Dear Judge Spanó,

Submission of Third Party Intervener in Mokgadi Caster Semenya v Switzerland (Case no: 10934/21)

1. The South African Human Rights Commission (SAHRC or the Commission) is grateful to the Court for this opportunity to make submission in this matter, pursuant to the Court's letter dated 31 August 2021.

2. As directed by the Court, the SAHRC's submission is limited to ten pages and addresses only the general principles applicable to the determination of this matter. In accordance with the Court's Practice Direction on written pleadings, the SAHRC has also provided an Annex which lists all evidence referred to in the written submissions, together with a bundle of supporting documents.

3. The SAHRC takes this opportunity to note that, if the Court is ultimately minded to grant a hearing in this case, the SAHRC will request permission to take part in that hearing pursuant to Rule 44(3), by way of short oral submissions, within such time limit as the Court may direct.

4. The circumstances of this case are exceptional. In particular, this case raises complex questions around the rights of the applicant to dignity and respect; uniquely, the proper approach to intersectional discrimination, and the approach that should be taken to justifying any discrimination found on those bases. Respectfully, therefore, the Court may be assisted by such a hearing.

5. Moreover, as to the SAHRC's involvement, it is respectfully noted that the SAHRC's submissions do not contain duplication with the matters to be addressed by the applicant, and rather seek to inform the Court of a significant area of relevant jurisprudence by the Constitutional Court of South Africa: a Court which has had to grapple with such issues in the context in particular of intersectional discrimination. Any oral submissions permitted by the Court would be equally focussed, and would seek only to bring further clarity to the Court on that extensive and nuanced jurisprudence and its relevance to the matters before it.

6. The SAHRC remains at your disposal for any further information you may require. We can be contacted through our legal representatives at Baker McKenzie. Please direct all communication for the attention of both Xavier Salvatore (Xavier.Salvatore@bakermckenzie.com) and Romain Bizzini (Romain.Bizzini@bakermckenzie.com) at the following address:

Application no. 10934/21

In the matter between:

SEMENYA Appellant

and

SWITZERLAND Respondent

and

SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION Intervener

SOUTH AFRICAN HUMAN RIGHTS COMMISSION'S WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS

A. Introduction

1. Pursuant to the Court's letter dated 31 August 2021, these submissions are filed on behalf of the South African Human Rights Commission ("the SAHRC"). As directed, they are limited to ten pages; do not include any comments on the facts or merits of the case; and address only the general principles applicable to its determination. They seek to assist the Court's consideration of the case particularly by referring to comparable South African caselaw.

2. South Africa is a particularly instructive comparative jurisdiction by virtue of its constitution being the first in the world explicitly to entrench protection against discrimination on the ground of sex, gender and sexual orientation[1] (including the ground of intersexuality).[2] South Africa also has a developed body of case law relating to a key legal principle arising in this case:[3]

[1] Brickhill Public Interest Litigation in South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Cape Town 2018) at 239 (A/25).

[2] As the South African High Court explained in KOS v Minister of Home Affairs 2017 (6) SA 588 (WCC) para 20 fn 22, "[t]he labels of transsexual, transgenderist, intersexed, transvestite, heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual and pansexual are all labels that are used in an attempt to describe the many permutations of human identity and sexuality" and the CC "tends to use sex and gender interchangeably in the relatively large number of cases it has considered on these grounds" (A/14/1129). However, the CC has subsequently clarified in Rahube v Rahube 2019 (2) SA 54 (CC) para 19 fn 22 that "references to the word 'sex' refer to the biological characteristics that define humans as female, male or intersex" and that "[t]his is usually assigned at birth and differentiation between people is made on the basis of external genitalia, chromosomes, hormones and the reproductive system (A/15/1160-1161). Gender is both a social construct and a personal identity. In social terms gender refers to the socially created roles, personality traits, attitudes, behaviours and values attributed to and acceptable for men and women as well as the relative power and influence of each. In individual terms gender refers to the specific gender group with which an individual identifies, regardless of their sex." In Rahube v Rahube the CC considered the impugned provision on the grounds both of sex and gender.

intersectionality.[4] It is in this context that the SAHRC advances the following submissions, referring in what follows substantially to caselaw by the apex court of South Africa, the Constitutional Court ("the CC").[5] The SAHRC has provided a bundle of supporting documents with these submissions. References are in the form [Annex/Tab/Page number (if applicable)].

B. South African comparative caselaw on equality and intersectionality

3. The CC's caselaw on equality commences (in its first judgment on the equality provision in the interim Constitution) by referring to "patterns of disadvantage" being "particularly acute in the case of black women, as race and gender discrimination overlap."[6] This was an early recognition of the phenomenon to which the intersectionality concept responds.[7] It has spawned principles of particular importance in adjudicating cases like the present matter.

(1) First principle: No adaptation or negation nor self-abnegation necessary

4. Intersectionality adopts a whole-person approach to people, requiring that they "be treated just as they are."[8] This the CC confirmed subsequently in its locus classicus on equality in the context of sexual orientation,[9] citing Canadian caselaw confirming the effect of discrimination:[10] a negation of an individual's true identity, infringing human dignity.[11] The CC held that the denial of identity, and the creation of homogeneity, uniformity or the elimination or suppression of difference is not what the right to equality contemplates.[12] Instead, it affords "equal concern and respect across difference."[13]

[4] Based on the above text (Atrey op cit at 139) intersectionality and intersectional discrimination – a concept forming the subject-matter of considerable academic debate over the last three decades – can be described as a doctrine which (i) recognises that multiple causes may exist which contribute to causation in the context of discrimination; (ii) envisages the variability in pattens of group disadvantage by virtue of various characteristics of an individual, viewed holistically and contextually; and (iii) aims to transform patterns of prejudice by dismantling structures of disadvantage and systems of power (A/26/1967).

[5] The CC described intersectionality as "an approach that recognises that different identity categories can intersect and co-exist in the same individual thus creating a qualitatively different experience when compared to that of another individual" (Mahlangu v Minister of Labour 2021 (2) SA 54 (CC) para 76 (A/17/1315-1316)) and held that "[i]t means nothing more than acknowledging that discrimination may impact on an individual in a multiplicity of ways based on their position in society and the structural dynamics at play (id at 76).

[7] See Atrey op cit at 41, adopting the terminology used in Brink v Kitshoff NO supra to explain that "intersectional disadvantage is defined in terms of patterns of inter-group and intra-group disadvantage, which embody different kinds of substantive harm in terms of oppression, powerlessness, subordination, marginalization, deprivation, domination and violence" (A/26/1869).

[8] Atrey op cit at 47 (A/26/1875).

[9] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC) para 134, per Sachs J in a separate concurrence (A/5/409-410).

[10] Vriend v Alberta (1998) 1 SCR 493 (SCC) para 69 (A/20/1520).

[11] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice supra at para 24, per Ackermann J writing for the court (A/5/436).

[13] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice supra at para 132 (Sachs J) (A/5/406-407).

5. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principle applicable to the determination of the case (concerning particularly questions 1, 2, 3.1, 3.2 and 4.1 addressed by the Court to the parties): an individual is not required to change personal characteristics in order to qualify for inclusion,[14] nor to confine themselves to one aspect of their identity (thus foregoing inclusion or legal protection as member of a particular group)[15] to qualify for legal protection as member of another group to which the same person also belongs.[16]

(2) Second principle: Determinability of dignity

6. The CC has recognised that "[p]ast discrimination frequently has ongoing negative consequences, the continuation of which is not halted immediately when the initial causes thereof are eliminated, and unless remedied, may continue for a substantial time and even indefinitely. Like justice, equality delayed is equality denied."[17] The CC adopts a remedial, restitutionary, and substantive approach to equality,[18] focussing on the overall impact of the discrimination on the people against whom a measure discriminates.[19]

7. The overall impact includes not only all the characteristics included as prohibited grounds of discrimination,[20] but also the impact on other fundamental rights – particularly privacy and

[14] E.g. by undergoing medical treatment. See KOS v Minister of Home Affairs 2017 (6) SA 588 (WCC) para 2 fn 5 (A/14/1125). The High Court cited (in the context of transgender individuals) with approval the Indian Supreme Court's judgment in National Legal Services Authority v Union of India AIR 2014 SC 1863 para 76 for the proposition that "(g)ender identity ... forms the core of one's personal self, based on self-identification, not on surgical or medical procedure" (A/22/1671).

[16] E.g. by sacrificing any SOGIE equality protection for purposes of affording fellow females protection on the basis of the prohibition against sex discrimination.

[17] National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Justice supra at para 60 (Ackermann J) (A/5/335). The SAHRC's research confirms subsisting prejudice presenting as gendered inequality between not only men and women, but also the LGBTIQ+ community based on SOGIE; the frequent overlapping effect of inequality with poverty, socio-economic disadvantage and race, resulting in multiple forms of discrimination particularly against women not conforming to traditional gender roles; hence the importance of recognising the intersectionality of discrimination based on people's identities and character traits, particularly in a global South country like South Africa, where poverty and socio-economic disadvantage intersect directly with race and affect women disproportionately. See SAHRC Research Brief on Gender and Equality in South Africa 2013-2017 pp 6-10 (A/30/2110-2114).

[19] Id para 61 (Ackermann J) (A/5/336), citing President of the Republic of South Africa v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC) para 41 (A/2/75-76). The same approach was confirmed in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC) para 35, holding that proper regard must be had to the operation, experience or impact of discrimination on society since discrimination does not occur in discrete areas of law but must be underst ood in the context of the experience of those on whom it impacts without evaluating impact in isolation (A/6/446).

[20] Id para 113 (Sachs J), referring specifically to critical race feminist theory and its recognition that women of colour are often discriminated against on the basis of race, gender and economic class; and explicitly noting the intersection of race, gender, class, sexual orientation, physical disadvantage and other characteristics which often serve as the basis for unfair discrimination (A/5/386-387).

dignity,[21] which interrelate with the right to equality.[22] The CC has accepted that a single situation can simultaneously give rise to multidimensional discrimination;[23] and multiple, overlapping and mutually-reinforcing violations of fundamental rights.[24] Key to contextualising the discrimination inquiry for the purposes of assessing the impact on an affected person is dignity.[25] The inquiry is accordingly not simply whether group-based differential treatment exists, but whether the differentiation perpetuates disadvantage and damages the dignity and self-worth of group members.[26]

8. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principle applicable to the determination of the case (in particular questions 1, 2, 3.1, 3.2 and 4.1 to the parties): a provision which differentiates on a prohibited ground and does so in a manner which impacts adversely on an individual's dignity is problematic;[27] it cannot be justified circuitously by invoking intersectionality, least of all where the dignity of only a subgroup (but not the larger group itself) is impaired; accordingly discrimination against a sub-group (e.g. intersex or black females) cannot be justified by invoking protection against discrimination against the larger group (e.g. females).[28]

(3) Third principle: Systemically irrational rule-making discriminates

9. In a separate CC concurrence Sachs J considered academic commentators' views that the principle of equality requires that the LBGTIQ+ community must have full access to decision-making on questions affecting them to enable effective and equal law-making.[29] Sach J considered

[21] The right to dignity indeed constitutes the "core" of the CC's "focus on the defined antidiscrimination principles" entrenched in section 9(3), (4) and (5) of the South African Constitution (id para 121 per Sachs J (A/5/397)).
[22] Id paras 111 and 120 (Sachs J) (A/5/383-384 and 395-396).
[23] Id para 113 (Sachs J) (A/5/386-387), referring to discrimination on the grounds of race, origin, sex, marital status, age and socio-economic circumstances. In a subsequent unanimous judgment, National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality v Minister of Home Affairs supra para 40, the CC confirmed the correctness of the approach adopted in Sachs J's minority judgment (A/6/450-451). Minister of Home Affairs confirmed the overlapping or intersecting discrimination on the ground of inter alia sexual orientation, hence the equality evaluation has to be conducted on the basis of a combination of the grounds concerned in a global and contextual manner. Minister of Home Affairs supra para 41 further confirms the importance of assessing inter alia the position of complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage; the nature of the provision or power and its purpose; and any other relevant factor affecting the claimants and whether it has led to an impairment of their human dignity or any other comparable serious impairment (A/6/451-454).
[24] Id para 114 (Sachs J) (A/5/388).
[25] Id para 126 (Sachs J) (A/5/401). This accords with the CC's confirmation in Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC) para 47 (A/4/220-221) and Prinsloo v Van Der Linde 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC) para 31 (A/367-68) that dignity is the key criterion for determining whether differentiation constitutes discrimination on an undefined ground.
[26] Id para 125 (Sachs J) (A/5/401).
[27] Id para 129 per Sachs J): "[t]o penalise people for being what they are is profoundly disrespectful of the human personality and violatory of equality" (A/5/405).
[28] See Atrey op cit 189: "intersectionality explains a form of discrimination, and not its rationalisation" (A/26/2017).
[29] To this may be added caution expressed by Crenshaw, the innovator of the intersectionality principle, in an article subsequently cited with approval by the CC (Mahlangu v Minister of Labour supra para 85 (A/17/1319)) in a case dealing explicitly with this principle. Crenshaw "Mapping the margins: Intersectionality, Identity Politics, and Violence against Women of Color" (1991) 43(6) Stanford Law Review 1241 at 1250 cautions: "[w]omen of color are it unnecessary to determine the issue in that case.[30] But subsequent CC caselaw on rationality (a precondition for lawful differentiation)[31] confirms that a failure to include affected groups in decision-making processes may render the result irrational.[32]

10. Question 4.2 to the parties asks inter alia whether the DSD Regulations have a sufficient legal basis. The SAHRC submits that the CC caselaw reflects that a rule-making process which fails to consider affected group's circumstances appropriately and fails to afford such group an adequate audi alteram partem is vulnerable to a legal challenge pursuant to intersectionality for failing to give effect to the context and systemic disadvantages peculiar to the group on which the measure impacts. Thus a regulatory regime resulting from such process may lack a sufficient legal basis.

(4) Fourth principle: Incumbent on courts to consider context

11. The CC's equality caselaw continues to acknowledge the particular vulnerability of African women – as victims of discrimination based on race, class, and gender – during and as a consequence of colonialism and apartheid.[33] It has held that courts are compelled to scrutinise in every equality case the situation of the complainant in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or compounds group disadvantage in real life contexts.[34]

12. Thus South Africa's "jurisprudence on equality has made it clear that the nature of the discrimination must be analysed contextually and in the light of our history."[35] Absent such differently situated in the economic, social, and political worlds. When reform efforts undertaken on behalf of women neglect this fact, women of color are less likely to have their needs met than women who are racially privileged" (A/24/1744).

