . . Intersectional discrimination can appear as direct or indirect discrimination, denial of reasonable accommodation or harassment. For example, while the denial of access to general health-related information due to inaccessible format affects all persons on the basis of disability, the denial to a blind woman of access to family planning services restricts her rights based on the intersection of her gender and disability. In many cases, it is difficult to separate these grounds . . . Intersectional discrimination refers to a situation where several grounds operate and interact with each other at the same time in such a way that they are inseparable and thereby expose relevant individuals to unique types of disadvantage and discrimination.' See also [3] [11] [21] [22] [32] [33] [36] [37] [55] [63] [67] [71] [73].

[39] United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination Against Women (opened for signature 18 December 1979, entered into force 3 September 1981) 1249 UNTS 13. See pmbl, arts 4(2), 11(2), 12(2), 14, 16.

concept for understanding the scope of the general obligations of States parties [to CEDAW]'.[40] Similar observations have previously been made by the Human Rights Committee established under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the Committee on the Elimination of Racial Discrimination established under the UN Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (CERD).[41] The Human Rights Committee (HRC) in its General Comment No 28 acknowledged that '[d]iscrimination against women is often intertwined with discrimination on other grounds such as race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status'.[42] Similarly, the CERD Committee in General Recommendation No 25 noted that: 'racial discrimination does not always affect women and men equally or in the same way. There are circumstances in which racial discrimination only or primarily affects women, or affects women in a different way, or to a different degree than men.'[43] These acknowledgements have gone a long way in addressing intersectionality juridically, especially before the CEDAW Committee and the HRC under their individual complaints procedures.[44] Much can be said about the jurisprudence which grapples with intersectional disadvantage of claimants especially the CEDAW Committee's decisions in Alyne da Silva Pimentel Teixeira v Brazil,[45] Kell v Canada,[46] and RPB v Philippines;[47] and the HRC's decisions like Lovelace v Canada[48] and LNP v Argentina.[49] In a swath of single-axis claims decided by them, these decisions mark successful pursuits of claims brought by, respectively—a Black woman in Brazil, an aboriginal woman in Canada, a young disabled girl in Philippines, another indigenous Canadian woman, and a young indigenous girl in Argentina. Several things stand out in these decisions especially in contrast with domestic discrimination laws. First and foremost, these decisions are not formally 'legally binding' even though they indicate the most specific interpretations of the [40] CEDAW Committee, General Recommendation No 28: Core Obligations of States Parties Under Article 2, UN Doc CEDAW/W/C/GC/28 (2010) [18].

[41] United Nations International Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (opened for signature 21 December 1965, entered into force 4 January 1969) 660 UNTS 195.

[42] United Nations Human Rights Committee, General Comment No 28: Article 3 (The Equality of Rights Between Men and Women), UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.10 [30].

[43] Ibid [3].

[44] See for the analysis of CEDAW Committee and HRC respectively: Shreya Atrey, 'Lifting as We Climb: Recognising Intersectional Gender Violence in Law' (2015) 5 Oñati Socio-Legal Series 1512; Shreya Atrey, 'Fifty Years On: The Curious Case of Intersectional Discrimination in the ICCPR' (2017) 35 Nordic Journal of Human Rights 220.

[45] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 17/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/49/D/17/2008 (views adopted on 25 July 2011).

[46] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 19/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/51/D/19/2008 (views adopted on 28 February 2012).

[47] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 34/2011, UN Doc CEDAW/C/57/D/34/2011 (views adopted on 21 February 2014).

[48] HRC, Communication No R6/24, UN Doc Supp No 40 (A/36/40) (1981).

[49] HRC, Communication No 1610/2007, UN Doc CCPR/C/102/D/1610/2007 (2011).

treaties and thus determine the legal obligations arising thereof.[50] That said, the adjudicative aspect of the Committees' work is much less formal and rather liberal especially in terms of burden of proof on the parties and standard of review applied. Secondly, the evaluation of these individual complaints is not always and only based on the right to equality and non-discrimination but based on equality with respect to enjoyment of human rights contained in different provisions of the treaties. This helps avoid arid issues of comparison which arise chiefly in discrimination claims. Thus, thirdly, this flexible and rather liberated space for redressing intersectionality provides a useful foil for evaluating the progress made in international law generally and, also, as against the record of the domestic courts.

Between the two ends of national and international discrimination laws, lie regional laws on equality and non-discrimination. In Europe alone, two sets of independent systems under the European Union law and the European Convention on Human Rights[51] (ECHR) have created a complex web of protections. EU non-discrimination obligations arise from Article 13 of the Amsterdam Treaty 1997, now Article 19 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union 2007, which obligates the EU to combat discrimination based on sex, racial or ethnic origin, religion or belief, disability, age, and sexual orientation. The EU Charter of Fundamental Rights prohibits discrimination under Article 21 on the basis of a much larger set of illustrative grounds including sex, race, colour, ethnic or social origin, genetic features, language, religion or belief, political or any other opinion, membership of a national minority, property, birth, disability, age, and sexual orientation. More specific protections are variously scattered in the EU Directives dedicated to specific grounds, such as the Race Directive 2000/43/EC,[52] Framework Directive 2000/78/EC which covers religion or belief, disability, age or sexual orientation,[53] Gender Directive 2004/113/EC,[54] and the Gender Directive (Recast) 2006/54/EC on gender.[55] Although seemingly exhaustive in their scope, there is some leeway in reading in other grounds within each. For example, the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) interpreted severe forms of obesity to be included within the ground of disability under the Framework Directive.[56]

[50] Sarah Joseph and Melissa Castan, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: Cases, Commentary and Materials (OUP 2014) [1.61] [1.69].

[51] European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms 1950 (opened for signature 4 November 1950, entered into force 3 September 1953) ETS 5.

[52] Council Directive 2000/43 implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin [2000] OJ L180/22.

[53] Council Directive 2000/78 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation [2000] OJ L303/16.

[54] Council Directive 2004/113 implementing the principle of equal treatment between men and women in the access to and supply of goods and services [2003] OJ L373/37.

[55] Council Directive 2006/54 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation (recast) [2006] OJ L204/23.

[56] Case C-354/13 Fag og Arbejde v Kommunernes Landsforening [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2463.

The hypothetical claimant in Lord Phillips' example may find it far easier to argue on the basis of weight, obesity, or fattism with this specific recognition, although he would have to surmount the fragmentation hurdle of arguing a claim on two grounds under two different directives. Fragmentation matters because, besides relating to different sets of grounds, the directives have differing material scope. The Race Directive applies to employment and occupation, education, social protection (including social security and healthcare), social advantages, and access to and supply of goods and services; the Framework Directive applies to employment and occupation; the Gender Directive applies to the access of supply of goods and services; and the Gender Directive (Recast) applies to the field of employment and occupation. So, whilst the Race Directive covers access to goods and services, the Framework Directive which includes disability does not cover the situation of the hypothetical claimant.

Notwithstanding the complex design of EU discrimination law, its conceptual foundations do seem to go beyond single-axis discrimination. Whilst the directives do not mention intersectionality explicitly, there are sporadic references to interaction of grounds in producing discrimination prohibited under the directives.[57] Recital 14 of the Race Directive and Recital 3 of the Framework Directive mandate the EU to: 'eliminate inequalities, and to promote equality between men and women, especially since women are often the victims of multiple discrimination'. Other references are less explicit. Article 6(2) of the Framework Directive provides that although age discrimination can be justified, it must not 'result in discrimination on the grounds of sex', thereby prohibiting the intersection of age and sex discrimination to be considered lawful. The Gender Directive (Recast) acknowledges discrimination against women in marriage, pregnancy, maternity, and child-care.[58] Article 6 further recognizes that the Gender Directive (Recast) applies not just between men and women but to 'members of the working population, including self-employed persons, persons whose activity is interrupted by illness, maternity, accident or involuntary unemployment and persons seeking employment and to retired and disabled workers', thereby acknowledging the effects of illness, maternity, unemployment, and disability on women's equality. These provisions are considered sufficiently accommodating of intersectional discrimination.[59] The CJEU has been lauded for responding to single-axis claims based on sex or age in a manner which took into account multiple and crosscutting disadvantages of claimants.[60] Yet, it seems to have missed such disadvantages when [57] Race Directive, recital 14; Framework Directive, recitals 2, 3, 10 and arts 4(2), 6(2); Gender Directive (Recast), recitals 3, 11, 23, 24 and arts 6, 8(2), 9(1)(c), 11(a), 13.

[58] Gender Directive (Recast), recitals 11, 23, 24.

[59] Gay Moon, 'Multiple Discrimination: Justice for the Whole Person' (2009) 2 Journal of the European Roma Rights Centre 5; Karon Monaghan, 'Multiple and Intersectional Discrimination in EU Law' (2012) 13 European Anti-discrimination Law Review 20.

[60] Sandra Fredman, 'Intersectional Discrimination in EU Gender Equality and Non-discrimination Law' (2016) <http://ohrh.law.ox.ac.uk/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2016/07/argued explicitly. The failure of the only intersectional case argued and decided as such by the CJEU confirms this.

Parris v Trinity College Dublin[61] was argued on two grounds—age and sexual orientation—under the Framework Directive.[62] The case concerned the denial of the survivor's benefit under an occupational pension scheme to same-sex partners who had not married or entered into a civil partnership until the member's sixtieth birthday. The member of the scheme in the case was unable to formalize his same-sex union before he turned sixty since same-sex civil partnerships were not recognized in Ireland before 2011. Therefore, the rule did not disadvantage younger gay couples who could enter into civil partnerships after 2011 and still meet the terms of the scheme or heterosexual couples who had a choice to marry before that date. The rule specifically affected older gay couples who had no chance of legalizing their unions before turning sixty because of restrictive marriage laws in Ireland. The CJEU found that there was no basis of finding such 'combined' discrimination when no discrimination existed on the basis of sexual orientation and age alone:

> while discrimination may indeed be based on several of the grounds set out in Article 1 of Directive 2000/78, there is, however, no new category of discrimination resulting from the combination of more than one of those grounds, such as sexual orientation and age, that may be found to exist where discrimination on the basis of those grounds taken in isolation has not been established.[63]

In this way, the Court rejected the normative basis of intersectionality in EU discrimination law—finding instead that multi-ground claims exist only as claims of single-ground discrimination taken in succession. The first and only test case of intersectional discrimination in EU law thus falls in line with other jurisdictions which adopt a limited understanding of multi-ground intersectional claims as simply multiple claims of single-axis discrimination. Thus, our hypothetical claimant may fare no better in EU law which shows promising signs of embracing intersectionality in its legislative text and in cases argued on a single ground, but has finally rejected intersectionality when it came to it in Parris.

The case of the ECHR is slightly different. For starters, though there are forty-seven States Parties to the ECHR, it is not directly binding in the way that EU treaties and legislation are, which bind twenty-seven Member States. Yet, the ECHR Intersectional-discrimination-in-EU-gender-equality-and-non-discrimination-law.pdf> (see esp the discussion on Case C-123/10 Brachner v Pensionsversicherungsanstalt [2011] ECR I-000). Cf Case C-555/07 Kucukdeveci v Swedex GmbH & Co KG [2010] ECR I-00365; Case C-144/04 Mangold v Rüdiger Helm [2005] ECR I-09981; Case C-77/02 Steinicke v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit 2003 I-09027; Case C-187/00 Kutz-Bauer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [2003] ECR I-2741.

[61] Case C-443/15 Parris v Trinity College Dublin [2017] ICR 313 (hereafter Parris).

[62] Cf Case C-227/04 Maria-Luise Lindorfer v Council of the European Union [2007] ECR I-6767 (argued on two grounds before the CJEU but not decided as such).

[63] Parris (n 61) [80].

is implemented through domestic legislation like the Human Rights Act 1998 in the UK and the judgments of the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) too are binding. As international law, the ECHR thus lies somewhere between the UN human rights treaties and the EU law in terms of enforceability. What is most peculiar, though, is the way the equality guarantee is set out. Article 14 of the ECHR provides:

> The enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention shall be secured without discrimination on any ground such as sex, race, colour, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, birth or other status.

On the face of it, the right is 'parasitic' on other Convention rights, such that the discrimination complained of under Article 14 must be connected to the 'enjoyment of the rights and freedoms set forth in this Convention'. The ECtHR has started interpreting this link liberally—no longer requiring that the discrimination claim would only arise upon the 'breach' of another right but merely when the matter is within the 'ambit' of other Convention rights.[64] In any case, a self-standing equality guarantee was incorporated via Protocol 12 to the ECHR in 2000 which prohibits discrimination in relation to any 'right set forth by law'.[65] But no discrimination claim has been brought forward on two or more grounds under the Protocol, and it remains to be seen whether claimants would find it any easier to prove discrimination independent of other Convention rights. The concern arises because while several potential intersectional cases seem to have been decided under the ECHR, including challenges to a headscarf ban by Muslim women and to forced sterilization of Roma women;[66] these claims have seldom touched upon Article 14 itself. References to intersectionality have instead been confined to understanding the basis of violations of other Convention rights like the right to religion or the right to privacy. This opens up an intriguing prospect of arguing discrimination in the guise of other Convention rights, rather than in reference to Article 14 explicitly. It may provide a unique opportunity to our hypothetical claimant—the fat Black man—to challenge certain kinds of treatment which touch upon civil–political rights like life, liberty, and security. However, he will find it difficult to argue a 'classic' discrimination case like the denial of service by a private shopkeeper as a violation of another right for which a state or public authority is meant to be accountable. Even if the hypothetical claimant surmounts the parasitic nature of Article 14, there are further hurdles to confront.

[64] Sandra Fredman, 'Emerging from the Shadows: Substantive Equality and Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights' (2016) 16 Human Rights Law Review 273.

[65] Council of Europe, Protocol 12 to the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms on the Prohibition of Discrimination (adopted on 4 November 2000, entered into force 1 April 2005) ETS 177.

[66] SAS v France [2014] ECHR 695.

The list of enumerated grounds in Article 14 of the ECHR is non-exhaustive. In comparison with EU law, the enumerated grounds are greater in number, including language, political or other opinion, national or social origin, association with a national minority, property, and birth. Grounds such as disability, sexual orientation, and age, which were not included in 1950 when the Convention was adopted, have now been judicially recognized by the ECtHR.[67] The Court has also recognized immigrant status,[68] place of residence,[69] and prisoners[70] within 'other status' protected under Article 14. Though the Court has not yet considered weight-related grounds, its rather inclusive approach to grounds could be helpful for the hypothetical claimant in having them recognized as analogous to grounds in Article 14. But this rather liberal approach to grounds comes with a variable standard of scrutiny attached to different grounds. While some grounds, like race, sex, sexual orientation, and disability, attract a very high standard of scrutiny requiring 'particularly convincing and weighty reasons' for discrimination to be justified,[71] other grounds only attract a low standard of scrutiny, giving states a wide margin of appreciation to justify discrimination on a reasonable basis.[72] This throws up an unusual problem of choosing the appropriate standard of scrutiny for intersectional claims which are based both on grounds attracting a very high standard of scrutiny, viz. race, and on those attracting relatively lower levels of scrutiny, perhaps weight. No answer has been offered in doctrine and intersectional claims under the ECHR remain few and far between.

2. The Project

As the hypothetical claimant travels across jurisdictions his expectations recede. Not only are his problems in the UK mirrored in other jurisdictions, they multiply and change form from one regime to another. He notices some scattered bright spots in the jurisprudence, but nowhere does he find discrimination law practice on all fours with intersectionality. But can he use the lessons in comparative law to conceive of a successful intersectional claim which overcomes the recurring roadblocks to intersectionality, while also following the favourable signs in doctrine?

[67] For example, disability was recognized in Glor v Switzerland (2009) Application No 13444/04 (ECtHR); sexual orientation in Kiyutin v Russia [2011] ECHR 439, Alajos Kiss v Hungary (2010) Application No 38832/06 (ECtHR), and Salgueiro Da Silva Mouta v Portugal (2010) Application No 33290/96 (ECtHR); and age in Schwizgebel v Switzerland (2010) Application No 25762/07 (ECtHR).

[68] Bah v United Kingdom (2011) Application No 56328/07 (ECtHR).

[69] Carson v United Kingdom [2010] ECHR 338.

[70] Laduna v Slovakia (2011) Application No 31827/02 (ECtHR).

[71] DH v Czech Republic (2007) Application No 57325/00 (ECtHR); Abdulaziz, Cabales and Balkandali v United Kingdom (1985) Application Nos 9214/80, 9473/81, 9474/81 (ECtHR); X v Austria (2013) Application No 19010/07 (ECtHR).

[72] Stec v United Kingdom [2006] ECHR 1162; Connors v United Kingdom [2004] ECHR 223.

This book is dedicated to imagining such a successful account of a claim of intersectional discrimination.

The account of intersectional discrimination properly so called may be conceived along three dimensions: theoretical, categorial, and practical. The first and overarching concern is that there seems to be a gap between what is meant by intersectionality and how intersectional claims are understood. The gap is theoretical in that discrimination law does not appear to be abreast with the idea of intersectionality, let alone responding to a claim based on intersectionality successfully. So, what does it mean for someone to suffer intersectional discrimination? There is no consensus across jurisdictions as to what is meant by this. The first thing to do then is to explicate intersectionality theory itself to understand what it brings to discrimination law and to the category of intersectional discrimination.

What intersectionality is is a normative question. It is informed by over two hundred years of Black feminism and, more recently, since the 1980s, by Critical Race Studies, Critical Race Feminism, and Postmodernism in the United States. There are also indigenous framings of intersectionality which have existed and been developed without reference to 'intersectionality' as a trope. All of these together provide a rich resource for understanding what the theory stands for, thirty years after it was consolidated and christened 'intersectionality' by Kimberlé Crenshaw.[73] This understanding is at the heart of the present project. Once we know what intersectionality means, it is that understanding that we would like realized in discrimination law practice. Thus, what we want to know at the outset is what is the hypothetical claimant really saying when he says that he has suffered intersectional discrimination on the basis of his race and weight.

Secondly, how is this understanding different from the way in which discrimination is traditionally understood in law? The traditional paradigm of discrimination has been single-axis. This was the case when Crenshaw first mounted her critique in 1989 and remains the case today. In fact, Lord Phillips does not, even hypothetically, pause to consider that a fat Black man could potentially be discriminated on two grounds and only asks which of the two (race or weight) it is for it to be discrimination. But our short comparative survey shows that this is no longer the standard reaction to complex claims. Assertions of discrimination based on more than one ground have been interpreted beyond single-axis and variously as sex-plus, race-plus, multiple discrimination, and such. Cases like Bahl, Jefferies, Falkiner, and Parris show very different kinds of conceptual categorizations of multi-ground claims, different from both single-axis and intersectional discrimination. So how do we explain the difference and, importantly, how do we reinterpret these claims as claims of intersectional discrimination, if they really were that in fact?

[73] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139 (hereafter Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection').

At this point, we are both observing as well as closing the gap between intersectionality theory and how it manifests itself in discrimination law as a form or category of discrimination. This means conceptually delineating the different categories of thinking about discrimination, including single-axis discrimination and its variations (such as substantially single-axis, capacious single-axis, and contextual single-axis discrimination) as well as various forms of multi-ground discrimination (including multiple, additive as in combination or compound, embedded, and intersectional discrimination). The proliferation of categories of discrimination beyond single-axis is a promising sign for intersectionality. But it makes it all the more important, then, to be amply clear, diagnostically-speaking, as to what discrimination in each case entails.

Thirdly, and as the comparative survey made plain, the theoretical and categorial dimensions of intersectionality and intersectional discrimination respectively are not themselves enough in actually ensuring that intersectional claims succeed. They need to specifically resonate with the practice of discrimination law. This involves studying how each concept or cog in the wheel of discrimination law responds to an intersectional claim, including the text of the discrimination guarantees, the grounds of protection, the possibility of expansion of grounds, the scope of prohibition of direct and indirect discrimination, the test for discrimination, the use of comparators, the justification defences, the standard of scrutiny and burden of proof, and the possible remedies. It is only when each of these independently and simultaneously responds to intersectionality favourably that an intersectional claim may succeed.

In fact, the three dimensions of theoretical, categorial, and practical inquiries too are inevitably related and at points overlapping. It is their collective force which turns intersectionality from an independent theory into a category of intersectional discrimination in practice. For example, the theoretical and categorial dimensions reinforce each other in that the contours of intersectionality theory define the category of intersectional discrimination, and this categorization in turn shows the contrast with other ways of conceiving discrimination. The praxis further reveals that a theoretical and categorial understanding of intersectionality and intersectional discrimination respectively is insufficient for the project at hand. Realizing intersectionality in discrimination law thus requires a concerted effort which touches all aspects of discrimination law—theoretically, categorially, and doctrinally.

This project is such an effort. The next three chapters of the book unravel each of the dimensions of the project. The conclusions with respect to each contribute to the threefold central argument made in this book: that the account of intersectional discrimination—(i) is inspired by the idea of intersectionality, which illuminates the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities understood as a whole, and in their full and relevant context, with the purpose of redressing and transforming them; (ii) is conceptually and categorially salient in discrimination law, that is qualitatively different from the category of single-axis discrimination and also other forms of multi-ground discrimination such as substantially single-axis, capacious single-axis, contextual single-axis, multiple, additive, or embedded discrimination; and (iii) can be accommodated in discrimination law by recalibrating the chief features of discrimination law practice to align with it, including features like grounds, direct and indirect discrimination, test of discrimination, comparators, burden of proof, standard of scrutiny, and remedies.

The book is admittedly lopsided. It is just three chapters, each exploring the theoretical, conceptual, and doctrinal dimensions of the project. The chapters become lengthier as we proceed. This only reflects the uphill task intersectionality represents in terms of having it understood as a theory, then as a concept of discrimination, and finally having it redressed in discrimination law. The reader will have to cope with the surmounting roadblocks to intersectionality at each step. The steps are clearly outlined in subheadings for readers to browse independently. Though as a whole, it is useful to remember that it is only when each step along the way is well taken that we may finally arrive at a destination worth writing home about as intersectional discrimination.

3. The Parameters

As one would expect, a catholic account of intersectional discrimination of the kind offered in this book is constructed within certain parameters. It is important to explain what these are so that the account holds up and can ultimately do the work it is intended for in discrimination law.

First, a few remarks about the nature of the account are in order. The account is imagined as embodying what is necessary and sufficient for realizing intersectionality in discrimination law, in theoretical and doctrinal terms. Yet, it must be acknowledged that it is still a mediating and tentative account. All it does is take intersectionality theory and discrimination law as they have been developed in theory and practice and imagine intersectional discrimination within these discourses. It is thus, to draw some inspiration from Rawls, representing a state of 'reflective equilibrium' resting on the stilts of intersectionality and discrimination law.[74] This means that the account is internally consistent amongst the principles which give rise to it (intersectionality theory and discrimination law) and also consistent with the particular cases to which it is applied. In line with the Rawlsian approach, it is arrived at by first sketching an initial theoretical account (chapter 2), and then testing it against specific cases in discrimination law (chapters 3 and 4). The initial account is constantly reconsidered in light of its application to particular cases and its principles are accordingly open to revision. The book follows this discursive process of reasoning back and forth between theory and comparative doctrine. The emphasis on particular cases appreciates rather than suppresses the peculiarities of new cases which may belie a set formula and reflect their own complexities on the account. The possibility of revision upon reflection allows mediating accounts, like the present one, to continue to develop as more intersectional cases emerge. This is also the reason why the account is best described as tentative. It is consistent with Crenshaw's description of the original conceptualization of intersectionality theory in 1989 as 'provisional' and since then always as being a 'work-in-progress'.[75]

[74] John Rawls, A Theory of Justice (1st edn, OUP 1971) 20, 48–51.

The account is also tentative in that it is non-particular. It is drawn from the failed and successful experiences of intersectional discrimination in many jurisdictions. The account which comprises theoretical, categorial, and practical matters seeks to represent the bare bones of intersectional discrimination which is common to the jurisdictions it is derived from but does not represent a full-bodied version of intersectional discrimination in any one jurisdiction. Instead, the skeleton can be filled in based on the peculiarities of both specific discrimination claims and particular laws which apply. I hope the book as a whole shows how this transition from comparative law to a general account and back can be made in contexts far and wide.

And lastly, it is a mediating account because it is not so much a complete reimagination of law, politics, or society but a critical restatement of discrimination law to accommodate, what is for itself a rather radical idea, intersectionality. The project neither dismantles the structure of discrimination law nor does it abandon it as a site of reform. It is thus an admittedly liberal account which nevertheless hopes to achieve radical transformation of both intersectionality, as in the patterns of disadvantage created by it, as well as discrimination law, which seems to neglect such patterns. Sceptics may rightfully find this line dissatisfying. That will just have to be, given that this project is about rendering intersectionality redressable in discrimination law as it exists in theory and practice. If they still do peruse the book, I hope that they at least reckon with the transformative utopia imagined as a result of realizing intersectionality in discrimination law. In fact, the present project may complement other interventions—political reform, social movements, and even the radical overhaul of discrimination law—that aim to achieve just this.

The restatement of discrimination law in this project is primarily concerned with the juridical realization of intersectionality, namely having people claim intersectional discrimination successfully in courts. It is in line with discrimination laws which have developed through the common law route by adjudicators arriving at general principles from specific cases.[76] The focus on adjudication of intersectional claims is no small matter given the frequency with which intersectional claims fail. In fact, adjudication has a special link to justice, in that it is exactly the business of courts to impart justice.[77] Justice for individual victims of intersectional discrimination, like the hypothetical claimant in Lord Phillips' example, should thus be an imminent concern for discrimination lawyers, even if we agree that broader efforts to dismantle patterns of intersectional disadvantage need also be pursued. Therefore, the corollary of the prohibition of discrimination as positive discrimination, in the form of affirmative action, preferential treatment, or reasonable accommodation, should all be a part of the conversation for realizing intersectionality in discrimination law.

[75] Devon W Carbado, Kimberlé Williams Crenshaw, Vickie M Mays, and Barbara Tomilson, 'Intersectionality: Mapping the Movements of a Theory' (2013) 10 Du Bois Review 303, 304.

This brings me to offer an explanation for the choice of jurisdictions covered and the purpose of comparative analysis undertaken here. This project engaged with the discrimination laws of the US, UK, Canada, South Africa, India, and the EU and with the jurisprudence of the ECtHR and human rights treaty bodies including the CEDAW Committee, CRPD Committee, and the Human Rights Committee. The basis of selection is in equal parts dictated by purpose and practicality. The purpose of referring to these jurisdictions is to understand, explain, and learn from how courts in different jurisdictions have actually responded to actual or potential cases of intersectional discrimination. It gives real depth and meaning to the aim of arriving at a normative account that is embedded in practical experience and hence relevant in and sensitive to contexts to which it may be applied. Since the purpose of sketching a normative account here is for supporting actual cases of intersectional discrimination, testing it against existing doctrine provides an opportunity to reflect on, revise, and reaffirm the principles of the account, in line with the methodology of reflective equilibrium. In fact, the doctrine in these jurisdictions provides particularly rich fodder for the present inquiry because of their relatively mature discrimination laws as well as their engagement with intersectionality. The fact that the account of intersectional discrimination is inspired by comparative doctrine from these jurisdictions, which have some of the most progressive discrimination law practice, makes it both contemporary and compelling in redressing intersectional discrimination.

But what binds them ultimately is that these jurisdictions share some of the key features of discrimination law and a common language which provides consistency

[76] Denise G Réaume, 'Of Pigeon Holes and Principles: A Reconsideration of Discrimination Law' (2002) 40 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 113.

[77] John Gardner, 'Discrimination as Injustice' (1996) 16 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 353, 354–55, who in fact argued that justice had a special link to adjudication, though perhaps the obverse is true just the same.

and feasibility to the project of considering them together. Their discrimination laws have a common premise in central concepts they employ, for example, direct and indirect discrimination, grounds, burden of proof, justification defences, etc. While there are substantial differences in how these concepts actually transpire within a particular jurisdiction, the differences do not defeat the allegiance to these central concepts per se. For example, even as direct discrimination under the UK Equality Act 2010 operates with a finite number of grounds in the form of a closed list unlike the Canadian and South African constitutional counterparts, the underpinning of 'grounds' itself seems to be a common one. Similarly, what is 'unfair discrimination' under the South African Constitution is 'discrimination' under the Canadian Charter and may be 'less favourable treatment'/'direct discrimination' and 'particular disadvantage'/'indirect discrimination' under the UK Equality Act 2010;[78] but the substantive explanations of these concepts confirm that the jurisdictions are in fact involved in a common project of addressing status-based disadvantages. Though inter-jurisdictional differences remain important to this project and are appropriately noted, they do not themselves make the choice of studying these jurisdictions together irreconcilable. In fact, inter-jurisdictional conversations[79] and cross-pollination of concepts[80] are very much a part of the methodology of doing discrimination law. For example, important concepts like indirect discrimination, analogous grounds, and even intersectionality as developed in the US have travelled trans-continentally and been embraced by jurisdictions around the world. The transatlantic borrowing from US law is particularly visible in the UK which in turn influenced the development of EU law. This is also characteristic of the way in which South African equality jurisprudence developed in reference to its Canadian counterpart.[81] Comparativism is thus a running thread in the fabric of discrimination law. It is important for a project on intersectional discrimination to speak to and profit from this feature.

Another practical concern is that because intersectional discrimination remains largely unrealized in discrimination law, most jurisdictions only have a handful of cases to offer on the subject. Lack of intersectional cases may be explained by the judicial resistance to them and to ask for more resilience in the face of such resistance would be asking for too much and in vain. While no single [78] Constitution of South Africa 1997, s 9(3); Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1982, s 15(1); UK Equality Act 2010, ss 13, 14, 19.

[79] For similar projects which work with comparative doctrine from these jurisdictions, see Sandra Fredman, Discrimination Law (2nd edn, OUP 2011); Tarunabh Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (OUP 2015).

[80] See generally Christopher McCrudden, 'A Common Law of Human Rights?: Transnational Judicial Conversations on Constitutional Rights' (2000) 20 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 499.

[81] Albie Sachs, 'Equality Jurisprudence: The Origin of Doctrine in the South African Constitutional Court' (1999) 5 Review of Constitutional Studies 76; Adam M Dodek, 'Canada as Constitutional Exporter: The Rise of the "Canadian Model" of Constitutionalism' (2007) 36 Supreme Court Law Review 309.

jurisdiction provides an extensive catchment of intersectional claims, comparative law comes in handy here in providing references to a diverse set of intersectional claims. From the number and kind of grounds involved, the categorization of direct or indirect intersectional discrimination, and methods relied on in proving discrimination to understanding the actual discrimination suffered by intersectional claimants and the eventual remedies they receive, the cases show the many permutations and combinations of issues involved in intersectional discrimination. The comparative references are not comprehensive in any sense, though. The selection of cases is meant to be purposeful, to shine a spotlight on some of the most knotty problems with intersectional discrimination and how they can be resolved, rather than to populate the ranks of cases for each point of discussion. The hope, then, is that the experience of these jurisdictions with intersectional discrimination will provide the necessary steer for imagining and initiating developments elsewhere, including non-Anglophone and civil law systems, and other areas of international law.

For all this, finally, it must be recognized that the book relies on an eclectic set of sources to make its case. Besides obvious references to intersectionality theory and comparative discrimination law, there is appropriate use made of feminist theory, Dalit feminism, identity theory, disability law, and philosophy of discrimination law. All of these have influenced the way in which both intersectionality and discrimination law have developed. But their contribution remains latent and is often missed. The purpose is to make these foundational influences evident and to ultimately have intersectional discrimination resonate with them. Kalpana Kannabiran explains this befittingly: 'The effort to use a plurality of sources points towards the existence of multiple locations of [discrimination] law in action, and to the need to span the entire range in order to grasp the complexity of the problem and its solutions.'[82] Given that intersectionality remains largely unrealized in discrimination law, this project is fairly liberated in taking its own form while remaining faithful to the foundational influences of both intersectionality and discrimination law. But it is not only better but expedient to go beyond the law at least. The reason is straightforward. It is only through these wider sets of sources, which go beyond law or strictly discrimination law, that we understand the lived reality of discrimination. The project of redressing discrimination of any kind will miss the mark if it does not actually understand what those experiences of discrimination really are. Thus, this book, especially in chapter 2, casts a wide net in appreciating discrimination for what it is, especially intersectional discrimination, through a variety of social, philosophical, and ethnographic material. It is a commitment to keeping it real in discrimination law.

[82] Kalpana Kannabiran, Tools of Justice: Non-Discrimination and the Indian Constitution (Routledge 2012) 43.

Conclusion

The fact that, thirty years after Crenshaw's seminal article describing intersectionality in US discrimination law,[83] this book still needs to be written is a paradox in discrimination law. That a body of law specifically designed to address inequality has missed the worst kind of inequalities which are constituted and compounded by their interaction seems astonishing. Those who are not discrimination lawyers may find it especially so. But why has discrimination law been so resistant to Crenshaw's major insights when intersectionality has proliferated in other disciplines rather successfully? Why would real or hypothetical claims continue to be construed as anything but claims of intersectional discrimination? Perhaps, as this chapter tried to show, the paraphernalia of discrimination law is too extensive and intricate to simply adjust itself to intersectionality. It is, in theory and practice, designed for single-axis discrimination per se. Intersectionality is fundamentally incompatible with this framework. So, what does it take to reimagine the framework as a whole? This chapter has introduced this project and defined its parameters. I hope the readers take away from this the significance and urgency of the project to embark on the three-dimensional journey through the theoretical, categorial, and doctrinal issues in resolving this inexplicable paradox.

[83] Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection' (n 73).

2
The Theory
Outlining the Intersectional Framework

Introduction

The first of three questions that this book sets out to answer is what exactly is intersectionality or the idea that forms the kernel of the category of intersectional discrimination? This chapter is concerned with that question. It outlines the framework of intersectionality, which serves as the backbone of the project of redressing intersectional discrimination because it tells us what it is about this category of discrimination that we want redressed through law. It thus prepares the ground for answering the next two questions about how this understanding of intersectional discrimination differs from other categories of discrimination and how it can be accommodated in discrimination law practice.

The present chapter aims to do three things: delineate, defend, and apply the principal strands of the framework of intersectional theory and praxis. Section 1 identifies five strands in particular: the attention to both sameness and difference (section 1.1), in relation to patterns of group disadvantage (section 1.2), considered as a whole or with integrity (section 1.3), in their full context (section 1.4), with the purpose of furthering broadly conceived and transformative aims (section 1.5). Each of these has been present, emphasized, and developed in intersectionality thinking over the years. I argue that together they represent the intellectual core of intersectionality, and in turn the core of the category of intersectional discrimination is defined by it.

Section 2 responds to some of the key critiques of intersectionality theory that have emerged in the last three decades. Prominent amongst these is the reliance of intersectionality theory on identity categories and identity politics. Section 2.1 explains this reliance as reflexive and thus critical of its limitations while enabling the potential for transformation. Section 2.2 shows that intersectionality's reliance on identity categories is one shared with discrimination law and hence not utterly out of kilter. An understanding of intersectionality critiques and the responses to them clarifies each of the strands further. It confirms the continuing relevance and mettle of intersectionality in analysing the complexity of disadvantage in the world and particularly in discrimination law. Section 3 extends the framework to the Dalit feminist discourse. Its relevance in explaining the disadvantage suffered on the basis of caste and sex in a wholly different context—of Dalit women in India—confirms the normative strength and global appeal of intersectionality beyond its paradigmatic case of Black women in the United States.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

1. The Idea

Human lives are complex. Everyone has an ethnicity, gender, sexual orientation, age, marital status, and national or social origin; some are disabled, have political opinions or religious beliefs, are pregnant, or have parental responsibilities. All of these identities affect us in different ways and in the way we experience the world. The absence of disability helps some to navigate an able-bodied world efficiently. Belonging to a dominant race helps evade the negative stereotypes and prejudices suffered by racial and ethnic minorities. Practising a dominant religion helps people live undisrupted lives in a society which accommodates their preferences for working hours, holidays, grooming, clothing, and diet. Being male allows patriarchal privileges within structures of domination which have been conceived to subordinate and exclude women. Heteronormative assumptions similarly allow straight men and women to 'fit in' and be perceived as part of the mainstream culture. Straying from any of these positions of power brings well-known disadvantages associated with racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, ageism, ableism, etc. The anti-racism movement, feminism, LGBTQ advocacy, and disability activism have thus grown to resist the everyday injustices inflicted on disadvantaged groups and individuals around the world.

But human lives can be more complex still. Some people may not just belong to one of these disadvantaged groups but several of them at once. Those who are disabled can also be Black; those who are disabled and Black can be Muslims; some of these Black Muslims who are disabled will be women; and some of these Black Muslim women who are disabled can be gay. Disadvantage associated with each of these groups, and individuals belonging to them, will no longer be defined along a single categorial axis of racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, or ableism alone. The positions of these groups may represent a much more complex picture of disadvantage, caught between the throes of many movements at once.

Intersectionality is about cutting a wedge into this complexity. It helps understand the structural and dynamic consequences of interaction between multiple forms of disadvantage based on race, sex, gender, disability, class, age, caste, religion, sexual orientation, region, etc. In helping to understand this complexity, it opens up ways of addressing the disadvantage associated with it.

This basic idea of navigating complexity has itself developed into a complex body of intellectual thought and praxis. Intersectionality has been unmissable in the public discourse: from frequent references to intersectionality by the 2016 US presidential candidates Bernie Sanders and Hilary Clinton, its mounting relevance in the headscarf controversy embroiling Muslim women in Europe, and its repeated invocation in the blazing Rhodes Must Fall campus movement at South African universities; to the swathe of signage embracing intersectionality during the recent Women's Marches around the world, its omnipresence in the #MeToo and #TimesUp movements, and its ubiquitous pop culture presence popularized by celebrities like Beyoncé and activists like Malala Yousafzai and adopted by online denizens alike. Movements around the world are animated with intersectional ideas even where the locution itself is absent. The Black feminist struggle in Brazil and Dalit women's resistance in India both work with intersectional frames in fighting multiple oppressions of race, caste, sex, gender, and class. The organization of microfinance and microcredit for rural women in the global south has similarly become increasingly attentive to intersectionality. Intersectional overtones have defined the discussions around the global refugee crisis, paying specific attention to the persecution and plight of women and children, disabled persons, and sexual minorities. Local and specific sites for applying intersectionality in practice have thus proliferated globally, elevating intersectionality to a level of international prominence.

Meanwhile, the intellectual project of intersectionality has also continued to flourish. Google Scholar alone returns tens of thousands of articles on intersectionality. But nowhere are its involute workings clearer and more consolidated than at its source in Kimberlé Williams Crenshaw's 1989 article where the term 'intersectionality' was first introduced.[1] Crenshaw used intersectionality to explain the disadvantage suffered by Black women on the basis of their race and sex. She showed how this combined form of disadvantage was similar to both the disadvantage suffered by white women on the basis of their sex and the disadvantage suffered by Black men on the basis of their race, as well as different from these forms of disadvantage, as disadvantage suffered by Black women as Black women on the basis of their race and sex both. The complexity of such disadvantage was lost on the discourses of three fields—discrimination law, feminism, and the civil rights movement in the US. All of them, Crenshaw argued, operated along a single categorial axis of either race or sex, thereby protecting only those who were disadvantaged but for their race or sex, viz. Black men and white women. They excluded from protection Black women, whose position of disadvantage was defined not by race or sex alone but by both of them at the same time. Crenshaw thus exhorted discrimination lawyers, feminists, and civil rights campaigners alike to rethink and recast the established analytical frames of understanding and redressing discrimination so that they included intersectionality.

The intellectual trajectory of intersectionality extends both backwards and forwards from Crenshaw's first intervention in 1989. Crenshaw drew from over a century's worth of rich Black feminist thought and those after Crenshaw have continued to draw on Crenshaw as well as other seminal intersectionalists, including Patricia Hill Collins, Angela Harris, Adrien Katherine Wing, Mari Matsuda, Gloria Anzaldúa, Richard Delgado, Patricia Williams, and others, to develop intersectionality in diverse contexts. Initially conceived as a Black feminist critique, the theoretical engagements with intersectionality now go beyond its disciplinarily origins in Critical Race Feminism, Critical Race Theory, Critical Legal Studies (CLS), and feminist and postmodern jurisprudence and into literature, sociology, anthropology, gender studies, economics, history, psychology, political science, and political theory.[2] Its beneficiaries have multiplied beyond women of colour in the US, to Black women in Latin America, indigenous women in Canada, Roma women in Europe, and Muslim women, disabled women, lesbians, and transwomen around the world.[3] Intersectionality has thus transformed into a truly representative form of feminism capable of speaking to myriad systems of power and structures of domination in diverse contexts. It has also been used for intersectional groups beyond the intersections with sex to explicate the disadvantage suffered by, for example, disabled LGBTQ.[4] Improvisations to intersectionality have been offered in the forms of 'configurations',[5] 'assemblages',[6] 'cosynthesis',[7] 'symbiosis',[8] 'social dynamics',[9] 'interactions',[10] 'multidimensionality',[11] and

[1] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139 (hereafter Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing').

[2] For an exposition of the mixed origins and shared history of these discourses, see Adrien K Wing (ed), Critical Race Feminism: A Reader (2nd edn, NYUP 2003). See also Patrick R Grzanka (ed), Intersectionality: A Foundations and Frontiers Reader (Westview 2014) (hereafter Grzanka (ed), Intersectionality); Nina Lykke, Feminist Studies: A Guide to Intersectional Theory, Methodology and Writing (Routledge 2010); Yvette Murphy, Valerie Hunt, Anna M Zajicek, Adele N Norris, and Leah Hamilton, Incorporating Intersectionality in Social Work Practice, Research, Policy, and Education (NASWP 2009).

[3] R Aída Hernández Castillo, 'The Emergence of Indigenous Feminism in Latin America' (2010) 35 Signs 539; Patricia Monture-Angus, Thunder in My Soul: A Mohawk Woman Speaks (Fernwood 1995) (hereafter Monture-Angus, Thunder in My Soul); Elvia R Arriola, 'Gendered Inequality: Lesbians, Gays and Feminist Legal Theory' (1994) 9 Berkeley Women's Law Journal 103; Mary Eaton, 'At the Intersection of Gender and Sexual Orientation: Towards a Lesbian Jurisprudence' (1994) 3 Southern California Review of Law and Women's Studies 183.

[4] Kate Caldwell, 'We Exist: Intersectional In/Visibility in Bisexuality & Disability' (2010) 30 Disability Studies Quarterly; Robert McRuer, 'Compulsory Able-Bodiedness and Queer/Disabled Existence' in Lennard J Davis (ed), The Disability Studies Reader (2nd edn, Routledge 2006).

[5] Kum-Kum Bhavnani and Krista Bywater, 'Dancing on the Edge: Women, Culture, and a Passion for Change' in Kum-Kum Bhavnani, John Foran, Priya A Kurian, and Debashish Munshi (eds), In on the Edges of Development: Cultural Interventions (Routledge 2009).

[6] Jasbir K Puar, Terrorist Assemblages: Homonationalism in Queer Times (DUP 2007).

[7] Peter Kwan, 'Complicity and Complexity: Cosynthesis and Praxis' (2000) 49 DePaul Law Review 673.

[8] Nancy Ehrenreich, 'Subordination and Symbiosis: Mechanisms of Mutual Support between Subordinating Systems' (2002) 71 UMKC Law Review 251.

[9] Davina Cooper, 'Intersectional Travel through Everyday Utopias: The Difference Sexual and Economic Dynamics Make' in Emily Grabham, Davina Cooper, Jane Krishnadas, and Didi Herman (eds), Intersectionality and Beyond: Law, Power and the Politics of Location (Routledge Cavendish 2009).

[10] Rita Kaur Dhamoon, 'Considerations on Mainstreaming Intersectionality' (2011) 64 Political Research Quarterly 230.

[11] Darren Hutchinson, 'Identity Crisis: Intersectionality, Multidimensionality, and the Development of an Adequate Theory of Subordination' (2000) 6 Michigan Journal of Race and Law 285.

'interconnectivity'[12] theories. From the basic idea of understanding the complexity of disadvantage associated with multiple identities, intersectionality has thus diversified and developed into 'a burgeoning field of intersectional studies' of its own.[13]

So, before turning to understand the complexity of disadvantage through intersectionality, it is necessary to understand the complexity of the theory and practice of intersectionality itself. What is the core of intersectionality which binds decades of developments in the field? The rest of this section is dedicated to answering this question and distilling the core from the voluminous and insightful scholarship on intersectionality. It is useful to iterate the findings here. I argue that intersectionality is composed of five principal strands: first, it is concerned with tracing both sameness and difference in experiences based on multiple group identities; secondly, it is concerned with tracing the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage understood broadly in terms of subordination, marginalization, violence, disempowerment, deprivation, exploitation, and all other forms of disadvantage suffered by social groups; thirdly, in order to make sense of these same and different patterns of group disadvantage they must be considered as a whole, namely with integrity; fourthly, intersectionality can only be appreciated in its full socio-economic, cultural, and political context that shapes people's identities and patterns of group disadvantage associated with them; and lastly, the purpose of this intersectional analysis is to further broadly conceived transformative aims which remove, rectify, and reform the disadvantage suffered by intersectional groups.

This is no more a definite account of intersectionality than Crenshaw's original postulation, which was meant to be 'provisional'.[14] Intersectionality literature is too vast and variously applied to be simply 'defined' in a single stroke. Like other academic work on theories of justice, theories of human rights, theories of discrimination law etc., intersectionality is a broad church and has many theoretical or justificatory accounts which have contributed to the development of the field. This is merely one such account from the point of view of discrimination law. It unpicks the strands that have been central to intersectionality in the way it was initially set out by Crenshaw and has been developed by others over the last thirty years. Individually or together, the strands do not represent an exhaustive case of intersectionality. But they do present some of the chief features developed in intersectionality literature, which are in turn salient in developing an account of intersectional discrimination in this book. For this purpose, then, the claim is that:

[12] Francisco Valdes, 'Sex and Race in Queer Legal Culture: Ruminations on Identities & Inter-Connectivities' (1995) 5 Southern California Law Review and Women's Studies 25.

[13] Sumi Cho, Kimberlé W Crenshaw, and Leslie McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies: Theory, Applications, and Praxis' (2013) 38 Signs 785 (hereafter Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies').

[14] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Color' (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1241, 1244–45 n 9 (hereafter Crenshaw, 'Mapping').

> Intersectionality illuminates the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities understood as a whole, and in their full and relevant context, with the purpose of redressing and transforming them.

I elaborate on how each of the strands contributes to the idea of intersectionality below.

1.1 Sameness and Difference

Crenshaw set out to do two things in her 1989 piece: first, to explain what Black women's disadvantage or intersectionality was all about; and secondly, to show how their disadvantage was left by the wayside of dominant discourses in discrimination law, feminism, and the civil rights movement. The first inquiry was a precursor to the second. So, in order to critique the normative vision of discrimination law, Crenshaw had to explicate the normative vision of intersectionality itself. Three cases helped Crenshaw make this case: DeGraffenreid v General Motors,[15] Payne v Travenol,[16] and Moore v Hughes.[17]

In DeGraffenreid, Black female employees of General Motors challenged the 'last hired, first fired' lay off policy as discriminating against them on the basis of both their race and sex. The United States District Court of Missouri summarily dismissed the possibility that claims could be based upon two grounds. It interpreted the claim based on both race and sex as a demand for recognizing a 'new special sub-category' or 'special class' for the grant of a 'new "super-remedy" '[18] beyond the contours of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act 1964, which prohibits discrimination on the basis of race, colour, religion, sex, or national origin. It concluded that: 'this lawsuit must be examined to see if it states a cause of action for race discrimination, sex discrimination, or alternatively either, but not a combination of both'.[19] Thus, according to the Court, Black women could be protected only to the extent that their experience coincided with either Black men or white women, but they had no cause of action of their own.

While General Motors had not hired Black women before 1964, it had hired white women for the same positions. The favourable hiring statistics for white women apparently negated any basis for indirect sex discrimination against Black women. Similarly, the Court dismissed the possibility of race discrimination

[15] DeGraffenreid v General Motors 413 F Supp 142 (1976) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri) (hereafter DeGraffenreid).
[16] 673 F 2d 798 (5th Cir 1982) (USCA) (hereafter Travenol).
[17] Moore v Hughes Helicopters, Inc 708 F 2d 475 (9th Cir 1983) (USCA) (hereafter Hughes).
[18] DeGraffenreid (n 15) 143.
[19] Ibid.

1866

because it was seen as creating 'a new classification of "Black women" ' with a greater standing than Black men under Title VII.[20] The unique disadvantages suffered by Black women thus fell through the cracks of both sex and race discrimination, defined through the experiences of white women and Black men respectively.

In Travenol, Payne, a Black woman, challenged a host of Travenol's employment practices as being discriminatory on the basis of race and sex. She was certified to claim on behalf of the class of Black women and her claim was allowed in part. Payne challenged the decision, including the relief, on the basis that Black males were erroneously excluded from the class certified by the district court. The concerned Rule 23(a) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedure provided that: 'the representative parties will fairly and adequately protect the interests of the class'. In reaffirming its corollary that 'a class representative may not head a class including persons whose interests substantially conflict with his or her own',[21] the Fifth Circuit Appeals Court dismissed the appeal upholding the district court opinion that a claim of sex discrimination necessarily denoted a conflict between men and women, notwithstanding their race. The Court denied the representation of Black males through Black females, and barred the possibility of Black females claiming for all Blacks as such. It failed to see Black women as capable of representing Blacks, just as Black men could represent all Blacks, including Black women. Even though the Travenol Court allowed Black women to claim as Black women, it isolated Black women's experiences into an uninteractive category of discrimination that had nothing in common with Black men's experiences of racial discrimination.

In the same vein, the case of Hughes revealed a judicial unwillingness to certify the class of Black women as representing all women. Tommie Moore, a Black female employee, had brought a complaint against Hughes Helicopters Inc, a manufacturer of commercial and military helicopters, for discriminating against Black females in the selection of supervisory and upper-level craft positions. The Court disagreed that Black women could represent all women since only Black women were potentially discriminated against. While Travenol forbade Black women from claiming on behalf of all Blacks, Hughes foreclosed the possibility of Black women claiming for all women. According to the Court, the claim did not concern the interests of women who were not Black, namely white women. Thus, it dismissed the lived realities of Black women's experiences as women's experiences. In doing so, the Court overlooked that Black women's experiences of sex discrimination could have been similar to the experiences of white women, or that the category of sex discrimination simply included all women irrespective of their race.

So, what is it that the courts missed in DeGraffenreid, Travenol, and Hughes? They missed the nature of Black women's disadvantage at the intersection of race and sex. Their disadvantage was one that was both similar to the disadvantage suffered by Black men and white women since they were both Black like Black men and women like white women, but also different in terms of being both Black and women at the same time and thus suffering disadvantage not just as Blacks or women alone but as Black women. In DeGraffenreid the Court denied that there was anything different about Black women as compared to white women and Black men, while in Travenol and Hughes the courts denied that Black women's disadvantage could be the same as the disadvantage suffered by white women and Black men. The lack of appreciation of this dynamic of sameness and difference in defining discrimination against Black women became the centrepiece of Crenshaw's critique and thus of intersectionality theory.

[20] Ibid 145.
[21] Travenol (n 16) 810.

Though Crenshaw made her case with reference to legal claims brought under US discrimination law in the 1970s and 1980s, the lesson of focussing on sameness and difference at the same time appears in the Black feminist struggle of several generations prior to that. The attention to Black women's experiences within broader systems of disadvantage like racism and sexism, as well as their unique disadvantages suffered within these systems, has characterized Black feminist thought for almost two centuries. Sojourner Truth's raging speech in 1851 where she asked the epithetic Black feminist question 'Ain't I a Woman?'[22] and Anna Julia Cooper's appeal to the civil rights movement in 1892: 'Only if the Black women can say, when and where I enter . . . then and there the whole Negro race enters with me',[23] mark the early efforts for understanding Black women as having same and different experiences as women and Blacks generally. Ange-Marie Hancock in her recent work, An Intellectual History of Intersectionality, traces back this thought further to Maria Miller Stewart's Religion and the Pure Principles of Morality published in 1831 and, later, Harriet Jacobs's Incidents in the Life of a Slave Girl published in 1860.[24] Both Stewart and Jacob drew upon the experiences of Black women to critique slavery in broad terms as well as, in particular, the sexual exploitation of Black women within it. They showed how Black women not only suffered from state-sanctioned racism and slavery, and exploitation at the hands of their female masters, including sexual exploitation by white men, but also violence by Black men within their communities. Thus, while Black women suffered from patriarchal structures which inflicted white women (lower level of employment and wages, gender bias, sexual exploitation by men), and racial domination which subjugated Black men (slavery, segregation, lower level of employment and wages, racial stereotypes), they simultaneously also suffered racial and patriarchal violence at the hands of white women and Black men respectively. The former made their experience akin to the experiences of white women based on their sex and Black men based on their race; the latter made their experience distinct in their own right.

[22] Sojourner Truth, 'Woman's Rights' in Beverly Guy-Sheftall (ed), Words of Fire: An Anthology of African-American Feminist Thought (New Press 1995) 36.

[23] Anna Julia Cooper, A Voice from the South (OUP 1988) 31.

[24] Ange-Marie Hancock, An Intellectual History of Intersectionality (OUP 2016) (hereafter Hancock, An Intellectual History).

The dynamic of sameness and difference has been reiterated in scholarship as the key to understanding the nature of discrimination based on multiple and interlocking systems of disadvantage. Barbara Smith declared this dynamic representing the 'simultaneity of oppressions' to be 'one of the most significant ideological contributions of Black feminist thought' as early as 1983.[25] Similarly, Crenshaw, in her survey of the field with Sumi Cho and Leslie McCall, notes that the 'insistence on examining the dynamics of difference and sameness' has been the running thread across varied disciplines and contexts in which intersectionality has been applied.[26] Vivian M May relates to this dynamic as one of the most basic takeaways from intersectionality throughout her work in Pursuing Intersectionality, Unsettling Dominant Imaginaries.[27] Jennifer Nash describes it as 'intersectionality's attention to difference while also strategically mobilizing the language of commonality'.[28]

What is interesting to note here, before we part with this idea, is that the simultaneous attention to sameness and difference is not unique to intersectionality but one known to discrimination law as well. Benjamin Eidelson alludes to this particular strand, when he defines wrongful discrimination, in his essay on 'Treating People as Individuals'.[29] He explains that one dimension of discrimination harm involves failing to treat people as individuals in two senses—first, in a way which recognizes that they share their individual-ness in being human; and second, in that they are both distinct and unique as individuals. Individuals are thus same and different at the same time. Failing to treat them as the same and unique on the basis of their membership in disadvantaged groups is what constitutes, for Eidelson, the wrong of discrimination. He recognizes that other paradigmatic forms of wrongful discrimination include: (i) 'those [which] express a kind of disrespect or contempt for the equal worth of those who are disfavoured'; (ii) those 'allocat[ing] opportunities unfairly, and, in doing so, entrench[ing] status hierarchies that warp our social structures'; (iii) that which can 'humiliate, stigmatize and demean'.[30] But Eidelson chooses to focus instead on what he believes is a hitherto neglected aspect in the moral case against discrimination.

Discrimination law and intersectionality theory thus coincide in their emphasis on the dynamic of sameness and difference as defining a particular kind of [25] Barbara Smith (ed), Home Girls: A Black Feminist Anthology (RUP 2000) xxxiv (hereafter Smith (ed), Home Girls).

[26] Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies' (n 13) 787.

[27] Vivian M May, Pursuing Intersectionality: Unsettling Dominant Imaginaries (Routledge 2015) 37, 70–71 (hereafter May, Pursuing Intersectionality).

[28] Jennifer C Nash, 'Re-thinking Intersectionality' (2008) 89 Feminist Review 1, 4 (hereafter Nash, 'Re-thinking Intersectionality').

[29] Benjamin Eidelson, 'Treating People as Individuals' in Deborah Hellman and Sophia Moreau (eds), Philosophical Foundations of Discrimination Law (OUP 2013) 203.

[30] Ibid 203, 205.

disadvantage that people suffer, based on their identity categories or grounds of discrimination. When multiple identities intersect to yield this dynamic, we can call it a case of intersectional discrimination.

1.2 Patterns of Group Disadvantage

When people belong to multiple disadvantaged groups, the disadvantage they suffer is intersectional in nature, that is, it is simultaneously both the same as and different from disadvantage suffered by members of the groups. Having established that identities intersect and result in a distinct form of disadvantage, intersectionality proceeds to answer what the sameness and difference in disadvantage actually refers or relates to.

The theme which animates the dynamic of sameness and difference, borrowing from O'Regan J, is that of 'patterns of group disadvantage'.[31] The phrase requires some unpacking. First of all, intersectionality conceives of 'disadvantage' broadly, including every kind of harm, oppression, powerlessness, subordination, marginalization, deprivation, domination, and violence. Moreover, the disadvantage is defined not by isolated or stray incidents but by its systemic or structural nature. It represents a pattern of historic motifs of disadvantage which have been entrenched over time. Such disadvantage is also not personally directed towards random individuals but suffered by individuals because of their membership in a social group. So, the focus is on disadvantage suffered by groups like women, disabled, Blacks, and gays, defined by their gender, disability, race, and sexual orientation, rather than individual choices or qualities viz. membership of a society, readership of a national daily, character, strength, morality etc. Furthermore, groups which matter are those which are relatively and substantially more disadvantaged (women, disabled persons, Blacks, gays etc.) compared to groups which are privileged (men, non-disabled people, white people, heterosexual people etc.).[32]

Thus, intersectionality, like discrimination law, is concerned with 'discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups [which] can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm'.[33] The difference lies in the fact that these patterns of group disadvantage, in the case of intersectional discrimination, are both simultaneously similar and dissimilar to patterns of group disadvantage associated with individual groups and also individual experiences within those groups. In this way, intersectional disadvantage is defined in terms of patterns of intergroup and intra-group disadvantage, which embody different kinds of substantive harm in terms of oppression, powerlessness, subordination, marginalization, deprivation, domination, and violence. The dynamic of sameness and difference matters because it ultimately speaks to these patterns of group disadvantage suffered by those belonging to multiple disadvantaged groups.

[31] Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (SACC) (hereafter Brink).

[32] Sandra Fredman, Discrimination Law (2nd edn, OUP 2011) 26–28, 138–39 (hereafter Fredman, Discrimination Law); Tarunabh Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (OUP 2015) ch 2 (hereafter Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law).

[33] Brink (n 31) [42] (O'Regan J).

Intersectionality's chief purveyors have maintained this emphasis on patterns of group disadvantage faithfully. Crenshaw used intersectionality to study similar and different experiences of violence against Black women. Far from looking for intentional harm perpetuated by single individuals, Crenshaw focussed on 'structures of domination', 'patterns of social power', and 'systems of subordination', which interacted with 'preexisting vulnerabilities' to reproduce Black women's disempowerment.[34] Crenshaw thus relied on identity politics to reveal how racism and sexism produced structural, political, and representational forms of violence against women of colour. Similarly, Patricia Hill Collins developed the 'matrix of domination' to understand how multiple forms of oppression are organized.[35] She identified four distinct but interrelated forms of oppressions as: structural, hegemonic, disciplinary, and interpersonal. Collins reshaped the thinking of systems of power as operating independently to one which always operated in an interlocking manner. Thus, oppressive systems of racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, ableism, ageism etc., are to be considered not as independent forms of oppression but in terms of their relationships with one another at every level of social organization, institutionally or interpersonally. bell hooks called this a 'politic of domination', which paid attention not only to the feminist movement's resistance to sexist domination but also to the racial, material, and cultural domination of all women.[36]

Even Adrien Katharine Wing, Mari Matsuda, and Angela Harris' highly ontological interventions querying the 'multiple consciousness' of those belonging to multiple identity-categories were concerned with consciousness of oppression in the first place: of awareness of concrete injustices suffered by those belonging to many disadvantaged groups at once. For Wing, once multiple consciousness—or intersectionality's dynamic of sameness and difference—is recognized, it is important to move on to recognizing its nature as residing in 'multiple layers of oppression'.[37] Similarly for Matsuda, what her jurisprudential method of multiple consciousness brought to the table was an appreciation of the 'reality and detail of oppression'.[38] Likewise, Harris argued for using multiple consciousness 'to describe

[34] Crenshaw, 'Mapping' (n 14) 1243, 1249, 1265, 1293.

[35] Patricia Hill Collins, Black Feminist Thought (2nd edn, Routledge 2009) 21 (hereafter Collins, Black Feminist Thought).

[36] bell hooks, Feminist Theory: From Margin to Center (2nd edn, SEP 2000) ch 2 (hereafter hooks, Feminist Theory).

[37] Adrien K Wing, 'Brief Reflections toward a Multiplicative Theory and Praxis of Being' (1991) 6 Berkley Women's Law Journal 181, 194, 196 (hereafter Wing, 'Brief Reflections').

[38] Mari Matsuda, 'When the First Quail Calls: Multiple Consciousness as Jurisprudential Method' (1989) 11 Women's Rights Law Reporter 7, 9.

a world in which people are not oppressed only or primarily on the basis of gender, but also on the bases of race, class, sexual orientation and other categories in inextricable webs'.[39]

The inextricability of these patterns of group disadvantage alerts us to two further things—that these patterns are mutually reinforcing, and, hence, that there is no hierarchy between them. The point about mutual reinforcement undercuts imagining racism, sexism, homophobia, transphobia, abelism, cultural supremacy etc. as separate spheres of disadvantage at all. As Devon W Carbado and Mitu Gulati observe: 'Fundamental to Intersectionality Theory [sic] is the understanding that race and gender are interconnected, and as a result, they do not exist as disaggregated identities'.[40] Intersectionality decries the idea of disaggregated identities and instead stresses their co-existing and co-constitutive nature, such that disadvantage associated with one could not be defined in isolation from other forms of disadvantage. This is true for those who are multiply disadvantaged as well as those who are not. For instance, Black women's disadvantage is one defined by similar and different patterns of group disadvantage based on their race, sex, and class. But their experience is also defined, say for those who are straight and non-disabled, by privileges attached to heterosexism and ableism. Similarly, saying that white women and Black men are disadvantaged only on the basis of their sex and race, respectively, actually means that the disadvantage they suffer is a product of harm based on sexism and racism and privileges attached with their race and sex respectively, including privileges based on their religion, disability, sexual orientation, age etc. There are thus 'no pure victims or oppressors'[41] because the patterns of group disadvantage created by multiple systems of power run along the axes of both privilege and disadvantage. Each form of disadvantage is 'always already imbricated within multiple axes of power'[42] such that axes of disadvantage and privilege cannot be individually dismantled without an appreciation of how they are mutually reinforcing.

This mutual reinforcement, though, cannot be captured in the idea of addition or multiplication or any other mathematical rendition. Once it is admitted that patterns of discrimination associated with grounds like race, sex, gender, sexual orientation, etc. are not one dimensional, it becomes clear that one cannot simply add, multiply, or divide identities to understand intersectional discrimination. Intersectionality defies such simple arithmetic and insists on viewing patterns of group disadvantage simultaneously.

[39] Angela P Harris, 'Race and Essentialism in Feminist Legal Theory' (1990) 42 Stanford Law Review 581, 587.

[40] Devon W Carbado and Mitu Gulati, Acting White? Rethinking Race in 'Post-Racial' America (OUP 2013) 71 (hereafter Carbado and Gulati, Acting White).

[41] Collins, Black Feminist Thought (n 35) 229.

[42] Vrushali Patil, 'From Patriarchy to Intersectionality: A Transnational Feminist Assessment of How Far We've Really Come' (2013) 38 Signs 847, 848.

Moreover, because the patterns of group disadvantage are mutually reinforcing, they are not ranked or arranged in any form of hierarchy. That is, there is no hierarchy of disadvantage. Intersectionality resists a race to the bottom in a kind of disadvantage contest where intersectional disadvantage is understood as worse or more important in a mathematical sense. The importance of intersectionality lies in the appreciation of qualitatively distinct explanations of same and different patterns of group disadvantage, rather than their quantitative rendition of sorts. As Grillo insightfully remarks: 'We have spent a lot of time arguing over whose pain is greater. That time would be better used trying to understand the complex ways that race, gender, sexual orientation, and class (among other things) are related'.[43]

Finally, since the patterns are mutually reinforcing and co-constituted, and there is no hierarchy between the different arrangement of patterns, there are also no pure sites of identities or oppressions such that there is nothing like an essentialized or isolated site of being a woman or experiencing sexism. More importantly, there is no pure site of intersectional identity as a Black woman, or of intersectional disadvantage composed of racism, sexism, and classism either. Sameness and difference remain relevant down to the bottom of their complexity. Carbado and Gulati's trenchant account of intra-group differences between Black women in identity performance cases helps with understanding this point about anti-essentialism.[44] When four Black women have been promoted as partners in a law firm, the case of 'the fifth Black woman', Mary, cannot simply be explained as sameness and difference in relation to white women and Black men. While the four Black women choose to 'cover' their identities by wearing non-ethnic clothes, having straight hair, and playing golf, Mary wears her traditional clothing, participates in minorities and diversity committees within and outside work, and lives in a Black neighbourhood. So while Mary may have experiences of sexism and racism similar to white women and Black men respectively, and also share the unique experiences of Black women who face both racism and sexism together, her experiences may be different from not just white women and Black men but also other Black women, exactly on the same basis (of racism and sexism), depending on how Black women choose to 'perform' their identities. In other words, there is no essential category of Black women's experience either. The example of identity performance highlights that intersectional identities or experiences of intersectional disadvantage cannot be essentialized. At the same time, this does not undermine the shared or common experiences of disadvantage where they exist. The project of uncovering complexity through intersectionality thus strengthens the case for both similar as well as different patterns, discarding neither in favour of another. The absence of either chips away at intersectionality.

[43] Trina Grillo, 'Anti-Essentialism and Intersectionality: Tools to Dismantle the Master's House' (2013) 10 Berkley Women's Law Journal 16, 27.

[44] Carbado and Gulati, Acting White (n 40) ch 3.

We thus return to the idea of complexity in intersectionality. To reiterate, the discussion on the simultaneity of the dynamic of sameness and difference in experiences matters because it ultimately reveals the complex patterns of group disadvantage associated with the dynamic. And herein lies the critical bite of intersectionality: that it beckons rich explanatory accounts of patterns of group disadvantage and discrimination suffered on an intersectional basis, as shown below in section 3 with the example of Dalit women. The epistemic depth in marshalling explanations of what same and different patterns of group disadvantage look like is what gives intersectionality its deserved relevance. The accounts or evidence in sociology, anthropology, psychology, feminist theory, political theory, economics, and other disciplines, explored from the vantage point of those disadvantaged because of their multiple identities, all provide germane fodder for understanding intersectional disadvantage qualitatively. Without an explanation of what intersectional disadvantage and discrimination actually are in terms of structures of power and relationships of domination, intersectionality would remain merely a rhetorical tool.

1.3 Integrity

The dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage may give the impression of a highly variegated and fragmented reality of intersectional discrimination. As if an individual or a group lives through multiple realities where some experiences of discrimination are similar to, whilst others are different from, disadvantage associated with each ground individually. But, in fact, the ontological reality that intersectionality seeks to convey is exactly the opposite: that sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage make sense only when they are considered as a whole or with integrity.

Etymologically, integrity appears from the word 'integer', which means wholeness or perfect condition. Semantically, it conveys 'the state of being "undivided, an integral whole"'.[45] Integrity binds the multiplicity and complexity in intersectionality into a cohesive and complete understanding of discrimination suffered on the basis of several identities at the same time. This emphasis on considering intersectional identities or experiences of disadvantage associated with them as a whole or with integrity is widely dispersed throughout intersectionality literature.

Wing explains this eloquently: '[T]he experiences of black women . . . might reflect the basic mathematical equation that one times one truly does equal one . . . [Their] experiences . . . must be seen as multiplicative, multi-layered, indivisible whole'.[46] Rosario Morales extends this to her own positionality and proclaims: 'I want to be whole. I want to claim my self to be puertorican [sic], and U.S. American, working class & middle class, housewife and intellectual, feminist, marxist, and anti-imperialist'.[47] Audre Lorde, Dianne Pothier, and Patricia Monture-Angus make similar points as a Black woman, a woman with disability, and as an indigenous woman respectively:

[45] Lynne McFall, 'Integrity' (1987) 98 Ethics 5, 7.

> As a Black lesbian feminist comfortable with the many different ingredients of my identity, and a woman committed to racial and sexual freedom from oppression, I find I am constantly being encouraged to pluck out some one aspect of myself and present this as the meaningful whole, eclipsing or denying the other parts of self.[48]
>
> I can never experience gender discrimination other than as a person with a disability; I can never experience disability discrimination other than as a woman. I cannot disaggregate myself nor can anyone who might be discriminating against me. I do not fit into discrete boxes of grounds of discrimination. Even when only one ground of discrimination seems to be relevant, it affects me as a whole person.[49]
>
> I am not just woman. I am a Mohawk woman. It is not solely my gender through which I first experience the world, it is my culture (and/or race) that precedes my gender. Actually, if I am object of some form of discrimination, it is very difficult for me to separate what happens to me because of my gender and what happens to me because of my race and culture. My world is not experienced in a linear and compartmentalized way. I experience the world simultaneously as Mohawk and as woman.[50]

The idea is simply that: 'Women don't lead their lives like, "Well this part is race, and this is class, and this part has to do with women's identities" '.[51] Even though defined by multiple axes of disadvantage (and privilege), their identities, and hence their experience based on those, are indivisible. Intersectionality theory relies on this idea to emphasize that disadvantage based on multiple identities is experienced and thus can be understood only as one single whole.

Seen this way, intersectionality might seem presumptively double-edged. In one way it asks us to be nuanced and complex in our view of identities. This essentially [46] Wing, 'Brief Reflections' (n 37) 182, 200.

[47] Rosario Morales, 'I Am What I Am' in Cherríe Moraga and Gloria Anzaldúa (eds), In This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color (KTP 1983) 91.

[48] Audre Lorde, Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches (Crossing Press 1984) 114, 120.

[49] Dianne Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds of Discrimination to Real People's Real Experiences' (2001) 13 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 39, 59 (hereafter Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds').

[50] Monture-Angus, Thunder in My Soul (n 3) 177–78.

[51] Elizabeth Spelman, Inessential Woman: Problems of Exclusion in Feminist Thought (Women's Press 1990) 133–34.

requires us to study aspects of identities and their interactions closely and perhaps also disparately, analysing the constituent group identities for their individual and associated impact. In another way, it asks us to take a holistic view of identities by pressing on integrity. However, intersectionality embodies exactly this double-edged character. It emphasizes both complexity and completeness at the same time. Explanatory accounts of same and different patterns of group disadvantage are analysed in as much depth as possible. But they are not lumped together or understood in a piecemeal way. Intersectionality insists on considering them as a whole. Integrity supports complexity by providing the lens of completeness through which it is to be seen. Thus, integrity provides the epistemic perspective of wholeness for understanding the complex patterns of group disadvantage in line with their ontological experience.

In this way, integrity in intersectionality underscores that people should be treated just as they are. It fights the invisibility imposed on intersectional groups by making their oppression be seen for what it is, rather than just as a sum or fragments of experiences. As Davis declares: 'we [Black women] have a right to be who we are. We have a right to emerge together from the historically imposed invisibility to which we have been subjected.'[52] Sachs J makes a similar statement in the context of discrimination law:

> The acknowledgment and acceptance of difference is particularly important in our country where group membership has been the basis of express advantage and disadvantage. The development of an active rather than a purely formal sense of enjoying a common citizenship depends on recognising and accepting people as they are.[53]

Integrity as being seen for what you are has been particularly relevant in the context of disability discrimination. Viewed as insufficient and lacking, disabled people fight the negative portrayal of their identities by substituting it with a positive assertion of the disabled body and life as complete. The use of the language and meaning of integrity undercuts the notions of disabled life as incomplete, abnormal, or deficient. It allows a disabled person to affirm her identity as a whole person.[54] Thus, integrity guarantees the space for asserting respect for bodies and lives dissimilar to our own. It undercuts the pejorative and patronizing way of looking at others and gives voice to the richness of the human condition and experience, specifically by valuing disability and disabled life. It allows for breaking through the essentialist prism of 'normal' and provides a lens for respecting identities that are complex and diverse. The relevance of integrity in the context of disability illuminates its appeal in relation to other personal characteristics, especially when they intersect.

[52] Angela Y Davis, 'Women of Color at the Center: Selections from the Third National Conference on Women of Color and the Law: Keynote Address' (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1175, 1177.

[53] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (SACC) [134] (emphasis supplied).

[54] United Nations Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (opened for signature 30 March 2007, entered into force 3 May 2008), art 17.

Integrity also provides the opportunity and basis for groups like Black women to break through their image as victims and instead self-define themselves as whole and powerful. Jung recounts this process as: 'Conscious realization or the bringing together of the scattered parts [which] is in one sense an act of the ego's will, but in another sense [a] spontaneous manifestation of the self, which was always there'.[55] Similarly, Harris explains integrity as the will and creativity for groups like Black women to be masters of their destiny rather than victims of oppressions which undermine them. Because only they experience their multiple identities as an integrated whole, integrity is seen as an empowering tool for disempowered groups to define and fight their disadvantage. Thus, Black women use the idea of integrity in intersectionality to reconstruct their image 'as powerful, independent subjects'—resolute, resilient, and more than just women, poor, Black, mothers, wives, labourers, or slaves.[56] In the final analysis, integrity in intersectionality rejects viewing intersectional groups like Black women as simply '"multiply-burdened" entities subject to a multiplicity of oppression, discrimination, pain and depression' but those characterized by 'a multiplicity of strength, love, joy . . . and transcendence that flourishes despite adversity'.[57] Integrity humanizes the subjectivity of its intersectional subjects by appreciating them as a whole, as themselves, and as more than just objects for critical inquiry.

1.4 Context

The intersectional disadvantage associated with identities is a product of context. While Blacks and Muslims may not be disadvantaged as Blacks and Muslims in Nigeria and Tunisia respectively, they are disadvantaged as racial and religious minorities in the US and Europe. The reference to disadvantage associated with particular identities is thus not a universal claim but true of particular contexts. This holds for intersectional identities just the same. The demonization of Black women's hair and Muslim women's headscarves, while rife in contexts like the US and Europe, may not be so apparent in Nigeria or Tunisia. Other kinds of intersectional disadvantages might travel more easily. Dalit women in the UK face many of the disadvantages they face in India. Intersectional disadvantage thus is as much a product of intersecting identities and patterns of disadvantage as it is of contexts in which it exists.

[55] CG Jung, Psyche and Symbol (Violet Staub de Laszlo (ed), RFC Hull (trans), PUP 1958) 214.

[56] Deborah K King, 'Multiple Jeopardy, Multiple Consciousness: The Context of a Black Feminist Ideology' (1998) 14 Signs 42, 72 (hereafter King, 'Multiple Jeopardy').

[57] Wing, 'Brief Reflections' (n 37) 196 (emphasis in original).

What makes up context is many things. As May describes, it includes 'contexts of structural inequality, affective economies, ideological forces, history, social location, material structures, philosophical norms and more'.[58] Context comprises of more than just processes of identity formation and immediate patterns of disadvantage, and includes knowledge of how identities and disadvantage associated with them operate within the historical, social, legal, economic, ideological, national, and transnational frames. In this way, context itself is intersectionally constituted. This intersectional context then provides a 360-degree or a multidimensional view of intersectional disadvantage that goes beyond the rubric of identities and disadvantage and into the environment in which they exist. It thus unravels the background conditions in which intersectional disadvantage ensues.

Context also helps go beyond generalizations and into the specific circumstances of groups and individuals within the groups. According to Catharine MacKinnon: 'That the location of departure and return for the analysis is on the ground, with the experience of a specific group, this group in particular, and not in universal generalizations or in classifications or abstractions in the clouds, even ones as potentially potent as race and sex, is the point [of intersectionality]'.[59] Collins and Bilge reflect a similar understanding: 'intersectionality as an analytical tool means contextualizing one's arguments, primarily by being aware that particular historical, intellectual, and political contexts shape what we think and do'.[60] They thus identify 'social context' as one of the core tenets of intersectionality, which grounds the intersectional analysis in structural, cultural, disciplinary, and interpersonal domains. Deborah King too recognizes that 'the relative significance of race, sex, or class in determining the conditions of Black women's lives is neither fixed nor absolute but, rather, is dependent on the socio-historical context and the social phenomenon under consideration. These interactions also produce what to some appears a seemingly confounding set of social roles and political attitudes among Black women.'[61]

Hancock refers to this as a kind of 'situational contingency'. In particular, she explains this in reference to the idea of choice and integrity. She argues that one way to understand intersectionality would be to imagine it as multiple criss-crossing forces which compel individuals to live their lives as warring souls. But, in fact, people's 'quotidian choices between analytically distinct multiple identities . . . reflect the consistency of an integrated identity, not an analytically fractured multiple category identity.'[62] In other words, Hancock uses the idea of choice for explaining that despite the multiple axes of oppression which afflict people, individuals make [58] May, Pursuing Intersectionality (n 27) 99.

[59] Catharine A MacKinnon, 'Intersectionality as Method: A Note' (2013) 38 Signs 1019, 1028.
[60] Patricia Hill Collins and Sirma Bilge, Intersectionality (Polity Press 2016) 28 (hereafter Collins and Bilge, Intersectionality).
[61] King, 'Multiple Jeopardy' (n 56) 49.
[62] Hancock, An Intellectual History (n 24) 113.

everyday choices about how they relate back and respond to those, and that is what makes the full situational context of their lived intersectional reality. For example, Muslim women's headscarves are symbolic of this sort of situational contingency of intersectionality where their position defined by forces of racism and sexism does not always imply oppression when they don the headscarf. But the insistence on seeing the choice of wearing the hijab as either a challenge to Western hegemony or coercive oppression misses the particular and sophisticated contexts that frame Muslim women's choices and lives. Their continuous negotiation with systems of power defines the actual situational context in which that choice is made, which symbolizes their intersectional position.

To this, Hancock adds the idea of 'time contingency' which 'marshals the continuities of structures of racism, sexism, classism, and homophobia while noting episodic interventions that may change in particular Black women's positionality and opportunity structure in their reference to "temporarily class-privileged Black women"'.[63] She thus warns against sweeping generalizations which discount the privileges members within certain groups come to enjoy over time and, thus, simply using membership in a group as a touchstone for suffering intersectional discrimination.

The need for what Hancock calls contingency or, more broadly, intersectional context is then one of specificity, which reflects the actuality of the intersectional disadvantage rather than some pre-packaged version of what it is like. It feeds into discrimination law's tort-like model which has an interest in assessing each situation most closely in relation to a broader category of wrongs but having its own unique specificities. It also reminds us that wrongs, especially of discrimination, take place outside of and beyond what come to be the narrow adversarial contexts of disputed claims. Appreciation of this broader intersectional context allows us not only to do discrimination law better in particular cases but to do it at all: because discrimination, like intersectionality, is nothing but a product of context. Sandra Fredman captures this aptly:

> Anti-discrimination law is necessarily a response to particular manifestations of inequality, which are themselves deeply embedded in the historical and political context of a given society. Discrimination laws are only effective if they are moulded to deal with the types of inequality which have developed in the society to which they refer.[64]

Context thus becomes both a methodological imperative and a substantive tool for understanding intersectional discrimination. Neither intersectionality nor

[63] Ibid 115.
[64] Fredman, Discrimination Law (n 32) 38.

discrimination law have a place aside from the actual discriminatory practices and contexts to which the theory and praxis of each refer.