[30] Id para 133 (Sachs J) (A/5/408-409).

[31] Harksen v Lane 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC) para 45 (A/4/218). The test established in Harksen was confirmed by the CC in Mahlangu supra para 71 (A/71/1313-1314). Mahlangu is the judgment in which the CC explicitly confirmed the application of intersectionality in South African equality law. Hence Harksen's precondition for lawful differentiation (namely rationality, which Harksen held however was not a sufficient condition) applies equally in this specific context.

[32] Democratic Alliance v President of the Republic of South Africa 2013 (1) SA 248 (CC) para 36 (A/12/997); Albutt v Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation 2010 (3) SA 293 (CC) para 72 (A/11/957-958).

[33] Rahube v Rahube supra paras 2 and 23-24 (A/15/1163-1164), confirming the need to recognise "patterns of systematic disadvantage" particularly in the context of gender and race (quoting Volks NO v Robinson 2005 (5) BCLR 446 (CC) para 162 (A/8/687-688)).

[34] Minister of Finance v Van Heerden 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC) para 27 (A/7/519-520).

[35] Hassam v Jacobs NO 2009 (5) SA 572 (CC) para 33 (A/9/756-757). The CC's judgment in Hassam v Jacobs NO received particularly favourable treatment by Atrey op cit passim. It is, for instance, cited as example of the transformative potential of intersectionality to achieve "a truly equal society" (id at 129 (A/26/1957)). See, too, id at 130-131: "The reality and the totality of this disadvantage [the 'exclusion of Muslim widows in polygynous marriages from intestate succession'] could only be appreciated because of the Court's careful discrimination analysis which is characteristic of intersectionality. Each strand of the framework found its way, succinctly but sufficiently, into the Court's reasoning, making a difference to the understanding of the nature of discrimination of this particular analysis a key constitutional consideration – the recognition that "each person is of equal worth and must be treated accordingly" – is eclipsed.[36]

13. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principle applicable to the determination of this case (particularly relevant to questions 1, 2, 3.1, 3.2 and 4.1 of the Court's questions to the parties): considering the context in which an equality case arises is a crucial analytical aspect of every case concerning an allegation of unfair discrimination.[37]

(5) Fifth principle: Universality and utility of intersectionality

14. More recently the CC reappraised its equality caselaw by interrogating the application of intersectionality.[38] It held that the intersectionality doctrine is indeed familiar,[39] and frequently applied – even if not by name – in South African equality caselaw.[40] International caselaw, including the caselaw of this Court,[41] and academic commentary from multiple jurisdictions were cited in support of the proposition that a phenomenon particularly prevalent in South Africa is pervasive throughout the world:[42] discrimination based on overlapping categories of identity (typically gender, sex and race)[43] can co-exist ("intersect") in the same individual, resulting in increased prejudice.[44]

15. In the SAHRC's submission, the recognition of intersectionality is necessary to redress a pervasive and pernicious form of compound prejudice. The intersectionality concept addresses ubiquitous problems, and therefore should not be peculiar to particular jurisdictions (even if its recognition or application is not necessarily explicit). Jurisdictions in the global South (and courts seized of discrimination cases involving individuals originating from the global South) are more regularly confronted with the enduring triple-yoke oppression based on race, gender and class wrought by apartheid, colonialism and other forms of suppression;[45] and these courts' experience case. Hassam is a case in point of breaking through the complexity of intersectional discrimination, in being able to diagnose and explain it as it is rather than transmogrifying it into a proxy category" (A/26/1958-1959).

[36] Hassam v Jacobs NO supra para 35 (A/9/758).

[37] Although earlier CC equality cases have been criticized for not always adopting an unqualified intersectional approach (see Atrey op cit at 142 (A/26/1970)), subsequent key cases reflect the CC's explicit adoption of intersectionality and confirm it as the correct approach to adopt in all cases concerning multiple grounds of discrimination.

[42] Id paras 85-89 (A/17/1319-1321).

[43] Id para 85 (A/17/1319). The broad range of factors which may cause discrimination in an intersectional manner includes race, sex, gender, sexuality, religion, disability, age, socio-economic status, place of residence, employment status, physical appearance (Atrey op cit 84 (A/26/1912)).

[45] Id paras 63 and 96 (A/17/1310-1311 and 1323-1324).

is that intersectionality is "a useful analytical tool"[46] to apply to complex discrimination cases concerning "oppression based on race, sex, gender, class and other grounds".[47] The SAHRC submits that this is highly relevant to the determination of questions 1, 2, 3.1, 3.2 and 4.1 posed by the Court to the parties.

(6) Sixth principle: Intersectionality integrates equality and dignity

16. The CC's caselaw further reflects the intersecting effect of unfair discrimination and other fundamental rights vested in vulnerable individuals.[48] Specifically the right to dignity, which (as set out above) is key to equality, has also been identified in South African caselaw as a substantive right realised by adopting the multidimensional approach required by the intersectionality principle.[49] This applies particularly where a court is confronted with claims by individuals vulnerable to "[s]ocietal dynamics such as patriarchy, gender stereotyping, inflexible application of oppressive cultural practices" which "perpetuate the intersectional consequences of the challenged provisions operating on Black women".[50]

17. Black women's equal enjoyment of entrenched rights (including the right to dignity) is compromised by systemic impediments inherent in social structures.[51] This despite the pressing need to vindicate their right to dignity.[52] The impact on dignity militates strongly against the "possibility of the unfair discrimination being reasonable and justifiable".[53]

18. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principle applicable to the determination of this case (particularly question 3.2 addressed by the Court to the parties): intersectionality assists in integrating Article 14 with other Convention rights (especially dignity inherent in Article 3) through which the right to equality is realised, and can correctly calibrate the compelling justification required to render a discriminatory provision Convention compliant,[54] thus requiring that a qualitatively more compelling justification be adduced.

[47] Id para 65 (A/17/1311).
[48] Sithole v Sithole 2021 (5) SA 34 (CC) para 2 (A/18/1368).
[49] Id paras 27 and 46, confirming that the right to dignity is foundational to many other rights, including equality (A/18/1379 and 1386).
[50] Id para 31 (A/18/1381-1382).
[51] Id para 36, confirming that it is a matter for judicial notice that the majority of Black women in South Africa lives in the rural areas and townships and are not fully apprised of their legal rights (A/18/1383).
[52] Id para 45 (A/18/1385-1386).
[53] Id para 45 (A/18/1385-1386).
[54] This is consistent with, and indeed a necessary corollary of, this Court's recognition (as regards which, see Atrey op cit at 181 and 189 (A/26/2009 and 2017)) that proportionality review for discrimination based on grounds of race and sex is stricter than in the case of other grounds.

(7) Seventh principle: Intersectionality excels in SOGIE settings

19. The CC's caselaw on intersectionality has culminated in a recent judgment upholding a case brought by the SAHRC before the South African Equality Court: Qwelane v SAHRC.[55] It supports various propositions advanced above,[56] and does so specifically in the context of Sexual Orientation, Gender Identity and Expression ("SOGIE") rights and discrimination.[57]

20. In Qwelane the CC confirmed the "continuing structural subordination and vulnerability relating to sexual orientation and gender identity", and held that conduct (in that case words) which might appear innocuous must be approached from the perspective of the different structural positions in a post-apartheid South Africa (and, the SAHRC would respectfully add, a post-colonial world) in the light of "systemic disadvantages and inequalities" and "the system of subordination of vulnerable and marginalised groups".[58]

21. The CC held that it is wrong to require an evidential link between the impugned action and societal prejudice against the LGBTIQ+ community.[59] Reactive and restrictive approaches to evidence and causation in the context of discrimination are "misplaced" because the law in this field must be "pre-emptive" in order to prevent the perpetuation of systemic violations of marginalised individuals' entitlement to non-discrimination on prohibited grounds.[60] Hence a causal link is not required,[61] and the onus is imposed on a defendant to prove that discrimination (on a listed ground) is fair.[62]

22. This is because the listed grounds "have the potential to demean persons by denying them their inherent humanity and dignity", the Constitutional Court explained, adding that "[t]here is often a complex relationship between these grounds", which "in some cases … relate to immutable biological attributes or characteristics" or "a combination of one or more of these features."[63] On this basis the CC held that the rights of the LGBTIQ+ community could not be protected without restricting the right of freedom to expression.[64]

23. Ensuring that the LGBTIQ+ community has equal protection against exclusion is imperative in the light of the apartheid history and the current prevalence of prejudice against gays, lesbians, transgender people and gender non-conforming persons in Africa, the CC held.[65] Hence the need to redress conduct or measures "contribut[ing] to an environment that serves to delegitimise" the LGBTIQ+ community's "right to be treated as equals".[66]

24. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principles applicable to the determination of this case (particularly questions 3.2 and 4.2 addressed by the Court to the parties): intersectionality applies specifically in SOGIE scenarios; it permits and indeed requires a relaxation of strict approaches to matters of evidence and causation for purposes of establishing an infringement,[67] imposes the onus on a defendant to establish the fairness of discrimination,[68] and necessitates compelling justification of unfair discrimination.[69]

(8) Eighth principle: Arbitration and public policy considerations

25. Under the CC's caselaw the compelling justification required for infringements of public policy cannot be provided by a pro-arbitration policy. Public policy rests, the CC has confirmed,[70] on the values underlying the South African Constitution (i.e. dignity, equality and freedom; non-racialism and non-sexism; supremacy of the constitution and the rule of law; and democracy and openness).[71] Despite its recognition of the importance of affording ample appreciation to

[67] Indeed, as Atrey op cit at 190 states (with reference to earlier caselaw), the CC's judgment exemplifies "making good use of qualitative evidence without necessarily demanding statistical proof." Atrey continues by identifying two difficulties with courts considering statistics as necessary proof of intersectional discrimination. The first is the dearth of available data. The second is that it is unrealistic to expect a claimant to access statistics (generally held by governments, not individuals) (A/26/2018).
[68] This, too, is consistent with this Court's approach, as Atrey op cit at 193 points out (A/26/2021).
[69] As Atrey op cit at 196 summarises the position (as adopted and applied also by the CC), a claimant is only required to prove a prima facie case of discrimination on a prohibited ground; a defendant must thereupon acquit itself of the burden to establish an adequate basis for the discrimination; thus the respondent bears a greater burden of proof at the second stage than the claimant bears at the first stage; the burden to justify discrimination is "not a light burden"; and it may indeed be the case that the presumption of unfairness applicable at the second stage of the discrimination analysis (preceding the justification analysis) results in the conclusion that there cannot be an adequate explanation for the discrimination in question (A/26/2024). See, again, in this regard Sithole v Sithole supra para 45, which reflects that Atrey's assessment is consistent with South African law (A/18/1385-1386).
[70] King NO v De Jager 2021 (4) SA 1 (CC) para 91 (A/16/1230), continuing to hold that a clause in a will is unenforceable for being contrary to public policy if it violates the value of equality (id para 96 (A/16/1231)).

arbitration,[72] the CC has confirmed that public policy prevails.[73] Indeed, as it held, international law on arbitration itself recognises that public policy prevails over the enforcement of arbitral awards.[74]

26. The SAHRC submits that this reflects the following general principle of relevance to questions 4.3 and 5 addressed by the Court to the parties: the reduced scrutiny applied by domestic courts over arbitration tribunals' determination of issues impacting on fundamental rights militates against applying a broad margin of appreciation or loose limitations analysis.[75]

C. Conclusion

27. The SAHRC is indebted to the Court for the opportunity to participate in these proceedings as an intervener, and respectfully submits that – for the reasons set out above – the identified principles apply to the adjudication of this case. In particular, the SAHRC submits that the determination of the central questions raised in this case (namely whether the applicant has suffered a violation of her rights guaranteed by Articles 3, 8 and 14 of the Convention) requires a detailed consideration of the context in which the alleged violations arise in applying the intersectionality principle already recognised by this Court. The intersectionality principle has wide utility in discrimination cases and provides an appropriate analytical approach to integrating the prohibition on discrimination enshrined by Article 14 (which the SAHRC recognises does not have an independent sphere of operation) with other Convention rights (especially dignity inherent in Article 3) through which the right to equality is realised.

CASE NO CCT 15/95

[1] CHASKALSON P: This is another case in which difficulties have arisen in regard to the application of the provisions of section 102(1) of the Constitution.

[2] Section 102(1) which deals with the referral of constitutional issues to this Court by a provincial or local division of the Supreme Court, and sections 103(3) and (4) which deal with referrals of constitutional issues raised in other courts, are necessary to address problems of jurisdiction. A provincial or local division of the Supreme Court has jurisdiction under section 101 of the Constitution to determine certain constitutional issues.

In the absence of a consent to jurisdiction in terms of section 101(6) it has no jurisdiction to give a decision on the constitutionality of an Act of Parliament, to rule on disputes of a constitutional nature between the national government and any other organ of government, or to deal with disputes between organs of state of different provinces.

[3] No provision is made for proceedings to be initiated in the Constitutional Court, but section 100(2) empowers the Constitutional Court to make provision in its rules "for direct access to the Court where it is in the interest of justice to do so in respect of any matter over which it has jurisdiction." Such provision has been made by rule 17 which permits direct access in "exceptional circumstances only, which will ordinarily exist only where the matter is of such urgency, or otherwise of such public importance, that the delay necessitated by the use of the ordinary procedures would prejudice the public interest or prejudice the ends of justice and good government."

[4] The procedures, which are prescribed by sections 102(1), (2), and (3) and sections 103(2), (3) and (4) of the Constitution, contemplate that constitutional issues within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court will be raised formally in proceedings before the Supreme Court or other courts, and will only be referred to the Constitutional Court for its decision in circumstances where it would be appropriate to do so. It is in the first instance the responsibility of the Supreme Court to decide whether or not the circumstances are appropriate.

[5] Thus, if the validity of any legislation is challenged in the Magistrates Court or other court which has no jurisdiction to deal with such challenge, the presiding officer must either act in terms of section 103(2) and deal with the matter on the assumption that the legislation is valid, or if he or she is "of the opinion that it is in the interest of justice to do so",[1] postpone the proceedings in terms of section 103(3) to enable the party who has raised the matter to apply to the Supreme Court for relief in terms of section 103(4). The Supreme Court has the power in terms of section 103(4) to deal with the issue itself if it is within its jurisdiction or to refer it to the Constitutional Court if it is beyond its jurisdiction. To exercise the power to refer the issue to the Constitutional Court, the provincial or local division concerned must be of the opinion that a decision on the validity of the law will be material to the adjudication of the matter, that there is a reasonable prospect that the relevant law will be held to be invalid, and that it is in the interest of justice that the issue be decided. If a decision is taken to refer the issue to the Constitutional Court the provincial or local division concerned must make a finding on any evidence that may be relevant to the constitutional issue. This will be necessary only if oral evidence has to be heard and although that is not specifically stated, the provision clearly contemplates that in such event the evidence will be heard by the provincial or local division concerned.

[6] Sections 102(1), (2), and (3) prescribe the procedure to be followed in dealing with constitutional issues raised in proceedings before a provincial or local division. They provide:

> (1) If, in any matter before a provincial or local division of the Supreme Court, there is an issue which may be decisive for the case, and which falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in terms of section 98(2) and (3), the provincial or local division concerned shall, if it considers it to be in the interest of justice to do so, refer such matter to the Constitutional Court for its decision: Provided that, if it is necessary for evidence to be > heard for the purposes of deciding such issue, the provincial or local division concerned shall hear such evidence and make a finding thereon, before referring the matter to the Constitutional Court.

> (2) If, in any matter before a local or provincial division, there is any issue other than an issue referred to the Constitutional Court in terms of subsection (1), the provincial or local division shall, if it refers the relevant issue to the Constitutional Court, suspend the proceedings before it, pending the decision of the Constitutional Court.
> (3) If, in any matter before a provincial or local division, there are both constitutional and other issues, the provincial or local division concerned shall, if it does not refer an issue to the Constitutional Court, hear the matter, make findings of fact which may be relevant to a constitutional issue within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, and give a decision on such issues as are within its jurisdiction.

The Constitution contemplates that constitutional disputes will ordinarily be dealt with by the provincial or local division before the Constitutional Court is engaged; and this is so even if the only issue in the case is a constitutional issue within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court. This follows from the language of section 102(1) and (2) which necessarily implies that section 102(1) is applicable to cases in which the only issue is the one to be referred to the Constitutional Court, and section 102(17) which makes provision for appeals to the Constitutional Court against a decision of the Supreme Court refusing a referral where "the only issue raised is a constitutional issue within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court".

[7] The Constitution requires the Supreme Court to deal with constitutional issues raised in proceedings brought before it in terms of sections 102(1) or 103(4), if such issues are within its jurisdiction. Where the constitutional issues raised in proceedings before it, are within the jurisdiction of the provincial or local division, they will ordinarily be considered in conjunction with the other issues in the case, and any appeal will be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of sections 102(4), (5), (6) and (7); such appeals will also be subject to the rules of the Supreme Court and the Constitutional Court.

[8] Where, however, a constitutional issue within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court is raised in a matter, the provincial or local division is empowered by section 102(1) to refer such issue to the Constitutional Court for its decision. It is not, however, obliged to do so. It is required by the section to have regard to two further matters upon which the exercising of the power is dependent. First, whether the issue is one which may be decisive for the case; and secondly, whether it would be in the interest of justice to refer the issue to the Constitutional Court. The referral should only be made if both these requirements have been satisfied.

[9] The importance of the second issue has been stressed in a number of decisions where it has been pointed out that it is not in the interest of justice to refer an issue which is based upon a contention that has no reasonable prospect of being upheld by the Constitutional Court. It has also been pointed out that it is not ordinarily in the interest of justice for cases to be heard piecemeal, and that as a general rule if it is possible to decide a case without deciding a constitutional issue this should be done.[2]

[2] S v Mhlungu & Others 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 59; S v Vermaas 1995 (3) SA 292 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 851 (CC) at para 13; Ynuico Ltd. v Minister of Trade and Industry and Others 1995 (11) BCLR 1453 (T) at 1465B-E; Bernstein and Others v Von Wielligh and Others (CCT 23/95: judgment delivered on 27 March 1996), at para 2.

Defence,[3] where he held that the requirement that it "may be decisive" was satisfied "once the ruling given there may have a crucial bearing on the eventual outcome of the case as a whole, or on any significant aspect of the way in which its remaining parts ought to be handled." This would include an issue which, if decided in favour of the party who has raised it, would put an end to or materially curtail the litigation. It would also include an issue such as the constitutionality of the provisions of section 217(1)(b)(ii) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977, dealing with the onus of proof in relation to the admissibility of a confession in a criminal trial, which arose in S v Zuma[4] and S v Mhlungu.[5] In Zuma's case, which had been wrongly referred for other reasons, the decision of the entire case in fact depended on where the onus lay. In Mhlungu's case a ruling would determine the way in which the voir dire was to be conducted, and was also necessary in fairness to the accused to enable them to decide whether or not to give evidence.

[11] Evidence that may be necessary for the determination of a constitutional issue should be placed before the Supreme Court at the time of the application for referral. Frequently, this can be done on affidavit. There may, however, be exceptional cases in which it is necessary for oral evidence to be led in respect of the constitutional issue, and the proviso to section 102(1) requires that in such cases the provincial or local division concerned shall hear the evidence and make findings thereon before referring the issue to the Constitutional Court. This requirement is clearly directed towards avoiding the delays and inconvenience that would be caused if such evidence had to be dealt with by a court of eleven judges. Rule 34 of the Rules of the Constitutional Court provides that a party may also make use of material that does not specifically appear on the record, provided that the facts are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible, or are of an official, scientific, technical, or statistical nature capable of easy verification. Frequently it will not be necessary for evidence to be placed before the Court for the purposes of the decision on the constitutional issue; but there will be occasions on which such evidence will be necessary, particularly when it is sought to justify a limitation of a right entrenched under Chapter Three of the Constitution.

[12] A litigant who wishes to rely on evidence that is not covered by rule 34, has a duty to ensure that such evidence is placed on record before asking for an issue to be referred to the Constitutional Court, and the referring judge should also be satisfied that any evidence necessary for the proper determination of the issue is on record before making the referral. It should be borne in mind in this regard, that an important part of any decision is the order to be made in terms of sections 98(5) or (6) of the Constitution. If either party wishes to rely on evidence beyond the scope of rule 34 to support its submissions concerning the terms of the order, the affidavits containing such evidence should be placed before the court at the referral phase and should not be tendered after the referral has been made.

[13] Although the language of sections 102(1), (2) and (3) differs from the language of sections 103(2), (3),and (4), they have in common the fact that the Supreme Court has the responsibility of controlling referrals to the Constitutional Court. This is an important function which is necessary both to ensure that the hearing of cases is not disrupted by frivolous or unnecessary applications to refer issues to the Constitutional Court, and to ensure that if the determination of a constitutional issue may be decisive, it should only be referred after all the evidence necessary for such a decision has been placed on record.

[14] Where, as in the present case, a ruling as to the decisiveness of the constitutional issue depends in part on a point of law within the jurisdiction of the provincial or local division, the law point should be considered and decided by the provincial or local division concerned, and a referral should not be made unless that decision leads to the conclusion that the constitutional issue may indeed be decisive. These procedures ensure that litigation proceeds in an orderly fashion, that constitutional issues are only referred to the Constitutional Court when they are ripe for hearing, and that the Constitutional Court has the benefit of the reasons of the provincial or local division for the referral when it is called upon to deal with the matter. Applications for referral are not mere formalities and ought not to be treated as such by the parties seeking a referral, or by the courts to whom an application for a postponement under section 103(3) or a referral under section 103(4) or section 102(1) is made.

[15] In the present case the issue referred to this Court concerns the constitutionality of section 44 of the Insurance Act, 1944. It is an issue within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court and the requirement that there be a reasonable prospect of success was clearly satisfied. The consideration that presents a difficulty in the present case is whether the issue is one which may be decisive for the case. As appears from the judgment of O'Regan J, the answer to that question depends upon whether the date on which the deeming provision takes effect is the date of the concursus creditorum or some earlier date. This is relevant because the deceased died before the Constitution was in force and if the vesting of the creditors' rights to the proceeds of the insurance policy took effect on or before that date it would not be subject to attack even if section 44 was invalidated by the Constitution when it came into force.[6] A ruling as to the constitutionality of section 44 could, however, be decisive for the case if the relevant date is the date of the concursus creditorum. A finding as to the relevant date was therefore necessary for the purpose of deciding whether or not the issue was a proper one for referral in terms of section 102(1). This Court has no jurisdiction to make such a finding, which was relevant not only for the purposes of the referral but also for the making of an order in terms of section 98(5) or (6) of the Constitution. The Transvaal Provincial Division should have been asked to make a finding on this issue. This was not done and as a result the referral has not been made in accordance with the requirements of section 102(1).[7]

[16] In the present case an application was made on the 23rd March 1995 to the Transvaal Provincial Division, before which the case was pending, for the issue of the constitutionality of section 44 of the Insurance Act to be referred to this Court, and that application was granted on the 28th March. The parties failed at the time to appreciate the importance of the date of the vesting of creditors' rights under section 44 of the Insurance

[6] Du Plessis v De Klerk CCT 8/95: judgment delivered in May 1996. Whether there may be exceptional circumstances in which an order in terms of section 98(6) could render invalid anything done prior to 27 April 1994, a question expressly left open in De Klerk's case (at para 20 per Kentridge AJ) needs no further consideration here. It is clear that the circumstances of the present case do not warrant such an order.

Act, and it was for this reason that the provincial division was not asked to determine such date. This was before the judgments in S v Mhlungu, S v Vermaas, and Du Plessis v De Klerk had been given. Practitioners and Courts were not yet familiar with the provisions of the new Constitution or with the procedures to be followed in the referral of constitutional issues to this Court. It had also not yet been made clear by this Court that the Constitution will not ordinarily[8] be construed as interfering with vested rights, and as the judgments in S v Mhlungu and Du Plessis v De Klerk show, there was considerable confusion at the time of the application for referral in this case in regard to the applicability of the Constitution to issues that had arisen prior to the date on which it came into force.

[17] Although they have some features in common there are material differences between the present case and Luitingh's case. Luitingh's case was referred to this Court more than a month after judgment had been given in Zuma's case and at a time when it had already been made clear that rule 17 "is not intended to be used to legitimate an incompetent reference."[9] One of the issues in Luitingh's case was whether the Plaintiff's claim had been extinguished before the Constitution came into force; if it had been the constitutional issue would have been irrelevant. Despite the uncertainty that existed in regard to the "retrospectivity" of the Constitution, it had never been suggested, nor could it reasonably have been suggested, that one of the consequences of the coming into force of the Constitution was to revive extinguished debts. Finally, there was no pressing need to deal with the constitutional issue raised in Luitingh's case, as the same issue had been argued in another case before this court, and in which the issue would be resolved.

[18] The parties in the present case desire that a decision be given on the constitutional issue. The issue as to the constitutionality of section 44 of the Insurance Act is one of importance on which we have heard full argument by parties with an interest in the outcome, and in respect of which we are in a position to give judgment. Although we do not have jurisdiction to determine the time of the vesting of creditors' rights under section 44 of the Insurance Act I am satisfied that there is a reasonable prospect that on the facts of the present case, the relevant date may be held to be the date of the concursus creditorum, which means that there is a reasonable prospect that the constitutional issue will prove to be decisive for the case. Having regard to this, to the uncertainty that existed at the time of the referral in regard both to the procedures to be followed and the reach of the Constitution, and to the fact that the public interest and the ends of justice and good government will be served by the delivery of a judgment on the constitutional issue by this Court, I consider that the matter is one in which we can exercise our power to grant direct access to the parties.[10] It should, however, be clearly understood that uncertainty as to the procedures to be followed or the reach of the Constitution can no longer be regarded as excuses for incorrect referrals, and that this Court has a discretion, even where exceptional circumstances have been established, to refuse to grant permission for a matter to be brought directly to it. It will not hesitate to exercise that discretion when it considers it appropriate to do so.

O'REGAN J

A CHASKALSON
PRESIDENT, CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

Mahomed DP, Ackermann J, Didcott J, Kentridge AJ, Kriegler J, Langa J, Madala J, Mokgoro J, O'Regan J and Sachs J concur in the judgment of Chaskalson P

[19] O'REGAN J: The question referred to the court in this matter was whether section 44 of the Insurance Act, 27 of 1943 ('the Act'), is in conflict with the provisions of chapter 3 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act, 200 of 1993 ('the Constitution'), in so far as it discriminates against married women by depriving them, in certain circumstances, of all or some of the benefits of life insurance policies ceded to them or made in their favour by their husbands.

> (1) If the estate of a man who has ceded or effected a life policy in terms of section forty-two or forty-three has been sequestrated as insolvent, the policy or any money which has been paid or has become due thereunder or any other asset into which any such money was converted shall be deemed to belong to that estate: Provided that, if the transaction in question was entered into in good faith and was completed not less than two years before the sequestration --
> (a) by means or in pursuance of a duly registered antenuptial contract, the preceding provisions of this subsection shall not apply in connection with the policy, money or other asset in question;
> (b) otherwise than by means or in pursuance of a duly registered antenuptial contract, only so much of the total value of all such policies, money and other assets as exceeds thirty thousand rand shall be deemed to belong to the said estate.
> (2) If the estate of a man who has ceded or effected a life policy as aforesaid, has not been sequestrated, the policy or any money which has been paid or has become due thereunder or any other asset into which any such money was converted shall, as against any creditor of that man, be deemed to be the property of the said man --
> (a) in so far as its value, together with the value of all other life policies ceded or effected as aforesaid and all moneys which have been paid or have become due under any such policy and the value of all other assets into which any such money was converted, exceeds the sum of thirty thousand rand, if a period of two years or longer has elapsed since the date upon which the said man ceded or effected the policy; or
> (b) entirely, if a period of less than two years has elapsed between the date upon which the policy was ceded or effected, as aforesaid, and the date upon which the creditor

> concerned causes the property in question to be attached in execution of a judgment or order of a court of law.