In sum, the application of intersectional thinking in a specific context is a complex and unique process. The explanations of intersectionality will look different because of the different intersectional contexts which go beyond simply the difference in the identities intersectionality works with. Thus, explanations of intersectionality of Black women in the US will be different from Black women in Europe, where raciality does not immediately or does not only take on the historical context of slavery in the same way as in the US; or Black and indigenous women in South Africa who experienced settler colonialism in the reverse; and even newly arrived 'Black' immigrant women in the US who may not be deemed Black in their own countries. But they may all have something shared amongst themselves and with, as Hancock says, the 'intersectionality-like thinking' of other groups in different contexts. Section 3 below explores how these contextual analogies can be made in the context of Dalit women in India.

1.5 Transformation

Intersectionality aims to accomplish many things. As a form of critical inquiry, it seeks to challenge the received wisdom about identities and the disadvantage associated with them as running along a single categorial axis. It furnishes the basis for understanding, and hence including, multiple standpoints in identity politics, social movements, and social institutions with the aim of making them more inclusive and effective. This is an epistemic project. It enhances our knowledge of identity categories and their intersections, the resulting complexity of disadvantage, and the context in which they operate. It thus uncovers a certain blind spot in our normative conception of the world by illuminating its complexity.

Intersectionality also serves the ontological aim of giving space and voice for multiple identities to exist and thrive. It enhances the recognition and representation of those belonging to multiple disadvantaged groups. By allowing intersectional groups and their disadvantage to be seen as a whole and for what it is, intersectionality acknowledges the ontological plurality in people's existence and experiences.

The epistemic and ontological aims naturally flow into one another. As Sara Salem helpfully remarks: 'The aim of intersectionality is to listen to the voices of women and men on their own terms, in order to piece together narratives and unpack experiences that can help in understanding social life'.[65] In recognizing intersectional experiences we allow them to exist and be self-defined, and in allowing them to exist and self-define, we recognize them for what they are. Epistemic understanding and ontological plurality thus reinforce each other in intersectionality theory.

[65] Sara Salem, 'Feminist Critique and Islamic Feminism: The Question of Intersectionality' (2013) 1 The Postcolonialist.

Intersectional praxis on the other hand is defined by these aims, as well as the aim of redressing intersectionality and the broader aim of transcending it. Those who use intersectionality as a tool of social reform use it with the purpose of removing the intersectional disadvantage the theory seeks to uncover. These efforts aim to break the cycle of the patterns of group disadvantage which afflict those belonging to multiple disadvantaged groups.

As Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall explain, what binds these diverse and ambitious aims of intersectionality theory and praxis is ultimately 'a motivation to go beyond mere comprehension of intersectional dynamics to transform them'.[66] Hancock identifies this as: '[i]ntersectionality's will to progressive social transformation [that] is indisputable throughout its history'.[67] She thus posits: '[i]ntersectionality challenges scholars and activists alike to partake in an analytic shift that transforms the questions to be asked, the evidence to be considered, and the methods with which we analyze it'.[68]

This book shares the transformative vision of intersectionality. Its immediate concern is to render redressable claims of intersectional discrimination. But it feeds into the larger and more emancipatory aim of intersectionality to transform the creation, sustenance, and reproduction of intersectional disadvantage. In this process, it hopes to transform discrimination law or law more generally, to attend to those who are multiply disadvantaged. It is thus premised on the conviction that:

> the reformist dimensions of intersectionality embodied interventions that addressed the marginalization of, for example, Black women plaintiffs, [and are] coextensive with a more radical critique of law premised in part on understanding how it reified and flattened power relationships into unidimensional notions of discrimination. Antidiscrimination doctrine and political discourses predicated on feminism and antiracism certainly do not exhaust the terrain of intersectional erasure, marginalization, and contestation.[69]

In this way, the project of realizing intersectionality in discrimination law, like intersectionality itself, pursues transformative goals that go beyond the successes of individual and specific claims of intersectional discrimination. In particular, the aim of transformation goes beyond the emancipation of Black women. It includes everyone, in that it hopes to eradicate all intersectional disadvantage and not just [66] Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies' (n 13) 786.

[67] Ange-Marie Hancock, 'Intersectionality's will Toward Social Transformation' (2015) 37 New Political Science 620, 626.
[68] Ibid 622.
[69] Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies' (n 13) 791.

that of Black women. Even Black feminist scholarship frames intersectionality in these terms. This is reflected as early as 1896 when, upon the formation of the National Association of Colored Women's Club, their chosen motto was 'Lifting As We Climb'. It echoed the commitment of Black feminists to the uplifting of all sisters and indeed all dispossessed. Smith shared this all-inclusive vision for Black feminism in 1984 when she wrote:

> I have often wished I could spread the word that a movement committed to fighting sexual, racial, economic and heterosexist oppression, not to mention one which opposes imperialism, anti-Semitism, the oppressions visited upon the physically disabled, the old and the young, at the same time that it challenges imminent nuclear destruction, is the very opposite of narrow.[70]

Similarly, Austin urged 'Black female minority scholars to use their positions and their skills to promote the social and political standing of all minority women'.[71] King identified '[t]he necessity of addressing all oppressions [as] one of the hallmarks of black feminist thought'.[72] Crenshaw reiterated these commitments in her 1989 piece where she laid down the goal for intersectionality: 'to facilitate the inclusion of marginalized groups for whom it can be said: "When they enter, we all enter" '.[73] As she further clarified in her 1991 piece, the focus on the race and sex of Black women was only meant to highlight 'the need to account for multiple grounds of identity when considering how the social world is constructed'.[74] The case of Black women was thus illustrative rather than the whole of intersectionality. The whole of intersectionality's concern has been a complete and substantive transformation of all the relationships of power, structures of subordination, and systems of domination which disadvantage people on the basis of their multiple group identities.

These, then, were the five principal strands which run through intersectionality literature and make up the framework of the theory. By no means exhaustive or final, the framework is particularly relevant for the purposes of discrimination law and for the project of translating intersectionality theory into a redressable category of intersectional discrimination. But before turning to apply the framework to discrimination law, it is important to consider what criticisms have been levelled against it. It is useful to identify and respond to them to further clarify the framework, going beyond the apparent and uncontroversial aspects and querying some [70] Smith (ed), Home Girls (n 25) 257–58.

[71] Regina Austin, 'Sapphire Bound!' (1989) Wisconsin Law Review (Fall 1989) 539 (emphasis supplied) (hereafter Austin, 'Sapphire Bound!').
[72] King, 'Multiple Jeopardy' (n 56) 45 (emphasis supplied).
[73] Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing' (n 1) 167.
[74] Crenshaw, 'Mapping' (n 14) 1245.

of its underlying premises like its reliance on identity categories and identity politics. The next section sets out this defence.

2. A Defence

In the intervening decades since 1989, 'the burgeoning field of intersectionality studies' has continued to develop alongside a burgeoning field of intersectionality critiques.[75] These critiques have been far reaching, querying every aspect of intersectionality at the conceptual and practical level. Conceptually, intersectionality is attacked as lacking both depth and breadth. Depth-wise intersectionality is seen as too shallow in its reliance on identity-categories. This critique unfolds severally. Intersectionality is considered as addressing mainly locational, rather than material, structural, and relational systems of power. In particular, it is said to have ignored considerations of poverty and class, which sit uncomfortably against static cultural understandings of identity-categories like race and sex. Intersectionality is also seen as too categorial and essentialist in its assumption that independent identity categories exist and intersect, rather than being constantly in flux. In this way, it is considered exclusionary and not truly representative of disadvantages which defy intersectionality's linear view of identities. Intersectionality thus assumes away the categorial distinction between identities instead of challenging it. Moreover, intersectionality potentially suffers from the infinite regress problem that splinters identity categories into ever smaller sub-groups incapable of saying anything meaningful about structural disadvantage. It is viewed as too experiential and individual-centric to be a useful tool for group struggles. The point of these identity-related critiques is to show that intersectionality's conceptual reliance on identity categories is ultimately ineffective in carrying out the radical and transformative aims of the theory, which include transcending identity politics and group disadvantage.

Practically, even if all its theoretical challenges are met, intersectionality is critiqued for being toothless in actually realizing the vision it espouses. Not only do its legal roots limit the possibility of challenging law's deep-seated and narrow assumptions about identity and disadvantage, but there is also no methodological clarity in actually using intersectionality as a critical theory or as an instrument of social change beyond the strictures of law.

Similarly, breadth-wise, intersectionality is considered too narrow, focussed on the 'extreme' example of Black women, and hence having little of the generalizable and normative qualities supposed of a theory. Intersectionality, in its best form, is reduced to a rhetorical tool without any analytic traction or global appeal.

[75] Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies' (n 13).

So voluminous and vociferous are these challenges that, as May remarks, '[i]ntersectionality critiques have become something of their own genre—a form so flourishing, at times it seems critique has become a primary means of taking up the concept and its literatures'.[76] Thus, intersectionalists have had to not only develop and advance intersectionality on its own terms, but also, as a matter of priority, defend it from the onslaught. The recently published first set of monographs on the subject do this comprehensively and convincingly. Patricia Hill Collins and Sirma Bilge's Intersectionality (2016), Ange-Marie Hancock's Intersectionality: An Intellectual History (2016), Anna Carastathis' Intersectionality: Origins, Contestations, Horizons (2016), and Vivian M May's Pursuing Intersectionality, Unsettling Dominant Imaginaries (2015), provide formidable responses in defence of intersectionality's theory and praxis, in addition to scores of articles with pointed replies to every challenge. I do not mean to rehash the credible defences offered in these accounts. But I do wish to reiterate some of these defences, especially from the standpoint of discrimination law, because it is useful for the present project to do so. In particular, I wish to point out the shared, limited, but plausible identity-basis of intersectionality and discrimination law; and the general appeal of intersectionality theory beyond the context of Black women in the United States. Section 3 considers the latter. In this section, I want to consider the tension which exists between intersectionality, its reliance on identity categories, and its relationship with identity politics. This tension is at the heart of multiple critiques and its resolution, I argue, lies in recognizing the middle ground that intersectionality inhabits in both working with and being critical of identity categories and identity politics (section 2.1). This middle ground is one shared with discrimination law in its reliance on the construct of grounds (section 2.2). Neither intersectionality's reliance on identities nor discrimination law's reliance on grounds should detract us from addressing complex forms of disadvantage defined as broadly as possible, going beyond identity politics itself.

2.1 Intersectionality and Identity

The strongest theoretical challenge to intersectionality comes from the post-structural and Marxist critiques. As identified above, three challenges are particularly poignant: intersectionality's emphasis on social and cultural over material and structural inequalities; its overreliance on identity categories; and the infinite regress problem. The first critique considers intersectionality to be limited to the categories of race and sex, thus failing to engage with other categories like sexuality, weight, nationality, ethnicity, language, and class. For example, Crenshaw's work has been critiqued for: 'the wholesale abandonment of addressing how factors beyond race and sex shape Black women's experiences of violence [which] demonstrates the shortcomings of intersectionality to capture the sheer diversity of actual experiences of women of colour'.[77] The complaint is that, in keeping intersectional analysis limited to too few (two) and 'cultural' categories (like race and sex) alone, intersectionality falls short of its own promise of revealing truly complex systems of domination and structures of power. Even if one agrees that Crenshaw and other intersectionalists did echo, for example, the relevance of class inequality in examining systems of dominations, their class-consciousness was inevitably compromised by their primary focus on providing a 'total' account of oppressions defined primarily, if not exclusively, by social or cultural identities like sex and race.[78] According to this critique, material analysis has never been concretely pursued within intersectionality, given the lack of a conceptual framework for understanding the economic or redistributive forms of domination.

[76] May, Pursuing Intersectionality (n 27) 98.

These critiques overstate the use of race and sex in intersectionality as giving epistemic priority to certain categories over forms of analyses, which are structural and multi-dimensional; while at the same time underplay how intersectionality pursues, for example, class analysis even if not on the same terms as, say, Marxist feminism. Class, poverty, material inequalities, and redistributive concerns have been writ large in intersectionality.[79] Angela Davis' Women, Race and Class (1981) and Spelman's Inessential Woman (1990) specifically interrogated not just the dynamics of race and sex but also class in entrenching Black women's disadvantage. Similarly, Austin led by example the 'research project based on the concrete material and legal problems of Black women'.[80] Thus, Austin not only charted similar and different patterns of group disadvantage between Black women on the one hand, and white women and Black men on the other, but also between groups of poor Black women and middle-class Black women, and Black teens and Black adults. Social movements like the Combahee River Collective kept material concerns at the heart of their agendas for improving the lives of Black women.[81] The bait to make intersectionality more class-aware, then, overlooks its extant resistance to capitalism and imperialism in the way it has been formulated and applied. Although class may not have been studied in exactly the same terms as social construction of 'identities' like race and sex, it has been a key component in examining how race is genderized and gender is racialized within conditions of material [77] Nash, 'Re-thinking Intersectionality' (n 28) 9.

[78] Joanne Conaghan, 'Intersectionality and the Feminist Project in Law' in Emily Grabham, Davina Cooper, Jane Krishnadas, and Didi Herman (eds), Intersectionality and Beyond: Law, Power and the Politics of Location (Routledge Cavendish 2009) 17.

[79] See esp Kelly Coogan-Gehr, 'The Politics of Race in US Feminist Scholarship: An Archaeology' (2011) 37 Signs 83, 95.

[80] Austin, 'Sapphire Bound!' (n 71) 546.

[81] The Combahee River Collective, 'A Black Feminist Statement' in Linda Nicholson (ed), The Second Wave: A Reader in Feminist Theory (Routledge 1997).

inequality. For example, while Scales-Trent studied Black women's position in the US as defined by 'disabilities of Blacks and the disabilities which inhere in their status as women', her research was informed by their material inequality, including the fact of being the lowest paid, least employed, and most poor group as compared to white women, Black men, and white men.[82] Class, especially poverty, has thus acted as the authoritative foil which has shaped the accounts of intersections in intersectionality theory.

Just as with class, analyses of structures and relationships of power have been central to intersectionality from early days. Austin's incisive critique of the decision in Chambers v Omaha Girls Club[83] illustrates this central focus. In Chambers, a US district court had upheld the employer's decision to dismiss a young unmarried Black pregnant woman for being a negative role model to Black teenagers at the Girls Club. Austin criticized the Court's condemnation of the choices of young Black women, rather than the structures which led them to this Hobson's choice between difficult teenage years and early pregnancy and single motherhood. Austin presented a multi-layered interdisciplinary account of evidence which revealed how identity categories like race, sex, gender, class, and age interacted with the lack of equal education, employment, and healthcare to severely curtail valuable life choices for Black teenagers and young adults. In the same vein, Crenshaw explained violence against Black women as a product of the interaction of Black women's multiple identities with multiple systems of power. She grouped these systems of power into three: structural, political, and representational. She built from the ground up an account of how each of these exacerbated the incidence, obscuring, and dismissal of routinized patterns of violence against Black women at home and beyond. Crenshaw's recent contribution on mass incarceration of minority women tows this familiar line.[84]

As I highlighted in the last section, intersectionality is interested in the simultaneity of similarities and differences between identity categories because of the social, cultural, political, and material inequalities organized around them. Identity categories like race and sex are thus meant to provide a foot in the door for understanding disadvantage, which in turn is understood broadly in terms of institutional, structural, and relational systems of power in the relevant historical, social, political, and economic context.

Post-structural critiques find even this provisional reliance on identity categories problematic. The problem for them lies not in the ignorance of certain identity categories, or their interaction with systems of powers, but in the use of [82] Judy Scales-Trent, 'Black Women and the Constitution: Finding our Place, Asserting our Rights' (1989) 24 Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 9 (hereafter Scales-Trent, 'Black Women and the Constitution').

[83] 834 F 2d 697 (8th Cir 1987) (USCA).

[84] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'From Private Violence to Mass Incarceration: Thinking Intersectionally About Women, Race, and Social Control' (2012) 59 UCLA Law Review 1418.

categories at all. Intersectionality is seen as belying its anti-essentialist roots, which consider the social construction of identities like race and sex to be inherently inadequate and exclusionary. Instead of challenging the use of identity categories per se, intersectionality is criticized for fetishizing identity categories by pointing out their intersections alone, rather than abandoning allegiance to them all together. The theory is ultimately seen as too conservative and inconsistent with its radical roots in anti-essentialism and its avowed aim of social reform.[85]

Diametrically opposite to this runs the infinite regress problem which troubles advocates of identity politics. Intersectionality is feared for splintering identities into ever so small sub-groups which have little in common. Mapping intra-group differences can thus devolve into nothing more than collating disparate accounts of individual experiences—annihilating the basis of groups as the primary sites of organizational politics. Within this critique, intersectionality is considered too open-ended and uncontainable, such that it is buried under its own weight of identity politics.

I think intersectionality's own position lies somewhere in the middle. Whilst post-structural critiques overstate intersectionality's provisional reliance on identity categories and underemphasize its critical outlook on them, identity-based critiques misunderstand intersectionality's inclination to map differences and gloss over the relationship of individual experiences with broader patterns of group disadvantage.

The insistence on recognizing Black women's experiences as defined by both race and sex does not perforce sanction an uncritical and rigid understanding of race and sex. In fact, part of intersectionality's theoretical project is to reorganize the boundaries regulating the social meaning of being of a particular race or sex to include those who have been previously excluded at the altar of essentialist definitions. This is also evident in the discussion on Dalit feminism in the next section—the claim being that intersectionality or intersectionality-like thinking accommodates an inclusive and fluid understanding of caste and sex both. In that sense, intersectionality takes on board the post-structural insight and insists on a critical treatment of identity categories. It thus embraces a kind of transversal identity politics, which lies in the middle of, and as an alternative to, both universalistic or assimilationist and abortive identity politics.[86] Crenshaw sums it up as:

> Recognizing that identity politics takes place at the site where categories intersect thus seems more fruitful than challenging the possibility of talking about categories at all. Through an awareness of intersectionality, we can better [85] Leslie McCall, 'The Complexity of Intersectionality' in Grzanka (ed), Intersectionality (n 2); Barbara Risman, 'Gender as a Social Structure: Theory Wrestling with Activism' (2004) 18 Gender and Society 429.

[86] Nira Yuval-Davis, 'What is 'Transversal Politics'?' (1999) 12 Soundings 94.

> acknowledge and ground the differences among us and negotiate the means by which these differences will find expression in constructing group politics.[87]

Intersectionality's provisional reliance on identity categories is meant to be strategic and inclusive at the same time. It is strategic in that intersectionality refers to identity categories as useful markers of inequality which can be transformed and reclaimed as tools of resistance. Intersectionality thus furthers the epistemological project of uncovering and redressing the disadvantage associated with identities and, at the same time, creates space for the ontological project of asserting identities as 'ideologically powerful, experientially salient (but not essentialist), and as fluid'.[88] In contrast with the post-structural critique which imagines identity nihilism as its logical victory, intersectionality is a project with transformation by reclamation at its heart. Scales-Trent called this a project of 'self-definition'—of asserting rights as Black women by rejecting the definitions imposed by the powerful and setting forth our own.[89] This is why the Black feminist critique insisted on including Black feminist standpoints in mainstream feminism, the civil rights movement, and discrimination law, and thus transforming, rather than transcending, these movements and spaces. Much of intersectionality can be understood in terms not of renouncing but of rehabilitating identity politics.

One way in which intersectionality does that is by using individual and concrete accounts of intra-group experiences as always relating to broader patterns of group disadvantage. Intersectionality shows a strong and balanced interest in both individual as well as coalitional implications of identity categories. Individual experiences of people within sub-groups, like Black women, are important not just by themselves, but because they furnish concrete and instructive evidence of wider group-based patterns. The range of experiences within groups also helps to prevent making a certain kind of experience archetypical of the disadvantage suffered by all group members. This is what is meant by saying that intersectionality is concerned with both the universal and the particular. And this is why intersectionality dodges the infinite regress problem—because its concentration on minute and specific differences between individuals in specific groups and sub-groups always relates back to those groups and sub-groups to which they belong in terms of sameness and difference. An infinitely fractured vision of intersectionality thus remains speculative in light of a grounded and purposeful invocation of group identities.

In any case, intersectionality was never meant to be a totalizing theory of identity or a totalizing theory of any kind at all. It leaves enough space for other theories and methodologies, including exclusively post-structural, Marxist, and those wholly imbedded in identity politics, to chart their own course to social justice. For itself though, it has chosen a reflexive middle ground, which is both pragmatic and transformative at the same time. Evelyn Glenn describes this standpoint fittingly:

[87] Crenshaw, 'Mapping' (n 14) 1299.
[88] May, Pursuing Intersectionality (n 27) 113.
[89] Scales-Trent, 'Black Women and the Constitution' (n 82) 43.

> As I struggle to formulate an integrated analysis of gender, race, and class, I have relied on a historical comparative approach that incorporates political economy while taking advantage of the critical insights made possible by post-structuralism. I use a social constructionist framework, which considers how race, gender, and class are simultaneously constituted in specific locations and historical periods through 'racialized' and 'genderized' social structure and discourse. I try to inhabit that middle ground . . . by looking at the ways in which race, gender, and class are constituted relationally.[90]

2.2 Intersectionality, Identity, and Discrimination Law

As a final point, it is useful to note that intersectionality shares the reflexive middle ground—of working with and being critical of identity categories—with discrimination law. Like intersectionality, discrimination law is based on identities or 'designations that are listed as prohibited grounds in anti-discrimination laws'.[91] Prohibited grounds such as race, religion, caste, sex, gender, disability, sexual orientation, age etc. are chosen based on a host of factors like immutability, historical prejudice, political powerlessness, and fundamental choice.[92] Much like intersectional identities, grounds are designated not just for their own sake or for the sake of discrimination law, but because they serve as relevant 'markers of the dynamics of power'.[93] In this way, grounds in discrimination law (and identities in intersectionality) are self-limiting: they are counted as grounds or identities because they signify patterns of group disadvantage which are historical, substantial, pervasive, and abiding.[94] So grounds like race, gender, disability, and sexual orientation protect groups like Blacks, women, those with disabilities, and gay people. Intersectional discrimination requires the protection of groups like Black women and disabled gay people who belong to groups otherwise protected and on the basis of grounds which are either already recognized or can be argued as analogous to recognized grounds. Recognition of their intersectional disadvantage in the form

[90] Evelyn N Glenn, 'The Social Construction and Institutionalization of Gender and Race: An Integrative Framework' in Myra M Ferree, Judith Lorber, and Beth B Hess (eds), Revisioning Gender (Sage 1998) 32.

[91] Suzanne B Goldberg, 'Identity-based Discrimination and the Barriers to Complexity' in Dagmar Schiek and Anna Lawson (eds), European Union Non-Discrimination Law and Intersectionality (Ashgate 2011) 177.

[92] Robert Post, 'Prejudicial Appearances: The Logic of American Antidiscrimination Law' (2000) 88 California Law Review 1.

[93] Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds' (n 49) 58.

[94] Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (n 32) 35–38.

of intra- and inter-group similarities and differences necessarily requires neither adding new grounds nor recognizing new groups per se in intersectionality or discrimination law. Thus, the fears imagined by the DeGraffenreid Court—of discrimination law devolving into a 'many-headed Hydra' and 'opening the hackneyed Pandora's box' to any kind of identity—remain unrealized and with good reason. Far from splintering identities into unrecognizable and unusable categories, the legal construct of grounds in discrimination law provides a site for thinking about individual and specific instances of intersectional discrimination within a wider context of grounds and groups and thus as a whole. Discrimination law, like intersectionality, furnishes this opportunity to assert the integrity of identities and experiences of discrimination suffered because of them. As Scales-Trent confirms: 'Thinking about and writing about the constitutional rights of black women [under the Equal Protection Clause which prohibits discrimination] has allowed me to pull those fragments of self back into a whole, focused and centered'.[95]

But, despite their reliance on identities or grounds, both intersectionality and discrimination law aim to do more than just provide adequate recognition, representation, and redress to disadvantaged groups. Their projects should be seen as much more ambitious, especially in terms of their redistributive, participative, and transformative aims. In the context of discrimination law, Fredman describes these overlapping dimensions as 'substantive equality', explained thus:

> First, it aims to break the cycle of disadvantage associated with status or outgroups. This reflects the redistributive dimension of equality. Secondly, it aims to promote respect for dignity and worth, thereby redressing stigma stereotyping, humiliation, and violence because of membership of an identity group. This reflects a recognition dimension. Thirdly, it should not exact conformity as a price of equality. Instead, it should accommodate difference and aim to achieve structural change. This captures the transformative dimension. Finally, substantive equality should facilitate full participation in society, both socially and politically. This is the participative dimension.[96]

Intersectionality's social justice aims are perhaps even wider than discrimination law's goal of furthering substantive equality because intersectionality travels further than the domain of law and spurs wider possibilities of transformation through social movements. But neither of their aims are simply identity related or subsumed by transcendence or transformation of identity politics. In fact, the point of recounting the shared identity-basis of intersectionality and discrimination law is to drive home the plausibility of the vast and transformative pursuits of intersectionality and discrimination law by relying on a provisional understanding of identities which is inclusive and fluid. Identity or grounds are just the points of departure for what intersectionality and discrimination law are seeking: the end goal being the appreciation and redress of disadvantage suffered by people on the basis of these.

[95] Scales-Trent, 'Black Women and the Constitution' (n 82) 42.
[96] Fredman, Discrimination Law (n 32) 25.

Of course, none of this denies the limitations of discrimination law, or even law per se, as a site for transformative politics and social justice. These limitations drawn up by Critical Legal Scholars are well known. The structure of discrimination law is highly formalistic, centred on adjudication, and triggered only ex-post by an individual claimant. The remedies, even if structural, are rather narrow, relating first and foremost to the specific claimant and fact situation at hand, and then only by extension to the broader group to which the claimant belongs. Added to these are difficulties in accessing—both in reality and ideologically—legal systems which literally operate from on high and are consequently too removed from some of the most insidious forms of discrimination like those captured by intersectionality. Discrimination law is thus considered too abstract to be able to truly relate to 'real people's real experiences'.[97] In fact, since many of Crenshaw's initial problems with discrimination law—of essentialism of grounds and the perception of discrimination as operating along a single-axis alone—continue to plague intersectionality, one is compelled to ask why they must continue to expend intellectual energy on intersectional discrimination anymore? Surely the resistance to reform is a sign that the idea of reform through law is itself misconceived. Postmodern scholarship makes this point forcefully.[98]

This book exhumes the project of realizing intersectionality in discrimination law practice by borrowing a healthy dose of scepticism from post-structuralism, post-modernism, and CLS. But it goes beyond what Harris calls their 'deconstructive excesses',[99] leading to total refutation of rights and identity politics, and towards reconstruction and transformation of these tools. This is the standpoint which reverberates through this book which hopes to make a small but significant contribution to rights scholarship by letting intersectional claimants, like the fat Black man in Lord Phillips' hypothetical scenario, succeed. Given the history of intersectionality's struggles and discrimination law's resistance, his success will be no mean feat. But, given the historical developments and current possibilities in the field recounted in the previous chapter, his claim is not a hopeless one either.

Thus, discrimination law need not be the only or even the primary site for engaging with intersectionality. Even for Crenshaw, whose earliest contribution in 1989 was concerned with the formal limits of discrimination law, it was but one of the ways in which she hoped and considered intersectionality to be relevant and applicable. It is with an appreciation of discrimination law's limited capacity to address intersectionality, and the limits of intersectionality itself, that either can be made useful at all.

[97] See, for this critique in relation to Canadian discrimination law, Pothier (n 49).

[98] Anthony E Cook, 'Reflections on Postmodernism' (1992) 26 New England Law Review 751; Allan C Hutchinson, 'Identity Crisis: The Politics of Interpretation' (1992) 26 New England Law Review 1173.

[99] Angela P Harris, 'The Jurisprudence of Reconstruction' (1994) 82 California Law Review 741.

Does any of this help make intersectionality an idea of general applicability beyond its limited context of Black feminism in the United States? There is no doubt that 'intersectionality' originated in this specific context. But Black women were not supposed to be its sole protectorate, nor were race and sex mandated as the only categories to serve it. In fact, intersectionality has become one of the most successful 'travelling' theories of our times.[100] It has transcended national and continental boundaries, cementing itself in South America, Africa, and Asia; expanded to analyses beyond race and sex, including caste, nationality, age, disability, sexuality etc.; and applied across disciplines of literature, sociology, anthropology, psychology, gender studies, economics, history etc. This chapter closes by pointing out the wide presence and omnipotence of intersectionality and intersectionality-like thinking which existed even before the locution travelled. Intersectional analyses have been present, borrowed, applied, and hence been relevant in discursive environments. The example of Dalit feminism in India shines a spotlight on this.

3. An Illustration

It is time to see what the framework of intersectionality, composed of the five strands described in section 1, yields. What is the nature of disadvantage revealed by the framework? That is, what does intersectional disadvantage look like? Before turning to the example of Dalit women to answer this question, a word about caste in India may be helpful.

Caste, like race, is a social construction that signifies an entrenched form of segregation and hierarchy. The caste system divides all Hindus into four principal 'varnas' or caste—Brahmin (priests) at the very top, followed by Kshatriya (warriors), Vaishya (merchants and farmers), and Shudra (menials). Each caste is further divided into several sub-castes. Those outside of the fourfold caste system are known as outcastes or 'Untouchables' or the 'Scheduled Castes' per the Constitution of India, or—as a matter of assertive pride and resistance—'Dalits', which means those who have been broken or suppressed.

Although seemingly based on division of occupational labour, caste is determined by heredity not choice, and thus is designated upon birth. There is no possibility of change or conversion from one caste into another. In fact, even conversion to other religions means that caste travels into those religions such that Dalits become Christian or Muslim Dalits upon conversion. The one exception to this is Buddhism which is meant to provide a wider berth for equality upon conversion. Nevertheless, by and large, caste as an ascription appears irreversible. This irreversibility is ensured by endogamy, or the practice of marrying within caste. Endogamy maintains the 'purity' of castes and thus supports and reinforces its hereditary character.[101]

[100] See, for a discussion on the 'travels' of intersectionality, Helma Lutz, Maria Teresa Herrera Vivar, and Linda Supik (eds), Framing Intersectionality: Debates on a Multi-Faceted Concept in Gender Studies (Ashgate 2011) (hereafter Lutz et al, Framing Intersectionality).

The caste system locks people not only into ascriptive caste identities but also into an interminable cycle of disadvantages associated with the caste hierarchy. Being outside the caste system, Dalits have suffered the worst consequences of it in terms of a lower social status, reduced cultural capital, a lack of economic security, diminished political power, and heightened aggression and violence.[102] Dalit women have suffered this broad-based casteism along with patriarchal domination. They are thus considered 'Dalits amongst the Dalits', whose position is worsened by multiple and intersecting forms of oppression relating to caste, gender, and class.[103]

This section highlights the intersectional thinking in the Dalit feminist discourse. Section 3.1 explores the intersectional roots of Dalit feminism in India. It shows how other categories like caste, religion, creed, nation, and region have shaped women's gendered identity in India. The mediation of sex or gender by other identity categories cements an inherently intersectional understanding of these categories in the Indian context. The section traces the development of postcolonial Dalit feminism against this background and in response to their exclusion from the mainstream upper-caste, middle-class ('Brahminical') feminism, and the patriarchal, anti-caste movement.

Section 3.2 argues that even as there are obvious differences in context and an absence of the term 'intersectionality' in the Dalit feminist discourse, the shared language and explanations of the respective positions of disadvantage of Black women and Dalit women reveal their common conceptual foundations. Both were [101] See, for a detailed account of caste, Nripendra K Dutt, Origin and Growth of Caste in India (vol 1, The Book Company 1931).

[102] There are of course notable exceptions to this, especially in relation to the rise of Dalit political parties like the Bahujan Samaj Party in the Indian state of Uttar Pradesh. For an analysis, see Radha Sarkar and Amar Sarkar, 'Dalit Politics in India: Recognition without Redistribution' (2016) 51 Economic and Political Weekly 14; Vivek Kumar, 'From Social Reform to Political Mobilisation: Changing Trajectory of Dalit Assertion in Uttar Pradesh' (2003) 53 Social Action 115.

[103] The term 'Dalit women' is used rather loosely, and hence inclusively. The position of women who are Dalit Christians and Dalit Muslims (or tribal and nomad women who remain at the fringes of the Dalit identity) cannot be squarely defined with reference to caste, gender, and class, without analysing the implications of religion (or tribe) separately. However, if we follow Galanter's associational view of caste, the composition of caste is characterised by a complex set of features including but not limited to religious features. 'Dalit' identity may then be extremely complex from within, such that the position of Dalit women can be studied taking their caste identity as simultaneously defined by multiple intersections and as intersecting with other identities. See Marc Galanter, 'The Religious Aspects of Caste: A Legal View' in DE Smith (ed), South Asian Politics and Religion (PUP 1966).

concerned with mapping the uniqueness of their positions as Dalit women and Black women, as well as what they shared with Dalit men and upper-caste women, and Black men and white women. They too use the dynamic of sameness and difference based on identity categories considered as a whole, to reveal broader patterns of group disadvantage with the aim of challenging and transforming such patterns. Though only one of them went on to develop intersectionality as intersectionality, their respective positions, rooted in their specific contexts, transcend contextual limitations, and confirm the global avail and normative fortitude of intersectionality-like thinking; and the usefulness of extending intersectionality as a framework developed in the context of Black feminism for understanding intersectional disadvantage and discrimination in diverse settings.

The overall takeaway is that marginalized discourses, whether of women or others, located anywhere in the world have or can resonate with intersectionality when they try to see patterns of group disadvantage associated with multiple identities as a whole. So, the present juxtaposition of Dalit feminism with Black feminism is not simply an attempt to illustrate an application of intersectionality, or even to show partnerships between postcolonial/Third World feminisms on the one hand and First World discourses on the other; it is also about the intersectional perspective of always looking for detailing, rather than simply the deployment of the locution. More importantly, it is about digging into accounts that provide a basis for pursuing intersectionality or discrimination law at all—of explicating the meaning of what we say when we say that individuals and groups suffered intersectional discrimination. Thus, in the end, this is an epistemic exercise which in turn supports an ontological or experiential one of understanding intersectional disadvantage with the purpose of relieving the lives that are suffering from such disadvantage.

3.1 Dalit Feminism

The roots of Black feminism's intersectional thinking lie in challenging the exclusionary tendencies in the feminist as well as the civil rights movement. Black feminists thus argued against an essentialist understanding of women and women's experiences as solely defined by sex or gender and in isolation of women's other identities of race, class, sexuality, disability, age etc. Similarly, they contested the monolithic category of Blacks inhabited by Black males, whose interests defined and trumped the interests of Black women in the civil rights movement.

In contrast, the intersectional thinking of Dalit feminists was inspired by a different legacy. For example, although they too had to confront the mainstream Brahminical feminism conceived mainly for upper-caste middle-class women, they had to do so against a backdrop of over-inclusive rather than exclusive rendering of sex and gender, populated by other categories of nationalism, community, religion, caste, class, region, and sexuality.[104] Thus, before charting the trajectory of Dalit feminism as a response to the mainstream feminist and anti-caste movements, it is useful to briefly understand the background in which it developed—one which Anupama Rao describes as being saturated with the discourse of gender in everyday life.[105]

Women's identity in India has been the chief architectural motif in the construction of other identity categories like caste, nation, region, class, sexuality, and religion.[106] Caste serves as the classic case for understanding this process of production and reproduction of other identities via sex or gender. Caste, which operates through endogamy, is based on a strict regulation of women's sexuality. Patriarchy controls the sexuality of Brahmin or upper-caste women by regulating it with notions of purity and chastity, and thereby prohibiting marriage outside caste, while conceiving of Dalit women as loose and promiscuous, and thus using their bodies as sites of sexual exploitation. Both upper-caste and lower-caste women serve as the gateways of the caste system, through which they are in turn subordinated and oppressed.[107]

Thus, women in India have not just been affected by their exclusion but also by their appropriated inclusion. While Western feminism had to be alerted that the 'insistence upon a subject for feminism obscures the "social and discursive production of identities"',[108] Indian feminists began with a diametrically opposite challenge—that of delineating the gendered identity of women by analysing women's central role in the social and discursive production of identities. Similarly, while Western feminism was criticized for relegating differences between women to the 'embarrassed et cetera',[109] Indian feminists had to struggle with discerning the category of women at all, from the confines of the 'unembarrassed et cetera' like caste, nation, region, class, and religion. As Nivedita Menon remarks: 'Women's movements in the global South thus never started with the idea of some subtract Woman that they later needed to complicate with more and more layers. This identity of Woman was from the start located within Nation and within communities of different sorts.'[110]

[104] Irene Gedalof, Against Purity: Rethinking Identity with Indian and Western Feminisms (Taylor and Francis 1999) 183, 201.

[105] Anupama Rao (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005) 20 (hereafter Rao, Gender and Caste).

[106] See, for another example, the relationship between gender and religion which frames Muslim women's subordination in India: Flavia Agnes, 'From Shah Bano to Kausar Bano: Contextualizing the "Muslim Woman" Within a Communalized Polity' in Ania Loomba and Ritty A Lukose (eds), South Asian Feminisms: Contemporary Interventions (DUP 2012).

[107] Vidyut Bhagwat, 'Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives—Some Critical Reflections' in PG Jogdand (ed), Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives (GPH 1995) (hereafter Bhagwat, 'Dalit Women in India').

[108] Iris M Young, 'Gender as Seriality: Thinking about Women as a Social Collective' (1994) 19 Signs 713, 715–16.

[109] Judith Butler, Gender Trouble (Routledge 1990) 143.

[110] Nivedita Menon, 'Is Feminism about 'Women'? A Critical View on Intersectionality from India' (2015) 50(17) Economic and Political Weekly 37, 38 (hereafter Menon, 'Is Feminism about 'Women'?').

Just as Dalit feminism set out to articulate their subjective position of subordination due to their gender, caste, and class, the mainstream or Brahminical feminism too had to work with a gendered identity of women in relation to their religious, caste, and class identities. This was because both upper-caste women and Dalit women were oppressed by 'casteist patriarchies'.[111] Caste identity thus became central to the understanding of gender and patriarchy for both mainstream feminists and Dalit feminists. This seemingly 'intersectional' analysis of gender, though, was limited to understanding one's own position of disadvantage rather than the engagement with the disadvantage of others. It meant that although Brahminical feminists appreciated their own caste oppression (for example, in terms of strict regulation of their sexuality and choice in marriage), they did not appreciate the difference between their position and the oppression of Dalit women (for example, the sexual exploitation of Dalit women by both upper-caste and Dalit men). Even if gender and caste impacted all women, they impacted women in qualitatively different ways. The exploration and articulation of this qualitative difference gave rise to the postcolonial discourse defined by multiple and competing feminisms, rather than a plural but unified sisterhood. Supriya Akerkar captures this pithily:

> Indeed the different fragmented contexts of struggle suggest to us that there can be no 'one' feminism in the 'Indian' context or one way of understanding or locating women's oppression. This means that the context itself suggests a need for a plural expression of feminism around women's multiple oppressions, viz, class, caste, ethnicity, gender, sexual preference, etc. In some ways, the diverse responses to the women's oppression and existence of diverse groups reflect this plural reality of women's oppression. However, it appears that these different perceptions have not led to a celebration of the plural practice of feminism.[112]

Dalit feminism came to the fore against this background. Beginning in the 1970s and gaining momentum in the 1980s and 1990s, it emerged as a response to the exclusions of mainstream feminist and anti-caste movements. The postcolonial mainstream or Brahminical feminism had systematically ignored the plight of Dalit women. Just as white women were burdened by the 'pedestal' and its implications, such as lack of employment opportunities, dependency, and undervalued household work, so too, upper-caste middle-class women considered themselves burdened by their image as '[t]he good woman, the chaste married wife/mother, empowered by a spiritual strength'.[113] They espoused causes that related to their [111] Tarabai Shinde, 'A Comparison between Women and Men: An Essay to Show Who's Really Wicked and Immoral, Women or Men?' in Rosalind O'Hanlon, A Comparison between Women and Men: Tarabai Shinde and the Critique of Gender Relations in Colonial India (OUP 1994).

[112] Supriya Akerkar, 'Theory and Practice of Women's Movement in India: A Discourse Analysis' (1996) 30(17) Economic and Political Weekly 2, 13–14.

[113] Samita Sen, 'Motherhood and Mothercraft: Gender and Nationalism in Bengal' (1993) 5(2) Gender and History 231, 232.

'status' vis-à-vis men, especially in relation to marriage, including concerns over consent, dowry, divorce, widowhood, inheritance, and domestic violence. These did not resonate with Dalit women who had a long history of internal critique and reform within Dalits and vis-à-vis Dalit men. By the end of colonial rule in 1947, Dalits had already popularized consent and choice in marriage, resisted dowry, and espoused marriage without priests and widow remarriage. Similarly, in the private sphere, though Dalit women were responsible for running the household just as upper-caste women were, they were neither pedestaled in their homes nor did they subscribe to pata puja or worshipping at the feet of their husbands. While they were domestically abused, they often retaliated against their husbands and families. At the same time, they had always occupied the public sphere since they had had to move out of their homes whether for accessing water from village wells, fetching logs for fire, or earning meagre wages for menial jobs. Yet, their employment was confined to degrading jobs meant only for 'Untouchables', like manual scavenging and cleaning of corpses, still receiving fewer wages than Dalit men for the same job. Coupled with their traditional duties of housekeeping, Dalit women considered themselves more 'overworked' than their male counterparts and upper-caste Hindu women.[114] They were ill-treated as the domestic servants of upper-caste women and sexually exploited by upper-caste men. Brahminical feminists had not just contributed to and in fact obscured this caste oppression, they had romanticized and overdetermined Dalit women's position: marriage reform was seen as a sign of equality, sexual exploitation was couched as sexual freedom, brave retaliation against sexual abuse was counted as evidence of power, and participation in precarious forms of employment was dubbed as an exercise of personal autonomy. Disregarded as lower-caste and misunderstood as more equal, Dalit women failed to make it into mainstream feminism in India.[115]

Nowhere is this more apparent than in the case of sexual assault and violence against Dalit women. The seminal case of Bhanwari Devi is instructive.[116] Bhanwari Devi was a grassroots worker employed as part of the Women's Development Project by the state of Rajasthan. She worked to convince local villagers to reject child marriage and had tried to frustrate the wedding of a nine-month-old girl in a powerful upper-caste Gurjar family in her village. In retaliation, she was gang raped by the upper-caste Gurjar men who penalized her for pursuing the cause against child marriage in their family. The District Judge who heard her rape complaint dismissed it on the basis that upper-caste men could not possibly have raped her, a Dalit woman. The issue flared up and was pursued by Indian feminists in the form of the demand for protection of women against sexual harassment at the workplace. They expedited their cause through public interest litigation in the Supreme Court of India. The Court began addressing the petition, which finally resulted in the Supreme Court Sexual Harassment in Workplace Guidelines in 1977 and Sexual Harassment of Women at Workplace Act in 2013 in these terms:

[114] Gail Omvedt, 'The Downtrodden among the Downtrodden: An Interview with a Dalit Agricultural Labourer' in Rao, Gender and Caste (n 105).

[115] See, for a longer analysis, Gabriel Dietrich, 'Dalit Movement and Women's Movements' in Rao, Gender and Caste (n 105) (hereafter Dietrich, 'Dalit Movement').

[116] Vishaka v State of Rajasthan (1997) 6 Supreme Court Cases 241 (Supreme Court of India).

> The immediate cause for the filing of this writ petition is an incident of alleged brutal gang rape of social worker in a village of Rajasthan. That incident is the subject matter of a separate criminal action and no further mention of it, by us, is necessary. The incident reveals the hazards to which a working woman may be exposed and the depravity to which sexual harassment can degenerate . . .[117]

The characterization of the petition stemming from Bhanwari Devi's gang rape as merely a case of sexual harassment (not then a crime), rather than rape (a crime under the Indian Penal Code) perpetrated on the basis of caste, signified the oversights of mainstream feminists and judges alike. Couching Bhanwari Devi's gang rape as a broader issue of 'gender equality', not only hijacks a case which really belonged to Dalit women but also fails to fulfil the feminist promise of realizing gender justice for all women in fact. Furthermore, neither the Supreme Court Guidelines nor the succeeding Act of 2013 addressed the situation of Dalit women like Bhanwari Devi, targeted not just as women but specifically as Dalit women. Without directly addressing the nature of intersectional harm involved in sexual assault and harassment against Dalit women, cases like Bhanwari Devi's continue to be mischaracterized (e.g. sexual assault such as rape devolving into sexual harassment defined as unwelcome sexual contact) and overlooked (as cases of both caste oppression and sexual discrimination at the same time). The feminist undertaking of Bhanwari Devi's case marks the persistent sidelining of caste as a gender issue.

This sidelining is mirrored in the anti-caste movement. The Dalit liberation movement began in the early 1900s. Since its inception, Dalit women were active participants along with Dalit men.[118] But while early protagonists like Bhimrao Ambedkar, Jyotirao Govindrao Phule, and Periyar EV Ramaswami were conscious of Dalit women and their presence in the anti-caste movement, Dalit women's exploitation was never centre stage in their anti-caste struggles. For example, though Ambedkar included and encouraged Dalit women to participate in Dalit liberation, his appreciation of Dalit women's concrete reality was often imagined only from the perspective of caste rather than patriarchy. This is noticeable in his grandest anti-caste essay, Annihilation of Caste (1936), where he exhibits his intersectional thinking as he remarks: 'Religion, social status, and property are all sources of power and authority which one man has to control the liberty of another.'[119]

[117] Ibid (emphasis supplied).

[118] Meenakshi Moon and Urmila Pawar have excavated this prolific, though largely overlooked, history of women's participation in the Ambedkarite movement. Meenakshi Moon and Urmila Pawar, Amihihi Itihaas Ghadawila: Ambedakari Chatatitil Streeyancha Sahabhag (Stree 1989).

[119] BR Ambedkar, Annihilation of Caste (Verso 2016) 230.

1898

Gender or patriarchy though, was not independently considered a source of power or authority that controlled Dalits especially Dalit women. Observations on patriarchy, where made, were too generalist ('traditional supremacy of man over woman') to be meaningful in explicating the Dalit women's position. The Dalit movement and its leaders were thus too preoccupied with caste to articulate the specific ways in which general and broad-based forms of oppression including patriarchy, poverty, and casteism impacted Dalit women in particular. The assumption was that Dalit women's struggles were the same as those of Dalit men and hence simply caste based; the annihilation of caste would automatically defeat patriarchy and classism.

The tendency to subsume the issues of Dalit women within broader caste struggles cemented itself in the post-Ambedkar years. While Dalit women shared all forms of caste oppression with Dalit men, they also suffered distinct forms of sexism at the hands of upper-caste men and Dalit men, which were both similar to and different from the sexism suffered by non-Dalit women. As Bhanwari Devi's case showed, rape and sexual abuse were specifically targeted at Dalit women as a form of patriarchal and caste domination over them, as well as caste domination over Dalit men as a tool for disciplining them or teaching them a lesson by exploiting their wives and daughters. Access to Dalit women was not deemed inconsistent with the practice of untouchability or other forms of caste-based segregation. At the same time, Dalit women suffered from wife battering and desertion by Dalit men. Although they shared their poverty with Dalit men, they were often poorer—eating last and hence the least in the household, earning far less than Dalit men for equal work, and seldom having land or material resources of their own. Dalit women were also passed over for leadership positions in Dalit organizations like Dalit Panthers, which gained a wide base in the 1970s. Barred from participation, their issues were left unrepresented in the Dalit struggle, which was rendered chiefly male in its postcolonial incarnation. Dalit women were thus left 'doubly deserted' by both the women's and the anti-caste movement.[120]

The exclusion from the contours of both feminist and Dalit movements became key to the articulation of the Dalit women's position. Dalit feminism thus emerged as a response to the 'masculinization of dalithood and a savarnisation of womanhood'[121] ('savarna' meaning upper or high caste). In highlighting that Dalit women could not be collapsed into the unqualified category of 'women' in the women's movement or 'Dalit' in the caste movement, Dalit feminism sought to create an alternate paradigm that more accurately represented and explained the realities of Dalit women. It was a plea neither for inclusion nor for representation but to re-examine the very core of these discourses—of how to conceptualize caste and gender subordination. Gopal Guru flagged the need for Dalit women to talk 'differently' in one of the first essays highlighting the reality of Dalit women's oppression, based on the 'external' (Brahminical forces regulating the issues of women) and 'internal' factors (the patriarchal domination within the Dalit movement).[122] Sharmila Rege further substantiated the salience of the Dalit feminist discourse by advancing the 'Dalit Feminist Standpoint', which:

[120] Dietrich, 'Dalit Movement' (n 115) 58.

[121] Sharmila Rege, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently: A Critique of "Difference" and Towards a Dalit Feminist Standpoint Position' (1998) 33(44) Economic and Political Weekly 39, 42 (hereafter Rege, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently').

> emphasises individual experiences within socially constructed groups and focusses on the hierarchical, multiple, changing structural power relations of caste, class and ethnicity which construct such groups . . . the subject/agent of dalit women's standpoint is multiple, heterogeneous and even contradictory, i.e., the category of 'dalit woman' is not homogenous. Such a recognition underlines the fact that the subject of dalit feminist's liberators knowledge must also be the subject of every other liberators project and thus requires a sharp focus on the processes by which gender, race, class, caste, and sexuality all construct each other. Thus, the dalit feminist standpoint itself is open to liberatory interrogations and revisions. The dalit feminist standpoint which emerges from the practices and struggles of dalit women may originate in the works of the dalit feminist intellectuals, but it cannot flourish if it is isolated from the experiences and ideas of other groups and must educate itself about the histories, preferred social relations, the utopias and the struggles of the marginalised. A transformation from 'their cause' to 'our cause' is feasible for the subjectivities can be transformed. By this we do not argue that non-dalit feminists can 'speak as' or 'for the' dalit women but they can 'reinvent' themselves as dalit feminists.[123]

Rege's exposition deserves unpacking. First, Rege, like Guru, was speaking of culling out differences between individual experiences but within disadvantaged groups, thus highlighting the need to speak to both individual differences as well as shared group disadvantage. Rege thus characterized the Dalit feminist standpoint as concerned with 'historically locating how all our identities are not equally powerful, and about reviewing how in different historical practices similarities between women have been ignored in an effort to underline caste-class identities or at other times differences ignored for "the feminist cause".'[124] Uma Chakravarti too recognized this in proclaiming that 'Dalit women experience[d] patriarchal oppressions in unique as well as in shared ways'.[125] These contradictions of sameness and difference led Dalit women to articulate their distinct position of disadvantage defined not simply in reference to caste, gender, or class alone, but in terms of the intersection of casteism, patriarchy, and poverty at the same time. But, secondly, the purpose was not simply to articulate these similarities and differences but to articulate, in Rege's terms, 'the hierarchical, multiple, changing structural power relations' or, so to say, the patterns of group disadvantage. The Dalit feminist standpoint was thus an analysis of relationships of power which rendered Dalit women, 'Dalits among Dalits' or 'downdrotten amongst downdrotten', being 'thrice alienated' on the basis of caste, class, and gender.

[122] Gopal Guru, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently' in Rao, Gender and Caste (n 105) 80–81.
[123] Sharmila Rege, 'A Dalit Feminist Standpoint' in Rao, Gender and Caste (n 105) 99.
[124] Sharmila Rege, '"Real Feminism" and Dalit Women: Scripts of Denial and Accusation' (2000) 35(6) Economic and Political Weekly 492, 493 (hereafter Rege, 'Real Feminism').

Thirdly, such a 'multiple, heterogeneous and even contradictory' exposition of the Dalit women's position rendered all Dalit women's experiences, and indeed all Dalit and female experiences, as non-normative and hence inclusive. Rege argued against privileging any standpoint as limiting the emancipatory potential of that movement and indeed of their epistemological standpoint.[126] She thus opened the doors of Dalit feminism to a broader struggle for emancipation of all dispossessed individuals and groups. She emphasized the transformative goal of movements to look outwards, to reinvent rather than reject modes of engaging with identity politics. Finally, the Dalit feminist standpoint, as Rege describes, was one marked by both theory and praxis—both in touch with one another and flourishing in tandem. Dalit feminism, like Black feminism, was thus not merely, not even predominantly, a scholarly space. It was, and has continued to be, an activist space inhabited by Dalit women's organizations and advocates, leading the social movement against Dalit women's oppression. The work of the National Federation of Dalit Women formed in 1995 bears testimony to the strong coexistence and mutual reinforcement of theory and praxis.[127]

The similarities between intersectionality developed by Black feminists and the intersectional thinking of Dalit feminists may be apparent in the common language and explanations of both the discourses. What conclusions can we draw from this coincidence? Where does this leave us in terms of using intersectionality as a framework developed in one context, as a frame of reference for another? What does an example of a thick account of intersectional disadvantage, as in the case of Dalit women, show anyway? And how does this feed into the aim of using intersectionality for defining and redressing the category of intersectional discrimination in discrimination law? The next section reflects upon this.

[125] Uma Chakravarti, Gendering Caste: Through a Feminist Lens (Stree 2003) 88 (hereafter Chakravarti, Gendering Caste).

[126] Rege, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently' (n 121) 44.

[127] Kalpana Kannabiran, 'A Cartography of Resistance: The National Federation of Dalit Women' in Nira Yuval-Davis, Kalpana Kannabiran, and Ulrike Vieten (eds), The Situated Politics of Belonging (Sage 2006) 54–71 (hereafter Kannabiran, 'A Cartography of Resistance).

3.2 Dalit Feminism, Black Feminism, and Intersectionality

The roots of Dalit feminist intersectional thinking are indigenous and self-made. Their struggles reflect their own circumstances, and consequently the theorizations borne out of the Dalit feminist movement are informed by that praxis rather than universal theories of any kind. In fact, like Black feminism, Dalit feminism is inspired by its longstanding genealogy of thought; including, as the previous section highlighted, the politics of engaging with multiple identities that can be traced as far back as the early twentieth century. There is, as Subramaniam notes, 'no single point in time or place [that] marked "start" for the contemporary dalit women's movement'.[128] Given that the surge in both Dalit feminism and Black feminism coincided in time, from the 1980s onwards, there was no possibility initially of borrowing from one another. The locution of intersectionality and transcontinental dialogue thus remained absent in the formative moments of Dalit feminism.

This has of course changed now. Cross-referencing and conversations between Dalit feminists and Black feminists are mutual, if not equal. Indian feminists have used Black feminist literature on intersectionality as a theory and a methodological tool for illuminating or clarifying their own intersectional subjectivities.[129] For example, Rege cites '[f]eminists of colour [who] developed the powerful resource of "intersectionality" of structures of domination', including hooks, Collins, and Anzaldua, in her work.[130] In a recent exchange between Nivedita Menon and Mary E John on the usefulness of intersectionality theory in India, John ruminates: 'Dalit feminists have also frequently found inspiration in the history of black women, which makes me wonder whether some dimension of the intersectionality problem might speak to them. It would surely be odd to reject this out of hand.'[131] In fact, out of hand rejections of intersectionality have been rare.[132] The locution and the theory have found their way into spaces, often beyond Dalit feminism, which benefit from them.[133] For example, in her work Tools of Justice, Kalpana Kannabiran presents a contextualized account of intersectionality in Indian [128] Mangala Subramaniam, The Power of Women's Organizing: Gender, Caste and Class in India (Lexington Books 2006) 59 (emphasis in original).

[129] Dalit feminism and indeed feminism in India has explored intersectionality and Black feminism in far more detail in comparison. See the dedicated vol 48 issue 18 of Economic Political Weekly in 2013 on intersectionality; Purvi Mehta, 'Dalit Feminism at Home and in the World' in Barbara Molony and Jennifer Nelson (eds), Women's Activism and 'Second Wave' Feminism: Transnational Histories (Bloomsbury 2017).

[130] Rege, 'Real Feminism' (n 124) 495.

[131] Mary E John, 'Intersectionality Rejection or Critical Dialogue?' (2015) 33(1) Economic and Political Weekly 72, 76.

[132] The notable one being Menon, 'Is Feminism about 'Women'?' (n 110).

[133] See especially the proceedings of Jagori Conference, 'A Brief Report Intersectionality: Knowing and Doing' (17 August 2015) <http://www.jagori.org/sites/default/files/publication/panel%20discussion%20on%20intersectionalities%2017th%20august%202015%20-%20report.pdf> accessed 28 March 2019.

constitutional law in relation to caste, religion, disability, sexuality, and indigenous and tribal peoples.[134]

Similarly, Bilge and Collins acknowledge Black feminism's shared but independent trajectory of intersectionality with Dalit feminism. They refer to Kannabiran's powerful exposition of the Dalit women's political position 'shaped by multiple and interrelated systems of oppression: religiously sanctioned casteism, patriarchy, capitalism, state, and religion'.[135] They use Kannabiran's analysis and the example of Dalit feminism to show how intersectional thinking has pervaded identity-based resistance and struggles beyond the context of Black feminism in the US.

The invocation of the Dalit feminism-Black feminism analogy has been both measured and attentive. Neither discourse adopts the other wholesale, uncritically or out of context; and both engage with the other more than just as passing references. The engagement thus bears out several things. First and foremost, it shows the limited value of engaging with identity politics, social movements, and discourses along a single categorial axis alone. Secondly, it shows in great depth from the perspective of Black feminism and Dalit feminism why intersectional thinking along multiple axes matters—to capture the qualitatively distinct nature of disadvantage associated with multiple identity categories. Thirdly, it shows the conceptual convergences in thinking about intersectional disadvantage and discrimination across diverse contexts. It is these convergences that reveal the value in applying the intersectional framework to different subjects and sites. It is useful to collate them here.

Both Dalit and Black feminists broke away from their respective mainstream feminist movements upon realizing that an unqualified category of women or Blacks or Dalits did not adequately explain and address the position of those women who were also Black or Dalit. In fact, their mutual discord with caste and race movements on the one hand, and Brahminical and white feminisms on the other, is captured in their comparable slogans: 'All Men are Black, All Women are White' and 'All Dalits are male and all women savarna [upper-caste]'. They then developed this with the central insight that women's subordination cannot exclusively be explained in reference to gender, and that other identities like race and caste create both shared and unique experiences amongst women. Their common demand was for reconceptualizing identity theory, social movements, and interventions, including law, from the standpoint of the most disadvantaged, namely those who suffered intersectional discrimination. Thus, like Black feminists, Dalit feminists demanded an epistemological shift across disciplines and an ontological space to reassert their multiple but whole identities and experiences. Their demands coincide, in that feminists and Dalit (or race) scholars are asked not to speak as or for Dalit (or Black) women but to 'reinvent themselves as dalit feminists'[136] or to bring Black women from 'margin to centre'.[137]

[134] Kalpana Kannabiran, Tools of Justice: Non-Discrimination and the Indian Constitution (Routledge 2012).

[135] Collins and Bilge, Intersectionality (n 60) 130 (citing Kannabiran, 'A Cartography of Resistance (n 127)).

In this sense, both Dalit and Black feminist intersectional positions are transformative at heart; they are not about the aggregate of individuals or certain groups, and explicating their subjective positions, but about the eventual 'contingent transformation of collective subject positions', an emancipated standpoint which was 'not a given but one to be achieved'.[138] Dalit feminists share with Black feminists their larger goal of creating a paradigm for fighting oppression on behalf of every oppressed group and demanding Dalit women's emancipation for the 'emancipation of entire womanhood'.[139] As Vidyut Bhagwat writes:

> The core of dalit consciousness is made of protest against exploitation and oppression. In short, the term dalit stands for change and revolution. By using the term Dalit women we are trying to say that if women from dalit castes and of dalit consciousness create a space for themselves for fearless expression i.e. if they become subjects or agents or self, they will provide a new leadership to Indian society, in general and to feminist and dalit movements in particular.[140]

Even when, as Bhagwat characterizes, Dalit feminism adopts a caste and gender framing, it is but a shorthand for a structured analysis of intersections beyond caste and gender, and including sexualities, religion, disability, and especially class and poverty. It is important to underscore that just as Dalit feminism arose as a response to the exclusions of mainstream feminist and Dalit movements, it was equally a response to the thriving Marxist and eco-feminist discourse, which had excluded caste and gender analyses. In this, both the anti-caste movement as well as Dalit feminists had criticized the Left's blindness to caste, seeing it merely as a 'superstructure' like religion and thus leaving it unexamined. In fact, the Left's standpoint was that once class relations were assailed, caste could automatically be surpassed.[141] The argument appeared as exclusive as those of feminist and Dalit movements for excluding caste and gender specific detailing respectively. Dalit feminists thus made class the cornerstone of their analysis going beyond Dalit women who constituted the educated elite working in universities and in white-collar jobs, and towards interrogating, for example, the 'material realities of the lives of the rural Dalit

[136] Rege, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently' (n 121) 45.
[137] hooks, Feminist Theory (n 36).
[138] Rege, 'Real Feminism' (n 123) 495.
[139] Surendra Jondhale, 'Theoretical Underpinnings of Emancipation of Dalit Women' in PG Jogdand (ed), Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives (GPH 1995) 107.
[140] Bhagwat, 'Dalit Women in India' (n 107) 2 (emphasis in original).
[141] For a detailed explanation of this point, see Chhaya Datar, 'Non-Brahmin Renderings of Feminism in Maharashtra: Is it a More Emancipatory Force?' (1999) 34(1) Economic and Political Weekly 2964.

women'.[142] The material reality of women's disadvantage was thus as foundational to Dalit feminism as it was for Black feminism; perhaps in the same way that, often, its muted presence in the list of identity categories was reflective of its foundational salience in the analysis of power structures rather than its exclusion.

It is hard to consolidate and compare the entire discourses of Black feminism and Dalit feminism, or any other which has developed or applied intersectional thinking. But even their brief iterations show what work they perform in understanding the complexity of intersectional discrimination. The formative roots of intersectionality in Black feminism and intersectionality-like thinking in Dalit feminism show how intersectionality is pursued concretely and on the ground, in relation to the specific forms of disadvantage it seeks to uncover. This specificity provides epistemic depth to the intersectional framework which, as I argued, is about sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage considered simultaneously and as a whole and in their context for the purposes of transforming them.

The lesson from this illustration is also that intersectionality as a trope is unimportant so long as one appreciates the intersectional framework. The framework, of course, is a rather complex one composed of several interconnected strands. The lived realities of discrimination suffered by groups like Black women and Dalit women, which feed the framework, are even more complex. Dilemmas, exhaustion, and fatigue are inevitable in traversing intersectional frames. This chapter has tried to simplify the complexities, address some of the dilemmas, and provide an illustration for accessing intersectionality in a systematic way. So, this is how this chapter and intersectionality come to inform the project of successfully claiming intersectional discrimination: by appreciating the complexity of this category of discrimination via a crystallized framework. What Black feminism and Dalit feminism do is to enrich that framework with a thick account of what intersectional discrimination with respect to specific groups looks like. Thus, this chapter has provided a template for extending the framework of intersectionality to understand intersectional discrimination yielded by the patterns of group disadvantage associated with multiple identity categories like race, caste, nationality, language, religion, sex, gender, sexual orientation, disability, age etc., in disparate contexts and with respect to diverse groups, like fat Black men, Muslim men, Muslim women, disabled people identifying as LGBTQ etc.

Conclusion

One may ask whether this thick account of intersectionality—its defences and its presence/relevance in contexts like Dalit feminism—strays from the legal project of this book, which is concerned, in the remaining part, with comparative discrimination law. The reason for this detailed account is perhaps exactly to render such a question meaningless: to show that it is in no other way that discrimination law can address the complexity of discrimination in reality than actually diving deep into understanding it. Intersectionality theory and praxis give us a firm grasp on the qualitative nature of disadvantage suffered by intersectional subjects. It is useful to sum up the main points made in the course of making this argument.

[142] Chakravarti, Gendering Caste (n 125) chs 1–2.

Intersectionality rejects the understanding of discrimination as a function of a single categorial axis and emphasizes the need to recognize discrimination resulting from the intersections of multiple axes of race, caste, religion, sex, gender, disability, age, sexual orientation etc. It seeks to reconceptualize the way we understand such intersectional discrimination to present a more accurate vision of the prevailing social inequalities that correspond with people's lived realities. By filling in this epistemological gap, intersectionality aims to transcend and ultimately transform these patterns of group disadvantage. This is the core of intersectionality, which hopes to be reflected in the category of intersectional discrimination and redressed in discrimination law. The full version of the claim appears thus: intersectionality illuminates the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities understood as a whole, and in their full and relevant context, with the purpose of redressing and transforming them.

For each case of intersectionality, the explanation of what sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage looks like will be highly specific to the identities in question and the context in which they emerge. These explanations will be framed by supporting works of sociology, anthropology, psychology, political science, economics, law etc., which provide evidence of the qualitative nature of intersectional disadvantage. Intersectionality then fulfils a limited but significant role in providing the conceptual framework for distilling the explanations of group disadvantage experienced by persons with multiple identities or membership in disadvantaged groups. This contribution can be neither overemphasized nor understated. After all, intersectionality 'even in its theoretical voice [is] about the practical implications of its arguments'.[143] Thus, intersectionality, as Crenshaw herself stressed, is what it does, not what it is.[144] And that is all that matters. So, the question we must now ask is, how do we do intersectionality in discrimination law? The next two chapters turn to this.

[143] Hancock, An Intellectual History (n 24) 71.

[144] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Postscript' in Lutz et al, Framing Intersectionality (n 100); Cho, Crenshaw, and McCall, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies' (n 13) 795.

3

The Concept

Understanding the Category of Intersectional Discrimination

Introduction

This chapter aims to explore the juridical conception of intersectional discrimination. It complements the last one by extending the theoretical discussion about intersectionality to discrimination law practice. The purpose is to understand how intersectionality, understood in the way described in the last chapter, has been understood qua discrimination law in courts. The analysis of relevant case law from a range of jurisdictions shows that there is no one way of responding to intersectional claims. Justices not only respond to them as intersectional discrimination but also in various other ways. Their responses can be traced along a continuum which spans the categories of single-axis and intersectional discrimination, and includes strictly single-axis, substantially single-axis, capacious single-axis, contextual single-axis, multiple, compound, combination, and embedded forms of discrimination. The category of intersectional discrimination is thus to be understood as qualitatively distinct from these other ways of conceptualizing discrimination in law.

Why is it important to understand the concept of intersectional discrimination in this way? If we recall, Crenshaw's greatest dismay with discrimination law, when she first wrote about intersectionality in 1989, was its single-axis framework. She showed how courts reduced intersectional claims based on the grounds of race and sex to either race or sex discrimination. Thirty years on, intersectional claimants still find it hard to succeed in courts, though it is no longer because of single-axis thinking alone but various other categories of thinking which are distant from intersectionality. The salience of intersectional discrimination lies in its contrast with these other categorial frames of conceiving discrimination.

This chapter picks through seminal case law to illuminate the continuum of judicial responses to intersectionality. Each case, at its heart, is a case of intersectional discrimination. By this I mean that the case is one properly understood in terms of the intersectional framework described in the previous chapter; that is, it represents the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities understood as a whole, in their full and relevant context, and requiring transformative ways of redressing such disadvantage. While not all cases have been seen in this way and thus have been classified appropriately along the continuum, the discussion justifies why each case fits this framework in fact.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

The case law is drawn from comparative jurisdictions including the US, Canada, UK, South Africa, and India; regional systems including the EU and European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR); and international law including the jurisprudence of the Human Rights Committee (HRC), and the Committees of the UN Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) and UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD). While some categories of discrimination may be more common in one jurisdiction than another (say, capacious single-axis is peculiar to EU law), there is decidedly little consistency or coherence within each jurisdiction in how judges have responded to intersectional claims at different points in time. So, the purpose of comparative case law is to delineate the categories of thinking about discrimination, and not to map the differences in individual jurisdictional positions per se. The comparative references are thus not exhaustive and do not showcase all of the intersectionality-related case law from each jurisdiction. Cases are selected for their ability to clarify our conceptual understanding of intersectional discrimination as well as every other category of discrimination constructed as a response to it. The discussion is thus conceptual, the comparative references providing the foil for it.

It is important to stress that the conceptual grounding of intersectional discrimination is necessary but not sufficient for intersectional claims to succeed in discrimination law; much more is required. A more fine-grained comparative survey appears in chapter 4, which considers matters such as legislative texts, the meaning of grounds, the test for identifying analogous grounds, the difference between direct and indirect discrimination, the preferred touchstone for identifying discrimination harms (i.e. dignity, autonomy, fairness, prejudice, stereotyping, marginalization etc.), the standard of scrutiny, the burden of proof, justification analysis, and remedies; each of these affects how an intersectional claim is received in discrimination law and will be considered in turn. The focus of the present chapter is rather more macrocosmic; the interest is in understanding the conceptual framing of claims which are claims of intersectional discrimination properly so called.

A word about terminology will be useful here. The term 'intersectionality' is used to refer to the theoretical framework sketched in the last chapter while 'intersectional discrimination' is used to denote discrimination experienced because of multiple identities that corresponds to the framework. Intersectional discrimination is thus supposed to reflect the framework of intersectionality. To the extent that the judicial meanderings have been unable to do this, intersectional discrimination remains aspirational within the judicial discourse. This does not mean that intersectional discrimination does not itself exist. It only means that courts have been unable to translate intersectionality into a clear perspective on intersectional discrimination. Likewise, the absence of the term intersectionality or intersectional discrimination does not necessarily mean an absence of appreciation of the framework. We need to look closely at the judicial text to gauge whether and how intersectionality has transpired in cases. Similarly, in relation to other categories on the continuum—strictly single-axis, substantially single-axis, capacious single-axis, contextual single-axis, multiple, compound, combination, and embedded discrimination—the terminology does not seek to match that adopted in a particular jurisdiction or even previous works on the subject. These labels are far from settled between different jurisdictions and commentators. It is thus helpful to pay attention to the conceptual explanation of each of the categories, rather than their labels. The labels try to match the accompanying conceptual explanation alone.

This chapter is divided into seven sections. Section 1 sets the scene by explaining why it is important to be diagnostically clear about what causes discrimination, especially intersectional discrimination. The rest of the chapter uses this as the key to distinguish between different conceptual categories of thinking about discrimination. Section 2 consolidates these categories along a continuum and the next five sections explain each of the categories, namely, single-axis discrimination (which includes strictly single-axis, substantially single-axis, capacious single-axis, and contextual single-axis discrimination); multiple discrimination; additive discrimination (which includes combination discrimination and compound discrimination); embedded discrimination; and, finally, intersectional discrimination.

1. Causation

At the outset, let us return to Lord Phillips' hypothetical scenario of a fat Black man being denied purchase.[1] When the shopkeeper says, 'I do not serve people like you', Lord Phillips applies the objective test to assess whether the criterion applied by the shopkeeper for making this distinction was discriminatory. The mental processes or motive (subjective test) were irrelevant in this assessment. According to Lord Phillips, if the criterion for refusal was weight, it was not discriminatory (since weight was not a prohibited ground); if it were the fact that the man was Black, then it was discriminatory, on the basis of race. Lord Phillips does not consider the possibility that both weight and race could have been the criteria of discrimination. Given that weight, as in obesity, can be considered a ground of discrimination under disability now,[2] would Lord Phillips reconsider his set of options for finding discrimination in this situation today? Would he consider that discrimination in this case could have been caused by two grounds?

[1] R v JFS [2009] UKSC 15 (hereafter JFS).

[2] Case C-354/13 Fag og Arbejde v Kommunernes Landsforening [2014] ECLI:EU:C:2014:2463 (CJEU) (hereafter Kaltoft).

While Section 14 on combination discrimination under the Equality Act 2010 remains unenforced, there is little prompting Lord Phillips to expand his options, legally speaking. But our problem is not just legal, whether about the letter or the interpretation of the law; the problem is our normative frames of reference for thinking about causation in discrimination. Because causation is at the heart of the discrimination inquiry, for both direct and (in a modified way) indirect discrimination, we need to first address the fact that discrimination can in fact be caused by multiple identity categories or grounds.

What does this mean? Causation in legal parlance refers to the idea that a particular 'harm' complained of by the claimant was the 'consequence of' or 'caused by' or the 'effect of' a wrongful act.[3] In discrimination law, causation is revised such that the harm of discrimination is due to a wrongful act which is 'based on' (whether directly or indirectly) particular identities called grounds or personal characteristics. Thus, to prove discrimination it is not only necessary to show a causal link between the wrongful act and its discriminatory consequence but that the act and consequence flow from certain kinds of identities recognized as grounds or personal characteristics. Identities or grounds need to have played some role or should have been a factor which resulted in the discrimination being complained of.[4] For example, the shopkeeper may have denied purchase to the fat Black man because: (i) the man did not have enough money to make the purchase; or (ii) although he had enough money, he was not allowed to make the purchase in a white neighbourhood being a Black person; or (iii) according to a government policy, shopkeepers were entitled to refuse purchase of certain items to obese persons; or (iv) the shopkeeper did not wish to serve fat Blacks in his shop; or (v) the shopkeeper was following an official policy whereby those without jobs or on social assistance did not have access to regular shops but to a separate rationing system. While (i) may not necessarily devolve into a discrimination claim per se since the causal basis is not anchored in a ground (like race, caste, religion, disability, gender, etc.), (ii) and (iii) can be easily framed as single-axis claims based on race and weight respectively. In intersectional discrimination, we are particularly thinking of cases like (iv) and (v) where discrimination is either directly or indirectly a consequence of multiple grounds such that both race and weight are said to influence the way the claimant was treated or impacted.[5] It is in this sense of diagnosing discrimination as being based on multiple grounds that we are concerned about causation in intersectional discrimination.

[3] HLA Hart and Tony Honoré, Causation in the Law (2nd edn, OUP 1985) 4.

[4] Given that the connection between grounds and discrimination is rather loose, some may avoid using the term 'causal' at all in describing intersectional discrimination. See Peel Law Association and Melissa Firth v Selwyn Pieters and Brian Noble 2013 ONCA 396 (Ontario Court of Appeal) [60] (Juriansz JA) ('I do not think it acceptable, however, to attach the modifier "causal" to "nexus". Doing so seems to me to elevate the test beyond what the law requires. The Divisional Court's requirement of a "causal nexus" or a "causal link" between the adverse treatment and a prohibited ground seems counter to the evolution of human rights jurisprudence, which focuses on the discriminatory effects of conduct, rather than on intention and direct cause'). I think we can retain the term 'causal' because it helps ground intersectional discrimination in patterns of group disadvantage and structures of power associated with people's identities. That said, the term and the connection it seeks to make must be interpreted liberally, as it is in human rights and discrimination law, as merely a correlative link.

Traditionally, discrimination law has assumed that there is one, and only one, ground which causes discrimination in a particular instance. Tests for assessing whether discrimination has so occurred are designed in this way. For example, the 'but for' test for establishing causation and identifying grounds in the UK and the 'on grounds only of' language in the Indian Constitution show this thinking explicitly.[6] The failure of early intersectional cases like DeGraffenreid v General Motors[7] in the US which were argued on two grounds (race and sex) confirms this. What was being asked for in cases like DeGraffenreid was the recognition that discrimination could be based on two grounds in fact, namely that it was caused by two grounds together. Whether one applies the 'but for' test or the objective test from Lord Phillips in JFS,[8] the disparate treatment and disparate impact theories popular in the US,[9] the 'direct coincidence' test from the European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR),[10] or the impact analysis carried out by the South African and Canadian courts,[11] the causal point about intersectional discrimination is the same. None of these tests are fundamentally averse to modification to accommodate intersectional discrimination. Although their application has been confined to a single ground alone at a time, there is little to no justification for this. For example, they could be re-cast as 'but for' the grounds of race and sex, for a group such as Black women; or the objective criteria of distinction being based on both race and sex, such that it is targeting groups like Black women, Asian women, or Latinas; or the discriminator particularly choosing to discriminate because of the claimants' personal characteristics of being both Black and female; or that the disadvantaged group (say of Black women) and the group at a certain advantage (say of white men) are distinguished precisely by the personal characteristics of race and sex; or the impact test which shows that, ultimately, whatever the animus, criteria, or reason for distinction, it was Black women who in fact suffered a disadvantage. The [5] Grounds, single or multiple, may not be the sole reason why discrimination occurred. So long as grounds are one of the reasons for which someone suffers discrimination, explicitly or in effect, the causation requirement may be satisfied. See Shamoon v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary [2003] UKHL 11 [8]–[10]; Chief Constable of the West Yorkshire Police v Khan [2001] UKHL 48 [29]–[30]. See also Tarunabh Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (OUP 2015) 165–71.

[6] James v Eastleigh Borough Council [1990] 2 AC 751 (HL); Constitution of India 1950, art 15(1).

[7] DeGraffenreid v General Motors 413 F Supp 142 (1976) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri) (hereafter DeGraffenreid).

[8] JFS (n 1) [20] (Lord Phillips); also adopted by Lady Hale [55] [65]–[66], Lord Mance [78], Lord Clarke [129]; Preddy v Bull [2013] UKSC 73 [61].

[9] McDonnell Douglas Corporation v Green 411 US 792 (1973); Wards Cove Packing Co v Atonio 490 US 642 (1989).

[10] Opinion of Advocate General Sharpston in Case C-73/08 Bressol v Gouvernement de la Communaut Francaise [2010] ECR I-2735 [56].

[11] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (SACC) [50] (hereafter Harksen); R v Kapp [2008] 2 SCR 483 (SCC) [16] [37] [40].

causal implications of all these tests is to find for two bases of discrimination at the same time, in both race and sex for Black women. This chapter asks the reader to keep an open mind about the possibility of discrimination due to a certain act or omission (measure, policy, provision, criterion, or practice) to be either directly based on two or more grounds (direct intersectional discrimination) or indirectly leading to an effect or impact which is suffered on two or more grounds (indirect intersectional discrimination). The forthcoming analysis will explain exactly how this can be appreciated within the different causal frameworks or tests that jurisdictions apply to find for discrimination. The ultimate aim is to define causality on multiple grounds in terms of the qualitative nature of intersectional discrimination, as defined by the framework of intersectionality outlined in the last chapter. This means that the ultimate causality we are after is not just an appreciation of the fact that discrimination is multi-causal (where that is the case), but also that its explanation resides in similar and different patterns of group disadvantage considered as a whole and in light of its context. It is this intersectional understanding of causation that will be sought in this chapter.

Three things must be noted before we proceed further. First, not every case is a case of intersectional discrimination. This must be obvious. In our example above, for the same claimant who is a fat Black man, not every case of discrimination involving him will be a case like (iv) and (v)—cases where both fatness and Blackness make a difference causally to the experience of discrimination directly or indirectly. Claims like (i), (ii), and (iii) are not intersectional and need not be considered as such even where they involve a claimant like the fat Black man. Intersectionality makes a difference to discrimination law when used to explain causation which is not one-dimensional. Where causation is actually one-dimensional, intersectionality need not be invoked.

Secondly, even though the idea of intersectionality is one which explains the nature of discrimination which is multi-causal, not all its strands are causally relevant or useful in explaining intersectionality qua discrimination law. At least, the final limb of transformation has more to do with how one responds to intersectional discrimination rather than how one appreciates it. On the other hand, the first four strands seem bound together in illuminating the complexity of causality in intersectionality that produces similar and different patterns of group disadvantage, which can only be appreciated by treating the claimant as a whole and in her full and relevant context.