[21] Section 44(3) of the Act is concerned with spouses married in community of property and protects life insurance policies owned by a wife from attachment in certain circumstances. It has no bearing on the facts of the case before us and this judgment is therefore concerned solely with subsections (1) and (2) of section 44.

[22] One effect of these provisions is that, where a life insurance policy has been ceded to a woman, or effected in her favour, by her husband more than two years before the sequestration of her husband's estate, she will receive a maximum of R30 000 from the policy. If it was ceded or taken out less than two years from the date of sequestration, she will receive no benefit from the policy at all. Similarly, once two years has elapsed since the policy was ceded to a wife, or effected in her favour, the policy or any money due thereunder, to the extent that it exceeds R30 000, will be deemed, as against the creditors of the husband, to form part of the husband's estate. Such proceeds may therefore be attached by judgment creditors of the husband in execution of a judgment against him. If less than two years has elapsed since the date of the cession or taking out of the policy and the date of attachment by a creditor of her husband, all the proceeds of the policy will be deemed to be part of the husband's estate. The Act contains no similar limitation upon the effect of a life insurance policy ceded or effected in favour of a husband by a wife.

[23] Counsel for Mr A Kitshoff NO, the respondent, pointed out that sections 44(1) and (2), and their predecessors, section 26(2) of the Insolvency Act, 32 of 1916, and section 28 of the Insurance Act, 37 of 1923, were enacted at a time when donations between spouses during a marriage were prohibited. One of the effects of sections 44 (1) and (2) and their predecessors was therefore to provide some relief to married women in the context of the prevailing law governing matrimonial property. During the 1980s, however, the Legislature enacted legislation which altered substantially the proprietary consequences of marriage (the Matrimonial Property Act, 88 of 1984, and the Marriage and Matrimonial Property Law Amendment Act, 3 of 1988). Section 22 of the 1984 Act abolished the common law provision which had forbidden donations between spouses. Sections 44 (1) and (2) therefore no longer have the beneficial effect referred to by counsel. As a consequence of that change in the law, the effect of the provision, which had formerly been to provide some benefit to married women, was altered so that it, in effect, was prejudicial to them.

[24] The facts in the case referred to this court are as follows: a life insurance policy valued at approximately R2 million in respect of Mr P Brink was taken out during 1989. The policy reflected Mr Brink as the owner of the policy and in 1990 he ceded, or purported to cede, it to his wife, Mrs A Brink, who is the applicant before this court. On 9 April 1994 Mr Brink died. Mr A Kitshoff, the Respondent before this court, was appointed as executor of the estate and on 23 May 1994, in terms of section 34(1) of the Administration of Estates Act, 66 of 1965, ('the Estates Act'), he sent a notice to creditors informing them that the estate was insolvent. In terms of section 44 of the Act, the executor demanded that the assurer (Liberty Life Association of Africa) pay into the estate all but R30 000 of the proceeds of the life insurance policy. When the assurer refused to do so, the executor launched an application in the Transvaal Provincial Division of the Supreme Court for an order compelling the assurer to pay over the proceeds. Mrs Brink, the assurer and the Master of the Supreme Court were cited as respondents in that application.

[25] Mrs Brink made a counter application seeking an order that the life insurance policy be rectified to reflect her, and not her husband, as the original owner of the policy. She also raised the question of the constitutionality of section 44 of the Act. On 28 March 1995 the parties applied to the Supreme Court for a consent order referring the question of the constitutionality of section 44 to this court in terms of section 102(1) of the Constitution. That order was granted.

[26] In this case, the insurance policy was taken out and ceded and the applicant's husband died before the Constitution came into force. The question of whether this Constitution can have application to events that occurred before it came into operation on the 27 April 1994 has been decided in Du Plessis and others v De Klerk and others CCT8/95, an unreported judgment of this court delivered in May 1996. In that case, Kentridge AJ, speaking for the court, held that the Constitution would not ordinarily be construed as interfering with rights which had vested before it came into force (at para 20).

[27] Although that judgment had not been handed down when this case was argued, Mr Bertelsmann, for the applicant, developed his argument on the assumption that the Constitution would only apply to the present case if the executor's claim to the proceeds of the policy arose after the Constitution came into force. According to his argument, on a proper reading of section 44(1), an estate only becomes entitled to the proceeds of the policy once the estate has been sequestrated. He pointed out that the deceased estate had never been formally sequestrated. However, Mr Bertelsmann argued, relying upon Miller NO v Smit 1986 (1) SA 320 (C) at 326, that the estate would become entitled to the proceeds of the policy once a concursus creditorum had been initiated in terms of section 44(2), read with section 34 of the Estates Act. This could be brought about by the provisions of section 34 of the Estates Act without a formal sequestration order. In terms of this section, where an executor discovers that an estate is insolvent, he or she may send a notice to all creditors reporting on the insolvency of the estate. If a majority of the creditors do not require the executor to surrender the estate for sequestration in terms of the Insolvency Act, 24 of 1936, the executor may, within a period specified in the notice, which may not be less than fourteen days after sending it, proceed with an informal insolvency procedure governed by the provisions of section 34 of the Estates Act. At that stage, a concursus creditorum is deemed to have been initiated. In the present case, a section 34 notice was sent out on 23 May 1994 and Mr Bertelsmann argued in reliance on section 34 that a concursus creditorum came into existence fourteen days later and that it was only then that the estate could have acquired a right to the proceeds of the policy.

[28] The jurisdiction of this court is limited to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of the Constitution (in terms of section 98(2) of the Constitution) and any other matter over which it is expressly given jurisdiction. Neither the question of when an estate becomes entitled to the proceeds of a life insurance policy in terms of section 44, nor the question of when a concursus creditorum will be initiated, are constitutional questions. This court accordingly does not have jurisdiction over such matters.

[29] The first question to be considered is whether, in the circumstances, the reference of the constitutional issue to this Court is proper. That issue is discussed fully in the judgment of Chaskalson P with which I am in complete agreement. In short, section 102(1) of the Constitution provides three prerequisites for a valid referral: the issue referred must fall within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court, it must be shown that the issue 'may be decisive of the case' and the judge of the provincial or local division must consider it in the interest of justice for the issue to be referred. In S v Mhlungu 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) (at para 59) Kentridge AJ held that it was implicit within the third requirement that there be reasonable prospects of success in regard to the issue referred. (See also Ferreira v Levin NO 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC); 1996 (1) BCLR 1 at para 7.)

[30] On the construction of section 102(1) adopted by Chaskalson P, it is necessary for Mr Bertelsmann to show that the Constitution may have a decisive bearing on the outcome of the case. Whether it will or not in this case depends on whether Mr Bertelsmann's construction of section 44 of the Act and section 34 of the Estates Act is correct or not. This is a matter which falls outside our jurisdiction and within the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and is a question which should have been answered before this referral was made. Accordingly, the referral in this case is improper. However, for the reasons given by Chaskalson P (at paragraphs 16 - 18), I consider that this is an appropriate case in which to grant direct access in terms of section 100(2) of the Constitution read with rule 17.

[31] Sections 44 (1) and (2) of the Act are challenged on the ground that they constitute a breach of section 8 of the Constitution. Section 8 provides that:

> (1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, > religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
> (3) (a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.
> (4) Prima facie proof of discrimination on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) shall be presumed to be sufficient proof of unfair discrimination as contemplated in that subsection, until the contrary is established.

[32] All the parties who appeared before us conceded that sections 44(1) and (2) constituted a breach of section 8 of the Constitution. The applicant and the Centre for Applied Legal Studies, which was admitted as amicus curiae, presented detailed and helpful argument as to the manner in which section 8 should be interpreted. This is the first case in which the court has been directly concerned with section 8, and in particular section 8(2), of the Constitution and some consideration of the approach to that section is appropriate.

[33] Equality has a very special place in the South African Constitution. The preamble states that

> ... there is a need to create a new order in which all South Africans will be entitled to a common South African citizenship in a sovereign and democratic constitutional state in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races ....

Furthermore, section 33(1) of the Constitution states that rights entrenched in chapter 3 may be limited to the extent only that it is 'justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality'. It is not surprising that equality is a recurrent theme in the Constitution. As this court has said in other judgments, the Constitution is an emphatic renunciation of our past in which inequality was systematically entrenched. (S v Makwanyane 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paragraphs 218, 262, 322*; Shabalala and others v Attorney-General, Transvaal and another* 1996 (1) SA 725 (CC); 1995 (12) BCLR 1593, at paragraph 26.)

[34] Section 35(1) of the Constitution requires us to have regard to international law to interpret the rights it entrenches. The concepts of 'equality before the law' and 'discrimination' are widely used in international instruments. Article 7 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights 1948 provides that:

> All are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to equal protection of the law. All are entitled to equal protection against any discrimination in violation of this Declaration and against any incitement to such discrimination.

Article 26 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1966 provides that:

> All persons are equal before the law and are entitled without any discrimination to the equal protection of the law. In this respect, law shall prohibit any discrimination and guarantee to all persons equal and effective protection against discrimination on any ground such as race, colour, sex, language, religion, political or other opinion, national or social origin, property, birth or other status.

In addition, there are other international conventions dealing with specific aspects of discrimination such as the International Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Racial Discrimination 1966, the Convention on the Elimination of all Forms of Discrimination against Women 1980, the Convention against Discrimination in Education 1960 and the International Labour Organisation (ILO) Discrimination (Employment and Occupation) Convention 1958.

[35] As well as the international instruments, many countries have constitutional provisions protecting equality and prohibiting discrimination. One of the oldest of such provisions is the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America, which provides that no state shall 'deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws'. Although this provision contains no specific reference to discrimination, it is widely perceived to be a precursor to equality provisions in many modern constitutions. Similarly, the extensive jurisprudence developed by the United States Supreme Court has informed much of the jurisprudence on equality of other courts. A central principle of the United States jurisprudence has been to impose different levels of scrutiny on different categories of legislative classification. The most stringent level of scrutiny is reserved for classifications based on race or nationality, or those that invade fundamental rights. Such classifications are almost inevitably considered to be a breach of the Fourteenth Amendment. An intermediate level of scrutiny is applied to classifications concerning gender or socio-economic rights. The third level of scrutiny requires merely that a classification be shown to have a rational relationship to the legislative purpose. (See Laurence H Tribe American Constitutional Law 2nd ed chapter 16; Geoffrey R Stone, Louis M Seidman, Cass R Sunstein, Mark V Tushnet Constitutional Law 2nd ed chapter 5.)

[36] The Indian Constitution, too, protects equality and seeks to outlaw discrimination. Article 14 and 15(1) provide that:

> 14. The State shall not deny to any person equality before the law or the equal protection of the laws within the territory of India.
> 15. (1) The State shall not discriminate against any citizen on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them.
> (2) No citizen shall, on grounds only of religion, race, caste, sex, place of birth or any of them, be subject to any disability, liability, restriction or condition with regard to -
> (a) access to shops, public restaurants, hotels and places of public entertainment; or > (b) the use of wells, tanks, bathing ghats, roads and places of public resort maintained wholly or partly out of State funds or dedicated to the use of the general public.
> (3) Nothing in this article shall prevent the State from making any special provision for women and children.
> (4) Nothing in this article or in clause (2) of article 29 shall prevent the State from making any special provision for the advancement of any social and educationally backward classes of citizens or for the Scheduled Castes and the Scheduled Tribes.

[37] In interpreting article 14, the Indian Supreme Court has required that any legislative classification or distinction be shown first to be founded on 'intelligible differentia' which have a rational relation to the object sought to be achieved by the impugned legislation. Article 15 is understood as an instance of the right to equality protected by article 14. (Basu Shorter Constitution of India 10th ed at 63; Seervai The Constitution of India 3rd ed, volume 1 at Chapter 9.)

[38] In Canada article 15 of the Charter on Rights and Freedoms provides that:

> (1) Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.
> (2) Subsection (1) does not preclude any law, program or activity that has as its object the amelioration of conditions of disadvantaged individuals or groups including those that are disadvantaged because of race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or mental or physical disability.

In Andrews v Law Society of British Columbia (1989) 36 CRR 193, the Supreme Court of Canada held that the primary purpose of section 15 was to prevent discrimination on the grounds listed in section 15(2) or on grounds analogous to those listed. (See P W Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada 3rd ed 1164 - 65.)

[39] This cursory consideration of the international conventions and the foreign jurisprudence makes it clear that the prohibition of discrimination is an important goal of both national governments and the international community. However, it also illustrates that the various conventions and national constitutions are differently worded and that the interpretation of national constitutions, in particular, reflects different approaches to the concepts of equality and non-discrimination. The different approaches adopted in the different national jurisdictions arise not only from different textual provisions and from different historical circumstances, but also from different jurisprudential and philosophical understandings of equality.

[40] As in other national constitutions, section 8 is the product of our own particular history. Perhaps more than any of the other provisions in chapter 3, its interpretation must be based on the specific language of section 8, as well as our own constitutional context. Our history is of particular relevance to the concept of equality. The policy of apartheid, in law and in fact, systematically discriminated against black people in all aspects of social life. Black people were prevented from becoming owners of property or even residing in areas classified as 'white', which constituted nearly 90% of the landmass of South Africa; senior jobs and access to established schools and universities were denied to them; civic amenities, including transport systems, public parks, libraries and many shops were also closed to black people. Instead, separate and inferior facilities were provided. The deep scars of this appalling programme are still visible in our society. It is in the light of that history and the enduring legacy that it bequeathed that the equality clause needs to be interpreted.

[41] Although our history is one in which the most visible and most vicious pattern of discrimination has been racial, other systematic motifs of discrimination were and are inscribed on our social fabric. In drafting section 8, the drafters recognised that systematic patterns of discrimination on grounds other than race have caused, and may continue to cause, considerable harm. For this reason, section 8(2) lists a wide, and not exhaustive, list of prohibited grounds of discrimination.

[42] Section 8 was adopted then in the recognition that discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm. Such discrimination is unfair: it builds and entrenches inequality amongst different groups in our society. The drafters realised that it was necessary both to proscribe such forms of discrimination and to permit positive steps to redress the effects of such discrimination. The need to prohibit such patterns of discrimination and to remedy their results are the primary purposes of section 8 and, in particular, subsections (2), (3) and (4).

[43] Sections 44 (1) and (2) of the Act treat married women and married men differently. This difference in treatment disadvantages married women and not married men. The discrimination in sections 44(1) and (2) is therefore based on two grounds: sex and marital status. Section 8(2) does not require that the discrimination be based on one ground only; it specifically states that it may be based on ' one or more' grounds. Nor is it a difficulty for the applicant that section 8(2) mentions only one of the grounds, sex. The list provided in section 8(2) is not exhaustive. The subsection states expressly that the list provided should not be used to derogate from the generality of the prohibition on discrimination. It is not necessary to consider whether the other ground of discrimination, marital status, would be a ground which would constitute unfair discrimination for the purposes of section 8. It is sufficient that the disadvantageous treatment is substantially based on one of the listed prohibited grounds, namely, sex.

[44] Although in our society, discrimination on grounds of sex has not been as visible, nor as widely condemned, as discrimination on grounds of race, it has nevertheless resulted in deep patterns of disadvantage. These patterns of disadvantage are particularly acute in the case of black women, as race and gender discrimination overlap. That all such discrimination needs to be eradicated from our society is a key message of the Constitution. The preamble states the need to create a new order in 'which there is equality between men and women' as well as equality between 'people of all races'.

The Constitution proposes the establishment of a Commission on Gender Equality which shall 'promote gender equality'. It is clear, therefore, that legal rules which discriminate against women, as do sections 44(1) and (2), are in breach of section 8(2), unless it can be shown that they fall within the terms of section 8(3). It was not argued, nor could it have been, that sections 44(1) and (2) could be saved on that ground. Once it is established that a legal rule or provision is in breach of section 8, the question remains as to whether that particular rule or provision may be justified in terms of section 33.

> (a) shall be permissible only to the extent that it is --
> (i) reasonable; and
> (ii) justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality; and
> (b) shall not negate the essential content of the right in question,
> and provided further that any limitation to --
>
> (aa) a right entrenched in section 10, 11, 12, 14(1), 21, 25 or 30(1)(d) or (e) or (2); or
> (bb) a right entrenched in section 15, 16, 17, 18, 23 or 24, in so far as such right relates to free and fair political activity,
> shall, in addition to being reasonable as required in paragraph (a) (i), also be necessary.

[46] For sections 44 (1) and (2) to be held to be permissible limitations in terms of section 33, it must be shown that they are reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality, and that they do not negate the essential content of section 8. It is now well established that section 33 involves a proportionality exercise, in which the purpose and effects of the infringing provisions are weighed against the nature and extent of the infringement caused. It is to that exercise that I now turn.

[47] Sections 44 (1) and (2) appear to have been enacted with two purposes in mind: the first was to provide married women with a benefit which would otherwise have been denied to them because of the effect of the common law rule prohibiting donations between spouses. As discussed above, this beneficial purpose is no longer achieved because the common law rule was abolished in the mid-1980s. The provisions are now therefore disadvantageous to married women. The second apparent purpose of the section is to protect the interests of creditors of insolvent estates. This purpose is still achieved by the provisions. There is no question that protecting creditors is a valuable and important public purpose. There can be no dispute either that the close relationship between spouses may sometimes lead to collusion or fraud.

[48] However, I am not persuaded that the distinction drawn between married men and married women, which is the nub of the constitutional complaint in this case, can be said to be reasonable or justifiable. No cogent reasons were advanced by the respondent as to why sections 44 (1) and (2) apply only to transactions in which husbands effect policies in favour of, or cede them to, their wives, and not to similar transactions by wives in favour of their husbands. There seems to be no reason why fraud or collusion does not occur when husbands, rather than wives, are the beneficiaries of insurance policies. Avoiding fraud or collusion does not suggest a reason as to why a distinction should be drawn between married men and married women.

[49] Nor could the respondent demonstrate that there were not other legislative provisions which could reasonably serve the purpose of protecting the interests of creditors in a manner less invasive of constitutional rights. The Insolvency Act, 24 of 1936, contains a series of provisions in terms of which transactions which took place prior to the insolvency may be impeached if it is shown, for example, that they were collusive, or resulted in undue preference being given to certain creditors (see sections 26, 29, 30 and 31 of the Insolvency Act). The Insolvency Act also contains specific provisions for the property of the spouse of an insolvent to vest in the Master and thereafter in the trustee (section 21). If these provisions are not considered sufficient, there seems to be no reason either why Parliament could not enact a provision similar to sections 44 (1) and (2) which does not discriminate against married women. Indeed, it appears from information placed before us by the Financial Services Board that draft legislation has been prepared which contains a provision similar to sections 44 (1) and (2), but which does not discriminate against married women.

[50] In the circumstances, it is clear that sections 44(1) and (2) result in a breach of section 8. The respondent has failed to show that there is any reasonable basis for the constitutional breach caused. The purposes sought to be achieved by the provisions do not require a distinction to be drawn between married women and married men. The discrimination occasioned by the provisions cannot be said to be reasonable or justifiable in the light of the purposes of the legislation. In my view, therefore, the respondent has failed to provide sufficient justification for the infringement caused by sections 44(1) and (2). In the circumstances, it is not necessary to consider whether they constitute a negation of the essential content of the right to equality. From the above, it is clear that sections 44(1) and (2) are therefore inconsistent with the Constitution and this court must therefore hold them invalid.

[51] Section 98(5) of the Constitution requires this court to declare invalid any law found to be inconsistent with the Constitution. The court is granted a discretion to suspend that declaration of invalidity in terms of the proviso to section 98(5) if it considers it to be in the interests of justice and good government. The respondent could point to no compelling reason of good government for the court to exercise its discretion under section 98(5) and suspend the effect of the declaration of invalidity. In the absence of such a reason, there can be no grounds upon which the court would exercise that discretion.

> Unless the Constitutional Court in the interests of justice and good government orders otherwise, and save to the extent that it so orders, the declaration of invalidity of a law or provision thereof --
> (a) existing at the commencement of this Constitution, shall not invalidate anything done or permitted in terms thereof before the coming into effect of such declaration of invalidity; or
> (b) passed after such commencement, shall invalidate everything done or permitted in terms thereof.

[53] Sections 44 (1) and (2) of the Act came into force before the Constitution commenced on the 27 April 1994, and therefore section 98(6)(a) is of application to it. If this court were to declare subsections (1) and (2) of section 44 invalid, the ordinary effect would be not to invalidate any reliance on those provisions since the Constitution came into force.

[54] In S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso (1996 (1) SA 388 (CC); 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC)), in considering the discretion conferred on the court in section 98(6)(a), we held that:

> Central to a consideration of the interests of justice in a particular case is that successful litigants should obtain the relief they seek. It is only when the interests of good government outweigh the interests of the individual litigants that the Court will not grant relief to successful litigants. In principle too, the litigants before the Court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants (see US v Johnson 457 US 537 (1982); Teague v Lane 489 US 288 (1989)). On the other hand, as we state in S v Zuma (at para 43), we should be circumspect in exercising our powers under section 98(6)(a) so as to avoid unnecessary dislocation and uncertainty in the criminal justice process. (at para 32)

[55] Although that was a criminal case and this case is not, the considerations relevant to an exercise of discretion in terms of section 98(6)(a) are similar. The court must consider whether there are any reasons to believe that not invalidating all acts done or permitted in terms of sections 44 (1) and (2) would be against the interests of justice or good government.

[56] Since the Constitution came into force, estates may have been wound up and finalised in terms of the Insolvency Act, 24 of 1936, or the Administration of Estates Act, 66 of 1965, in good faith in reliance on sections 44(1) and (2). It is also possible that the proceeds of life insurance policies contemplated by section 44(2), or assets into which such proceeds have been converted, have been attached and realised by judgment creditors in terms of the section. There are cogent reasons of good government against making an order which may render proceedings which, to all intents and purposes, have been concluded, subject to further challenge or investigation. Such a possibility is not far-fetched. At common law an unpaid creditor of a deceased person has an action against heirs or legatees who have been paid more than they were entitled to out of the proceeds of the estate. (See De Villiers v Bullbrand Fertilisers Ltd 1941 TPD 131; Prinsloo v Woolbrokers Federation Ltd 1955 (2) SA 298 (N).) The position of unpaid creditors of insolvent companies is different to the position of an unpaid creditor of a deceased estate, although they may have a cause of action based on unjust enrichment. (See Kommissaris van Binnelandse Inkomste v Willers 1994 (3) SA 283 (A) at 333 and Willis Faber Enthoven (Pty) Ltd v Receiver of Revenue 1992 (4) SA 202 (A).)

[57] On the other hand, if the order of invalidity were to be made applicable only to causes of action that arise after the date of the order, it would deny some married women the protection of the Constitution Generally speaking, the interests of justice require that the protection of the Constitution be effective from the date upon which it came into force.

[58] In the circumstances of the present case, I take the view that the interests of justice and good government can best be met by an order which will, on the one hand, avoid creating the possibility of litigation concerning estates which have been wound up or payments to judgment creditors which have been made, while, on the other hand, not deprive women of the rights conferred upon them by the Constitution. This would be achieved by an order which invalidates the deeming provisions of sections 44(1) and (2) with effect from 27 April 1994, but exempts from that order payments made as a result of the operation of deeming provisions before the date of this order.

[59] The question of costs was not an issue before this court. In making the referral in terms of section 102(1), the Supreme Court expressly reserved the question of costs for later adjudication by that court. The parties before us were equally at fault in relation to the incorrect reference. The decision to deal with the matter by way of our power to grant direct access to litigants is one which benefits both parties and which resolves an issue which may be of importance to their litigation. In the circumstances this is not a case in which it would be appropriate to make any order as to costs.

1. It is declared that subsections (1) and (2) of section 44 of the Insurance Act, 27 of 1943, are invalid.

2. In terms of section 98(6) (a) of the Constitution it is ordered that the declaration of invalidity made in paragraph 1 shall invalidate the deeming provisions of sections 44(1) and (2) of the Insurance Act with effect from 27 April 1994, except to the extent that the operation of such deeming provisions has resulted, before the date of this order, in the payment of any money or the delivery of any asset, which, but for such provisions, would not otherwise have formed part of the estate, to any creditor of the man, or any beneficiary of his estate.

3. The matter of Brink v Kitshoff NO is remitted to the Transvaal Provincial Division to be dealt with in terms of this judgment.

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

Case CCT 11/96

THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC OF SOUTH AFRICA First Appellant
THE MINISTER OF CORRECTIONAL SERVICES Second Appellant

versus

JOHN PHILLIP PETER HUGO Respondent

Heard on: 12 November 1996
Decided on: 18 April 1997

JUDGMENT

GOLDSTONE J:

[1] This matter comes before us on appeal against a judgment of Magid J in the Durban and Coast Local Division of the Supreme Court.[1] The applicant in the court below (now respondent) is a prisoner who, on 6 December, 1991, commenced serving an effective sentence of fifteen and a half years. Some nine years prior to his incarceration, the respondent married and a child was born of that marriage on 11 December 1982. The respondent's wife died in 1987.

[2] On 27 June 1994, acting pursuant to his powers under section 82(1)(k) of the interim Constitution,[2] the President (first appellant) and the two Executive Deputy Presidents signed a document styled Presidential Act No. 17 (the "Presidential Act"), in terms of which special remission of sentences was granted to certain categories of prisoners.[3] The category of direct relevance to these proceedings was "all mothers in

2 Act 200 of 1993.

3 The Presidential Act provided, inter alia, the following:

> "In terms of section 82(1)(k) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993 (Act 200 of 1993), I hereby grant special remission of the remainder of their sentences to :
> - all persons under the age of eighteen (18) years who were or would have been incarcerated on 10 May 1994; (except those who has escaped and are still at large)
> - all mothers in prison on 10 May 1994, with minor children under the age of twelve (12) years;
> - all disabled prisoners in prison on 10 May 1994 certified as disabled by a district surgeon.

prison on 10 May 1994, with minor children under the age of twelve (12) years". It is common cause that the respondent would have qualified for remission, but for the fact that he was the father (and not the mother) of his son who was under the age of twelve years at the relevant date.

Provided that no special remission of sentence will be granted for any of the following offences or any attempt, soliciting or conspiracy to commit such an offence :

- murder;
- culpable homicide;
- robbery with aggravating circumstances;
- assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm;
- child abuse;
- rape;
- any other crimes of a sexual nature; and
- trading in or cultivating dependance producing substances."

[3] In the application before Magid J, the respondent in an amended notice of motion[4] sought an order declaring the Presidential Act unconstitutional and directing the first appellant to correct it in accordance with the provisions of the interim Constitution. The respondent alleged that the Presidential Act was in violation of the provisions of section 8(1) and (2) of the interim Constitution in as much as it unfairly discriminated against him on the ground of sex or gender and indirectly against his son in terms of section 8(2) because his incarcerated parent was not a female.

[4] The application was upheld, the court finding that the Presidential Act discriminated against the respondent and his son on the ground of gender. This finding in turn raised the presumption of unfairness in section 8(4) of the interim Constitution, which presumption was found not to have been rebutted by the appellants.[5] The court ordered the first appellant to correct the Presidential Act in accordance with the provisions of the interim Constitution within six months from the date of its order.[6] It is the appeal from this decision, (leave having been granted in terms of Constitutional Court

[5] This appeal requires us to consider the nature of the powers granted to the President by section 82(1)(k) of the interim Constitution.[7] Section 82(1) contains powers which historically are the non-statutory or prerogative powers which have traditionally inhered in the English monarch.[8] Similar powers have been and still are exercised (by heads of state or the executive in his or her name) in many countries, those in the

7 Section 82(1) of the interim Constitution reads as follows:

> "(1) The President shall be competent to exercise and perform the following powers and functions, namely-
> (a) to assent to, sign and promulgate Bills duly passed by Parliament;
> (b) in the event of a procedural shortcoming in the legislative process, to refer a Bill passed by Parliament back for further consideration by Parliament;
> (c) to convene meetings of the Cabinet;
> (d) to refer disputes of a constitutional nature between parties represented in Parliament or between organs of state at any level of government to the Constitutional Court or other appropriate institution, commission or body for resolution;
> (e) to confer honours;
> (f) to appoint, accredit, receive and recognise ambassadors, plenipotentiaries, diplomatic representatives and other diplomatic officers, consuls and consular officers;
> (g) to appoint commissions of enquiry;
> (h) to make such appointments as may be necessary under powers conferred upon him or her by this Constitution or any other law;
> (i) to negotiate and sign international agreements;
> (j) to proclaim referenda and plebiscites in terms of this Constitution or an Act of Parliament; and > (k) to pardon or reprieve offenders, either unconditionally or subject to such conditions as he or she may deem fit, and to remit any fines, penalties or forfeitures."