Finally, it is useful to note that we are not delimited here in looking for causation based on recognized lists of traditional grounds alone. As shown in chapter 2, there is no difficulty in intersectionality accounting for patterns of group disadvantage based on identities like class or socio-economic status, even though it was developed primarily with the grounds of race and sex in relation to Black women. Crenshaw's initial response was framed this way because she was responding to discrimination law's inability to address claims of Black women based on race and sex, both of which were recognized grounds under Title VII of the Civil Rights Act 1964. Which intersectional identities should be recognized as grounds will be considered in the next chapter. In this chapter it is useful to keep in mind a broad range which includes not only some obvious grounds like race, sex, gender, sexuality, religion, disability, age etc. but also socio-economic status, place of residence, employment status, physical appearance etc. which may cause discrimination just the same in an intersectional way.

2. Continuum

The twofold purpose of this chapter is to, first, pore over comparative doctrine to understand how actual or potential intersectional claims have been categorized in discrimination law, and, secondly, test how different categories of discrimination fare against the framework of intersectionality. The chapter illustrates a range of categorial responses to discrimination based on two or more grounds. These responses can be consolidated by imagining a progressive continuum with single-axis discrimination on the one hand and intersectional discrimination on the other. A variety of responses lie between the two. It is useful to summarize the continuum here before elaborating on each of the categories.

Intersectional discrimination characterizes the realization of the framework of intersectionality and thus represents the most accurate conceptualization of multi-causal claims based on two or more grounds. The category furthest from intersectional discrimination is that of single-axis discrimination. Crenshaw's original critique of DeGraffenreid was one which can be described as a critique of strictly single-axis discrimination where discrimination is delimited by a single ground, to the exclusion of every other identity. Single-axis discrimination, though, has evolved into at least three other categories. Substantially single-axis acknowledges that discrimination may be based on other identities but can be substantially understood as based on a single ground. Capacious single-axis is based on a single ground again, but interpreted capaciously so as to include patterns of group disadvantage associated with other grounds as part of that single ground itself. Contextual single-axis, while based on a single ground, accounts for other grounds as the context of the discrimination claim. Further along from these categories of single-axis discrimination is multiple discrimination which admits multiple grounds of discrimination but considers them as causing discrimination independently. Multiple discrimination is thus nothing but multiple claims of single-axis discrimination. Single-axis and multiple discrimination quantitatively limit the possibility of multi-causal discrimination and hence do not quite consider the qualitative implications of intersectionality in the way discrimination occurs. Additive discrimination differs from single-axis and multiple discrimination in two fundamental ways—first, it admits that discrimination can be based on more than one ground; and secondly, that such discrimination is based on the interaction of multiple grounds. Additive, as in combination or compound forms of discrimination, thus reflects judicial thinking far more advanced than Crenshaw's bane of 'the dominant conception' of single-axis discrimination. And yet, additive discrimination does not quite comport with the idea of intersectional discrimination since the interaction between grounds is not conceptualized squarely as a matter of intersectionality. Finally, embedded discrimination, which is closest to the category of intersectional discrimination, considers two or more grounds as coming together to form a separate ground of discrimination. The new amalgamated ground is seen as representing the complex character of multi-ground discrimination better than grounds taken alone or in some combination.

These categories are very much a product of the individual circumstances of the claims which dictated judicial thinking. While some cases represent categories which are reflective of intersectionality in some measure, others miss it by a long shot. In order to understand the category of intersectional discrimination, it is thus important to understand the variety of categories which have been invoked as a response to it and to distinguish it from those. The real difference between each of the categories is in the way each appreciates the various strands of the framework of intersectionality. The emphasis of each category of thinking about discrimination on each of these strands is unequal and dispersed. In fact, cases representative of a particular category may place different levels of emphases on each strand. The effort is not simply to map each case or category's engagement with each strand of intersectionality in a clinical fashion. Instead, the idea is to unravel judicial frames of thinking about discrimination on their own terms and in reference to intersectionality. In the final analysis, this dialectic engagement should lead the reader to appreciate the salience of intersectional discrimination.

3. Single-axis Discrimination

The approach of the Missouri District Court in DeGraffenreid was to splinter the claim of Black women into individual claims of race and sex discrimination and ask which was the case in fact. As we have already seen, this is an incorrect characterization of the claim because it fails to reckon with the nature of intersectional disadvantage suffered by Black women. But this is only one version of single-axis thinking, which can be called 'strictly' single-axis discrimination. There are at least three more variants which have developed in comparative jurisprudence: the South African Constitutional Court's earliest characterization of intersectional claims as based 'substantially' on a single ground; the interpretation of a few of the successful cases in EU discrimination law as 'capacious' enough despite being based on a single ground; and some of the seminal minority decisions in the South African and Canadian jurisprudence using contextual factors alongside a single ground. These are but forms of single-axis discrimination and this section takes each in turn. It confirms how single-axis thinking is ingrained in discrimination law as strategically convenient and cognitively accessible.

3.1 Strictly Single-axis Discrimination

Despite Crenshaw's early intervention in DeGraffenreid-type thinking, strictly single-axis discrimination remains a typical response to intersectional claims. While much of the US discrimination jurisprudence on the grounds of race and sex has progressed to other categories like multiple or additive discrimination, most of the Indian discrimination jurisprudence and some rather significant decisions of the Canadian Supreme Court and the South African Constitutional Court are characteristic of strictly single-axis thinking. It is useful to consider, then, what strictly single-axis thinking involves across these jurisdictions.

The jurisprudence on Article 15(1) of the Indian Constitution has been mainly strictly single-axis since the constitutional non-discrimination guarantee came into force in 1950. The immediate reason for this appears to be the language used in the provision which states that: 'the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them'.[12] The phrase 'on grounds only of' has been consistently interpreted as prohibiting discrimination that occurs solely on the basis of a single ground.[13] The 1982 Supreme Court decision in Air India v Nergesh Meerza[14] confirmed this interpretation. Air India concerned a challenge to the constitutional validity of the Air India Employees Service Regulations (Service Regulations) which provided that an air hostess were to retire from service upon one of the following occurring: (i) on attaining the age of thirty-five years (extendable at the discretion of managing director to forty-five years); (ii) on first pregnancy; or (iii) on marriage if it took place within four years of the service. Air hostesses challenged the Service Regulations under Article 15(1) of the Constitution as discriminating on the basis of sex or disabilities arising there from. Air India argued that there was no discrimination in this case on the grounds only of sex, and the discrimination, if there were any, was based not only on sex but on a host of other considerations, including the difference between the class of air hostesses and assistant flight pursuers (who were male) based on job functions, the mode of recruitment, qualifications, promotional avenues, and the circumstances of retirement. The Court agreed with Air India for the reason that: 'what Articles 15(1) and 16(2) prohibit is that discrimination should not be made only and only on the ground of sex. These Articles of the Constitution do not prohibit the State from making discrimination on the ground of sex coupled with other considerations.'[15] Based on this, while the first two conditions (relating to age and pregnancy) were declared unconstitutional, the third condition (relating to termination upon marriage within four years of service) was upheld since it was seen as based not only on sex but other considerations including family planning, improving health and maturity of the employee, and hence ensuring the success of her marriage, as well as the economic costs of training the crew. The Supreme Court thus justified sex discrimination based on the fact that it was linked to justifications associated with marital status which were not prohibited from consideration under Article 15(1). Consideration of marital status was deemed unproblematic given its absence from the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination in Article 15(1). Sex was thus isolated from the social, political, and material reality of gender, as well as its interaction with other systems of disadvantage including marriage. Such an isolated reading of sex not only circumscribed the possibility of claiming for gender discrimination as a matter of sex discrimination,[16] but also the possibility of claiming intersectional discrimination based on sex coupled with other grounds.[17] There has been some progress in addressing gendered aspects of sex discrimination since Air India[18] and reading in analogous grounds under Article 15(1).[19] In September 2018, a sole judge in the landmark decision decriminalizing sodomy in India gave a friendly nod to intersectionality questioning the single-axis reasoning in Air India.[20] According to Chandrachud J:

[12] Kalpana Kannabiran, Tools of Justice: Non-Discrimination and the Indian Constitution (Routledge 2012) 337, 460.

[13] Mahadeb v BB Sen AIR 1951 Cal 563 (Calcutta High Court) [28]; Anjali Roy v State of West Bengal AIR 1952 Cal 825 (Calcutta High Court) 839; Dattatraya Motiram More v State of Bombay AIR 1953 Bom 311 (Bombay High Court) [7]; Yusuf Abdul Aziz v Bombay 1954 SCR 930 (Supreme Court of India) 932; Government of Andhra Pradesh v PB Vijaykumar AIR 1995 SC 1648 (Supreme Court of India) [14]; Vijay Lakshmi v Punjab University AIR 2003 SC 3331 (Supreme Court of India) [10].

[14] 1982 SCR (1) 438.

> This formalistic interpretation of Article 15 [in Air India] would render the constitutional guarantee against discrimination meaningless. For it would allow the State to claim that the discrimination was based on sex and another ground ('Sex plus') and hence outside the ambit of Article 15... This fails to take into account

[15] Ibid [70].

[16] See Indira Jaising, 'Gender Justice and the Supreme Court' in BN Kirpal et al (eds), Supreme But Not Infallible: Essays in Honour of the Supreme Court of India (OUP 2001); Martha Nussbaum, 'India: Implementing Sex Equality Through Law' (2001) 2 Chicago Journal of International Law 49; Martha Nussbaum, 'India, Sex Equality, and Constitutional Law' in Beverley Baines and Ruth Rubio-Marin (eds), The Gender of Constitutional Jurisprudence (CUP 2005); Catharine MacKinnon, 'Problems, Prospects, and "Personal Laws" ' (2006) 4 International Journal of Constitutional Law 181.

[17] Cf Gautam Bhatia, The Transformative Constitution (HarperCollins 2019) ch 1.

[18] See esp Anuj Garg vs Hotel Association of India (2008) 3 SCC 1 (Supreme Court of India) (lifting the ban on employment of women in places serving alcohol) and State of Maharashtra v Indian Hotels and Restaurants Association AIR 2013 SC 2582 (Supreme Court of India) (lifting the ban on the performance of 'bar dancers' in hotels and restaurants below three stars).

[19] Naz Foundation v Government of NCT (2009) 160 DLT 277 (High Court of Delhi) (reading sexual orientation as a ground analogous to sex under art 15(1)); National Legal Services Authority vs Union of India (2014) 5 Supreme Court Cases 438 (Supreme Court of India) (reading trans-status as third gender and analogous to sex under art 15(1)).

[20] Navtej Singh Johar v Union of India (Writ Petition (Criminal) No 76 of 2016) (decided on 6 September 2018) (Supreme Court of India).

> the intersectional nature of sex discrimination, which cannot be said to operate in isolation of other identities, especially from the socio-political and economic context. For example, a rule that people over six feet would not be employed in the army would be able to stand an attack on its disproportionate impact on women if it was maintained that the discrimination is on the basis of sex and height. Such a formalistic view of the prohibition in Article 15, rejects the true operation of discrimination, which intersects varied identities and characteristics.[21]

While the Air India reasoning may finally be in peril, the Supreme Court is yet to consider intersectional discrimination in any substantive way. India is also the only jurisdiction of those considered in this book, whose jurisprudence can be largely attributed to one category of thinking about discrimination as strictly single-axis. Chandrachud J's remark, made as obiter in a case which was not squarely about intersectionality, will thus have to be tested to unleash its true potential.

Other jurisdictions have rejected a multi-causal understanding of discrimination in a more considered and substantial way than the Indian Supreme Court. The decision of the Canadian Supreme Court in Mossop v Canada (Attorney General)[22] serves as a good starting point. The claimant in the case was denied bereavement leave for attending the funeral of his partner's father. The leave was restricted to immediate family or spouses. The claimant was excluded on the basis that he was in a same-sex relationship with his partner which neither qualified as familial nor spousal for the purposes of the bereavement leave. He challenged this as discrimination on the grounds of family status under the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA). The matter came up before the Canadian Supreme Court in 1992. Lamer CJ, writing for the majority, observed that the matter could have been decided on the ground of sexual orientation if it were pleaded as such and, in particular, if it were interpreted as an analogous ground under the CHRA. Since the claimant did not take this approach but proceeded under the ground of family status instead, he followed the claimant's lead. This proved fatal because according to Lamer CJ it was not actually family status, but rather sexual orientation, which had led to discrimination in this case:

> It is sexual orientation which has led the complainant to enter [into] a "familial relationship" [with his same-sex partner] and sexual orientation, therefore, which has precluded the recognition of his family status with regard to his lover and that man's father. So in final analysis, sexual orientation is really the ground of discrimination involved.[23]

Lamer CJ was strict about finding the ground of discrimination in Mossop. For him, only one ground, either family status or sexual orientation, could have caused discrimination. Since he found that discrimination was actually caused by sexual orientation, which was not a recognized ground under the CHRA, there was no discrimination in this case. The obstinate effort in affixing only one ground as causing discrimination is characteristic of strict single-axis discrimination.[24]

[21] Ibid [36].
[22] [1993] 1 SCR 554 (SCC) (hereafter Mossop).
[23] Ibid [33] (emphasis supplied).

This, though, misunderstands the causal basis of discrimination in Mossop. Even if sexual orientation discrimination had been recognized as a ground of discrimination and the claimant had pleaded his case based on it, there is no guarantee that he would have succeeded. The reason the claimant was denied bereavement leave was not only because of his sexual orientation or because his partner was the same sex as him, but because his same-sex relationship with his partner was not included in the kind of relationships recognized as 'familial' or 'spousal' in law. Sexual orientation simpliciter would have regulated discrimination where one was denied a benefit because of his own sexuality but would not necessarily have affected how his sexuality determined other statuses like marital or family status.[25] It was the intersection of homosexuality and relationship status which caused the particular disadvantage, in this case, of being denied bereavement leave. While both gay and single men and women suffered from disadvantages associated with their sexuality and marital status, including homophobia and social marginalization, neither suffered from this particular disadvantage. The disadvantage suffered by those like Mr Mossop was thus similar to and different from that based on individual grounds of discrimination. It was about being denied equal benefit of the law as compared to similar long-term heterosexual relationships which had the possibility of being recognized as de jure or de facto marriages for the purposes of the impugned law. A strict focus on Mr Mossop's sexual orientation alone would not have uncovered this basis of discrimination, which was intersectional in fact.

The result in Egan v Canada[26] confirms this. In Egan, the Supreme Court of Canada considered a challenge to the Old Age Security Act 1985 which provided an allowance to spouses of pensioners, when they turned sixty and until they became pensioners themselves at sixty-five, if their income fell below a stipulated amount. Mr Egan maintained that this provision was discriminatory under Section 15 of the Canadian Charter because it applied only to legally married or common [24] Note that according to Lamer CJ, 'if Parliament had decided to include sexual orientation in the list of prohibited grounds of discrimination, [the] interpretation of the phrase "family status" might have been entirely different [such that] Mr. Mossop's situation included both his sexual orientation and his "family status"'. This reasoning appears at odds with what he had just determined about Mr Mossop's case in fact—that it was not one that was causally based on family status at all but on sexual orientation as such. It is curious why he then considered that the inclusion of sexual orientation as a ground under the CHRA could have changed the character of discrimination as such—from being sexual orientation discrimination to sexual orientation and family status discrimination at the same time. Ibid [35].

[25] Of course, one could argue that sexual orientation should in fact include all kinds of discrimination whether alone or based on other grounds associated with it. It could then be a matter of capacious or contextual single-axis discrimination and, as I argue below, may still be reductionist in its appreciation of intersectionality.

[26] [1995] 2 SCR 513 (SCC) (hereafter Egan).

law spouses and excluded those in same-sex relationships. The Canadian Supreme Court for the first time in 1995 admitted sexual orientation as a ground of discrimination under Section 15 of the Charter. Yet, the majority Court refused to see this as a case of discrimination based on sexual orientation. La Forest LJ, writing for the majority, considered the case in light of the content of the law, its purpose, and its impact upon those to whom it applied.[27] He concluded that the purpose of the law was to support aged and elderly married couples whose relationships were defined by the special legal status of the institution of marriage. This institution was 'by nature heterosexual' in that it was 'firmly anchored in the biological and social realities that heterosexual couples have the unique ability to procreate, that most children are the product of these relationships, and that they are generally cared for and nurtured by those who live in that relationship'.[28] Conceived this way, marriage had little do with the ground of sexual orientation but was about procreation and child-rearing. Thus, neither the heterosexual nature of marriage nor the exclusion of people like Mr Egan from benefits associated with marriage were considered discriminatory by the Court. Sexual orientation alone seemed to have been inadequate in convincing the Court of discrimination under Section 15, given that the majority focussed its entire analysis on another ground (marital status). In fact, what was at stake was neither what gay people suffered on account of their sexual orientation nor the contours of marriage per se, but how sexual orientation determined other identities like marital status and how identities and the disadvantages associated with them were co-constituted. The impact of excluding gay people from an institution like marriage lay at the heart of discrimination in this case, which can properly be described as intersectional based on both sexual orientation and marital status. But the strict focus on sexual orientation seems to have obfuscated this.

Cases like Mossop and Egan may be relatively straightforward if considered within the intersectional framework. The claimants and the Court could conceive of these cases as being based on the two grounds of sexual orientation and family or marital status, and trace the patterns of disadvantage suffered by those at the intersection of the grounds. They could then possibly uncover the distinct nature of structural disadvantage suffered by gay people not simply as gay people but also as those structurally excluded from other groups defined by family or spousal status. While such disadvantage may be similar to the disadvantage suffered by others who are excluded from these structures, such as heterosexual and gay single persons and unmarried couples, there is a difference between suffering disadvantage as a gay person or as someone outside of the familial or marital relationship, on the one hand, and as both of them at the same time, on the other. It is the whole of the claimant's identity which yields the qualitative nature of similar and different patterns of group disadvantage which may have to do with prejudice, stigma, stereotyping, denial of dignity, and loss of socio-economic forms of security and wellbeing. A transformative approach is required to be able to see and overturn these patterns. A strict focus on a single ground, though, does none of this.

[27] Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 (SCC) [149] (McIntyre J).
[28] Egan (n 26) [21].

Other cases may be tougher still. Intersectional discrimination may involve more than two grounds, in a much more complex socio-political and economic context, and with polycentric considerations. Such discrimination may also be far more insidious for all these reasons and a strictly single-axis focus may obscure such discrimination further. The Canadian Supreme Court's decision in Gosselin v Quebec exemplifies this dilemma.[29]

Louise Gosselin was young, female, poor, unemployed, and battling with mental health issues. She challenged the Quebec government's social assistance scheme where the base amount payable to welfare recipients under thirty was a third of the amount payable to those thirty and over. To receive a comparable amount, recipients under thirty had to participate in a designated work activity or educational programme. She argued that this scheme violated Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter on the ground of age. McLachlin CJ, writing for the majority, found that 'unlike race, religion, or gender, age is not strongly associated with discrimination and arbitrary denial of privilege'.[30] According to her, 'as a general matter, and based on the evidence and our understanding of society, young adults as a class simply do not seem especially vulnerable or undervalued'.[31] She thus dismissed the claim that the legislative criterion perpetuated stereotypes or reinforced prejudice on the basis of age and thereby violated Section 15(1) of the Charter.

The gap, for our purposes, lies in the majority's analysis which focusses solely on the legislative criterion of age rather than the basis of discrimination suffered by Louise Gosselin in fact. The claimant in this case was a young woman who had relied on social assistance much of her adult life, being unable to keep a job for long. She had also been economically dependent on her mother, with whom she shared a difficult relationship but to whom she had nevertheless had to turn for a safe place to stay. She eventually moved out but was unable to pay her own rent and, on occasions, was forced into rough sleeping, leaving her vulnerable to sexual harassment. Her situation was aggravated by substance abuse and her delicate mental health, which made her opt out of vocational and educational training that could have increased her social assistance. Instead, she was stuck in a vicious cycle of receiving lower social assistance because she was under thirty, and slipping into mental distress, malnutrition, physical precarity, and sexual vulnerability, all of which in turn made her unable to participate in programmes which could have upgraded her amount of social assistance.

[29] [2002] 4 SCR 429 (SCC) (hereafter Gosselin).
[30] Ibid [31].
[31] Ibid [34].

Age was thus only part of Louise Gosselin's problem. Another claimant who was not a woman and was not exposed to the gendered nature of poverty, or who did not battle with mental health and could participate in the social assistance programmes uninterrupted, or who was in fact thirty or older and could benefit from full social assistance may not have found themselves in her situation. While they may still have suffered discrimination in their own way if they were also disabled, younger, and reliant on social assistance like Louise Gosselin, they would not have suffered the unique combination of discrimination suffered on the basis of all of these characteristics at the same time. But it was this similar and different nature of group disadvantage due to these characteristics that defined Louise Gosselin's experience with the social assistance scheme.

This understanding appears nowhere in Gosselin. The majority is concerned only with the legislative distinction based on age, taking it to be the ground, that is the basis or reason, on which discrimination may have occurred. Considerations beyond age are dismissed as Louise Gosselin's own 'personal problems', because of which she '[fell] through the cracks' of the legislative scheme.[32] But a legislative distinction may not perforce be the ground of discrimination even if it coincides with a ground like age. Structural discrimination can be far more discreet, based directly on one ground and indirectly causing discrimination on other grounds. If we are to ferret out such discrimination, we need to begin by thinking about discrimination conceptually in ways which go beyond strictly single-axis thinking.

Of course, this will only be a foot in the door. Conceptual categorization of discrimination alone will not ferret out invidious forms of discrimination, including intersectional discrimination. Gosselin is a prime example of this—its failure being a multi-faceted one, and not one of strictly single-axis thinking alone.[33] But conceptual clarity over how discrimination transpires is key to resolving other issues of doctrine. The clarity lies in being clear over the rudimentary matter of the causal link of grounds with discrimination.

The Canadian Supreme Court's discrimination jurisprudence is not the only one to have obfuscated this link in potential cases of intersectional discrimination. The South African Constitutional Court shows comparable signs in inopportune cases. In fact, the Constitutional Court's decision in S v Jordan[34] shows uncannily similar single-axis reasoning to Gosselin. The case involved a constitutional challenge to [32] Ibid [48] [55].

[33] For example, Sheila McIntyre has critiqued the application of a very low and deferential standard of review in 'The Supreme Court and Section 15: A Thin and Impoverished Notion of Judicial Review' (2006) 31 Queen's Law Journal 731; Gwen Brodsky has criticised the Court's justification analysis under s 1 of the Canadian Charter in 'Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General): Autonomy with a Vengeance' (2003) 15 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 194; Jennifer Koshan and Jonnette Watson Hamilton have criticised the acontextual discrimination analysis of the Court in 'The Continual Reinvention of Section 15 of the Charter' (2013) 64 University of New Brunswick Law Journal 19. These issues are considered in the next chapter.

[34] 2002 (6) SA 642 (SACC) (hereafter Jordan).

Section 20(1)(aA) of the Sexual Offences Act for unfairly discriminating against women. The state contended that the provision targeted both the prostitutes (as primary offender) and the customers (as accomplice) indulging in commercial sex and hence was not discriminatory. The appellants and the amici contended that it only targeted prostitutes (in principle, as the primary offender, as well as in practice, since only prostitutes were prosecuted), who were most often women, and hence discriminated on the basis of gender. The majority, led by Ngcobo J, upheld the neutral and formalistic construction of the provision to find that there was neither direct discrimination against women nor any indirect discrimination when a provision employed 'a common distinction' between a merchant and a customer for outlawing commercial sex.[35] The majority did not look beyond the pale of gender neutrality to recognize the reality that it was mainly women in the role of the 'merchant' who were penalized, and that the male customers were never prosecuted. The fact that those found in violation of the criminal provision were women was dismissed as being a result not of law, but of social attitudes.[36]

Jordan is rightly criticized for brushing aside indirect discrimination.[37] But there is something more basic than the difference between direct and indirect discrimination which the majority missed in this case. It is that whether it is direct or indirect discrimination (i.e. an explicit distinction or a neutral one), either one has to seem to cause discrimination based on certain ground(s) relevant to the claimant. Jordan was the case of a gender-neutral criminal provision under which only women were prosecuted in fact. The reason they were deemed criminal was not simply because of their gender or for being women per se, but that their gender, poverty, and employment status as prostitutes combined to produce patterns of group disadvantage for women who were economically worse off and hence had to take to prostitution which in turn was uniquely denigrative, and defined by physical, mental, and economic exploitation, social ostracization, and stereotypes and prejudices associated with it. Gender, strictly-speaking, could not explain this causal basis all on its own.

So when the majority assumed that '[t]he stigma that attaches to prostitutes attaches to them not by virtue of their gender, but by virtue of the conduct they engage in',[38] it was important to ask how this 'conduct' (flowing from the employment status that was dictated by gender and poverty) could be weighted into the discrimination analysis for having actually caused the discrimination being complained of. If only the Court were inclined to consider this, a range of possibilities would have opened up—reading-in class (socio-economic status or poverty) and

[35] Ibid [9] [10].
[36] Ibid [16]–[19].
[37] See Cathi Albertyn and Beth Goldblatt, 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 South African Journal on Human Rights 248 (hereafter Albertyn and Goldblatt, 'Facing the Challenge').
[38] Jordan (n 34) [16].

employment status or prostitution as aspects of the ground of gender; or treating them as possible analogous grounds; or taking them as part of the full context of discrimination; or treating gender–prostitution, gender–employment status, or gender–poverty–prostitution as embedded grounds of discrimination. As we will see when we proceed through the categories of discrimination in this chapter, these are all possibilities which give some acknowledgement to the causal basis of discrimination as being based on more than one identity, to open up ways that lead eventually to intersectional discrimination. None of these were explored in Jordan with the Court's strict focus on gender.

What is clear is that sex or gender alone cannot explain all forms of discrimination against women. Women's multiple identities, when they have a role to play in the discrimination being complained of, cannot simply be discarded as irrelevant if we care for discrimination as occurring on the basis of or because of certain characteristics, identities, or grounds.

A final example of the discrimination women face in respect of marriage should suffice. Consider the decisions of the South African Constitutional Court in Volks v Robinson[39] and the Canadian Supreme Court in Quebec v A.[40] The controversy in Volks revolved around the exclusion of partners in permanent opposite-sex relationships from claiming maintenance from the estates of their deceased partners if they were unable to support themselves. Similarly, Quebec v A concerned the exclusion of de facto spouses from matrimonial property. The majority in both cases held that the relevant statutory provisions did not discriminate on the basis of marital status. For them, the issue of unfair discrimination under Section 9(3) of the South African Constitution and substantive inequality under Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter was to be determined not only in reference to the actual disadvantage of being unable to inherit a deceased partner's property, but also as an impairment of fundamental human dignity[41] or objectionable stereotypes and prejudices.[42] The latter was absent in the opinion of the majorities. This was because exclusion from the benefits associated with the marital status of being married was accompanied by a freedom of self-determination and personal autonomy which included the choice not to marry and to dispose of property as one pleased.[43] Imposing a duty of maintenance after the death of a partner when none arose during their lifetime would have disrespected the deceased's choice not to marry and his freedom of testation.[44] According to the majority in both cases, there was thus no case of unfair discrimination or substantive inequality to be made in respect of surviving partners.

[39] 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (SACC) (hereafter Volks).
[40] [2013] 1 SCR 61 (SCC) (hereafter Quebec v A).
[41] Volks (n 39) [79].
[42] Quebec v A (n 40) [178].
[43] Volks (n 39) [60] [81] [82] [85] [87] [94].
[44] Ibid [17] [60] [62].

The problem with this line of reasoning lies in its exclusive focus on marital status couched as a matter of self-determination rather than fundamentally determined by gender and income inequality. The claimants before the two courts were women who, at all times, were prepared to marry. The fact that their wish to marry was not respected was a matter of unequal power relations between men and women, including women's financial dependence on their male partners. The Constitutional Court in Volks had before it the evidence presented by the amicus curie which showed the vulnerability of women in cohabitation relationships.[45] According to the Court, the evidence was based on qualitative research from 'only eight poor communities'[46] relating primarily to 'African' and 'Coloured' women.[47] Contrasted with 'statistical or scientific evidence capable of easy verification', the evidence brought by the amicus curie was seen as 'non-representative', 'controversial', and not relating to the 'direct case before the court'.[48] Similarly, the Supreme Court in Quebec v A had heard intervenors who had contended that relationships which were spousal in nature were marked by gender inequality.[49] Skweyiya J, writing for the majority in Volks, expressed in passing his 'sympathy' and 'genuine concern' for female surviving partners whose deceased male partners had refused to marry them and found that the 'conduct of the male partner is unconscionable in these cases'.[50] But, like the court in Jordan, he concluded that gender inequality in this case was a product of social reality not law.[51] Similarly, McLachlin J in Quebec v A, recognized the 'unfortunate dilemma' of women like the claimant but found that it was ultimately proportionate to the benefits of choice and autonomy guaranteed by the scheme.[52] But neither court was inclined to consider the actual impact of the exclusion on those in marriage-like relationships, particularly women who were financially dependent on and subservient to the choices of their male partners. The actual impact was one which was defined not only by marital status but also by marital status, gender, class, and even race, considered together.

These cases are paradigmatic of single-axis discrimination because of their blinkered view of the causality of discrimination as based on one, and only one, ground alone, when the situation in each of the cases warranted a more complex view. There are a whole host of things the courts consequently get wrong—the criteria for admitting analogous grounds, the difference between direct and indirect discrimination, the substantive test of wrongful discrimination, the standard of review etc. We want to pick through each of these when we come to it in the next chapter. But what is key to getting other aspects of a discrimination inquiry right

[45] Ibid [30] [31].
[46] Ibid [34].
[47] Ibid [33].
[48] Ibid [31]–[35].
[49] Quebec v A (n 40) [49].
[50] Volks (n 39) [59] [68].
[51] Ibid [66].
[52] Quebec v A (n 40) [449] (concurring in result with the majority).

is a prior matter of conceiving discrimination as based on more than one ground at all. If we conceive of it as quantitatively limited to one ground, we tend to miss discrimination which is multi-causal and ultimately qualitatively intersectional in nature.

3.2 Substantially Single-axis Discrimination

Another way of understanding an intersectional claim is to think of it as not strictly but substantially based on a single-axis. The difference lies in acknowledging that there may be other axes relevant to the claim, but ultimately construing the claim as running along a single central axis. The result is similar to strict single-axis in that the construction misses the causal basis and hence the qualitative nature of discrimination just the same, albeit with an admission that the claim may have been substantiated on another ground too.

The decision of the South African Constitutional Court in Brink v Kitshoff NO,[53] which was the first case brought under the non-discrimination guarantee of the interim constitution, exemplifies this approach.[54] O'Regan J's discussion on the normative foundations of equality and non-discrimination, especially acknowledging the possibility of discrimination to be based on multiple grounds, was a remarkable feat for a new court.

The question before the court was whether a provision under the Insurance Act 1943 discriminated against married women by depriving them, in certain circumstances, of all or some of the benefits of life insurance policies made in their favour by their husbands. O'Regan J introduced the claim as one based on two grounds of discrimination, namely, sex and marital status. The fact that one of them (marital status) was not an enumerated ground did not affect the nature of protection since the constitution explicitly recognized the possibility of discrimination being based on 'one or more' grounds. She thus reaffirmed that the enumerated list of grounds 'should not be used to derogate from the generality of the prohibition on discrimination'.[55] Despite this, according to her, even when discrimination was apparently based on two grounds, it was not necessary to construe it as such and it was 'sufficient that the disadvantageous treatment is substantially based on one of the listed prohibited grounds'.[56] O'Regan J was cognizant of the relative effort in reading-in the analogous ground of marital status to be able to eventually find for [53] 1996 (4) SA 197 (SACC) (hereafter Brink).

[54] Section 8 on 'Equality' under the Interim Constitution of South Africa 1993 provided in part: '(2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language'.

[55] Brink (n 53) [43].

[56] Ibid.

discrimination on both the grounds. From the claimant's perspective, it was also sensible to resort to a listed ground rather than an analogous one since the constitution offered a presumption of unfairness when discrimination was based on one or more of the listed grounds. No doubt she considered it pragmatic to simply find for discrimination on the basis of sex alone.

But the expediency of finding discrimination to be 'substantially' based on a single ground fails to reach the heart of discrimination—that something is discriminatory because of the wrongful conduct or effects being based on certain identities or grounds. The approach may thus be 'accused of failing to perceive an applicant's "true" experience of disadvantage'.[57] As such, although Brink itself succeeded, its approach can still be critiqued within the framework of intersectionality which has a particular interest in respecting the claimant's identity and treating her as a whole person in tracing similar and different patterns of group disadvantage. The specific claim in Brink was against 'married women'.[58] The impugned provision concerned 'spouses married in community of property and protect[ed] life insurance policies owned by a wife from attachment in certain circumstances'.[59] Characterizing this as mainly or substantially a claim of sex discrimination runs the danger of essentializing the disadvantage associated with an individual ground like sex, thus undermining the causal link of sex discrimination with marital status and the specific disadvantage women face in marriage.

Gumede v President[60] and Moseneke v The Master of High Court[61] also tow this line. Gumede concerned issues of ownership, including access to and control of family property that affected women during and upon dissolution of customary marriages. It was identified as 'a claim of unfair discrimination on the grounds of gender and race in relation to women who are married under customary law'.[62] Yet, the discrimination analysis focussed on gender inequality in marriages, making only sporadic references to gender inequality in customary marriages. The thrust of the analysis became the 'self-evident discrimination on at least one listed ground: gender'.[63] The decision thus glossed over the specific situation of women in customary marriages which is comparable but in no way coincides with women in civil marriages generally. On the other hand, in Moseneke, the claimant had argued that it was discriminatory in intestate succession that white people's estates were administered by the Master of the High Court, while Black people's were administered by a Magistrate. The case was argued as a matter of race discrimination but the amicus had aptly pointed out that in the case of intestate estates of deceased [57] Marius Pieterse, 'Finding for the Applicant? Individual Equality Plaintiffs and Group-based Disadvantage' (2008) 24 South African Journal on Human Rights 397, 407.

[58] Brink (n 53) [19] [43] [47] [50] (O'Regan J).
[59] Ibid [21].
[60] 2009 (3) SA 152 (SACC) [1] (hereafter Gumede).
[61] 2001 (2) SA 18 (SACC) (hereafter Moseneke).
[62] Gumede (n 60) [1].
[63] Ibid [34].

Africans, race, gender, and culture interacted in a way which discriminated directly and indirectly against African widows.[64] Yet, the Court's analysis did not explore the qualitative distinction of discrimination based on both race and gender. Racism consumed the impact of discrimination on Black women, no matter their gender.

Obviating grounds by actively and substantially focussing on a single ground is not just a trend in South African jurisprudence alone, even if it were most characteristically laid down in Brink.[65] In her minority opinion in Mossop, L'Heureux Dubé J also preferred this approach even when she recognized that: 'The situation of individuals who confront multiple grounds of disadvantage is particularly complex . . . Categorizing such discrimination as primarily racially oriented, or primarily gender-oriented, misconceives the reality of discrimination as it is experienced by individuals.' Be that as it may, the ultimate treatment of the issue was determined thus: 'On a practical level, where both forms of discrimination [viz. on race and gender] are prohibited, one can ignore the complexity of the interaction, and characterise the discrimination as of one type or the other. The person is protected from discrimination in either event.'[66]

In 2010, the Second Circuit Court of Appeal in the United States adopted this approach in Gorzynski v JetBlue Airways Corp.[67] The claimant in Gorzynski was a 54 year-old woman who was employed with the customer services department of an airline. She was subjected to several sexually coloured and ageist remarks, negative performance evaluations, and disparate training standards in comparison with other women and other male employees. One of her arguments was that 'she was treated differently because of her status as an older woman, rather than because of age or gender acting as independent factors'.[68] The Court readily acknowledged that 'where two bases of discrimination exist, the two grounds cannot be neatly reduced to distinct components'.[69] However, it went on to find that '[h]aving determined that Gorzynski has provided sufficient evidence of age discrimination to reach a jury, there is no need for us to create an age-plus-sex claim independent from Gorzynski's viable [age discrimination] claim'.[70] The holding is uncannily similar to Brink, which likewise acknowledged the possibility of multi-causal basis of discrimination but ultimately found it sufficient to deal with the claim as based on a single ground. The acknowledgement basically portrays that single-axis discrimination and intersectional discrimination on two or more grounds may be the same, such that even when, per Gorzynski, 'grounds cannot be neatly reduced to [64] Moseneke (n 61) [17].

[65] See the decision of the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario in Arias v Desai 2003 HRTO 1.
[66] Mossop (n 22) 106.
[67] 596 F 3d 93 (2d Cir 2010) (USCA).
[68] Ibid 109.
[69] Ibid.
[70] Ibid 110.

distinct components', claimants can somehow provide 'sufficient evidence' of discrimination based on one ground alone. Causally speaking, it can only be one or the other. And if these cases were admittedly multi-dimensional, then it should neither have been possible nor preferable to have them proven on a single ground. Substantial single-axis discrimination thus reproduces the weaknesses of single-axis discrimination in appreciating the complexion of causality when discrimination is said to be based on more than one ground.

3.3 Capacious Single-axis Discrimination

As substantial single-axis thinking shows, strict single-axis is not the only way of limiting intersectional claims to a single ground. It is even possible to limit discrimination to a single ground and yet interpret it capaciously.[71] The result is qualitatively different from strict and substantial forms of single-axis thinking. EU discrimination jurisprudence shows this strikingly.

Consider the landmark case of Marshall decided by the Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) in 1986.[72] The facts involved a claimant who was dismissed from employment because she had reached the retirement age. The Social Security Act 1975 (UK) set a qualifying retirement age of sixty years for women and sixty-five years for men to access their state pension, but imposed no obligation to retire at the said age. The claimant challenged her dismissal as discrimination on the ground of sex under Article 5(1) of Council Directive 76/207/EEC on the equal treatment between men and women in employment.[73] The Court held that the dismissal of a woman 'solely because she has attained or passed the qualifying age for a State pension, which age is different under national legislation for men and for women' constituted discrimination on the ground of sex under the Directive.[74] The Court's terse reasoning hints at its capacious reading of the ground of sex which involves other aspects of discrimination against women, including age. According to the Court, when the 'sole' reason for dismissal of a woman is her age, the dismissal is a matter of discrimination on the basis of sex after all. Unlike the strict approach, the Court does not jostle with age and sex to determine which one of them caused discrimination; and unlike the substantial approach the Court [71] A concept first explained by Sandra Fredman in her EU Commission Report for the European network of legal experts in gender equality and non-discrimination, 'Intersectional Discrimination in EU Gender Equality and Non-discrimination Law' (2016) <https://publications.europa.eu/en/publication-detail/-/publication/d73a9221-b7c3-40f6-8414-8a48a2157a2f> accessed 30 March 2019.

[72] Case 152/84 Marshall v Southampton and South West Area Health Authority [1986] ECR 723 (CJEU) (hereafter Marshall).

[73] Article 5(1) provided that: 'the principle of equal treatment with regard to working conditions, including the conditions governing dismissal, means that men and women shall be guaranteed the same conditions without discrimination on grounds of sex'.

[74] Marshall (n 72) [38].

also does not say that one of the two grounds of age or sex could have substantially captured the discrimination at play. Instead, the Court reads sex discrimination capaciously to include aspects of age which disadvantage women. In effect the Court finds for discrimination against the claimant as an older woman, by acknowledging that both age and sex played a part in causing the discrimination which neither younger women nor older men would have suffered, whereas both younger women and older men would have suffered from general sexism and ageism. The result of dismissal from service could be explained fully in reference to both similarities as well as differences in patterns of group disadvantage based on sex and age. Looking for only or substantially one or the other would not have uncovered the nature of discrimination suffered.

The capacious approach flows perhaps from the language of EU law itself in that it recognizes that discrimination on the basis of a particular ground includes discrimination in reference to other grounds as well. For example, one of the earliest EU Directives (76/207 of 1976) had provided that 'the principle of equal treatment shall mean that there shall be no discrimination whatsoever on grounds of sex either directly or indirectly by reference in particular to marital or family status'.[75] Similarly, Directive 79/7 of 1978 on the progressive implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in matters of social security provided that the Directive applied to statutory schemes which provided protection against: sickness, invalidity, old age, accidents at work and occupational diseases, and employment.[76] Intersections of these other disadvantages with sex thus became a matter of sex discrimination construed capaciously. The CJEU's typically concise opinions simply adopt this capacious approach flowing from the legislation without more. P v S[77] is the locus classicus in this regard. According to the CJEU, 'the scope of the [sex equality] Directive cannot be confined simply to discrimination based on the fact that a person is of one or other sex . . . the scope of the directive is also such as to apply to discrimination arising, as in this case, from the gender reassignment of the person concerned'.[78] It thus held that dismissal from employment due to a person's gender reassignment 'is based, essentially if not exclusively on the sex of the person concerned'.[79] Since gender reassignment is not itself a ground recognized under EU law, a capacious reading of sex allowed for the protection from discrimination to be extended to gender reassignment.

In fact, some rather hard cases which would have otherwise fallen through the cracks of single-axis discrimination fare successfully under the capacious view:

[75] Council Directive 76/207 on the implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women as regards access to employment, vocational training and promotion, and working conditions [1976] OJ L39/40. See also Council Directive 79/7 on the progressive implementation of the principle of equal treatment for men and women in matters of social security [1979] OJ L6/1, arts 2(1) and 4(1).

[76] Council Directive 79/7, ibid, art 3(1).

[77] Case C-13/94 P v S and Cornwall County Council [1996] IRLR 347 (CJEU) (hereafter P v S).

[78] Ibid [20]

[79] Ibid [21].

Helga Kutz-Bauer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg,[80] Steinicke v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit,[81] and Brachner v Pensionsversicherungsanstalt,[82] to name a few.[83] In Kutz-Bauer, the CJEU held that a part-time scheme for older employees was discriminatory when it impacted those between the age of fifty-five and sixty-five years differently on the ground of sex. The scheme operated in such a way that 'the great majority' of workers who could actually take advantage of the five-year flexible work arrangement were men because their retirement age was sixty-five as compared to women whose retirement age was set at 60.[84] In finding that such a difference was discrimination on the ground of sex, the Court was not inhibited by the fact that the criterion of differentiation and its impact were grounded in both age and sex at the same time. Similarly, in Steineke, the Court found another part-time scheme for older employees to be discriminating on the basis of sex, when the scheme required employees to have been working full-time for at least three out five years before applying. Since 'the group of persons who have chiefly worked part-time during the period referred to by the provision at issue and who are thereby excluded from that scheme consists mainly of women',[85] the Court concluded that the scheme 'results as a matter of fact in discrimination against female workers by comparison with male workers'.[86] The disadvantage suffered at the intersection of part-time work, age, and sex was deemed to be a matter of sex discrimination. In Brachner, the Court again found for indirect sex discrimination against the intersectional group of older women. The case concerned a statutory provision which reserved an exceptional increase in pensions to those receiving pensions above EUR 746.99 per month. The percentage of men receiving this amount was found to be approximately 2.3 times higher than the percentage of women.[87] Thus, the category of retired persons suffering disadvantage consisted of a significantly greater number of older women than older men. The statistics in favour of the intersectional group of older women defined by their age and sex became a basis of finding for sex discrimination.

There are examples from other jurisdictions as well. For example, in the South African Constitutional Court's decision in Volks, the dissenting opinion of [80] Case C-187/00 Kutz-Bauer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [2003] ECR I-02741 (CJEU) (hereafter Kutz-Bauer).

[81] Case C-77/02 Steinicke v Bundesanstalt für Arbeit [2003] ECR I-09027 (CJEU) (hereafter Steinicke).

[82] Case C-123/10 Brachner v Pensionsversicherungsanstalt [2011] ECR I-000 (CJEU) (hereafter Brachner).

[83] See also Case C-171/88 Rinner-Kühn v FWW Spezial-Gebäudereinigung GmbH & Co KG [1989] ECR 2743 (CJEU) [12]; Case C-457/93 Kuratorium für Dialyse und Nierentransplantation v Lewark [1996] ECR I-243 (CJEU) [31]; Case C-243/95 Hill and Stapleton v The Revenue Commissioners and Department of Finance [1998] ECR I-03739 (CJEU) [34]; Case C-226/98 Jørgensen v Foreningen af Speciallæger and Syge- sikringens Forhandlingsudvalg [2000] ECR I-2447 (CJEU) [29].

[84] Kutz-Bauer (n 80) [45]

[85] Steinicke (n 81) [56].

[86] Ibid [57].

[87] Brachner (n 82) [29].

Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ proceeded on the single ground of marital status but ended up finding for unfair discrimination against survivors of permanent and intimate life partnerships which were 'socially and functionally' similar to marriage. Their primary thrust was on clarifying the purpose of the prohibition of discrimination based on marital status and why Mrs Robinson's case was a central case of marital status discrimination in fact. Within this, they considered how 'rules of marriage [were] discriminatory on the grounds of gender and sex'.[88] They were thus able to appreciate how gender inequalities associated with marriage were reproduced in marriage-like relationships. Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ seem to have adopted a capacious view of a single-axis, like marital status, to conceive of structural disadvantages associated with gender within it.[89]

The capacious single-axis approach is further ahead than strictly and substantially single-axis discrimination because it not only admits two or more grounds into the discrimination analysis but also ensures that such multi-causal basis helps appreciate the qualitative nature of discrimination at play. The approach is closer to intersectional discrimination even if it is ultimately defined as discrimination based on a single ground. This is because, in spite of its formal characterization of being based on one ground, the substantive reasoning is multi-causal and appreciates that discrimination is actually a result of interaction of several identities. This approach works for claimants who are already seen, generally or on the basis of statistical evidence, to be part of a distinct disadvantaged subgroup. Thus, in the cases brought by older women under EU law, the considerable sympathy towards older women as a subgroup and the incontrovertible evidence of their relative disadvantage made it easy to argue for discrimination associated with age for women and hence for older women per se.[90] In a similar vein, obese persons have been included within the protection from discrimination on the grounds of disability under EU law.[91] The capacious approach has also worked equally well in cases of sexual orientation discrimination for unmarried gay couples. In Maruko and Romer, a capacious view of sexual orientation discrimination was taken under Directive 2000/78 to include the denial of a survivor's benefits under the occupational pension scheme of a deceased same-sex life partner when such benefits were confined to partners within opposite-sex relationships or marriage previously.[92] Discrimination against gay men and women in same-sex life partnerships was considered a matter of sexual orientation discrimination when national laws had abolished marital-status distinctions between married and unmarried life

[88] Volks (n 39) [109] (Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ).
[89] Ibid [108]–[118].
[90] See esp Case C-4/02 Hilde Schönheit v Stadt Frankfurt am Main and Case C-5/02 Silvia Becker v Land Hessen [2003] ECR I-12575 (CJEU) [35].
[91] Kaltoft (n 2) [64].
[92] Case C-267/06 Tadao Maruko v Versorgungsanstalt der deutschen Bühnen [2008] ECR I-1757 (CJEU); Case C-147/08 Jürgen Römer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [2011] ECR I-3591 (CJEU).

partnerships. Marital status was thus subsumed within sexual orientation and considered an aspect of sexual orientation itself.

But the approach does not work so well in cases where a subgroup is not socially salient or there is little statistical evidence relating to the subgroup in particular. For example, the CJEU in 1998 was reluctant to admit sexual orientation discrimination against a lesbian claimant as part of sex discrimination because such an interpretation 'does not in any event appear to reflect the interpretation so far generally accepted of the concept of discrimination based on sex which appears in various international instruments concerning the protection of fundamental rights, [and it] cannot in any case constitute a basis for the Court to extend the scope of Article 119 of the Treaty'.[93] This was two years after the Court had found that discrimination against trans persons was part of sex discrimination.[94] Similarly, unlike Maruko and Romer, the result in Parris v Trinity College Dublin[95] confirms that the lack of a socio-legal consensus on the equivalence of marriage and life partnerships between same-sex individuals debars the capacious view of sexual orientation discrimination to include intersections with marital status and age discrimination. Social consensus on who was considered protected within sex discrimination explains the difference in extending the capacious single-axis discrimination to some cases but not others.

This approach is thus highly contingent and suits only a limited number of cases. One may argue that, principally, this need not be so. Thus, for example, disability, race, and gender must each be capacious enough to include all forms of disability, race, and gender discrimination such that discrimination based on one of them can be described as another just the same. That is, discrimination against a fat Black man can then be described as capacious disability discrimination, capacious race discrimination, or capacious sex discrimination. Such an approach suffers from solipsism. It is important to understand why.

We are interested in explaining intersectional discrimination as a category of discrimination such that it is based on structures of disadvantage which are not, after all, singular or unidimensional. This matters because we want to be diagnostically clear about how patterns of group disadvantage interact and create similar and different patterns of intersectional group disadvantage. So, we are interested in reckoning with intersectionality as a category of discrimination, such that these patterns, even if multi-dimensional, are said to be based on multiple grounds, because that is what makes discrimination discrimination. The capacious approach runs the danger of explaining away this diagnostic link as insignificant. Discrimination under this approach could be based on one or another [93] C-249/96 Grant v South West-Trains [1998] ECR I-00621 (CJEU).

[94] P v S (n 77).
[95] Case C-443/15 Parris v Trinity College Dublin [2017] ICR 313 (CJEU) (hereafter Parris). See discussion on Parris in section 4 on multiple discrimination.

ground because each ground is considered capable of explaining discrimination so far as it intersects with another. Capacious single-axis discrimination may thus turn out to be too self-referential rather than intersectional for the purposes of discrimination law.

3.4 Contextual Single-axis Discrimination

Focussing on a single ground strictly or substantially, or on groups included capaciously within a ground, are not the only ways of conceptualizing single-axis discrimination. One can also look at single-axis discrimination contextually and consider other identities or grounds as the context shaping the experience of discrimination. What does this entail?

The South African Constitutional Court has explained the contextual approach to discrimination as:

> Discrimination does not take place in discrete areas of the law, hermetically sealed from one another, where each aspect of discrimination is to be examined and its impact evaluated in isolation. Discrimination must be understood in the context of the experience of those on whom it impacts.[96]
>
> One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgement that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both, that is, globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly. The objective is to determine in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way if the group concerned is subjected to scarring of a sufficiently serious nature as to merit constitutional intervention.[97]

According to Albertyn and Goldblatt, there are four aspects of the contextual approach: (i) analysis of the socio-economic situation of the claimant; (ii) impact on the claimant as flowing from systemic patterns of group disadvantage; (iii) relevance of examining complex forms of discrimination yielded by multiple identities in an intersectional way; and finally (iv) an appreciation of the historical context of the claim.[98] Similarly, in the Canadian context, Iacobucci J in Law enlisted four non-cumulative and non-exhaustive 'contextual' factors as: (i) pre-existing disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping or prejudice experienced by the individual or group; (ii) relationship between grounds and the claimant's characteristics or [96] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (SACC) [35].

[97] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (SACC) [113].

[98] Albertyn and Goldblatt, 'Facing the Challenge' (n 37) 260–61.

circumstances; (iii) ameliorative purposes or effects; and (iv) nature of the interest affected.[99]

What constitutes 'context' is thus framed very broadly such that a whole host of factors can be considered relevant to a discrimination claim. Context can be taken to reflect all such identities, conditions, and circumstances which are relevant to the experience of discrimination. Here, we are primarily concerned with the understanding of context as identities which form the basis of discrimination. Construed this way, identities which are not captured as grounds have the potential to be factored into the discrimination analysis via context. The possibility seems intuitively attractive. It is then useful to examine those cases where context as identities has been used to explicate the nature of discrimination, especially that which is intersectional. The most interesting and relevant cases are of indirect discrimination—where the criteria of discrimination do not themselves invoke multiple identities but the impact is suffered by those who belong to multiple disadvantaged groups at once. The minority opinions in Volks and Gosselin are telling examples, and I take them each in turn.

In Volks, the dissenting opinion of Sachs J reckoned with gender as the context of the claim based on the ground of marital status. He distinguished this approach from the strictly single-axis view of the majority and the capacious view of Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ in these terms:

> The source of the complexity appears to lie elsewhere. In my view this is one of those cases in which however forceful the reasoned text might be, it is the largely unstated subtext which will be determinative of the outcome. The formal legal issue before us is embedded in an elusive, evolving and resilient matrix made up of varied historical, social, moral and cultural ingredients. At times these emerge and enter explicitly into the legal discourse. More often they exercise a subterranean influence, all the more powerful for being submerged in deep and largely unarticulated philosophical positions.[100]

Sachs J's characterization of the issue as being multi-layered, and more complex and elusive, is accurate. According to him, a strictly formal view of the claim may camouflage the complexity of discrimination.[101] While he too described the 'legal issue' as discrimination based on the ground of marital status,[102] the issue, for him, was situated within a 'framework of reference that goes beyond the classificatory landscape established by the impugned measure itself'[103] and defined by its 'socio-legal context: patriarchy and poverty'.[104] In light of this, he noted that:

[99] Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1999] 1 SCR 497 (SCC) (hereafter Law v Canada) [59] [87].
[100] Volks (n 39) [149].
[101] Ibid [147]–[148].
[102] Ibid [189]–[190].
[103] Ibid [191].
[104] Ibid [163].

> it is women rather than men who suffered disadvantage because of their status of being married or unmarried. Any investigation of unfairness resulting from marital status would accordingly have to take into account the manner in which patriarchy dictated the advantage or disadvantage associated with the status of being married or not being married.[105]

This contextual framing led him to find the exclusion of unmarried partners from inheritance to be unfair discrimination.[106] He particularized his analysis to the context of female cohabiting partners who survived their male partners, and identified both the specific vulnerability of women as well as broader patterns of disadvantage associated with marital status, including socio-economic vulnerability and poverty.

The minority opinions in Gosselin had followed a similar approach. L'Heureux-Dubé J warned against abstract generalizations and categorizations based on grounds and insisted on evaluating the effects of the impugned distinction based on age.[107] She went beyond the government's stated purpose and criterion of discrimination and focussed specifically on the claimant and the impact upon her. She thus found a whole set of surrounding circumstances to be accentuating Louise Gosselin's position including: the 'imminent and severe threat of poverty' arising from the disparate operation of the training programmes; vulnerability to malnutrition and to prostitution in order to make ends meet; and the wholesale exclusion from participation in Canadian society.[108] Although L'Heureux-Dubé J went on to find discrimination to be the 'sole consequence' of the claimant's age, her reliance on the context of Louise Gosselin's gender, poverty, and disability changed her view of the impact of the age-based criterion for accessing social assistance.[109] Not only did the contextual approach help reveal the disadvantage in the case of Louise Gosselin in particular, but it also, according to Bastarache J's dissenting opinion, showed how Louise Gosselin's situation was illustrative of the manner in which the social assistance scheme violated the basic human dignity of those below the age of thirty, such that there was 'no necessity for her to bring evidence of actual deprivation of other named welfare recipients under the age of 30'.[110] He treated Louise Gosselin as representative of those in her position, who were not suffering just because they were under thirty, but who, because of their own context and circumstances, were suffering the structural disadvantage inflicted by an arbitrary criterion like age.

A contextual approach to single-axis discrimination is especially helpful when a claimant may have chosen to argue a potential intersectional claim on

[105] Ibid [199].
[106] Ibid [219]–[220].
[107] Gosselin (n 29) [110]–[111].
[108] Ibid [132].
[109] Ibid.
[110] Ibid [255].

a single ground. Once the claim is argued as such, it may be inapt for the court to read-in another ground to the discrimination claim. For claims challenging general legislative provisions, it may also be the case that the provision (criterion) is directly discriminating on a single ground but ends up adversely affecting the claimants on multiple grounds. In such cases, 'context' becomes relevant as a device for recognizing causality which is explained in reference to multiple identities, circumstances etc., beyond a single ground. Thus, a provision excluding survivors of cohabitation relationships can be found discriminatory on the basis of marital status but, in the case of a female claimant, it may be apposite for the court to note her intersectional disadvantage accruing not just on the basis of marital status but also gender via context (Volks). The approach seems particularly appropriate in challenging legislative provisions and policy decisions rather than individual cases of discrimination, where those situated differently may face discrimination based on that difference in context (Volks and Gosselin). It helps respond directly to the impugned provision based on a single ground (marital status or age) but contextualizes it enough to relate to broader patterns of group disadvantage. At the same time, the approach focusses on the situation of the actual claimant in fact and allows us to extrapolate, from her experience, the experience of those similarly situated. Thus, both Bastrache and L'Heureux Dubé JJ in Gosselin focussed on the particular claimant and her experience of the law rather than the exclusive viewpoint of the legislature. The contextual approach satisfies the claimant's interest in integrity in that it helps appreciate, what Duclos calls, the whole picture of discrimination, which goes beyond the exclusive focus on a particular characteristic and includes 'not only individual complainant and respondent, and all their attributes, but others (co-workers, tenants, customers), their various relationships, and the environment in which the situation arose'.[111]

For all this, the contextual approach is a step in the right direction in realizing intersectionality. If the eventual explanation of disadvantage suffered is described in intersectional terms—appreciating similar and different patterns of group disadvantage suffered by the claimant as a whole in the full and relevant context, like in the dissenting opinions of Sachs J in Volks and L'Heureux Dubé and Bastrache JJ in Gosselin, there is a real possibility of addressing intersectional discrimination without reference to multiple grounds of discrimination. If identities can be reckoned with as context, and context is deemed causally significant, one can overcome the single-axis thinking as based on a single ground alone.

Yet, for the purposes of intersectionality, it may be legitimate to argue for the use of contextual analysis in respect of multiple grounds rather than a single ground. The framework of intersectionality outlined in the last chapter argued for this—to see multiple identities as grounds, within their full and relevant context—for charting patterns of group disadvantage. This characterization rests on a vital distinction between identities as grounds, and their context. I think the distinction is a useful one to retain in discrimination law. I will explore the nature of grounds in the next chapter to clarify this distinction, but it may suffice to clarify the relationship between grounds and context here.

[111] Nitya Duclos, 'Disappearing Women: Racial Minority Women in Human Rights Cases' (1993) 6 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 25, 50.

1936

This chapter has been concerned with the categorization of discrimination in a causal (correlative) way. The purpose is to understand how certain structures of disadvantage associated with people's identities or personal characteristics interact in yielding intersectional discrimination. Context enables this understanding by revealing the background conditions which facilitate these structures of disadvantage. Thus, for example, amongst other things, the war on drugs, incarceration laws, gun control, and police impunity make up the context in which race discrimination transpires in twenty-first-century United States. It contributes to why race operates as a ground of discrimination, by segregating people into social groups with massive differences in socio-economic, political, and cultural power. Similarly, South African and Indian discrimination law continue to be defined by, and at the same time to fight against, the racist and casteist ideologies which manifest in housing arrangements, quality of education, level of employment, access to justice, and so on. These contextual framings thus make up both the grounds of discrimination in a general sense and the individual instances of discrimination based on these grounds in specific ways. But, in the general sense, context is too broad to causally explain the link between specific instances of discrimination and grounds. Contextual single-axis discrimination, like other categories of single-axis thinking, runs the risk of obscuring this link by calling everything relevant to discrimination a matter of context, while facially operating on a single ground. It is the opposite of the capacious approach which deems every causal connection, however strong or weak, as capable of being explained within a single ground in question. While it is obviously much more appreciative of intersectionality than strict and substantial single-axis discrimination, which ignore multi-causal explanations of discrimination either completely or substantially, it is less appreciative of the distinction that intersectionality maintains between identities and context in terms of the distinctive roles they play in explaining the nature of intersectional discrimination.

So much for single-axis forms of conceptualizing discrimination in law. What happens when we open up the causal basis of discrimination to actually include multiple grounds? Does it help in appreciating the nature of discrimination in intersectional claims? The next four sections explain the different ways in which multiple grounds have been accounted for in discrimination cases and the categories of discrimination they yield, namely, multiple, additive, embedded, and intersectional.

4. Multiple Discrimination

Courts may move beyond single-axis thinking and admit that discrimination can be based on more than one ground. One way they do so is by treating discrimination as devolving on multiple grounds individually. The UK Court of Appeal's reasoning in Bahl v Law Society[112] is typical of what may be characterized as multiple discrimination where multiple grounds are treated discreetly and in isolation from one another.[113] Bahl largely mirrors the single-axis reasoning in DeGraffenreid in that the claim based on the grounds of race and sex was split into independent claims to be proven separately. The difference between the two is that while the DeGraffenreid Court insisted that the claimant could only show either race or sex discrimination, the Bahl Court agreed that discrimination could be based on both of the grounds, provided they were argued and proven separately.

The case concerned Dr Kamlesh Bahl, a Black woman, who had served as the Vice President of the Law Society in the UK. She argued that she had been discriminated against by its members, especially its President and Secretary General, in the determination of staff complaints against her behaviour. In analysing the copious evidence presented before the courts below, Peter Gibson LJ found that the Employment Tribunal had omitted to 'identify what evidence goes to support a finding of race discrimination and what evidence goes to support a finding of sex discrimination' and that it would have been 'surprising if the evidence for each form of discrimination was the same'.[114] He insisted that for a claim of race and sex discrimination to succeed, the claimant should prove both sex and race discrimination separately such that discrimination was based on 'either race or sex' at a time.[115] This way of conceptualizing a claim based on multiple grounds may have resulted from the atomized nature of UK discrimination law before the Equality Act 2010, when sex was a protected ground under the Sex Discrimination Act 1975 and racial discrimination was prohibited separately under the Race Relations Act 1976. But this conceptualization led the Court to imagine the grounds of race and sex as mutually exclusive, as if the disadvantage associated with being Black and female were disembodied. The multiplicity of grounds basically multiplied and disintegrated the identity of the claimant as a Black person and as a woman. This in turn delimited the possibility of seeing how patterns of discrimination based on race and sex co-existed and co-constituted one another, denying any recognition of [112] [2004] EWCA Civ 1070 (UK Court of Appeal) (hereafter Bahl).

[113] 'Multiple discrimination' is often used as a generic term, especially in EU law, to denote all forms of multi-ground discrimination, including additive, combination, compound, embedded, overlapping, and intersectional discrimination. Here, multiple discrimination is used in a particular sense to denote the category of thinking about intersectional claims which treats intersectional discrimination as 'multiple' single-axis claims.

[114] Bahl (n 112) [137].

[115] Ibid [115]–[137].

similar and different patterns of group disadvantage suffered by Dr Bahl as a Black woman.[116]

Section 14 of the Equality Act 2010 breaks away from Bahl and multiple discrimination. Under Section 14, it is not necessary to show that the treatment complained of was direct discrimination 'because of each of the characteristics in the combination (taken separately)'. If Section 14 were brought into effect, the Bahl approach would lose ground.[117] But while Section 14 remains unenforced, the current position under the Equality Act 2010 appears to be the same as in Bahl, with the claimant having to prove each ground separately under Section 13 on direct discrimination or Section 19 on indirect discrimination. There are signs that the UK courts may in fact have fortuitously overcome the Bahl reasoning despite an unenforced Section 14.[118] Yet, Bahl remains the highest and only detailed consideration of a claim actually argued on two grounds and marks a missed opportunity for the Court of Appeal.

Similarly, although much of the US jurisprudence has progressed from strictly single-axis discrimination in DeGraffenreid to additive discrimination, intersectional claims continue to be characterized as multiple discrimination as well. Cases at the intersection of the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 are particularly prone to this. For example, in Lowe v Angelo's Italian Foods,[119] the complainant had alleged discrimination under both the statutes. She was referred to as 'girl' or 'girlie' by the employer and had overheard a line cook remark 'no skirts in the kitchen'. She was consistently told what to wear at work while other (male) waiters were left to choose for themselves. When Lowe presented a letter from her doctor stating that she could not stoop, bend, lift weight, or climb stairs because of her medical condition (Multiple Sclerosis), she was immediately dismissed. The Court allowed only her disability discrimination claim to proceed. According to the Court, the complainant had failed to establish that she was treated less favourably than male employees in respect of the dress code, since she could not show that the male employees were 'similarly situated'. Similarly, the Court found that the complainant's evidence did not reveal a case of 'hostile work environment' since the evidence of sexual or [116] This is not to say that such discrimination in fact existed in Bahl. It is the conceptual denial of the Court which is being critiqued here. In fact, as James Hand notes, it was 'the non-existence of credible evidence and the absence of justification for inferences that caused the claim to fail'. See 'Combined Discrimination—Section 14 of the Equality Act 2010: A Partial and Redundant Provision?' [2011] Public Law 482.

[117] This need not necessarily be the case; Iyiola Solanke finds it 'questionable whether the new provision corrects the eclipse highlighted by the theory of intersectional discrimination'. Discrimination as Stigma: A Theory of Anti-discrimination Law (Hart 2016) 149.

[118] See Hewage v Grampian Health Board [2012] UKSC 37 [26], which does not explicitly deal with intersectional discrimination, but the Supreme Court gives a nod to claims based on the grounds of race and sex and using a single comparator group like white males to prove discrimination based on both grounds.

[119] 87 F 3d 1170 (10th Cir 1996) (USCA).

gendered remarks, regrettable as they were, did not permeate the work environment 'with discriminatory intimidation, ridicule, and insult'.[120] In the opinion of the Court, evidence from a former employee indicating that the employer had used racial epithets against waitresses could not be used to establish sex discrimination.[121] Contrast the result in Lowe with that of Joseph v HDMJ Restaurant, Inc,[122] where another Court let a complainant's Title VII but not her disability claim proceed. The complainant was a Black woman of Haitian origin employed as a waitress by the defendant. The complainant was frequently abused by the defendants and propositioned with lewd remarks, gestures, and violent threats.[123] The complainant had also suffered a knee injury in a car accident which kept her out of work. Upon her return, she was pulled down a flight of stairs and yelled at when she complained that she was not given any tables to serve in order to be able to receive tips. According to the employer, 'white girls were supposed to make more money than foreign Blacks'.[124] The complainant was dismissed after this incident. She complained of race, colour, national origin, sex, and disability discrimination under the ADA and Title VII. While the Court found the defendant's conduct individually and collectively to be sufficiently severe and pervasive so as to create a hostile work environment for women on the basis of sex, it did not find for any other ground despite direct evidence of treatment meted out because of race and disability.[125]

A slew of cases involving the ADA and Title VII has been addressed in this way.[126] What is characteristic of the courts' approach in these cases is the preoccupation with isolating discrimination as based on each ground separately. There is not even a superficial or passing acknowledgement that grounds could potentially interact, let alone of the possibility that such an interaction could create intersectional patterns of group disadvantage for those like disabled Black women, who belong to multiple disadvantaged groups at a time. Instead, the claimant is treated as a separate entity in respect of each ground, as Black, as a woman, as a disabled person etc. This isolated treatment of grounds in multiple discrimination fails to respect the integrity of such claimants and appreciate the nature of discrimination they suffer, not in discrete packets relating to their race, sex, and disability individually, but in a discursive yet composite way as disabled Black women. Without this detailing, such as described in the last chapter for Black women and Dalit

[120] Ibid 1175.
[121] Ibid 1176.
[122] 685 F Supp 2d 312 (2009) (United States District Court, Eastern District of New York).
[123] Ibid 139.
[124] Ibid 139–40.
[125] Ibid 148.
[126] See Herx v Diocese of Fort Wayne-South Bend, Inc (2014) 48 F Supp 3d 1168 (United States District Court, Northern District of Indiana), where the Court let the disability claim go forward but dismissed the sex discrimination claim; Querry v Messar 14 F Supp 2d 437 (1998) (United States District Court, Southern District of New York), where the Court allowed the Title VII but not the ADA claim.

women, there is little to aid the recognition and redress of the experience of intersectional discrimination.

Yet, multiple discrimination remains a popular way of conceptualizing discrimination based on multiple grounds. Most recently, in 2016, the CJEU adopted it unequivocally in its first ever decision which considered discrimination based on two grounds explicitly.[127] In Parris v Trinity College Dublin,[128] the Court considered a pre-emptive challenge to the exclusion of same-sex surviving partners from claiming the pensions of their deceased partners. The claimant, David Parris, had been in a same-sex partnership for over thirty years. His partnership was legally recognized in 2011 when Ireland passed the Civil Partnership Act. He was sixty-four years old then. Under his occupational pension scheme, his partner would have been excluded from succeeding him since they had not married or entered into a civil partnership before he turned sixty. But there was no legal provision for same-sex individuals to marry or enter into civil partnership in 2007, before David Parris turned sixty. He challenged the exclusion of his same-sex partner as discriminating on the grounds of sexual orientation and age under EU Council Directive 2000/78.[129] When the Labour Court (Ireland) came to frame its reference questions for the CJEU to consider, it asked whether there was discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation, discrimination on the basis of age, or, instead, discrimination based on the 'combined effect' of age and sexual orientation. The CJEU rejected the independent claims of sexual orientation and age discrimination, and further rejected the 'combined' basis of discrimination when no discrimination was found on the basis of each of the grounds considered independently.[130] In its words:

> while discrimination may indeed be based on several of the grounds set out in Article 1 of Directive 2000/78, there is, however, no new category of discrimination resulting from the combination of more than one of those grounds, such as sexual orientation and age, that may be found to exist where discrimination on the basis of those grounds taken in isolation has not been established.[131]

Thus, according to the Court, when the pension scheme did not discriminate on the basis of sexual orientation and age taken separately, it could not discriminate on the basis of both taken together.[132] The refusal to see the claim as based on sexual orientation and age together cost the Court the ability to uncover the causal [127] Cf Advocate General Sharpston's opinion in Case C-227/04 P Maria-Luise Lindorfer v Council of the European Union [2007] ECR I-6767 (CJEU), which specifically dealt with the discrimination claim on the grounds of both age and sex. The CJEU did not, however, address the claim as such.

[128] Parris (n 95).

[129] Council Directive 2000/78 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation [2000] OJ L303/16.

[130] Parris (n 95) [80] [81].

[131] Ibid [80].

[132] Ibid [81].

basis of discrimination explained by similar and different patterns of group disadvantage associated with being gay and old at the same time. The claimant (and his partner) was disadvantaged not only as someone who was gay and suffered everyday homophobia and systematic exclusion from mainstream institutions like marriage, or as someone who was old and faced economic and social marginalization, but as someone who was both gay and aged and faced both these disadvantages simultaneously. This meant that their disadvantage, while similar to other gay and old people, was also distinct from them in that younger gay men and women would not have been excluded like them since they had the option to have their partnerships legally recognized before turning sixty to avail themselves of the pension scheme benefit, while straight pensioners were legitimately excluded because their partnerships were not on par with long-term stable relationships. They were excluded as older gay people considered as a whole, suffering from these similar and distinct patterns of group disadvantage associated with sexual orientation and age, in the context of the historical, socio-economic, and legal landscape of Ireland. Seeing their position as a matter of sexual orientation or age, one at a time, would have revealed little of this.

Multiple discrimination is thus no more sophisticated than strict single-axis discrimination, other than the fact that it is based on more than one ground. Yet, it is a mischaracterization of the causal basis of multi-ground discrimination which cannot be so neatly segregated into multiple single-axis claims.

5. Additive Discrimination

When multiple grounds are considered not in an isolated manner but in a way which reflects some interaction between the grounds resulting in discrimination, the category of discrimination may be described as additive discrimination. The term 'addition', though, is too simplistic, implying that the grounds somehow add up mathematically to yield a quantitatively different form of discrimination. There is simply no way to quantify discrimination, based on a single ground or on multiple grounds.[133] Additive discrimination thus needs to be stripped of this quantitative understanding to reveal what it signifies. This section argues that the interaction between multiple grounds, within what has been seen as the category of additive discrimination, can be explained in terms of either 'combination' or 'compound' discrimination. While combination discrimination appreciates the unique forms of discrimination suffered by intersectional claimants, compound discrimination engages with the similarities between discrimination suffered by intersectional claimants and other disadvantaged groups such [133] Sarah Hannett, 'Equality at the Intersections: The Legislative and Judicial Failure to Tackle Multiple Discrimination' (2003) 23 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 65, 68–72.

1942

that discrimination is seen to be made worse or aggravated because of multiple grounds. While both go a long way in appreciating aspects of intersectionality, neither seems to appreciate the totality of patterns of group disadvantage to reflect intersectionality fully.

5.1 Combination Discrimination

In 1980, four years after DeGraffenreid, the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeal in Jefferies v Harris County[134] considered another claim of race and sex discrimination by a Black woman. The claimant had argued that she was passed over for promotion in favour of Black men and white women. The Court below had ignored her claim of 'discrimination based on a combination of race and sex' and had rather bifurcated it into separate claims of race and sex discrimination.[135] The Fifth Circuit Court, in a first, held that the District Court had erred in failing to address her 'claim of discrimination on the basis of both race and sex'.[136] According to the Court: 'Title VII provides a remedy against employment discrimination on the basis of an employee's "race, color, religion, sex, or national origin". The use of the word "or" evidences Congress' intent to prohibit employment discrimination based on any or all of the listed characteristics.'[137] Acknowledging that discrimination could in fact be based on more than one ground at a time, the Court held that such discrimination, based on both race and sex, could only be identified and remedied with the '[r]ecognition of Black females as a distinct protected subgroup'.[138] This meant that discrimination against Black women could be proven in the absence of discrimination against Black men and white women.

Jefferies made a breakthrough in US discrimination law. It not only opened up the possibility of claiming discrimination based on multiple grounds but also admitted that such discrimination was truly distinctive and not merely a matter of single-axis discrimination considered strictly on its own, substantially, capaciously, contextually, or taken in turn multiply. It was followed by Judge v Marsh in 1986, where the District Court of Columbia also affirmed that the subgroup of Black women was protected from discrimination since both their personal characteristics (race and sex) were listed under Title VII.[139] Though Judge v Marsh

[134] 615 F 2d 1025 (5th Cir 1980) (USCA).
[135] Ibid [22].
[136] Ibid [23].
[137] Ibid [24].
[138] Ibid [34]
[139] 649 F Supp 770 (1986) (United States District Court, District of Columbia) (hereafter Judge v Marsh).

confirmed the Jefferies rationale, it found it to be too broad and injudicious, and limited it thus:

> The difficulty with [Jefferies'] position is that it turns employment discrimination into a many-headed Hydra, impossible to contain within Title VII's prohibition. Following the Jeffries rationale to its extreme, protected subgroups would exist for every possible combination of race, color, sex, national origin and religion . . . For this reason, the Jefferies analysis is appropriately limited to employment decisions based on one protected, immutable trait or fundamental right, which are directed against individuals sharing a second protected, immutable characteristic . . . The benefits of Title VII thus will not be splintered beyond use and recognition; nor will they be constricted and unable to reach discrimination based on the existing unlawful criteria.[140]

The result is that US courts which have followed the Jefferies rationale have limited what they see as 'combination' discrimination to two grounds only per Judge v Marsh. Further, such discrimination has been understood to be suffered particularly by a distinctive subgroup composed of those who belong to two disadvantaged groups protected under enumerated grounds. Finally, combination discrimination, say against Black women, is established not only in contrast with the position of white men, but also Black men and white women. This means that it is mainly the evidence of lack of discrimination against Black men and white women which is seen as causally relevant in establishing discrimination against Black women.

Lam v University of Hawaii[141] confirms this interpretation. In Lam, a woman of Vietnamese descent alleged that the University of Hawaii's Richardson School of Law had discriminated against her on the basis of race, sex, and national origin when she applied for the position of Director of the Law School's Pacific Asian Legal Studies Program. In examining the evidence, the Ninth Circuit Court characterized the claim as one of combination discrimination against Asian women and found that:

> where two bases for discrimination exist, they cannot be neatly reduced to distinct components . . . Rather than aiding the decisional process, the attempt to bisect a person's identity at the intersection of race and gender often distorts or ignores the particular nature of their experiences . . . Like other subclasses under Title VII, Asian women are subject to a set of stereotypes and assumptions shared neither by Asian men nor by white women. In consequence, they may be targeted for discrimination "even in the absence of discrimination against [Asian] men or white women". . . . Accordingly, we agree with the Jefferies court that, when a plaintiff is claiming race and sex bias, it is necessary to determine whether the employer discriminates on the basis of that > combination of factors, not just whether it discriminates against people of the same race or of the same sex.[142]

[140] Ibid 780.
[141] 40 F 3d 1551 (9th Cir 1994) (USCA).

Lam added a new dimension to Jefferies and Judge v Marsh. It was no longer enough to prove that subgroups like Black women suffered disadvantage when Black men and white women did not; but it was also not sufficient to show that Black men and white women were disadvantaged in order to prove combination discrimination against Black women. Realistically, Black women, or Asian women for that matter, had only the reference point of white men for proving that they were discriminated against uniquely.[143] The fact that men belonging to their racial or ethnic group or other white and non-white women were treated worse or better contributed nothing to proving combination discrimination. Its proof rested on showing combined patterns of group disadvantage which were different from, and not similar to, patterns of groups disadvantage associated with each disadvantaged group. Thus, in the case of Daniels v Church's Chicken[144] the District Court of Alabama interpreted a Black woman's claim based on 'her sex or race and a combination of both' as centred around the proof of a special class defined by 'membership in the separate and distinct protected class of Black females'.[145] The reason was that '[n]o substantive case was ever made that Church's discriminate[d] against females or blacks in general'.[146] In the absence of discrimination against white women and Black men, the claim could only be characterized as combined discrimination against the subgroup of Black women alone. This, however, the claimant failed to show. The Court was fastidious in looking for discrimination against the claimant which was defined in terms of both her race and sex in a unique way such that it was only her race and sex combined which appeared in the discriminator's reasoning. Construed this way, the causality of multiple grounds was hard to prove.

Pitting the combination of groups as highly distinctive defies the relational basis of intersectional discrimination between groups and undermines the sameness in patterns of group disadvantage. It is as if Black women and the disadvantage they suffer have nothing to do with others, especially other non-Black women and Black men. But without reference to these other groups, Black women's claims seem solipsistic and liable to fail. Take, for example, the case of Jeffers v Thompson where the claimant complained of discrimination in promotion 'because of her race, her gender, her race-and-gender combined, and her age'.[147] The United States District Court of Maryland interpreted this as a claim against the 'composite class' of Black [142] Ibid 1562 (emphasis in original).

[143] See Goodwin v Board of Trustees of University of Illinois 442 F 3d 611 (7th Cir 2006) (USCA).
[144] 942 F Supp 533 (1996) (United States District Court, Southern Division of Alabama).
[145] Ibid 538.
[146] Ibid.
[147] 264 F Supp 2d 314 (2003) (United States District Court, Maryland).

women. The claimant had brought evidence of her difficult relationship with her supervisor and the statistical evidence of promotion of white men and white women. The Court found that such 'sparse statistical evidence discloses no special bias against African-American women':

> Some characteristics, such as race, color, and national origin, often fuse inextricably. Made flesh in a person, they indivisibly intermingle. The meaning of the statute is plain and unambiguous. Title VII prohibits employment discrimination based on any of the named characteristics, whether individually or in combination . . . Discrimination against African-American women necessarily combines (even if it cannot be dichotomized into) discrimination against African-Americans and discrimination against women—neither of which Title VII permits.[148]

The analytical gap in this framing should now be apparent. This was the gap Crenshaw had highlighted when discussing Payne v Trevanol[149] and Moore v Hughes,[150] which had rejected Black women's discrimination as having to do with discrimination against Black men and white women respectively.[151] From thereon, the category of combination discrimination in the US has solidified into a highly unique form of discrimination levelled against a subgroup which has little to do with discrimination suffered by others.[152] In reality, such a heightened construction of uniqueness of an intersectional claim is in fact unreal given that discrimination based on multiple grounds cannot be wholly distinguished from the multiple grounds that yield it. In particular, while such a construction appreciates the difference in patterns of group disadvantage between different (sub)groups, it overstates that difference as obscuring all similarities between them. That intersectional discrimination is defined by both sameness and difference simultaneously seems to be lost in this. So even if the US jurisprudence describes this category as intersectional discrimination,[153] it is clear that it is not one which embraces intersectionality due to its failure to correspond with one of the key strands of intersectionality theory,

[148] Ibid 326.

[149] 673 F 2d 798 (5th Cir 1982) (USCA).

[150] 708 F 2d 475 (9th Cir 1983) (USCA).

[151] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139 (hereafter Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing'). See chapter 2, section 1.1 for a discussion of the dynamic of sameness and difference based on these cases.

[152] See also Kimble v Wisconsin Department of Workforce Dev 690 F Supp 2d 765 (United States District Court, Eastern Division of Wisconsin 2010); Shazor v Professional Transit Management Ltd 744 F 3d 948 (6th Cir 2014) (USCA).

[153] Equal Employment Opportunity Commission in the US characterises this type of discrimination as 'intersectional discrimination': 'Title VII prohibits discrimination against African American women even if the employer does not discriminate against White women or African American men. Likewise, Title VII protects Asian American women from discrimination based on stereotypes and assumptions about them "even in the absence of discrimination against Asian American men or White women" '. See Compliance Manual, ch 15 <https://www.eeoc.gov/policy/docs/race-color.html> accessed 11 March 2019.

which appreciates the relationships between groups or, as we describe it, the dynamic of sameness and difference together.

5.2 Compound Discrimination

A slightly different idea of additive discrimination exists in other jurisdictions that do not view it as a matter of highly unique combined patterns of group disadvantage associated with a distinct subgroup but actually a matter of shared disadvantage suffered by several groups. For them, additive discrimination is the opposite of the US conception—too similar to rather than too different from discrimination based on individual grounds. We may refer to this as 'compound' discrimination, where similar patterns of disadvantage associated with different groups are compounded with patterns of disadvantage associated with other groups based on different grounds. Unlike multiple discrimination, such discrimination is not necessarily proven in isolation but in a fluid and flexible way. The problem, though, from an intersectional perspective is that, despite its flexibility, it may still fail to be diagnostically precise about tracing sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage simultaneously and in treating the claimant's identities as a whole.

The UK courts' most advanced thinking on discrimination based on multiple grounds is representative of compound discrimination. The decisions of the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) in Tilern de Bique v Ministry of Defence[154] and the Employment Tribunal (ET) in O'Reilly v BBC[155] are useful examples. Tilern concerned the case of a female solider, from St Vincent and the Grenadines, serving in the British army, who was also a single mother to a young daughter. As a solider, she was meant to be available for work twenty-four hours a day, seven days a week ('24/7 condition'). But, as a foreign national, she could not have a family member stay with her for an extended period to help her with childcare ('immigration condition'). The immigration condition made it impossible for her to meet the 24/7 condition. She argued that the conditions indirectly discriminated against her on the basis of sex and race. The ET found that the conditions were not shown to be a proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim and upheld her claim. The Ministry of Defence challenged this ruling. In dismissing the appeal, Cox J of the EAT rejected the argument that the two conditions had to be shown as discriminating under 'the separate and distinct grounds of sex and race' such that '[e]ither one or the other, or both independently' were indirectly discriminatory.[156] Such a characterization misconceived the nature of discrimination at play, which was instead found to be a case of 'double disadvantage':

[154] [2009] UKEAT/0075/11/SM (hereafter Tilern).
[155] [2010] UKET/2200423/2010 (hereafter O'Reilly).
[156] Tilern (n 154) [162] [165].

> The Claimant in this case considered that the particular disadvantage to which she was subject arose both because she was a 24/7 female soldier with a child and because she was a woman of Vincentian national origin, for whom childcare assistance from a live-in Vincentian relative was not permitted. The Tribunal recognised that this, double disadvantage reflected the factual reality of her situation.[157]

To understand what Cox J meant by double disadvantage, it is useful to see how she went about proving it. According to her, the 24/7 condition had to be tested for sex discrimination by comparing 'men and women soldiers in the British Army whose potential child carers were foreign nationals'.[158] Seen this way, the particular disadvantage suffered by women, especially single mothers, in comparison with men, was amply clear since 'the women soldiers . . . were more likely than the men to be single parents requiring assistance with childcare'.[159] Cox J clarified that '[t]his is what we understand this Tribunal to mean, in referring to the combined effect of the 24/7 and the immigration [conditions] when considering the claim of indirect sex discrimination'.[160] Similarly, the combined effect of the two conditions was tested for race discrimination by comparing those of 'Vincentian national origin and of British national origin in the Army who are or may become single parents', which reflected 'the particular disadvantage caused to women of Vincentian origin in the British Army who were single parents'.[161] The so-called combined effect then was a matter of considering how Vincentian female soldiers who were single mothers suffered disadvantaged which was similar to female soldiers who required childcare and Vincentians who were single parents. The similarities between the claimant's position and these groups compounded the discrimination suffered by the claimant on the basis of both sex and race at the same time.

The problem lies in the way the comparator groups were selected and discrimination proven on the basis of each ground separately and then compounded together to reflect the combined effect. The choice of the comparator groups will be analysed in the next chapter. At this point, what is critical is that the category of compound discrimination reflected in Tilern ended up ignoring the unique patterns of group disadvantage in addition to the shared disadvantage of the claimant (and those in her position) with women of different racial groups and people of the same race who were single parents. For this reason, compound discrimination does not achieve full compliance with the key ingredient of the framework of intersectionality—of appreciating similar and different patterns of group disadvantage simultaneously. For an intersectional claimant like a female soldier and single mother from St Vincent, it means that she faced the disadvantages

[157] Ibid [165].
[158] Ibid [167].
[159] Ibid.
[160] Ibid [168].
[161] Ibid [169] [170].

1948

associated with single motherhood on the basis of sex and immigrant status on the basis of race, just as other women and non-British persons, and also faced some unique disadvantages attached to single mothers who were non-British soldiers. The simultaneity of similar and different patterns of group disadvantage was thus lost in the framing of disadvantage as 'doubled' when based on two grounds at the same time.

O'Reilly also falls in this trap. In deciding a claim of age and sex discrimination in respect of the underrepresentation of older women at the BBC, the ET admitted that the claim could be based on two grounds. However, it rejected that the claim could be characterized as 'combined discrimination', defined in terms of the unique discrimination suffered by women above forty, when men above forty and women below forty could apply for the same position.[162] According to the ET, this was flawed because:

> the prescribed reason [ground] need not be the sole reason, or even the principal reason, why a person suffers detrimental treatment. Part of the reason that a woman over 40 is precluded from applying for the job, in the above example, is the fact that she is a woman. Another part of the reason is that she is over 40. Both of them are significant elements of the reason that she suffers the detriment. In such circumstances, we consider it is clear that the woman is subject to both sex and age discrimination.[163]

The ET's approach to discrimination based on two grounds in O'Reilly is similar to the EAT's approach in Tilern. Both are looking for similar patterns of discrimination between members of the larger social groups (women, foreign nationals, single parents, older people) and the subgroup to which intersectional claimants belong (single mothers who are foreign nationals/older women). While multiple discrimination stops at showing these individual patterns of disadvantage based on each characteristic, compound discrimination presents the result as 'compounded' in the form of double or worse-off discrimination.

This characterization is most conspicuous in the Canadian context.[164] Take, for example, the case of Radek v Henderson Development.[165] The British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal in that case found for discrimination based on multiple grounds, in that the presence of each ground was seen as compounding the experience of discrimination suffered. This is evident in the Court's approach: 'While the primary focus of Ms. Radek's individual complaint is her race, colour and ancestry, the analysis of those grounds must not ignore her disability, and the possibility of [162] O'Reilly (n 155) [244].

[163] Ibid [245].
[164] Morrison v Motsewetsho (2003) HRTO 21 (Ontario Human Rights Commission) was the earliest case in this regard.
[165] (2005) BCHRT 302 (British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal).

the compound discrimination which may have occurred.'[166] Thus, using evidence to trace patterns of stereotyping based on race, colour, and ancestry the Tribunal held that discrimination was 'particularly clear with respect to discrimination on the grounds of race, colour and ancestry' and even 'disability was a factor in the adverse treatment she received, as . . . her gait was an element in the way she was treated'.[167] Disability thus compounded the discrimination suffered by the claimant on the basis of race, colour, and ancestry.

Radek had relied on Comeau v Cote,[168] where the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal had interpreted multi-ground discrimination in this way. In Comeau, the case of dismissal of a worker was deemed discriminatory on the basis of his disability and age when separate evidence could be deduced for each ground to prove discriminatory treatment. But since the treatment was suffered by the claimant as one person,[169] the treatment had a 'combined effect' because of the claimant's disability and age, such that the treatment based on disability or the perceived heart condition of the claimant was 'amplified' by his age.[170]

Isolating similar and different patterns of group disadvantage, and then adding them to yield compound and combination discrimination respectively, is thus a common way of conceptualizing multi-ground claims. US courts do this too when they 'aggregate' evidence of different forms of discrimination.[171] Even at the ECtHR, De Albuquerque J's separate opinion in Kostantin Markin v Russia[172] followed this approach. Markin concerned a challenge to the denial of parental leave to men enrolled in the military service while servicewomen were entitled to the leave. While the majority had found for discrimination under Article 14 on the basis of sex, according to De Albuquerque J it was 'important, for both practical and theoretical reasons, to analyse separately the double nature of the discrimination suffered by the applicant as a serviceman: in relation to servicewomen (the sexual-discrimination issue) and in relation to civilian men (the professional-discrimination issue)'.[173] He thus held that:

> the denial of parental leave to the applicant was based on a combination of two different discriminatory grounds: military status and sex. The impugned discrimination has a twofold legal nature: there is not only sex discrimination between servicemen and servicewomen, since servicewomen are treated better than servicemen, but also

[166] Ibid [465].
[167] Ibid [586].
[168] (2003) BCHRT 32. See also Dartmouth Halifax (County) Regional Housing Authority v Sparks (1993) 119 NSR (2d) 91 (Nova Scotia Court of Appeal).
[169] Ibid [86] [87].
[170] Ibid [88].
[171] See esp Hicks v Gates Rubber Co 833 F 2d 1406 (10th Cir 1987) (USCA) 1416 ('in determining the pervasiveness of the harassment against a plaintiff, a trial court may aggregate evidence of racial hostility with evidence of sexual hostility. We conclude that such aggregation is permissible').
[172] [2010] ECHR 1435.
[173] Ibid (De Albuquerque J).

> discrimination based on professional status, since civilian men are treated better than servicemen.[174]

The approach seems to divide grounds for the purposes of proving discrimination and then compound the different results to explain the nature of disadvantage. A final illustration of the decision of the South African Constitutional Court in Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha[175] should make clear why this approach falls short of intersectionality.

Bhe concerned a constitutional challenge to the rule of male primogeniture, according to which only males related to the deceased qualified for intestate succession under customary law. The rule was found to be discriminatory because it excluded: (a) widows from inheriting from their late husbands; (b) daughters from inheriting from their parents; (c) younger sons from inheriting from their parents; and (d) extra-marital children from inheriting from their fathers. In the specific case brought by Nontupheko Maretha Bhe, which sought relief for the exclusion of all female heirs, Langa DCJ, writing for the majority, held that:

> The exclusion of women from heirship and consequently from being able to inherit property was in keeping with a system dominated by a deeply embedded patriarchy which reserved for women a position of subservience and subordination and in which they were regarded as perpetual minors under the tutelage of the fathers, husbands, or the head of the extended family.[176]
>
> The exclusion of women from inheritance on the grounds of gender is a clear violation of section 9(3) of the Constitution. It is a form of discrimination that entrenches past patterns of disadvantage among a vulnerable group, exacerbated by old notions of patriarchy and male domination incompatible with the guarantee of equality under this constitutional order.[177]

His reasoning shows an appreciation of the particular forms of exclusion suffered by women governed by customary law, in addition to patriarchal domination suffered by women generally. There is, though, little analysis of racism per se, even when the rule of primogeniture applied only to Black women (as opposed to women of other races) and thus carried relics of the racist past of South Africa.[178] The fact that their exclusion from inheritance may not mirror white women's experiences of inheritance and thus was not simply a matter of 'gender' discrimination is left unexamined. Race did not define the discrimination causally, but merely added or compounded the sex discrimination suffered. The approach of the Court can be interpreted as considering the rule of male primogeniture as reproducing patterns of sexism, made worse by the racist [175] 2005 (1) SA 580 (SACC).

[174] Ibid.
[176] Ibid [78].
[177] Ibid [91].
[178] Ibid [78] [89]–[92].

implications of a separate regime of succession. The result is that the analysis reflects some composition of racism and sexism against African women's rights of inheritance but there is no analytic precision in explaining what this relationship is. It is not that the Constitutional Court is unaware of the interaction between race and sex in Bhe's claim, only that the nature of such interaction is left undistinguished.

Furthermore, wholly absent from consideration is the claimant's situation of extreme poverty and destitution in Bhe. The fact that the claimant and her daughters lived in poverty and that severance from the contentious property would have rendered them homeless does not factor in the Court's reasoning, even though it was initially set out as the background of the claim.[179] Again, the loss is causal in that the Court failed to see how multiple identities of the claimant yielded the patterns of group disadvantage considered as a whole and in the necessary context. As Albertyn and Fredman write: 'a proper consideration of the multiple dimensions of equality and their impact on Black women [in Bhe] might have been a better legal approach and would have better reflected the nature of inequality on the ground'.[180]

But the Court did find for the claimants and declared that the rule constituted unfair discrimination under Section 9(3) which could not be justified under Section 36 of the Constitution. Bhe shows that the South African Constitutional Court is generally good at spotting multi-ground discrimination and, eventually, finding for the claimant. However, this does not automatically translate into linking the claimant's multiple identities to the particularity of disadvantage suffered based on those. Thus, even when the Court reaches a favourable outcome, the reasoning leaves something to be desired in how it treats a claim involving multiple identities of the claimant.

To sum up, the shortcoming of both forms of additive discrimination, described either as a combination of or as compounded by multiple grounds of discrimination, is that they do not truly capture the causality of multi-ground discrimination in terms of appreciating both the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage at the same time. It takes a lopsided view of discrimination by focussing on either sameness or difference, thereby compromising on treating the claimant as a whole and/or considering discrimination in its full and relevant context including that of poverty or class. Despite its superior sense of interaction between multiple grounds as compared to all other categories of discrimination preceding it, additive discrimination may thus still evade intersectionality.

[179] Ibid [14]–[19].

[180] Catherine Albertyn and Sandra Fredman, 'Equality Beyond Dignity: Multi-dimensional Equality and Justice Langa's Judgments' (2015) Acta Juridica 430, 446–47.

1952

6. Embedded Discrimination

This is a rare category of conceptualizing discrimination but is a useful one to map on the continuum for an important reason. Since multi-ground claims have raised fears of creating a 'special sub-category', 'special class', 'new "super remedy"',[181] or 'many headed Hydra'—protecting 'subgroups . . . for every possible combination of race, color, sex, national origin and religion', giving rise to a 'volley of discrimination charges', and splintering discrimination law 'beyond use and recognition'[182]—it is useful to consider what happens when courts amalgamate multiple grounds into an independent ground of discrimination itself. Conceptually, it does not seem misconceived to do that because, after all, can we not express patterns of group disadvantage associated with multiple grounds as inhering in a composite ground rather than multiple grounds? The Canadian Supreme Court's decision in Corbiere v Canada (Minister of Indian and Northern Affairs) seems to do just that and gives us a ready example of what it called discrimination based on ' "embedded" analogous grounds'.[183]

The facts in Corbiere concerned the exclusion of off-reserve Indian band members from voting in band elections as violating Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter. The Court found that the exclusion was based on a new analogous ground of 'aboriginal residence' or 'off reserve status' of band members. Such a distinction was discriminatory because it undermined the cultural identity of off-reserve band members in a stereotypical way. It denied voting privileges to off-reserve band members and perpetuated the message that they were uninterested in and undeserving of participating in band governance.[184] The Court held that the disenfranchisement was thus discriminatory and could not be justified under the Charter.[185]

The first step of reading-in aboriginal residence as an analogous ground in Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter was the key to this holding. As L'Heureux-Dubé J explained in her concurring opinion, '[t]he differential treatment in this case is based on the status of holding membership in an Indian Act band, but living off that band's reserve. This combination of traits does not fall under one of the enumerated or already recognized analogous grounds.'[186] While race is an enumerated ground under Section 15(1), residence was not recognized as a standalone analogous ground. Yet, for off-reserve band members, the combination of the two status identities of race (aboriginal status) and residence (off-reserve residence) reflected [181] DeGraffenreid (n 7) 143.

[182] Judge v Marsh (n 139) 780.
[183] [1999] 2 SCR 203 (SCC) [14].
[184] Ibid [18] (McLachlin and Bastarache JJ).
[185] As the majority judgment by McLachlin and Bastarache JJ describes, the two points of departure with the minority were: '(1) the suggestion by some that the same ground may or may not be analogous depending on the circumstances; and (2) the criteria that identify an analogous ground'. Ibid [6].
[186] Ibid [58] (L'Heureux-Dubé J).

a position of immutability or fundamental choice—identified by the Court as the underlying logic of grounds under the Canadian Charter.[187] Aboriginal residence was considered a personal characteristic which was unchangeable or changeable at a very high personal cost. It had discriminatory potential because those defined by the characteristic lacked political power, were historically disadvantaged, and were potentially vulnerable to becoming disadvantaged or having their interests overlooked.[188] The fact that aboriginal residence related only to a 'sub-set' of Indian band members in fact, namely those who lived off-reserve, was no impediment to recognizing it as an analogous ground. In fact, it was found that '[i]ts demographic limitation is no different from, for example, pregnancy, which was a distinct, but fundamentally interrelated form of discrimination from gender. "Embedded" analogous grounds may be necessary to permit meaningful consideration of intragroup discrimination.'[189] Thus the claim in Corbiere was seen as one based on aboriginal residence which was an analogous ground embedded in the enumerated ground of aboriginality under Section 15(1) and concerned a subset of Indian band members, that is those living off-reserve. This characterization helped the Court appreciate the disadvantage at the crossroads of aboriginality and off-reserve residence. The disadvantage was one which perpetuated the historic exclusion of off-reserve band members from democratic participation in the band governance. They were thus deemed less worthy than those band members who lived on reserves. This in turn undermined their cultural identity as Indian band members, which was central to the aboriginal population, living on- or off-reserve alike. In fact, the Court was quick to point out that '[a]boriginals living on reserves are subject to the same discrimination' in that they too constituted an underprivileged group and were forced to flee, return, and disrupt their lives through government policies.[190] The disadvantage suffered by the intersectional group in question, of off-reserve band members, was thus characterized by patterns of similar and different group disadvantage based on aboriginality and residence or aboriginal residence. Similarities did not undermine the unique claim of discrimination and nor did differences appear unrelatable such that the claimants had nothing in common with other groups.

The discrimination inquiry in Corbiere was conducted from the perspective of the claimants, namely off-reserve band members considered as a whole, and not simply either Indian band members or those living in the cities and removed from their cultural context. Race and culture were seen as embodied in one identity of off-reserve residence as band members. Furthermore, the inquiry was firmly grounded in the Canadian context, which had historically, through legislation and [187] Ibid [13].

[188] Ibid [60].
[189] Ibid [15].
[190] Ibid [19].

1954

government policies, contributed to exactly the sort of exclusion and marginalization being complained of. As L'Heureux-Dubé J correctly reminded the Court, the Canadian cultural context included the cultural context of aboriginal people, such that:

> [the] contextual approach to s. 15 requires that the equality analysis of provisions relating to Aboriginal people must always proceed with consideration of and respect for Aboriginal heritage and distinctiveness, recognition of Aboriginal and treaty rights, and with emphasis on the importance for Aboriginal Canadians of their values and history.[191]

All this and more was ultimately geared towards furthering the purpose of Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter which was recognized as being:

> [T]o prevent the violation of essential human dignity and freedom through the imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice, and to promote a society in which all persons enjoy equal recognition at law as human beings or as members of Canadian society, equally capable and equally deserving of concern, respect and consideration.[192]

The transformative purpose of Section 15(1) is apparent in this construction. In the final analysis, the impact of the exclusion was gauged from this perspective and whether the exclusion undermined this vision of the society. If it did, it was liable to be outlawed in order that the law, especially discrimination law qua Section 15(1), actually subverted disadvantage, stereotyping, and prejudice, and promoted equal dignity of all. The Court's reasoning and ultimate finding did this fittingly.

Corbiere is a unique example of how the characterization of a claim as based on an embedded ground like aboriginal residence which brings together two identities—aboriginal status and off-reserve residential status—can ultimately realize intersectionality in a meaningful way, appreciating all its key strands in the discrimination analysis. The result is far from that of single-axis discrimination, in its treatment of the nature of discrimination as actually causally defined by multiple systems of disadvantage. Unlike multiple discrimination, these systems are studied interactively, appreciating their synergy rather than treating them in isolation. Finally, unlike additive discrimination, the causal connections are drawn clearly, without undermining the complexity of their interaction and overemphasizing either sameness or difference as the key to intersectionality.

But it is important to note that not every case will yield itself to this category of discrimination based on an embedded analogous ground. For example, Lord Phillips' hypothetical scenario of the fat Black man may not immediately appear to be a case based on a distinctive ground of race–weight, unless the socio-cultural, historical, and legal context of the claim allows for such a ground to pass the test of grounds, such as one based on immutability, fundamental choice, lack of political power etc. This—to show a compound ground as embedded within an enumerated ground—is often not easy in discrimination law other than for obvious cases. For example, as the Court in Corbiere acknowledged, pregnancy is considered a separate embedded ground both related to sex or gender and, in particular, related to the condition of pregnancy, which does not affect all women but can only affect women in fact. Another example may be the case of discrimination against sex workers in Jordan, which can be imagined as a matter of both sex/gender and employment status as a prostitute which predominantly affects women. The approach may also be helpful in arguing poverty as embedded in grounds like age combined with reliance on social assistance which protects unemployed youth from discrimination as in Gosselin.[193] But in all other cases, where the 'embeddedness' of an unrecognized ground (residence, weight, employment status, or poverty) within another, recognized ground (race or sex) is moot, it will be difficult to create a composite ground like aboriginality–residence to find for discrimination. One may have to look for another strategy for making intersectionality real in discrimination law. It is finally time, then, to turn to the category which promises to do so, of what may be called intersectional discrimination proper.

[191] Ibid [54].
[192] Ibid [58] (quoting Law v Canada (n 99) [51]).

7. Intersectional Discrimination

The effort in the last five sections has been to explain eight different conceptual categories of framing discrimination which occurs on multiple grounds. All of them relate to intersectionality in different ways—some reflecting the strands of intersectionality in a much more considered and profound way (like capacious and contextual single-axis discrimination, and embedded discrimination), and others (like strict and substantial single-axis discrimination, and multiple discrimination) failing to do so. Additive discrimination lies somewhere in between these successful and failed efforts in terms of appreciating intersectionality. In contrast with all is the category which embraces intersectionality fully—intersectional discrimination.

We already have a sense of what this category may look like. Indeed, given that we know what the real or potential shortcomings of the rest of the categories are, we can imagine what overcoming them means. But what we are after is not simply finding for each strand of intersectionality in the judicial conceptualization of [193] This was the preferred approach of the feminist judgment of Gosselin written by the Women's Court of Canada: Gwen Brodsky, Rachel Cox, Shelagh Day, and Kate Stephenson, 'Gosselin v. Quebec (Attorney General) (Women's Court of Canada)' (2006) 18 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 193.

1956

multi-ground discrimination but, ultimately, how that aids in explicating a comprehensive and clear understanding of what such multi-causal discrimination looks like. A few good examples in comparative case law reflect this diagnostic clarity befittingly. In particular, the approach of the South African Constitutional Court in Hassam v Jacobs[194] serves as a model for this category.

Hassam involved a challenge to certain legislative provisions which excluded widows of Muslim polygynous marriages from intestate succession. The claimant had been married to the deceased under Muslim rites. She argued that her exclusion from inheriting the property of her deceased husband constituted unfair discrimination on the grounds of religion, marital status, and gender.[195] The failure to include spouses of polygynous Muslim marriages was argued as indirect discrimination against women on the basis of gender generally, and Muslim widows in polygynous marriages specifically, given 'the reality that women constitute a particularly vulnerable segment of the population' and that the impugned Act 'operates to the detriment of Muslim women but not Muslim men because only Muslim men may have multiple spouses under Islamic Law'.[196] Similarly, she argued that the discrimination was one based on marital status because it excluded certain kind of relationships from protection, but in particular it was problematic because it withheld protections from Muslim widows in polygynous marriages.[197] Finally, the religious aspect of discrimination was argued as entrenching the historical subordination of Muslims, in particular that the 'non-recognition prejudices widows of polygynous Muslim marriages in that it fails to have regard to their lived reality and to accommodate diversity within a heterogeneous society'.[198] The scheme of arguments mirrors the framework of intersectionality. Each of the claimants' arguments mapped similar and different patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple grounds (religion, marital status, and gender), noting not only the uniqueness of disadvantage suffered as a Muslim woman in a polygynous marriage, but also connecting it to broader patterns of group disadvantage shared with women, Muslims, and those in non-traditional marriages, and, also, intersectional groups like Muslim women, and women in non-traditional forms of marriages, while acknowledging stark differences, viz. with Muslim men who were not similarly affected.

Before embarking on the discrimination analysis under Section 9(3) of the South African Constitution, the Court set out the interpretive approach to be used in making the determination. Noting the shift in the constitutional landscape and ethos at the end of the apartheid era, the Court held that 'the content of public policy must now be determined with reference to the founding values underlying [194] 2009 (5) SA 572 (hereafter Hassam).

[195] Ibid [9].
[196] Ibid [11].
[197] Ibid [11].
[198] Ibid [14].

our constitutional democracy, including human dignity and equality'.[199] This was important in light of the rich history and diversity of the South African society, including the social reality of prejudice directed towards the Muslim community in South Africa.[200] The values of equality, dignity, and diversity thus framed the constitutional interpretation with the specific purpose of 'the achievement of the progressive realisation of our "transformative constitutionalism" '.[201] The jurisprudence of transformative constitutionalism reckons with the transformative strand of intersectionality perfectly in its emphasis on transcending the past, transitioning from the status quo and transforming into 'a truly equal society'.[202]

Following this interpretive approach with the goal of transformation in mind, the Court applied the three-part Harksen test for unfair discrimination.[203] It first considered whether the differentiation was on grounds listed under Section 9(3). According to Nkabinde J, this question had to be answered 'contextually and in the light of our history'.[204] The South African context and history included the past when 'Muslim marriages, whether polygynous or not, were deprived of legal recognition'.[205] However, under the current law, it was Muslim women, not Muslim men, who were excluded from intestate succession because only Muslim men would have multiple spouses. But it was not that Muslim women per se were being discriminated against. It was particularly Muslim widows of polygynous marriages and not widows married in terms of the regular Marriage Act or those in monogamous Muslim marriages or even widows in polygynous customary marriages, all of whose marriages were recognized.[206] According to the Court, the complexity of this difference meant that discrimination in this case could be understood as overlapping on the grounds of religion, marital status, and gender.[207]

Having determined that the differentiation amounted to discrimination based on the 'overlapping' grounds of religion, marital status, and gender, Nkabinde J considered whether such discrimination amounted to 'unfair discrimination'. This inquiry focussed on the impact on the claimant and those in her position.

[199] Ibid [26].
[200] Ibid [25] [27].
[201] Ibid [26].
[202] Justice Pius Langa, 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 351, 353. See S v Makwanyane 1995 3 SA 391 (SACC) [262] ('What the Constitution expressly aspires to do is to provide a transition from these grossly unacceptable features of the past to a conspicuously contrasting ... future'); Du Plessis v De Klerk 1996 3 SA 850 (SACC) [157] ('[The Constitution] is a document that seeks to transform the status quo ante into a new order'); Rates Action Group v City of Cape Town 2004 12 BCLR 1328 (SACC) [100] ('Our Constitution provides a mandate, a framework and to some extent a blueprint for the transformation of our society from its racist and unequal past to a society in which all can live with dignity').
[203] Harksen (n 11) [54].
[204] Hassam (n 194) [33].
[205] Ibid.
[206] Ibid [31].
[207] Ibid [34].

1958

Considering the claimant as a whole, that is a Muslim widow of a polygynous marriage, the Court traced the patterns of group disadvantage as follows:

> women in polygynous Muslim marriages still suffer serious effects of non-recognition. The distinction between spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages and those in monogamous Muslim marriages unfairly discriminates between the two groups.[208]
>
> By discriminating against women in polygynous Muslim marriages on the grounds of religion, gender and marital status, the Act clearly reinforces a pattern of stereotyping and patriarchal practices that relegates women in these marriages to being unworthy of protection. Needless to say, by so discriminating against those women, the provisions in the Act conflict with the principle of gender equality which the Constitution strives to achieve.[209]
>
> The purpose of the Act would clearly be frustrated rather than furthered if widows to polygynous Muslim marriages were excluded from the benefits of the Act simply because their marriages were contracted by virtue of Muslim rites. The constitutional goal of achieving substantive equality will not be fulfilled by that exclusion.[210]

What these passages do is recognize the interrelationship between patterns of group disadvantage based on marital status, gender, and religion respectively, such that a claimant like a woman in a polygynous Muslim marriage is seen as suffering disadvantage not only as someone uniquely in this position vis-à-vis the disadvantaged groups of women, Muslims, and those in polygynous marriages; but also as someone who shared her disadvantage with these groups. The appreciation of the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on religion, marital status, and gender, by considering the claimant as a whole (i.e. a Muslim woman in a polygynous marriage, within the South African context, history, and contemporary society) against the transformative ideals of the South African Constitution, allowed the Court to appreciate the reality and totality of the discrimination at play. The exclusion of Muslim widows in polygynous marriages from intestate succession was thus recognized as causing 'significant and material disadvantage' and harm of 'non-recognition' by enforcing 'patterns of stereotyping and patriarchal practices' as if the claimant and those in her position were 'unworthy of protection'.[211] The reality and the totality of this disadvantage could only be appreciated because of the Court's careful discrimination analysis which is characteristic of intersectionality. Each strand of the framework found its way, succinctly but sufficiently, into the Court's reasoning, making a difference to the understanding of the nature of discrimination in this particular case. Hassam is a case in point of breaking through the complexity of intersectional discrimination,

[208] Ibid [36].
[209] Ibid [37].
[210] Ibid [38].
[211] Ibid [34] [36] [37].

in being able to diagnose and explain it as it is rather than transmogrifying it into a proxy category.[212]

In fact, as Hassam demonstrates, breaking through the complexity of intersectional discrimination does not require complicated tact. As other cases also show, intersectionality can be appreciated rather straightforwardly—with different strands feeding into one another dialectally not sequentially. The decision of the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario in Baylis-Flannery v DeWilde[213] is an apt example. The facts involved the claimant who worked as a receptionist at the respondent's physiotherapy clinic. She complained of discrimination 'in a way that was both racialized and sexualized'.[214] Her allegation was that she was treated badly because she was Black, and that this behaviour was coupled with unwelcome sexual advances and sexually coloured remarks and solicitations. In the Tribunal's opinion:

> reliance on a single axis analysis where multiple grounds of discrimination are found, tends to minimize or even obliterate the impact of racial discrimination on women of colour who have been discriminated against on other grounds, rather than recognize the possibility of the compound discrimination that may have occurred.[215]

The Tribunal thus treated the claim as based on both race and sex, such that the discrimination in question was 'intersectional'.[216] It found that the claimant's right to equal treatment with respect to employment without discrimination had been infringed based on race and sex because the respondent:

> sexually solicited her, sexually harassed her, racially harassed her, engaged in discriminatory treatment toward her within her employment, and poisoned her workplace with pornography that mirrored both her race and gender. He did so because she is an attractive, young Black woman, and all the evidence heard about his views about Blacks and Africans, his comments about dating, his visits to strip clubs in Detroit, about his fixation with Malina, about the Black female escort he found attractive on the internet, and about his hiring practices indicate that he has a stereotypical view of attractive, young, Black women over whom he can assert economic power and control.[217]

In the final analysis, the intersectional nature of discrimination was found to have caused 'wilfully and recklessly [injury to] her dignity and worth' as well as 'damage

[212] See also Daniels v Campbell No 2004 (5) SA 331 (SACC), which carries out a similar analysis of discrimination based on marital status, religion, and culture regarding the exclusion of surviving spouses, married under Muslim rites, from statutory intestate succession.
[213] 2003 HRTO 28 (hereafter Baylis-Flannery). See also Flamand v DGN Investments 2005 HRTO 10.
[214] Ibid [3].
[215] Ibid [144].
[216] Ibid [143]–[149].
[217] Ibid [146].

to her physical and emotional well-being'.[218] The impact of intersectional discrimination was considered to have exacerbated the mental anguish of the claimant,[219] such that it was 'greater' than would have been experienced if the matter were based on a single ground.[220]

It is important to note that, unlike the US courts and even the employment tribunals in the UK, the Tribunal in Baylis-Flannery resisted the classification of these instances of treatment as examples of either racism or sexism. Thus, the defendant's enquiries about the claimant's relationship status, comments about his preference for 'young black girls', descriptions of women's bodies, and references to Black women's physical characteristics[221] were all considered inappropriate and discriminatory 'based on both race and sex'.[222] The Tribunal was quick to explain that although the findings of the case were:

> of sufficient gravity that Ms Baylis-Flannery could succeed on either enumerated ground of race or sex, or on both grounds, one set following the other, the law must acknowledge that she is not a woman who happens to be Black, or a Black person who happens to be female, but a Black woman. The danger in adopting a single ground approach to the analysis of this case is that it could be characterized as a sexual harassment matter that involved a Black complainant, thus negating the importance of the racial discrimination that she suffered as a Black woman. In terms of the impact on her psyche, the whole is more than the sum of the parts: the impact of these highly discriminatory acts on her personhood is serious.[223]

The reason for not treating the claim as a case of single-axis, multiple, or additive discrimination is apparent in this reasoning. According to the Tribunal, respecting the integrity of the claimant as a whole person meant that it could not bifurcate the evidence before it as race or sex based. Importantly, the acknowledgement of the claimant's integrity was not simply an expressive matter but one which was causally important, lest it would have led to a mischaracterization of the nature of harassment and discrimination suffered as a Black woman. The Tribunal appears to be clear in its understanding that the nature of sexual harassment changes its character fundamentally when directed against a Black woman and that racial discrimination is causally significant in determining the experience of sexual harassment. The reasoning appears to treat strands of intersectional thinking as inseparable in that similar and different patterns of group disadvantage suffered on the basis of race and sex could only be appreciated when the claimant was considered as a whole person. This inquiry was guided, in turn, by the immediate context of her

[218] Ibid [145].
[219] Ibid [143].
[220] Ibid [149].
[221] Ibid [123] [124].
[222] Ibid [125].
[223] Ibid [145].

discrimination as defined by the power dynamics of the workplace where her employer was in a position of power and control over her socio-economic status and stability, as well as the broad and purposive dignity jurisprudence of the Canadian Supreme Court, which is committed to affirming equal moral worth of all despite such power structures.[224] While it is contestable how transformative the dignity jurisprudence has actually been, there is no doubt that the contours of dignity in Canada have at least been defined in as transformative terms as possible.[225] The decision in Baylis-Flannery reflects this in its final holding, governed by a sense of minimizing the harm to human dignity when individuals and groups are 'marginalized, ignored or devalued', and enhances it by recognizing 'the full place of all individuals and groups within society'.[226]

Recently, the ECtHR too has shown signs of embracing intersectional discrimination in the case of BS v Spain.[227] The case concerned a migrant woman from Nigeria who was self-employed as a sex worker in Spain. She was approached by the police at several points during the course of her employment, who had asked her to present her identity documents, demanded her to leave the premises with lewd remarks, and had even struck her on several occasions.[228] She complained of verbal and physical abuse by the police and mishandling of her case by the Spanish judiciary. Before the ECtHR, she alleged that her rights under Article 3 (right against torture) and Article 14 (right to equality) had been violated on the basis of her race, gender, and employment status as a sex worker. She argued that 'her position as a Black woman working as a prostitute made her particularly vulnerable to discriminatory attacks and that those factors could not be considered separately but should be taken into account in their entirety, their interaction being essential for an examination of the facts of the case'.[229] The repeated inspections, insults, and injuries inflicted by the police and the failure of the Spanish courts to investigate and redress these allegations were thus a result of the claimant's specific vulnerability as a Black female sex worker in Spain. Further, she argued that her case was not a stray incident but one symptomatic of 'structural problems discrimination' in the Spanish judicial system.[230]

Third party intervenors presented intersectionality literature and 'invited the Court to recognise the phenomenon of intersectional discrimination'.[231] In light of the evidence submitted before it, the Court concluded that the Spanish courts had 'failed to take account of the applicant's particular vulnerability inherent in her position as an African woman working as a prostitute' and 'to take all possible steps to ascertain [224] Ibid [147] [148] (quoting from Law v Canada (n 99) [53] and Egan (n 26) (L'Heureux-Dubé J).

[225] See, for an account of this transformative potential, Denise G Réaume, 'Discrimination and Dignity' (2003) 63 Louisiana Law Review 1.
[226] Baylis-Flannery (n 213) [147].
[227] (2012) Application No 47159/08 (ECtHR).
[228] Ibid [8] [9].
[229] Ibid [52].
[230] Ibid [55].
[231] Ibid [56]–[57].

whether or not a discriminatory attitude might have played a role in the events.'[232] Similarly, the failure to investigate the 'causal link' between alleged racist attitudes and the violence perpetrated by the police was considered discriminatory under Article 14 of the ECHR.[233] The ECtHR thus cast the responsibility on the Spanish state to trace and address the structural forms of discrimination suffered by the claimant as a Nigerian sex worker and those similarly situated. A full-blown intersectional analysis does not appear in BS v Spain, but the ECtHR heard evidence on intersectional discrimination and found that a failure to investigate and address the case as such was a failure on the part of Spain which constituted a violation of Article 14 of the ECHR. The judgment is sparse in detail but poignant in its assertion that claims of intersectional discrimination should be investigated and redressed as such.

The case is significant when we remind ourselves that Article 14 of the ECHR is a parasitic right and is invoked only when the matter is within the ambit of another Convention right. As the next chapter shows, the Court does not often respond to Article 14 claims, single-axis or otherwise, especially when it has already found for a violation of another right. Roma women's cases of sterilization are typical of this.[234] In other cases where the Court does not find a violation at all, equality claims fail anyway. Muslim women's headscarf cases are typical of this.[235] Given this record, the ECtHR in BS v Spain need not necessarily have made a determination under Article 14, but, in doing so, it made a strong statement for national courts to embrace intersectionality in potential cases.[236]

In international human rights law, the CEDAW Committee has an extensive record of intersectionality in deciding individual communications under the Optional Protocol. The first substantive consideration of intersectionality appeared in Alyne v Brazil.[237] The author had challenged the poor quality of emergency obstetric care which led to the death of her daughter, Ms. Alyne da Silva Pimentel Teixeira, as violative of Articles 2 and 12, in conjunction with Article 1, of CEDAW. She alleged that the state party had not provided appropriate medical treatment in connection with pregnancy and had failed to ensure that timely emergency obstetric care was made available to all women, and, in particular, to women who were from particularly vulnerable areas and belonged to minority groups. The Committee recognized the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage suffered by the author's daughter as one shared with women in general and in comparison with men, and

[232] Ibid [62].
[233] Ibid [60]
[234] VC v Slovakia (2012) Application No 18968/07 (ECtHR); NB v Slovakia (2010) Application No 29518/10 (ECtHR); IG v Slovakia (2013) Application No 15966/04 (ECtHR).
[235] Dahlab v Switzerland [2001] ECHR 449; Şahin v Turkey [2005] ECHR 819; SAS v France [2014] ECHR 695.
[236] Keina Yoshida, 'Towards Intersectionality in the European Court of Human Rights: The Case of B.S. v Spain' (2013) 21 Feminist Legal Studies 195.
[237] Alyne da Silva Pimentel Teixeira v Brazil, CEDAW Committee, Communication No 17/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/49/D/17/2008 (views adopted on 25 July 2011).

uniquely as women from a disadvantaged and vulnerable background, including on the basis of their race and class.[238] Even though the Committee ended up calling such discrimination 'compounded' or 'multiple discrimination',[239] its thinking differed from the line of reasoning described in the previous sections as compound or multiple discrimination. The Committee was particular in causally linking grounds of race and sex to the experience of discrimination such that: 'the convergence or association of the different elements described by the author may have contributed to the failure to provide necessary and emergency care to her daughter, resulting in her death'.[240] It thus concluded that Ms Alyne was discriminated against 'not only on the basis of her sex, but also on the basis of her status as a woman of African descent and her socio-economic background'.[241]

The term 'intersectional discrimination' appeared later in the Committee's decision in Kell v Canada,[242] where the Committee found discrimination against an aboriginal woman as a result of domestic violence which impaired the exercise of her property rights. It developed this analysis further in the context of intersectional gender violence in RPB v Philippines[243] where the Committee found for discrimination based on sex, age, and disability against a young deaf girl who was subjected to prejudices, stereotypes, and unfair practices during a rape trial. In particular, the Committee acknowledged the shared patterns of gender violence suffered by women generally,[244] and with women with disabilities,[245] in addition to the distinct disadvantages suffered by the claimant as a young deaf-mute girl.[246]

The CRPD Committee—although it has dealt with intersectionality ably in its General Comments, especially the latest General Comment no. 6 on the right to equality and non-discrimination—has not had the opportunity to decide an actual or potential case of intersectional discrimination. In contrast, the Human Rights Committee, in deciding over two hundred individual communications under Articles 2 and 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), has had numerous opportunities to deal with intersectional discrimination.[247] However, only its 2011 decision in LNP v Argentina[248] bears substantive resemblance to intersectionality. In LNP, the author of the communication

[238] Ibid [3.2] [5.9].
[239] Ibid [5.10] [7.7].
[240] Ibid [7.7].
[241] Ibid.
[242] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 19/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/51/D/19/2008 (views adopted on 28 February 2012).
[243] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 34/2011, UN Doc CEDAW/C/57/D/34/2011 (views adopted on 21 February 2014). See also MS v Denmark, CEDAW Committee, Communication No 40/2012, UN Doc CEDAW/C/55/D/40/2012 (views adopted on 22 July 2013) [5.8].
[244] Ibid [8.9] [8.10].
[245] Ibid [8.3] [8.6] [8.7].
[246] Ibid [8.5] [8.8].
[247] See, for an extended analysis of this, Shreya Atrey, 'Fifty Years On: The Curious Case of Intersectional Discrimination in ICCPR' (2017) 35(3) Nordic Journal of Human Rights 220.
[248] HRC, Communication No 1610/2007, UN Doc CCPR/C/102/D/1610/2007 (2011).

complained of discrimination based on her sex and ethnicity in the way that her rape complaint was handled and decided by the police and judicial system in Argentina. She showed specific instances of having been targeted as a minor indigenous girl, including inordinate delay in responding to her complaint; lapses in investigation and unfair trial of her case as compared to rapes reported by women of the dominant community; the re-victimization of the author by perpetrating negative stereotypes about her character and morals during the trial; and the use of Spanish throughout the process despite the protests of the author and her family that they did not understand Spanish as indigenous people. According to her, these instances showed a pattern of systemic disadvantage suffered by indigenous women such that:

> . . . her case is by no means exceptional, since Qom girls and women are frequently exposed to sexual assault in the area, while the pattern of impunity that exists in regard to such cases is promoted by the prevalence of racist attitudes. The author adds that, in the opposite case, when a Creole woman says that she has been raped by a Qom, he is immediately arrested and sentenced.[249]

The Committee agreed with the author's careful detailing of her experience of specific, as well as shared, forms of discrimination and found that the state had violated Article 26 of the ICCPR based on the author's gender and ethnicity. The appreciation of this dynamic by considering the claimant as a whole—as a young Qom girl, in the context of existing patterns of discrimination suffered by Qom women in comparison to Creole women in Argentina—is the only real instance of the HRC adopting an intersectional framework with the purpose of transformation.

It is useful to note that decisions of treaty bodies are not binding in law, given that the committee members do not sit as a court and are, in fact, not all lawyers. They are not written in the manner of typical legal opinions and are kept characteristically terse. It is arguable that this non-legalistic nature of determination in international law may lend itself to greater consideration of intersectionality. However, this has not especially been the case, substantively speaking. In comparison with Hassam and Baylis-Flannery, the key strands of intersectionality are not appreciated in comprehensive detail by any of the human rights treaty bodies.[250]

[249] Ibid [2.7].

[250] See, for example, the latest decisions of the Human Rights Committee which found that the French ban on wearing a full-face veil discriminated against Muslim women [Sonia Yaker v France, Communication No 2747/2016, UN Doc CCPR/C/123/D/2747/2016 (2018); Miriana Hebbadj v France, Communication No 2807/2016, UN Doc CCPR/C/123/D/2807/2016 (2018), both decided on 17 July 2018]. Although the Committee finds for 'intersectional discrimination based on gender and religion, in violation of article 26 of the Covenant', the analysis is too sparse to explain in what way was it a case of intersectional discrimination in fact. It may be argued that cases like these are too obviously intersectional to bother with this explanation. However, obvious or not, a clear and comprehensive, even if pithy, explanation of intersectionality may be important for appreciating what is wrong about

This matters because, ultimately, intersectionality must make a diagnostic difference to the way we conceive of cases of intersectional discrimination—in determining the multiple grounds on which they are based and how these interact and lead to the disadvantage which is sought to be addressed through the body of discrimination law. The appreciation of the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage, which can only be accomplished by considering the claimant's identity as a whole and in its context, serves exactly this diagnostic purpose in discrimination law. The first four strands of the framework of intersectionality are thus intertwined such that they can only transpire together—it is not possible to appreciate the dynamic of sameness and difference of patterns of group disadvantage without appreciating the claimant's integrity or out of the relevant context of discrimination. The final strand of transformation, however, is more dispersed. While intersectionality is committed to its transformative aims of upturning the structures of disadvantage associated with identities and envisioning a world without such disadvantage, not all of discrimination law is couched in this way. South Africa is unique in its commitment to transformative constitutionalism, which includes its commitment to the transformative aims of discrimination law. It is thus unsurprising that the Hassam Court did not just draw on the core of intersectionality, as in sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage considered as a whole and in their context, but did so with the purpose of subverting such patterns of disadvantage, so as to achieve transformation of a diverse yet divided post-apartheid South African society. The result reflects the category of discrimination which comprehensively touches upon all aspects of intersectionality, and hence represents intersectional discrimination. Baylis-Flannery is not too far behind in its elaboration of the nature of intersectional discrimination in light of intersectionality, including a keen appreciation of the particular context of workplace harassment and discrimination claims, as well as the overall purpose of the Canadian jurisprudence to affirm the dignity of all. Other examples of intersectional discrimination in international law, including the ECtHR and human rights treaty bodies, are more light-touch in contrast. But their causal understanding of intersectional discrimination is not amiss and shows genuine signs of appreciating causality through the dynamic of sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage.

In sum, examples of intersectional discrimination in case law may not be rife but there are sure-fire signs of success in the few and relevant examples considered above. Intersectionality does not receive a uniform treatment in how much each of its strands is appreciated in each case. But it is clear that each case which does bear on multiple grounds of discrimination can be appreciated faithfully as an

it as a case of discrimination (even where intuitive). It may also matter for other external reasons, including for transparency in (non)judicial reasoning and as guidance for future claimants and domestic judges.

intersectional case when the strands are appreciated at all. Most important amongst these turns out to be the strand which explains the causality of an intersectional claim transpiring on multiple grounds, as in the dynamic of sameness and difference. This emerges only when claimants are treated as whole persons, composed of their many identities as members of disadvantaged groups, and considered in their relevant context. Taken together, these reveal the patterns of group disadvantage which help appreciate intersectional discrimination as discrimination from which people must be protected. Once this is appreciated, intersectionality points to transformative ways of addressing such disadvantage and at least some judges have been able to draw on this aim appropriately in redressing intersectional discrimination.

Conclusion

This chapter canvassed the dissonance with the 'dominant ways of thinking about discrimination law'[251] in responding to intersectionality. Crenshaw's initial dissonance was with the dominance of single-axis discrimination. Thirty years later, there may be dissonance over more than just strictly single-axis discrimination. Ways of thinking about discrimination have multiplied, especially in response to multi-ground claims. Some of them relate to intersectionality more than others. Thus, categories like contextual and capacious single-axis discrimination have been constructed in jurisdictions ingrained in single-axis thinking to be able to accommodate claims of a more diverse kind. Similarly, multiple, additive, and embedded discrimination each allow more than one ground to be accounted for in the discrimination inquiry. However, multiple discrimination only accounts for multiple grounds in the scheme of single-axis discrimination such that each ground is seen to contribute to discrimination independently. In contrast, additive discrimination goes further and accounts for some complex ways in which grounds interact as a combination or compound of different patterns of discrimination. Either way, it overemphasizes or undermines the dynamic of sameness and difference rather than considering it as transpiring simultaneously. Embedded discrimination conceptualizes multi-ground discrimination as being based on a hybrid ground, which represents the complexity of discrimination at work. Embedded discrimination seems to be able to speak to the intersectionality of subgroups or grounds considered to be 'embedded' in individual grounds, and seems well conceived in appreciating intersectionality. Yet, for all other general cases of multi-ground discrimination, it may only be the category of intersectional discrimination proper which may account for the nature of discrimination based on multiple grounds. So, in order to make normative space for intersectionality, we need to think in terms of the category of intersectional discrimination which embodies the key strands of intersectionality outlined in chapter 2. This means two things. First, going beyond single-axis thinking and reimagining discrimination as something which can be causally based on multiple identities. It requires identifying accurately the multiple grounds which may have caused discrimination in a claim. This relates to not just how (through which act or policies) discrimination came about but also how it comes about 'on the basis of' or 'because of' or 'on grounds of' certain kinds of identities. The fact that the harm of discrimination flows as a (loose) consequence of certain kinds of identities (recognized as grounds of discrimination) represents the distinctive understanding of causation in discrimination law. While single-axis discrimination implicates only one identity in the discrimination inquiry, intersectional discrimination would involve two or more. The framework of intersectionality helps understand what it means for discrimination to be based on more than one ground. Thus, secondly, intersectionality posits what the nature of such discrimination is, namely same and different patterns of group disadvantage associated with multiple identities considered as a whole and in their relevant context. Intersectionality also dictates that the purpose of appreciating this is ultimately to transform these patterns and indeed dismantle them as structures of disadvantage and systems of power.

[251] Crenshaw, 'Demarginalizing' (n 151) 150.

4
The Practice
Establishing an Intersectional Claim

Introduction

The focus of this book has been on identifying and responding to the gap between intersectionality theory and discrimination law. The gap, as we determined in chapter 1, is theoretical, categorial, and doctrinal in nature, in that it requires efforts in all these dimensions to make discrimination law respond to intersectionality. Chapter 2 addressed the normative gap by distilling the key strands of a framework of intersectionality theory for the purposes of discrimination law. Chapter 3 addressed the categorial gap in discrimination law for conceptualizing the category of intersectional discrimination which corresponded with the framework of intersectionality. The doctrinal task of actually proving a claim of intersectional discrimination so called remains to be fulfilled.

The task is presumably mammoth. A substantive restatement of discrimination law doctrine from the standpoint of intersectionality is required, to conceive of intersectional discrimination in a comprehensive way. From rethinking the legal and moral foundations of discrimination to settling practical matters (like recognizing grounds, classifying direct and indirect discrimination, using the comparator test, restating the burden of proof, choosing an appropriate standard of review, applying the justification defences, and imagining a suitable remedy), a complete account of intersectional discrimination will have to be wide-ranging.

This final chapter looks into these doctrinal recalibrations needed to respond to the category of intersectional discrimination. Section 1 weighs up the different legislative and constitutional texts which make intersectional discrimination viable in discrimination law. It concludes that it is not so much the drafting of the text as its interpretation which makes non-discrimination provisions intersectionality-friendly. Section 2 considers the nature of grounds in discrimination law and the criteria for identifying analogous grounds. It defends the position that we need to retain the diagnostic purpose that grounds serve in discrimination law but it also suggests that we need to expand the breadth of grounds to reflect the vast spectrum of disadvantage suffered by people because of their identities. Section 3 analyses what direct and indirect forms of intersectional discrimination look like and problematizes the notion of maintaining a strict distinction between the two.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

This is because intersectional discrimination defies such a binary approach and is often, in practice, a mix of both. Section 4 explores the substantive meaning of discrimination in terms of the touchstone or the test used for examining whether discrimination is actually wrongful in a case. The conclusion is that most substantive tests for discrimination are capable of capturing the wrong of intersectional discrimination, so long as we are attentive to the causal basis of it connected to multiple identities and the qualitative nature of the harm being produced by them in terms of intersecting patterns of group disadvantage. Section 5 argues that a holistic and contextual approach to comparison can be employed for this purpose—to determine multiple grounds of discrimination, as well as the wrongfulness of discrimination. Section 6 considers the standard of review and type of justification analysis that works for intersectional discrimination, discussing in particular the inexplicable inconsistencies in the application of both of these to single-axis versus intersectional claims. Section 7, on the burden of proof, critiques the inordinate burden placed on claimants in intersectional claims and posits a justification for levelling the burden of proof no matter the number of grounds or type of claim. Finally, section 8 canvasses the kind of remedies available for intersectional claims. It argues that remedies which make a difference are those which are specific and transformative in redressing intersectional discrimination. Higher or aggravated damages or any other quantitatively superior remedy is just one, and certainly not the only, way to redress intersectional discrimination.

This chapter thus presents a granulated account of intersectional discrimination in comparative discrimination law. It uses much of the case law discussed in the previous chapter as its starting point to understand how individual aspects in discrimination law relate to intersectional discrimination at a micro level. The chapter should be read together with chapter 3, which provides a macro analysis of whether these cases were conceptually categorized as a matter of intersectional discrimination or otherwise. Given the resistance to appreciating these cases as intersectional discrimination, the case law relevant for the present purposes is not vast. The effort has thus been to identify those cases and examples in comparative doctrine which give some indication of the key issues involved in respect of each of the broad doctrinal features of discrimination enumerated above. The discussion should help develop a normative idea of the recalibrations necessary for realizing a claim of intersectional discrimination. Needless to say, none of these recalibrations would be sufficient by themselves. To refer back to the imagery used in chapter 1 to describe the project of this book—discrimination law has to be imagined as a giant wheel of interconnected cogwheels, where each cog needs to work independently and simultaneously towards processing a claim of intersectional discrimination. So, the normative positions arrived at in this chapter should be taken together with other such positions developed in the chapter and the rest of the book, to see the difference in discrimination law reimagined from the perspective of intersectionality.

1970

1. Text of Guarantees

The discussion in the previous chapter posited that the fundamental problem with realizing intersectionality in discrimination law is the lack of a category for thinking about discrimination which befits intersectionality theory. Not much was said of whether such a characterization should exist in the text of the non-discrimination guarantees. However, as we saw in chapter 1, the text does in fact matter. It matters at two levels—first, whether it allows discrimination to be based on more than one ground, and second, whether any such multi-ground discrimination can be interpreted as a matter of intersectional discrimination. Chapter 1 compared positions across international and comparative jurisdictions to gauge how different answers to these two questions have influenced the development of discrimination law in addressing intersectional discrimination. A constitutional provision like Section 9(3) of the South African Constitution, a statutory provision like Section 3.1 of the Canadian Human Rights Act, and a definition of intersectional discrimination like that in paragraph 19 of General Comment no. 6 of the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) Committee[1] give a resounding yes to both of the questions posed above. But as we saw in chapter 3, it is not necessary that these provisions actually be interpreted and enforced this way. South African jurisprudence is a case in point of the different ways in which an enabling non-discrimination guarantee like Section 9(3) of the Constitution can be applied—as a matter of strictly single-axis discrimination in Volks v Robinson[2] and S v Jordan;[3] as substantially single-axis discrimination in Brink v Kitshoff NO;[4] capacious single-axis discrimination in the minority opinions of Volks and Jordan; additive discrimination in Bhe v Magistrate, Khayelitsha;[5] and intersectional discrimination in Hassam v Jacobs.[6] In fact, as the last chapter showed, most jurisdictions exhibit this diversity in responding to actual or potential claims of intersectional discrimination, no matter the actual text of their non-discrimination guarantees.

All that remains to be said in respect of the text of the discrimination guarantees, then, is that, while favourably worded provisions provide a foot in the door for recognizing intersectional discrimination, they are themselves insufficient for guaranteeing the realization of intersectional discrimination. It is the conceptual framing of discrimination defining those guarantees which makes a difference. Thus, even provisions which do not explicitly state that discrimination could be based on more than one ground have successfully accommodated intersectional

[1] CRPD Committee, General Comment No 6 on equality and non-discrimination, UN Doc CRPD/C/GC/6 (2018).
[2] 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (SACC) (hereafter Volks).
[3] 2002 (6) SA 642 (SACC) (hereafter Jordan).
[4] 1996 (4) SA 197 (SACC) (hereafter Brink).
[5] 2005 (1) SA 580 (SACC) (hereafter Bhe).
[6] 2009 (5) SA 572 (hereafter Hassam).

claims when interpreted in such a way. EU discrimination law is typical of this, its capacious single-axis reasoning proving sufficiently capable of appreciating intersectionality for certain recognized subgroups.[7]

Yet, some non-discrimination provisions seem awfully averse to intersectionality in the way they are cast. The notorious phrase 'on grounds only of' in Article 15(1) of the Indian Constitution is a prime example. The phrase has been interpreted to mean that discrimination based on one and only one ground is prohibited.[8] Even benignly worded provisions, such as in Title VII of the US Civil Rights Act of 1964, required some interpretation to be understood as not barring claims based on multiple grounds and, even so, not all the interpretations of multi-ground claims have been on a par with intersectionality.[9] On the other hand, while Section 14 of the UK Equality Act 2010 prohibits 'combination discrimination', the provision remains unenforced. Furthermore, there is little clarity as to whether the combination—which is meant to be limited to direct discrimination based on two enumerated grounds alone—implies additive (as in combination or compound) discrimination, or is actually intersectional discrimination. In contrast, Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights (ECHR) throws up its own unique challenges in not being an independent, self-standing non-discrimination guarantee. It has thus not been too sought after even where intersectional discrimination was at issue, most prominently in cases involving Muslim women's dress.[10]

The key point is that language does matter, but it is not determinative. A non-discrimination guarantee worded in an intersectionality-friendly way (i.e. explicitly recognizing that discrimination can be based on more than one ground and/or that such discrimination need not be proven separately on the basis of each ground) is thus a helpful starting point. It reduces the need for arguing that, even where discrimination is said to be based on a single ground alone, there is no justification for artificially confining it in such a way, because that is simply not how discrimination transpires in reality.[11] However, a provision which explicitly acknowledges this is neither necessary nor sufficient by itself for ensuring that intersectionality succeeds within it. While such a provision could certainly support intersectionality, nearly any other discrimination guarantee could too, because intersectionality resides not in multiple grounds or in the trope of intersectionality or intersectional discrimination; it resides in the way in which we interpret what those multiple grounds do in intersectional discrimination and what such discrimination actually is. This has been explained in the foregoing chapters. Here,

[7] See chapter 3, section 1.3.

[8] See chapter 3, section 1.1, nn 14–21 ff.

[9] See chapter 3, which shows how the US jurisprudence spans multiple categories of discrimination including single-axis, multiple, and additive discrimination.

[10] Dahlab v Switzerland [2001] ECHR 449; Şahin v Turkey [2005] ECHR 819; SAS v France [2014] ECHR 695 (hereafter SAS).

[11] This is the argument I make below with respect to art 15(1) of the Constitution of India.

1972

I want to take the example of apparently the hardest possible legal language—that of Article 15(1) of the Indian Constitution—and show how even that could be interpreted broadly to include intersectional discrimination, provided we are clear about one thing: the causal basis of discrimination.

To recap, Indian courts have had an unfavourable disposition towards outlawing discrimination that is based, even incidentally, on factors beyond the strict confines of a single ground.[12] They take their cue from the text of the constitutional non-discrimination guarantee, interpreted as strictly limiting discrimination to one ground only. This, though, is not the only possible interpretation of the constitutional text. In fact, considered as a whole and in the light of its history and cannons of constitutional interpretation, this is not a viable interpretation of Article 15(1) at all.[13]

Article 15(1) of the Indian Constitution provides that 'the State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them'. Two things need to be appreciated. First, a complete reading of Article 15(1) confirms that the prohibition of discrimination is one that is not simply based on only the enumerated grounds but also, based on any of them. The use of the word 'or' connecting the list of grounds to the phrase 'any of them' makes clear that discrimination that is prohibited can be based on the listed grounds alone or any of them in combination. Without the latter, the phrase 'or any of them' would be rendered redundant.[14] This is perhaps the most straightforward explanation for Article 15(1) to be interpreted as prohibiting discrimination based on any of the grounds, including intersectional discrimination on multiple grounds. Furthermore, there is an argument that the word 'only', even if not limiting the number of grounds in a claim, does limit the grounds which can be considered as the basis of discrimination. According to this argument, Article 15(1) signifies an exhaustive 'closed' list of grounds, barring recognition of discrimination based on grounds not enumerated therein. However, this argument has been sufficiently debunked with sexual orientation and transgender or third-gender status now considered analogous to grounds listed in Article 15(1).[15] This does not perforce

[12] See Indira Jaising, 'Gender Justice and the Supreme Court' in BN Kirpal et al (eds), Supreme But Not Infallible: Essays in Honour of the Supreme Court of India (OUP 2001). Cf Chandrachud J in Navtej Singh Johar v Union of India (Writ Petition (Criminal) No 76 of 2016) (decided on 6 September 2018) (Supreme Court of India) [36], expressing an openness towards interpreting art 15(1) in a way which goes beyond strictly single-axis discrimination and embraces intersectional discrimination based on 'other identities', in addition to a recognized ground of discrimination (hereafter Navtej Johar).

[13] See the complete version of this argument made in Shreya Atrey, 'Through the Looking Glass of Intersectionality: Making Sense of Indian Discrimination Jurisprudence under Article 15' (2016) 16 Equal Rights Review 160.

[14] Kalpana Kannabiran, Tools of Justice: Non-Discrimination and the Indian Constitution (Routledge 2012) 460–61.

[15] Naz Foundation v Government of NCT (2009) 160 DLT 277 (High Court of Delhi); National Legal Services Authority v Union of India (2014) 5 Supreme Court Cases 438 (Supreme Court of India) (hereafter NALSA); Navtej Johar (n 12).

mean that 'only' must now refer to the number of grounds in a discrimination claim. In fact, nothing in the drafting history of the Constitution indicates either of these quantitative limitations. What it does indicate, though, is that the phrase 'on grounds only of' may have been intended to have a causative import—signifying that discrimination is only that which is based on grounds.[16] The discussion on Article 15(1) by the Constituent Assembly (the body which drafted independent India's Constitution between 1947 and 1950) attributes no quantitative meaning to the word 'only', other than, perhaps, a qualitative link between the prohibition on discrimination and the five listed categories—religion, race, caste, sex, and place of birth—which is a causative understanding. Based on this understanding, 'only' in the phrase 'on grounds only of' is an adverb limiting the list of grounds, which means discrimination that is 'and no [more] besides; solely' based on the enumerated grounds is prohibited.[17] This meaning signifies what is special about discrimination law, that causation is not simply about cause and effect but them being linked by or based on certain grounds. This interpretation mirrors the causal phrases used in other jurisdictions where discrimination is that which is based on, for the reason of or because of certain grounds.[18] Intersectional discrimination fits this frame, in that discrimination of its kind is one that is based on, for the reason of or because of multiple grounds. Intersectionality thus does not require a different phrasing to be understood in these broadly causal terms. What is important for intersectional discrimination is for the typical phrases to not be quantitatively limited to discrimination based on a single ground. Instead, they should be interpreted as referring to the qualitative basis of discrimination, connecting it to the discriminator's act or omission (law, rule, criterion, policy, practice, decision) which disadvantages the claimant adversely and which is based on (whether directly or indirectly) certain kinds of identities (recognized as grounds or personal characteristics in discrimination law). With this we activate the possibility of recognizing causality such that it captures the qualitative basis of intersectional discrimination conceptually. Chapter 3 has already explained what that meant in terms of capturing the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage considered as a whole and in their full and relevant context for transformative purposes. This section only clarifies that the text of discrimination guarantees, when interpreted as reflecting a broad causal understanding of discrimination to be linked to grounds, are well capable of supporting the conceptual framework of [16] For example, one member even suggested replacing the provision with '[t]hat the State shall not make nor permit any discrimination against any citizen, on mere grounds of religion, race, caste or sex'; explaining that, '[t]he idea is if you put it like that, that would cover all cases.' This was not put to vote. Constituent Assembly of India Debates, Vol III, 29 April 1947.

[17] 'Only', Oxford English Dictionary <https://en.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/only> accessed 29 March 2019.

[18] US Civil Rights Act 1964, s 703a; UK Sex Discrimination Act 1975, ss 1, 2; UK Race Relations Act 1976, s 1; UK Disability Discrimination Act 1995, s 5; UK Equality Act 2010, ss 13, 19; Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms 1982, s 15(1); and Constitution of South Africa 1997, s 9(3).

intersectionality. Non-discrimination guarantees require reinterpretation rather than redrafting so as to actually be able to do so.

2. Grounds

In chapter 3, we looked at real or potential cases of intersectional discrimination of three kinds: (i) those which were argued on multiple grounds; (ii) those which discussed other grounds but were decided on a single ground; and (iii) those which were decided on a single ground and in which, even though other grounds/identities were apparently relevant, other grounds were not examined. The key to identifying intersectional claims lay in the possibility of multiple identities having been part of the reason why discrimination occurred. We saw that multiple identities (like weight, employment status, reliance on social assistance, and poverty) frequently went beyond the traditional construct and list of grounds recognized in discrimination law.

However, intersectionality theory did not exclusively develop as a theory of discrimination law to be limited by grounds in the first place. As chapter 2 showed, intersectionality was developed by Black feminists in many contexts—literature, poetry, philosophy, sociology, anthropology, psychology, etc. With a background in identity politics, intersectionality referred to identities rather than grounds in explaining people's experiences of discrimination. Yet, since only certain types of identities counted as grounds in discrimination law, intersectional discrimination also referred to grounds within the field. Crenshaw's initial response was framed in this way; looking at how the grounds of race and sex were construed under US discrimination law. This does not mean that the grounds-based approach to intersectionality is automatically the correct one. It only means that because Crenshaw was critiquing how Black women's claims were handled in discrimination law, it was axiomatic to refer to race and sex, both of which were recognized grounds of discrimination in the US under Title VII. Black feminism maintained an equal emphasis on class or poverty, which was then (as now) not recognized as a ground in Title VII or in most other jurisdictions. Both Black feminism and intersectionality theory have thus continued to relate to people's identities beyond recognized grounds, such as gender, race, religion, disability, and age, to include class, poverty, socio-economic status, residence, employment status, physical appearance, and weight.

So far, so good, if only grounds in discrimination law could accommodate intersectionality's reliance on identities which is far broader than the construct of grounds. But this has not been the case. Amongst the most seething criticisms of discrimination law has been criticism of the inability of grounds to accommodate intersectionality in this way.[19] The critique is both normative and practical—that the very idea of grounds is too limiting, both in principle and in practice, to either identify new grounds of discrimination or explain the nature of intersectional discrimination based on them. It is useful to address both the critiques. The argument here is that while the normative boundaries of grounds are indeed limited, it is a necessary limitation for discrimination law to be hinged on grounds, including for the purposes of intersectional discrimination (section 2.1). However, the doctrinal application of grounds does need revision, especially expanding the terms of construction of grounds in three ways—what each ground represents, how grounds relate to one another, and the criteria for selection of new (analogous) grounds (section 2.2).

[19] Excellent analyses on the nature of grounds and their categorial application appear in: Daphne Gilbert, 'Time to Regroup: Rethinking Section 15 of the Charter' (2003) 48 McGill Law Journal 627;

2.1 The Construct of Grounds

I have stated at several points that this book relies on and defends the normative construct of grounds in discrimination law. The continuum of judicial responses charted in the previous chapter worked centrally with grounds of discrimination, whether single or multiple, and with different conceptual frames of deploying them in the discrimination analysis. The continuum thus reflects the centrepiece around which discrimination law operates. Grounds, which define people's disadvantage associated with certain kinds of group identities, form the centrepiece of the framework of discrimination law.

I have also explained in chapter 3 that the causal basis of discrimination as linked to grounds is the key to understanding the legal wrong of discrimination, including intersectional discrimination. Without this link, discrimination is just a generic wrong, wherein people are distinguished or suffer some differential impact or detriment for reasons which are arbitrary or based on any other reason—animosity, favouritism, sympathy, etc.—and not necessarily because people possess certain personal characteristics for which they have historically suffered, and continue to suffer, specific and substantial forms of structural disadvantage. Without the latter, there is nothing special about discrimination law as we understand it.

It is thus important for intersectional discrimination to relate to grounds not as an unjustified inconvenience in recognizing intersectional discrimination as based on multiple grounds but as what intersectional discrimination must necessarily be based on. Intersectionality itself is not based on an unhinged idea of disadvantage, but is squarely based on disadvantage associated with certain kinds of identities.

Denise G Réaume, 'Of Pigeon Holes and Principles: A Reconsideration of Discrimination Law' (2002) 40 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 40; Dianne Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds of Discrimination to Real People's Real Experiences' (2001) 13 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 37 (hereafter Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds'); Nitya Iyer, 'Categorical Denials: Equality Rights and the Shaping of Social Identity' (1993) 19 Queen's Law Journal 179 (hereafter Iyer, 'Categorical Denials').

1976

Thus, intersectionality works with structural disadvantage explained in reference to people's identities, whether ascribed, self-defined, or perceived, which represent the disadvantage people bear as members of social groups (like women, Blacks, Asian people) defined by identity categories (like sex/gender/race). In Tarunabh Khaitan's words, the disadvantage people suffer as members of a socially salient group should be pervasive, abiding, and substantial.[20] Identities in intersectionality and grounds in discrimination law serve the common purpose—of linking the discriminatory treatment or impact to disadvantage defined along these lines. It is in this sense that identities or grounds serve as constant markers or reminders of why discrimination is prohibited.[21]

The problem, then, is not the broad purpose for which the construct of grounds exists; it is, instead, whether that construct can accommodate a broad range of disadvantages associated with people's identities. For example, socio-economic disadvantage, social class, poverty, residence, employment status, social origin, and weight remain at the margins of discrimination law, seldom recognized in the list of grounds by legislatures and readily rejected by courts as improperly constituting analogous grounds of discrimination. While intersectionality has no problem working with these identities to chart the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage, discrimination law appears to oust these as causally significant as grounds of discrimination. This is because they do not easily fit the tests employed to identify grounds. We somehow need to align our working understanding of grounds with that of identity in intersectionality then. The next section does just this.

2.2 The Test for Grounds

The main problem with grounds, as Nitya Iyer's remarkable challenge shows, is that they are too 'narrowly defined' for the purposes of intersectionality.[22] This means several things.

First, that the definition of individual grounds is too narrow and does not reflect a wide range of disadvantages associated with them. Grounds defined narrowly become essentialist in what they represent and whom they protect. For example, the definition of the ground of sex once excluded protection from pregnancy discrimination,[23] and still excludes specific disadvantages associated with sex work [20] Tarunabh Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (OUP 2015) 35–38 (hereafter Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law); Iris Marion Young, Justice and the Politics of Difference (PUP 1990) 43–45 (hereafter Young, Justice and the Politics of Difference).

[21] Corbiere v Canada [1999] 2 SCR 203 (SCC) [8] [11] (McLachlin and Bastarache JJ) (hereafter Corbiere); Pothier, 'Connecting Grounds' (n 19) 41.

[22] Iyer, 'Categorical Denials' (n 19).

[23] Bliss v Attorney General of Canada [1979] 1 SCR 183 (SCC).

despite it being a highly gendered form of labour.[24] There can be no hope for intersectional discrimination if grounds like sex are defined too narrowly to exclude attendant disadvantages of poverty, sex work, weight, physical appearance, etc. Secondly, even if grounds are defined broadly, there exists the problem of failing to see the interactions between them. This is the problem with an isolated reading of grounds, considering them as transpiring all on their own and individually rather than in relation to one another. Thirdly, grounds are criticized for being too few and exclusive, leaving out some very plausible categories from protection. This problem manifests in discrimination guarantees which operate with a 'list' of grounds.[25] These lists can be either 'closed' (enumerating a few grounds and not permitting the addition of new grounds) or 'open' (listing a few grounds non-exhaustively and permitting the addition of 'analogous' grounds). While closed lists throw a challenge by their very nature of being closed to expansion, open lists too may be narrowly interpreted in reference to a narrow criteria for selection of analogous grounds.

All of these problems often transpire together. The case of Mossop v Canada (Attorney General),[26] discussed in the last chapter, exemplifies how the troubles with grounds become compounded. To recall, Mossop concerned the denial of bereavement leave to attend the funeral of a same-sex partner's parent. The denial was based on the interpretation of the word spouse in the collective agreement with the employer which limited bereavement leave to married heterosexual couples. It was argued as discriminatory on the basis of family status under the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA). The majority held that discrimination in this case could have been based on sexual orientation but for the fact that sexual orientation was not an enumerated ground under the CHRA. Since the claimant did not argue it as an analogous ground, and discrimination based on family status was considered justifiable, the Court held that there was no discrimination in this case.

The main problem with Mossop was the fact that sexual orientation was not an enumerated ground under the CHRA then, in 1993. The list of enumerated grounds, where meant to be exhaustive (as in the CHRA), posed a definite impediment to claiming discrimination based on an unenumerated ground. Thus, the claimant's strategy to proceed under family status instead of sexual orientation seems reasonable. But, given that the majority in Mossop thought that the claim was based on the ground of sexual orientation in fact, the strategy was liable to fail. Moreover, the enumerated ground of family status was understood in [24] Jordan (n 3).

[25] The most prominent non-list provision is the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the US Constitution which guarantees equal protection of laws to everyone within the jurisdiction. Even so, the US discrimination jurisprudence has developed with a sense of what protected characteristics or grounds under the Equal Protection Clause look like (viz. race) in order to attract higher levels of scrutiny. United States v Carolene Products Company 304 US 144 (1938) n 4.

[26] [1993] 1 SCR 554 (SCC) (hereafter Mossop).

1978

isolation to avoid the 'back-entry' of unenumerated grounds (like sexual orientation) through enumerated ones.[27] So, when sexual orientation was not itself recognized, its incidents and connections with family status were also not meant to be protected from discrimination. Thus, the claimants were inhibited in bringing a claim based not only on unenumerated grounds or the intersection of enumerated and unenumerated grounds but on the enumerated ground of family status itself.[28] The fact that a ground like family status was definitionally understood to exclude homosexual partnerships as familial relationships was simply the problem of defining the ground too narrowly for the purposes of what disadvantages it addressed and whom it protected. L'Heureux-Dubé J in her dissenting opinion in Mossop called this a 'narrow and exclusionary approach' at odds with the 'broad and purposive interpretation of human rights legislation'.[29]

Several things can be done about this—for example, first, reforming the narrow, exclusionary, categorial, and isolated application of grounds; and secondly, expanding the possibility of reading-in unenumerated grounds for protection from discrimination.

The first suggestion has been oft-repeated. In Iyer's words we need to 'open up the pockets and permit them to interact'.[30] Similarly, Crenshaw argues that '[i]dentity politics do not need to be abandoned because of their reliance on categories but rather need to recognize the multiplicity of identities and the ways categories intersect at specific sites'.[31] The suggestion is that pockets or identity categories and grounds need to be interpreted broadly and studied in light of their interrelationships. This view of categories essentially depends on how we use them in constructing frames of thinking about discrimination rather than what the categories themselves are. Thus, capacious and contextual single-axis discrimination, additive discrimination, embedded discrimination, and, of course, intersectional discrimination rely on grounds being considered broadly and in terms of their interactions. Readers can revisit this discussion in the previous chapter.

Here, I want to tackle the claim that grounds do indeed need opening up externally, so as to recognize more identity categories for protection from discrimination. I want to show that it is possible for both closed and open lists, when our criteria for recognition of grounds is wide enough, to reflect the diversity of disadvantage associated with identities. For that to be so, it is important for the criteria

[27] See also Rutherford v Secretary for State and Industry [2006] UKHL 19 [16] (Lord Scott) ('a difference in treatment of individuals that is based purely on age cannot be transformed by statistics from age discrimination, which it certainly is, to sex discrimination.').

[28] However, this may not always be the case. Cf Fitzpatrick v Sterling Housing [1999] 2 WLR 1113 (HL) (bringing homosexual relationships into the ambit of 'family' before sexual orientation was recognized as a ground) and Ghaidan v Godin-Mendoza [2004] UKHL 30 (extending right of partners in a homosexual relationship for inheriting statutory tenancy).

[29] Mossop (n 26) 107 (L'Heureux-Dubé J).

[30] Iyer, 'Categorical Denials' (n 19) 204.

[31] Kimberlé W Crenshaw, 'Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Color' (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1241, 1297–99.

to be based on a range of factors, none of which are necessary on their own but may independently or in combination be sufficient in underpinning the justification for both existing and analogous grounds.

The prospect of claiming discrimination on multiple grounds remains central to realizing intersectional discrimination. It is, in turn, enhanced by the prospect of claiming on not just enumerated but also unenumerated grounds. In jurisdictions like the UK and India, where the general non-discrimination guarantees operate with closed lists (under the Equality Act 2010 and Article 15(1) of the Constitution respectively), this may seem hard on the face of it. Though courts in both jurisdictions have made ambitious interpretive strides to read-in analogous grounds within existing grounds. Addressing caste discrimination through race and ethnic origin in the UK and transgender discrimination through sex in India are encouraging signs.[32] Where there is explicit allowance for reading-in analogous grounds, as in South Africa and Canada, the possibility of claiming on independent analogous grounds is even more promising.[33] Thus, despite the closed or open form of lists, claiming on multiple grounds, one or few of which are analogous, is conceivable in principle.

But, as the jurisprudence in the last chapter revealed, this is rather elusive for intersectional claims. Other than Corbiere, where the Canadian Supreme Court read in a new embedded analogous ground of aboriginality-residence, courts in cases like Brink, Mossop, Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General),[34] and Jordan did not attempt to recognize marital status (Brink), sexual orientation (Mossop), socio-economic disadvantage/reliance on social assistance (Gosselin), and employment status (Jordan) as analogous grounds relevant to the claims at hand.[35] Similarly, while the Supreme Court of India has recently gone on to recognize analogous grounds in single-axis claims, intersectional claims like Air India have neither considered the ground of sex to cover incidents of sex discrimination related to marital status, pregnancy, and age; nor considered these incidents as possible grounds of discrimination in themselves.[36] The US jurisprudence also limited the possibility of reading-in analogous grounds in the context of intersectional discrimination.[37]

[32] Chandhok v Tirkey [2015] ICR 527 (UKEAT) (interpreting 'caste' within the ground of 'ethnic origin' for the purposes of the Equality Act 2010); NALSA (n 15); P v S and Cornwall County Council [1996] IRLR 347 (CJEU).