Commonwealth and many outside it.[9] In South Africa, prior to 1993, some, but not all, of those powers had been codified in earlier constitutions. Those that remained non-statutory were dealt with by reference to the exercise of the prerogative by the English monarch. The Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 32 of 1961 provided in section 7(4) that:

> "The State President shall ... as head of the State have such powers and functions as were immediately prior to the commencement of this Act possessed by the Queen by way of prerogative."

[6] In the Republic of South Africa Constitution Act 110 of 1983, it was provided in section 6(4) that:

> "The State President shall ... as head of the State have such powers and functions as were immediately before the commencement of this Act possessed by the State President by way of prerogative."

The 1983 Constitution made specific mention of some of the powers now contained in section 82 of the interim Constitution. These included, inter alia, the power to confer honours, pardon and reprieve offenders, and to enter into and ratify international treaties.[10]

[10] Section 6(3) of Act 110 of 1983.

[7] This process has now been completed in the interim Constitution. There is no express reference to prerogative powers and those powers of the President which originated from the royal prerogatives are to be found in section 82(1). This approach has also been followed in The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996.[11]

[8] Two conclusions can be drawn from the foregoing. First, the powers of the President which are contained in section 82(1) of the interim Constitution have their origin in the prerogative powers exercised under former constitutions by South African heads of state. Second, there are no powers derived from the royal prerogative which are conferred upon the President other than those enumerated in section 82(1).

[9] It is in this context that we must consider the central submission of the respondent, namely, that the power of pardon or reprieve granted to the President in section 82(1)(k) is subject to the provisions of Chapter 3 of the interim Constitution and, in particular, the equality provisions contained in section 8. In order to consider this submission it is necessary first to determine whether, in the exercise of his or her section 82(1)(k) powers, the President is subject at all to the provisions of the interim Constitution.

provided in section 4 that:

> "(1) This Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic and any law or act inconsistent with its provisions shall, unless otherwise provided expressly or by necessary implication in this Constitution, be of no force and effect to the extent of the inconsistency.
> (2) This Constitution shall bind all legislative, executive and judicial organs of state at all levels of government."

In terms of section 75 of the interim Constitution:

> "The executive authority of the Republic with regard to all matters falling within the legislative competence of Parliament shall vest in the President, who shall exercise and perform his or her powers and functions subject to and in accordance with this Constitution."

And, section 76 provides simply that:

> "The President shall be the Head of State."

In section 81(1) and (2) the responsibilities of the President are set out as follows:

> "(1) The President shall be responsible for the observance of the provisions of this Constitution by the executive and shall as head of state defend and uphold the Constitution as the supreme law of the land.
> (2) The President shall with dignity provide executive leadership in the interest of national unity in accordance with this Constitution and the law of the Republic."

There then follow the provisions of section 82(1) which, as stated earlier, provide for the President's competence to perform powers which historically fell within the prerogative powers of the English monarch. These are powers which now flow directly from the interim Constitution itself. Unlike the other powers of the President, they do not derive their authority from, and they are not dependent upon, legislative enactment.

[11] There are only three branches of government viz. legislative, executive and judicial. The powers of the President, other than those set out in section 82(1), are without question executive powers.[12] The question is whether those referred to in section 82(1) fall within a different category. In my opinion they do not. Whether the President is exercising constitutional powers as head of the executive (ie the Cabinet) or as head of state, he is acting as an executive organ of government. His powers are neither legislative nor judicial and there is no fourth branch of government.

[12] Textual support for the view that the powers exercised by the President under section 82(1) are executive powers is to be found in the heading to and contents of section 83(1) and (2). It is there provided as follows:

> "83. Confirmation of executive acts of President.-

[12] Section 75.

(1) Decisions of the President taken in terms of section 82 shall be expressed in writing under his or her signature.

(2) Any instrument signed by the President in the exercise or performance of a power or function referred to in section 82(3) shall be countersigned by a Minister."

For the purpose of elucidating a provision in a statute our courts have referred to the headings of sections in a statute.[13] A similar position has been adopted in England[14] and Canada.[15] In the case of headings which are part of a constitution which was the product of negotiations conducted by the drafters thereof, and those headings are part of the 13 Headings have, in certain circumstances, been used by our courts as an aid to interpret the sections of an Act which follow them, even though headings are not voted on or passed by Parliament. In Chotabhai v Union Government and Another 1911 AD 13 at 24 Lord de Villiers CJ, referring to an English decision, adopted the literal traditional viewpoint that "the headings of different portions of a Statute may be referred to for the purpose of determining the sense of any doubtful expression in a section ranged under any particular heading." In Turffontein Estates Ltd v Mining Commissioner, Johannesburg 1917 AD 419 at 431 Innes CJ, adopting a purposive approach, held that: "[w]e are. . . fully entitled to refer to [the heading] . . . for the elucidation of any clause to which it relates. It is impossible to lay down any general rule as to the weight which should be attached to such headings. The object in each case is to ascertain the intention of the Legislature, and the heading is an element in the process. . . . Where the intention of the lawgiver as expressed in any particular clause is quite clear, then it cannot be overriden by the words of a heading. But where the intention is doubtful, whether the doubt arises from ambiguity in the section itself or from other considerations, then the heading may become of importance. The weight to be given to it must necessarily vary with the circumstances of each case." See also Solomon JA at 437. This position has recently been further endorsed by the Appellate Division in Chidi v Minister of Justice 1992 (4) SA 110 (A) at 115. See further Bhagwan's v Swanepoel 1963 (4) SA 42 (E) at 43D; Du Plessis Interpretation of Statutes (Butterworths, Durban 1986) 126-7.

14 In Inglis v Robertson and Baker [1898] AC 616 (HL) at 630 Lord Herschell (in regard to the Factors Act of 1889) stated: "These headings are not, in my opinion, mere marginal notes, but the sections in the group to which they belong must be read in connection with them and interpreted by the light of them." Lord Upjohn in Director of Public Prosecutions v Schildkamp [1971] AC 1 (HL) at 28 with special reference to cross-headings stated: "When the court construing the statute is reading it through to understand it, it must read the cross-headings as well as the body of the statute and that will always be a useful pointer as to the intention of Parliament in enacting the immediately following sections. Whether the cross-heading is no more than a pointer or label or is helpful in assisting to construe, or even in some cases to control, the meaning or ambit of those sections must necessarily depend on the circumstances of each case, and I do not think it is possible to lay down any rules."

15 In Canada it is accepted that headings are part of statutes and thus relevant to the construction thereof. Headings situate a provision within the general structure of the statute: indicating its framework, its anatomy and is a key to the interpretation of the sections ranged under it. See further Côte The interpretation of legislation in Canada (Editions Y Blais, Cowansville 1984). In The Queen v Saskatchewan Wheat Pool (1981) 117 DLR (3rd) 70 at 75 it was held that headings serve an interpretive purpose where there is ambiguity.

constitution as drafted, there is at least as much to be said for their relevance as a tool of interpretation as there is in the case of ordinary legislation.[16] It follows, in my opinion, that the heading of section 83 can be referred to as support for the conclusion that the powers of the President under section 82(1) are executive powers. The President, as an executive organ of state, by reason of the supremacy clause, is subject to the provisions of the interim Constitution.

[13] As far as Chapter 3 of the interim Constitution is concerned, it is provided in section 7(1) that:

> "This Chapter shall bind all legislative and executive organs of state at all levels of government."

Originating as they do from an executive organ of state, acts of the President, under section 82(1), are subject to the provisions of Chapter 3 of the interim Constitution. As a result, the exercise by the President of his powers under section 82(1) may be subject to review by courts of appropriate jurisdiction in the same way as the exercise by him of other constitutional powers would be subject to review.[17] This conclusion is consistent with the approach of this Court in the first Constitutional Certification judgment,[18] where it was said that:

> "The power of the South African Head of State to pardon was originally derived from royal prerogatives. It does not, however, follow that the power given in NT 84(2)(j) is identical in all respects to the ancient royal prerogatives. Regardless of the historical origins of the concept, the President derives this power not from antiquity but from the NT itself. It is that Constitution that proclaims its own supremacy. Should the exercise of the power in any particular instance be such as to undermine any provision of the NT, that conduct would be reviewable." (footnote omitted)[19]

It is also mirrored in section 98(2)(a) and (b) of the interim Constitution which provides that the Constitutional Court has jurisdiction -

> "over all matters relating to the interpretation, protection and enforcement of the provisions of [the] Constitution, including -

17 The general rule at common law was that the court may not review the manner in which the prerogative was exercised. See Carpenter Prerogative powers - an anachronism? Vol XXII CILSA 1989 at 192.

(a) any alleged violation or threatened violation of any fundamental right entrenched in Chapter 3; [and]

(b) any dispute over the constitutionality of any executive or administrative act or conduct . . . of any organ of state;

[14] The powers of the President under section 82(1) are expressed in wide and unqualified terms. Unlike most other presidential powers they can be exercised without the concurrence of the Cabinet. The President, in terms of section 82(1)(k), is subject only to a requirement that there be prior consultation with the Executive Deputy Presidents before the power is exercised.[20] The President is not, however, bound to follow the views of the Executive Deputy Presidents. As long as consultation has taken place his discretion is unfettered, in the sense that it is not expressly limited by the interim Constitution.

[15] In respect of most of the powers contained in section 82(1) it is not difficult to conceive of cases (extreme and unlikely as they may be) where some provision of the Bill of Rights might be contravened, and especially the equality provisions contained in section 8. One or another of the powers, for example, could be exercised, in a manner which excluded from consideration persons of a particular religion or ethnic group. As was stated by the Bavarian and Hessen Constitutional Courts,[21] the fact that the arbitrary exercise of the power to pardon may be a rarity is no ground for denying constitutional review.

[16] Thus far I have considered the issue before us with regard to the text of the interim Constitution. It is instructive also to have regard to developments in other relevant jurisdictions. Traditionally, the exercise of the prerogative powers of a monarch have not been subject to judicial scrutiny. However, over the past two or three decades there has been a movement, in certain circumstances, in favour of the recognition of such a review jurisdiction - and even in countries without a written constitution containing a bill of rights.

[17] In Sachs v Donges NO, Schreiner JA anticipated those developments. He said the following:[22]

> "Although in describing the category of prerogative powers the word "discretionary" is sometimes used, this only means that the exercise of the powers is not restricted within the limits of any statute. It does not mean that the powers falling within the category form an almost mystical field in which the executive is free not only to do whatever it wills, but also to undo whatever it has done. There is no general rule that whatever has been done by the executive without statutory authority can be revoked by it at will. Each purported exercise of a prerogative power must be considered, when a case arises, on its own merits to see whether the power exists and whether the exercise is within the power; and this applies equally to the revocation of a previous act, done under a

prerogative power."[23]

[23] The South African cases in which the prerogative power of pardon or remission of sentence were considered, dealt with the right of an individual offender to due process in the consideration of its exercise. In Smith v Minister of Justice and Another 1991 (3) SA 336 (T), it was held that an offender has no legal right or expectation of being considered for pardon and that, by the same token, has no right to be heard before a decision is taken or to receive reasons after it has been refused. See also Rapholo v State President and Others 1993 (1) SA 680 (T), a case in which the court was considering a similar question with regard to amnesty. However, these decisions are not relevant to the objection raised in this appeal. The respondent is not claiming a common law review. He rests his case upon the alleged violation of the equality clause in the interim Constitution.

And, in Baxter[24] the following view is expressed:

> "The traditional view now shows signs of change. As the courts have developed more fully the principles by which discretionary powers may be reviewed, some judges have begun to regard some prerogative powers as an historical anachronism, as powers which might as easily have originated from statute, and as powers to which the normal principles of review should be applied by analogy. If this approach is accepted - and since the scope of review will always be affected by the question of justiciability - it is possible that the prerogative will gradually lose all its significance in administrative law." (footnote omitted).

[18] In England, where the prerogative powers were historically beyond the reach of the courts, the exercise of some prerogative powers has been subjected to judicial review. In 1984, in Council of Civil Service Unions and Others v Minister for the Civil Service,[25] a majority of the Law Lords held unambiguously that a decision-making power derived from a common law and not a statutory source is not "for that reason only" immune from judicial review; and that is so in respect of prerogative powers.[26] What determines whether the exercise of such a power is subject to the power of review is not its source but its subject-matter. After recognising the power of review, Lord Roskill stated:

24 Supra n 8 at 392.

26 Per Lord Diplock at 410C-D, 411B-C; Per Lord Roskill at 417G-418B.

> "But I do not think that that right of challenge can be unqualified. It must, I think, depend upon the subject matter of the prerogative power which is exercised. Many examples were given during the argument of prerogative powers which as at present advised I do not think could properly be made the subject of judicial review. Prerogative powers such as those relating to the making of treaties, the defence of the realm, the prerogative of mercy, the grant of honours, the dissolution of Parliament and the appointment of ministers as well as others are not, I think, susceptible to judicial review because their nature and subject matter are such as not to be amenable to the judicial process. The courts are not the place wherein to determine whether a treaty should be concluded or the armed forces disposed in a particular manner or Parliament dissolved on one date rather than another."[27]

Lord Scarman put it thus:

> "[I]f the subject matter in respect of which prerogative power is exercised is justiciable, that is to say if it is a matter upon which the court can adjudicate, the exercise of the power is subject to review in accordance with the principles developed in respect of the review of the exercise of statutory power."[28]

In R v Home Secretary, ex p Bentley, Watkins LJ said the following:

28 Id at 407B-C.

> "The C.C.S.U. [1985] A.C. 374 case made it clear that the powers of the court cannot be ousted merely by invoking the word "prerogative". The question is simply whether the nature and subject matter of the decision is amenable to the judicial process. Are the courts qualified to deal with the matter or does the decision involve such questions of policy that they should not intrude because they are ill-equipped to do so? Looked at in this way there must be cases in which the exercise of the Royal Prerogative is reviewable, in our judgment. If, for example, it was clear that the Home Secretary had refused to pardon someone solely on the grounds of their sex, race or religion, the courts would be expected to interfere and, in our judgment, would be entitled to do so.
> We conclude therefore that some aspects of the exercise of the Royal Prerogative are amenable to the judicial process. We do not think that it is necessary for us to say more than this in the instant case. It will be for other courts to decide on a case by case basis whether the matter in question is reviewable or not.
> We do not think that we are precluded from reaching this conclusion by authority. Lord Roskill's passing reference to the prerogative of mercy in the C.C.S.U. case was obiter."[29]

That the reviewability of the exercise of prerogative power depends on the subject-matter was restated by the Privy Council in Reckley v Minister of Public Safety and Immigration and Others NO (2), where Lord Goff of Chieveley said that the CCSU case

> ". . . recognised that the exercise of a prerogative power was not ipso facto immune from judicial review; but it certainly did not go so far as to suggest that every exercise of such a power was amenable to that jurisdiction."[30]

[19] On the strength of these authorities it is safe to conclude that, in contemporary English law, the exercise of a prerogative power may be reviewed if, and to the extent that, the subject-matter thereof is amenable to judicial process.

[20] Other Commonwealth jurisdictions have adopted this English approach. In Burt v Governor-General, Cooke P said:

> "The prerogative of mercy is a prerogative power in the strictest sense of that term, for it is peculiar to the Crown and its exercise directly affects the rights of persons. On the other hand it would be inconsistent with the contemporary approach to say that, merely because it is a pure and strict prerogative power, its exercise or non-exercise must be immune from curial challenge. There is nothing heterodox in asserting, as counsel for the appellant do, that the rule of law requires that challenge shall be permitted in so far as issues arise of a kind with which the Courts are competent to deal."[31]

Burt's case established the reviewability of the exercise of a prerogative power on ordinary common law grounds.[32] Cooke P concluded, however, that cases such as that before him, in which a prisoner claimed he was entitled to a pardon on the grounds that he had been wrongly convicted, were subject to a fair practice in New Zealand and that the application for review should be dismissed. The approach of Cooke J in favour of reviewability of the executive power of pardon was statutorily confirmed in the New Zealand Bill of Rights Act, 1990, which controls the executive branch of government in [21] In Australia the question was considered in Minister for Arts Heritage and Environment and Others v Peko-Wallsend Ltd and Others.[34] The issue was whether a decision of the Federal Cabinet in the exercise of a prerogative power could be reviewed by the courts. Bowen CJ said:

> "In my opinion, subject to the exclusion of non-justiciable matters, the courts of this country should now accept responsibility for reviewing the decisions of Ministers or the Governor-General in Council notwithstanding the decision is carried out in pursuance of a power derived not from statute but from the common law or the prerogative. The decision of the House of Lords in the CCSU case, supra, provides persuasive authority for this . . ."[35]

[22] The Canadian Courts have required that prerogative powers be exercised in conformity with the Charter of Rights and other constitutional norms and also subject to administrative law norms.[36]

[23] What of non-Commonwealth countries? In Ireland the President is not answerable to the House of the Oireachtas (National Parliament) or to any court for the exercise of his or her powers and functions with regard to both formal and discretionary powers.[37] In State (Walshe) v Murphy Finlay P stated:

[37] Art 13.8.1 of the Irish Constitution. However this article cannot be raised in order to prevent judicial review of a function which, as Finley P stated in State (Walshe) v Murphy [1981] IR 275, "require[s] his [or her] intervention for its effectiveness in law, [but is] in fact the decision and act of the Executive."

> "The consequences of such a doctrine are alarming and appear to me to indicate its unsoundness as a proposition of constitutional law . . . . [It] would mean that the Executive would be in a position to act under the Constitution in respect of a number of matters contrary to the law and even contrary to the Constitution; and that, if such act required for its effectiveness the exercise of a function by the President, such illegal or unconstitutional conduct could not be reviewed by any court."[38]

[24] The US Constitution provides that the President

> " . . . shall have the power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment."[39]

This power of the President has been held by the Supreme Court to have as its origin the royal prerogative.[40] The nature of the power was considered by the Supreme Court as early as 1833 in United States v Wilson.[41] Chief Justice Marshall, in an oft quoted passage, said:

> "As this power had been exercised from time immemorial by the executive of that nation whose language is our language, and to whose judicial institutions ours bear a close resemblance; we adopt their principles respecting the operation and effect of a pardon, and look into their books for the rules prescribing the manner in which it is to be used by the person who would avail himself of it.

> A pardon is an act of grace, proceeding from the power entrusted with the execution of the laws, which exempts the individual, on whom it is bestowed, from the punishment the law inflicts for a crime he has committed. It is the private, though official act of the executive magistrate . . ."[42]

That definition of pardon as an act of grace was restated by the Supreme Court in 1915 in Burdick v United States.[43] However, in 1927, in Biddle v Perovich, Holmes J, speaking on behalf of a unanimous court, provided a more convincing basis for the exercise of the Presidential power than it being merely a private act of grace. He said:

> "A pardon in our days is not a private act of grace from an individual happening to possess power. It is a part of the Constitutional scheme. When granted it is the determination of the ultimate authority that the public welfare will be better served by inflicting less than what the judgment fixed."[44] (My emphasis)

In more recent judgments, the United States Supreme Court has reinforced the notion that the President's power of pardon and reprieve, although derived from the Constitution, must be interpreted with regard to its English heritage. In Schick v Reed,[45] Burger CJ said:

[45] 419 US 256, 266 (1974).

> "A fair reading of the history of the English pardoning power, from which our Art. II, §2, cl. 1, derives, of the language of that clause itself, and of the unbroken practice since 1790 compels the conclusion that the power flows from the Constitution alone, not from any legislative enactments, and that it cannot be modified, abridged, or diminished by the Congress. Additionally, considerations of public policy and humanitarian impulses support an interpretation of that power so as to permit the attachment of any condition which does not otherwise offend the Constitution."[46]

46 It should be noted that over the two centuries of United States Supreme Court jurisprudence there have been strong dissenting judgments holding that it was inappropriate to import into a constitutional state notions relating to the English monarch. See the dissent of McLean J in Ex Parte Wells supra n 40. In the passage at 321, his Republican fervour is apparent in his rhetorical question:

> "The President is the executive power in this country, as the Queen holds the executive authority in England. Are we to be instructed as to the extent of the executive power in this country, by looking into the exercise of the same power in England?"

Some 118 years later, a similar dissenting and no less emotional protest came from Marshall J (joined by Douglas J and Brennan J) in Schick v Reed id at 276:

> "The English annals offer dubious support to the Court. The majority opinion recounts in copious detail the historical evolution of the pardon power in England. Ante, at 260-262. See also Ex parte Wells, 18 How. 307, 309-313 (1856). The references to English statutes and cases are no more than dictum; as the Court itself admonishes, "the [pardon] power flows from the Constitution alone." Ante, at 266. Accordingly, the primary resource for analyzing the scope of Art. II is our own republican system of government."

See, further, Kalt "Pardon Me?: The Constitutional Case Against Presidential Self-Pardons" (1996) 106 No 3 Yale Law Journal 779 at 803.

On that approach, in effect, the Supreme Court has adopted a somewhat deferential approach to the exercise by the President of the power of pardon and reprieve. However, notwithstanding that deference, the United States courts have tested that power in relation to the nature of conditions attached to a pardon,[47] and in relation to the extent to which the exercise of the power affects the vested rights of third parties.[48]

[25] The German courts have also approached the power of pardon and reprieve as a prerogative power originating at the commencement of the German monarchy and taken over into the Weimar Constitution. Whether that power can be reviewed under the present constitution by the Federal Constitutional Court was an issue which led to one of the few tied decisions of that court. In BVerfGE 25, 352 (1969) four of the justices were of the opinion that the Basic Law (Comprehensive Judicial Review of all Acts of Public Authority) did not apply to acts of mercy. They relied on the historical origin of the power of mercy which had always been regarded as an institution outside the legal order (and even contradictory of it). They held, too, that it constitutes an exception to the separation of powers between the executive and the judiciary. Its exercise, they concluded, cannot be subject to judicial review. The other four justices held that the historical tradition could not live within the framework of the Basic Law and that the arbitrary exercise of public power was not exempt from the basic requirements of the constitution.

[26] In Israel, which has a non-executive President, in a judgment which antedated the CCSU case, the following was stated by Berinson J:

> "The President is a creature of statute and his powers are defined by law. Like everyone else in this country, he enjoys no rights or privileges which are not accorded to him by the laws of the State and every official act of his which exceeds the limits of the law is null and void."[49]

[27] The foregoing discussion indicates that there has been a distinct movement in modern constitutional states, (and, I include, for this purpose, England) in favour of recognising at least some power of review of what are or were prerogative powers of the head of state.

[28] The approach of the English courts whereby the jurisdiction of the courts to review the exercise of prerogative powers depends upon the subject-matter of the power is one that is not open to us. The interim Constitution obliges us to test impugned action by any organ of state against the discipline of the interim Constitution and, in particular, the Bill of Rights. That is a fundamental incidence of the constitutional state which is envisaged in the Preamble to the interim Constitution, namely:

49 Matana v Attorney-General 14 PD 970 at 977.

> "... a new order in which all South Africans will be entitled to a common South African citizenship in a sovereign and democratic constitutional state in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races so that all citizens shall be able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms;..."

In my view, it would be contrary to that promise if the exercise of presidential power is above the interim Constitution and is not subject to the discipline of the Bill of Rights. However, it may well be that, because of the nature of a section 82(1) power or the manner in which is it is exercised, the provisions of the interim Constitution, and, in particular, the Bill of Rights, provide no ground for an effective review of a presidential exercise of such a power. The result, in a particular case, may be the same as that in England, but the manner in which that result is reached in terms of the interim Constitution is a different one. On the English approach the courts, in certain cases, depending on the subject-matter of the prerogative power exercised, would be deprived of jurisdiction. Under the interim Constitution the jurisdiction would be there in all cases in which the presidential powers under section 82(1) are exercised.

[29] The way is now open to consider the review in the instant case, that is the exercise by the President of his power of pardon and reprieve of prisoners under section 82(1)(k) of the interim Constitution. I would emphasize that we are not required to consider the question of the reviewability of other powers which may be exercised by the President under section 82(1). In cases where the President pardons or reprieves a single prisoner it is difficult, (save in an unlikely situation where a course of conduct gives rise to an inference of unconstitutional conduct), to conceive of a case where a constitutional attack could be mounted against such an exercise of the presidential power. Even the provisions of section 8 of the interim Constitution - the equality clause - would have only limited application. No prisoner has the right to be pardoned, to be reprieved or to have a sentence remitted.[50] The interim Constitution places such matters within the power of the President. This does not mean that if a president were to abuse this power vested in him or her under section 82(1)(k) a court would be powerless, for it is implicit in the interim Constitution that the President will exercise that power in good faith. If, for instance, a president were to abuse his or her powers by acting in bad faith I can see no reason why a court should not intervene to correct such action and to declare it to be unconstitutional. For example, a decision to grant a pardon in consideration for a bribe, could no doubt be set aside by a court. So, too, if a president were to misconstrue his or her powers I can see no objection to a court correcting such an error, though it could not exercise the discretion itself. This is what happened in R v Home Secretary, ex p Bentley[51] but even then the court declined to issue a mandamus or a declaration. It simply invited the Home

50 In de Freitas v Benny [1976] AC 239 (PC) at 247 Lord Diplock in an appeal from the Court of Appeal of Trinidad and Tobago stated:

> "Mercy is not the subject of legal rights. It begins where legal rights end. A convicted person has no legal right even to have his case considered by the Home Secretary in connection with the exercise of the prerogative of mercy. In tendering his advice to the sovereign the Home Secretary is doing something that is often cited as the exemplar of a purely discretionary act as contrasted with the exercise of a quasi-judicial function."

Secretary to consider the case again in the light of the decision that he had misconstrued his powers. As it was put by Wilson J in Operation Dismantle Inc. v The Queen:

> "[T]he courts should not be too eager to relinquish their judicial review function simply because they are called upon to exercise it in relation to weighty matters of state. Equally, however, it is important to realize that judicial review is not the same thing as substitution of the court's opinion on the merits for the opinion of the person or body to whom a discretionary decision-making power has been committed. The first step is to determine who as a constitutional matter has the decision-making power; the second is to determine the scope (if any) of judicial review of the exercise of that power."[52]

In that case, the Canadian Supreme Court had been requested to review and set aside a decision by the Government to allow the testing of United States cruise missiles in Canada. Wilson J concluded that:

> "[I]f we are to look at the Constitution for the answer to the question whether it is appropriate for the courts to "second guess" the executive on matters of defence, we would conclude that it is not appropriate. However, if what we are being asked to do is to decide whether any particular act of the executive violates the rights of the citizens, then it is not only appropriate that we answer the question; it is our obligation under the Charter to do so."[53]

[30] In the present case we are asked to decide whether rights of male prisoners have been violated by the manner in which the President exercised his power to pardon or reprieve prisoners in the impugned part of the Presidential Act. Here the President did not exercise his power of pardon or reprieve in a single case. He exercised it "wholesale" as it were - in general terms. That is the only way in which such a power can be exercised in a case such as the instant one, where the head of state wishes to confer a benefit upon groups of prisoners to mark an important event in the life of the nation. The relevant date chosen in the Presidential Act was 10 May 1994, the date on which the President was inaugurated. For the first time in its history, South Africa had a head of state and a head of the executive chosen as the result of a democratic constitutional process, and representing the whole nation.

[31] Where the power of pardon or reprieve is used in general terms and there is an "amnesty" accorded to a category or categories of prisoners, discrimination is inherent. The line has to be drawn somewhere, and there will always be people on one side of the line who do not benefit and whose positions are not significantly different to those of persons on the other side of the line who do benefit. For instance there may be no meaningful difference between prisoners whose birthday was shortly before the cut off date identified by the President, and who were eighteen when the decision took effect, and those whose birthday was shortly after the cut off date and were under eighteen at the effective date. Indeed, there might well have been prisoners in the first category who, if assessed individually, might have been considered to be more deserving of a remission of sentence than persons in the latter category.

[32] The respondent argued that the Presidential Act was in conflict with section 8 of the interim Constitution in that by releasing all mothers whose children were under the age of twelve, it discriminated against fathers of children of a similar age. Section 8 of the interim Constitution provides as follows:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
> (3) (a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.
> (b) . . .