[33] Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter uses the words 'in particular' and s 9(3) of the South African Constitution uses 'including', before their respective lists of grounds.

[34] [2002] 4 SCR 429 (SCC) (hereafter Gosselin).

[35] Cf Egan v Canada [1995] 2 SCR 513 (SCC) (where the analogous ground of sexual orientation was recognized but the claim still failed) (hereafter Egan).

[36] It remains to be seen whether Chandrachud J's obiter in Navtej Johar (n 12), that claims like those based on both sex and height are presumptively covered within art 15(1) of the Constitution of India, gains any traction in future cases.

[37] For example, the 'plus' characteristic in cases involving two grounds must be an immutable one. See Arnett v Aspin 846 F Supp 1234 (1994) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Pennsylvania) 1241 ('[T]he current line drawn between viable and nonviable sex-plus claims is adequate—that the "plus" classification be based on either an immutable characteristic or the exercise of a fundamental

1980

The question has not really arisen in the context of EU law or the ECHR for intersectional claims, and the question does not quite arise under individual human rights treaties like the UN Convention on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women (CEDAW) and the UN Convention on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities (CRPD) which are limited to single grounds but do recognize, as the last chapter showed, intersections with other grounds, without having to recognize other grounds as 'analogous' to the main axis of sex or disability in CEDAW or CRPD respectively. Thus, for jurisdictions like Canada and South Africa, which have had single-axis claims succeed on analogous grounds, it is useful to ask what inhibits them in recognizing analogous grounds in intersectional claims?

We must begin with the test for recognizing analogous grounds in these jurisdictions. The leading test for identifying analogous grounds in Canada is one of actual or constructive immutability.[38] While the Supreme Court of Canada has hinted at other factors like 'the fact that the decision adversely impacts on a discrete and insular minority or a group that has been historically discriminated against', they are taken to 'flow from the central concept of immutable or constructively immutable personal characteristics' without being independently relevant.[39] In the same way, factors like the relevance of a personal characteristic being the basis of stereotypes and affecting personal identity have been taken as derivative of the central construct of immutability.[40] However, the focus on immutability or fundamental choice has been criticized for being too narrow and only 'tangentially relevant'[41] to other indicia like political power, historical disadvantage, marginalization, prejudice, and stereotyping. Thus, in contrast, the South African Constitutional Court has read-in analogous grounds like citizenship,[42] HIV status,[43] and refugee status[44] in Section 9(3) without a single-minded focus on immutability. Analogous grounds are simply taken to be those that have the potential to violate human dignity[45] and the Court approaches this inquiry by identifying patterns of historical group disadvantage based on the prospective analogous ground.[46] In addition, it has considered other factors like political marginalization,[47] immutability,[48] and right. And, although I have uncovered no other case that recognises a "sex-plus-age" discrimination claim under Title VII, it is clear that age is an immutable characteristic.').

[38] Corbiere (n 21) [13].
[39] Ibid.
[40] Ibid.
[41] Rosalind Dixon, 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Constitutional (Equality) Baselines' (2013) 50 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 637, 653.
[42] Larbi-Odam v Member of the Executive Council for Education 1998 (1) SA 745 (SACC) (hereafter Larbi-Odam).
[43] Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (SACC).
[44] Union of Refugee Women v Director, Private Security Industry Regulatory Authority 2007 (4) SA 395 (SACC).
[45] Harksen v Lane NO 1998 (1) SA 300 (SACC) [47] (hereafter Harksen).
[46] Ibid [50] (Goldstone J); Larbi-Odam (n 42) [19]–[20].
[47] Khosa v Minister of Social Development 2004 (6) SA 505 (SACC) [71] (Mokgoro J).
[48] Harksen (n 45) [50] (Goldstone J).

personal choice[49] in making this determination. Underlining all of these is the idea of historical disadvantage which is considered a 'powerful indicator' for identifying analogous grounds.[50] That said, neither sex work nor employment status in Jordan were argued or considered to be potential analogous grounds from the perspective of historical disadvantage suffered by female sex workers. The reason may have been practical, in that Section 9(5) of the South African Constitution offers a presumption of unfairness for cases based on listed grounds. The presumption does not extend to analogous grounds, where the claimant bears the burden of proof to show that the discrimination based on them is actually unfair. Claiming on analogous grounds thus only compounds the obstacles in claiming on multiple grounds to prove intersectional discrimination.

A further problem with analogous grounds is that each of the contenders for the criteria of grounds—immutability, personal choice, dignity, autonomy, historical disadvantage, political powerlessness, marginalization, stereotyping, prejudice, or stigma—seem individually insufficient in explaining the basis of all possible grounds, listed or otherwise. For example, while age as a ground may be explained through a criterion like immutability, it may not be appreciated through the idea of political powerlessness which is more appropriate for a ground like citizenship; however, citizenship may not speak as much to personal identity as religion does, but religion and citizenship may both be explained by personal choice and autonomy; and yet, disability may be explained through none of them in particular, but in reference to a shared basis in all of them and in reference to historical disadvantage, marginalization, stereotyping, and prejudice. Thus, not all grounds 'fit' a single criterion for grounds.[51] This is because the identities recognized as grounds or personal characteristics each relate to a distinct set of disadvantages for which they need to be recognized and protected from discrimination. For example, race is problematic for the fact that it is immutable and one cannot shrug off the disadvantages which are associated with it, while religion is protected for the reason that, even though it can be changed, it can only be changed at a very high personal cost because it is important to people to retain and celebrate their religious affiliations without such disadvantage; disability, on the other hand, is presumably protected for neither of those reasons (based on immutability or personal choice), but because of the structural 'barriers' which inhibit the participation of disabled persons in society and contribute to their historical disadvantage, marginalization, and negative portrayal as lacking in worth or dignity. While historical disadvantage seems to run through most of these grounds, even that cannot be the only reference point for identifying grounds. With the recent rise of immigration and displacement of people around the world, migrants or non-permanent residents of a state may be able to argue that they face a constant battering based on their socio-economic, cultural, and political status, quite on a par with other vulnerable groups in a state (including the poor, sexual minorities, and disabled persons). Their disadvantage may not be historic but is otherwise similar to disadvantage suffered by these social groups.

[49] Member of Executive Council for Education, Kwa-Zulu Natal v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (SACC) [61]–[67] (Langa CJ) (hereafter Pillay).

[50] Sandra Fredman, Discrimination Law (2nd edn, OUP 2011) 139 (hereafter Fredman, Discrimination Law).

[51] Ibid 130–39.

The criteria for the selection of grounds must then relate to and be extrapolated from a wide range of factors. A single criterion for all grounds can be limiting and unrepresentative of the diversity of disadvantage that grounds are meant to reflect, especially the peculiar nature of intersectional discrimination suffered on multiple grounds. This point is borne out in the South African Constitutional Court's decision in Jordan. The Court had found that the gender-neutral provision which criminalized both merchant and customer in the sex trade did not constitute unfair discrimination on the basis of gender under Section 9(3) of the Constitution. The majority in Jordan had doggedly focussed on the gender neutrality of the provision, ignoring the statistical evidence which showed that those targeted under the criminal provision were actually only women. But what was more problematic was the Court's framing of the employment status of sex workers in the illusory terms of choice—where women knowingly and willingly accepted the 'risks' of the trade,[52] including the indignity and incrimination which came with it. While employment status as a sex worker was not strictly immutable and involved some level of personal choice, this framing was misleading since it ignored indicia which better explained their status in terms of political powerlessness, exploitation, violence, stereotypes, prejudice, and marginalization. Thus, not only did the Court choose to ignore gender, a ground listed under Section 9(3) of the Constitution and attracting a presumption of unfairness under Section 9(5), but it made light of the employment status of sex workers which was the key to understanding the interminable cycle of disadvantage for female sex workers who were predominantly poor, abused, and vulnerable. The casualty was the lack of appreciation of the grounds on which discrimination was based in this case—not on gender alone, but specifically the intersection of gender as well as employment status of the women as sex workers. The specific nature of employment modified the character of discrimination at play which was not visited upon women and men in other forms of employment and even male sex workers. The key to the recognition of unfair discrimination in Jordan, then, lay in the recognition of intersecting grounds having caused such discrimination, viz. gender and the analogous ground of employment status or sex work that was based on a range of factors which explained what was problematic with it as a status to be protected from discrimination.[53]

[52] Jordan (n 3) [16] [52] [66].

[53] L'Heureux Dubé J makes this point emphatically: 'The enumerated or analogous nature of a given ground should not be a necessary precondition to a finding of discrimination. If anything, a finding

In conclusion, it is useful to reiterate that intersectional claims will be better served only when there is a genuine possibility of being argued on multiple grounds. This possibility is genuine when the factors for recognizing analogous grounds are not constrained by traditional indicia of immutability and personal choice, and include political powerlessness, historical disadvantage, marginalization, stereotyping, prejudice, and stigma. A wider set of factors, taken individually or in combination, is better suited to describing existing or new grounds in a far more accurate way, representing the kind of disadvantages that can attach to grounds and to people belonging to the disadvantaged groups defined by those grounds.

A clarification is in order before we move on from grounds. The insistence on recognizing analogous grounds in reference to a range of factors should not be misconstrued as a demand for recognizing intersectionality through embedded grounds for every combination of grounds. While this worked in Corbiere for the ground of aboriginality-residence, this may not be as useful or even tenable in other cases. This fearful idea—of necessarily recognizing intersectionality via embedded grounds—was instilled by the DeGraffenreid Court which viewed a claim based on both sex and race as attempting 'to combine two causes of action into a new special sub-category'[54] and was reiterated in Judge v Marsh which warned against discrimination law transforming into a 'many-headed Hydra'.[55] The fear has evidently failed to materialize. For example, Black women's discrimination claims have never demanded the recognition of a separate hybrid ground of race–sex or gender–race as 'a super-category'[56] in order to succeed. No other case arguing for intersectional discrimination has expressed itself in this way either. Instead, the demand for the recognition of the nature of intersectional disadvantage suffered by Black women as Black women is not asking either for the recognition of that group per se as a matter of identity politics or the recognition of a separate ground which may denote that group perfectly in discrimination law. Such a claim would belie the complexity in intersectionality which resides neither in groups nor grounds purely but in the co-constitutive nature of systems of disadvantage or structures of power associated with either.

In any case, the claim for recognizing analogous grounds is to align our understanding of disadvantage based on identity categories in intersectionality with that of grounds in discrimination law. It is only for the purposes of allowing of discrimination is a precondition to the recognition of an analogous ground.' Egan (n 35) [52] (L'Heureux-Dubé J).

[54] DeGraffenreid v General Motors 413 F Supp 142 (1976) (United States District Court, Eastern District of Missouri) 143 (hereafter DeGraffenreid).

[55] Judge v Marsh 649 F Supp 770 (1986) (United States District Court, District of Columbia) (hereafter Judge v Marsh).

[56] DeGraffenreid (n 54).

intersectional discrimination to also be based on non-traditional grounds like employment status, migrant status, poverty, residence, and physical appearance. Analogous grounds are sufficient for the purposes of intersectionality, when considered as independent but interactive systems of disadvantage, and not necessarily as categories which amalgamate into existing grounds and disappear into super-categories or form ever-so-small hybrid grounds based on every possible permutation of identities.

3. Direct and Indirect Discrimination

Discrimination, it is thought, comes in two forms—direct and indirect discrimination. Direct discrimination is understood as unequal treatment which is explicitly based on a ground or a protected characteristic. Indirect discrimination or disparate impact (in the US) is understood as inequality of results which is based on a neutral rule or practice that disproportionately affects those belonging to a particular disadvantaged group. This distinction, which appears uncomplicated on the face of it, has been vexed in practice. While some cases do show a propensity to be classified as either direct or indirect discrimination, others fail to be distinguished this way and may be classified as neither or both. The point was driven home by McLachlan J in her famed example of a rule which made it compulsory for all workers to report on Fridays.[57] The rule could be characterized as either directly discriminating against those whose religious beliefs proscribed work on Fridays, or classified as a neutral rule which applied to all employees of every religion equally but adversely affecting only those whose religion proscribed work on Fridays. The distinction seems unnecessary when ultimately the same discrimination ensues from both. McLachlan J concluded that the distinction between direct and indirect discrimination was thus too vague and malleable given that 'an adjudicator may unconsciously tend to classify the impugned standard in a way that fits the remedy he or she is contemplating'.[58] However, the distinction dictates the moral blameworthiness, justifications, standard of scrutiny, rules of burden of proof, and choice of remedies, based on how one classifies the rule. The distinction is thus far from superficial given its very practical implications.

The debate over the two forms of discrimination and the distinction between them resurfaces in cases of intersectional discrimination with even more gusto. Take the case of prohibition of Muslim women's headscarves. The prohibition can be viewed as explicitly directed against Muslim women based on the grounds of gender and race or religion. It can also be considered as a neutral prohibition on all kinds of headgear applicable to everyone and affecting Muslim women disproportionately on the basis of their gender and race or religion. It can also be couched as a prohibition on women's head coverings alone, in which case the prohibition would be based on the ground of gender explicitly but affect Muslim women based on the two grounds of gender and race or religion. The rule could also be couched as a prohibition on the display of all philosophical or religious beliefs, in which case it would be directly based on the ground of religion but would affect Muslim women based on the two grounds of gender and race or religion. It could even be a prohibition on the display of all religious beliefs and affect Muslim women, on the basis of their gender and race, as a form of Islamophobia or cultural prejudice against those perceived to be Arabs or Middle Eastern. All these permutations affect the same intersectional group, viz. Muslim women. But the permutations differ in the many ways they are couched, namely the criteria they are based on—whether a single ground, a neutral one, multiple grounds, or a combination of grounds and neutral considerations—and in the many ways their impact can be described—whether felt on the basis of gender and race (where intersectional impact is distinctly a combination of sexism and racial prejudice or otherness based on non-Europeanness) or gender and religion (where the intersectional impact is a combination of sexism and faith or preference for Judeo-Christian values). The sheer range of what may be described as either direct or indirect intersectional discrimination, or both, is mindboggling. Classification based on subtle differences can thus be exhausting and perhaps not too fruitful given the crossover between the categories.

[57] British Columbia (Public Service Employee Relations Commission) v British Columbia Government Service Employees' Union [1999] 3 SCR 3 (SCC) [27].

[58] Ibid [28].

Yet, form and classification matter in the way we understand discrimination substantively. The categories outlined in the previous chapter revealed that the frames of thinking about discrimination affected whether we understood the nature of intersectional discrimination at all. Making sense of the case law qua direct and indirect forms of discrimination may also help understand intersectional discrimination in a comprehensible way. One way to ensure this is to understand the relationship between grounds and impact, not simply in the single-axis format which populates our thinking of direct and indirect discrimination but to look more closely at the relationship between the two as it transpires in intersectional cases. Based on the case law canvassed in the previous chapter, four kinds of relationship between discrimination and grounds can be posited in intersectional claims—(i) discrimination which is directly based on multiple grounds and causes impact on those grounds; (ii) discrimination which is based on neutral criteria and causes indirect impact on multiple grounds; (iii) discrimination which is based facially on a single ground but causes impact on that and other grounds; and (iv) discrimination which is based on one or more grounds, coupled with a neutral consideration, and causes discriminatory impact on multiple grounds. Categories (i) and (ii) are what may be readily classified as direct and indirect intersectional discrimination respectively. The other two categories are harder to pin down. What helps in such cases is to appreciate the relationship between the criteria and grounds invoked, and the impact they lead to, which is intersectional in the way we have defined intersectional discrimination thus far. Case law can assist with this.

1986

Relationship (i) exemplifies straightforward cases of direct intersectional discrimination where unequal treatment is meted out to someone specifically because of their personal characteristics. Employers or service providers who would not hire or serve fat Black men because they do not like or trust them or consider them worthy of holding a job or of being served are guilty of direct intersectional discrimination when relying on the grounds of both weight/obesity and race/colour in excluding fat Black men. The treatment of the claimant in Baylis-Flannery v DeWilde[59] is typical of direct intersectional discrimination by an individual who sexually and racially targets the claimant because she is a Black woman. The animus is more than amply clear in such cases. Where it is not, and the treatment can be explained on grounds other than race and sex, cases of direct intersectional discrimination tend to fail.[60] But besides the US, most jurisdictions do not rely on animus or intention to discriminate, in establishing direct discrimination, but on simply a coincidence of reasons for discriminating with grounds of discrimination, or a coincidence of 100 per cent of those affected being defined by membership of a disadvantaged group. Even under these tests, cases of direct intersectional discrimination may be identified rather easily. Thus, legislative provisions—such as those in Bhe and Hassam—which specifically exclude certain sections of women from intestate inheritance (i.e. women in customary marriages and those in Muslim polygynous marriages respectively) are also cases of direct intersectional discrimination irrespective of whether the legislatures harboured any intention to deprive these groups of inheritance. All that is needed to appreciate discrimination in these cases is that the legislative provisions are crafted in a way that they rely on certain protected characteristics or grounds to determine who qualifies for a certain benefit, or that the provision exclusively excludes certain groups defined by certain protected characteristics or grounds, namely, all those affected are women married under and governed by customary law (Bhe) or Muslim widows of polygynous marriages (Hassam). The legislation in Corbiere was similarly problematic having invoked both aboriginality and lack of residence on the reserve as the criteria for limiting voting rights. These intersectional cases are all forms of direct discrimination in reference to either the motive or reasoning of the discriminator or the 100 per cent coincidence of those affected being defined by two or more grounds of discrimination specifically. But the effect of such discrimination is that intersectional claimants end up suffering disadvantage which is unique to them. Thus, the claimants in Corbiere faced the unique disadvantage of being excluded from voting as aboriginal band members living off-reserve, while also facing the disadvantages suffered by aboriginal people generally. The effect or the impact of discrimination was thus intersectional because it represented the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage when considered as a whole and in its full context.

[59] 2003 HRTO 28 (hereafter Baylis-Flannery).
[60] See, for example, Bahl v The Law Society [2004] EWCA Civ 1070 (UK Court of Appeal).

The question which arises is whether we can simply focus on the impact to find for intersectional discrimination rather than trying to connect the criteria for differentiation, or reasons for treatment, to personal characteristics or grounds. This is what indirect discrimination does anyway: notwithstanding the neutrality of the discriminator's criteria, it focusses on the eventual disproportionate impact upon those who share a particular set of personal characteristics. Despite its apparent simplicity, there are great challenges to making a successful case of indirect intersectional discrimination based on impact rather than direct intersectional discrimination explicitly based on grounds. This is because indirect intersectional discrimination on multiple grounds does not just come about in one form but many—unlike its single-axis counterpart. These forms often overlap with direct discrimination, complicating our view of the neat distinction between direct and indirect forms of discrimination even further.

In indirect intersectional discrimination, we are thinking of at least three types of cases—relationships (ii) to (iv) above. Let us take them in turn. The locus classicus of DeGraffenreid exemplifies (ii). DeGraffenreid can be classified as a typical case of indirect intersectional discrimination where the neutral policy of 'last hired first fired' ended up disproportionately affecting Black women. Needless to say, inter alia, the fact that discrimination was not overtly blameworthy, and did not affect white women and Black men but specifically Black women, exacerbated the claimants' plight in establishing the claim. It was then not just the conceptual myopia of failing to see intersectionality which contributed to its defeat, but also the fact that the Court declined to look beyond the pale of neutrality. The judicial failure lies in the resistance to recognizing indirect discrimination based on a neutral policy.

But (ii) may be further divided into a type of indirect intersectional discrimination which is not simply based on one neutral policy or rule, but two or more of them which cumulatively lead to indirect intersectional impact based on multiple grounds. The case of Tilern de Bique v Ministry of Defence[61] comes to mind here. The discrimination in the case was said to be based on two independent neutral conditions—one of which was based on immigration and prohibited the claimant from bringing family from overseas for childcare, and the other of which was based on the expectation of constant availability for work that was impossible for the claimant to comply with as a single mother without childcare. Both the conditions were neutral (i.e. not based on grounds) and neither caused any unjustifiable direct or indirect discrimination independently. It was only the combined application of the two that impacted the claimant as a non-British army officer who was also a single mother without any family in the UK. It was only women like her who were going to be disproportionately impacted by the two conditions—given their inability to arrange affordable childcare and to comply with the conditions of military service. Those who were British nationals or had families in the UK, and those who were not single mothers, did not face these disadvantages. The Employment Appeal Tribunal thus determined that the two neutral conditions were indirectly discriminatory on the basis of both race and gender.

[61] [2009] UKEAT/0075/11/SM (hereafter Tilern).

Tilern de Bique is an important case to remember. Intersectional discrimination, by its very nature, is about structures or systems of powers which collide, interact, and hence co-constitute one another to yield forms of disadvantage which are complex and hence often insidious. In the UK, migrant women detained at Yarl's Wood and the overwhelming numbers of BAME or immigrant victims of the Grenfell Fire tragedy are typical examples where structures, not necessarily designed to exclude or disadvantage intersectional victims, end up doing just that, in that, the way these systems operate hits those who are severally and severely disadvantaged because of their poverty, race, colour, gender, immigration status, employment status, etc. Sex work is another apt example. Neutral provisions criminalizing the sale and purchase of sex do not just fall on anyone. In effect, they predominantly criminalize a very clear section of the population which is both female and poor, and hence vulnerable to a distinct set of disadvantages which, admittedly, are similar to those faced by poor people and women generally, but which are also different from them because of the nature of sex work which is precarious, degrading, and entrapping. This was exactly what had happened in Jordan. But the South African Constitutional Court failed to appreciate this intersectional impact based on poverty, gender, and employment status in failing to go past the neutrality of the criminal provision. Openness to the many complex ways in which neutral systems operate is thus extraordinarily important in revealing insidious and subterranean forms of intersectional discrimination.

However, indirect intersectional discrimination may not just ensue from neutrality. It can also be based on single or multiple grounds and can cause intersectional impacts on grounds other than those on which they are overtly based. Thus, in the case of (iii), discrimination can be based on a single ground directly but cause indirect impact on that as well as other grounds of discrimination. Volks is one such example. To recall, the exclusion from intestate succession in Volks was overtly based only on marital status but had a particularly detrimental impact on female cohabiting partners. The case was argued as a matter of direct discrimination based on marital status. However, the disadvantage suffered by Mrs Robinson was due to her inability to exercise the choice to marry and her economic vulnerability as a female partner. The legislative criterion of marital status which excluded her from intestate succession was insufficient in bringing to light the disadvantage associated with her position. The nature of indirect intersectional disadvantage thus went underappreciated in Volks. Gosselin mirrors this failure in that the discrimination analysis was confined to the single ground of age because the social assistance scheme was age-based, and thus failed to appreciate the intersectional impact which accrued on the basis of not only age but also gender and poverty. In other words, Gosselin may have been a case challenging the legislative criterion of age for the distribution of social benefits, but it was certainly not a case which caused discrimination, as in impacted people, based on the ground of age alone. It could have well been a case which challenged the legislative criterion of being thirty years of age or below for claiming the full rate of social assistance, on grounds of age, reliance on social assistance, and gender, because, on evidence, it was clear that young women on social assistance were disproportionately impacted by the impugned legislative criterion. Cases like Volks and Gosselin require more than a superficial consideration of the relationship between criterion, grounds, and impact to understand what direct and indirect discrimination are really about.

A final type of indirect intersectional discrimination may be of the kind that is directly based on criteria which touch upon multiple grounds but that impacts intersectional claimants on a different set of grounds, namely, relationship (iv). Such a case is not inconceivable. The service industry's rules of grooming and physical appearance may be explicitly based on criteria like height, weight, hair, makeup, and uniform dress code. These may individually and together impact women far more than men. But together the criteria may have an even more disproportionate impact on Muslim women or Black women based on their preference to don a headscarf or wear their hair natural, respectively. The intersectional impact is thus indirectly based on the grounds of gender, race, or religion, irrespective of the fact that the criteria invoked by the discriminator may have been based on a different set of criteria based on enumerated or analogous grounds, some of which may have even been apparently neutral.

Finally, it must be said that the appreciation of indirect intersectional discrimination in its diverse forms ultimately depends on the legislative and judicial commitment to it. In the UK, for example, the unenforced Section 14 on combination discrimination in the Equality Act 2010 is limited to direct discrimination thus excluding a claim of indirect intersectional discrimination under the provision. The apparent reason for this exclusion was the 'unnecessary and disproportionate increase in the cost and the complexity of the law'.[62] Other jurisdictions are not so explicit in their disavowal but have not been able to do justice to the case law which appears to be of the type of indirect intersectional discrimination. Once again, the complexity of the matter seems to deflate the enthusiasm for addressing intersectionality, when complexity should be the reason for appreciating its significance as a specific form of discrimination. This section has contributed to breaking down the complexity of intersectional discrimination by laying bare the different forms in which it occurs. These are understood not simply as direct and indirect discrimination based explicitly on single or multiple grounds. Instead, they are best understood by deconstructing the relationship between discriminatory criteria (whether single or multiple neutral rules or policies, or based on single or multiple grounds), the impact of the application of that criteria on intersectional claimants (patterns of group disadvantage), and the grounds on which such impact seems to occur (multiple enumerated or analogous grounds). The hope is that cases of intersectional discrimination will be examined in greater detail in this precise way rather than the classificatory model of tactlessly fitting the square pegs of intersectional discrimination into the round holes of direct and indirect discrimination.

[62] HL Deb 13 January 2010, vol 716, col 547 (Lady Royall).

4. Wrongful Discrimination

We have now reached the heart of the discrimination analysis. What is so wrong about intersectional discrimination that a judge must enjoin it? This is the ultimate question discrimination law is geared to answer. The interpretation of the non-discrimination guarantees, the meaning and recognition of grounds, and the classification of discrimination as direct or indirect are all preliminaries for answering this substantive question of whether discrimination actually occurred in a given case. We are now poised to answer this question.

It is useful to begin by reiterating what intersectional discrimination is about. Consider Patricia Monture's dilemma:

> I do not know, when something . . . happens to me, when it is happening to me because I am a woman, when it is happening to me because I am an Indian, or when it is happening to me because I am an Indian woman.[63]

This dilemma illustrates the problem with intersectional discrimination squarely. That when a person with multiple identities experiences discrimination, they often cannot make sense of their discrimination. Thus, the conceptual framework of intersectionality has been offered to help resolve this dilemma to understand in what way do multiple identities inform the experience of discrimination. An appreciation of the framework will reveal the nature of discrimination at play in a particular case, that is, what is wrong about the treatment or impact suffered by the claimant. For example, Monture may ultimately be complaining that she was deprived of a job because of being stigmatized as an Indian woman[64] or stereotyped [63] Patricia A Monture, 'Ka-Nin-Geh-Heh-Gah-E-Sa-Nonh-Yah-Gah' in The Chilly Collective (eds), Breaking Anonymity: The Chilly Climate for Women Faculty (Wilfrid Laurier 1995) 274.

[64] Iyiola Solanke, Discrimination as Stigma: A Theory of Anti-discrimination Law (Hart 2016) ch 1 (hereafter Solanke, Discrimination as Stigma).

as lazy,[65] or because a prejudiced clientele refuses to be served by Indian women.[66] If her voting rights are curtailed, she may complain of social and political marginalization,[67] or denial of political participation,[68] or of being treated as a second-class citizen.[69] If she were excluded from an otherwise all-white photo of her graduate class, she may complain of being demeaned[70] or of a loss of dignity.[71] If she were asked to remove her headscarf for the photo she may have been forced to 'cover' her identity.[72] If she were denied admission into a graduate programme because of her personal characteristics she could say that her 'deliberative freedoms',[73] 'capabilities',[74] or autonomy[75] were curtailed. If she received a lower rate of social assistance, she could claim that she was oppressed[76] or disadvantaged.[77] Whatever the substantive conception of equality or non-discrimination—dignity, autonomy, perpetuation of stereotypes or prejudices, stigma, being demeaned, curtailment of deliberative freedoms, marginalization, etc.—the application of the framework of intersectionality should reveal the specific harm that is suffered by the claimant (denial of job/voting rights/admission into college/receipt of social assistance) in reference to the substantive conception. In other words, we are looking for a substantive explanation of discrimination which O'Regan J in Brink defined as 'against people who are members of disfavoured groups [that] lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm'.[78]

This section argues that the appreciation of the framework of intersectionality is necessary to get to the bottom of what these patterns of group disadvantage and harm

[65] Larry Alexander, 'What Makes Wrongful Discrimination Wrong? Biases, Preferences, Stereotypes, and Proxies' (1992) 141 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 149, 169 (hereafter Alexander, 'What Makes Wrongful Discrimination Wrong').

[66] Sophia R Moreau, 'The Wrongs of Unequal Treatment' (2004) 54 University of Toronto Law Journal 291, 297–303.

[67] Henk Botha, 'Equality, Plurality and Structural Power' (2009) 25 South African Journal on Human Rights 1, 10–16; Hugh Collins, 'Discrimination, Equality and Social Inclusion' (2003) 66 Modern Law Review 16, 22 (hereafter Collins, 'Social Inclusion').

[68] John Hart Ely, Democracy and Distrust (HUP 1980) 77–88 (hereafter Ely, Democracy and Distrust).

[69] Cass R Sunstein, 'The Anticaste Principle' (1994) 92 Michigan Law Review 2410 (hereafter Sunstein, 'The Anticaste Principle').

[70] Deborah Hellman, When is Discrimination Wrong? (HUP 2008) ch 2 (hereafter Hellman, When is Discrimination Wrong?).

[71] Denise G Réaume, 'Discrimination and Dignity' (2003) 63 Louisiana Law Review 1 (hereafter Réaume, 'Discrimination and Dignity').

[72] Kenji Yoshino, 'Covering' (2002) 111 Yale Law Journal 769; Kenji Yoshino, Covering: The Hidden Assault on Our Civil Rights (Random House 2006).

[73] Sophia Moreau, 'What is Discrimination' (2010) 38 Philosophy and Public Affairs 143, 147 (hereafter Moreau, 'What is Discrimination').

[74] Amartya Sen, Development as Freedom (OUP 1999) (hereafter Sen, Development as Freedom); Martha Nussbaum, Women and Human Development (CUP 2001) (hereafter Nussbaum, Women and Human Development).

[75] Khaitan, A Theory of Discrimination Law (n 20) chs 4–5.

[76] Young, Justice and the Politics of Difference (n 20) ch 2.

[77] Owen Fiss, 'Groups and the Equal Protection Clause' (1976) Philosophy and Public Affairs 107, 108 (hereafter Fiss, 'Groups').

[78] Brink (n 4) [42] (O'Regan J).

look like in intersectional cases. In this sense, the framework of intersectionality established in chapter 2 is a prerequisite to the discrimination analysis. But then the framework needs to be supported with a rich understanding of discrimination, that is, the disadvantages and harms which constitute it (section 4.1). These two elements reinforce one another so that where the court is aware of intersectionality, it often also applies a broad understanding of discrimination. Where it misses the conceptual backdrop of intersectionality it also misses the nature of discrimination at play. Thus, the framework of intersectionality and the courts' conception of discrimination operate hand in hand, in a helical way (section 4.2). The main takeaway from this discussion is that there is no new type of harm or wrong in intersectional discrimination. Most of our substantive understandings of what is wrong about discrimination may easily accommodate harms of intersectional discrimination. This is because the harms are in fact the same, like stereotyping, prejudice, unequal worth, loss of dignity, being demeaned, stigma, and lack of autonomy or substantive freedoms. What is different is the account of patterns of group disadvantage based on multiple identities which cause them, as opposed to membership in a single disadvantaged group. It is the distinctive explanation of these patterns which makes each intersectional claim unique.

4.1 The Meaning of Discrimination

Amartya Sen's famed question: 'equality of what?'[79] engenders a wide spectrum of responses. Commentators and courts have both yielded rich accounts of what is meant by equality or non-discrimination. There has been an extensive effort in delineating the human interests protected in the general guarantees of equality and non-discrimination and in defining what their breach entails. This section outlines some of the prominent accounts, each of which seeks to proffer a distinctive understanding of wrongful discrimination. The purpose of referencing these accounts is to show the variety of explanations of discrimination which intersectionality can plug into. They provide precise cues and descriptions for answering what is wrong about a certain kind of treatment or impact. The analytic strength and breadth of these accounts is immediately useful in explaining the wrong of intersectional discrimination, just as it is the case in single-axis claims.

Conceptions of discrimination have been advanced either as embedded in a single value or as comprehensive theories embodying a whole range of values. For example, Denise Réaume, Deborah Hellman, and Iyiola Solanke have offered trenchant accounts of the first kind.[80] Réaume argues that inequality resides in [79] Amartya Sen, Inequality Reexamined (HUP 1992) 12.

[80] See also Susie Cowen, 'Can "Dignity" Guide South Africa's Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 South African Journal on Human Rights 34; Sandra Liebenberg, 'The Value of Human Dignity in indignity such that: 'The central insight in a dignity-based account is that valuing human dignity means acknowledging the inherent worth of human beings; therefore violating dignity involves conveying the message that some are of lesser worth than others'.[81] Similarly, Hellman considers wrongful discrimination to be one which demeans by treating another as not fully human or not of equal moral worth.[82] Solanke considers discrimination to be that which stigmatizes, or creates a continuum of disempowerment in terms of social, economic, and political power.[83] Sen and Nussbaum offer a similar account, classifying inequality or disadvantage as lack of capability which deprives people of genuine choices for pursuing a life which they consider valuable.[84] Similarly, according to Sophia Moreau, 'the interest that is injured by discrimination is our interest in a set of . . . deliberative freedoms: that is, freedoms to have our decisions about how to live insulated from the effects of normatively extraneous features of us, such as our skin color or gender'.[85] While these accounts appear individual centric in nature, other theories have social goals like integration, inclusion, and solidarity as their explanation for equality and non-discrimination.[86] Ely relies on a representation-reinforcing justification for equality and non-discrimination which strengthens the political participation of 'discrete and insular minorities'.[87] Group-based justifications are also found in the accounts of Fiss and Sunstein. For Sunstein, equality prohibits 'caste like' distinctions based on group characteristics of individuals.[88] Fiss relies on the 'group-disadvantaging principle' for prohibiting actions which render certain people worse off than others.[89] Explanations of wrongful discrimination can exist for specific grounds as well. For example, MacKinnon suggests a 'dominance' view of sex discrimination such that inequality between sexes is seen as a consequence of power and subordination.[90] Similarly, Brodsky and Day argue for the specific recognition of socio-economic disadvantage as a distinctive wrong in discrimination law.[91]

Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 South African Journal on Human Rights 1; Laurie Ackermann, Human Dignity: Lodestar for Equality in South Africa (Juta 2012).

[81] Réaume, 'Discrimination and Dignity' (n 71) 22.
[82] Hellman, When is Discrimination Wrong? (n 70) 35.
[83] Solanke, Discrimination as Stigma (n 64) ch 1.
[84] Sen, Development as Freedom (n 74) 5; Nussbaum, Women and Human Development (n 74) 90–91.
[85] Moreau, 'What is Discrimination' (n 73) 147.
[86] Catherine Barnard, Simon Deakin, and Gillian S Morris (eds), The Future of Labour Law: Liber Amicorum Sir Bob Hepple (Hart 2004); Collins, 'Social Inclusion' (n 67) 24.
[87] Ely, Democracy and Distrust (n 68) 77–88.
[88] Sunstein, 'The Anticaste Principle' (n 69) 241–42.
[89] Fiss, 'Groups' (n 77).
[90] Catharine MacKinnon, Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law (HUP 1987) 42.
[91] Gwen Brodsky and Shelagh Day, 'Denial of the Means of Subsistence as an Equality Violation' [2005] Acta Juridica 149.

1994

In contrast, comprehensive theories seek to consolidate a range of values and goals to be furthered in equality and non-discrimination. Young[92] and Fraser[93] devote their accounts of group-based injustices to the dimensions of redistribution and recognition. While redistribution is about material benefits or burden, recognition has to do with the positive affirmation and valuation of groups, giving space to individuals and groups to define themselves, and to be valued and respected for it. Thus, devaluation, disparagement, disrespect, demeaning, stereotyping, stigmatising, maligning, ignoring, disconsidering, and deprecating may all be classified as recognition harms. Young further classifies redistributive and recognition harms as occurring in the forms of domination and oppression, going on to identify 'five faces of oppression' as exploitation, marginalization, powerlessness, cultural imperialism, and violence.[94] Each speaks to a distinct harm which may be caused by discriminatory practices against particular social groups. Fredman consolidates redistribution and recognition with participation and transformation into a four-dimensional framework of substantive equality. The participatory dimension advocates for the full social and political participation of disadvantaged groups in society, while the transformative dimension requires accommodation of differences and structural change instead of exacting conformity as the price of equality.[95]

Likewise, judicial accounts of equality and non-discrimination are expansive in nature. The Canadian Supreme Court frequently refers to human dignity as the fundamental value underpinning the guarantee of equality in the Canadian Charter.[96] Violation of dignity may typically occur with 'imposition of disadvantage, stereotyping, or political or social prejudice'.[97] Prejudice is broadly understood as being treated as inferior to others because of a group characteristic, while stereotyping may result from irrelevant and misplaced biases against persons of a particular group.[98] While other justifications like autonomy and self-determination have also appeared in judicial reasoning, they have not been centrally relied upon in finding for discrimination under Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter. Similarly, the South African Constitutional Court uses violation of human dignity as the touchstone for identifying unfair discrimination which perpetuates patterns of group disadvantage.[99] These patterns are often related to prejudices or [92] Iris Marion Young, 'Unruly Categories: A Critique of Nancy Fraser's Dual Systems Theory' (1997) I/222 New Left Review.

[93] Nancy Fraser, 'From Redistribution to Recognition? Dilemmas of Justice in a "Post-Socialist" Age' (1997) I/222 New Left Review; Nancy Fraser, 'A Rejoinder to Iris Young' (1997) I/223 New Left Review.

[94] Young, Justice and the Politics of Difference (n 20).

[95] Fredman, Discrimination Law (n 50) 25.

[96] Egan (n 35) [36] (L'Heureux-Dubé J).

[97] Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) [1999] 1 SCR 497 (SCC) 451 (hereafter Law v Canada).

[98] Moreau, 'What is Discrimination' (n 73) 302–03; Alexander, 'What Makes Wrongful Discrimination Wrong' (n 65) 158–59, 192.

[99] Harksen (n 45).

stereotypes.[100] In the case of the UK, according to Bob Hepple, the Equality Act 2010 refers to no less than nine theories of discrimination: consistent treatment; the removal of barriers to equal treatment; respect for equal worth or dignity of the individual; recognition of identity, difference, and diversity; equal opportunity; redistribution; individual choice or freedom; equality of capabilities; and fairness.[101] But equality in the UK is mainly a comparative concept with the discrimination analysis seldom going beyond the idea that a claimant receives 'less favourable treatment' or is put at a 'particular disadvantage' because of a personal characteristic.[102] The explanation of specific disadvantage is not necessarily developed once it is established that it exists on a comparative basis. This is true for the US as well, except for explanations which have emerged in the context of specific grounds like race and sex.[103] Indian jurisprudence, too, has historically relied on a comparative understanding of discrimination, without reference to substantive interpretations of equality and non-discrimination. This has started to change of late with the Supreme Court's interest in comparative doctrine, especially from Canada and South Africa and their references to dignity, autonomy, stereotyping, prejudice, and vulnerability.[104] The Court of Justice of the European Union (CJEU) and European Court of Human Rights (ECtHR) have also expanded their discrimination analyses to reflect on the harms or disadvantages for which each considers discrimination to be wrong. They have specifically shown an inclination towards an anti-stereotyping approach.[105] In addition, since the invocation of the right to equality and non-discrimination under Article 14 of the ECHR is dependent on the case falling within the ambit of another human right, discrimination is necessarily seen as something which limits the equal enjoyment of human rights protected under the ECHR.

Each of these philosophical and doctrinal accounts, whether based on a single value or a range of values, represent what may be wrong about discrimination when it is wrong. Do general accounts of wrongful discrimination assist in explicating the nature of wrongful intersectional discrimination? I believe that they do. Most of the conceptions when interpreted sufficiently broadly have the explanatory potential to serve as placeholders for describing the wrong of intersectional discrimination. It is this explanation that the courts should uncover and elucidate

[100] President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (SACC) 73 (Kriegler J); Jordan (n 3) [60] (O'Regan and Sachs JJ).

[101] Bob Hepple, 'The Aims of Equality Law' (2012) 61 Current Legal Problems 1, 2.

[102] Preddy v Bull [2013] UKSC 73; R v JFS [2009] UKSC 15.

[103] Brown v Board of Education of Topeka 347 US 483 (1954); United States v Virginia 518 US 515 (1996).

[104] See esp, Anuj Garg v Hotel Association of India (2008) 3 SCC 1 (Supreme Court of India), which spearheaded this trend (hereafter Anuj Garg).

[105] Kostantin Markin v Russia [2010] ECHR 1435; Case C-83/14 CHEZ Razpredelenie Bulgaria AD v Komisia za zashtita ot diskriminatsia (2015) EU:C:2015:480. See Alexandra Timmer, 'Toward an Anti-Stereotyping Approach for the European Court of Human Rights' (2011) 11 Human Rights Law Review 719.

in intersectional cases. The next section explores how these conceptions have been used in intersectional cases in comparative doctrine.

4.2 Wrongful Intersectional Discrimination

All jurisdictions have a conception of what they consider discriminatory and why. Each conception can either be interpreted broadly to embody a range of discrimination wrongs or it can be interpreted narrowly to reflect a limited understanding of protection from discrimination. Courts seem to have moved in both directions when it comes to adjudicating actual or potential intersectional claims. An incisive and broad understanding of discrimination is visible in successful claims like Hassam and Corbiere. On the other hand, a narrow conception of harm is visible in cases which were possibly intersectional but were argued as single-axis and hence eventually failed, viz. Volks and Gosselin. A comparison between the approaches in these two sets of cases reveals why it is important for courts to broaden their compass for detecting wrongful intersectional discrimination.

It is useful to begin with Hassam. The South African Constitutional Court in Hassam was committed to tracing sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage in relation to Muslim women in polygynous marriages by considering their identity as a whole and in the context of the South African history and constitutional principles, including the ideal of transformation. Through this it arrived at a thorough explanation of the harm and disadvantage resulting from the impugned legislative provision. Writing for the Court, Nkabinde J described the 'nature of discrimination' both in terms of the 'deprivation of legal recognition of their marriage'[106] as well as causing 'significant and material disadvantage' and 'denial of benefits'.[107] The exclusion from benefits which were afforded to other people entrenched the economically vulnerable position of Muslim women in polygynous marriages and also reinforced harmful stereotypes and 'patriarchal practices that relegate[d] women in these marriages to being unworthy of protection'.[108] It also implied that widows of polygynous Muslim marriages were less worthy of respect than widows of civil marriages or African customary marriages.[109] These particular harms contributed to the violation of dignity—considered key to a violation of Section 9(3) of the Constitution.[110] The Court interpreted dignity both expansively and precisely in describing what was wrong about discrimination based on religion, gender, and marital status at the same time.

[106] Hassam (n 6) [14] [33] [36].
[107] Ibid [34].
[108] Ibid [37].
[109] Ibid [46].
[110] Harksen (n 45) [53].

Similarly, in Corbiere, the Canadian Supreme Court applied the test of human dignity in answering the question of whether the disenfranchisement of off-reserve band members on the basis of the analogous ground of aboriginality-residence was actually discriminatory. According to the Court, simply put, the test was whether 'the distinction undermines the presumption upon which the guarantee of equality is based—that each individual is deemed to be of equal worth regardless of the group to which he or she belongs?'[111] The answer was yes, based on the Court's determination that the disenfranchisement perpetuated 'historic disadvantage experienced by off-reserve band members by denying them the right to vote and participate in their band's governance'.[112] This was not all, though. The denial of the right to vote was not simply one of not being able to cast a vote but the denial of the right to full participation which meant that off-reserve band members could not have their interests counted and voices heard. It was based on a stereotypical assumption about off-reserve members that they were 'not interested in maintaining participation in the band or in preserving their cultural identity'.[113] The denial thus conveyed the message that they were 'less worthy and entitled'[114] and 'less deserving'[115] as members of the band. All of these individual wrongs, of diminishing the participation and status of the Batchewana band members, spoke to what L'Heureux Dubé J described as the purpose of Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter: 'to recognize all individuals and groups as equally deserving, worthy, and valuable, to remedy stereotyping, disadvantage and prejudice, and to ensure that all are treated as equally important members of Canadian society'.[116] Thus, in her concurring opinion, L'Heureux-Dubé J used the fourfold criteria of 'pre-existing disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping and prejudice'[117] to test the violation of human dignity under Section 15(1). It was the combination of all of these types of specific wrongs that constituted a violation of human dignity in this case.

A similar exercise ensued in the Human Rights Tribunal of Ontario decision in Baylis-Flannery. At first, while making a finding in favour of the claimant, the Tribunal only held that the treatment was discriminatory, as in inappropriate in terms of the sexist and racist behaviour of the defendant.[118] But then, in explaining how the intersectional nature of discrimination exacerbated the claimant's mental anguish, it elaborated on what was so discriminatory or inappropriate about the defendant's actions. In the Tribunal's opinion, the impact on the 'personhood' of a claimant was serious in that the defendant had 'wilfully and recklessly injured her [111] Corbiere (n 21) [16].

[112] Ibid [17].
[113] Ibid [17].
[114] Ibid.
[115] Ibid [18].
[116] Ibid [63].
[117] Ibid [70].
[118] Baylis-Flannery (n 59).

1998

dignity and worth', causing 'damage to her physical and emotional well-being'.[119] It further noted that the defendant's actions were based on a 'stereotypical view of attractive, young, Black women over whom he can assert economic power and control'.[120] The Tribunal rounded off its remarks by referring to the touchstone of human dignity set out most prominently in the Supreme Court of Canada's decision in Law v Canada:

> Human dignity means that an individual or group feels self-respect and self-worth. It is concerned with the physical and psychological integrity and empowerment. Human dignity is harmed by unfair treatment premised upon personal traits or circumstances which do not relate to individual needs, capacities or merits . . . Human dignity is harmed when individuals and groups are marginalized, ignored or devalued, and is enhanced when laws recognize the full place of all individuals and groups within society.[121]

The Tribunal applied this understanding of human dignity to Baylis-Flannery. It thus wove in elements of physical and bodily harm with recognitional aspects like self-worth, as well as participatory harms, like marginalization and being ignored and devalued, in terms of how individuals and groups relate to the society and public at large. Dignity seems to be a catch-all in this situation, capable of describing what is wrong about intersectional discrimination in maximal detail.

Likewise, the consideration of merits of individual communications before the CEDAW Committee or the Human Rights Committee is brief but, in some noteworthy intersectional cases, distinctly precise in explaining what is wrong about discrimination. As set out in the previous chapter, this is attributable in large part to the awareness that treaty bodies have shown in recent years to intersectionality. But it is also because they have been aware of the diversity of discrimination wrongs and the need to respond to them via a broad and robust conception of equality and non-discrimination. For example, in RPB v Philippines, the CEDAW Committee found discrimination in respect of each of the specific disadvantages suffered by the claimant as a deaf mute woman—the lack of access to sign language interpretation in courts, the imposition of rape myths and stereotypes in investigating and adjudicating her complaint, the failure of the judicial system to consider her vulnerability and to provide her reasonable accommodation, and the unreasonable delay in conducting the proceedings. But then, after relaying these instances as instances of discrimination, the Committee further explained why exactly that was the case. Thus, in the case of the denial of sign language interpretation, the Committee explained why the denial mattered, namely, because its provision is 'essential to ensure the author's full and equal participation in the proceedings' and to comply with 'the principle of equality of arms'.[122] This is what the Committee meant by the guarantee of 'the enjoyment of the effective protection against discrimination'. Discrimination was thus not just a matter of specific instances of violations but a broad normative understanding of why these instances were wrong, so to speak. It is this broad normative conception of discrimination coupled with the specific detailing of intersectional patterns of group disadvantage that explicates what is wrong about intersectional discrimination.

[119] Ibid [146].
[120] Ibid [47].
[121] Law v Canada (n 97) [53].

When this broad, normative understanding is lacking, courts may fail to recognize and remedy wrongful intersectional discrimination. This is often accompanied by a lack of application of the framework of intersectionality in terms of appreciating its different strands in the discrimination analysis. All these losses thus transpire together. Gosselin exemplifies this. The majority in Gosselin relied on a particularly limited understanding of human dignity, considered to be the touchstone of equality under Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter. The Court began by citing that '[d]iscrimination occurs when people are marginalized or treated as less worthy on the basis of irrelevant personal characteristics, without regard to their actual circumstances'.[123] But in determining whether this was actually the case, it applied the perspective of the legislature to hold that the distinction was not discriminatory since it was not meant to treat the claimant and those in her position 'as less worthy and less deserving of concern, respect and consideration than others'.[124] The legislator's intention, according to the Court, was to affirm young people's potential rather than demeaning them or denying them dignity.[125] The Court took judicial notice of this legislative purpose on the basis that it considered it 'counter-intuitive' for people below the age of thirty to have suffered any historical disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping, or prejudice based on age (unlike race or gender).[126] Reliance on the stereotype of young people's self-sufficiency and capability justified their exclusion from a higher rate of social assistance. In serving a measure of judicial 'tough love',[127] the Court ignored the socio-economic vulnerability of those on social assistance. The version of dignity applied in Gosselin is simply a matter of the legislature's intention. It is removed from the actual experience of the claimant, which was, first and foremost, socio-economic—in that the lack of a higher rate of social assistance left Louise Gosselin unable to support her basic food, clothing, and shelter needs—but in which she was also left in a precarious situation whereby her physical security and integrity were compromised, including her mental and psychological well-being. None of this was an affront [122] RPB v Philippines, CEDAW Committee (2014) Communication No 34/2011, CEDAW/C/57/D/34/2011 [8.7].

[123] Gosselin (n 34) [21].
[124] Ibid [26].
[125] Ibid [42].
[126] Ibid [33].
[127] Gwen Brodsky, Rachel Cox, Shelagh Day, and Kate Stephenson, 'Gosselin v. Quebec (Attorney General) (Women's Court of Canada)' (2006) 18 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 193 [69].

2000

to dignity in the way dignity was understood and applied by the Supreme Court of Canada. Instead, the majority acknowledged the impact as, at best, a matter of choice and, at worst, a matter of misfortune of the claimant.

The decision in Volks mirrors this. Volks considered the constitutional validity of a provision which excluded the survivor of a stable, permanent relationship from the right to claim maintenance from their deceased partner's estate. Skweyiya J's majority opinion focussed exclusively on finding if there was any harm whatsoever associated with marital status discrimination. He interpreted the inability of the claimant to marry her long-term partner while he was alive as a matter of choice for her partner. To the judge, nothing about the claimant's inclination and her partner's resistance to marry was unfair or problematic. Gender inequality and economic vulnerability were not accounted for either in relation to grounds of discrimination or in the context of impact of discrimination. The reason, as in Gosselin, was that the exclusion was only meant by the legislature to affirm the dignity of individuals in choosing to marry. The fact that the choice was, in reality, only available to men was not something the Court could address or change. The deceased male partner's refusal to marry the woman 'who cared for him, put everything into the relationship and gave her heart and soul to it, bringing up a number of children born of the relationship between them in the process', was met with 'sympathy', deeming the conduct of the male partner 'unconscionable'.[128] But it was not something which affected her dignity since it was 'entirely appropriate not to impose a duty upon the estate where none arose by operation of law during the lifetime of the deceased'.[129] Again, the breach of dignity was to be assessed through the will of the legislature and the choice of the deceased, but not the claimant's choice to marry and the ensuing disadvantages which accompanied the denial of that choice. A narrow conception of dignity and how it is breached weighed down the possibility of finding for intersectional discrimination in Volks.

A final point must thus be made about the breadth of the substantive conception of discrimination. The conception of discrimination and the values it offends should not simply be a matter of perspective, whether solely of the discriminator or of the claimant. No doubt, both play a part in understanding whether there was discrimination in a given instance, but their perspectives must necessarily be combined with a more objective, perhaps universal one.[130] This is why it is important for discrimination law to have its own normative understanding of what is wrong about discrimination. Different philosophical and doctrinal accounts thus refer to different substantive core of dignity, autonomy, freedoms, respect, worth, etc. When interpreted broadly, these are entirely capable of explaining the wrong of intersectional discrimination, as they do for single-axis discrimination. A broad and inclusive normative conception of discrimination, then, lies at the heart of our understanding of what constitutes wrongful intersectional discrimination in a variety of cases.

[128] Volks (n 2) [59].
[129] Ibid [60].
[130] L'Heureux Dubé J calls it the 'subjective-objective' perspective, Law v Canada (n 97) [59].

5. Comparison

Discrimination analysis mostly takes the form of a two-step inquiry. First, we ask whether there has been any differentiation or discriminatory impact based on a ground. Second, we ask whether such discrimination is actually wrongful. Ascertaining the type of discrimination (direct versus indirect), the grounds it is based on (enumerated or analogous), and whether it constitutes wrongful discrimination (based on dignity, autonomy, substantive freedoms, stereotypes, prejudice, stigma, etc.) are thus the key steps in a discrimination inquiry. The last three sections dealt with these steps individually and the challenges they pose for claims of intersectional discrimination. These steps are by no means easy to establish in single-axis claims either. Courts have thus often resorted to the comparator test in the discrimination analysis to help establish either the grounds of discrimination or the wrongfulness of it, or both.[131] The test requires the claimant to compare herself to another real or hypothetical mirror comparator, namely, a person who is similarly situated in every way but for the alleged ground of discrimination. If such a comparator is better-off than the claimant, then the court can confirm both the ground of discrimination and the difference in treatment or impact suffered by the claimant. Despite its intuitive grasp, the comparator test throws more of a challenge to intersectional discrimination than it does lend a helping hand in establishing the multiple grounds on which it is based or the nature of it. This section shows that the comparator test, at least in its strict and flexible forms, is either too fastidious or too unprincipled to be useful in proving intersectional discrimination. However, as the South African experience confirms, a holistic and contextual approach to comparison can yet be useful. The argument is that comparison, like much of the rest of discrimination law, can be tailored to respond to intersectional discrimination and there is no reason why the test needs to be either adopted as is or abandoned altogether for the purposes of intersectional discrimination.

For some jurisdictions, like the UK and the US, comparison is necessary for establishing discrimination.[132] They thus require comparators for intersectional discrimination too, in the same way as for single-axis claims. The results have been [131] See, in particular, leading judicial and statutory formulations of the comparator tests in the context of the UK in the Equality Act 2010, s 23; the US in Teamsters v United States 431 US 324 (1977) n 15; Canada in Hodge v Canada (Minister of Human Resources Development) [2004] 3 SCR 357 (SCC) [1], [20]ff and Withler v Canada [2011] 1 SCR 396 (SCC) [41]ff (hereafter Withler); and South Africa in Pillay (n 49) [42]–[44] (Langa CJ), [164]–[165] (O'Regan J).

[132] US Civil Rights Act 1964, Title VII, ss 703–04; UK Equality Act 2010, ss 13, 14, 19, 23.

2002

mixed. Comparison has worked fortuitously or fallen flat. The lesson is that the strict requirement for proving intersectional discrimination through comparison may be indefensible in both principle and practice. Take, for example, the use of comparators in DeGraffenreid. The Court had made two sets of comparisons in this case. First, it used the favourable hiring statistics of white women and dismissed the claim of sex discrimination. Then, it construed the claim of race discrimination against Black women to be the same as that against Black men and combined it with another cause of action. Such a comparative exercise is suspect for several reasons. First, the Court segregated the claims of race and sex discrimination into individual claims to be proven separately as a matter of multiple discrimination. But then, even within this view of multiple discrimination, the comparators chosen for each ground were not those who did not share the relevant personal characteristic with the claimants, but those who did. Thus, the comparison for sex discrimination turned out to be white women and not Black men. The fact that white women were treated better than Black women was then used to deny sex discrimination against Black women. The result is completely antithetic to intersectionality in that it denies that what Black women face is sexism even when white women are not similarly disadvantaged, instead of acknowledging that the difference between their position and that of white women is evidence of a form of sexism that, when combined with racism, is uniquely experienced by Black women. Seen this way, the comparative evidence could have been used to establish the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage. But the disparate invocation of comparators for each ground separately, and then employing them to deny rather than recognize the patterns of group disadvantage suffered by Black women, seems to have defeated the claim in DeGraffenreid.

The opposite problem ensued in Bahl. In order to prove race and sex discrimination separately, the Court of Appeal used a single comparator of a white man to prove both. The demand for proving race and sex discrimination separately and the insistence on using a single comparator of a white male to prove both are fundamentally incompatible. While the framing of the claim as separate claims of sex and race discrimination gave the illusion that the Court viewed Dr Bahl's claim as a matter of multiple discrimination, the choice of comparator—constructed using both the grounds to find someone with whom the claimant did not share either of the personal characteristics (i.e. a white male)—appears to indicate that the Court thought of the claim as a matter of additive (in particular, compound) discrimination. The choice of the comparator may thus have helped establish the claim of compound discrimination as a unique combination of racism and sexism faced only by Black women such as Dr Bahl. But that would not have helped appreciate the sameness in patterns of group disadvantage between Black women on the one hand, and white women and Black men on the other. This could have been particularly problematic had there been white women and Black men who were treated much the same as Dr Bahl, in which case the Court of Appeal may well have towed the DeGraffenreid line and used that evidence to negate both sex and race discrimination rather than use the comparators to establish race and sex discrimination respectively. The choice of a white male comparator may thus easily negate the complexity of intersectionality inherent in both sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage simultaneously. It forces us to view discrimination always in contrast with or in opposition to the most privileged group, rather than in terms of the complex and concrete relationships of disadvantage between intersecting groups. What this does is create strong conformist pressures when the comparator is 'clothed with the attributes of the dominant gender, culture, religion, ethnicity, or sexuality'.[133] Couched only in terms of privilege, the court assumes that the most relevant comparator for intersectional claims will be someone who is disadvantaged in no way at all. That makes for a rather unrepresentative standard of comparison for a category of discrimination which is all about relationships of power and structures of disadvantage. Dr Bahl's claim resonated little with the hypothetical white male comparator because it was too removed from her actual position to reveal anything salient about how she was treated. The choice of a single dominant comparator was perhaps too burdensome and actually unreliable in characterizing intersectional discrimination either in terms of the multiple grounds of the claim or the disadvantage caused by them.

What the invocation of comparators in DeGraffenreid and Bahl makes clear is that there are two possible options for strict comparison in intersectional claims: finding a single mirror comparator which does not share any of the personal characteristics of the claimant (Bahl) or finding a mirror comparator for each ground individually (DeGraffenreid). As the discussion above makes plain, neither of the two options seems to have worked too well. As a consequence, jurisdictions like Canada have moved away from the strict requirement of proving discrimination through mirror comparators. Instead, Canada has adopted the flexible approach which advocates for using comparison freely between several comparators or not at all, as need be.[134] In fact, it was specifically adopted hoping that 'flexibility [could] accommodate claims based on intersecting grounds of discrimination'.[135] The extensive application of the flexible approach in Ontario Court of Appeal's decision in Falkiner v Ontario[136] shows that this hope has not materialized in fact. It is important to understand why.

Falkiner concerned a challenge to the 'spouse in the house rule' which excluded single parents from social assistance as soon as they started cohabiting with their partners. According to the claimants who were single mothers on social assistance, the rule caught casual relationships which were not 'spousal' and thus perpetuated

[133] Fredman, Discrimination Law (n 50) 11.
[134] Withler (n 131) [41]ff.
[135] Ibid [58] [63].
[136] (2002) 59 OR (3d) 481 (Ontario Court of Appeal) [105] (hereafter Falkiner).

the socio-economic disadvantage of single mothers with dependent children who were in desperate need of social assistance. They argued that the rule discriminated against them on the basis of either sex or a combination of sex, marital status, and receipt of social assistance. The Court found that the rule violated Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter on 'the combined grounds of sex, marital status and receipt of social assistance'[137] and the discrimination was unjustifiable under Section 1. The key to the Court's discrimination analysis was flexible comparison which was used to ascertain both the grounds of discrimination as well as the discriminatory impact of the impugned rule. According to the Court, the 'flexible comparative approach [reflected] the complexity and context of the respondents' claim'.[138]

What was the approach? In short, it was a determination based on a 'set of comparisons, each one bringing into focus a separate form of differential treatment'.[139] Thus, the Court picked a comparator to reflect the discrimination associated with each ground. For the ground of sex, the Court substituted the claimants' choice of comparator from men on social assistance to single men on social assistance. But then the Court did not examine evidence in respect of single men on social assistance and directly considered evidence relating to single women on social assistance, according to which, 'although women accounted for only 54% of those receiving social assistance and only 60% of single persons receiving benefits, they accounted for nearly 90% of those whose benefits were terminated by the definition of spouse. The corresponding figures for single mothers also show the definition's disproportionate impact on that group.'[140] According to Laskin JA, 'the statistics unequivocally demonstrate that both women and single mothers are disproportionately adversely affected'.[141] Despite the precision of statistical evidence in respect of single mothers on social assistance, the conclusion from the statistics was confined to a finding of sex discrimination alone. Neither the chosen comparator nor the statistics seem to have been made full use of to appreciate the disadvantage suffered by the claimants as single mothers on social assistance based on the ground of not just sex but also marital and childcare status and receipt of social assistance. Similarly, for the ground of social assistance, the Court substituted the claimant's choice of 'persons not on social assistance' with 'single persons not on social assistance' as the correct comparator. According to the Court, while the claimant's choice of comparator did not 'on its own tell us anything meaningful beyond the fact that people on social assistance are treated financially differently than people not on social assistance',[142]

[137] Ibid [105].
[138] Ibid [81].
[139] Ibid [71].
[140] Ibid.
[141] Ibid [77].
[142] Daphne Gilbert and Diana Majury, 'Critical Comparisons: The Supreme Court of Canada Dooms Section 15' (2006) 24 Windsor Year Book of Access to Justice 111, 135.

the comparison with 'single persons not on social assistance' showed that the claimants had suffered unequal treatment: 'They have suffered adverse state-imposed financial consequences because they began living in try-on relationships. By contrast, single people who are not on social assistance are free to have these relationships without attracting any kind of state-imposed financial consequences'.[143] But the same result would have followed from a comparator like 'single women not on social assistance', 'single mothers not on social assistance', or the claimant's choice of 'persons not on social assistance'. Each of these possible alternatives could show that any person not on social assistance had the agency and resources to pursue try-on relationships without suffering the disadvantage suffered by the claimants specifically. It appears that the Court's refinement is motivated by constructing as narrow a comparator as possible in strict terms based on a single ground at a time, such that social assistance was the only material difference between the claimants and the comparator group. But such a premise remains unarticulated and leaves hanging the question as to why the narrow comparator did not entail single mothers specifically, so that the comparison was with single fathers on social assistance.

The flexibility in the choice of comparators in Falkiner lacks guidance. It neither follows strict comparison after choosing comparators individually for each ground, nor does it seem to abandon comparison when it seemed superfluous in light of unequivocal evidence of relative disadvantage. More importantly, what is problematic with such flexibility is that it maps onto the frame of multiple rather than intersectional discrimination in its inclination to test for discrimination individually based on each ground. Comparison for intersectional discrimination cannot be but a version of single-ground comparison rolled over multiple times for every ground. But what is it supposed to be then?

Once again, Hassam provides the answer here. One way comparison can work for intersectional discrimination is, when comparators are chosen, to keep in mind not just the idea that comparators need not share the relevant personal characteristics with the claimant to reveal relative disadvantage but also that they need to show this disadvantage in terms of the nature of intersectional discrimination, that is, show the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on the relationships between groups. The South African Constitutional Court achieved this in choosing comparators comprehensively based on all possible relationships between the grounds, and then using them to reflect on the patterns of group disadvantage to appreciate the full story of discrimination in Hassam. For a claim that was based on three grounds—gender, marital status, and religion—there were seven possible comparisons, based on each ground independently, two of the grounds taken together, and all of them considered together. The Court therefore made seven sets of comparisons between the claimants (who were widows in Muslim polygynous marriages) and widows married in terms of Marriage Act (who did not share the religious aspect of discrimination), widows in monogamous Muslim marriages (who did not share the marital status with the claimants), widows in polygynous customary marriages (who did not share the same religion as the claimants),[144] women/widows (who shared the claimants' gender but perhaps not their religion or marital status),[145] Muslims (who shared aspects of religious discrimination but not necessarily the marital status or gender),[146] Muslim men (who did share aspects of religious discrimination but did not share gender and marital status with the claimants),[147] and persons in other kinds of relationships (who did not share the claimants marital status, gender, or religion).[148] Based on these comparisons, the Court concluded that the discrimination was based:

[143] Falkiner (n 136) [73].

> on the grounds of, religion, in the sense that the particular religion concerned was in the past not one deemed to be worthy of respect; marital status, because polygynous Muslim marriages are not afforded the protection other marriages receive; and gender, in the sense that it is only the wives in polygynous Muslim marriage that are affect[ed] by the [exclusion].[149]

The Court then examined the comparators more closely to find for unfair discrimination based on the three grounds it identified. Thus, the Court used comparisons with Muslim women in monogamous marriages and women who were married under the Marriage Act or customary laws, to show the disadvantage suffered by Muslim women in polygynous marriages because of their gender, marital status, and religion at the same time. The conclusion was further used, not to undermine the generality and pervasiveness of the category of gender discrimination, but to reinforce it, in as much as the comparisons also showed that women 'constitute[d] a particularly vulnerable segment of the population'.[150] Similarly, the comparisons with Muslims in polygynous marriages and Muslims in non-polygynous marriages were used to show the disadvantage suffered by Muslims on the basis of their religion.[151] At the same time, the same comparisons were used to show the disadvantage between Muslim women and men, since only Muslim men could contract polygynous marriages.[152]

What this comparative exercise shows is that comparators can be constructed using much the same formula of picking groups which do not share one, some, and all of the personal characteristics with the claimant. However, they should be [144] Hassam (n 6) [31].

[145] Ibid [10].
[146] Ibid [12] [25] [26] [33].
[147] Ibid [10] [31].
[148] Ibid [11].
[149] Ibid [34].
[150] Ibid [10].
[151] Ibid [12] [25] [26] [33].
[152] Ibid [10] [31].

deployed with the specific purpose of appreciating relative disadvantage in terms of the sameness and difference in disadvantage between different groups. Thus, to appreciate the nature of intersectional discrimination, each of the comparators is used to tell something salient about intersectional discrimination in terms of either sameness or difference in patterns of group disadvantage based on the relevant personal characteristics. Employed as the Hassam Court did, comparison can indeed be useful if made holistically (i.e. comprehensively in respect of all of the possible comparator groups) and contextually, to show the different patterns of group disadvantage between these groups.[153]

This approach could be helpful for jurisdictions like the UK and the US where comparison is necessary for proving discrimination. It could also be helpful for jurisdictions like Canada which have formally moved away from comparison but which, as the experience in Falkiner shows, are in practice unable to shrug it off. At the same time, it may be helpful for the ECtHR and jurisdictions applying EU law, which, like South Africa, do not necessarily resort to comparison but find it helpful nevertheless in cases where comparative evidence is available and may be useful in establishing discrimination. Similarly, the approach may be particularly apt for jurisdictions such as India where cases like Air India are defeated by bogus comparisons which justify rather than reveal the discrimination between groups like (female) air hostesses and (male) air stewards. It may even be helpful for discrimination claims before treaty bodies, especially the CEDAW Committee which has traditionally focussed on comparison with men while ignoring the relationships of power between women. Each of these possibilities can be illuminated in their individual contexts. The South African approach to comparison in Hassam provides a useful cue for this, as an antidote to both strict and flexible forms of using the comparator test to establish intersectional discrimination.

6. Justifications and Standard of Review

The discussion until now has focussed on the purpose of the discrimination analysis for determining wrongful intersectional discrimination based on multiple grounds. Once something is found to be discriminatory, the next question that arises is whether it can still be justified. For example, a ban on the full-face veil may be discriminatory against Muslim women on the basis of their gender and race or religion, but it may be possible to justify the ban in certain circumstances like at airport security or in a picture for an identity document. The question for our purposes, then, is should we allow such justifications for intersectional discrimination and, if so, how should we judge them?

[153] See for a fuller version of this argument, Shreya Atrey, 'Comparison in Intersectional Discrimination' [2018] Legal Studies 379.

The question of whether justifications should be allowed is often approached from the standpoint of the distinction between direct and indirect discrimination. We saw that the distinction between the two is based on whether the discriminatory criteria is explicitly based on grounds (direct discrimination) or is neutral but leads to a disproportionate impact on disadvantaged groups (indirect discrimination). However, the distinction can also be based on whether such discrimination can be justified. For example, in the UK, direct discrimination under Section 13 of the Equality Act 2010 cannot be justified. On the other hand, indirect discrimination under Section 19 of the Equality Act 2010 is, by its very definition, justifiable, in that it will not be discrimination if the measure in question can be shown to be a 'proportionate means of achieving a legitimate aim'. A similar distinction is adopted in EU law, where direct discrimination is not justifiable per se, except where the discriminatory measure constitutes a 'genuine and determining occupational requirement',[154] while indirect discrimination may be permissible if it is 'objectively justified by a legitimate aim and the means of achieving that aim are appropriate and necessary'.[155] In contrast, in the US, both disparate treatment and disparate impact under Title VII are justifiable. Once the claimant establishes a prima facie case of disparate treatment, the defendant can still show that there was a legitimate non-discriminatory justification for such treatment and the claimant would have another chance to argue that such justification was merely a pretence for discriminatory motive.[156] For disparate impact claims, once the claimant establishes a prima facie case, the defendant can show that there was a legitimate business necessity for the neutral rule or practice and if the defendant succeeds in showing this, the claimant can argue that another measure with less discriminatory impact would have been equally effective.[157] Furthermore, both disparate treatment and disparate impact can be justified by a 'bona fide occupational requirement'.[158] Similarly, in Canada and South Africa, both direct and indirect discrimination are justifiable. Section 1 of the Canadian Charter and Section 36 of the South African Constitution provide the general limitation clauses laying down the basis on which infringements of rights, including the right to equality and non-discrimination, can be justified. In India, discrimination is always justifiable, even [154] Compare for example, art 2(2)(a) and art 4 of Council Directive 2000/43 implementing the principle of equal treatment between persons irrespective of racial or ethnic origin [2000] OJ L180/22 (hereafter Race Directive); art 2(1)(a) and art 14(2) of Council Directive 2006/54 on the implementation of the principle of equal opportunities and equal treatment of men and women in matters of employment and occupation (recast) [2006] OJ L204/23 (hereafter Gender Directive (Recast)); art 2(1)(a) and art 4 of the Council Directive 2000/78 establishing a general framework for equal treatment in employment and occupation [2000] OJ L303/16 (hereafter Framework Directive).

[155] Race Directive (n 154), art 2(2)(b); Gender Directive (Recast) (n 154), art 2(1)(b); Framework Directive (n 154), art 2(2)(b).

[156] McDonnell Douglas Corp v Green 411 US 792 (1973); Texas Department of Community Affairs v Burdine 450 US 248 (1981).

[157] Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title VII, s 2000e-2(k).

[158] Ibid, s 703(e)(1).

though the Supreme Court has never recognized indirect discrimination as a separate cause of action.

Another way of justifying discrimination is through particular grounds. There are two ways of doing this. First, discrimination based on certain grounds, whether direct or indirect, may be classified either as unjustifiable or justifiable. Thus, for example, under UK law, direct discrimination based on disability or age discrimination is justifiable. Similarly, under EU law, several specific exemptions for direct discrimination exist for the grounds of age, marital status, and disability. Secondly, discrimination based on certain grounds may attract a different level of scrutiny than other grounds. For example, in the US, under the Equal Protection Clause of the Constitution, race attracts the highest level or strict scrutiny, sex attracts intermediate scrutiny, and all other classifications, like language or accent, attract rational scrutiny. The ECHR has also developed a staggered level of review for cases, much like the US, where grounds such as race and ethnic origin attract the strictest review.[159] There is some indication that the Supreme Court of India now treats discrimination based on the five listed grounds under Article 15(1), especially sex, to be more insidious than other kinds of distinctions made under the general right to equality under Article 14.[160] No such distinction exists in international human rights instruments, especially those dealing with single grounds like sex and disability in CEDAW and CRPD respectively.

Associated with these two ways of justifying discrimination (based on the distinction between direct and indirect discrimination, on the one hand, and on a specific ground, on the other hand) are the debates over deference and margin of appreciation. No matter which justifications are available and what standard of review a court chooses to apply to a case, there is always the possibility that the intensity of the court's review in each instance is driven by the subject matter at hand, its context, and impact. Thus, justifications are not simply about the type of discrimination or the particular ground involved, or even the standard of review the ground deserves, but about how intensely a court chooses to scrutinize them. This attracts the notion of deference both in terms of the expertise and the institutional legitimacy of the court to review a discriminator's actions. When it comes to legislative measures, courts are naturally most deferential, less so when state authorities are concerned, and perhaps least so for private employers and individuals. This also attracts the notion of margin of appreciation, peculiar to the ECtHR, where, in borderline or hard cases, the final determination of the balance to be struck between the interests of the victims and the interests of the discriminator or the beneficiaries of discrimination is left to States themselves, rather than the Court.

[159] Oddný Mjöll Arnardóttir, 'Vulnerability under Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights: Innovation or Business as Usual?' (2017) 4 Oslo Law Review.

[160] Anuj Garg (n 104).

2010

This is the broad organization of the justification analysis which follows the discrimination analysis to ascertain whether discrimination, even if wrong, could be sustained. How does it bear on intersectional claims? Not surprisingly, given all the hurdles for intersectional claims already discussed, most claims do not come to pass at the stage of justification analysis. When they do, however, several peculiarities emerge. I want to discuss three things which come to light in comparative jurisprudence. First, notwithstanding the availability of justifications for direct and indirect discrimination, justifications often creep into the discrimination analysis such that the determination of whether there has been discrimination based on multiple grounds is often laden with justificatory considerations even when a case does not reach the stage of justification analysis. This is true even for direct discrimination which may not be justified. Second, there is a tendency to use intersectionality, where present, as a justification rather than as constituting discrimination. Third, courts apply a rather low standard of review for sustaining justifications of intersectional discrimination, no matter which grounds are involved.

Nowhere are these controversies borne out more clearly than in the Supreme Court of India decision in Air India. For a jurisdiction which has not formally recognized indirect discrimination, does not have a limitations clause in the Constitution, and has not even developed a justification analysis for equality or non-discrimination claims, the supervenience of justifications in India is perplexing. But it shows exactly how—despite the technical distinctions between direct and indirect discrimination, and individual grounds in terms of the justifications and standard of review they attract—justification can be all-pervasive, inhibiting a finding of intersectional discrimination from the word go in the discrimination analysis.

Air India was about the service conditions for female air hostesses working with the airline, which included mandatory retirement at the age of thirty-five years, or upon marriage within four years of service, or upon first pregnancy, whichever was earlier. The Court's entire discrimination analysis, of whether the retirement conditions violated constitutional equality, was driven by whether the conditions could be justified by Air India. At no point did the Court disentangle discrimination from its justification. It simply applied the two tests of equality—of reasonable classification and non-arbitrariness—from the perspective of whether the reasons for the impugned conditions could be considered reasonable or non-arbitrary, not whether the conditions were themselves unreasonable or arbitrary. Conceived this way, there is no independent content of discrimination at all. In fact, discrimination is only the absence of justification. It is important to unpack the implications of this.

In Air India, the Supreme Court applied two different tests to see whether the provisions offended equality under the Constitution of India. In the first instance, it applied the reasonable differentia test, according to which a distinction, when drawn on an intelligible basis and having some rational connection with the purpose for which it is adopted, is sustainable.[161] Here the Court concluded that the difference in service conditions between the class of air stewards who were male and that of air hostesses who were female was not drawn on the basis of sex alone, but on several other considerations including age, marriage, and pregnancy as well as the requirements of the particular employment sector, societal conditions, and sensitivities and limitations of each sex. None of the service conditions were problematic under this test, which was too weak perhaps to find any distinction problematic. Multiple grounds and intersectional impact thus became justifiable reasons for which the service conditions existed rather than the reasons for which discrimination was wrongful. Intersectionality effectively ended up justifying, rather than constituting, discrimination. The reasonableness test has thus been severely criticized not just for its weak standard of review, but also for barely catching any discrimination at all.[162]

It was only when the Supreme Court applied the arbitrariness test[163] that one of the service conditions, retirement upon first pregnancy, was considered the 'most unreasonable and arbitrary provision which shocks the conscience of the Court'.[164] Termination of employment on this basis was seen as to compel 'the poor [Air Hostesses] not to have any children and thus interfere with and divert the ordinary course of human nature', which was 'extremely detestable and abhorrent to the notions of a civilised society' and 'grossly unethical, [that] it smacks of a deep rooted sense of utter selfishness at the cost of all human values' thus constituting not only 'a callous and cruel act but an open insult to Indian womanhood the most sacrosanct and cheris[h]ed institution'.[165] In contrast, mandatory retirement upon marriage within four years of service was considered 'a very sound and salutary provision' under the arbitrariness test for the reasons that:

> Apart from improving the health of the employee, it helps [sic] in the promotion and boos[t]ing up of our family planning programme. Secondly, if a woman marries near about the age of 20 to 23 years, she becomes fully mature and there is every chance of such a marriage proving a succes[s], all things being equal. Thirdly, it has been rightly pointed out to us by the Corporation that if the bar of marriage within four years of service is removed then the Corporation will have to incur huge expenditure in recruiting additional [air hostesses] either on a temporary or on ad hoc basis to [161] Anwar Ali Sarkar v State of West Bengal [1952] SCR 284 (Supreme Court of India) (Das J) ('In order to be a proper classification so as not to offend against the Constitution it must be based on some intelligible differentia which should have a reasonable relation to the object of the Act as recited in the preamble.').

[162] Tarunabh Khaitan, 'Beyond Reasonableness–A Rigorous Standard of Review for Article 15 Infringement' (2008) 50 Journal of the Indian Law Institute 177.

[163] EP Royappa v State of Tamil Nadu AIR 1974 SC 555 (Supreme Court of India) ('Where an act is arbitrary, it is implicit in it that it is unequal both according to political logic and constitutional law and is therefore violative of Article 14.').

[164] Air India v Nergesh Meerza 1982 SCR (1) 438 (Supreme Court of India) [84].

[165] Ibid.

> replace the working [air hostesses] if they conceive and any period short of four years would be too little a time for the Corporation to phase out such an ambitious plan'.[166]

What appears more arbitrary than the service conditions is the Court's application of the arbitrariness test. Riddled with antiquated notions of sex and gender, arbitrariness as a standard seems to turn on affirmation of stereotypes rather than questioning them as discriminatory. In sum, both the tests—reasonable differentia and non-arbitrariness—seem ill-conceived in rooting out discrimination. This is so because the standards are devoid of any substantive consideration of discrimination as wrongful and are only defined through the lens of justification, especially when that justification is based on multiple grounds or identities.

Air India, though is not alone in this. The Canadian Supreme Court and the South African Constitutional Court, too, have done much the same in cases like Gosselin, Volks, and Jordan, despite provisions like Section 1 of the Canadian Charter and Section 36 of the South African Constitution which set a high bar for justifications. Thus, the majority's discrimination analysis in Gosselin was dominated by the justifications offered by the government. The Canadian Supreme Court accepted without question the generalizations relied upon by the legislature in assuming that those under thirty years of age did not suffer any historic disadvantage, stereotyping, or prejudice.[167] The government's good intentions of enabling young adults to be self-sufficient was sufficient for the Court to find that there was in fact no discrimination in the case.[168] Similarly, in Volks, the majority plainly accepted justifications like upholding freedom of testation and choice to marry for excluding cohabitating partners from intestate succession, finding that these considerations discounted any possibility of unfair discrimination in the first place.[169] On the other hand, in Jordan, the impact of disproportionate criminalization of female sex workers was justified not only by the legislature's lack of interest and intention in harming their human dignity, but also by the risks voluntarily assumed by the sex workers in choosing to offer their bodies for sex. Their choice justified the stigma, including of criminalization, attached to sex work. The Court thus refused to find anything discriminatory about a neutral provision criminalizing sex workers and customers alike. The line of reasoning invoked in these cases confirms that justificatory considerations have become central to the finding of discrimination. Much like the Indian Supreme Court in Air India, the majorities in all three cases invoked justifications alongside the discrimination analysis to defeat a finding of wrongful discrimination rather than saving justifications for Section 1 of the Canadian Charter or Section 36 of the South African Constitution. The result

[166] Ibid [82].
[167] Gosselin (n 34) [59]–[66].
[168] Ibid [65].
[169] Volks (n 2) [60] [81] [82] [85] [87] [94].

was that the Courts barely considered the impact of discrimination and, consequently, the nature of intersectional discrimination, but instead focussed on justifying any prima facie argument of discrimination which could have been made.

The point is not simply about the location of justificatory considerations—whether within or after the discrimination analysis, or well beyond in the limitation clauses—but the way justifications are used to deny any discrimination at all.[170] Discrimination and justification analysis may well be done simultaneously or separately but to let justifications ride over the determination of the causal inquiry—of whether certain grounds lead to a certain kind of discriminatory impact which is considered wrongful—is forsaking the commitment to adjudicate upon discrimination as such.[171] Thus, it becomes important to stress that justifications should not divert the court from the focus of the discrimination analysis of determining which grounds cause discrimination and how.

Here,intersectional cases seem to have particularly suffered because courts have not only assessed discrimination through justifications but also used intersectionality as a justification in itself. Thus, direct intersectional discrimination as in Air India was justified as 'meant to be so' and hence not wrongful since intersectional. The fact that discrimination may have been based on multiple grounds of sex, age, pregnancy, and marital status was used as a reason for it to not have been discriminatory at all since only single-axis discrimination was believed to be prohibited under the Constitution. On the other hand, indirect intersectional discrimination is seen as unintended and hence justified as merely happenstance or misfortune. In Gosselin, the intersectional impact of being under thirty years of age, reliant on social assistance, and female, understood as rendering the claimant poor, homeless, and vulnerable to sexual abuse and depression, was considered too exceptional and hence ignorable.[172] The Volks Court, too, lamented the intersectional impact upon Mrs Robinson because she was female and unmarried,[173] but that impact was seen as justifiable given the neutral framing of the provision based on marital status. Besides failing to detect indirect discrimination, what is regrettable is that the Court is acknowledging but ultimately ending up justifying the intersectional impact suffered by the claimant. This spin on intersectionality points to the need for resisting the acceptance of intersectional impact as a justification that is unintended and hence excusable. Such an understanding is plainly against the text and spirit of non-discrimination provisions which prohibit discrimination [170] Although some courts and commentators maintain that the two must be delineated: Volks (n 2) [209] (Sachs J); Harksen (n 45) [51]–[52] (Goldstone J); Law v Canada (n 97) [81]. See also Titia Loenen, 'The Equality Clause in the South African Constitution: Some Remarks from a Comparative Perspective' (1997) 13 South African Journal on Human Rights 401, 410–11.

[171] See Catherine Albertyn and Janet Kentridge, 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 South African Journal on Human Rights 149, 175; Rósaan Krüger, 'Equality and Unfair Discrimination: Refining the Harksen Test' (2011) 128 South African Law Journal 479, 504–05.

[172] Gosselin (n 34) [46]–[48].

[173] Volks (n 2) [59] [66] [68].

comprehensively, including, either explicitly or through interpretation, indirect and intersectional forms of discrimination. It is also against the plain language of limitation clauses like Section 1 and Section 36 which do not suggest that justifications which are neutral and lead to unintended impact will perforce be sustainable.

Lastly, it is clear that courts seem to be applying a rather low standard of review or level of scrutiny in these cases. In Volks, the Court accepted the government's purpose of ensuring freedom of succession and to marry, in excluding cohabitating partners from intestate succession without subjecting these justifications to any searching scrutiny. Similarly, the governmental purpose of enabling young adults by giving them a lower rate of social assistance was ratified by the Court in Gosselin without more. In Jordan, the neutrality of the provision in punishing anyone involved in the sex trade was taken as proof that no discrimination existed in the first place. The standard of review in these cases seems to have been one of mere rationality, reasonableness, or non-arbitrariness. What is interesting to note is that the standard of review seems to drop when the majorities in these cases considered justifications specifically in response to intersectionality or impact suffered on multiple bases. It is counterintuitive that intersectionality dips the standard of review such that legislative distinctions in these cases did not need to be shown to be justified but merely stated in order to be accepted. The rationale for this is clearly amiss.[174]

A searching and structured standard of review is required for giving the justification analysis a meaningful role in discrimination law, including for intersectional discrimination.[175] It is widely argued that the appropriate standard of review is one of proportionality.[176] In addition to asking about the legitimacy of the impugned measure, proportionality is concerned with testing the suitability and necessity of, as well as any excessive burdens imposed by, the measure.[177] The tripartite test is meant to inherently respect rights by not taking infringements lightly and requiring precise explanations of legitimate aim, suitability, necessity, and balance. Proportionality is popular with the European courts in particular. While the CJEU rejected intersectionality in Parris, its next-best response to intersectionality in the form of capacious single-axis discrimination shows that proportionality as a structured form of review indeed works for indirect intersectional cases where justification is allowed. What is notable in the CJEU's approach is that it only proceeds [174] See Sheila McIntyre, 'The Supreme Court and Section 15: A Thin and Impoverished Notion of Judicial Review' (2006) 31 Queen's Law Journal 731; Denise G Réaume, 'The Relevance of Relevance to Equality Rights' (2006) 31 Queen's Law Journal 696.

[175] Murray Wesson, 'Discrimination Law and Social Rights: Intersections and Possibilities' (2007) 13 Juridica International 74, 81.

[176] Sheldon Leader, 'Proportionality and the Justification of Discrimination' in Janet Dine and Bob Watt, Discrimination Law: Concepts, Limitations and Justifications (Longman 1996); Aharon Barak, Proportionality: Constitutional Rights and their Limitations (CUP 2012); Julian Rivers, 'Proportionality and Variable Intensity of Review' (2006) 65 Cambridge Law Journal 174; Cora Chan, 'Proportionality and Invariable Baseline Intensity of Review' (2013) 33 Legal Studies 1. See also Brink (n 4) [46].

[177] Paul Craig, Administrative Law (5th edn, Sweet & Maxwell 2003) 622.

to discuss the possibility of justification once discrimination is established. Thus, in a case like Kutz-Bauer, the Court first satisfied itself that a part time scheme which excluded a vast majority of women from benefiting from it (since their retirement age was set five years earlier than that of men), constituted indirect sex discrimination under Directive 76/207.[178] It then proceeded to ask whether the scheme could be objectively justified by criteria unrelated to any discrimination on grounds of sex (legitimate aim). Not only are the aims meant to be objectively justifiable, but it is also required to show that the aims cannot be achieved by other means (necessity) and the means chosen to achieve those aims are actually capable of advancing those aims (suitability). The Court was quick to remind that while combating unemployment and encouraging early retirement were all acceptable aims, they were insufficient as 'mere generalisations . . . to show that the aim of the disputed provisions is unrelated to any discrimination based on sex or to provide evidence on the basis of which it could reasonably be considered that the means chosen are or could be suitable for achieving that aim'.[179] Similarly, while budgetary considerations could influence the choice of social policy, they could not 'themselves constitute an aim pursued by that policy and cannot therefore justify discrimination against one of the sexes'.[180] In sum, the Court reaffirmed the broad discretion EU Member States have in designing social policy, but pointed out that it 'cannot have the effect of frustrating the implementation of a fundamental principle of Community law such as that of equal treatment for men and women'.[181] In this case, the effect of the policy was intersectional in that it ended up disadvantaging women of a certain age because their retirement age was different from that of men. The Court was clear that purported aims like combating unemployment and budgetary deficits, or unintended consequences like intersectional disadvantage for older women, could not be used to justify discrimination without more.

It is useful to note that the standard of review in a case like Kutz-Bauer cannot simply be classified as high or low. The CJEU is not just asking for very weighty, substantially weighty, or merely important reasons for the discrimination to be sustained, but is carrying out a structured qualitative assessment of legitimate aims, suitability, necessity, and balance, and also providing specific guidance as to what kind of considerations can be shown to satisfy each of the limbs of the proportionality analysis. It is thus both the CJEU's structured form of review, as well as its specificity of the kind of justifications deemed acceptable, which makes a difference to finding for intersectional cases. The latter is particularly important, in that when the Court is analysing the justifications, it is aware of accepting as justifiable neither general or neutral explanations, on the one hand, nor specific but [178] Case C-187/00 Kutz-Bauer v Freie und Hansestadt Hamburg [2003] ECR I-2741 [51].

[179] Ibid [58].
[180] Ibid [59].
[181] Ibid [57].

unintended intersectional impact, on the other. In the absence of an understanding that intersectionality is not an acceptable justification, structured analysis, proportionality, or other heightened forms of review alone will be insufficient in rooting out intersectional discrimination.

This conclusion is reinforced in the ECtHR jurisprudence which purports to carry out a structured proportionality analysis with varying intensities of review for different grounds, but is not always successful in resisting intersectionality-based justifications as rationalizing the discrimination at play. Take, for example, the treatment of intersectionality in SAS v France which concerned the legality of the full-face veil ban under Articles 3, 8, 9, 10, 11, and 14 of the ECHR. The argument in respect of Article 14 was that the ban constituted indirect intersectional discrimination against Muslim women because of their sex, religion, and ethnic origin.[182] The government responded with two arguments—that the practice of wearing a full-face mask was applied to everyone and not just Muslim women and that, in any case, the practice was voluntary and hence Muslim women had put themselves at a disadvantage and could not subsequently complain of discrimination.[183] The Court agreed with the claimants that the ban on the full-face veil had a disproportionate impact on Muslim women because of their sex and religion, but ultimately held that the ban had 'an objective and reasonable justification'.[184] In particular, the Court was satisfied by the necessity and the suitability of the ban which was both non-specific (i.e. it applied to everyone) and limited (i.e. it did not prohibit Muslim women from wearing other religious insignia like the burqa). Intersectional discrimination, to the extent that it existed, was thus tolerable. But the strongest argument for the ECtHR was one regarding the legitimate aim pursued by the ban, namely the preservation of the conditions for 'living together' in France. The state had a wide margin of appreciation in defining and pursuing this aim, which was about how French society wanted to organize itself as a plural, tolerant, and broad-minded democracy. This choice was always one for individual societies to make since there was no European consensus on it anyway. The Court decided that it had a duty to exercise a degree of restraint in its review of Convention rights and accordingly found the ban to be proportionate.

It is clear that proportionality itself does not do the trick for intersectional discrimination despite being a structured form of review. Intersectional justifications and the margin of appreciation may yet supersede a finding of wrongful discrimination. This may particularly be the case for unenumerated and analogous grounds which attract less scrutiny than grounds which are enumerated. In fact, even within the enumerated grounds, some seem to attract a higher standard of review than others. Thus, under the ECHR, the proportionality review for discrimination based on the grounds of race and sex has been stricter than it has been for other grounds.[185] Yet, it is not clear why the review becomes leaner, with a wider margin of appreciation, in cases where race and sex combine, such as in cases involving Muslim women's dress.[186] If at all, there is an argument to be made for the strictest form of review when grounds (especially those like race which are listed and recognized as 'suspect') combine with others. This argument has been made in the context of the US, making a case for applying a strict standard of scrutiny for Black women's claims based on race and sex under the Equal Protection Clause.[187] There is merit in arguing that when a suspect ground like race is involved, the standard of review should be high, even if it is combined with other grounds. In any case, what should be relatively straightforward, though, is not accepting the same reason as an argument for lowering the standard of review. Just as intersectionality cannot serve as a justification for discrimination, it cannot serve as a reason for less searching scrutiny, regardless of whether we agree to give intersectional claims involving suspect grounds the highest level of scrutiny.

[182] SAS (n 10) [80].
[183] Ibid [86].
[184] Ibid [161].

It is useful to collate the conclusions here. As more cases of intersectional discrimination are litigated, more defendants will seek to justify it. It is therefore important to stress that the justification analysis should not overtake a determination of discrimination per se—on what grounds it is based and whether it is wrongful. Justifications should be treated as they are, that is, as justifying rather than eliminating discrimination. Importantly, intersectionality should not become a justification itself, especially when it occurs indirectly. The fact that intersectionality explains a form of discrimination, and not its rationalization, should go uncontested. Finally, there is little justification for the low standard of review which has often been applied to intersectional cases. But a robust form of review is not just about high or low levels of scrutiny. The form of review has to be about the structure of justification analysis which lays out the lines of inquiries (legitimate aim, suitability, necessity, balancing) and the kind of responses (costs, budgetary considerations, unemployment, social cohesion, democratic values) deemed acceptable. Instead of quibbling over variable levels of scrutiny based on the different combination of grounds involved, we may be better served by insisting on a structured and consistent form of review which provides greater guidance for, and promise of withstanding, the justification analysis in intersectional claims.

[185] The cases of Roma women's sterilization which could presumably be classified as based on race and sex, have succeeded under the proportionality test, albeit under arts 3 and 8 of the ECHR and not under art 14 of the ECHR. See NB v Slovakia (2010) Application No 29518/10; VC v Slovakia (2012) Application No 18968/07.

[186] See n 10.

[187] Judy Scales-Trent, 'Black Women and the Constitution: Finding Our Place, Asserting Our Rights' (1989) 24 Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 9.

7. Evidence and Burden of Proof

Thus far we have considered substantive issues of discrimination: on what grounds do intersectional claimants argue; what type of claims do they bring—direct or indirect discrimination; what is the substantive conception of discrimination that explains what is wrong in their complaint; does comparison help establish such discrimination; can the defendant justify the discrimination anyway, and how? All of this rests as much on doctrinal issues as on evidence. It is, after all, the evidence that is brought forth which makes a difference to the conclusions reached in respect of each of the substantive issues arising in discrimination cases. So, what kind of evidence is acceptable and who bears the burden of persuasion based on that evidence—the claimant, the defendant, or both?

Like single-axis discrimination, intersectional discrimination can be established by qualitative or quantitative evidence. What either must do is show the distinct nature of intersectional discrimination, that is, the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage. The explanation of this distinct nature looks different for each intersectional claimant. As chapter 2 showed, the explanation is long and comprehensive for a group like Dalit women who are disadvantaged because of both their caste and gender. The evidence must eventually help us arrive at this explanation for intersectional claimants and the particular instances of discrimination of which they complain. Furthermore, because the nature of intersectional discrimination resides in social structures and norms, it is important for evidence to be led from this perspective, focussing on unearthing broader patterns rather than isolated explanations of disadvantage. Only a wide range of evidentiary material can help render such discrimination comprehensible and thus redressable. It is useful to look beyond legal sources, to accounts of such patterns of group disadvantage in sociology, anthropology, psychology, history, economics, feminist studies, and other relevant disciplines. Each has engaged with intersectionality in elaborate ways, revealing the lived experience and reality of those who are caught between multiple and intersecting systems of power. The South African Constitutional Court leads by example in admitting elaborate explanatory accounts of intersectionality in cases like Bhe and Hassam. The Court is defined by its acute appreciation of South Africa's discriminatory past as well as the contemporary society in its social, political, economic, and cultural context. Discrimination analysis under Section 9(3) of the South African Constitution is thus highly contextual. This is only possible with the help of rich qualitative and quantitative evidence the Court seeks out from parties, amici, or experts.

South African jurisprudence is also an example of making good use of qualitative evidence without necessarily demanding statistical proof. Statistics or quantitative evidence of any kind can be immensely helpful, just like qualitative accounts of discrimination. The problem arises when courts consider statistics to be necessary for the proof of intersectional discrimination. First, statistics for indirect intersectional discrimination, where the claimant has to show that an entire group has been put at a disadvantage, may not always be available. Second, even if they are available, it may be unrealistic to demand these statistics from the claimant or a party which does not have access to them. Both problems emerged pointedly in the Canadian Supreme Court's handling of Gosselin. Louise Gosselin was expected to produce qualitative and quantitative evidence, not just in respect of herself but in respect of the entire class of persons—young persons below the age of thirty years and reliant on social assistance—and show how many accessed the various programmes which allowed them to receive an enhanced sum of social assistance, how many accessed and dropped out of these programmes, how many continued to be in need of places on these programmes, and how many lived below the poverty line. Some of these statistics were unavailable, not just to the claimant but to the government itself. Where available, the government, not Louise Gosselin, would have had access to them since it managed both the payments of social assistance as well as the vocational and education programmes for young adults. The majority considered neither the availability nor the access to such evidence too seriously. According to the Court, it was upon Louise Gosselin to establish the claim on behalf of her class with concrete statistics. Even if it were 'prepared to accept that some young people must have been pushed well below the poverty line',[188] since it did not know 'how many, nor for how long', the complainant had failed to discharge her burden of proof.

The obvious flaw in the Court's evidentiary approach was addressed by the minority in Gosselin. In Bastarache J's dissenting opinion, he pieced together every bit of evidence brought forth by the claimant to find that the claimant had not only established a violation of her human dignity but also that her situation was illustrative of the manner in which the social assistance scheme operated and affected the human dignity of those in her position; hence, there was 'no necessity for her to bring evidence of actual deprivation of other named welfare recipients under the age of 30'.[189] Rather, he required the state to adduce evidence to discharge its burden under the justification analysis because '[g]iven the government's resources, it is much more appropriate to require it to adduce proof of the importance and purpose of the program and its minimal impairment of equality rights in discharging its burden under s. 1'.[190] Bastarache J's approach is particularly helpful for intersectional claims in that it is both fair and pragmatic in the kind of evidence each party is expected to bring forth to make their case. It is fair because it asks the claimant to bring in evidence mainly in respect of her own position of disadvantage, and then draws conclusions about broader patterns of group disadvantage based on that and extends it to those in her position. It is pragmatic because it leaves the government to bring in counter-evidence in the justification analysis because it is far easier for the government to have access to statistics in respect of its own programmes. This approach to statistics has been popular with Canadian tribunals at least.[191] In its most radical statement on the kind of evidence useful in establishing intersectional claims, the British Columbia Human Rights Tribunal in Radek proclaimed that:

[188] Gosselin (n 34) 463.
[189] Ibid [255] (Bastarache J).
[190] Ibid [259].

> the nature of the evidence necessary to establish systemic discrimination will vary with the nature and context of the particular complaint in issue. If the remedial purposes of the [Human Rights Code] are to be fulfilled, evidentiary requirements must be sensitive to the nature of the evidence likely to be available. In particular, evidentiary requirements must not be made so onerous that proving systemic discrimination is rendered effectively impossible for complainants . . . the necessity of statistical evidence, would, in the context of a complaint of the type before me, render proof of systemic discrimination impossible.[192]

What is radical about this approach is that it dispenses with the requirement of proving intersectional discrimination through statistics alone, especially cases of an indirect and systemic nature, and instead takes a contextual view of evidence that may be available and ultimately useful. Such a view of evidence is dependent on what is asked of intersectional claimants in the first place or what burden of proof is on the parties; an issue we now turn to consider.

The question of who bears the burden of proof in a discrimination case is normally divided into two stages—first, establishing whether a prima facie case of discrimination exists, and second, considering whether such discrimination actually exists and, if so, whether it is justifiable. The apportioning of the burden of proof for both stages differs vastly between jurisdictions. In the US, under Title VII, the claimant bears the burden at the first stage for establishing a prima facie case of discrimination. The burden then shifts to the defendant at the second stage to articulate a legitimate, non-discriminatory reason for the impugned action.[193] But, throughout, the ultimate burden is borne by the claimant to persuade the court, either directly, that the defendant's explanation is merely a pretext for a discriminatory motive, or indirectly, that the defendant's explanation for their actions is [191] See esp Radek v Henderson Development (Canada) and Securiguard Services (No 3) 2005 BCHRT 302 [513] (The Tribunal disagreed with the respondents' submission that 'statistical evidence of disproportionate effect is essential to a claim of systemic discrimination, either generally or in the present case. Rather, to return to first principles, what is necessary is evidence of "practices or attitudes that have, whether by design or impact, the effect of limiting an individual's or a group's right to the opportunities generally available because of attributed rather than actual characteristics . . . ." Statistics may be a "signal" of such effects, but they are not necessary in every case. The signal should not be confused with the thing signified. The evidence as a whole should be considered to determine if practices or attitudes are present which have the effect of limiting persons' opportunities due to their membership in one or more protected groups.') (citing CNR v Canada (Human Rights Commission) [1987] 1 SCR 111 (SCC) [34]).

[192] Ibid [509].

[193] McDonnell Douglas Corporation v Green (1973) 411 US 792.

inadequate.[194] This is different from the Equal Protection Clause, where the burden of proof is based on the standard of scrutiny that a ground attracts. While the claimant bears the burden of establishing a threshold case of discrimination, the burden of justification is dependent on the sliding scale of scrutiny from strict to rational, as explored in the previous section. In the UK, Section 136 of the Equality Act 2010 does not explicitly place the burden on the claimant to prove a prima facie case of discrimination, but it has been interpreted as such to be the case.[195] However, a court is meant to consider all evidence brought forth by both the parties to draw this initial conclusion. The burden of proof at the second stage is on the defendant to show that they did not contravene an equality provision. In Canada, under the Canadian Charter, the burden at the first stage is on the claimant but, once met, the burden shifts to the respondent state under Section 1 of the Charter.[196] South Africa follows this shifting burden of proof framework but apportions the burden differently in that the burden of proof on the state at the second stage is higher. This is because of the unique provision in Section 9(5) of the Constitution which provides that once discrimination is shown to be based on grounds listed under Section 9(3) of the Constitution, such discrimination is presumed to be unfair. Similar provisions exist in EU law, though member states are explicitly allowed to introduce rules of evidence which are more favourable to the claimants in discrimination law.[197] The ECtHR also seems to have followed the two-step framework of a shifting burden of proof, though there is little clarity over the burden of proof in the particular case of Article 14.[198] As international courts with a unique set of investigatory powers and referral systems, there are no strict stipulations of procedural rules to be followed by the CJEU and the ECtHR. In respect of their equality and non-discrimination jurisprudence, these courts are thus more similar to international human rights bodies like the CEDAW Committee and the Human Rights Committee which govern their own procedure and do not impose arid rules of evidence upon the parties. There is an expectation that the parties produce all that they can to support their case and there is an understanding that, ultimately, it is the totality of circumstances and evidence which should be considered. Thus, issues of burden of proof which have arisen in actual or potential intersectional cases relate, in the main, to some of the jurisdictions we have considered so far (US, UK, South Africa, and Canada). India is an outlier in this respect, adopting neither the shifting burden of proof nor the presumption of discrimination format. On the contrary, it applies a presumption of constitutionality when legislative provisions are challenged under Article 14 of the Constitution.[199] There is some indication [194] Texas Department of Community Affairs v Burdine (1981) 450 US 248.

[195] Ayodele v Citylink Ltd [2017] EWCA Civ 1913.
[196] Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia [1989] 1 SCR 143 (SCC) 178.
[197] See Race Directive (n 154), arts 8, 21.
[198] Oddný Mjöll Arnardóttir, 'Non-discrimination Under Article 14 ECHR: The Burden of Proof' (1999–2012) 51 Scandinavian Studies in Law 13.
[199] This does not apply to pre-constitutional colonial legislation. See Anuj Garg (n 104).

that Article 15(1) operates with a presumption of wrongful discrimination like Section 9(5) in South Africa when a non-legislative distinction is based on a listed ground. All other classifications under Article 14 on the general right to equality must be 'examined with the presumption that the State action is reasonable and justified'.[200]

The trouble for intersectional claimants is that they seem to have borne an inexplicably heavy burden of proof at every stage.[201] Take, for example, the case of Judge v Marsh where the US District Court of Columbia was quick to point out that, although intersectional claims could be brought on two grounds, the burden of proof on the employer remained the same while the claimant continued to bear the same burden, 'difficult though it may be, of establishing by a preponderance of the evidence that her employer's challenged decisions were based on this narrowly defined [intersectional] subgroup'.[202] These words have since become a self-fulfilling prophecy. The erratic fate of claims argued on two grounds in the US shows that courts have assumed that the burden of proof on claimants in these cases is inevitably high and that it is difficult to show evidence of discrimination related to a subgroup. This, though, is no fault of the intersectional claimants themselves. As the Court in Judge v Marsh remarked, 'the generally small sample size and lack of historical data . . . undermined the evidentiary value of the statistics' relating to Black women's discrimination.[203] The argument is tautologous; if the group is narrowly defined, such as Black women or eligible Black women or eligible Black women in a particular organization or neighbourhood, the statistics relating to them will inevitably be narrow. Given the long history of racial and gender oppression, it is also possible that a long history of employment may not be readily available in Title VII cases. The demand to bring specific evidence in respect of a subgroup and then doubting that evidence for being too specific are thus conflicting moves.[204] Similarly, the requirement for showing discriminatory motive for claims of direct intersectional discrimination is equally problematic since the defendants can too easily show that either multiple grounds had nothing to do with their actions or that their actions were predicated on other criteria like qualifications and experience, which were far more complex and subjective. Thus, in Judge v Marsh, the Court readily accepted the subjectivity of reasons for not selecting the claimant, a [200] Kathi Raning Rawat v State of Saurashtra AIR 1952 SC 123 (Supreme Court of India).

[201] Though it is uncontroversial that the standard of proof is one of preponderance of probabilities. The controversy lies in respect of the relatively high intensity of this standard as applied to claimants of intersectional discrimination.

[202] Judge v Marsh (n 55) 780.

[203] Ibid.

[204] See also similar conflicting statements in Jeffers v Thompson 264 F Supp 2d 314 (2003) (United States District Court, Maryland) ('The more specific the composite class, the more readily a plaintiff can demonstrate that the beneficiary of the contested employment decision does not belong to the class. A prima facie case is not supposed to be difficult to establish . . . The ultimate burden of persuasion remains always on the plaintiff . . . And the more specific the composite class in which the plaintiff claims membership, the more onerous that ultimate burden becomes.') Ibid 326–27.

Black woman, as nothing to do with race or sex. The defendant's burden of proof appears incommensurately low, as the claimant's appeared high in bringing statistical evidence which was specific, historical, and substantial all at the same time. Yet, the defendants asked for the claimants to bear a 'more demanding evidentiary burden' or bring 'more persuasive evidence to support [a] claim than would otherwise be necessary' for the reason that claims of direct intersectional discrimination are 'implausible' in professional contexts and make 'little economic sense'.[205] Such demands have been rejected only at the altar of overwhelming direct and circumstantial evidence of direct discrimination in sex-plus and race-plus cases.[206] Claimants in age-plus and disability-plus cases meanwhile continue to face insurmountable standards of proof, including an insistence on proving discrimination to be solely or specifically connected to particular grounds, an approach rooted in single-axis thinking.[207]

The US courts have been unrealistic in what they expect of intersectional claimants for succeeding in their claims.[208] Tribunals in the UK have thus been wary of enforcing burden of proof provisions in intersectional cases too strictly. In O'Reilly v BBC[209] both the parties and the Court agreed that instead of focussing on channelling the discrimination analysis via the shifting burden of proof framework from the claimant to the defendant, it was more helpful to focus on 'the reason why'[210] discrimination occurred at all by analysing the evidence and drawing appropriate inferences from primary facts and 'deciding the matter on the balance of probabilities on a consideration of the totality of the evidence'.[211] This is essentially the approach which succeeded for the claimant in Tilern de Bique where the Employment Appeal Tribunal (EAT) upheld the ruling of the Employment Tribunal (ET) that the combined operation of the immigration and constant-availability conditions of employment in the army constituted discrimination based on both race and gender. This conclusion was based on the primary facts established before the ET, namely that the claimant and those in her position faced substantial difficulties in meeting the requirements of their job given the difficulties they faced in arranging child care and the inflexible attitude of the army in accommodating their needs or relaxing the requirements for them. These facts were established firmly before the ET, while the Ministry of Defence had failed to discharge the burden of [205] Lam v University of Hawaii 40 F 3d 1551 (9th Cir 1994) (USCA) 1563.

[206] Ibid.

[207] See esp Gross v FBL Fin Services, Inc 557 US 167 (2009) 180, where the US Supreme Court held that '[t]he burden of persuasion does not shift to the employer to show that it would have taken the action regardless of age, even when a plaintiff has produced some evidence that age was one motivating factor in that decision'.

[208] See discussion in Deborah A Widiss, 'Griggs at Midlife' (2015) 113 Michigan Law Review 993 (2015) on why indirect intersectional discrimination remains undeveloped in the US.

[209] [2010] UKET/2200423/2010 (hereafter O'Reilly).

[210] Shamoon v Chief Constable of the Royal Ulster Constabulary [2003] UKHL 11 [7]–[10]; Chief Constable of West Yorkshire Police v Khan [2001] UKHL 48 [29]–[30].

[211] O'Reilly (n 209) [237].

justification. The EAT was clear that no more was required to prove discrimination when primary facts went undisputed. The UK Supreme Court in Hewage clarified these matters further for intersectional claimants. First, the Court emphasized that 'it is important not to make too much of the role of the burden of proof provisions'.[212] The only time this controversy comes live is when evidence before the courts is genuinely deficient to conclude one way or the other in a case. Aside from what the Supreme Court thought would be few such cases, the burden of proof should be of no real importance in intersectional cases. Secondly, and in those few cases, the burden of proof upon a claimant arguing on two grounds cannot be too high at the first stage of the discrimination analysis. The claimant is only required to prove a prima facie case of intersectional discrimination at this stage (so that the Tribunal can assume that discrimination may have occurred on the said grounds); at the second stage, the burden of proof shifts onto the defendant to show that an adequate explanation existed for such discrimination.[213] In fact, the Court went so far as to say that the assumption at the second stage of the discrimination analysis is that there is no adequate explanation for discrimination. There is no assumption of any kind at the first stage.[214] The implication is clear. That the defendant in a case may bear a greater burden of proof at the second stage than the claimant does at the first stage.

This is largely the approach which has proven to be successful for intersectional claimants in South Africa, where discrimination based on enumerated grounds is 'presumed' to be unfair. The burden is thus upon the defendant to show that discrimination can be justified under Section 36 of the Constitution. This is not a light burden given that, under Section 36, justification should be reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality, and freedom. In deciding this question, regard must be had to the 'nature of the rights infringed, the nature of the discriminatory conduct, the provisions themselves, as well as the impact of the discrimination on those who are adversely affected'.[215] Significant amongst these is the unequivocal evidence of the impact of discrimination, which, when admitted, makes it near impossible to pass muster in the justification analysis. In Hassam, the minster had advanced no justification for discrimination and the Court went no further on his behalf to indulge in a justification analysis. Conversely, the piecemeal appreciation of intersectional impact (as in Volks and Jordan) made it easier for the courts to justify discrimination without having the state explain their legislative choices as against the evidence of impact. Smoking gun evidence of the kind available in cases which show a clear intention to discriminate are difficult to come by, given that the majority of cases are not

[212] Hewage v Grampian Health Board [2012] UKSC 37 [32].
[213] Ibid [25].
[214] Ibid [32]; see also Equality Act 2010, s 136.
[215] Hassam (n 6) [41].

intentional but involve complex structures, policies, and norms which have an intersectional impact on disadvantaged groups. We need a wealth of qualitative and quantitative evidence to show such discrimination. But what is perhaps more important is for the courts to have evidentiary approaches and burden of proof provisions which allow for such evidence to be brought forth and examined fairly. The success of intersectional claims thus relies on both the appreciation of such evidence as well as the appreciation of the burden each party bears in producing and proving their case based on it.

8. Remedies

All the fuss about getting intersectional discrimination right is ultimately about fixing it. As chapter 2 described, the whole project of intersectionality is about transforming structures of disadvantage and systems of powers which are co-constituted. The goal is to upturn the structures and systems which cause intersectional discrimination and to reimagine societies as truly equal where no one is intersectionally disadvantaged. The fundamental goal of transformation is what inspires intersectionality as a theory and in turn what must inspire discrimination lawyers to redress it as a category of discrimination.

How do we achieve this goal through remedies in an intersectional claim? Remedies in adjudication are naturally limited. This is because they relate to the legal claim before the court. Unless the claim is a broad one that challenges a large-scale social policy, thereby requiring wholesale reconception or programmatic response, remedies in individual cases of discrimination involve specific relief like damages, compensation, penalties, declarations, injunctions, interdicts, and legal costs.[216] Courts can also order remedies with a broader remit, issue guidelines, or direct the defendant to instate structural policies which address intersectional discrimination. In fact, remedies in intersectional claims may be no different in form than those for other categories of discrimination. But they are, like all other things considered so far, highly dependent on how the courts choose from different conceptual and doctrinal positions, and, in particular, from the range of remedial offerings available in a jurisdiction. For example, in EU law, remedies are often left to the discretion of the member states.[217] The equality Directives mandate the member states to introduce measures for 'real and effective compensation or reparation as the Member States so determine for the loss and damage sustained by a person injured as a result of discrimination on grounds of sex, in a way which is dissuasive and proportionate to the damage suffered'.[218] They also allow member states to make rules for issuing penalties in cases of discrimination as well as encouraging collective agreements and practices for preventing discrimination.[219] In contrast, the UK's position under the unenforced Section 14 has been that combination discrimination could not give rise to higher indemnification.[220] There is no such bar in Canada, where the primary remedy in intersectional claims before human rights tribunals is in the form of aggravated monetary compensation. There is no bar in South Africa either, but the issue of remedies for intersectional discrimination, especially under constitutional law, raises some very distinctive questions. For example, in the case of Bhe, the Constitutional Court considered a host of complex issues in designing an effective remedy: the appropriateness of substituting the long-standing customary law of succession with a legislative scheme suitably adjusted by the Court; the breadth of relief to cover those in a similar position as the claimants and affected by the repeal; and retrospectivity.[221] These issues are both specific and significant but go beyond the scope of this book. These specificities will inevitably need to be worked out in each discrimination law regime, both federally and provincially, and in respect of specific laws which apply to different subject matters, grounds of discrimination, etc. Here, we must resolve two issues which have emerged at the forefront of the remedies debate. First, should intersectional discrimination be indemnified with aggravated monetary indemnification, where such a form of remedy is appropriate? Secondly, should intersectional claims be limited to the claimant and those in her position or extend to everyone who shares some disadvantage with the claimant?

[216] UK Equality Act 2010, s 124; Civil Rights Act of 1964, Title VII, s 2000e-5 [s 706] (g)–(k); Constitution of India, art 32; South African Constitution, ss 38, 172; Canadian Charter, s 24(1); European Communities Act 1972, art 249; Race Directive (n 154), art 15; Gender Directive (Recast) (n 154), art 18; Framework Directive (n 154), art 9; ECHR, art 13. Under international law, the Human Rights Committee, CEDAW Committee, and CRPD Committee may issue any of these remedies as well, but relief is suggestive in nature and not legally enforceable in a court of law. See art 7 of the CEDAW Optional Protocol ('recommendations'); art 5(4) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights Optional Protocol 1 ('views'); and art 5 of the CRPD Optional Protocol ('suggestions and recommendations').

The issue whether intersectional discrimination should be indemnified at a higher rate than other claims of discrimination divides opinion. One opinion is that direct intersectional discrimination should attract higher indemnification than indirect discrimination since it is more morally culpable.[222] Irrespective of [217] See Christa Tobler, 'Remedies and Sanctions in EU Non-Discrimination Law' (2005) European Commission.

[218] Gender Directive (Recast) (n 154), art 18; Race Directive (n 154), art 15; Framework Directive (n 154), art 17.

[219] Gender Directive (Recast) (n 154), arts 25, 26.

[220] Government Equalities Office, 'Equality Bill: Assessing the Impact of a Multiple Discrimination Provision. A Discussion Document' (April 2009) <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20100212235759/http://www.equalities.gov.uk/pdf/090422%20Multiple%20Discrimination%20Discussion%20Document%20Final%20Text.pdf> accessed 29 March 2019 (hereafter GEO, 'Equality Bill').

[221] Bhe (n 5) [101]–[121] (Langa DCJ).

[222] Victoria Chege, 'The European Union Anti-discrimination Directives and European Union Equality Law: The Case of Multi-dimensional Discrimination' (2012) 13 ERA Forum 275; Jumard v Clwyd Leisure Ltd [2008] IRLR 345 (UKEAT) [50] ('The offence, humiliation or upset resulting from

whether a jurisdiction requires proof of the perpetrator's animus in establishing direct discrimination, such a claim may work only in cases where there is evidence of the perpetrator's state of mind in fact. Such cases, though, are rare. Others have argued that higher indemnification is necessary in order to incentivize intersectional claims.[223] Surely, the argument goes, if intersectional claims on multiple grounds are not better compensated than claims based on a single ground, there is little practical benefit to having courts recognize intersectional claims, especially in those situations where monetary remedies are preferable. The argument is not entirely meritless. Intersectional discrimination is hard to prove given the unfavourable judicial attitudes towards it. The rigmarole of succeeding in an intersectional claim may pay off only when a claimant is duly compensated. A bar on accessing aggravated indemnification can dissuade meritorious claims of intersectional discrimination.[224]

Yet, in principle, higher monetary relief should not be granted for bravery in pursuing hard claims in court or for incentivizing future claims of such nature. Higher indemnification may make sense for the reason that there is something extraordinary or aggravated about discrimination in the case. Intersectional discrimination should not by itself be treated as aggravated or exceptional since it goes against the point of intersectionality—that it is a rather common form of discrimination—even if discrimination law has not recognized it as its mainstay. There may of course be cases of intersectional discrimination which are exceptional. Certain forms of discrimination, harassment, and violence against Dalit women definitely qualify as exceptional because of the gravity of violations against them.[225] It is the qualitative nature of what Dalit women suffer which makes a difference to whether their discrimination claims should be considered for a higher rate of indemnification, if indemnification is appropriate. This is an important point. Intersectionality has no quantifiable stakes. It is not as if intersectional discrimination is necessarily worse or more problematic than other categories of discrimination or that discrimination on two grounds is actually double discrimination and one on three grounds is triply wrong.[226] As the EAT in Jumard aptly remarked, 'the degree of injury to feelings is not directly related to the number of a deliberate act of race discrimination may quite understandably cause greater injury to feelings than, say, a thoughtless failure to make an adjustment under the Disability Discrimination Act.') (hereafter Jumard).

[223] Nitya Duclos, 'Disappearing Women: Racial Minority Women in Human Rights Cases' (1993) 6 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 25, 40.

[224] This is the position of the UK government in respect of the unenforced s 14 of the Equality Act 2010, namely that no aggravated indemnification can be sought. See GEO, 'Equality Bill' (n 220).

[225] See chapter 2, section 3.

[226] Jumard (n 222) and Khanum v IBC Vehicles Ltd [1999] UKEAT/685/98 warning against double counting for the purposes of damages when a single cause of action is at issue, simply because a claim is based on two grounds.

grounds on which discrimination has occurred'.[227] This is because the multiplicity of grounds in an intersectional claim does not explain what is wrong about intersectional discrimination per se. Intersectional wrongs matter in a qualitative sense. More importantly, as posited in chapter 2, intersectional discrimination occurs as a whole rather than as fragments of the individual identities involved. So, in a single cause of action, multiple identities create a qualitatively different experience which can only be examined together to understand the sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage.[228] The case for higher indemnification should thus be made on a case by case basis based on the severity of disadvantage suffered by the claimant. In which case, neither a mandatory provision enabling, nor a bar or an upper limit on, monetary remedies for intersectional discrimination is justifiable.

Take the example of the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal in Baylis-Flannery.[229] There was ample direct evidence to conclude that the claimant had suffered discrimination and harassment due to her race and sex as a Black woman. When it came to calculating damages for mental anguish, the Tribunal referred to intersectionality to find that the mental anguish caused was greater than that suffered because of a single ground since the 'employer repeatedly diminish[ed] her based on his racist assumptions of the sexual promiscuity of Black women'.[230] It thus found that the claimant was due 'restitution for all of the enumerated grounds of discrimination that she suffered by adding them together within the restitution she receives for general damages'.[231] Despite an intersectionality-friendly analysis discussed in the last chapter, the approach to higher damages in Baylis-Flannery is suspect. It is not immediately clear that the mental anguish is greater simply because the claimant was targeted both for her race and sex. Would the claimant have suffered less mental anguish had the perpetrator expressed persistent interest in 'young girls' rather than 'young Black girls'.[232] There is more needed to understand [227] Jumard (n 222) [49]. See also Birmingham City Council v Desmond Jaddoo (2004) UKEAT/0448/04.

[228] See esp Morrison v Motsewetsho (2003) HRTO 21, where the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal did not view multiple grounds themselves as separate causes of action for each claimant. Cf. Jumard (n 222) [60] ('The losses flowing from the two forms of race and disability discrimination, at least where they did not arise out of the same facts, should have been separately considered.').

[229] Baylis-Flannery (n 59).

[230] Ibid [149].

[231] Ibid. See also Comeau v Cote [2003] BCHRT 32 [131] ('Finally, I find that the impact of the discrimination on the basis of both age and disability or perceived disability to be more hurtful to Mr. Comeau, than if it were only on one ground. As the impugned conduct was tied to both Mr. Comeau's age and his health, it was an attack on two aspects of his dignity, feelings and self respect. The Respondents' conduct branded Mr. Comeau as old and physically incapable. The experience gained with his age was reduced in significance, as he was also perceived as physically incapable as a result of his health. This was not a view Mr. Comeau had had of himself at any time prior. Although it is difficult to assess how much of the hurt and humiliation was attributed to the perceived disability and how much to the perception that his age hampered his performance, I am satisfied that this intersectionality of prohibited grounds had a greater impact on Mr. Comeau's dignity, feelings and self respect than would discrimination on either ground in isolation.').

[232] Baylis-Flannery (n 118) [24] [107].

why each ground should count for more, adding to the mental anguish and hence the damages.[233] Of course, there may be cases in which Black women are at risk of greater injury. For example, the case of Black women's hair exemplifies this possibility where the same hairstyles (such as corn rows, braids, or dreads) can be worn by white and Black women, but Black women face greater disadvantage because of the nature of Black women's hair and the history of wearing it in, what are distinctly, Black hairstyles.[234] But unless such an explanation emerges for acts of intersectional discrimination, not every cause of action should be a case for greater monetary indemnification.

This approach also prevents intersectionality from being treated simply as an aggravating factor in determining damages. Intersectionality as a theory is relevant in defining what we mean by intersectional discrimination and hence determining liability for such discrimination in law. It is not something which can be acknowledged and addressed simply by adding it at the stage of remedies for higher indemnification. Courts have incorrectly tried to segregate liability and remedy for intersectionality in this way. For example, in Arias v Desai, the Ontario Human Rights Tribunal noted that '[w]hile Ms Arias' age was not relevant to the issue of liability for sexual harassment, the Tribunal finds that the Respondents must be responsible for the extent of the damage that flows from their acts due to her particular vulnerability'.[235] The evidence before the Tribunal was unequivocal. That Ms Arias was in fact treated differently from others in a similar situation and that her young age was a particular factor in the way she was treated and how she responded to sexual harassment. This evidence should make a difference to liability in the first place because it shows on what grounds discrimination occurred and why it was wrong. Instead, intersectionality was simply added to the determination of damages to increase the amount payable. Such a treatment of intersectionality tells a cautionary tale against treating intersectionality as simply a matter of aggravated indemnification.

The second issue is whether the remedies, whatever they may be—damages, compensation, penalties, declarations, injunctions, interdicts, or reasonable accommodation—should relate only to the claimant and those in her position or if they should be conceived widely and relate to the disadvantaged groups more broadly? An adequate response to intersectional discrimination should address, for example, the Dalit women's unique position of disadvantage defined by sex and [233] Jumard (n 222) [49] ('It may be, for example, that a tribunal takes the view that the injury to feelings in, say, a case of race and disability discrimination is not materially different from the injury that would have been experienced had it been race alone.').

[234] Rogers v American Airlines, Inc 527 F Supp 229 (1981) (United States District Court, Southern Division New York); Hollins v Atlantic Company, Inc 188 F 3d 652 (6th Cir 1999) (USCA); Cooper v American Airlines 149 F 3d 1167 (4th Cir 1998) (USCA). See, for an excellent reflection on this, Paulette M Caldwell, 'A Hair Piece: Perspectives on the Intersection of Race and Gender' (1991) Duke Law Journal 365.

[235] 2003 HRTO 1, 41.

caste, but it should also address the forms of sexism and casteism they suffer and share with upper-caste women and Dalit men respectively. This global approach to remedies may seem self-evident in the way intersectional discrimination is defined—as both similar to and different from discrimination based on individual grounds. Obvious as it seems, claims which have had remedies designed, keeping in mind both the specific claimant as well as her relationships with other disadvantaged groups, are predominantly those in international law.[236] Communications decided by the CEDAW Committee are representative of this global approach and provide useful guidance for domestic courts and international bodies alike.

In Alyne v Brazil,[237] the author's daughter, a Black woman, had died in the absence of adequate emergency services for pregnant women in Brazil. The CEDAW Committee ordered the state government to provide appropriate reparation, including adequate compensation to the author. In addition, the Committee issued a range of general recommendations, such as mandating the state to provide adequate, accessible, and affordable emergency obstetric care to all women and ensuring the enforcement of their right to reproductive health with access to adequate remedies and sanctions. The state was also directed more broadly to reduce preventable maternal deaths through programmatic and policy interventions. The only thing lacking in these recommendations was an appreciation of intersectionality in the general recommendations, thus speaking not only to all women broadly, but specifically to the intersectional group of Black and racial minority women in Brazil. This was important because the specific violation in Alyne was intersectional in that the author's pregnant daughter was at the receiving end of poor obstetric care not only because the quality, availability, and timeliness of these services was generally low, but because African women and women of colour who were also socio-economically disadvantaged were perhaps worse off than others in all these respects. Thus, sex, race, and socio-economic background had specifically 'contributed to the failure to provide necessary and emergency care to [the author's] daughter, resulting in her death'.[238] Given this finding, it would have been appropriate not only to provide for specific damages and compensation to be made to the author but also to design the recommendations so as to address the specific [236] In addition to the specific claimant (say, a Black woman), courts may extend relief to the specific subgroup to which the claimant belongs (all Black women). The contention is that there may be a legitimate case for extending relief to even broader groups like white women and Black men, that is, those with whom the claimant shares some disadvantage based on sex and race respectively. This is a relatively uncontentious proposition for single-axis claims. For example, the South African Constitutional Court has consistently remarked that '[c]entral to a consideration of the interests of justice in a particular case is that successful litigants should obtain the relief they seek. . . In principle too, the litigants before the Court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants' (S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso 1996 (1) SA 388 (SACC)). Reaffirmed in Bhe (n 5) and Hassam (n 6).

[237] Alyne da Silva Pimentel Teixeira v Brazil, CEDAW Committee, Communication No 17/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/49/D/17/2008 (views adopted on 25 July 2011).

[238] Ibid [7.7].

disadvantages faced by women of colour from socio-economically disadvantaged backgrounds. Because intersectional claimants suffer differently, it is important for this difference to be reflected in remedies. Intersectional claims should therefore attract remedies which provide relief not only for the individual claimant (a socio-economically disadvantaged African woman) but also those in her position (other socio-economically disadvantaged African women) and other possible disadvantaged groups who share her disadvantage in some way (all women).

The CEDAW Committee has been able to issue recommendations in later decisions which are global in both this general and particular way. Thus, in Kell v Canada,[239] the CEDAW Committee made two sets of recommendations, first, concerning the author, for the state to provide her with adequate housing and commensurate damages for the violation of her right to non-discrimination as an aboriginal woman, and second, concerning aboriginal women more broadly, for the state to recruit and train legal aid officers and to review the legal aid system to ensure that aboriginal women who were victims of domestic violence had effective access to justice.[240] The facts of this case were narrowly confined to the particular legal strictures which affected aboriginal women. But where facts have been more easily relatable to women generally, the Committee has made recommendations relating to all women, such as in Jallow v Bulgaria, where it extended its recommendations to preventing domestic violence in respect of all 'women victims of domestic violence, in particular migrant women'.[241]

This brings us to the final point about remedies in intersectional discrimination: that they should be structural in nature. The point about not having intersectional discrimination indemnified at a higher rate necessarily and the point about making remedies holistic is the same. It is to insist that remedies in intersectional discrimination be constructed as complementing the nature of intersectional discrimination specifically. Remedies that complement intersectional discrimination are inevitably those which reflect the complex structure of intersectional discrimination, which is, after all, about sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage. This structural make-up of intersectionality should be reflected not only in respect of the type of remedy awarded (especially going beyond monetary indemnification) and in relation to whom it is awarded (the claimant, those in her position, and the broader disadvantaged groups to whom she belongs) but also in the way remedies are designed and ordered.

Structural remedies go beyond monetary relief and directly attack the structures of disadvantage which lead to a breach of equality and non-discrimination guarantees. They are inevitably more elaborate than a mere dollar figure and more reflexive in terms of relating to the particular structures of disadvantage at stake in each case. They thus require some effort in being designed. The South African Constitutional Court's painstaking work in Bhe is a good example of where it was easier to find for unfair discrimination against Black and African women, and women governed by customary law, than to address 'the most difficult aspect . . . the issue of remedy'.[242] According to Langa DCJ, the decision that the customary law of inheritance was unconstitutional opened at least four courses of action for the Court:

[239] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 19/2008, UN Doc CEDAW/C/51/D/19/2008 (views adopted on 28 February 2012).
[240] Ibid [11].
[241] CEDAW Committee, Communication No 32/2011, UN Doc CEDAW/C/52/D/32/2011 (views adopted on 23 July 2012).

> (a) whether the Court should simply strike the impugned provisions down and leave it to the legislature to deal with the gap that would result as it sees fit; (b) whether to suspend the declaration of invalidity of the impugned provisions for a specified period; (c) whether the customary law rules of succession should be developed in accordance with the 'spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights'; or (d) whether to replace the impugned provisions with a modified section 1 of the Intestate Succession Act or with some other order.[243]

The first option was impractical. Those governed by customary law could not simply be left in a vacuum without any provision governing intestate succession.[244] The second option was unfair. Those whose rights were infringed could not continue being governed by a discriminatory regime in the hope that the legislature would rectify their situation.[245] The third option was inappropriate. The Court found itself ill-placed to ascertain the exact content of the customary law to develop per the mandate of Section 39(2) of the Constitution.[246] The process of judicial development of customary law in line with the Bill of Rights was considered too slow and piecemeal given that it would depend on individual cases which came up before the courts and thus would not be 'sufficient to guarantee the constitutional protection of the rights of women and children in the devolution of intestate estates'.[247] Thus, the Court considered it best to leave it for the legislature to rectify the discrimination in the long run. But, in the interim, the Court was left to 'fashion an effective and comprehensive order that will be operative until appropriate legislation is put in place'.[248] This was essentially the fourth option: to replace the customary law of succession with that of the civil law of succession under the Intestate Succession Act. Although better than the other courses, this choice was still problematic. It did not entirely take into account the position of women in polygynous

[242] Bhe (n 5) [101].
[243] Ibid [105] (citation omitted).
[244] Ibid [107].
[245] Ibid [108].
[246] The provision states: 'When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights.'
[247] Bhe (n 5) [113].
[248] Ibid [116].

customary marriages since that was not a subject of civil law; it would also not have accommodated complex relationships in extended families which were common in a customary environment, and would have possibly had a negative impact upon vulnerable groups such as poor rural women.[249] The Court took all these objections on board. While it was slow to extend the relief to those whose interests were not heard or represented, it was clear that the relief could not be limited to women in monogamous marriages alone and must, in order to avoid creating further inequalities, protect those in polygynous marriages. The Court further explained how this would affect the order of inheritance of children from multiple spouses if they had to inherit under the civil law system.[250] Its final order reflected all these general principles, effectively replacing the customary law of succession with appropriately modified civil law. The order ultimately declared the claimants in the case, the women who brought the claim, as heirs, and took care of any future claims of intestate succession until the legislature enacted a suitable law. By this point, the Court had given all the indicators to the legislature for designing such a law which was transformative, not piecemeal, in reforming the customary law of inheritance.

Bhe's consideration of remedy was complex and extensive. What lies at the core of the Court's approach is the understanding that the remedy had to be the one that was most effective in actually relieving the condition of the claimants and those in their position as women governed by customary law. Remedying their situation involved a commitment to appreciating the historical traditions of the African communities, the civil regime of intestate succession, and the constitutional provisions which governed both. The complex details of these matters and their extensive consideration is what comes to define the Court's structural approach to remedy, which goes beyond the determination of the rights of the parties alone. It is both the approach to and the nature of remedy as structural which is truly befitting of intersectionality.

Bhe is a rare example of this.[251] Structural remedies are often left to equality bodies and human rights commissions or the governments and the legislatures. The tort-like adjudicatory model of discrimination law has been largely limited to individual-centred relief, with declaratory and monetary remedies ruling the roost. This model has inevitably failed to make a real dent in intersectional discrimination, which is structural in nature. Yet, if we assume the normative

[249] Ibid [118].

[250] Ibid [125] ('First, a child's share would be determined by having regard to the fact that there is more than one surviving spouse. Second, provision should be made for each surviving spouse to inherit the minimum if there is not enough in the estate. Third, the order must take into account the possibility that the estate may not be enough to provide the prescribed minimum to each of the surviving spouses. In that event, all the surviving spouses should share what is in the estate equally.').

[251] Hassam (n 6) reaffirmed much of the Bhe (n 5) analysis in relation to retrospectivity but was a far simpler case in terms of the remedy, that is reading-in the word 'spouse' in the Intestate Succession Act as including spouses of Muslim polygamous marriages.

positions offered in this book, recalibrating the entire apparatus of discrimination law by adjusting each of the individual cogwheels in the apparatus, structural remedies may not elude us after all when we come to them. This is because, once we update our understanding of discrimination as one which includes the category of intersectional discrimination inspired by intersectionality theory, we are immediately abreast of the complex structures of disadvantage which cause such discrimination. The appreciation of this complexity is at the heart of intersectional discrimination. Once we know the structures which lead to intersectional discrimination, in terms of the 'patterns of group disadvantage' we have spoken of so far, there is no bar in designing remedies which speak to these structures directly in terms of limiting and eventually eliminating them. In fact, once justices become attuned to intersectionality, even the adjudicatory model of discrimination may have real potential to become an effective site for fighting intersectional discrimination because of its keen diagnostic purpose of learning the basis of discrimination as residing in multiple grounds and the nature of such discrimination. The diagnostic purpose of discrimination law has something quite pointed and unique to offer in terms of understanding both precisely and comprehensively what intersectional discrimination really looks like in specific instances. It provides a genuine opportunity not only to understand intersectional discrimination this way but, because of this understanding, to conceive of ways to help dismantle the structures through which it comes about. Re-centering discrimination law around this diagnostic purpose and around intersectionality may thus ultimately help design meaningful structural remedies, as the South African Constitutional Court did in Bhe.

There are, no doubt, limitations to what courts can do in this respect given that they are limited by the individual and often narrow cases with which they are presented. Issues of individual justice, timeliness, costs, retrospective nature of relief, restrictions on deciding matters actually litigated, and even expertise and knowledge of broader socio-economic, cultural, and political contexts define the remedial reach of courts. These are limitations of design which cannot be studied here. That is a project for another book. For this project, it is important not to underestimate the normative dimensions of discrimination law as laid down in constitutional and legislative texts and enforced by courts. If these dimensions are reformed to include intersectionality, we activate the possibility of finding for intersectional discrimination. What that means in real terms is that an intersectional claimant may succeed in obtaining relief. Given the history of resistance to intersectional claims, this result in itself would be a significant victory. The hope is that each instance of intersectional discrimination not only obtains its due relief, but also opens up transformative opportunities to truly understand and remedy intersectional discrimination as more than the isolated or discrete instances which come up before the courts.

Conclusion

We return to the imagery of discrimination law as a complex apparatus of interconnected cogwheels. The image reminds us of the co-dependent nature of all cogs. The functioning of the apparatus is thus dependent on each of the individual cogs working independently and simultaneously. This is what this chapter has shown: that each of the concepts and tools invoked in discrimination law doctrine will have to be individually recalibrated with respect to intersectionality for a claim of intersectional discrimination to succeed.

However, the consideration of each of the cogs or concepts discretely may give the impression that they have an autonomous existence of their own. Far from it. None of these transpire on their own and are often too entangled in discrimination claims. Thus, for example, the exercise in determining the relevant grounds may coincide with the classification of the claim as direct or indirect discrimination, which may in turn be determined by comparators and may eventually all be answered through the substantive test of discrimination applied by a court. Questions of evidence, burden of proof, and level of scrutiny may or may not even feature very distinctly or at all. This much is clear from reading any case of intersectional discrimination, whether a successful one like Hassam or a potential one like Gosselin. Key concepts of discrimination are all fused together in actual discrimination cases.

The purpose of disentangling these concepts was to show that, despite such eventual fusion, there is an independent content to each concept, and understanding it helps us understand what it does in intersectional claims. The risk in not disentangling concepts has been that intersectional claims have simply failed within the grand scheme of discrimination law and we have known in no comprehensive detail why that has been the case. While we have known something about why intersectional claims fail, either conceptually or doctrinally, taking apart actual cases of discrimination law in the format of the last two chapters gives us a concrete sense of the reasons for such failure, and, also, for the modest successes. This understanding helped us develop the normative positions adopted in the chapter in respect of each of the concepts. It is useful to reiterate the positions here. The hope is that these will help recalibrate the apparatus of discrimination law in such a way that it can process a claim of intersectional discrimination successfully.

First, the possibility of redressing intersectionality in discrimination law resides in the interpretation of equality and non-discrimination guarantees as signifying the causal basis of discrimination in certain grounds or personal characteristics. There is no reason why the causal basis of discrimination needs to be limited to a single ground. Even the most unwieldy constitutional and legislative provisions can and should be interpreted as including the prohibition of discrimination based on multiple grounds.

Secondly, and on a related note, it is important not to limit the possible grounds of discrimination to those enumerated or otherwise recognized in law but to develop the criteria for or ways of reading-in analogous grounds, which are far more representative of the intersectional disadvantage people suffer because of their identities. So, while it is useful to retain the idea of grounds in discrimination law because it explains what is distinctive about the field, it is also useful to have a broadly conceived test for identifying grounds.

Thirdly, intersectional discrimination may not necessarily be amenable to the categorization of direct or indirect discrimination developed for single-axis claims. It would be more helpful for intersectional claims to be understood not just in terms of grounds and their impact but to focus on the specific relationship between the criteria of discrimination (which may or may not be neutral), the grounds of discrimination (which may or may not coincide with the criteria), and the impact of such discrimination in terms of the specific disadvantages it leads to.

Fourthly, like the grounds of discrimination, the substantive test for discrimination should be broadly conceived so that it is able to catch the specific disadvantages associated with grounds, especially when they intersect. Most tests for discrimination are well capable of capturing intersectional disadvantage if interpreted inclusively, but they need to be attuned to the specific form it takes.

In terms of actually proving intersectional discrimination, several things need to be considered. The comparator test, which is a heuristic devised to confirm the grounds of discrimination and/or whether there was any relative disadvantage or discrimination, may not always come in handy. In the way that comparison is popularly made (i.e. in strict or flexible forms), comparison not only proves to be unprincipled but also unhelpful when invoked in intersectional claims. Instead, fifthly, the South African approach to holistic and contextual comparisons provides both a principle for the selection of comparators and a purpose for deploying the comparators, in terms of appreciating the nature of intersectional discrimination residing in sameness and difference in patterns of group disadvantage.

Sixthly, it is important to segregate all these issues, which are issues of discrimination, from issues of justification. Intersectionality should not be used as a justification but treated as a form of discrimination itself. Otherwise, we run the risk of reinforcing the single-axis framework of discrimination where all discrimination which is based on more than one ground is not treated as problematic. The standard of review of the justification analysis should be attuned to phasing out intersectionality-based justifications.

Seventhly, evidentiary issues and the burden of proof should be evenly and fairly determined as between the parties at all stages of the discrimination analysis. A shifting burden of proof framework is necessary for intersectional claimants, who may otherwise bear an insurmountable burden in bringing in evidence which is neither accessible nor available to them. The purpose of all evidence for establishing an intersectional claim should be, either qualitatively and/or quantitatively, to explicate the nature of intersectional discrimination in terms of the same and different patterns of group disadvantage. As chapter 2 showed for Dalit women, these patterns are unique for every combination of characteristics and for each claimant in her own situation. A judge in a discrimination claim should use the evidence to unearth the distinct explanation of intersectional disadvantage in that claim.

Finally, remedies in intersectional claims should be determined on a case by case basis just as for any other claim. There is no good reason to think that intersectional claims can only be redressed through higher indemnification, as is popularly contended. But there are good reasons to contend that remedies should be structural, both in terms of their focus and design, and global with respect to the intersectional disadvantage they seek to redress. This is because, for intersectionality to truly be a part of discrimination law, the latter must embrace its transformative ideals, namely, for upturning the structures of disadvantage that intersectionality seeks to illuminate and thereby relieving everyone who is so disadvantaged.

Conclusion

This book sought to realize intersectionality in discrimination law. As the preceding chapters have shown, the road to this destination is a long one. The theoretical, conceptual, and doctrinal steps to be undertaken span the entire breadth of the discourses of both intersectionality and discrimination law. What becomes clear is that both intersectionality and discrimination law must be understood on their own terms, and then in relation to one another, to arrive at an account of intersectional discrimination. This account is primarily a juridical one, aimed at establishing a successful claim of intersectional discrimination before the courts. It is also aspirational in nature. It is trying to envision discrimination law—an apparatus conceived for single-axis discrimination—as amenable to intersectionality. Instead of having intersectionality unsuccessfully mould itself into the single-axis model, the project reimagines a fundamentally distinct mould for the category of intersectional discrimination.

This means remoulding the way in which inequalities or discrimination have been conceived until now. In the context of the hypothetical scenario visited in chapter 1, it means having Lord Phillips reimagine a fat Black man's claim as a claim of intersectional discrimination proper. When the shopkeeper said, 'I do not serve people like you', there were not one but two possibilities in characterizing the discrimination at hand. Discrimination in this case either could have been based on the man's race or weight. Or it could have been based on both the man's race and weight at the same time. In case of the latter, how would Lord Phillips have understood the nature of discrimination based on multiple grounds?

Intersectionality explains the nature of such discrimination. When considered as a whole and in its full context, defined in terms of history, region, time, circumstances, etc., discrimination against a fat Black man is based on patterns of group disadvantage which are not only similar to those experienced by corpulent persons and Black persons but also different from them and which are unique to those both corpulent and Black at the same time, such as the claimant. Thus, the disadvantage is both the same as and different from other patterns of group disadvantage. As chapter 2 argued, it is this dynamic relationship between sameness and difference, understood as a whole and in its full and relevant context, that explains the nature of disadvantage at play in Lord Phillips' hypothetical scenario. Intersectionality would thus have allowed Lord Phillips to both acknowledge and understand discrimination which goes beyond the single-axis model.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

But, in going beyond strictly single-axis discrimination, Lord Phillips may have encountered several categories of thinking about multi-ground discrimination including substantial, capacious, and contextual forms of single-axis discrimination, multiple discrimination, additive (as in combination or compound) discrimination, and embedded discrimination. In order to make sense of the category of intersectional discrimination, he would have needed to have distinguished between these categories as distinct from the qualitative understanding of intersectional discrimination defined qua intersectionality. This exercise, undertaken in chapter 3, further clarifies the conceptual sphere of intersectional discrimination as a distinct category of discrimination per se.

Despite such theoretical and conceptual clarity, there still would be no sure-fire route to translating this understanding into the doctrine of discrimination law. In fact, the entire apparatus of discrimination law would have to be recalibrated to accommodate this understanding of the nature of intersectional discrimination against a fat Black man. A constitutional or statutory guarantee of non-discrimination would have to be interpreted as prohibiting such discrimination based on multiple grounds and understood in the particular way that intersectionality proposes. Grounds of discrimination would have to be chosen such that an unenumerated ground like weight could be recognized as the basis of discrimination. This means going beyond traditional frames of recognizing grounds as based on either immutability or fundamental choice, and instead relating to a broader set of factors which speak to forms of disadvantage associated with a particular characteristic or identity such as weight or physical appearance. This entails widening the conception of what disadvantage or discrimination itself is. Most substantive tests of discrimination—whether in the form of impairment of dignity or autonomy, or entrenchment of stereotypes, prejudices, etc.—have the capacity to explain what is wrong about a shopkeeper refusing to serve a fat Black man because he is a fat Black man. However, such disadvantage or discrimination need not necessarily be reduced to direct or indirect discrimination given that the divide between the two is strained and artificial in intersectional cases. What matters instead is to trace the relationship between the criteria, grounds, and impact of discrimination in specific detail. In the same vein, applying too strict or too flexible a form of comparison may not help in determining either the grounds or the nature of intersectional discrimination. A holistic and contextual use of all the available comparators may yet assist in establishing intersectional discrimination before courts. Matters relating to the burden of proof, standard of review, justification analysis, and remedies are more typical and require careful unravelling in each jurisdiction to truly 'get' intersectionality in a discrimination claim. Chapter 4 considered the nitty gritty of each of these.

The takeaway is that Lord Phillips would have to thoroughly fine-tune his understanding of discrimination law to reflect the specific ways in which each of its central concepts could respond to intersectionality. With all these manoeuvres, if he did end up finding for the fat Black man, he would have accomplished what few justices have. The rarity of successful claims of intersectional discrimination should give us a sobering idea of the urgency of intersectionality as a juridical project. Because people are intersectionally discriminated against, it is high time to make discrimination law address that discrimination, thirty years after Crenshaw's first intervention in 1989.

Transforming discrimination law this way would be an extraordinary feat for intersectional claimants. That, though, will not itself fulfil intersectionality's transformative ambitions for seeing a radical and substantial change in the way inequalities are created and reproduced. Discrimination law is, after all, a clunky apparatus of such social transformation. I have acknowledged it before and must do so again: the limitations of discrimination law—in terms of its ex-post tort-like adjudicatory model of justice with highly technical concepts like grounds, comparison, direct and indirect discrimination, justification, etc.—circumscribe its potential as a site for realizing intersectionality in totality. There are other sites, and radical transformation will only come about when they are actively co-engaged. Positive discrimination may be an obvious choice here. Affirmative action in the form of quotas or preferential treatment; reasonable accommodation; and positive action, like equality duties for fostering good relations, are certainly part of the broader project for discrimination law and are considered suitably influential in addressing intersectionality.[1] Human rights law, beyond the right to equality and non-discrimination, is also considered to be a viable tool for addressing violations which are intersectional in nature. This is specifically true of the UN treaty body jurisprudence which draws an explicit link between rights and their realization on an equal basis with others and without any discrimination.[2] Social movements and praxis too have contributed tremendously to mobilizing and mainstreaming intersectional frames of thinking and effecting social change.[3] This project is thus a small but significant part of the broader transformative project of intersectionality. A few parting remarks may help underscore that.

This project is but small within the field of intersectionality studies, which, we must acknowledge, is a vast one. It is too rich and diverse to be consolidated in one project. This is especially relevant when coming up with a 'definition' of intersectionality. I said in chapter 2 that intersectionality cannot be defined in a single stroke. Instead, what I have tried to do is to pick the strands that I think have been central to intersectionality in the way it was initially set out by Crenshaw and in other seminal works in the last few decades. I am relying on the intellectual labour of others to arrive at a version of intersectionality that I consider to be salient for defining the category of intersectional discrimination in discrimination law. Similar sources may well lead others to define intersectionality differently for the purposes of discrimination law. Much like academic work on theories of justice, theories of human rights, and theories of discrimination law, intersectionality theory is a broad church and may have many versions or justificatory accounts that contribute to the development of the field of discrimination law. This is just one such bid for translating intersectionality into discrimination law.

[1] See Sandra Fredman, 'Positive Rights and Duties: Addressing Intersectionality' in Dagmar Schiek and Victoria Chege (eds), European Union Non-Discrimination Law: Comparative Perspectives on Multidimensional Equality Law (Routledge Cavendish 2008); Andrea Krizsan, Hege Skjeie, and Judith Squires (eds), Institutionalizing Intersectionality: The Changing Nature of European Equality Regime (Palgrave 2012); Mieke Verloo, 'Intersectionality and Positive Action' (2015) 2 Journal of Diversity and Gender Studies 45.

[2] Gautheir de Beco, 'Protecting the Invisible: An Intersectional Approach to International Human Rights Law' (2017) 17 Human Rights Law Review 633; Ivona Truscan and Joanna Bourke-Martignoni, 'International Human Rights Law and Intersectional Discrimination' (2016) 16 Equal Rights Review 103.

[3] The literature in this field is vast, but see, for example, Sharon Doetsch-Kidder, Social Change and Intersectional Activism: The Spirit of Social Movement (Palgrave Macmillan 2012).

If there are any universalizing tendencies appearing in this project, they should be read down. For one, the account of intersectional discrimination suggested here should not be seen as the archetype of discrimination. It cannot replace other categories of thinking about discrimination, including single-axis discrimination. Not all discrimination is intersectional, even when suffered by those intersectionally disadvantaged, such as groups of Dalit women and Black women. They, too, may sometimes be discriminated against specifically on the basis of race, caste, gender, or poverty alone. It is only when multiple strands of inequality do seem to be relevant that we should turn to intersectionality. We would have to be exceptionally clear about which patterns of disadvantage lead to discrimination in actually categorizing discrimination as intersectional or single-axis.

That said, there are good reasons to see all multi-ground discrimination as basically intersectional. That is, when multiple grounds are implicated in a claim, as seen in chapter 3, it may best be understood in terms of intersectionality and characterized as intersectional discrimination. That is because there is no other way of both clearly and comprehensively getting to grips with the nature of discrimination, when multiple identities are involved, than to see it as transpiring as a matter of similar and different patterns of group disadvantage based on those multiple identities considered as a whole and in their full context. Any other way of categorizing such discrimination (substantially, capaciously, or contextually single-axis, multiple, additive, or embedded) misses something of this complete way of looking at discrimination. To serve the diagnostic purpose of discrimination law, it is then useful to see discrimination as either single-axis or intersectional.

But it may also be significant to see that the account matters in an expressive sense, and not only in this diagnostic sense. In as much as courts end up ignoring intersectional discrimination and classifying it as anything but, they end up conveying an unsympathetic attitude towards it. Intersectional discrimination may be met with disbelief and even derision.[4] If judicial disposition and language matters,[5] it is important to challenge these attitudes and have justices show openness and empathy towards those suffering intersectional discrimination. This may have a considerable impact on how those severally and severely disadvantaged may view themselves and their position vis-à-vis the courts and the legal system. In this way, adjudication of intersectional discrimination may play a pivotal role in conveying a strong commitment to ending intersectional discrimination. A transformed future may not depend on this project alone, but it may certainly be enabled by a transformed discrimination law which takes intersectionality seriously enough to redress it.

[4] See, for example, the discussion with respect to Gosselin and Volks in chapter 4, section 4.2 on wrongful discrimination.

[5] Richard H McAdams, 'The Expressive Power of Adjudication' (2005) 5 University of Illinois Law Review 1043.

Bibliography

Ackermann L, Human Dignity: Lodestar for Equality in South Africa (Juta 2012)

Agnes F, 'From Shah Bano to Kausar Bano: Contextualizing the "Muslim Woman" Within a Communalized Polity' in Loomba A and Lukose RA (eds), South Asian Feminisms: Contemporary Interventions (DUP 2012)

Akerkar S, 'Theory and Practice of Women's Movement in India: A Discourse Analysis' (1996) 30(17) Economic and Political Weekly 2

Albertyn C and Goldblatt B, 'Facing the Challenge of Transformation: Difficulties in the Development of an Indigenous Jurisprudence of Equality' (1998) 14 South African Journal on Human Rights 248

Albertyn C and Kentridge J, 'Introducing the Right to Equality in the Interim Constitution' (1994) 10 South African Journal on Human Rights 149

Alexander L, 'What Makes Wrongful Discrimination Wrong? Biases, Preferences, Stereotypes, and Proxies' (1992) 141 University of Pennsylvania Law Review 149

Ambedkar BR, Annihilation of Caste (Verso 2016)

Arnardóttir OM, 'Non-discrimination Under Article 14 ECHR: The Burden of Proof' (1999–2012) 51 Scandinavian Studies in Law 13

Arnardóttir OM, 'Vulnerability under Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights: Innovation or Business as Usual?' (2017) 4 Oslo Law Review

Arriola ER, 'Gendered Inequality: Lesbians, Gays and Feminist Legal Theory' (1994) 9 Berkeley Women's Law Journal 103

Ashiagbor D, 'The Intersection Between Gender and Race in the Labour Market: Lessons for Anti-discrimination Law' in Morris A and O'Donnell T (eds), Feminist Perspectives on Employment Law (Cavendish 1999)

Atrey S, 'Lifting as We Climb: Recognising Intersectional Gender Violence in Law' (2015) 5 Oñati Socio-Legal Series 1512

Atrey S, 'Through the Looking Glass of Intersectionality: Making Sense of Indian Discrimination Jurisprudence Under Article 15' (2016) 16 Equal Rights Review 160

Atrey S, 'Fifty Years On: The Curious Case of Intersectional Discrimination in the ICCPR' (2017) 35 Nordic Journal of Human Rights 220

Atrey S, 'Comparison in Intersectional Discrimination' [2018] Legal Studies 379

Austin R, 'Sapphire Bound!' (1989) Wisconsin Law Review 539

Barak A, Proportionality: Constitutional Rights and their Limitations (CUP 2012)

Barnard C, Deakin S, and Morris GS (eds), The Future of Labour Law: Liber Amicorum Sir Bob Hepple (Hart 2004)

Bhagwat V, 'Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives—Some Critical Reflections' in Jogdand PG (ed), Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives (GPH 1995)

Bhatia G, The Transformative Constitution (HarperCollins 2019)

Bhavnani K and Bywater K, 'Dancing on the Edge: Women, Culture, and a Passion for Change' in Bhavnani K, Foran J, Kurian PA, and Munshi D (eds), In on the Edges of Development: Cultural Interventions (Routledge 2009)

Botha H, 'Equality, Plurality and Structural Power' (2009) 25 South African Journal on Human Rights 1

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

Brodsky G, 'Gosselin v Quebec (Attorney General): Autonomy with a Vengeance' (2003) 15 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 194
Brodsky G and Day S, 'Denial of the Means of Subsistence as an Equality Violation' [2005] Acta Juridica 149
Brodsky G, Cox R, Day S, and Stephenson K, 'Gosselin v. Quebec (Attorney General) (Women's Court of Canada)' (2006) 18 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 193
Butler J, Gender Trouble (Routledge 1990)
Caldwell K, 'We Exist: Intersectional In/Visibility in Bisexuality & Disability' (2010) 30 Disability Studies Quarterly
Caldwell PM, 'A Hair Piece: Perspectives on the Intersection of Race and Gender' (1991) Duke Law Journal 365
Carastathis A, Intersectionality: Origins, Contestations, Horizons (University of Nebraska Press 2016)
Carbado DW, Crenshaw KW, Mays VM, and Tomilson B, 'Intersectionality: Mapping the Movements of a Theory' (2013) 10 Du Bois Review 303
Carbado DW and Gulati M, Acting White? Rethinking Race in "Post-Racial" America (OUP 2013)
Castillo RAH, 'The Emergence of Indigenous Feminism in Latin America' (2010) 35 Signs 539
Chakravarti U, Gendering Caste: Through a Feminist Lens (Stree 2003)
Chan C, 'Proportionality and Invariable Baseline Intensity of Review' (2013) 33 Legal Studies 1
Chege V, 'The European Union Anti-discrimination Directives and European Union Equality Law: The Case of Multi-dimensional Discrimination' (2012) 13 ERA Forum 275
Cho S, Crenshaw KM, and McCall L, 'Toward a Field of Intersectionality Studies: Theory, Applications, and Praxis' (2013) 38 Signs 785
Collins H, 'Discrimination, Equality and Social Inclusion' (2003) 66 Modern Law Review 16
Collins PH, Black Feminist Thought (2nd edn, Routledge 2009)
Collins PH and Bilge S, Intersectionality (Polity Press 2016)
Combahee River Collective, 'A Black Feminist Statement' in Nicholson L (ed), The Second Wave: A Reader in Feminist Theory (Routledge 1997)
Conaghan J, 'Intersectionality and the Feminist Project in Law' in Grabham E, Cooper D, Krishnadas J, and Herman D (eds), Intersectionality and Beyond: Law, Power and the Politics of Location (Routledge Cavendish 2009)
Constituent Assembly of India Debates, Vol III, 29 April 1947
Coogan-Gehr K, 'The Politics of Race in US Feminist Scholarship: An Archaeology' (2011) 37 Signs 83
Cook AE, 'Reflections on Postmodernism' (1992) 26 New England Law Review 751
Cooper AJ, A Voice from the South (OUP 1988)
Cooper D, 'Intersectional Travel through Everyday Utopias: The Difference Sexual and Economic Dynamics Make' in Grabham E, Cooper D, Krishnadas J, and Herman D (eds), Intersectionality and Beyond: Law, Power and the Politics of Location (Routledge Cavendish 2009)
Cowen S, 'Can "Dignity" Guide South Africa's Equality Jurisprudence?' (2001) 17 South African Journal on Human Rights 34
Craig P, Administrative Law (5th edn, Sweet & Maxwell 2003)
Crenshaw KW, 'Demarginalizing the Intersection of Race and Sex: A Black Feminist Critique of Antidiscrimination Doctrine, Feminist Theory and Antiracist Politics' (1989) University of Chicago Legal Forum 139

Crenshaw KW, 'Mapping the Margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Color' (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1241

Crenshaw KW, 'Postscript' in Lutz H, Vivar MTH, and Supik L (eds), Framing Intersectionality: Debates on a Multi-Faceted Concept in Gender Studies (Ashgate 2011)

Crenshaw KW, 'From Private Violence to Mass Incarceration: Thinking Intersectionally About Women, Race, and Social Control' (2012) 59 UCLA Law Review 1418

Datar C, 'Non-Brahmin Renderings of Feminism in Maharashtra: Is it a More Emancipatory Force?' (1999) 34(1) Economic and Political Weekly 2964

Davis AY, Women, Race and Class (Random House 1981)

Davis AY, 'Women of Color at the Center: Selections from the Third National Conference on Women of Color and the Law: Keynote Address' (1991) 43 Stanford Law Review 1175

de Beco G, 'Protecting the Invisible: An Intersectional Approach to International Human Rights Law' (2017) 17 Human Rights Law Review 633

Dietrich G, 'Dalit Movement and Women's Movements' in Rao A (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005)

Dixon R, 'The Supreme Court of Canada and Constitutional (Equality) Baselines' (2013) 50 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 637

Dhamoon RK, 'Considerations on Mainstreaming Intersectionality' (2011) 64 Political Research Quarterly 230

Dodek AM, 'Canada as Constitutional Exporter: The Rise of the "Canadian Model" of Constitutionalism' (2007) 36 Supreme Court Law Review 309

Doetsch-Kidder S, Social Change and Inter-sectional Activism: The Spirit of Social Movement (Palgrave Macmillan 2012)

Duclos N, 'Disappearing Women: Racial Minority Women in Human Rights Cases' (1993) 6 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 25

Dutt NK, Origin and Growth of Caste in India (vol 1, The Book Company 1931)

Eaton M, 'At the Intersection of Gender and Sexual Orientation: Towards a Lesbian Jurisprudence' (1994) 3 Southern California Review of Law and Women's Studies 183

Eidelson B, 'Treating People as Individuals' in Hellman D and Moreau S (eds), Philosophical Foundations of Discrimination Law (OUP 2013)

Ehrenreich N, 'Subordination and Symbiosis: Mechanisms of Mutual Support between Subordinating Systems' (2002) 71 UMKC Law Review 251

Ely JH, Democracy and Distrust (HUP 1980)

Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, Compliance Manual, ch 15 <https://www.eeoc.gov/policy/docs/race-color.html> accessed 11 March 2019

Fiss O, 'Groups and the Equal Protection Clause' (1976) Philosophy and Public Affairs 107

Fraser N, 'From Redistribution to Recognition? Dilemmas of Justice in a "Post-Socialist" Age' (1997) I/222 New Left Review

Fraser N, 'A Rejoinder to Iris Young' (1997) I/223 New Left Review

Fredman S, 'Positive Rights and Duties: Addressing Intersectionality' in Schiek D and Chege V (eds), European Union Non-Discrimination Law: Comparative Perspectives on Multidimensional Equality Law (Routledge Cavendish 2008)

Fredman S, Discrimination Law (2nd edn, OUP 2011)

Fredman S, 'Emerging from the Shadows: Substantive Equality and Article 14 of the European Convention on Human Rights' (2016) 16 Human Rights Law Review 273

Fredman S and Alberytn C, 'Equality Beyond Dignity: Multi-dimensional Equality and Justice Langa's Judgments' (2015) Acta Juridica 430

Fredman S, 'Intersectional Discrimination in EU Gender Equality and Non-discrimination Law' (2016) European Commission <http://ohrh.law.ox.ac.uk/wordpress/wp-content/uploads/2016/07/Intersectional-discrimination-in-EU-gender-equality-and-non-discrimination-law.pdf> accessed 30 March 2019

Galanter M, 'The Religious Aspects of Caste: A Legal View' in Smith DE (ed), South Asian Politics and Religion (PUP 1966)

Gardner J, 'Discrimination as Injustice' (1996) 16 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 353

Gedalof I, Against Purity: Rethinking Identity with Indian and Western Feminisms (Taylor and Francis 1999)

Gilbert D, 'Time to Regroup: Rethinking Section 15 of the Charter' (2003) 48 McGill Law Journal 627

Gilbert D and Majury D, 'Critical Comparisons: The Supreme Court of Canada Dooms Section 15' (2006) 24 Windsor Year Book of Access to Justice 111

Glenn EN, 'The Social Construction and Institutionalization of Gender and Race: An Integrative Framework' in Ferree MM, Lorber J, and Hess BB (eds), Revisioning Gender (Sage 1998)

Goldberg SB, 'Discrimination by Comparison' (2011) 120 Yale Law Journal 728

Goldberg SB, 'Identity-based Discrimination and the Barriers to Complexity' in Schiek D and Lawson A (eds), European Union Non-Discrimination Law and Intersectionality (Ashgate 2011)

Government Equalities Office, 'Equality Bill: Assessing the Impact of a Multiple Discrimination Provision. A Discussion Document' (April 2009) <http://webarchive.nationalarchives.gov.uk/20100212235759/http://www.equalities.gov.uk/pdf/090422%20Multiple%20Discrimination%20Discussion%20Document%20Final%20Text.pdf> accessed 29 March 2019

Grillo T, 'Anti-Essentialism and Intersectionality: Tools to Dismantle the Master's House' (2013) 10 Berkley Women's Law Journal 16

Grzanka PR (ed), Intersectionality: A Foundations and Frontiers Reader (Westview 2014)

Guru G, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently' in Rao A (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005)

Hancock A, 'Intersectionality's will Toward Social Transformation' (2015) 37 New Political Science 620

Hancock A, An Intellectual History of Intersectionality (OUP 2016)

Hand J, 'Combined Discrimination - Section 14 of the Equality Act 2010: A Partial and Redundant provision?' [2011] Public Law 482

Hannett S, 'Equality at the Intersections: The Legislative and Judicial Failure to Tackle Multiple Discrimination' (2003) 23 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 65

Harris AP, 'Race and Essentialism in Feminist Legal Theory' (1990) 42 Stanford Law Review 581

Harris AP, 'The Jurisprudence of Reconstruction' (1994) 82 California Law Review 741

Hart HLA and Honoré T, Causation in the Law (2nd edn, OUP 1985)

Hellman D, When is Discrimination Wrong? (HUP 2008)

Hepple B, 'The Aims of Equality Law' (2012) 61 Current Legal Problems 1

hooks b, Feminist Theory: From Margin to Center (2nd edn, SEP 2000)

HL Deb 13 January 2010, vol 716, col 547

HM Treasury, 'The Plan for Growth' (March 2011) <https://assets.publishing.service.gov.uk/government/uploads/system/uploads/attachment_data/file/221514/2011budget_growth.pdf> accessed 30 March 2019

Hutchinson AC, 'Identity Crisis: The Politics of Interpretation' (1992) 26 New England Law Review 1173

Hutchinson D, 'Identity Crisis: Intersectionality, Multidimensionality, and the Development of an Adequate Theory of Subordination' (2000) 6 Michigan Journal of Race and Law 285

Iyer N, 'Categorical Denials: Equality Rights and the Shaping of Social Identity' (1993) 19 Queen's Law Journal 179

Jaising I, 'Gender Justice and the Supreme Court' in Kirpal BN et al (eds), Supreme But Not Infallible: Essays in Honour of the Supreme Court of India (OUP 2001)

Jagori Conference, 'A Brief Report Intersectionality: Knowing and Doing', available at <http://www.jagori.org/sites/default/files/publication/panel%20discussion%20on%20intersectionalities%2017th%20august%202015%20-%20report.pdf> accessed 1 June 2017

John ME, 'Intersectionality Rejection or Critical Dialogue?' (2015) 33(1) Economic and Political Weekly 72

Jondhale S, 'Theoretical Underpinnings of Emancipation of Dalit Women' in Jogdand PG (ed), Dalit Women in India: Issues and Perspectives (GPH 1995)

Jonker M, 'Comparators in Multiple Discrimination Cases: A Real Problem or Just a Theory?' in Brink M, Burri S, and Goldschmidt J (eds), Equality and Human Rights: Nothing But Trouble? (Utrecht University 2015)

Joseph S and Castan M, The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights: Cases, Commentary and Materials (OUP 2014)

Jung CG, Psyche and Symbol (de Laszlo VS (ed), Hull RFC (trans), PUP1958)

Kannabiran K, 'A Cartography of Resistance: The National Federation of Dalit Women' in Yuval-Davis N, Kannabiran K, and Vieten U (eds), The Situated Politics of Belonging (Sage 2006)

Kannabiran K, Tools of Justice: Non-Discrimination and the Indian Constitution (Routledge 2012)

Khaitan T, 'Beyond Reasonableness—A Rigorous Standard of Review for Article 15 Infringement' (2008) 50 Journal of the Indian Law Institute 177

Khaitan T, A Theory of Discrimination Law (OUP 2015)

King DK, 'Multiple Jeopardy, Multiple Consciousness: The Context of a Black Feminist Ideology' (1998) 14 Signs 42

Koshan J and Hamilton JW, 'The Continual Reinvention of Section 15 of the Charter' (2013) 64 University of New Brunswick Law Journal 19

Krizsan A, Skjeie H, and Squires J (eds), Institutionalizing Intersectionality: The Changing Nature of European Equality Regime (Palgrave 2012)

Krüger R, 'Equality and Unfair Discrimination: Refining the Harksen Test' (2011) 128 South African Law Journal 479

Kumar V, 'From Social Reform to Political Mobilisation: Changing Trajectory of Dalit Assertion in Uttar Pradesh' (2003) 53 Social Action 115

Kwan P, 'Complicity and Complexity: Cosynthesis and Praxis' (2000) 49 DePaul Law Review 673

Lacey N, 'From Individual to Group' in Hepple B and Szyszczak E (eds), Discrimination: The Limits of the Law (Mansell 1992)

Langa PS, 'Transformative Constitutionalism' (2006) 17 Stellenbosch Law Review 351

Leader S, 'Proportionality and the Justification of Discrimination' in Dine J and Watt B, Discrimination Law: Concepts, Limitations and Justifications (Longman 1996)

Liebenberg S, 'The Value of Human Dignity in Interpreting Socio-Economic Rights' (2005) 21 South African Journal on Human Rights 1

Loenen T, 'The Equality Clause in the South African Constitution: Some Remarks from a Comparative Perspective' (1997) 13 South African Journal on Human Rights 401

Lorde A, Sister Outsider: Essays and Speeches (Crossing Press 1984)

Lutz H, Vivar MTH, and Supik L (eds), Framing Intersectionality: Debates on a Multi-Faceted Concept in Gender Studies (Ashgate 2011)

Lykke N, Feminist Studies: A Guide to Intersectional Theory, Methodology and Writing (Routledge 2010)
MacKinnon CA, Feminism Unmodified: Discourses on Life and Law (HUP 1987)
MacKinnon CA, 'Problems, Prospects, and "Personal Laws" ' (2006) 4 International Journal of Constitutional Law 181
MacKinnon CA, 'Intersectionality as Method: A Note' (2013) 38 Signs 1019
Mahanta U, 'Social Movements in a Neo-Liberal Era' in Moksnes H and Melin M (eds), Global Civil Society: Shifting Powers in a Shifting World (UUP 2012)
Majury D, 'The Charter, Equality Rights, and Women: Equivocation and Celebration' (2002) 40 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 297
Matsuda M, 'When the First Quail Calls: Multiple Consciousness as Jurisprudential Method' (1989) 11 Women's Rights Law Reporter 7
May VM, Pursuing Intersectionality: Unsettling Dominant Imaginaries (Routledge 2015)
McAdams RH, 'The Expressive Power of Adjudication' (2005) 5 University of Illinois Law Review 1043
McCall L, 'The Complexity of Intersectionality' in Grzanka PR (ed), Intersectionality: A Foundations and Frontiers Reader (Westview 2014)
McCrudden C, 'A Common Law of Human Rights?: Transnational Judicial Conversations on Constitutional Rights' (2000) 20 Oxford Journal of Legal Studies 499
McFall L, 'Integrity' (1987) 98 Ethics 5
McIntyre S, 'The Supreme Court and Section 15: A Thin and Impoverished Notion of Judicial Review' (2006) 31 Queen's Law Journal 731
McRuer R, 'Compulsory Able-Bodiedness and Queer/Disabled Existence' in Davis LJ (ed), The Disability Studies Reader (2nd edn, Routledge 2006)
Mehta P, 'Dalit Feminism at Home and in the World' in Barbara Molony and Jennifer Nelson (eds), Women's Activism and "Second Wave" Feminism: Transnational Histories (Bloomsbury 2017)
Menon N, 'Is Feminism about 'Women'? A Critical View on Intersectionality from India' (2015) 50(17) Economic and Political Weekly 37
Monaghan K, 'Multiple and Intersectional Discrimination in EU Law' (2012) 13 European Anti-discrimination Law Review 20
Monture-Angus P, Thunder in My Soul: A Mohawk Woman Speaks (Fernwood 1995)
Monture-Angus P, 'Ka-Nin-Geh-Heh-Gah-E-Sa-Nonh-Yah-Gah' in The Chilly Collective (eds), Breaking Anonymity: The Chilly Climate for Women Faculty (Wilfrid Laurier 1995)
Moon G, 'Multiple Discrimination: Justice for the Whole Person' (2009) 2 Journal of the European Roma Rights Centre 5
Moon M and Pawar U, Amihihi Itihaas Ghadawila: Ambedakari Chatatitil Streeyancha Sahabhag (Stree 1989)
Morales R, 'I Am What I Am' in Moraga C and Anzaldúa G (eds), In This Bridge Called My Back: Writings by Radical Women of Color (KTP 1983)
Moreau S, 'The Wrongs of Unequal Treatment' (2004) 54 University of Toronto Law Journal 291
Moreau S, 'What is Discrimination' (2010) 38 Philosophy and Public Affairs 143
Murphy Y, Hunt V, Zajicek AM, Norris AN, and Hamilton L, Incorporating Intersectionality in Social Work Practice, Research, Policy, and Education (NASWP 2009)
Nash JC, 'Re-thinking Intersectionality' (2008) 89 Feminist Review 1
Nussbaum M, Women and Human Development (CUP 2001)
Nussbaum M, 'India: Implementing Sex Equality Through Law' (2001) 2 Chicago Journal of International Law 49

Nussbaum M, 'India, Sex Equality, and Constitutional Law' in Baines B and Rubio-Marin R (eds), The Gender of Constitutional Jurisprudence (CUP 2005)

Omvedt G, 'The Downtrodden among the Downtrodden: An Interview with a Dalit Agricultural Labourer' in Rao A (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005)

'Only', Oxford English Dictionary <https://en.oxforddictionaries.com/definition/only> accessed 29 March 2019

Patil V, 'From Patriarchy to Intersectionality: A Transnational Feminist Assessment of How Far We've Really Come' (2013) 38 Signs 847

Pieterse M, 'Finding for the Applicant? Individual Equality Plaintiffs and Group-based Disadvantage' (2008) 24 South African Journal on Human Rights 397

Post R, 'Prejudicial Appearances: The Logic of American Antidiscrimination Law' (2000) 88 California Law Review 1

Pothier D, 'Connecting Grounds of Discrimination to Real People's Real Experiences' (2001) 13 Canadian Journal of Women and the Law 39

Puar JK, Terrorist Assemblages: Homonationalism in Queer Times (DUP 2007)

Rao A (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005)

Rawls J, A Theory of Justice (1st edn, OUP 1971)

Réaume DG, 'Of Pigeon Holes and Principles: A Reconsideration of Discrimination Law' (2002) 40 Osgoode Hall Law Journal 113

Réaume DG, 'Discrimination and Dignity' (2003) 63 Louisiana Law Review 1

Réaume DG, 'The Relevance of Relevance to Equality Rights' (2006) 31 Queen's Law Journal 696

Rege S, 'Dalit Women Talk Differently: A Critique of "Difference" and Towards a Dalit Feminist Standpoint Position' (1998) 33(44) Economic and Political Weekly 39

Rege S, ' "Real Feminism" and Dalit Women: Scripts of Denial and Accusation' (2000) 35(6) Economic and Political Weekly 492

Rege S, 'A Dalit Feminist Standpoint' in Rao A (ed), Gender and Caste: Issues in Contemporary Indian Feminism (Kali for Women 2005)

Risman B, 'Gender as a Social Structure: Theory Wrestling with Activism' (2004) 18 Gender and Society 429

Rivers R, 'Proportionality and Variable Intensity of Review' (2006) 65 Cambridge Law Journal 174

Sachs A, 'Equality Jurisprudence: The Origin of Doctrine in the South African Constitutional Court' (1999) 5 Review of Constitutional Studies 76

Salem S, 'Feminist Critique and Islamic Feminism: The Question of Intersectionality' (2013) 1 The Postcolonialist

Sarkar R and Sarkar A, 'Dalit Politics in India: Recognition without Redistribution' (2016) 51 Economic and Political Weekly 14

Scales-Trent J, 'Black Women and the Constitution: Finding our Place, Asserting our Rights' (1989) 24 Harvard Civil Rights-Civil Liberties Law Review 9

Sen A, Inequality Reexamined (HUP 1992)

Sen A, Development as Freedom (OUP 1999)

Sen S, 'Motherhood and Mothercraft: Gender and Nationalism in Bengal' (1993) 5(2) Gender and History 231

Shinde T, 'A Comparison between Women and Men: An Essay to Show Who's Really Wicked and Immoral, Women or Men?' in O'Hanlon R, A Comparison between Women and Men: Tarabai Shinde and the Critique of Gender Relations in Colonial India (OUP 1994)

Smith B (ed), Home Girls: A Black Feminist Anthology (RUP 2000)
Solanke I, 'Putting Race and Gender Together: A New Approach to Intersectionality' (2009) 72 Modern Law Review 723
Solanke I, 'Infusing the Silos in the Equality Act 2010 with Synergy' (2011) 20 Industrial Law Journal 336
Solanke I, Discrimination as Stigma: A Theory of Anti-discrimination Law (Hart 2016)
Spelman E, Inessential Woman: Problems of Exclusion in Feminist Thought (Women's Press 1990)
Subramaniam M, The Power of Women's Organizing: Gender, Caste and Class in India (Lexington Books 2006)
Sunstein CR, 'The Anticaste Principle' (1994) 92 Michigan Law Review 2410
Timmer A, 'Toward an Anti-Stereotyping Approach for the European Court of Human Rights' (2011) 11 Human Rights Law Review 719
Tobler C, 'Remedies and Sanctions in EU Non-Discrimination Law' (2005) European Commission <https://publications.europa.eu/en/publication-detail/-/publication/d5dce8b8-09ee-4399-acf4-08bfdf8e1cd4> accessed 30 March 2019
Truscan I and Bourke-Martignoni J, 'International Human Rights Law and Intersectional Discrimination' (2016) 16 Equal Rights Review 103
Truth S, 'Woman's Rights' in Guy-Sheftall B (ed), Words of Fire: An Anthology of African-American Feminist Thought (New Press 1995)
United Nations Committee on the Elimination of Discrimination Against Women, General Recommendation No 28: Core Obligations of States Parties Under Article 2, UN Doc CEDAW/W/C/GC/28 (2010)
United Nations Committee on the Rights of Persons with Disabilities, General Comment No 6 on equality and non-discrimination, UN Doc CRPD/C/GC/6 (2018)
United Nations Human Rights Committee, CCPR General Comment No 28: Article 3 (The Equality of Rights Between Men and Women) UN Doc CCPR/C/21/Rev.1/Add.10 (2000)
United Nations Secretary-General, 'Integrating the Gender Perspective into the Work of United Nations Human Rights Treaty Bodies', Report, 14–18 September 1998, HRI/MC/1998/6
Valdes F, 'Sex and Race in Queer Legal Culture: Ruminations on Identities & Inter-Connectivities' (1995) 5 Southern California Law Review and Women's Studies 25
Verloo M, 'Intersectionality and Positive Action' (2015) 2 Journal of Diversity and Gender Studies 45
Wesson M, 'Discrimination Law and Social Rights: Intersections and Possibilities' (2007) 13 Juridica International 74
Widiss DA, 'Griggs at Midlife' (2015) 113 Michigan Law Review 993 (2015)
Wing KW, 'Brief Reflections toward a Multiplicative Theory and Praxis of Being' (1991) 6 Berkley Women's Law Journal 181
Wing KW, (ed), Critical Race Feminism: A Reader (2nd edn, NYUP 2003)
Yoshida K, 'Towards Intersectionality in the European Court of Human Rights: The Case of B.S. v Spain' (2013) 21 Feminist Legal Studies 195
Yoshino K, 'Covering' (2002) 111 Yale Law Journal 769
Yoshino K, Covering: The Hidden Assault on Our Civil Rights (Random House 2006)
Young IM, Justice and the Politics of Difference (PUP 1990)
Young IM, 'Gender as Seriality: Thinking about Women as a Social Collective' (1994) 19 Signs 713
Young IM, 'Unruly Categories: A Critique of Nancy Fraser's Dual Systems Theory' (1997) I/222 New Left Review
Yuval-Davis N, 'What is 'Transversal Politics'?' (1999) 12 Soundings 9

Index

Note: For the benefit of digital users, indexed terms that span two pages (e.g., 52–53) may, on occasion, appear on only one of those pages.

Intersectional Discrimination. Shreya Atrey, Oxford University Press (2019). © Shreya Atrey
DOI: 10.1093/oso/9780198848950.001.0001

1. Republic of South Africa.—The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:

(a) Human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.

(b) Non-racialism and non-sexism.

(c) Supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law.

(d) Universal adult suffrage, a national common voters roll, regular elections and a multi-party system of democratic government, to ensure accountability, responsiveness and openness.

2054

NANHRI & SAHRC

IN - COUNTRY MEETING ON SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY AND EXPRESSION

Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
NANHRI
RINADH
Réseau des Institutions Nationales Africaines des Droits de l'Homme

south african human rights commission

Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
NANHRI RINADH
Réseau des Institutions Nationales Africaines des Droits de l'Homme

south african human rights commission

THE NETWORK OF AFRICAN NATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS INSTITUTIONS

&

THE SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION IN - COUNTRY MEETING ON SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY AND EXPRESSION

29 – 30 NOVEMBER 2017
JOHANNESBURG, SOUTH AFRICA

Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
NANHRI
RINADH
Réseau des Institutions Nationales Africaines des Droits de l'Homme

south african human rights commission

The Network of African National Human Rights Institutions (NANHRI)

The Network of African National Human Rights Institutions (NANHRI) is a not-for-profit- organization and regional umbrella body that brings together 44 National Human Rights Institutions (NHRIs) in Africa. NANHRI, whose Secretariat is based in Nairobi, Kenya, is registered under Kenyan laws as an independent legal entity. It has been operational since 2007.

The Network works towards the establishment and strengthening of the NHRIs in Africa. It also facilitates coordination and cooperation amongst NHRIs and links them with other key human rights actors at the regional and international level. It supports these institutions through capacity building to meet their objective of protecting and promoting human rights at the national level.

Vision

A continent with effective NHRIs; contributing to an enhanced human rights culture and justice for every African.

Mission

To support, through national, regional and international co-operation, the establishment and strengthening of NHRIs to more effectively undertake their mandate of human rights promotion, protection, monitoring and advocacy.

Values and Guiding Principles

To achieve its mission and vision, NANHRI is committed to the following: - Transparency, Accountability, Openness, Cooperation, Professionalism and Gender Equality

Website: www.nanhri.org
E-mail: info@nanhri.org
Facebook: Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
Twitter: @NANHRI40 #NANHRISOGIEProject

Published by:

The Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
2nd Floor, CVS Plaza,
Lenana Road
P.O Box 74359-00200
Nairobi-Kenya

Acknowledgement

The South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) and the Network of African National Human Rights Institutions (NANHRI) acknowledge the contribution of all individuals who assisted in the hosting of the In-Country Meeting on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression.

We wish to thank the Deputy Chairperson of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR), Commissioner Lawrence Mute, who also serves as the Special Rapporteur on the Right to Freedom of Expression, for his presence and informative contributions throughout the duration of the meeting. We further wish to thank the SAHRC Deputy Chairperson, Commissioner Priscilla Jana, for her continued support toward the expansion of SOGIE rights in South Africa, and Adv. Pansy Tlakula, former Chairperson of the ACHPR for sharing her thoughts and experience in advancing SOGIE rights on the continent.

We further express our gratitude and appreciation to all panelists and participants, emanating from civil society, government departments and Chapter 9 institutions, for their presentations and generous contributions toward the robust discussions that made the meeting successful.

Importantly, the SAHRC and NANHRI Secretariat would like to recognise and appreciate the efforts put in by their staff for organizing the meeting and producing this report.

NANHRI is a regional membership organization presently bringing together 44 African NHRIs. It works towards the establishment and strengthening of the NHRIs in Africa as well as to facilitate coordination and cooperation amongst and between them, and with other key human rights actors at the regional and international level. It also provides practical assistance and support to these institutions for them to meet their objective of protecting and promoting human rights within their jurisdictions.

Glenton Matthyse from Gender Dynamix said Religion plays a major role as to why LGBTI members are still discriminated against today

Ms Vernet Napo (right) from the Commission for Gender Equality, Dr Shanelle Van & Der Berg Pandelis Gregoriou (both SAHRC) as one of the panelists tackling SOGIE-based discrimination in South Africa.

Panelists presenting includes Sibongile Ndashe (second right) from the Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa, Wendy Isaack from Human Rights Watch and Carrie Shelver from Coalition of African Lesbians

TABLE OF CONTENTS

ACRONYMS

ACHPR	African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights
AU	African Union
CGE	Commission for Gender Equality
CAL	Coalition of African Lesbians
CSO	Civil Society Organisation
DoJ&CD	Department of Justice and Constitutional Development
GALA	Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action
GDx	Gender Dynamix
HRW	Human Rights Watch
ISLA	Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa
LGBT	Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender
NANHRI	Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
NHRI	National Human Rights Institution
NIS	National Intervention Strategy
NOC	National Operations Center
NTT	National Task Team
RRT	Rapid Response Task Team
SADC	Southern African Development Community
SAHRC	South African Human Rights Commission
SALC	Southern African Litigation Center
SAPS	South African Police Service
SOGIE	Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression

Executive Summary

In June 2011, the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC) adopted the first resolution on human rights, sexual orientation and gender identity, which was led by South Africa. Subsequently in May 2014, the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (ACHPR) adopted Resolution 275 on the 'Protection against Violence and other Human Rights Violations on the basis of their real or imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity'. In March 2016, the SAHRC co-hosted the first African Regional Seminar on Finding Practical Solutions to ending violence and discrimination based on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression (SOGIE). The Seminar culminated in the signing of the Declaration on Practical Solutions on Ending Violence and Discrimination against Persons Based on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression (Ekurhuleni Declaration). An important recommendation emanating from the Seminar was for National Human Rights Institutions (NHRIs) to utilise their mandate for monitoring, promoting and protecting human rights to develop plans of action to take the process forward in their respective countries beyond the Seminar.

Despite the constitutional recognition and statutory protections afforded to lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender and gender non-conforming (LGBT/GNC) persons in South Africa, LGBT/GNC persons continue to face numerous challenges, including gender or sexual orientation-based discrimination and hate crimes; difficulties accessing justice when these violations occur; and the prevalence of traditional gender roles which perpetuate stereotyping and marginalisation of vulnerable groups.

In response to these challenges, the SAHRC, in partnership with the Network for African National Human Rights Institutions (NANHRI), convened a meeting of over 50 delegates representing government departments, civil society stakeholders and Chapter 9 institutions, to address SOGIE-related issues in Johannesburg, South Africa.

Informed by the Ekurhuleni Declaration, the objectives of the meeting included:

- Documenting the country's progress and persisting challenges regarding SOGIE-related issues;
- Discussing societal and community based threats and challenges faced by LGBT / GNC persons;
- Encouraging a coordinated approach between government, Chapter 9 Institutions and civil society in responding to the discrimination and hate crimes experienced by persons with diverse sexual orientation, gender identity and expression;
- Identifying the main issues to be addressed in future to feed into the ongoing development of the SAHRC's strategy on SOGIE rights;
- The production of a report and the development of advocacy and educational materials; and
- Capacity building and sensitization training of different role players of their role in protecting the rights of LGBT / GNC persons in South Africa.

Key outcomes of the meeting, particularly as they relate to the SAHRC, include:

- Regional Interventions – The SAHRC should engage more robustly with regional bodies, including the ACHPR, African Union and NHRIs on the continent to further promote and protect the rights of LGBT / GNC individuals on the continent.
- Strategic Litigation and Complaints Handling – Beyond using litigation as a means of resolving individual complaints, the SAHRC should work closely with lawyers, social movements and civil society actors, working in both the domestic and regional contexts, to ensure that litigation interventions build on existing jurisprudence to further expand SOGIE rights.
- Policy Interventions and Research Outputs – The SAHRC should collaborate with civil society actors to ensure that a streamlined approach is adopted regarding policy interventions impacting on SOGIE rights. In addition, the SAHRC should proactively engage with civil society actors and academics to ensure that all SOGIE-related research reports and recommendations emanating therefrom are relevant and impactful toward the advancement of SOGIE rights.
- Criminal Justice – The SAHRC should actively engage with South African Police Service (SAPS) to fast-track the development of systems to disaggregate data required to monitor the investigation and resolution of SOGIE-based hate crimes.
- Sensitization Training – the SAHRC should actively engage in sensitization training with relevant State departments, including members of the judiciary, particularly with respect to how the use of language in behavior, policies and judgments can perpetuate the marginalisation and exclusion of LGBT / GNC persons.

Tashwill Esterhuizen from the SA Litigation Centre said during his presentation that members of the LGBTI although a small minority fall part of a diverse society that everyone belongs to

1.0 SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS

DAY 1

1.0 SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS – DAY 1

Welcome and opening remarks

The Deputy Chairperson of the SAHRC, Commissioner Priscilla Jana opened the meeting by welcoming all delegates, and affirming the significance of the meeting in light of the SAHRC's constitutional mandate to protect and promote the recognition of human rights. Despite the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Constitution) being among the most progressive in the world, recognising explicitly the rights of LGBT persons, severe rights violations are experienced by LGBT persons. Moreover, when seeking redress, and in reporting these violations such persons face secondary victimisation in their own communities and police stations.

The reality of the experience of LGBT persons precipitated the need to bring together groups from different backgrounds, with influence over domestic and regional spheres in the SOGIE space, to settle on a clear way forward to translate South Africa's legal protections into more tangible protections for some of the most vulnerable persons in the country.

Keynote address

The keynote address was delivered by Adv. Pansy Tlakula, former Chairperson of the ACHPR, who commended the NANHRI and the SAHRC for convening the meeting. Adv. Tlakula acknowledged the work undertaken by NANHRI in taking the lead to ensure the implementation of the Declaration on Practical Solutions to ending violence and discrimination against persons based on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression (Ekurhuleni Declaration). The Ekurhuleni Declaration was adopted in 2016 at the First African Regional Seminar on Finding Practical Solutions for Addressing Violence and Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression, inspired by the historic Resolution 275 on Protection against Violence and other Human Rights Violations against persons on the basis of their real or imputed Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity, adopted by the ACHPR.
The Ekurhuleni Declaration contains a multi-pronged, comprehensive and practical plan of action which, amongst others, urges the African Union (AU), the ACHPR, Regional Bodies, NHRIs and Civil Society Organisations (CSOs) to advance the rights of LGBT persons.

Adv. Tlakula charged delegates with giving serious consideration as how best to engage the AU and its organs with a human rights mandate in a constructive and non-confrontational dialogue on the meaning of some of the Articles of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Charter). Taking into consideration the prescripts of the African Charter, which include, inter alia, the right to enjoy the rights and freedoms therein without any distinction of any kind - such as race, sex, gender or other status, the right to equality and equal protection of the law, the right to dignity and freedom - such a dialogue would have to address the basis upon which it can be said that the rights entrenched in the African Charter extend to all individuals, to the exclusion of LGBT persons.

While there is little doubt that much is being done to advance LGBT rights on the African continent, a lot more remains to be done. In order to effectively address violence, discrimination and other human rights violations against LGBT persons, challenges that hamper progress must be identified and strategies to address these challenges developed.

Adv. Tlakula closed her address by affirming to those still struggling to accept the rights of LGBT persons, to remember that human beings are human beings, irrespective of our sexual orientation, gender identity or expression.

Overview and objectives

Marie Ramtu, Program Officer at NANHRI, gave a brief description about NANHRI and its role in the SOGIE project. The role of NANHRI as an umbrella body for NHRIs in Africa which provides capacity strengthening support for its members was explained.

Following the adoption of Resolution 275, NANHRI initiated a project to strengthen the capacity of civil society and relevant stakeholders to protect the rights of LGBTQI+ persons. The SOGIE project, which was started in December 2016 with five African NHRIs (Ghana, Kenya, Malawi, Uganda and South Africa), commenced with staff from these countries undertaking online training which was subsequently followed up by a face-to-face training in Nairobi, Kenya in March 2017. The outcome of the training was to have each country organise its own in-country training on SOGIE and human rights.

The objective of the project was to build the capacity of NHRI staff to respond to SOGIE-related violence and discrimination, and improve collaborative efforts between NHRIs and CSOs in responding to SOGIE-related violations and discrimination. It is anticipated that staff can also reconcile work/ professionalism with cultural/personal beliefs.

Sibongile Ndashe (left) from the Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa with Commissioner Lawrence Mute as panelists on Day 1

Regional Strategies to Tackle SOGIE-Based Violence And Discrimination

The panel presentations were opened by the Deputy Chairperson of the ACHPR, Commissioner Lawrence Mute, who drew up a set of considerations to address when advancing the agenda of human rights violations against people on the basis of their sexual orientation, gender identity and expression.

These include the need for rights claimants, or those undertaking advocacy on behalf of rights claimants, to consider the bigger picture and realise the conceptualisation of SOGIE rights as human rights. It is also crucial to assess where and from whom you are seeking help. Tailoring the approach to salient dynamics would depending on whether you are approaching a technical body, or a political body. Finally, the Commissioner reiterated the universality of the African Charter, which protects all persons from violations of their rights. The African Charter has been signed and ratified by a number of countries, including South Africa. Activists, human rights defenders, and civil society stakeholders therefore need to be in a position to hold their respective governments fully accountable to their commitments.

Speaking to the use of litigation to advance SOGIE rights across the continent, Sibongile Ndashe of the Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa (ISLA) highlighted that approaches to the law itself can have the implication of contributing toward SOGIE-based violence in Africa. There has been significant prioritisation of decriminalisation as a means of advancing related rights, such as spousal benefits or access to health care, for example, without addressing the root causes that lead to violence or the multiple ways in which SOGIE-based violence manifests. ISLA has devised an incremental approach to hold states accountable and to develop jurisprudence that makes linkages to the various ways that sexual rights are violated. The approach allows local courts and African human rights mechanisms to highlight the linkages between "everyday" issues such as freedom of association, consent and privacy in ways that are gradual, and thus less likely to be divisive. For example, in the Ugandan case of Jacqueline Kasha & Others v Rolling Stone Ltd and Another, the court established that irrespective of sexual orientation, the "outing" of the applicants in Rolling Stone magazine, and the magazine's calls to "hang" the identified homosexuals, violated their inherent rights to privacy, dignity and protection from inhuman treatment. With the goal of incrementally building rights, and minimizing the potential harmful effects of the law, ISLA promotes partnerships between legal experts and social movements as critical to striking the balance between much needed expertise possessed by lawyers, and the crucial knowledge possessed by grassroots activists of the extent of discrimination. This approach is thus cognizant of how law is interpreted and implemented, and whom it affects.

Wendy Isaack from Human Rights Watch (HRW) presented research findings contrasting the respective positions of Ghana and Nigeria, with respect to the protection of LGBT persons against violence and discrimination. Ghana was presented as a country of contradictions. While Ghana criminalises "unnatural carnal knowledge" in its Criminal Offences Act, the law is rarely, if ever, enforced, and unlike several of its neighbors, Ghana has not taken steps in recent years to stiffen penalties against consensual same-sex conduct or to expressly criminalise sexual relations between women. Moreover, at least two government agencies, the Ghana Police Force and the Commission on Human Rights and Administrative Justice (CHRAJ), have reached out to LGBT people and taken proactive steps to help ensure their protection. However, LGBT persons in Ghana continue to be subjected to the most brutal violence from their communities because of their sexual orientation and gender identity. The retention of the provision pertaining to "unnatural carnal knowledge" in section 104(1)(b) of its Criminal Offences Act - commonly referred to as the anti-gay law – is often seen as tacit state approval of discrimination, and even violence, on the basis of real or imputed sexual orientation and gender identity. The law also fuels a social environment in which there is pervasive violence against lesbian, bisexual and gender non-conforming women in the home and LGBT people more generally in communities where they live. LGBT Ghanaians interviewed by HRW said that the combination of the criminalization of adult consensual same-sex conduct and the profoundly religious and socially conservative Ghanaian context has an insidious effect on their individual self-expression.Ghana is a liberal democracy, with a constitution that guarantees fundamental human rights to all its citizens, has a relatively responsive police force, and an independent national human rights institution; however, the government has consistently rejected calls by United Nations bodies, including the Human Rights Council during the Universal Periodic Review of Ghana's human rights record, to repeal the law against "unnatural carnal knowledge." Despite positive initiatives from the CHRAJ and from some individuals within the Ghana Police, the government is thus far failing to adequately protect LGBT persons from violence. HRW has since petitioned the ACHPR to put pressure on the Ghanaian government to protect persons from such grotesque forms of violence, and approaches by HRW to assist Ghana in implementing the necessary measures have been met with positive responses.

In Nigeria, the passing Same-Sex Marriage Prohibition Act, 2013 (SSMPA) prompted a series of instances of mob violence, arbitrary mass arrests, detention and extortion against LGBT people by some police officers and members of the public. The SSMPA not only punishes same sex marriage, but also prohibits same sex cohabitation, and imposes harsh prison sentences on anyone who associates with organisations that purport to promote the rights of LGBT persons. Moreover, the SSMPA contravenes basic tenets of the Nigerian Constitution, including respect for dignity and prohibition of torture. It also goes against several regional and international human rights treaties which Nigeria has ratified, including the African Charter, the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights (ICESCR), and the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR). Human rights treaties impose legal obligations on Nigeria to prohibit discrimination; ensure equal protection of the law; respect and protect rights to freedom of association, expression, privacy, and the highest attainable standard of health; prevent arbitrary arrests and torture or cruel, degrading, and inhuman treatment; and exercise due diligence in protecting persons, including LGBT individuals, from all forms of violence, whether perpetrated by state or non-state actors. In November 2015, the ACHPR urged the Nigerian government to review the SSMPA in order to prohibit violence and discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity and ensure access to HIV prevention, treatment, and care services for LGBT individuals. What has been most disheartening, however, has been a perceived lack of interest shown by the Nigerian Human Rights Commission to engage with HRW in relation to LGBT matters, including the SSMPA.

Carrie Shelver of the Coalition of African Lesbians (CAL), noted how in addition to laws criminalizing same-sex conduct, some jurisdictions also contain provisions that place additional restrictions and penalties on the 'promotion of homosexuality' and in other contexts refuse registration of organisations working on SOGIE-related issues. The current approaches, strategies and interventions of governments and CSOs to promote the rights of LGBT persons include focusing on health care (and HIV/AIDS in particular) and gender-based violence as entry points to advance SOGIE rights. National organisations are increasingly utilizing the regional and international human rights spaces to raise concerns that are not being addressed at all or addressed satisfactorily domestically. However, the emphasis on legal and policy reform has had the implication of less resources and attention being allocated to knowledge production and the building of social movements. In addition, the hierarchy of rights and violations within and among various population groups has resulted in some rights of some groups in some locations being viewed as more important than others. There also appears to be a failure in addressing the intersectional and lived realities of how different groups experience human rights violations, and the multiple forms of vulnerabilities within the LGBT community - such as race, ethnicity, gender, class and geographical location – resulting in many LGBT individuals being excluded from the gains made by the broader LGBT community.

Discussion

The discussion centered on the need to take the recommendations put forward by the panelists a step further by engaging with policy-makers who have the power to implement interventions directed toward providing greater protection to LGBT persons. While it is important from a strategic point of view for human rights activists to engage in these discussions among themselves, it is necessary to take these discussions further and initiate effective dialogue with our governments. In particular, the SAHRC as an NHRI must actively engage with regional bodies such as the ACHPR and the African Union to ensure that African governments protect the rights of NHRI individuals. Moreover, in light of its constitutional mandate to promote and protect the rights of LGBT individuals in South Africa, the SAHRC

Tackling SOGIE-Based Violence In South Africa

Matthew Clayton of The Triangle Project led the presentations on how best to tackle SOGIE-based violence in South Africa, highlighting the need to have a detailed understanding of the problem before deciding on what strategies to adopt in response. The lack of statistical information was highlighted as one of the major obstacles to presenting an accurate picture of the current state of affairs pertaining to the rights of LGBT persons. For example, in instances where a lesbian woman is murdered due to her sexual orientation, the statistic is simply recorded as one of 'murder'. Similarly when a trans woman is beaten on the basis of their gender identity, the statistic is recorded as one of 'assault'. This dearth of disaggregated data results in the inability to obtain information on crime statistics that is required to better understand the root causes of the problem. The capturing and recording of the reports is only part of the problem though, as the main obstacle to understanding the true state of SOGIE-based violence is the lack of reporting by LGBT victims due to the high levels of distrust toward the South African Police Service (SAPS), where secondary victimization in the form of discrimination is likely to occur. This is especially troubling considering the extreme forms of SOGIE-based violence in South Africa, which is unique and disassociated from other factors widely understood as drivers of crime in the country. Proposals were put forward to introduce robust hate crimes legislation; a well-funded criminal justice system that follows through with reported hate crimes; and a police service that is not only properly trained but is also held accountable to its failure to provide victims of SOGIE-based violence the protection they need.

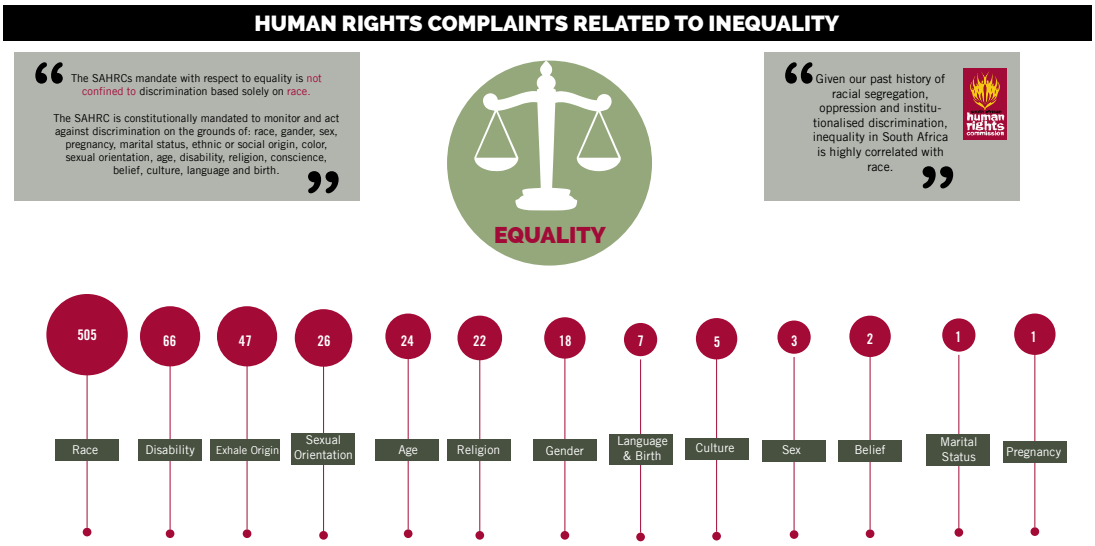
The Department of Justice and Constitutional Development (DOJ&CD), represented by Busisiwe Dhlamini, provided an overview of the strides South Africa has made in terms of developing legislation and policy – namely, Prevention and Combating of Hate Crimes and Hate Speech Bill - that serves to promote and protect the rights of LGBT persons, including SOGIE-based violence. The DOJ&CD has established a National Task Team (NTT) to develop a National Intervention Strategy (NIS) on LGBT issues, with the aim of countering the violence perpetrated on people on the basis of their sexual orientation and gender identity. The NIS follows a multi-sectoral approach, which includes government and civil society organisations (CSOs) in addressing violence against LGBT persons through four programme areas, namely: Prevention, Response, Training, and Monitoring and Evaluation at a national level. The ultimate aim is for national, regional and municipal policies, strategies, plans, budgets and legislation to have an integrated, mainstreamed approach to eradicating hate crimes. A Rapid Response Team (RRT) was also established to urgently track the pending cases committed against LGBTI persons which are in the criminal justice system, as well as to respond as soon as possible, to reported cases of violence. The RRT comprise the SAPS, National Prosecuting Authority (NPA), DoJ&CD and representatives from CSOs. Progress has been made by the RRT to ensure the fast tracking of the pending hate crimes cases within the criminal justice system. Key learnings to be taken from the ongoing process include the need to put in place proper finance and funding mechanisms to support multi-sectoral collaborations; the need to mobilise political leadership and senior officials to become the key drivers of change; as well as ensuring continuous communication and consultation within and across the sector.

Discussion

Most of the discussion centered on the lack of disaggregated data, and on what can be done to fill the gap created by not having the information available to inform interventions. It was proposed that SAPS take the initiative in this regard, with participants suggesting that SAPS needs to implement more efficient systems for recording crime reports and statistics, and making those publicly available. The National Operations Center was also mentioned in response to the question of disaggregated data, which was established for the purposes of comprehensive data collection and administration. It was resolved that while there were a plethora of challenges created by the gap in disaggregated data, it was important to find solutions and prioritise work that needs to be done based on the resources that are currently available.

SOGIE-Based Discrimination In South Africa

Pandelis Gregoriou, representing the SAHRC, opened the presentations of the day's last panel by highlighting the SAHRC's constitutional mandate to promote respect for human rights and a culture of human rights; to promote the protection, development and attainment of human rights; and to monitor and assess the observance of human rights in South Africa.The violation of the constitutional right to equality, which prohibits discrimination on the listed grounds of gender, sex and sexual orientation, comprises the highest proportion of complaints reported to the SAHRC (14%). Of these equality-related complaints, discrimination based on gender, sex, and sexual orientation seem to make up a disproportionately low number, comprising only 47 of the total (705) equality complaints received in the 2016-2017 financial year. The implication is that a number of such violations go unreported, largely due to the secondary victimisation that has characterised the handling of SOGIE-based discrimination.



While the SAHRC may, in the execution of its mandate, resolve disputes constituting a violation of a human right through conciliation, negotiation or mediation, it is also empowered to litigate on its own accord, or on behalf of a person or class of persons. One such instance involved legal proceedings initiated against Jon Qwelane, a former ambassador of South Africa to Uganda, who was accused of making derogatory statements about members of the LGBT community in an article published in a large South African newspaper. He was subsequently found guilty of hate speech, with the court ordering him to provide an unconditional and published apology to the LGBT community. It was necessary to acknowledge that while the SAHRC has made significant progress in the execution of its mandate, there have been challenges. These include limited resources and capacity in the context of executing the protection mandate of the SAHRC; the use of tools to address the systemic issues of unfair discrimination which members of the LGBT community face; as well as pervasive public prejudice against the LGBT community.

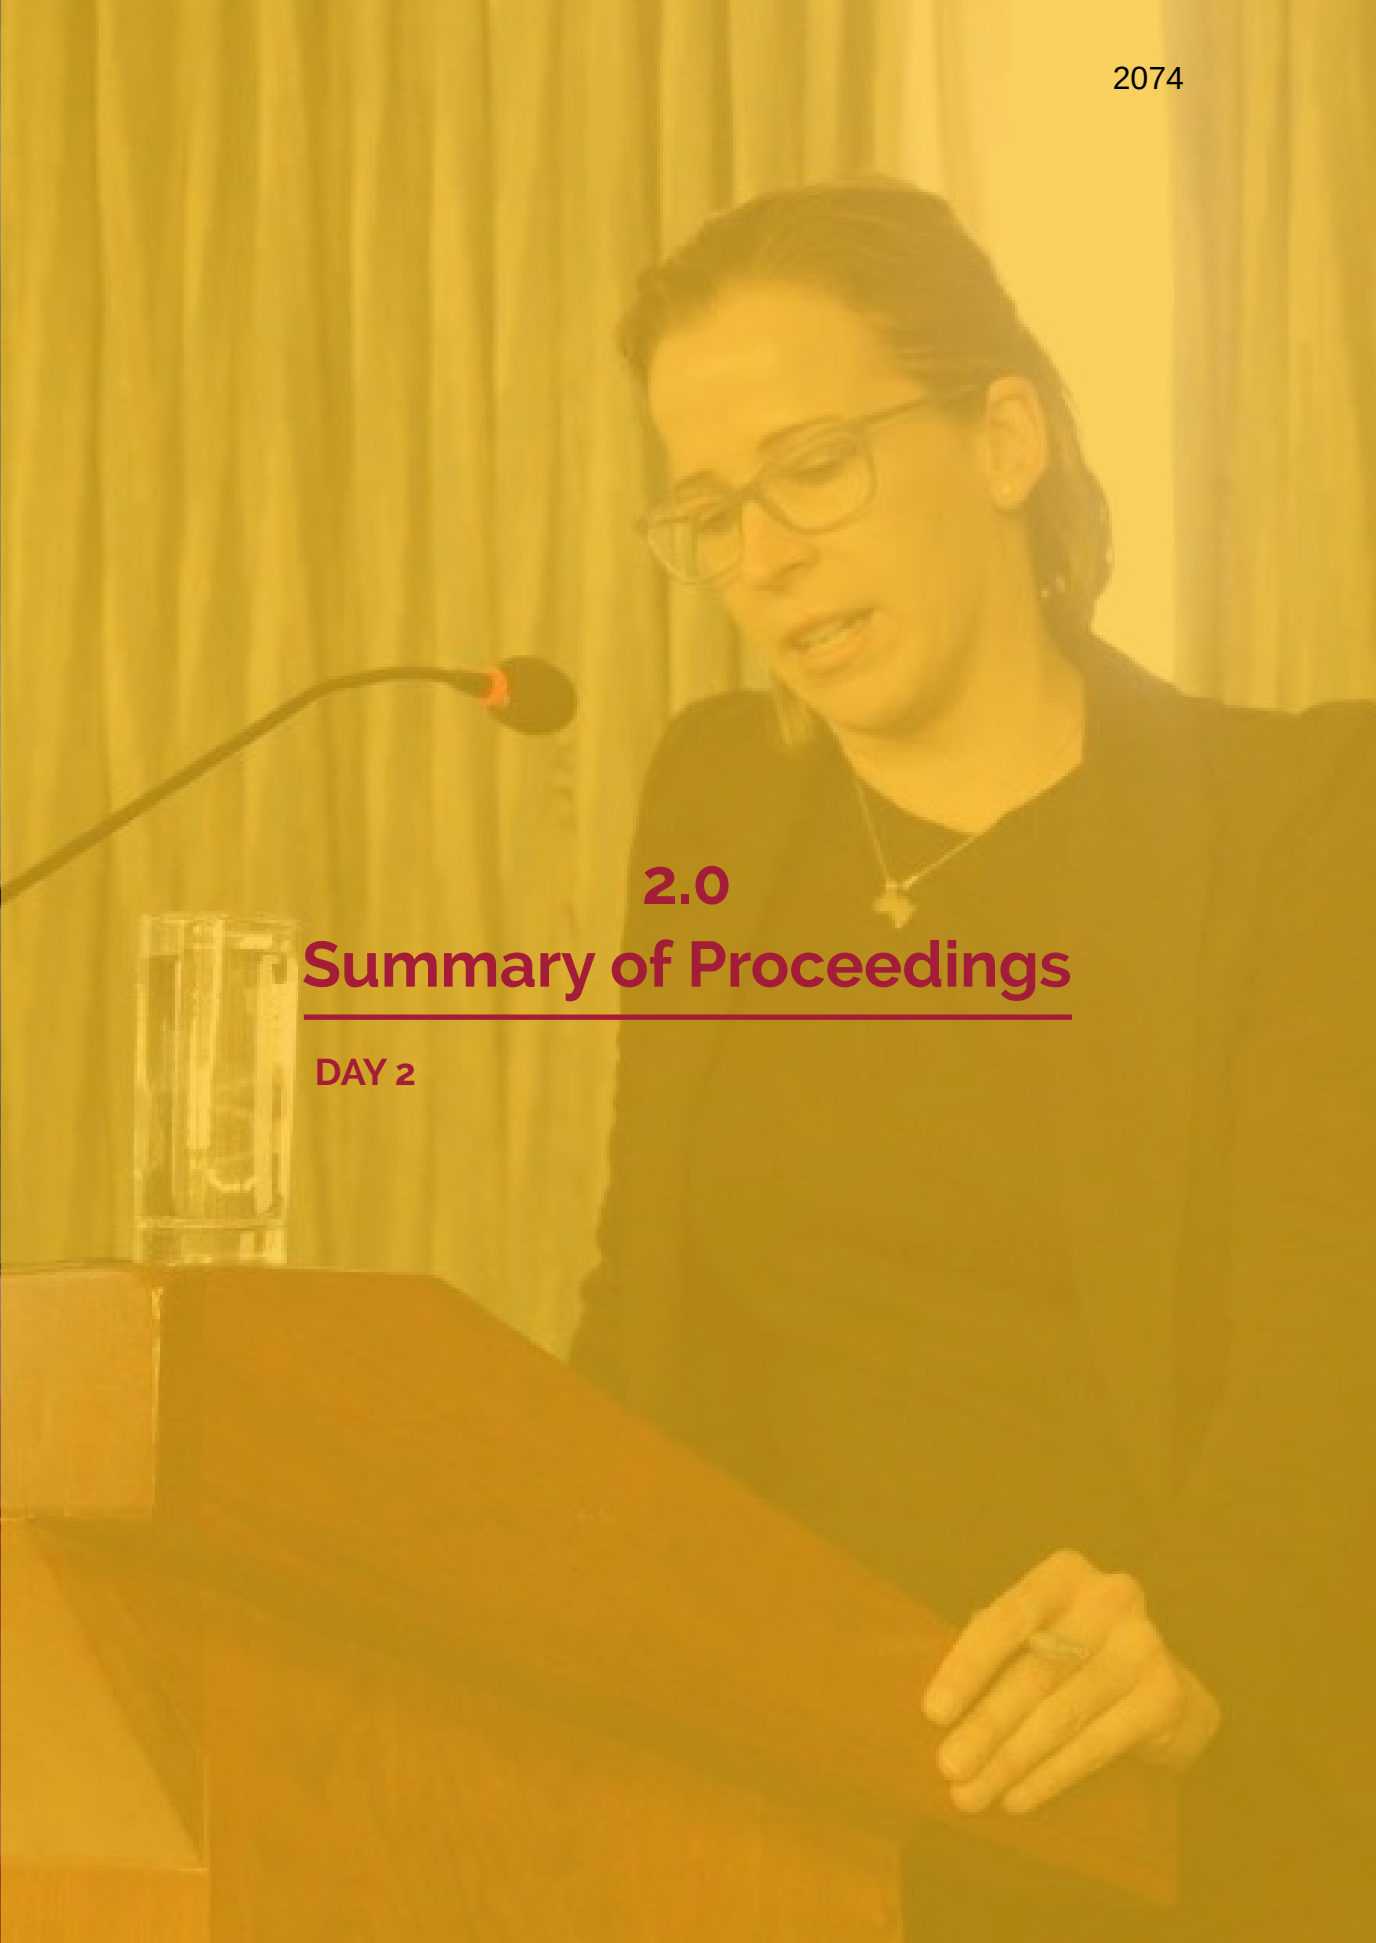
The Commission for Gender Equality (CGE), represented by Vernet Napo, highlighted some of the systemic issues undermining gender equality in South Africa, identifying patriarchy as the source of the country's fettered understanding of gender dynamics, while cultural beliefs, traditions and religious beliefs have also perpetuated patriarchal power inequalities. The CGE reported that while its SOGIE-related work has not been properly institutionalised, its programmes and interventions are directed toward the broader umbrella of promoting and protecting gender and minority rights. It is under these auspices that the CGEs Public Education and Information (PEI) department works with CSOs in each of the nine provincial offices, ensuring also that when community workshops on gender are held, officers facilitate the importance of the rights of the LGBT persons. The CGE has served as amicus curiae in a number of cases, including the Nare case against the Limpopo DOE, where the CGE worked with the SAHRC's Limpopo office to make several recommendations to the authorities regarding measures to be put in place to remedy the discrimination faced by Nare and other transgender learners. Another example of the CGE's legal contribution is the case of Laubscher N.O. v Duplan and Another regarding same-sex partners and the right to inherit.Accordingly, the CGE noted its authority to monitor the Equality Courts, established to advance substantive equality in South Africa as per the Constitution. In the course of this work it has been determined that the Equality Courts are fraught with challenges. These include the Equality Courts being inaccessible for persons seeking to lodge complaints, with challenges ranging from the Equality Courts' clerks tending to subject LGBT persons to secondary victimization, in addition to the more institutional issues of a lack of resources and appropriate expertise, such as the availability of Magistrates who have been properly trained on discrimination and the various aspects of the right to equality.

Discussion

One of the main threads to inform the discussion was around the role of the SAHRC in engaging the courts and conducting sensitivity training on SOGIE issues. There tends to be a conflation of the most basic SOGIE terminology, such as the distinction between sexual identity and sexual orientation, and courts need to be sensitive to the nuances of language in order to better understand the rights afforded to LGBT persons. The issue of LGBT refugees' rights in South Africa was also raised, with the implication being that they are targeted by the Department of Home Affairs due to their undocumented status, which consequently prevents LGBT refugees from living freely in the country that has purportedly granted them asylum status. The question thus arose of how the SAHRC may leverage its relationship with government to intervene in such cases, and partner with civil society in using advocacy to address challenges faced on the ground.

Panelists tackling the issues of SOGIE, religion and culture are:- Gift Kgomosotho (SAHRC) on the left, Reverend Nokuthula Dhladla (centre) & Keval Harie from Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action (right).

Participants:- Estian Smit (left) & George Barasa (right) interacting during question session on Day 1 of SOGIE



2.0
Summary of Proceedings

DAY 2

2.0 SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS – DAY 2

Recap Session

The second day of proceedings was opened by Kathleen Hardy of the SAHRC, who noted that there are important regional similarities and differences in the challenges faced by SOGIE movements. One fundamental similarity is the perception, at both a private and state level, that all rights are extended to all people to the exclusion of non-normative people. Notwithstanding these similarities, lawyers, NHRIs and activists should avoid using a "one size fits all" strategy as methodologies and narratives about SOGIE on the continent need to be challenged. Flexible, context specific and responsive strategies need to be adopted in order to advance the rights of LGBT persons. The work on SOGIE has thus far happened in silos, with NHRIs performing their mandated function while lawyers and social movements push a different agenda. It is important that synergy and collaboration happens, with a view of realising that it is important that the movement articulate its expectations of NHRIs. An emerging trend is that the most successful litigation and advocacy occurs when lawyers are embedded in the movement. However NHRIs continue to have limited engagement with social movements, which has slowed down the pace of advancing SOGIE rights because the litigation strategies pursued by NHRIs have become outdated. This is largely because NHRIs continue to work at the level of the individual and seek redress for particular people as opposed to a class of persons. Therefore the need for NHRIs to engage actively with civil society in strategic litigation becomes apparent. The SAHRC communicated its desire to become a positive ally that is both accountable to parliament and to social movements. The overwhelming response was to have increased collaboration between the SAHRC, social movements and other NHRIs on the continent.

Outcomes that should stem from this meeting include:

- The need for closer engagement, knowledge transfer and collaboration between NHRIs, social movements and lawyers.
- The need to shift litigation strategies from focusing on individuals to those that focus on classes of people and stem from social movements themselves.
- A dialogue should be held with NHRIs, key population groups and other stakeholders to establish sustainable ways of working together.

Strategies for the Legal Recognition of Gender Identity and Expression

The panel sought to share experiences on the strategies that have worked regionally in the realization of variant gender identities and expressions. One of the main objectives of this panel was to engage in a dialogue on what is expected of the SAHRC as an NHRI.

Tashwill Esterhuizen of the Southern African Litigation Centre (SALC) opened the presentations by affirming the universality and indivisibility of human rights. People of variant gender identities and expressions should therefore not be discriminated against and denied their rights arbitrarily. Notwithstanding, the issue of changing gender markers for transgender individuals remains difficult as there continues to be resistance to this form of administrative action across the continent. Transgender people struggle to get identity documents that reflect their expressed gender. This significantly impedes their right to human dignity and undermines their access to routine services and work. There is increasing evidence that suggests that transgender and gender non-conforming persons are targeted for violence because of their gender identity and/ or chosen gender expression. This violence occurs at both the social and institutional level. An example is trans women being jailed with cis men and thus being subjected to sexual assault and rape, while trans men are subjected to corrective rape. The institutional dynamics of violence are bolstered by the existence of penal codes that perpetuate and promote stereotypes that increase the vulnerability of LGBT people and form the basis on which trans people are denied the correct documentation. These laws also have the "knock on effect" of curtailing the right to freedom of association. Despite these challenges there have been several encouraging developments on the continent. In Zimbabwe a trans woman was charged with criminal nuisance for using the women's bathroom and dressing like a woman. She was subjected to humiliating examinations to verify her gender. The case against her was ultimately removed from the roll, and she has since pursued a case of damages against the State and the police service for infringement on her dignity and privacy. The court of appeal in Botswana has recognised the change in gender markers, arguing that the decision was tied to recognition of rights to dignity and freedom of expression. The court emphasised that the State and society have a duty to uphold the dignity of an individual despite the opposing views that different sectors of society have.

The presentation by Glenton Matthyse of Gender Dynamix (GDx) gave insights into the importance of using the appropriate language and understanding even the most subtle linguistic nuances within the SOGIE space. It was proposed that there needs to be a shift away from biological and socially constructed understandings of gender, to understandings based on self-construction and self-determination.

Building on this, law and policy relating to SOGIE needed to move away from cis-normative and heteronormative framing that had the propensity to conflate issues of gender identity and expression with sexual orientation.

Discussion

Many of the questions coming out of the discussion concerned the issue of language. Noting that the language used has evolved at a great pace. At times even greater than the discourse and strides being made with respect to advancing SOGIE rights. How can society remain on track with the constant linguistic evolution? There were suggestions that LGBT discourse tends to have a largely western and academic conceptualisation of SOGIE issues, which, although valid in the right contexts, has the effect of alienating many African communities who are already struggling to understand and identify with such issues. The question of introducing and using language that is inclusive of African communities was therefore recognised as critical, with the need to start off with advocacy materials that speaks to the linguistic nuances and needs of affected communities.

The importance of maintaining consistency in language for the purpose of law-making and policy formulation was emphasised. Laws and policies need to be given the scope to be reflective of the current state of affairs, and not be rendered redundant by updates in language.

Right of Access to Education for Transgender Learners

Joshua Sehoole of Iranti led the panel presentations by recounting the story of a 10 year old transgender learner in the Limpopo province who wore trousers to school. He was humiliated and given degrading punishment of walking in a jersey and underwear all day (the Nare case). Such has been the suffering of gender diverse learners, who are disproportionately impacted by school uniform codes. The Nare case is an example of what transgender learners have to endure in many South African schools. The principal in that case had orchestrated bullying, isolation, outing and discrimination against the learner, creating a dangerous learning environment for the learner. While the national guidelines do have the potential to protect LGBT learners and their rights, it tends to be ineffectively applied. Practices which relate to uniform should not impede the right to access education or impede on the constitutional rights to privacy and dignity. The discrimination is rooted in many school guidelines, which still maintain LGBT phobias in their approach to refusals by learners to abide by binary uniform standards as a disciplinary issue. Such guidelines introduce a binary from the onset, in the way they decide what clothing is "for boys and for girls". This strikes at the core of the right to freedom of expression and the principle of self-determination. It was proposed that South Africa look at the Argentinian Gender Identity Act which actively provides for the dignified treatment and special protections for children's right to dignity. South Africa needs to look at implementing strategies that ensure learners have access to a competent learning environment where their emotional and mental wellness is not compromised. To this end learners need to have access to psychosocial support from properly trained educators who are aware of the sensitivities associated with young learners' gender identity and expression.

The SAHRC, represented by Victor Mavhidula, affirmed that there remain high levels of SOGIE-based discrimination despite a strong legal framework of rights protection. Equality courts in the country are tasked with adjudicating matters relating to discrimination as defined in the Constitution. Equality Courts therefore need to take a more proactive and functional role in understanding and adjudicating SOGIE-based discrimination, especially as it relates to children, who are the most vulnerable. Institutions such as Equality Courts, Magistrates, and government departments need to undertake sensitivity training to ensure that their rulings are reflective of the discourse on discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation and gender identity. In this regard, the SAHRC itself has played a stronger role in questioning responses from government and holding it accountable for its failures, with specific references to the Department of Basic Education and the Department of Higher Education, both of whom are charged with handling the government's education portfolios.

Glenton Matthyse of GDx reported on how LGBT youth are disproportionately prone to mental health issues, which has been shown to be a direct consequence of societal pressure and rejection. Institutional homophobia and transphobia make it increasingly difficult for LGBT learners to succeed in the classroom. Heteronormative curricula and class room settings damage trans learners, and create an environment where a learners feel invisible or silenced. While social attitudes need to be shifted, law reform and policy development, as well as a complete review of curricula are critical to improving the experience of trans learners in South African schools.

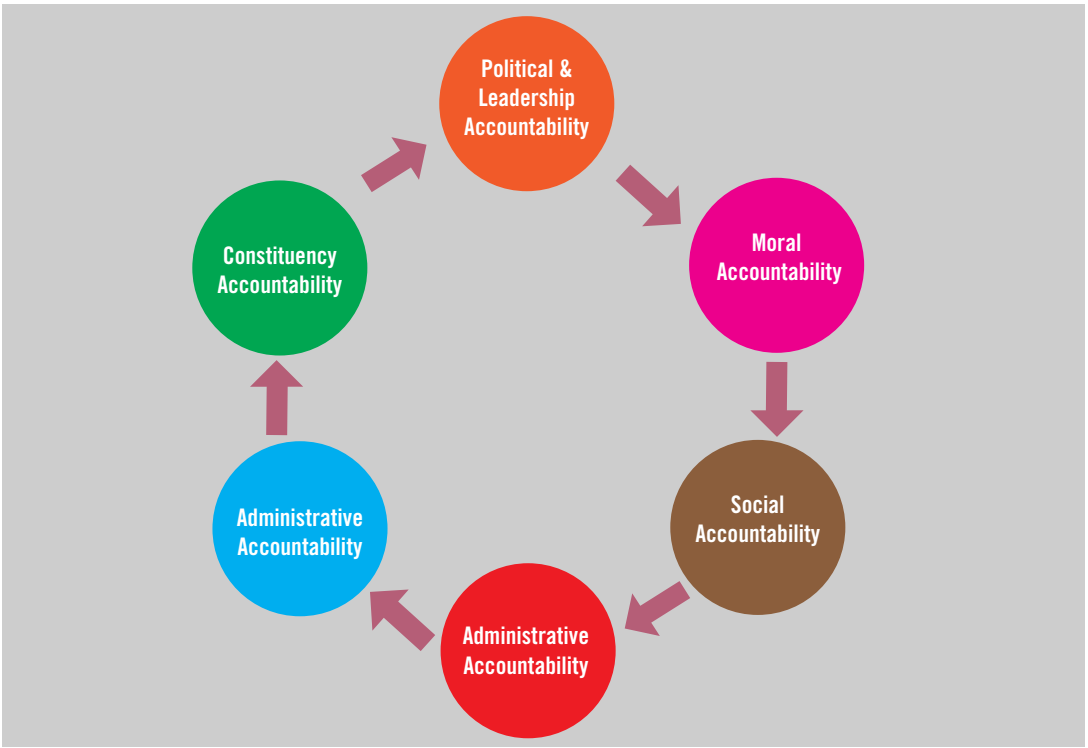


Diagram: Multiple actors are accountable for trans and gender diverse exclusion, marginalization, discrimination, harassment and violence in educational settings.

Discussion

The discussion was opened with the question on how to balance the rights to freedom of expression and self-determination for learners against the rights of educators who are tasked with the responsibility of maintaining discipline in schools. The immediate response to this was that, while educators and schools are entitled to their beliefs and have the responsibility to instill discipline within the school, uniforms should not deny learners' the right to access education. The enjoyment of learners' constitutionally entrenched rights to education and freedom of expression cannot be limited at the discretion of educators. There needs to be a diversion from considering LGBT issues in schools as disciplinary ones. These are issues that strike at the core of human rights discourse, and it is time they are considered as such.

SOGIE, Religion and Culture

The final panel at the meeting dealt with the interaction of SOGIE issues with religion and culture, focusing specifically on strategies to combat SOGIE-based religious and cultural discrimination and exclusion. Reverend Nokuthula Dhladla explained that this is an issue which churches have resolved to discuss due to the excessive violence and discrimination suffered by persons in the LGBT community. Materials have been developed on the role of churches in the context of violence against LBGT groups, with the purpose of training church leaders. While the process is ongoing and there continue to be challenges, the space for dialogue on religion and LGBT rights has been opened up, which represents significant strides compared to the previous status quo.

Keval Harie of the Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action (GALA) posed the question of how to create spaces for young, gay and black youth in African communities. These spaces need to be safe and allow for the voices of marginalised individuals to be preeminent in the narrative. While religion is deeply private and protected by the Constitution, both the State and religious institutions tend to use religion to divert attention from important conversations around SOGIE-based discrimination.

Discussion

The discussion kicked off with questions around the position of lesbians within the Muslim community. The assertion is that they are more oppressed than gay men, and are silenced due to the inherently patriarchal nature of the Islamic faith. Acknowledging that queer persons have always been able to move within their cultures and religions, the discussion moved to whether activism leaves any room for LGBT persons to be reconciled with their religious beliefs? In the context of Christianity, it was suggested that preachers need to undergo theological training to further understand the development of scriptures within their context

3.0
Annex 1 & 2

ANNEX 1 – RECOMMENDED PLAN OF ACTION

Pursuant to the Regional Seminar held in March 2016, NHRIs were requested to develop an institutional plan for activities and interventions relating to SOGIE work. The plan of action is intended to speak to the issues identified in the Ekurhuleni Declaration that require urgent attention from NHRIs and State intervention to promote and protect the rights of LGBT-GNC individuals in South Africa. These key areas of concern include: the role of State and non-State actors in addressing SOGIE-based violence and discrimination; changing perceptions and creating awareness; violence and discrimination in educational institutions and settings; economic justice; health and psychosocial support; victimisation in the criminal justice system and in border control systems; legal support for survivors of violence and discrimination, and their families; and accurate data on incidence of violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity and expression. Based on the key areas of concern highlighted in the Ekurhuleni Declaration, the SAHRC's Plan of Action is a multi-faceted programme incorporating activities undertaken across the institution and intended to be a 'living' document and will be updated on an ongoing basis.

Current strategies/actions that are being employed within the SAHRC to respond to SOGIE-related violence and discrimination

1. Selected staff have been sensitised on SOGIE-related issues, and an in-country meeting has been hosted to further understand contemporary issues affecting the LGBT / GNC community.
2. The SAHRC continues to participate in the National Task Team on Gender and Sexual Orientation-based Violence Perpetrated against Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex Persons.
3. Ongoing complaints handling through Provincial Offices and the identification of potential matters for Strategic Impact Litigation.
4. Development of a school principal's guide in protecting the rights of LGBT learners and training.
5. Engagement with the Department of Basic Education (DBE) and other relevant stakeholders on school codes of conduct (including uniform regulations and the protection of privacy). Initial meetings are taking place with a view of hosting a public dialogue and identifying other strategic interventions. Further engagement with the DBE on the infusion of human rights (including SOGIE rights) into the school curriculum.
6. The production of a Thematic Concept Paper on SOGIE-based violence and discrimination, with a particular focus on transgender persons and secondary victimization of SOGIE-based violence victims.
7. Stakeholder engagement with the Centre for Human Rights about the possible inclusion of SOGIE-based theme into the National Schools Moot Court Competition and / or the African Human Rights Moot Court Competition.

8. Engagement with the Department of Justice on proposed legislation and policy relating to equality and non-discrimination.
9. Launch of the Unfair Discrimination in the Workplace Report (which includes unfair discrimination against LGBTI and gender non-conforming persons), and monitoring the implementation of recommendations emanating from the report.
10. Internal discussions on increased internal awareness to promote SOGIE rights (including inter alia Women's Day and Movember for men celebrations).

Innovative suggestions emanating from the in-country meeting

1. Regional Interventions – The SAHRC should engage more robustly with regional bodies, including the ACHPR, African Union and NHRIs on the continent to further promote and protect the rights of LGBT individuals on the continent.
2. Strategic Litigation and Complaints Handling – Beyond using litigation as a means of resolving individual complaints, the SAHRC should work closely with lawyers, social movements and civil society actors, working in both the domestic and regional contexts, to ensure that litigation interventions build on existing jurisprudence to further expand SOGIE rights. Similarly, and where appropriate, all complaints handling mechanisms available to the SAHRC, such as alternative dispute resolution, should be utilised in a manner that advances SOGIE rights beyond the individual complainant.
3. Advocacy Materials – The SAHRC should work in partnership with civil society actors to ensure that all advocacy materials aiming to promote SOGIE rights, and reduce stigma and discrimination, is presented in a manner that contains SOGIE-appropriate language and is relevant to the lived experiences of LGBT / GNC persons and the communities in which they live.
4. Policy Interventions and Research Outputs – Noting the constrained resource environment that exists within State institutions, the SAHRC should collaborate with civil society actors to ensure that a streamlined approach is adopted regarding policy interventions impacting on SOGIE rights. In addition, the SAHRC should proactively engage with civil society actors and academics to ensure that all SOGIE-related research reports and recommendations emanating therefrom are relevant and impactful toward the advancement of SOGIE rights.
5. Criminal Justice – In light of the existing Memorandum of Understanding (MOU) between the SAHRC and the South African Police Service (SAPS), the SAHRC should actively engage with SAPS to fast-track the development of systems to disaggregate data required to monitor the investigation and resolution of SOGIE-based hate crimes. The SAHRC should further incorporate sensitization training within the MOU with a view of addressing the occurrence of secondary victimization which frequently occurs when victims report crimes to the SAPS.
6. Sensitization Training – the SAHRC should actively engage in sensitization training with relevant State departments, including members of the judiciary, particularly with respect to how the use of language in behavior, policies and judgments can perpetuate the marginalisation and exclusion of LGBT / GNC persons.

Propose strategies/actions that the SAHRC can undertake to increase/improve the response to SOGIE-related violence and discrimination. Outline objectives, activities, identify other actors and timelines.

Objective	Activities	Actors	Timeline (monitoring)
Objective 1 Establish a committee of experts comprising lawyers, civil society actors, activists and academics to advise the SAHRC Deputy Chairperson, Commissioner Priscilla Jana on the Equality Portfolio and SOGIE related work.	Host one Section 11 Committee meeting, as provided for in the SAHRC Act, 2013.	SAHRC Commissioners' Programme Civil Society Actors Academics Lawyers	January - March 2018
Objective 2 Promote SOGIE rights at a regional level.	Engage with the existing network of Southern African Development Community (SADC) NHRIs to promote SOGIE rights within their respective jurisdictions, ACHPR and the AU.	SAHRC Commissioners' Programme DOJ&CD Department of International Relations and Cooperation (DIRCO) SADC NHRIs ACHPR AU	Ongoing
	Robustly engage with the AU in particular concerning its approach to SOGIE-related issues.	SAHRC Commissioners' Programme DOJ&CD; DIRCO AU NANHRI	Ongoing

Objective	Activities	Actors	Timeline (monitoring)
Objective 3 Impactful strategic litigation and complaints handling.	Actively engage with relevant civil society actors, Chapter 9 institutions and social movements regarding all SOGIE-related complaints lodged with the SAHRC.	SAHRC Legal Services at Head and Provincial Offices CGE	Ongoing
Objective 4 Advocacy Materials.	Develop advocacy materials in consultation with relevant civil society actors, Chapter 9 institutions and social movements to promote the advancement and protection of SOGIE rights.	SAHRC Advocacy and Communications Unit CGE DoJ&CD	January – March 2018
Objective 5 Strategic Policy Intervention and Research Outputs.	Actively engage with relevant civil society actors, Chapter 9 institutions, social movements, lawyers and academics regarding all SOGIE-related policy interventions and research.	SAHRC Research Unit SAHRC Commissioners' Programme CGE	Ongoing
Objective 6 Criminal Justice.	Settle terms of MOU with the SAPS and advocate for the establishment of disaggregated data systems and SOGIE sensitization training.	SAHRC Commissioners' Programme SAPS	Ongoing
Objective 7 Sensitization Training.	Develop training materials for State and non-State actors regarding SOGIE rights.	SAHRC Advocacy and Communications Unit DOJ&CD CGE DBE	Ongoing

Outline steps to have the proposed plan adopted and implemented by the SAHRC.

1. Debriefing session with the Commissioners
2. Approval by Commissioners
3. Include in Strategic planning and development of Annual Work plan
4. Allocation of funds

ANNEX 2 – PROGRAM

DAY 1: Violence and Discrimination based on SOGIE
08:30	Registration
09:00	Welcome and Opening Remarks, Adv. Priscilla Jana – SAHRC Deputy Chairperson
09:15	Keynote Address, Adv. Pansy Tlakula - former Chairperson of the African Commission on Human and People's Rights
09:30	Overview and objectives, Marie Ramtu - NANHRI Program Officer
09:45	Panel 1: Regional strategies to tackle SOGIE-based violence and discrimination • Comm. Lawrence Mute, Deputy Chairperson of the African Commission on Human and People's Rights • Sibongile Ndashe, The Initiative for Strategic Litigation in Africa • Wendy Isaack, Human Rights Watch • Carrie Shelver, Coalition of African Lesbians • Moderator: Thandiwe Matthews, SAHRC
10:45	Discussion
11:15	Tea
11:30	Panel 2: Tackling SOGIE-based violence in South Africa • Matthew Clayton, Triangle Project • Busisiwe Dhlamini, Department of Justice • Moderator: Dr. Shanelle van der Berg, SAHRC
12:30	Discussion
13:00	LUNCH
14:00	Panel 3: SOGIE-based discrimination in South Africa • Pandelis Gregoriou, SAHRC • Vernet Napo, Commission for Gender Equality • Moderator: Dr. Shanelle van der Berg, SAHRC
14:45	Discussion
15:15	Tea
15:30	Wrap Up & Way Forward – Thandiwe Matthews & Gift Kgomosotho, SAHRC
16:30	END

DAY 2: Promoting, Advancing and Expanding SOGIE rights
09:00	Welcome Remarks and Recap, Kathleen Hardy, SAHRC
09:30	Panel 1: Strategies for legal recognition of gender identity • Tashwill Esterhuizen, Southern African Litigation Centre • Glenton Matthyse, Gender Dynamix • Moderator: Thandiwe Matthews, SAHRC
10:30	Discussion
11:00	Tea
11:15	Right of access to education for transgender learners Panel 2: Transforming school admissions policies, codes of conduct and curricula • Joshua Sehoole, Iranti • Victor Mavhidula, SAHRC • Glenton Matthyse, Gender Dynamix • Moderator: Eden Esterhuizen, SAHRC
12:15	Discussion
12:45	LUNCH
13:30	SOGIE, religion and culture Panel 3: Strategies to combat SOGIE-based religious and cultural discrimination and exclusion • Reverend Nokuthula Dhladla • Keval Harie, Gay and Lesbian Memory in Action • Moderator: Gift Kgomosotho, SAHRC
14:30	Discussion
15:00	Wrap Up & Way Forward – Thandiwe Matthews, SAHRC
16:00	END

Network of African National Human Rights Institutions
NANHRI RINADH
Réseau des Institutions Nationales Africaines des Droits de l'Homme

south african human rights commission

NANHRI & SAHRC

IN - COUNTRY MEETING ON SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY AND EXPRESSION

THEMATIC DISCUSSION PAPER

DISCRIMINATION AND VIOLENCE ON THE BASIS OF SEXUAL ORIENTATION, GENDER IDENTITY AND EXPRESSION (SOGIE) IN SOUTH AFRICA

TABLE OF CONTENTS

1. INTRODUCTION

Globally, South Africa is celebrated for its progressive and transformative democracy installed by the 1996 Constitution founded on human dignity, the achievement of equality and the advancement of human rights and freedoms.[1] In relation to violence and discrimination based on sexual orientation, gender identity and expression (SOGIE-based violence and discrimination), South Africa's Constitution was indeed the first in the world to expressly prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.[2] South Africa boasts a comprehensive and "liberal" policy framework for the promotion of equality and social justice, with generous protection for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Intersex and Queer[3] (LGBTIQ) persons.

Notwithstanding this much celebrated constitutional, legislative and policy framework, serious violations of the rights to equality and dignity of LGBTIQ persons occur much too frequently in South Africa – on the basis of their real or perceived SOGIE;[4] and the justice system in the country is unfortunately not known for its adequate response to these seemingly systematic challenges experienced by members of the LGBTIQ community.

As with other forms of violence and discrimination, SOGIE-based violence and discrimination tends to impact most severely on black, poor and rural LGBTIQ people due to race, class, level of formal education, geographical location and economic status.[5]

In 2010 the former Chairperson of the South African Human Rights Commission (Commission), Jody Kollapen, attributed violence directed against LGBTIQ persons to two factors: first, institutionalised prejudice deriving from the historical separation of people into categories with differential values;

[1]Section 1 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ("the Constitution").
[2]Peter Fabricius, "South Africa teeters, but avoids falling, in its high-wire act of protecting LGBTIQ rights without offending its African chums" Available at https://issafrica.org/iss-today/just-how-serious-is-south-africa-about-gay-rights Accessed 17 October 2017.
[3]The letter "Q" is added to the traditional "LGBTI" to indicate inclusion of a category of persons who may identify as being either gender, sexually and/or bodily diverse or non-conforming. The term "Queer" was originally a term used in a derogatory sense. Many LGBTIQ movements have embraced and reclaimed this word and gave it a rebirth. It can now be understood to describe a broad category of people who are non-conforming or diverse.
[4]Studies referred to in J A Nel and M Judge, "Exploring Homophobic Victimization in Gauteng, South Africa: Issues, Impacts and Responses" Acta Criminologica 21(3) 2008. In fact, in the African Region, violence and discrimination against persons on the basis of their real or imputed sexual orientation, gender identity and expression has received the attention of the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights through its adoption of the Resolution 275 at the 55th Ordinary Session, on the Protection against Violence and other Human Rights Violations against Persons on the Basis of their Real or Imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity.
[5]SAHRC 2017 Research Brief: Gender; A "socio-political" analysis would suggest it is impossible to explore violence against LGBTIQ people without factoring in race, class and poverty, discourses around culture and religion, which are arguably informed by "social panic" around sex, sexuality, sexual orientation and gender.

and second, the widespread problem of violence within South African society.[6] Indeed over time SOGIE-based violence and discrimination had become institutionalised religion, culture and tradition.

In December 2017, the Commission in partnership with the Network of African National Human Rights Institutions (NANHRI) hosted a 2-day In-country meeting on SOGIE-based violence and discrimination where a range of challenges faced by the LGBTIQ community were discussed. One of the recommendations that emerged from this meeting was the need for the Commission to prepare a thematic discussion paper on the subject of violence and discrimination that is perpetrated on the basis of SOGIE.

A further recommendation was that a stakeholder engagement should be held to explore practical solutions to these challenges at the grassroots level of South African society. While much has been said about the challenges of discrimination and violence on the basis of SOGIE, not as much has been achieved in practice to ensure the full realization of the constitutionally guaranteed rights of LGBTIQ persons. While this paper does not purport to address all the challenges faced by LGBTIQ persons, it does however highlight identified challenged experienced by LGBTIQ persons in their interaction with the justice system. The paper (1) takes forward the recommendations of the NANHRI's In-country meeting and (2) advances ways in which issues of violence and discrimination in this context can be addressed - with a focus on the relationship between the justice system and the survivor[7] of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination.

[6]See Jeremy Schaap, "Corrective Rape," ESPN, May 11, 2010, http://espn.go.com/video/clip?id=5181871. See also, the sentiments of former Justice Albie Sachs in National Coalition of Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others (1998) (6) BCLR 726 at paras 127 and 128.

[7]Throughout this paper, the term 'survivor' is used instead of to 'victim'. This use of language is used to affirm the experiences of persons against whom SOGIE-based violence or discrimination was inflicted, it implies progression over stagnancy, and it serves as a term of empowerment. "Victim"-izing someone morphs one's identity into simply being a victim.

2. EMERGING AND SYSTEMATIC ISSUES ARISING

One does not need to search far for evidence that illustrates the disconnect between South Africa's policy and legislative framework on the one hand, and the actual lived experiences of LGBTIQ persons on the other. For instance, among the results of the 2015 Gauteng City-Region Observatory Quality of Life Survey,[8] 14 percent of Gauteng residents support violence against members of the LGBTIQ community.[9] This number is representative of some 1.26 million people in the province, and reportedly reflects an increase from 13 percent in 2013.[10] This is perhaps evidenced by the high prevalence of physical and sexual attacks in townships against (particularly black) lesbians, carried out under the guise of trying to 'cure' lesbians of their sexual orientation (corrective rape).[11] Equally shocking, only 56 percent of respondents felt that gays and lesbians deserve equal rights. This is a reportedly significant drop compared to 2013, when 71 percent agreed with the same statement.[12]

One of the biggest gaps is between justice system on the one hand, and the LGBTIQ person's interaction with the system on the other hand. While this gap was identified earlier, the urgency of addressing it was identified by the National Task Team on Gender and Sexual Orientation-based Violence (NTT) with its establishment of a Rapid Response Team, comprised of representatives of the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development (DoJ&CD), National Prosecuting Authority (NPA), South African Police Service (SAPS) and civil society organisations (CSO). The NTT noted that the "deprioritisation, marginalisation, exclusion and targeted victimisation by those public institutions intended to provide services and protection … for LGBTI persons … lead to a lack of resources when crimes are committed and result in victims' fear to even report crimes."[13]

[8]Available at 2015 Gauteng City-Region Observatory Quality of Life Survey http://www.gcro.ac.za/media/redactor_files/GCRO_QoL_2015_Press_pack_low_res.pdf (Accessed 02 December).
[9]This study is limited to the Province of Gauteng and is used here only for illustrative purposes.
[10]2015 Gauteng City-Region Observatory Quality of Life Survey, Figure 9, page 2.
[11]Nondumiso Tracy Hlongwane, Corrective rape as an anti-lesbian hate crime in South African law: A critique of the legal approach, Dissertation Submitted in Partial Fulfilment of the Degree Masters in Medical Law at the University of KwaZulu-Natal, College of Law And Management Studies, School of Law, Howard College Campus, 2016; Melanie Judge, violence against lesbians and (im)possibilities for identity and politics, A thesis submitted in fulfilment of the requirements for the degree of Doctor of Philosophy in the Department of Women's and Gender Studies at the University of the Western Cape, 2015.
[12]2015 Gauteng City-Region Observatory Quality of Life Survey, Figure 8, Page 6.
[13]National Intervention Strategy for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) Sector, Available at http://www.justice.gov.za/vg/lgbti/NIS-LGBTIProgramme.pdf.

This institutional violence is very often coupled with the infliction of secondary victimization of the survivors themselves. For instance, evidence was heard in SAHRC v Qwelane[14] that after a black lesbian woman was raped, SAPS officials responded to her attempt to lay a charge by saying that lesbians are 'boys', and 'boys cannot be raped'.

As evidenced by the recent Nare Mphela Equality Court case brought by the Commission, such victimisation takes place in all spaces including the school environment and as well as the judiciary.[15] In this case, between 2013 and 2014, Nare, a transgender girl, was the victim of ongoing discrimination by the school and the principal. This created a hostile and intimidating environment surrounding her gender identity which, among other things, led to her failing her matriculation examinations in 2014. What is important for purposes of this discussion, is the fact that even after hearing evidence of Nare's self-identification as a transgender girl, the presiding officer continued to note that "[t]he court will refer, where necessary, to [t]he Complainant in the male form." Although appearing very subtle, this is nonetheless further victimisation of Nare and is evidence that much work still needs to be done to achieve substantive equality and dignity for LGBTIQ persons, especially in their interaction with the justice system at all levels.

As there is growing confrontation of racism (as evidenced by, among others, the H&M,[16] Dove[17] or Panny Sparrow[18] incidents), it appears that increasing levels of homophobia are not being addressed by our society with the same rigour as racism. For instance, very little was reported in the mainstream media on the 2015 murder of Bobby Motlatla who was stabbed 39 times and raped for being gay; or the recent murder of Kagiso Ishmael Maema, a 25-year-old transgender woman from Rustenburg; or the brutal murder of Joey and Anisha van Niekerk who were raped and set on fire in December 2017. Even when incidents are publicised on social media, they are met with homophobic and hateful comments.

[14] Qwelane v The South African Human Rights Commission (36314/13) [2014] ZAGPJHC 334.
[15] Nare Phillemon Mphela and Others v Limpopo Provincial Department of Education, in the Equality Court, Seshego, 2017.
[16] http://www.bbc.com/news/world-africa-42675665
[17] https://www.news24.com/SouthAfrica/News/racist-dove-ad-causes-outrage-on-social-media-20171008
[18] https://citizen.co.za/news/south-africa/927765/kzn-estate-agent-calls-black-people-monkeys/

3. APPLICABLE LEGAL AND POLICY FRAMEWORK

A. INTERNATIONAL AND REGIONAL LEGAL FRAMEWORK

South Africa is a State party to the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR), which, among others, prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex (but not sexual orientation). In the case of Toonen v Australia, the United Nations Human Rights Committee held that, even though the ICCPR did not expressly mention sexual orientation, the ICCPR was sufficiently broad to include sexual orientation as part of the anti-discrimination provisions of the ICCPR.[19]

At a regional level, the African human rights framework imposes obligations, through the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Charter), to protect and ensure respect for a broad range of civil, political, economic, social, and cultural rights central to the experiences of members of the LGBTIQ community. Similar to the ICCPR the Charter does not expressly prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

However, the question of SOGIE-based violence has, at least recently, been on the African Commission's[20] agenda, evidenced through the adoption of Resolution 275,[21] which calls on States to end all acts of violence and abuse, whether committed by State or non-State actors, including by enacting and effectively applying appropriate laws prohibiting and punishing all forms of violence including those targeting persons on the basis of their imputed or real sexual orientation or gender identities, ensuring proper investigation and diligent prosecution of perpetrators, and establishing judicial procedures responsive to the needs of survivors.

[19] Toonen v Australia, Communication No. 488/1992, U.N. Doc CCPR/C/50/D/488/1992 (1994).
[20] African Commission on Human and People's Rights.
[21] African Commission on Human and People's Rights, Resolution on Protection against Violence and other Human Rights Violations against Persons on the basis of their real or imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity.

B. SOUTH AFRICAN LEGAL AND POLICY FRAMEWORK

In the South African context, the point of departure must, of course, be the Constitution, which makes the achievement of equality a founding value of the Republic of South Africa; while Section 9 thereof, guarantees the right to equality and prohibits discrimination on the basis of sex, gender and sexual orientation respectively, and applies to the State and to private parties alike.

Various statutes were intended to give effect to the Constitutional right to equality, the most salient of which for purposes of this paper is the Equality Act,[22] which is the national legislation mandated by Section 9(4) of the Constitution, and accordingly, enjoys special constitutional status. Significantly, the Act identifies the need to address systemic discrimination and is intended for 'eradication of social and economic inequalities'.[23] The Act gives effect to the letter and spirit of the Constitution by prohibiting unfair discrimination, protecting human dignity and providing measures to eradicate unfair discrimination, hate speech and harassment, particularly on the grounds of race, gender and disability.[24]

While the prohibited grounds of discrimination in the Act resemble those listed in Section 9 of the Constitution, the Act seeks to provide additional grounds by including "any other ground" where discrimination on that ground causes or maintains systemic disadvantages, undermines human dignity, or adversely affects the equal enjoyment of a person's rights and freedoms in a serious manner that is comparable to discrimination based on any traditional ground. This broad approach in the Act successfully acts as a catch-all approach, with the burden being placed on judicial officers to determine whether conduct not expressly listed as one of the prohibited grounds is, indeed, prohibited.

[22]Promotion of and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, 4 of 2000 ("PEPUDA or Equality Act").
[23]See Preamble to the Equality Act.
[24]SAHRC Research Brief on Race, 2017.

In 2017 the South African Police Service (SAPS) adopted a policy aimed at the respect, protection and promotion of the rights of LGBTIQ persons – the Standard Operation Procedure.[25] This policy, which applies to all SAPS members – particularly those who provide frontline services, mandates suitable, supportive services and skilled and sensitized personnel when dealing with members of the LGBTIQ community. The policy largely prohibits secondary victimisation, which is often experiences by LGBTIQ survivors from SAPS members, through the use of language, survivor-friendly interview rooms, confidentiality, behaviour etc. The policy further mandates SAPS station lectures to include content on LGBTIQ issues for all functional SAPS members.

[25]The Standard Operating Procedure to Respect, Protect and Promote the Rights of Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex Persons, V002/2017.

4. KNOWLEDGE AND POLICY GAPS

A. SECONDARY VICTIMISATION WITHIN THE JUSTICE SYSTEM

While the legal and policy framework in respect of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination in South Africa is relatively inclusive and progressive, its existence on paper has thus far proven insufficient to reduce SOGIE-based violence and discrimination on the ground. LGBTIQ persons have to be empowered to know and use the laws and policies in order to protect themselves. A study has shown that victims of SOGIE violence and discrimination in South Africa often thought they had received sufficient service from health, police and justice service providers, until what they were in fact entitled to in terms of the law was explained to them. It is only then that participants realised that they had in fact received very poor service.[26]

A typical example is access or use of the Equality Court systems - which were meant for the achievement of individual or collective redress in cases of prejudice-based violence and discrimination. There are reports of systematic and prohibitive barriers to effective access to Equality Courts with problems including untrained or insensitive personnel or lack of awareness about these courts.[27] Another example of this is the remarks of the presiding officer in the Nare Mphela case referenced above.

This lack of appreciation of the legal framework is also evident in those officials and agencies responsible for implementing and applying the policies and laws, often resulting in secondary victimisation (and even structural violence).[28]

Often the obligation to provide basic information about rights and processes falls on the "first responders" or "[f]rontline service providers", who are, for instance, police officers in police stations, clerks of Equality Courts, health care providers or officials at other community or social service centers.

[26]Bornman S, Dey K, Meltz R, Rangasami J, Williams J (2013) Protecting Survivors of Sexual Offences - The Legal Obligations of the State With Regard to Sexual Offences in South Africa

[27]Reports were heard at the NANHRI In-Country Meeting of SOGIE-based violence and Discrimination, held in Rosebank on 29 December 2017 and hosted by the Commission.

[28]Parenzee, P (2014). A guiding document to the Shukumisa Dossier: A resource on available documents pertaining to the formulation and implementation of legislation and related policies pertaining to Sexual Offences in South Africa: 2003 – 2014. The Shukumisa Campaign; Vetten, L (2014) Domestic violence in South Africa, Policy Brief 71. The Institute for Security Studies: Pretoria.

These officials have the crucial responsibility to provide accurate information in a language and manner that the survivor in question understands, and they also serve as a survivor's first impression of the justice and or social service system.[29]

It is most often the interaction with these frontline service providers that gives rise to secondary victimisation — particularly in the case of LGBTIQ survivors, who face the personal ignorance and prejudice of officials in trying to access government and social services to which the legislative and policy framework entitle them.[30]

It was reported that by March 2015 the SAPS had established survivor friendly rooms at 897 of their 1 138 police stations across the country. In 2015 monitoring by the Civilian Secretariat for Police found that not all of these rooms were functional or resourced. This is despite the fact that the SAPS reported to parliament that 100 percent of its police stations provide "survivor friendly services".[31]

B. THE JUSTICE SYSTEM AND SURVIVORS OF SOGIE-BASED VIOLENCE AND DISCRIMINATION

While many survivors of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination do not understand and as a result cannot effectively navigate the justice system, many often seek legal assistance and/or representation. Since private legal representation is prohibitively expensive, particularly for black and/or disadvantaged survivors, a disproportionally low number of such survivors approach the Commission or civil society organisations (CSOs) for redress, while only a small minority are able to afford private legal representation. A disjuncture is created as the cost of litigation is prohibitive for the poor who as a result are unable to enjoy their constitutionally guaranteed rights.

The limited understanding of legal processes by South Africans remains an impediment to full comprehension of individual rights and how these can be realised.

[29]Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTIQ Persons in South Africa, Submission to the UN Human Rights Committee in response to the Initial Report by South Africa under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights at the 116th session of the Human Rights Committee (Geneva, March 2016) (hereafter Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTIQ Persons in South Africa) Available at http://tbinternet.ohchr.org/Treaties/CCPR/Shared%20Documents/ZAF/INT_CCPR_CSS_ZAF_23069_E.pdf page 6.
[30]Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTI Persons in South Africa page 7.
[31]In a briefing of the parliamentary Portfolio Committee on Police, on 18 August 2015, available at http://pmgassets.s3-website-eu-west-1.amazonaws.com/150818saps.pdf

Victims of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination are as a result unable to understand their rights, including what they are entitled to especially in terms of service delivery or possible recourse in cases where their rights are not respected.

There is a need for a legal aid system (similar to the existing legal aid as established by the Legal Aid South Africa Act 39 of 2014) for survivors of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination. In theory, access to free legal advice and representation for SOGIE-based violence and discrimination is possible for everyone through the government system of legal aid, managed by the Legal Aid Board.[32] However, the reality is that access to a legal aid representative is only automatically and unconditionally available to those who find themselves in conflict with the law (perpetrators and accused persons) and not to those who are survivors and complainants of discrimination and violence cases.[33]

As evidenced by the Legal Aid South Africa Annual Report 2016/17[34] the bulk of the resources of Legal Aid South Africa is allocated to representation in criminal courts for those who find themselves in conflict with the law – predominantly cis-gendered men. Thus it is the latter who benefit most from the legal aid system at the expense of women and other members of the LGBTIQ community, who are more often survivors of gender-based violence and/or SOGIE-based violence and discrimination. Thus, the relevant legislation must be amended to require the Legal Aid Board to make legal representation available to survivors in certain instances.

C. THE NEED FOR DISAGGREGATED DATA

In recent years significant efforts have been made by civil society[35] and the Commission[36] to call for a reform in the manner in which data about sexual and other violence is collected and reported to the public. In 2017, the Department of Justice in partnership with European Union begun conducting a study of methods of data collection on incidents of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance.

[32]As established by the Legal Aid South Africa Act 39 of 2014.
[33]Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTI Persons in South Africa.
[34]Available at http://www.legal-aid.co.za/wp-content/uploads/2017/09/ANR-Legal-Aid-SA_2017.pdf (Accessed 29 November 2017).
[35]In November 2014, and again in October 2015; See also Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTI Persons in South Africa page 8.

The study is aimed at providing technical assistance to the Department, and to analyse the existing data sources and methods of data collection on incidents of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance in the public and private sector. This need for disaggregated data was discussed in 2016 at the Commission and Department of Justice's First Regional African Seminar on Finding Practical Solutions for Addressing Violence and Discrimination Based on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression in Johannesburg, South Africa from 3rd to 5th March 2016. It was identified earlier, and again at this dialogue, that there is a need for adequate resourcing for the development of a system which captures and stores disaggregated data relating to SOGIE-based discrimination and violence, as well as training of officials.[37]

The SAPS routinely announces figures of reported crimes on an annual basis. For instance, it was reported that April 2014 to March 2015 a national total of 53 617 sexual offences were reported.[38] However, these figure remains largely unhelpful in the absence of disaggregation in respect of Gender, Offence and Prejudice-motivated crimes.[39]

For instance, in relation to Gender, it is not possible to tell from the lump sum figure of reported sexual offences what proportion of survivors were male (or male identified) or female (or female identified), and children, or whether the incident was motivated by hate or prejudice towards to the LGBTIQ community. This kind of disaggregated data should be the basis and should inform policy makers, government, CSO's and state institutions' interventions here. In the absence of disaggregated data, it becomes impossible to gain a comprehensive appreciation of the nature and scope of violence against LGBTIQ persons in South Africa. Moreover, it becomes difficult, if not impossible, to develop targeted and informed interventions according to real experiences of LGBTIQ persons.[40]

Further, there is a need for a shift in focus, away from the number of reported incidents, and towards the removal of barriers to reporting gender and/or SOGIE-based violence.[41]

[36]2017 Research brief on race and equality in South Africa, page 22.
[37]Ekurhuleni Declaration of 5 March 2016 on Practical Solutions on Ending Violence and Discrimination against Persons Based on Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity and Expression
[38]South African national crime statistics, available at http://www.saps.gov.za/resource_centre/publications/statistics/crimestats/2015/crime_stats.php
[39]Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTI Persons in South Africa page 8.
[40]Thorpe, J (2014), Financial Year Estimates for Spending on Gender-Based Violence by the South African Government at 4.
[41]Thematic Report on Violence against Women and LGBTI Persons in South Africa page 9.

To this end the Police Minister has adopted the Policy on Reducing Barriers to the Reporting of Gender Based and Domestic Violence. This policy addresses “service delivery barriers faced by vulnerable groups, including LGBTIQ persons, and persons with disabilities. It has three strategic objectives: to establish uniform norms, standards and mechanisms forthe co-ordination and implementation of the [Sexual Offences Act] of 2007; to develop and strengthen coordinated services; to provide resources for the effective implementation of [Sexual Offences Act] of 2007 and its National Policy Framework.” Although informed by a binary interpretation of gender, this policy is an overdue step in the right direction. Like with many others of its kind, serious investments must be made into its implementation and monitoring of such implementation.

5. CONCLUSIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

What seems clear is that even though some gaps exist, the legal and policy framework in respect of SOGIE-based violence and discrimination in South Africa is fairly inclusive and progressive. However, the policies and laws still need to be implemented consistently in order to address SOGIE-based violence and discrimination – particularly within the justice system. The following recommendations are therefore advanced by the Commission in this respect:

(1) The Department of Justice and Constitutional Development at all levels must continue to make targeted efforts to make information about the substantive content of the law available in an accessible and inclusive manner, which takes into account the social realities of South African life where people often have low levels of education, inadequate means to access legal assistance, as well as language barriers. Information must be provided in plain language and should be easily accessible in police stations, government offices, clinics, schools and other public places.

(2) The Department of Education, the Department of Arts and Culture and the Department of Justice must encourage the use of Equality Courts in local communities. All efforts must be geared towards popularisation of these courts, with a focus on rural areas and townships.

(3) The South African Police Service and Statistics South Africa must ensure that data collection relating to crimes motivated by one's actual or imputed SOGIE is accurate and disaggregated in respect of Gender, Offence and Prejudice-motivated crimes. The data should be made accessible to relevant entities including the Commission.

(4) The Department of Justice and Constitutional Development, working with the National Task Team and Civil Society Organisations must implement national training programs for all public service providers and border control officials including SAPS, legal professionals, NPA and the judiciary in order to sensitise them to the rights and needs of all survivors of crime, discrimination and violence on the basis of SOGIE. This includes the development of comprehensive education and sensitisation, including on education related to human rights, SOGIE for purposes of training SAPS and those involved in the justice system, including clerks, police, prosecutors and the judiciary.

(5) The relevant legislation must be amended to require the Legal Aid Board to make legal representation available to survivors in certain instances.

(6) The NTT must take the lead in strengthening inter-departmental and inter-sectoral collaboration for an effective approach to SOGIE-based violence and discrimination experienced by survivors in the justice system, and generally in all forms.

RESEARCH BRIEF ON

GENDER AND EQUALITY

IN SOUTH AFRICA

2013 - 2017

Research Brief on Gender and Equality in South Africa 2013 - 2017

Table of contents

Abbreviations and Acronyms

CEDAW	United Nations Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women
CGE	Commission for Gender Equality
DOJCD	Department of Justice and Constitutional Development
EEA	Employment Equity Act, 55 of 1998
GBV	Gender-Based Violence
HIV	Human Immunodeficiency Virus
HRC	United Nations Human Rights Council
LGBTI	Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex
NDP	National Development Plan 2030
NGO	Non-Governmental Organisation
NHRI	National Human Rights Institution
NIS	National Intervention Strategy
NPA	National Prosecuting Authority
NTT	National Task Team on Gender and Sexual Orientation-Based Violence
PEPUDA	Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, 4 of 2000
SAHRC	South African Human Rights Commission
SAPS	South African Police Service
SOGIE	Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression
Stats SA	Statistics South Africa
UN	United Nations

1 INTRODUCTION

South Africa remains the most unequal country in the world, measured in terms of income and wealth.[1] Inequality often overlaps with poverty, socio-economic disadvantage, and race. When inequality manifests as unfair discrimination, vulnerable groups such as women or those who do not conform to traditional gender roles, face multiple forms of discrimination in addition to suffering from societal norms and structures that perpetuate disadvantage for those who are 'different'.

Historically, in South Africa and globally, women have been marginalised and regarded as unequal compared to their male counterparts in terms of social and power relations. In response to gendered inequality, the founding provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996, explicitly provide for a democratic state based on, amongst others, the value of 'non-sexism'.[2] Nevertheless, structural gender divisions of labour, both paid and unpaid, continue to lie at the heart of many cultural and social practices in South Africa. Women are often defined in relation to motherhood, and are regarded as socially responsible for caring for others and the provision of basic services such as water, sustenance and education. As a result, women often suffer disadvantage in the formal economy and labour market, while those who perform unpaid 'women's work' bear a disproportionate – and largely unacknowledged – burden.[3] In addition, poverty remains a persistent contributing factor to gender inequality, particularly for women residing within rural areas of South Africa. This is one of the reasons why women are so often rendered vulnerable as victims of exploitation, violence, and ill health including increased susceptibility to HIV/AIDS.

However, gendered inequality does not only exist as between women and men. Currently, and despite constitutional and legislative protections, serious violations of the rights to life and dignity of the Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) community occur frequently in South Africa. Gender Based Violence (GBV) is directed against women and girl-children as well as against persons based on their sexual orientation, gender identity and expression (SOGIE). Consequently, this research brief aims to address not only the current state of the equality rights of women in South Africa, but also – to a more limited extent[4] – that of the LGBTI community.[5]

Ultimately, this research brief does not aim to provide a comprehensive overview of gender equality in South Africa. It presents an outlook on some of the key challenges that have arisen in the period between 2013 and 2017, bearing in mind that further focus will be placed on gender equality in a separate, forthcoming research brief. In addition, selected developments and responses to these equality-related challenges are highlighted. Furthermore, the South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC or Commission) is cognisant of the important mandate of the Commission for Gender Equality, and this research brief is consequently limited in scope to those areas that fall within the SAHRC's own mandate.

---

1 Stats SA Millennium Development Goals 1: Eradicate Extreme Poverty and Hunger 2015 (2015) x; World Bank GINI Index (2014) <http://data.worldbank.org/indicator/SI.POV.GINI>.

2 S 1(b) of the Constitution.

3 See generally B Goldblatt 'Gender, Poverty and the Development of the Right to Social Security' (2014) 10 International Journal of Law in Context 460.

4 This is due to the gender binary approach evident from the existing national and international legal framework relevant to gender equality.

5 With a focus specifically on gender identity and GBV directed against lesbian women – see section 8 below.

2 THE MANDATE OF THE SAHRC

The SAHRC is mandated by section 184 of the Constitution to promote respect for human rights and a culture of human rights; to promote the protection, development and attainment of human rights; and to monitor and assess the observance of human rights in South Africa. The Commission does so through a number of means, one of which is by conducting research.[6]

3 APPLICABLE LEGAL FRAMEWORKS

3.1 South African legal and policy framework

The Constitution makes the achievement of equality a foundational value of the Republic of South Africa, while section 9 of the Constitution guarantees the right to equality. It does so by providing for equality of all before the law, allowing for positive redress measures to advance previously disadvantaged persons, and by prohibiting unfair discrimination by the state and by individuals. In addition, the Constitution includes provisions that consider the need for the state to actively advance equitable access to land (section 25(5)); housing (section 26(2)); health care; food, water and social assistance (section 27(2)); and equity in education (sections 29(1)(b) and 29(2)(a)).

Various statutes aim to give effect to the constitutional right to equality, the most prominent of which for purposes of this research brief are the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act, 4 of 2000 (PEPUDA) and the Employment Equity Act, 55 of 1998 (EEA). PEPUDA is the national legislation mandated by section 9(4) of the Constitution, and thus enjoys special constitutional status. Significantly, the Act recognises the need to address systemic discrimination and specifically aims at the 'eradication of social and economic inequalities'.[7] In terms of section 13 of PEPUDA, discrimination based on the prohibited ground of gender is considered unfair, unless it is established that the discrimination is fair. Section 8 of PEPUDA stipulates that no person may unfairly discriminate against any person on the ground of gender, and goes on to list various prohibited forms of gender-based discrimination. For purposes of this research brief, the following provisions of section 8 are pertinent:

> (a) gender-based violence; …
> (d) any practice, including traditional, customary or religious practice, which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men, including the undermining of the dignity and well-being of the girl child;
> (e) any policy or conduct that unfairly limits access of women to land rights, finance, and other resources; …
> (g) limiting women's access to social services or benefits, such as health, education and social security; …
> (i) systemic inequality of access to opportunities by women as a result of the sexual division of labour.

6 S 184(2)(c) of the Constitution.
7 See Preamble to PEPUDA.

Following a review of PEPUDA, numerous suggestions for its improvement were made. The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Amendment Bill is, at the time of writing, being drafted by the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development (DOJCD). The Commission, as Chair of the Equality Review Committee, will be monitoring this process closely.

Another important Act that will be referred to throughout this research brief is the Employment Equity Act. The EEA was passed in order to promote equal opportunity and fair treatment in employment through the elimination of unfair discrimination. The EEA promotes substantive equality through the implementation of affirmative action to ensure redress and equitable representation in the workforce. Section 28 of the EEA established the Commission for Employment Equity (CEE) which submits an annual report and advises the Minister of Labour on matters relating to the realisation of the objectives of the EEA.

3.2 International and regional legal frameworks

As a state party to the Convention on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women (CEDAW), South Africa must take action against all forms of discrimination against women, in order to realise substantive equality.

South Africa has also ratified the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (the African Charter), which contains numerous provisions directly relevant for equality and non-discrimination, including Article 2 which requires that 'every individual shall be entitled to the enjoyment of rights and freedoms… without distinction of any kind', and Article 3(1) which states that 'every individual shall be equal before the law'. Article 13(2) provides for equal access of citizens to public services, while Article 13(3) states that 'every individual shall have the right of access to public property in strict equality of all persons before the law'. The duties set out in the Charter include the duty of individuals to 'respect and consider his [sic] fellow beings without discrimination'. The equality of peoples is further recognised in Article 22 that guarantees the right to economic, social and cultural development of all peoples with due regard to their freedom and identity to 'equal enjoyment of the common heritage of mankind'. South Africa has also ratified the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa (the Maputo Protocol), which provides for the protection of women and girl-children, as well as for the eradication of discrimination against women. Significant aspects of the Women's Protocol include the elimination of harmful cultural practices (Article 5), the right to peace (Article 9), and a comprehensive list of reproductive rights for women in Article 14.

Lastly, South Africa was instrumental in the drafting the Southern African Development Community's Protocol on Gender and Development, and signed the Protocol in 2008. The Protocol highlights a regional commitment to gender equality and recognises the importance of gender equality for development.

> "South Africa must take action against all forms of discrimination against women, in order to realise substantive equality."

4 CONCEPTUALISING EQUALITY

The following research brief aims to provide a facts-based account of the state of gender equality in South Africa. Nonetheless, it is useful to provide a brief overview of some key equality-related concepts that are often used in legislation and by government, judges, human rights practitioners, civil society actors and academics.

Gender equality can be thought of in a 'formal' or 'substantive' sense. Formal gender equality refers to laws and policies that appear gender neutral by treating everyone the same. Such laws and policies may in fact cement existing gender inequalities since they do not seek to change an unequal status quo. Structural or systemic inequalities – in other words, unequal structures, hierarchies and power relationships that underlie our society and economy and that prejudice women and persons based on their SOGIE – are therefore left unaddressed. As the Constitutional Court has stated, '[a]lthough the long term goal of our constitutional order is equal treatment, insisting upon equal treatment in established inequality may well result in the entrenchment of that inequality'.[8] The idea of formal equality remains useful in cases of direct discrimination based on gender or gender identity, but falls short in dealing with cases of indirect discrimination, where equal treatment prejudices those who are different. Formal equality is similarly incapable of addressing structural inequalities inherited from the apartheid era, which are currently reflected in South Africa's huge income gap and grossly unequal distribution of wealth and land.

Whereas formal equality tries to ensure equal treatment for all regardless of their identities, substantive equality aims to achieve equal outcomes by treating people and groups differently.[9] Different treatment is justified where some people are discriminated against on the basis of their identities or characteristics. This is reflected in the constitutional endorsement of positive redress measures, or 'affirmative action', in section 9(2). This places an obligation on the state to adopt legislative and other measures aimed at creating equal opportunities and achieving equal outcomes particularly with regard to employment and education. Since fundamental inequalities exist in society and the economy, it is crucial that private actors work together with the state to achieve substantive equality.

Closely related to affirmative action is the concept of reasonable accommodation. Reasonable accommodation is defined in the EEA as 'any modification or adjustment to a job or to the working environment that will enable a person from a designated group to have access to or participate or advance in employment'. In terms of PEPUDA, failure to reasonably accommodate vulnerable groups amounts to unfair discrimination on, amongst others, the ground of gender. As explained by former Chief Justice Langa:

> At its core is the notion that sometimes the community, whether it is the State, an employer or a school, must take positive measures and possibly incur additional hardship or expense in order to allow all people to participate and enjoy all their rights equally. It ensures that we do not relegate people to the margins of society because they do not or cannot conform to certain social norms.[10]

8 President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SALR 1 (CC) 41 para 112 (per Justice O'Regan).
9 This is supported by the definition of 'equality' in PEPUDA: '"equality" includes the full and equal enjoyment of rights and freedoms as contemplated in the Constitution and includes de jure and de facto equality and also equality in terms of outcomes'.
10 MEC for Education: Kwazulu-Natal and Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC) para 73.

However, when equality of outcomes is advocated for, it must be remembered that equal outcomes can be achieved without addressing structures of society that perpetuate discrimination.[11] For example, a woman might be employed at the same level as her male counterpart, but to procure the job in question she might have had to conform to male working patterns that do not acknowledge her unpaid work related to motherhood or other caring responsibilities.[12] In cases of gender discrimination, reasonable accommodation might require an underlying societal norm to be changed, whereas in other instances a specific adjustment may need to be made to accommodate difference in a particular instance.[13] Substantive equality should therefore encompass more than equality of outcomes.[14]

“
In cases of gender discrimination, reasonable accommodation might require an underlying societal norm to be changed ... Substantive equality should therefore encompass more than equality of outcomes.
”

Finally, the concept of intersectionality is important in the context of equality. Intersectionality refers to cases where people face multiple forms of discrimination, based on their identities and character traits. For example, whereas a woman may face direct and indirect discrimination, a Black woman may be discriminated against on the bases of gender and race, whereas a Black homosexual woman faces discrimination based on gender, race and sexual orientation, and a poor Black lesbian faces additional discrimination on the ground of socio-economic disadvantage. In South Africa, poverty and socio-economic disadvantage intersect directly with race due to the legacy of apartheid, and affect women disproportionately.[15]

“
In South Africa, poverty and socio-economic disadvantage intersect directly with race due to the legacy of apartheid, and affect women disproportionately.
”

11 S Fredman ‘Substantive Equality Revisited’ (2014) University of Oxford Legal Research Paper Series No 70 1, 14.
12 Ibid.
13 Ibid 30.
14 Ibid in general.
15 Stats SA Poverty Trends in South Africa: An Examination of Absolute Poverty between 2006 and 2015 (2017) 56; Stats SA Poverty Trends in South Africa An Examination of Absolute Poverty between 2006 and 2011 (2014) 27, 40; Stats SA Quarterly Labour Force Survey: Quarter 2: 2016 (2016) 62; Stats SA Living Conditions Survey 2014/15 (2016) 15.

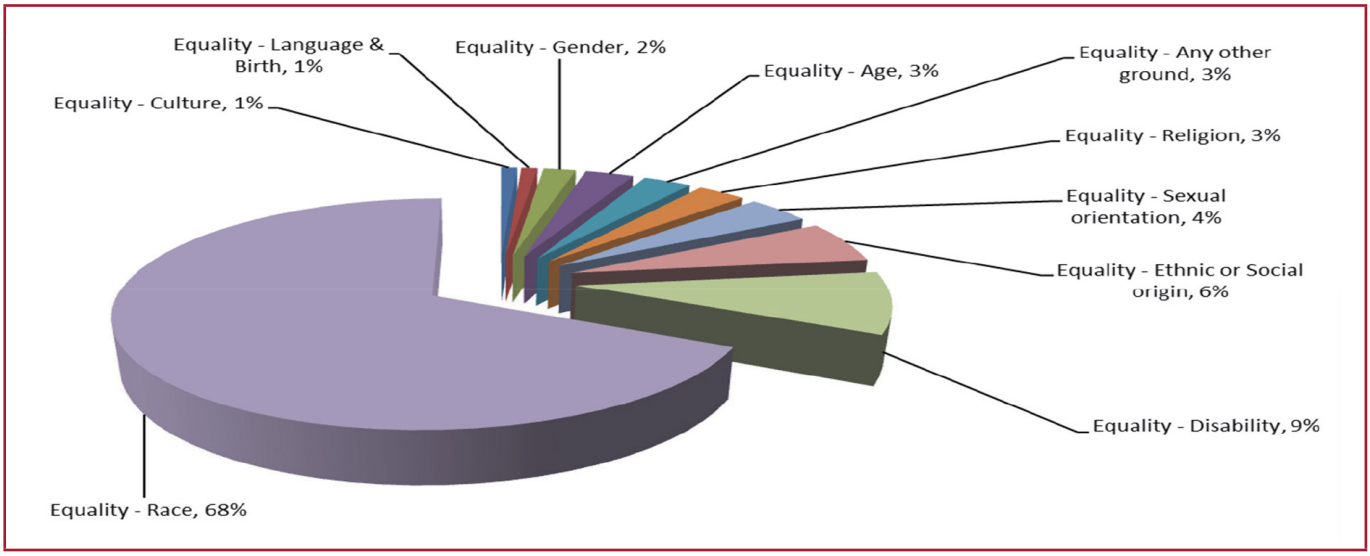
5 EMERGING TRENDS IN GENDER EQUALITY

5.1 Complaints received by the SAHRC

In terms of the complaints received by the SAHRC, violations of the right to equality continue to be the highest recorded grievance.[16] In the financial year ending 31 March 2016, 16 percent of the total complaints received alleged a violation of the right to equality. A total of 749[17] equality-related complaints were received. It is noted that gender-based complaints directed to the SAHRC are low in number because of the referral of cases to the Commission for Gender Equality (CGE).

Equality-related complaints from the public received by the SAHRC 1 April 2015 – 31 March 2016



> "...violations of the right to equality continue to be the highest recorded grievance. A total of 749 equality-related complaints were received."

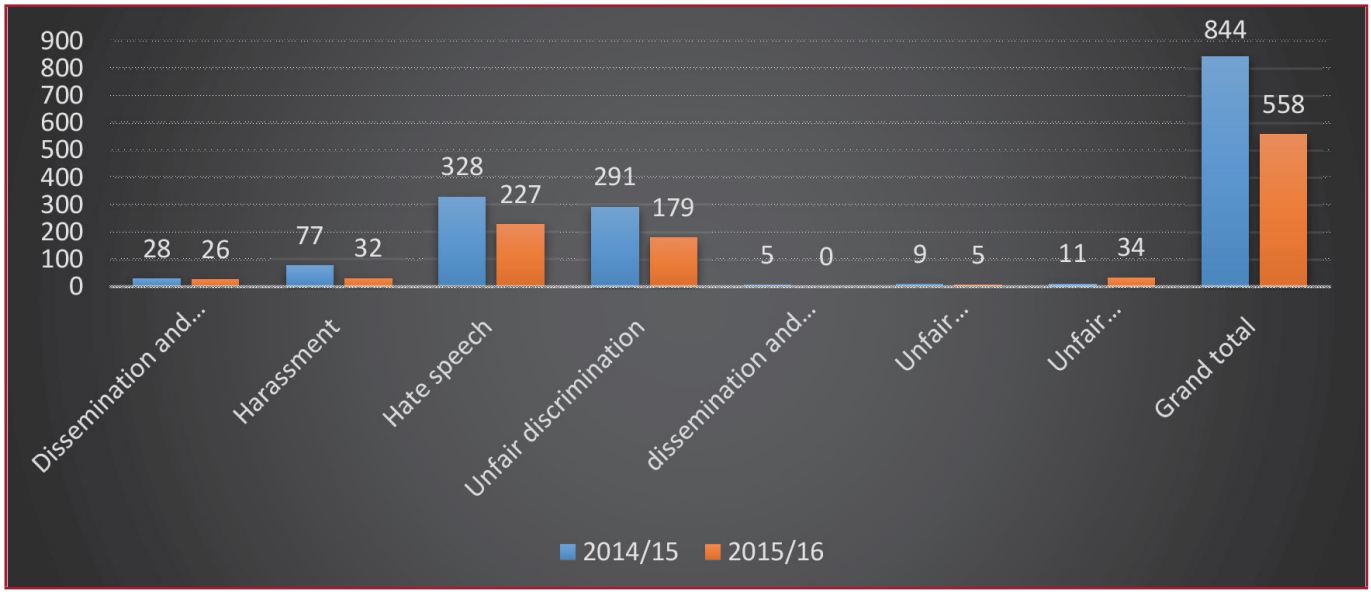
16 South African Human Rights Commission Annual Trends Analysis Report (2016) 31.
17 Ibid.

5.2 Equality Courts

The Equality Court was established in terms of PEPUDA to provide legal protection and recourse when violations of the right to equality occur. The Equality Courts hear matters regarding unfair discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds stipulated in PEPUDA, as well as matters concerning hate speech and harassment as prohibited by PEPUDA.[18]

In terms of the nature of complaints, it appears that complaints related to hate speech were especially prevalent, accounting for over 40 percent of overall grievances. Complaints of unfair discrimination represented the second largest proportion of Equality Court matters at 32 percent. [19] Unfortunately, disaggregated data indicating the ground on which hate speech or discrimination in Equality Court matters occurred, is not provided by the Department of Justice. Most Equality Court matters pursued by the SAHRC involved hate speech and discrimination based on race.

Department of Justice: Equality Court Complaints 2015/16[20]



> The Equality Courts hear matters regarding unfair discrimination on any of the prohibited grounds stipulated in PEPUDA, as well as matters concerning hate speech and harassment as prohibited by PEPUDA.

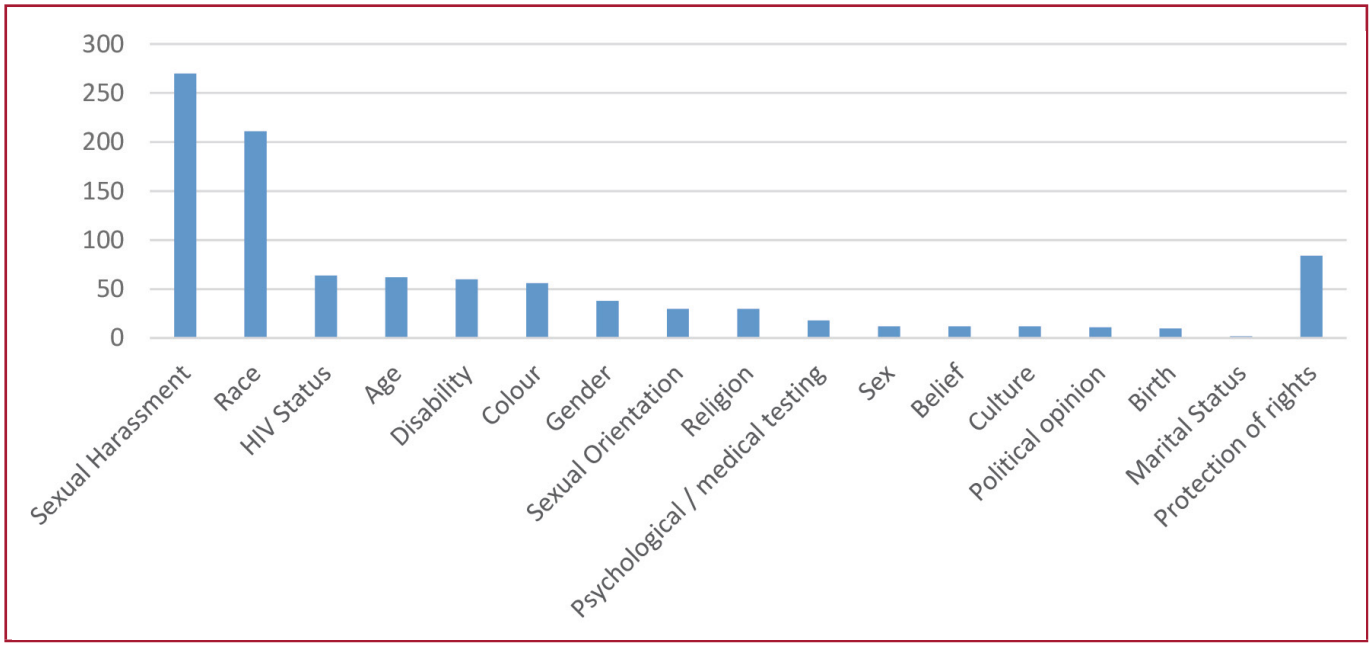
18 Ss 10 and 11 of PEPUDA.
19 Department of Justice and Constitutional Development Annual Report (2015/16) 34.
20 Figure reproduced from Department of Justice and Constitutional Development Annual Report (2015/16) 34.

5.3 Unfair discrimination in the workplace

PEPUDA defines 'harassment' as 'unwanted conduct which is persistent or serious and demeans, humiliates or creates a hostile or intimidating environment or is calculated to induce submission by actual or threatened adverse consequences and which is related to… sex, gender or sexual orientation…'.

The highest recorded forms of unfair discrimination experienced in the workplace are racism and sexual harassment.[21] According to the CCMA, the prohibited grounds of sexual harassment and race have consistently been the highest, with HIV and AIDS status, age, and disability rounding up the top five grounds of violations on average over this period.[22]

Unfair discrimination complaints on listed grounds at the CCMA: August 2014 to March 2016



On an annual basis, the Public Service Commission collects information on grievances lodged by employees in the public sector, with allegations of unfair treatment forming the second highest, accounting for approximately 22 percent of all complaints lodged in the 2014/15 financial year while rising to 24.5 percent of the total number of grievances lodged for 2015/16.[23] The vast majority of grievances lodged on the basis of unfair treatment relate to sexual harassment, and although the timeline for the resolution of complaints is set for 60 days, the public service frequently lags behind in meeting this deadline.

21 Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration Submission to the panel for the South African Human Rights Commission National Hearing on Unfair Discrimination in the Workplace (2016).

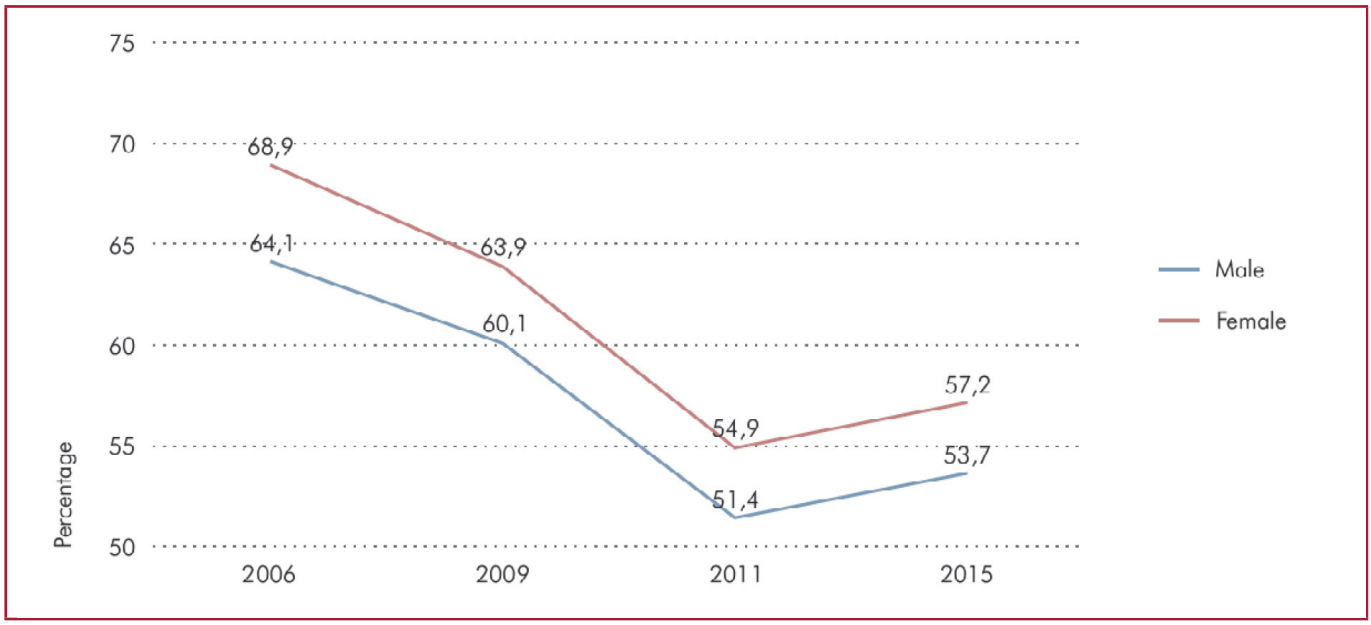
22 Ibid.

23 Public Service Commission Fact Sheet for the Grievance Resolution in the 2015/16 Financial Year (2016) 17. <http://www.psc.gov.za/documents/reports/2016/FACT%20SHEET%20ON%20GRIEVANCE%20RESOLUTION%20FOR%20THE%202015%20-%2016%20FY.pdf>.

6 GENDER AND ACCESS TO THE LABOUR MARKET, DIVERSE STREAMS OF INCOME AND EDUCATION

The fact that women have historically been marginalised and regarded as unequal compared to men in terms of social and power relations has given rise to significant social, cultural and economic inequalities. Women and girls from previously disadvantaged groups are today still disproportionately affected by poverty and its underlying determinants because of the legacy of apartheid:[24]

Poverty headcount based on sex[25]



In terms of household income, it is concerning that men earn almost twice what women earn on an annual basis,[26] with 56.01 percent of households in the lowest expenditure per capita quintile headed by women.[27] In terms of available data, reasons for this include under-representation of women in the workplace and a lack of access to alternative streams of income. However, it is encouraging to note that the participation rate of women in the workplace is gradually increasing, with approximately 43.8 percent[28] of South Africa's workforce now being female.[29] However, transformation is painstakingly slow, as can be seen from the data set out below.

24 Presidency of the Republic of South Africa South African CEDAW Report (2008) 6, 20; Government of the Republic of South Africa CESCR State Report (2017) 7, 21.
25 Figure reproduced from Stats SA Poverty Trends in South Africa: An Examination of Absolute Poverty between 2006 and 2015 (2017) 56.
26 Stats SA Living Conditions Survey 2014/15 (2016) 14.
27 Ibid 20.
28 Department of Women Report on the Status of Women in the South African Economy (2015) 66. This figure refers to the proportion of the employed population, while women make up 45.2 percent of the 'narrow' labour force, which includes those employed as well as those actively seeking employment (52).
29 Ibid 66.

6.1 Systemic inequality as a result of the sexual division of labour

Section 8(i) of PEPUDA prohibits unfair discrimination based on gender, including systemic inequality of access to opportunities by women as a result of the sexual division of labour.

Women remain underrepresented at top and senior management levels based on CEE data. At top management level, women constitute a mere 20.7 percent in the private sector, and 30.8 percent in the public sector.[30] At the senior management level, men are similarly over represented at decision-making levels in both the public (60.7 percent) and the private sector (68.5 percent), and this is evident in all provinces.[31] Negligible increases in female representation at top management level from 2014 to 2016 indicate that there continues to be a lack of opportunities for women at the top and senior management levels, which in turn reflects systemic inequality and indirect discrimination.

Workforce profile at top management level by gender: 2014 - 2016[32]

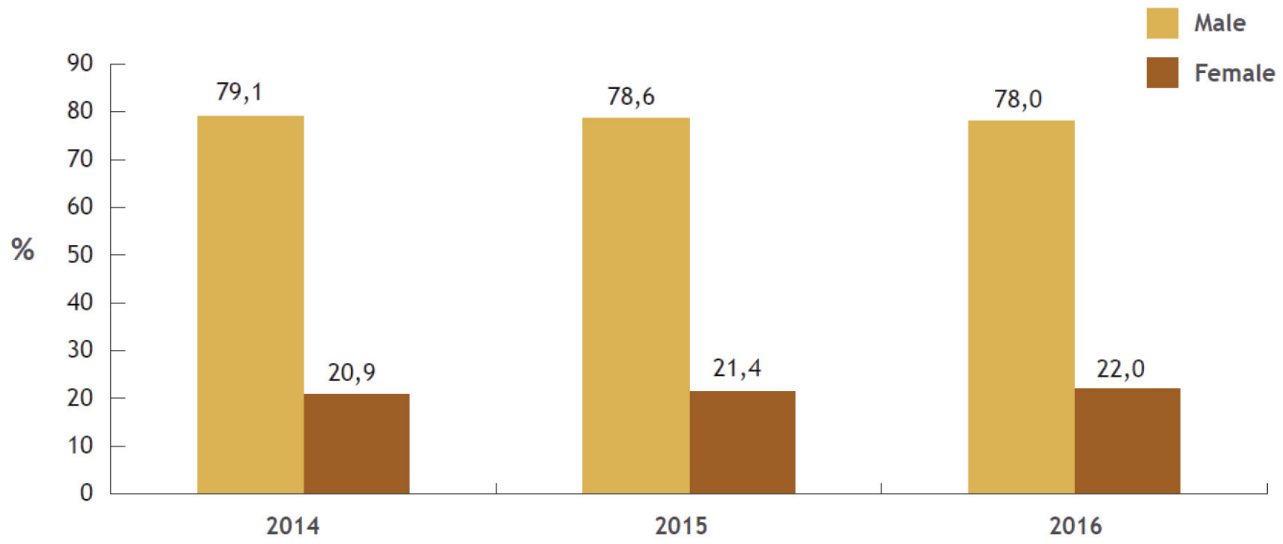

Figure 56 shows Female representation remains very low with the status static at just over 20% for the 2014 to 2016 period. Male representation on the other hand remains comparatively high with very little change in the status quo.

In addition, trends indicate that White male dominance is prevalent at the top levels across all sectors in the country, with a particular focus on the private sector.[33] According to 2016/17 CEE data, more than two-thirds majority male representation exists in the private sector (76.3 percent), as compared to 73.3 percent in local government and 62.6 percent in national government.[34] According to the same data, the sectors that are most in need of transformation by gender and race are the agricultural sector, which has an overwhelming concentration of White males at top management level (72.6 percent, increased from 72 percent in 2015/16); retail and motor trade/repair service with 62.7 percent White males at top management level (decreased from 64 percent in 2015/16); wholesale trade/commercial agents/allied services with 59 percent White males at top management level (decreased from 59.8 percent in 2015/16); and mining and quarrying at 56.3 percent (decreased from 59.9 percent in 2015/16).[35]

30 Commission for Employment Equity Annual Report 2016/17 (2017) 14.
31 Ibid 18-19.
32 Figure reproduced from Commission for Employment Equity Annual Report 2016/17 (2017) 55.
33 Ibid 16.
34 Ibid.
35 Ibid 14.

Slight decreases in these sectors indicate persistent inequality and reflects both systemic challenges as well as the intersection of gender and race as grounds for indirect discrimination.

The multiple forms of discrimination that women other than those from the White population group face, is again illustrated by the fact that White women have the most representation in all sectors at top management level compared with women of other race groups.[36] This is evident in several sectors including the community, social and personal services sector (15.3 percent) which predominantly comprises government, and the catering/accommodation/other trade sectors (21.8 percent).[37] Interestingly, in educational institutions, White women (34 percent) are the highest represented group at the senior management level (but not at top management level) and exceed the representation of 25.2 percent White males.[38] An increase in the number of foreign nationals is noted, especially among men within educational institutions.

6.2 Systemic inequality limiting access of women to land rights and alternative streams of income

Section 8(e) of PEPUDA prohibits unfair discrimination on the ground of gender, including 'any policy or conduct that unfairly limits access of women to land rights, finance, and other resources'. Land presents one potential alternative avenue of income to that derived from work, and an inability by women to access this stream of income due to discriminatory practices again points to systemic inequality. Furthermore, prevalence of income derived from pensions, social insurance and family allowances may indicate a systemic inability to access more mainstream sources of finance, resources and income. This is demonstrated by the fact that income from these sources represented a larger share (over 50 percent) than income from work in the three lowest income per capita deciles, whereas it accounted for less than 10 percent of income for each of the upper three deciles.[39]

Statistics South Africa's Living Conditions Survey indicates that men earn more income from imputed rent on an owned dwelling than women, with male-headed households earning an average of R 23 047 in this respect, compared to the average of R14 871 earned by female-headed households.[40] Additionally, in terms of complaints received by the CGE, annual trends for the financial year 2013/14 indicate that the highest identified ground for complaints received was for matters relating to estates. These complaints made up 12 percent of the 894 complaints received by the CGE.[41] Although estates do not necessarily include land and other forms of immovable property, this trend indicates that inheritance and property-related disputes are among the highest structural issues affecting women.

Due to the lack of avenues for income, it is found that female-headed households are more dependent on social grants since income from pensions, social insurance and family allowances make up 14 percent of income of female-headed households, compared to 5.8 percent of income for male-headed households.[42] Consequently, the prospect for those living in female-headed households of accessing opportunities such as education, or basic services, remains slim. This trend is also contrary to section 8(g) and (h) of PEPUDA, which prohibits unfair discrimination on the ground of gender in the forms of, amongst others, the denial of access to opportunities for women, including access to services, and the limitation of women's access to social services or benefits.

36 Ibid 15.
37 Ibid.
38 Ibid 20.
39 Stats SA Living Conditions Survey 2014/15 (2016) 18.
40 Ibid 14.
41 Commission for Gender Equality Annual Report 2013/14 (2014) 49.
42 Stats SA Living Conditions Survey 2014/15 (2016) 14.

6.3 Equal access to education

Section 29 of the Constitution guarantees the rights to basic and further education. The importance of quality education to unlock the potential of people and to provide economic opportunities cannot be overstated. Therefore, the state's obligation to provide access to quality education is an exceptionally important one. Furthermore, section 8(g) of PEPUDA specifically prohibits unfair discrimination based on gender in the form of limiting women's access to education.

> "The importance of quality education to unlock the potential of people and to provide economic opportunities cannot be overstated ... However, in South Africa, the education system is subject to significant challenges..."

However, in South Africa, the education system is subject to significant challenges, including, but not limited to, education of a poor quality, a lack of access to adequate infrastructure (including water and sanitation), a high ratio of learners to educators, strikes by educators, protest action by communities that result in malicious damage to school property and prevents learners from attending school, a lack of access to learning materials and a low number of learners that pass grade 12 and are able to study further in either technical colleges or a university.[43]

6.3.1 Equality in accessing education

Although access to basic education is relatively high for most South Africans,[44] fees constitute a significant barrier to education. Section 5 of the South African Schools Act, 84 of 1996 states that no learner may be refused admission into a public school due to the inability to pay school fees. In addition, government has compiled a list of no-fee schools, where students who are unable to afford any form of school fees can access education. The number of learners attending no-fee schools is unequally distributed provincially, with 92.5 percent of learners in Limpopo and 79.1 percent of learners in Eastern Cape attending no-fee schools, contrasted with 41.6 percent of learners in Gauteng and 43 percent of learners attending no-fee schools in the Western Cape.[45]

> "Although access to basic education is relatively high for most South Africans, fees constitute a significant barrier to education."

43 S Franklin & D McLaren (Studies in Poverty and Inequality Institute) Realising the Right to a Basic Education In South Africa (2015) 126-144; 146.
44 Ibid 117.
45 Stats SA General Household Survey 2015 (2016) 2.

At the peak schooling years of 7-15 years, 22 percent of learners who left school prematurely, the majority of whom is female, cited a lack of money as the reason for doing so.[46] Significantly, 9.4 percent of those who prematurely left school, cited family commitments, such as getting married, minding children or pregnancy, as the reason for doing so. Of these, the vast majority is female:[47]

Percentage distribution of main reasons given by persons aged 7 to 18 years for not attending an educational institution, by sex, 2015[48]

	No money for fees	Poor academic perfor-mance	Family commit-ments	Education is useless	Illness and disability	Completed education	Working at home	Getting to school	Other
Male	19,7	21,7	0,4	14,0	10,0	9,7	9,0	0,5	15,0
Female	25,2	19,0	18,1	4,4	8,4	8,5	3,5	1,6	11,3
RSA	22,5	20,3	9,4	9,1	9,2	9,1	6,2	1,1	13,1

Unintended teenage pregnancy remains a serious challenge that hampers access to education for teenage learners.[49] Although most young fathers expressed feeling a sense of responsibility towards their child and a willingness to be involved in the child's life, young fathers are generally unable to provide financial assistance.[50] As a result, unintended teenage pregnancies place additional burdens on the female learner, over and above the physiological and biological burdens that pregnancy imposes. This explains why a much larger percentage (18.1 percent) of female learners leave their studies on the grounds of family commitments compared with 0.4 percent of male learners.[51]

In a survey prepared by Stats SA on educational levels in South Africa, just over 1 million (1 023 000) women who are Black aged 20 years and older answered that their education was 'none' compared to 528 000 Black men and just 8 000 White women.[52] Overall, over 1 million women compared to 635 000 men have received no education.

46 Ibid.
47 Ibid.
48 Figure reproduced from Stats SA General Household Survey 2015 (2016) 11.
49 Department of Basic Education Teenage Pregnancy in South Africa - With a Specific Focus on School-Going Learners (2009) <http://www.education.gov.za/Port als/0/Documents/Reports/Teenage%20Pregnancy%20Report,%2028%20August%202009.pdf?ver=2011-01-18-113756-500>.
50 Ibid.
51 Stats SA General Household Survey 2015 (2016) 2.
52 Ibid 78.

Those who have received no education are primarily constituted by the Black population group, which again indicates the intersectionality of systemic discrimination on multiple grounds (in this case, sex and race). Approximately 17 percent of Black women aged 15 years and over do not have an education level over Grade 7, compared to almost 12 percent of Coloured women, seven percent of Indian women and less than two percent of White women.[53] The above figures clearly show the racial legacy of apartheid, but also indicate that increased access to education since 1994 has not ensured equal access to education.

6.3.2 Equality in education

Even where education is accessed, discrimination on the ground of gender and gender identity persists. For instance, the SAHRC instituted proceedings in the Seshego Equality Court (Limpopo) on behalf of a transgendered secondary school learner.[54] The case arises from allegations of humiliation and harassment based on the gender identity of the learner, which created a hostile and intimidating environment for her. The proceedings were instituted to procure relief for alleged unfair discrimination, harassment, and hurtful speech and the court found in favour of the Commission. In a landmark ruling, the Seshego Equality Court ordered the Limpopo Department of Education to pay R60 000 in personal compensation to the learner in question. Of concern is the fact that the Equality Court, referring to itself as a forum that 'deals with facts', referred the complainant 'in the male form', despite the fact that she identified as a woman.[55] Whereas the transgender learner was directly discriminated against based on her gender identity, the inability to understand or reasonably accommodate non-binary gender identities, as displayed by both the school authorities and the Equality Court itself, reflects indirect discrimination and systemic inequality in the form of a hierarchy of social norms that do not fully recognise those who do not conform to traditional gender identities.[56]

Codes of conduct are important mechanisms through which learning institutions can create a learning environment consonant with constitutional values, and should cater for the reasonable accommodation of difference on gender, racial, religious or cultural grounds.[57] In 2016, considerable attention was given to dress code policies at schools that unfairly discriminate against students on multiple grounds of race and sex. The Commission noted with concern the allegations of marginalisation and discriminatory treatment of Black female learners at Pretoria High School for Girls, the Sans Souci High School in Cape Town, Saint Michael's School for Girls in Bloemfontein, as well as other incidents and allegations emanating from other schools.[58]

---

53 Ibid.

54 Mphela and Others v Manamela and Limpopo Department of Education (unreported case), Seshego Equality Court.

55 Ibid.

56 In a context other than education, the Legal Resources Centre launched an application in the Western Cape High Court seeking to compel the Department of Home Affairs to amend the sex description of three transgender women on the national population register and on their birth certificates, and issue them with new identity numbers in terms of the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003. The Department refused to do so as the women were married in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961, which only recognises heterosexual marriages. In a significant judgment, the Western Cape High Court held that the Department's conduct infringed the applicants' constitutional rights to administrative justice, equality and dignity, and was inconsistent with the state's obligations as set out in s 7(2) of the Constitution. The Department was accordingly ordered to reconsider the applications in terms of the Alteration Act in the light of the High Court's finding that the solemnization of marriages under the Marriage Act had no bearing on the matter. See KOS and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others (2298/2017) [2017] ZAWCHC 90 (6 September 2017).

57 MEC for Education: Kwazulu-Natal and Others v Pillay 2008 (1) SA 474 (CC).

58 SAHRC Media Statement: Difference, diversity & reasonable accommodation of difference in South African Schools (7-09-2016); SAHRC Media Statement: School rules and codes of conduct are subject to the supremacy of the Constitution (26-07-2017). More instances of racism in language and dress code policies, as well as in racist statements made by teaching staff, have emerged since the last media release by the SAHRC. See, for example, Times Live 'St John's College: Teacher Found Guilty of Making Racist Remarks has Resigned' (27-07-2017) Times Live.

Indirect discrimination and systemic inequality also persist in higher education. In 2014, the Commission convened a National Hearing on transformation in South African public universities. The decision was taken following the receipt of a number of complaints on transformation issues in universities, which in the Commission's view required a holistic examination of transformation in institutions of higher learning in South Africa. The Commission found that discrimination on the grounds of gender, race, disability and socio-economic status continues, and that unsatisfactory transformation has occurred at the management, staff and student levels.[59]

If operationalised, Chapter 5 of PEPUDA could contribute to addressing indirect discrimination and systemic inequality in education, through the obligation it lays upon all sectors of society to promote equality. This would, in turn, help prevent systemic inequality and discrimination from leading to instances of direct discrimination in education, as occurred in the case of the transgender learner as well as various incidents in higher education.[60]

7 GENDER AND DISCRIMINATORY CULTURAL PRACTICES

Section 8(d) of PEPUDA prohibits 'any practice, including traditional, customary or religious practice, which impairs the dignity of women and undermines equality between women and men, including the undermining of the dignity and well-being of the girl child'. This provision highlights the tension that often exists between the cultural rights recognised in the Constitution,[61] and the right to equality, particularly in the context of gender.

7.1 Maiden bursaries, ukuhlolwa and virginity testing

Some interpretations of traditional culture and religious morals strongly link female value to virginity, with the implication that the inherent value of women is perceived as irrevocably diminished after certain forms of sexual activity. An additional erroneous belief is that virginity testing decreases HIV/AIDS transmission and teenage pregnancy. The above beliefs are clear indications of patriarchy and are often based on the belief that pregnancy is the sole responsibility of a female engaging in sexual activity, rather than a responsibility equally shared between women and men.[62]

Linked to the above beliefs are the invasive and discriminatory practices and 'inspections' (such as ukuhlolwa) where a young woman is required to 'prove' her virginity.[63] The recent linking of virginity to access to education through so-called 'maiden bursaries' was considered in 2016 by the CGE. The CGE investigated the award of bursaries in the uThukela district by the district council in KwaZulu-Natal. These bursaries included the requirement that recipients be 'proven' to be virgins; the bursary would be withdrawn on the 'failure' of such 'tests'.[64]

59 SAHRC Transformation at Public Universities in South Africa (2016) viii.
60 Ibid viii. Highly publicised incidents in higher education are based on race, but given the intersectionality of race and gender, a duty to promote equality could help address systemic inequality and discrimination on multiple grounds.
61 Ss 30-31 of the Constitution.
62 SAHRC Harmful Social and Cultural Practices – Virginity Testing? Children's Bill [B70 – B2003] Submission to the Select Committee on Social Services (NCOP) (2005) 6-7.
63 Ibid 7-10.
64 Commission for Gender Equality The Maiden Bursary Investigative Report (2016) 21.

The CGE concluded that such tests were unconstitutional in violating the rights to equality, dignity and privacy, and that 'any funding by an organ of state based on a woman's sexuality perpetuates patriarchy and inequality in South Africa'.[65]

7.2 Ukuthwala

Ukuthwala is a traditional form of marriage involving the abduction of young girls with the intention of making the girl a wife. Traditionally, the practice involves negotiations between the man and the girl's family in the form of an arranged marriage and does not include violence or rape.

However, the meaning of 'consent' – and whether the ability to consent rests with the girl or her family – remains uncertain.[66] The traditional form of ukuthwala can also be used as a means by which two consenting individuals can force their families to accept their relationship through culturally legitimised customary marriage. In addition, communities that practice ukuthwala value the custom for cultivating social cohesion, leading to longevity of marriages, and preventing girls from having children out of wedlock.[67] However, the DOJCD notes that the abuse of this practice 'increasingly involves the kidnapping, rape and forced marriage of minor girls as young as twelve years'.[68] Rights that may be potentially violated include those to equality; human dignity; freedom and security of the person; as well as the rights of access to health care services and justice. In addition, where ukuthwala is directed against girl-children under 18 years of age, children's rights are violated. In Jezile v S and Others,[69] the Western Cape High Court confirmed a conviction of one count of human trafficking and three counts of rape related to the abuse of ukuthwala. The SAHRC has likewise strongly condemned the abuse of the practice of ukuthwala,[70] and has held that it should not apply to children.

8 GENDER-BASED VIOLENCE

Gender Based Violence (GBV) is explicitly prohibited as a form of gender-based discrimination by section 8(a) of PEPUDA. GBV remains a persistent problem in South Africa, with Stats SA estimating that 21 percent of women over the age of 18 years have experienced violence by a partner.[71] The high levels of GBV that women face are also reflected in violence directed against sexual and gender minorities and people with non-normative bodies. In particular, 'corrective rape' results in significant harm to lesbian, gay and transgender persons.[72] In March 2011, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development mandated the establishment of a National Task Team (NTT) to develop a National Intervention Strategy to address the issue of corrective rape.[73]

65 Ibid 22.
66 L Mwambene & H Kruuse 'The Thin Edge of the Wedge: ukutwhala, alienation and consent' (2017) 33 South African Journal on Human Rights 25 42-43.
67 Ibid 41.
68 Department of Justice and Constitutional Development What is Ukuthwala? (2015) <http://www.justice.gov.za/brochure/ukuthwala/2015-Ukuthwala_leaflet-Eng.pdf>.
69 Jezile v S and Others 2015 (2) SACR 452 (WCC).
70 SAHRC South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC) NHRI written submission to the Universal Periodic Review (UPR) Mechanism (2011) <http://www.sahrc.org.za/home/21/files/SAHRC%20NHRI%20UPR%20Submission%20FINAL%202011.pdf>.
71 Stats SA South Africa Demographic and Health Survey (2016) 54.
72 K Thomas Homophobia, Injustice and 'Corrective Rape' in Post-Apartheid South Africa (2013) 3; P Strudwick 'Crisis in South Africa: The Shocking Practice of "Corrective Rape" - Aimed at "Curing Lesbians"' (4-01-2014) The Independent; K Nandipha '"Corrective rape": Lesbians at the Mercy of Powerless Men' (15-07-2013) Mail & Guardian.
73 Department of Justice and Constitutional Development National Intervention Strategy for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual,

Hate speech on the prohibited grounds, including gender and sexual orientation, is likewise prohibited by section 10 of PEPUDA. Hate speech includes speech that is harmful or which can potentially incite harm, and which propagates hatred. The recent Equality Court case of SAHRC v Qwelane[74] dealt with hate speech after a 2008 newspaper column written by Qwelane, in which he stated, amongst other things, that being gay was not 'ok' and compared homosexuality to bestiality. The SAHRC received around 350 complaints following the publication.[75]

The Equality Court heard comprehensive evidence regarding widespread instances of violence directed at the LGBTI community, including in the form of hate speech, assault, corrective rape (especially of lesbian women), murder and secondary victimisation by SAPS.[76] Although witnesses admitted that such instances of violence were not directly linked to Qwelane's statements, he occupied a position of power and influence (as a former ambassador for South Africa, coupled with the readership of the newspaper largely being Black residents of traditional informal settlements) and his hateful comments could thus fuel violence against an already vulnerable community.[77] The Equality Court agreed that the column constituted hate speech, and could potentially incite harm against the LGBTI community[78] (especially poor Black lesbian women who were most often victims of corrective rape). Importantly, the Equality Court noted that freedom of expression cannot protect speech which can itself be harmful to a pluralist society, and that the use of the word 'hurtful' in PEPUDA,[79] should be construed as meaning severe psychological harm.[80]

Crimes against sexual and gender minorities, people with bodily variation and women have a low rate of reporting according to the 2010 Gauteng Gender Violence Prevalence Study, with only 3.9 percent of women reporting domestic violence, while only 'one in 25 rapes has been reported to the police'.[81] Victims of GBV and SOGIE-based violence also face secondary victimisation when reporting these crimes, with some government officials (especially SAPS and healthcare workers) showing insensitivity or failing to pursue prosecutions.[82] For example, evidence was heard in SAHRC v Qwelane that after a Black lesbian woman was raped, SAPS responded to her attempt to lay a charge by saying that lesbians are 'boys', and 'boys cannot be raped'.[83] Gender discrimination of this severity cannot be tolerated in a democratic and constitutional society based on equality.

Prevention and prosecution of GBV are significantly hampered by a lack of accurate disaggregated data. Although the SAHRC has welcomed the creation of a hate crime in terms of the Combatting of Hate Crimes and Hate Speech Bill 2016, the absence of disaggregated data regarding GBV directed at women and persons based on their SOGIE, and a database dedicated to the collection of such data, reduces policy effectiveness and hampers the protection of women and gender minorities from GBV.[84]

Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) Sector (2014).

74 SAHRC v Qwelane case no EQ44/2009 (EQ13/2012) EQC (18 August 2017).

75 Ibid para 10.

76 Ibid paras 26, 29-34.

77 Ibid para 34.

78 Ibid para 53.

79 Which was challenged as overbroad and thus unconstitutional, ibid para 62.

80 Ibid paras 45, 65.

81 Gender Links and the Medical Research Council The War at Home: Preliminary findings of the Gauteng Gender Violence Prevalence Study (2015) <http://www.mrc.ac.za/gender/gbvthewar.pdf>.

82 Department of Justice and Constitutional Development National Intervention Strategy for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) Sector (2014) 3; Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation Gender-Based Violence (GBV) in South Africa: A Brief Review (2016) 13-14. See also SAHRC v Qwelane case no EQ44/2009 (EQ13/2012) EQC (18 August 2017), where secondary victimisation was recognised, and referred to the Commissioner of Police by the Equality Court.

83 SAHRC v Qwelane case no EQ44/2009 (EQ13/2012) EQC (18 August 2017) para 29.

84 SAHRC Comments on the Draft Prevention and Combating of Hate Crimes and Hate Speech Bill (2017) 5.

The need to gather disaggregated data is supported by the opinions of those interviewed by the SAHRC, by the NTT,[85] and also internationally through CEDAW General Recommendation 28, which calls for the accurate and efficient capturing of information about GBV.[86]

9 SAHRC RESPONSES TO GENDER-BASED DISCRIMINATION AND SYSTEMIC INEQUALITY

9.1 Seminars and hearings

In considering the far-reaching implications and the prevalence of substantive inequality in South Africa, the SAHRC hosted a National Investigative Hearing on Unfair Discrimination in the Workplace between March and April 2016. The aim of the hearing was to generate a deeper understanding and awareness of the trends of discrimination in the workplace; the form and inter-relatedness of types of discrimination; as well as the challenges and barriers to equality faced by all stakeholders, including employees, public and private sector employers, trade union bodies and government departments. Essentially, the inquiry found that unfair discrimination in the workplace remains pervasive in South Africa and includes both barriers to entry as well as discriminatory practices within the workplace itself. Although long-standing grounds of discrimination such as race, gender and disability persist, the changing nature of the workforce and social relations over time have given rise to newer forms of discrimination, including on the basis of HIV and AIDS status, age, sexual orientation and gender identity, language, religion and culture. Discrimination, in this way, is a moving target and requires constant attention and evaluation to ensure that no one is left behind in efforts to combat discriminatory practices and achieve the goals of equality and dignity for all.

In addition, the Commission hosted an African Regional Seminar on Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Gender Expression in 2016 to discuss the significant challenges still facing gender minorities in the region. The seminar served as a follow-up to the UN Human Rights Council's Resolution on Human Rights, Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity[87] and the African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights' Resolution 275 on the Protection against Violence and other Human Rights, Violations against Persons on the basis of their real or imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity.[88]

9.2 Promoting equality

Chapter 5 of PEPUDA, which is not yet operational, sets out a list of positive duties aimed at promoting equality. These responsibilities are placed both on the state as well as on private persons who directly or indirectly contract with the state or who exercise public power. Moreover, a social commitment by all persons to promote equality is similarly mandated.[89] However, challenges persist in respect of the full operationalisation of PEPUDA, whereby the promotional aspects of the Act have continued to be inoperative since its enactment in 2000. The Commission plans to recommend the proclamation of the commencement of this chapter in its forthcoming Equality Report.

85 Department of Justice and Constitutional Development National Intervention Strategy for Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender and Intersex (LGBTI) Sector (2014) 12.
86 Committee on Elimination of All Forms of Discrimination against Women General Recommendation 28 (2010).
87 UN Human Rights Council Resolution A/HRC/RES/17/19 - Human Rights, Sexual Orientation and Gender Identity (17-06-2011).
88 African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights Resolution 275 on the Protection against Violence and other Human Rights, Violations against Persons on the basis of their real or imputed Sexual Orientation or Gender Identity (12-05-2014).
89 See ss 25-27 of PEPUDA.

10 CONCLUSION

Gender inequality in South Africa remains rife. Substantive inequality is reflected at both a broad, structural societal level, and in instances of direct discrimination, as is regularly encountered in the workplace. GBV, which remains prevalent but is under-reported, also constitutes a form of direct discrimination. Systemic inequalities relating to the sexual division of labour, and the inaccessibility of other streams of income, resources, land and social services such as education, continue to prejudice women and gender minorities. A holistic approach is needed to combat gender inequalities in whichever sphere of society and the economy these may manifest. One practical step towards combatting gender inequality is for government to start capturing disaggregated data relating to SOGIE-based violence and GBV. In order to effect structural change in an effort to achieve substantive gender equality, it is similarly important for lawmakers to proclaim the commencement of Chapter 5 of PEPUDA, which recognises that the duty to promote equality rests on all those who inhabit South Africa.

“Systemic inequalities relating to the sexual division of labour, and the inaccessibility of other streams of income, resources, land and social services such as education, continue to prejudice women and gender minorities. A holistic approach is needed to combat gender inequalities in whichever sphere of society and the economy these may manifest.”

south african human rights commission