[33] The respondent argues that in releasing mothers of small children but not fathers, the President discriminated on the grounds of sex. The advantage that was afforded mothers was not afforded to fathers of small children and that failure is sufficient to establish discrimination within the context of section 8(2) of the interim Constitution. The Presidential Act, in fact, discriminates on a combined basis, sex coupled with parenthood of children below the age of twelve. Only women who are parents of such children were released: women without children were not. In Brink v Kitshoff NO[54] this Court held that it is sufficient if the discrimination is substantially based on one of the listed grounds in section 8(2). Accordingly, it is clear that the Presidential Act prima facie discriminates on one of the grounds listed in section 8(2). As such, section 8(4) requires us to presume that the discrimination is unfair, until the contrary is proved.

[34] The appellants rely on an affidavit of the President to which is attached a supporting affidavit of Ms Helen Starke, the National Director of the South African National Council for Child and Family Welfare. Those affidavits were filed in a similar application which came before the Transvaal Provincial Division of the Supreme Court in Kruger and Another v Minister of Correctional Services and Others.[55] In the present proceedings, the earlier affidavit of the President was attached to the affidavit of Colonel Du Plessis, who represented both appellants in the present matter. In error, the supporting affidavit of Ms Starke was omitted. Without any admission as to its admissibility, the appellant consented to the inclusion in the appeal record of the affidavit of Ms Starke.

[35] In the court a quo, the respondent submitted that the affidavit of the President, together with its attachments, constituted hearsay evidence and was inadmissible. Magid J found for the appellant on the basis that the affidavit was admissible and therefore did not have to decide the point. In this Court, counsel for the respondent wisely did not press the argument contained in his heads of argument objecting to the admissibility of the President's affidavit. It appears as part of the record of proceedings against the President in the Transvaal Provincial Division and is referred to and incorporated in his affidavit by an official duly authorised to represent the President in these proceedings. There is no question that the affidavit filed of record is that of the President and that it is the affidavit of Ms Starke that is now part of it. In my opinion their contents are properly before us and do not constitute hearsay evidence. Hence, it is not necessary to consider the alternative argument advanced by counsel for the appellants that, even if hearsay, the affidavit is admissible by reason of the provisions of section 3(1)(c) of the Law of Evidence Amendment Act.[56]

[36] In his affidavit, the President stated that in regard to the special remission of all mothers of minor children, he

"was motivated predominantly by a concern for children who had been deprived of the nurturing and care which their mothers would ordinarily have provided. Having spent many years in prison myself, I am well aware of the hardship which flows from incarceration. I am also well aware that imprisonment inevitably has harsh consequences for the family of the prisoner.

7 Account was taken of the special role I believe that mothers play in the care and nurturing of younger children. In this regard I refer to the affidavit of HELEN STARKE . . . respectfully draw attention to the fact that the well-being of young children has been of particular concern to me and was an important factor in identifying two of the three categories in the Presidential Act.

9 I have had an on-going concern about the general plight of young children in South Africa. There have been many occasions upon which I have expressed this concern publicly."

In her affidavit, Ms Starke stated in relation to the special remission of mothers of minor children:

"4 In my opinion, the identification of this special category for remission of sentence is rationally and reasonably explicable as being in the best interests of the children concerned. It is generally accepted that children bond with their mothers at a very early age and that mothers are the primary nurturers and care givers of young children.

5 Although it could be argued that fathers play a more significant role in the lives of older children, the primary bonding with the mother and the role of mothers as the primary nurturers and care givers extends well into childhood.

6 The reasons for this are partly historical and the role of the socialisation of women who are socialised to fulfil the role of primary nurturers and care givers of > children, especially pre-adolescent children and are perceived by society as such (sic).

> . . . .
> 8 In my experience, there are only a minority of fathers who are actively involved in nurturing and caring for their children, particularly their pre-adolescent children. There are, of course, exceptions to this generalisation, but the de facto situation in South Africa today is that mothers are the major custodians and the primary nurturers and care givers of our nation's children."

[37] The reason given by the President for the special remission of sentence of mothers with small children is that it will serve the interests of children. To support this, he relies upon the evidence of Ms Starke that mothers are, generally speaking, primarily responsible for the care of small children in our society. Although no statistical or survey evidence was produced to establish this fact, I see no reason to doubt the assertion that mothers, as a matter of fact, bear more responsibilities for child-rearing in our society than do fathers. This statement, of course, is a generalisation. There will, doubtless, be particular instances where fathers bear more responsibilities than mothers for the care of children. In addition, there will also be many cases where a natural mother is not the primary care giver, but some other woman fulfils that role, whether she be the grandmother, stepmother, sister, or aunt of the child concerned. However, although it may generally be true that mothers bear an unequal share of the burden of child rearing in our society as compared to the burden borne by fathers, it cannot be said that it will ordinarily be fair to discriminate between women and men on that basis.

[38] For all that it is a privilege and the source of enormous human satisfaction and pleasure, there can be no doubt that the task of rearing children is a burdensome one. It requires time, money and emotional energy. For women without skills or financial resources, its challenges are particularly acute. For many South African women, the difficulties of being responsible for the social and economic burdens of child rearing, in circumstances where they have few skills and scant financial resources are immense.[57] The failure by fathers to shoulder their share of the financial and social burden of child rearing is a primary cause of this hardship.[58] The result of being responsible for children makes it more difficult for women to compete in the labour market and is one of the causes of the deep inequalities experienced by women in employment.[59] The generalisation upon which the President relied is therefore a fact which is one of the root causes of women's inequality in our society. That parenting may have emotional and personal rewards for women should not blind us to the tremendous burden it imposes at the same time. It is unlikely that we will achieve a more egalitarian society until

57 As one woman put it in Barrett et al Vukani Makhosikazi: South African Women Speak (CIIR, London 1985) at 135: "Keeping a family, a home and a job going leaves most African women exhausted to the point of death."

58 One small study in the Cape Peninsula, for example, found a default rate of 85,5% in the payment of child support maintenance. See Burman and Berger "When Family Support Fails: The Problems of Maintenance Payments in Apartheid South Africa" (1988) 4 SAJHR 194 and 334 at 340.

[39] The fact, therefore, that the generalisation upon which the appellants rely is true, does not answer the question of whether the discrimination concerned is fair. Indeed, it will often be unfair for discrimination to be based on that particular generalisation. Women's responsibilities in the home for housekeeping and child rearing have historically been given as reasons for excluding them from other spheres of life. In a case note concerning Incorporated Law Society v Wookey,[60] which denied women the right to be admitted as attorneys, a commentator wrote:

> "A revolt against nature is involved in any proposal to allow women to enter into the legal profession. This idea is incompatible with the ideas and duties of Motherhood."[61]

To use the generalisation that women bear a greater proportion of the burdens of child rearing for justifying treatment that deprives women of benefits or advantages or imposes disadvantages upon them would clearly, therefore, be unfair.

[40] That, however, has not happened in this case. The President has afforded an opportunity to mothers, on the basis of the generalisation, that he has not afforded to fathers. In my view, the fact that the individuals who were discriminated against by a particular action, such as the one under consideration, were not individuals who belonged to a class who had historically been disadvantaged does not necessarily mean that the discrimination is fair.

[41] The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked. In Egan v Canada[62] L'Heureux-Dubé J analysed the purpose of section 15 of the Canadian Charter (which entrenches the right to equality) as follows:

> "This court has recognized that inherent human dignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society: Big M Drug Mart Ltd [(1985) 13 CRR 64] at p.97 . . . (per Dickson J. (as he then was)). More than any other right in the Charter, s. 15 gives effect to this notion. . . . Equality, as that concept is enshrined as a fundamental human right within s. 15 of the Charter means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to recognizing each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of individual differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that > treat certain people as second-class citizens, that demean them, that treat them as less capable for no good reason, or that otherwise offend fundamental human dignity."

> (See also the judgment of McLachlin J in Miron v Trudel (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 189 at 205.)

It is not enough for the appellants to say that the impact of the discrimination in the case under consideration affected members of a group that were not historically disadvantaged. They must still show in the context of this particular case that the impact of the discrimination on the people who were discriminated against was not unfair. In section 8(3), the interim Constitution contains an express recognition that there is a need for measures to seek to alleviate the disadvantage which is the product of past discrimination. We need, therefore, to develop a concept of unfair discrimination which recognises that although a society which affords each human being equal treatment on the basis of equal worth and freedom is our goal, we cannot achieve that goal by insisting upon identical treatment in all circumstances before that goal is achieved. Each case, therefore, will require a careful and thorough understanding of the impact of the discriminatory action upon the particular people concerned to determine whether its overall impact is one which furthers the constitutional goal of equality or not. A classification which is unfair in one context may not necessarily be unfair in a different context.[63]

63 It is the logical corollary of the principle that "like should be treated like", that treating unlike alike may be as unequal as treating like unlike. See the discussion in Kentridge "Equality" in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Kenwyn 1996) at para 14.2.

[42] According to the affidavits filed, the President intended by the special remission of the prison sentences of mothers to further the best interests of children. There is no doubt of his good faith. However, the fact that the President, in good faith, did not intend to discriminate unfairly and had in mind the benefit of children is not sufficient, to establish that the impact of the discrimination upon fathers was not unfair.

[43] To determine whether that impact was unfair it is necessary to look not only at the group who has been disadvantaged but at the nature of the power in terms of which the discrimination was effected and, also at the nature of the interests which have been affected by the discrimination.

[44] The power to pardon duly convicted prisoners in terms of which the President acted is conferred upon him by the interim Constitution. The power of pardon is one which is recognised in many democratic countries.[64] In terms of the interim Constitution, the power is not subject to cabinet concurrence or to legislative control, but is conferred upon the President directly by the interim Constitution. Although the historical roots of the pardoning power may lie in the royal prerogative, it is clearly a power which the drafters of the interim Constitution considered appropriate within a constitutional democracy. To repeat the words of Holmes J:

64 Supra para 5. See Sebba, supra n 9.

GOLDSTONE J

> "When [a pardon is] granted it is the determination of the ultimate authority that the public welfare will be better served by inflicting less than what the judgment fixed."[65]

The pardoning power in the interim Constitution serves a similar function. It is not a private act of grace in the sense that the pardoning power in a monarchy may be. It is a recognition in the interim Constitution that a power should be granted to the President to determine when, in his view, the public welfare will be better served by granting a remission of sentence or some other form of pardon.

65 Supra para 24.

[45] There are at least two situations in which the power to pardon may be important. First, it may be used to correct mistaken convictions or reduce excessive sentences and second, it may be used to confer mercy upon individuals or groups of convicted prisoners when the President thinks it will be in the public benefit for that to happen.[66] In the first situation, it has been recognised in many courts that it can play an important role in enhancing justice within a legal system. As Cooke P said in Burt v Governor-General:

> "[I]t must be right to exclude any lingering thought that the prerogative of mercy is no more than an arbitrary monarchial right of grace and favour. As developed it has become an integral element in the criminal justice system, a constitutional safeguard against mistakes."[67]

The pardoning power in the interim Constitution should provide such a safeguard.

[46] In addition, however, it will also provide an opportunity to the President to release groups of convicted prisoners where he or she considers it desirable in the public interest.

67 Supra n 31 at 681 lines 50-53.

This is such a case. Here the pardon was not to an individual to correct a miscarriage of justice, but to a group to confer an advantage upon them as an act of mercy at a time of great historical significance. In exercising the power, the President considered carefully the implications of the remission he proposed. In particular, he took into account the interests of the public and the administration of justice. As he stated in his affidavit:

> "5. The decision to grant special remission of the remainder of their sentences to the categories mentioned in the Presidential Act was not lightly taken. The power to grant special remission is, in my opinion, a grave one which requires careful consideration of many competing interests. In particular:
> 5.1 I believe that it is important that due regard be had to the integrity of the judicial system and the administration of justice. Whenever remission of sentence is considered, it is necessary to bear in mind that incarceration has followed a judicial process and that sentences have been duly imposed after conviction. A random or arbitrary grant of the remission of sentences may have the effect of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.
> 5.2 I believe further that it is of considerable importance to take into account the legitimate concerns of members of the public about the release of convicted prisoners. I am conscious of the fact that the level of crime is a matter of concern to the public at large and that there may well be anxiety about the release of persons who have not completed their sentences."

The considerations mentioned here would well nigh have made it impossible for the President to release all fathers who were in prison as well as mothers. Male prisoners outnumber female prisoners almost fiftyfold.[68] A release of all fathers would have meant that a very large number of men prisoners would have gained their release. As many fathers play only a secondary role in child rearing, the release of male prisoners would not have contributed as significantly to the achievement of the President's purpose as the release of mothers. In addition, the release of a large number of male prisoners in the current circumstances where crime has reached alarming levels would almost certainly have led to considerable public outcry. In the circumstances it must be accepted that it would have been very difficult, if not impossible, for the President to have released fathers on the same basis as mothers. Were he obliged to release fathers on the same terms as mothers, the result may have been that no parents would have been released at all.

[47] In this case, two groups of people have been affected by the Presidential Act: mothers of young children have been afforded an advantage: an early release from prison; and fathers have been denied that advantage. The President released three groups of prisoners as an act of mercy. The three groups - disabled prisoners, young people and mothers of young children - are all groups who are particularly vulnerable in our society, and in the case particularly of the disabled and mothers of young children, groups who have been the victims of discrimination in the past. The release of mothers will in many cases have been of real benefit to children which was the primary purpose of their release.

population was thus 2,58% of the total prison population. (Report of the Department of Correctional Services.)

The impact of the remission on those prisoners was to give them an advantage. As mentioned, the occasion the President chose for this act of mercy was 10 May 1994, the date of his inauguration as the first democratically elected President of this country. It is true that fathers of young children in prison were not afforded early release from prison. But although that does, without doubt, constitute a disadvantage, it did not restrict or limit their rights or obligations as fathers in any permanent manner. It cannot be said, for example, that the effect of the discrimination was to deny or limit their freedom, for their freedom was curtailed as a result of their conviction, not as a result of the Presidential Act. That Act merely deprived them of an early release to which they had no legal entitlement. Furthermore, the Presidential Act does not preclude fathers from applying directly to the President for remission of sentence on an individual basis in the light of their own special circumstances. In his affidavit, the President made clear that fathers of young children could still apply in the ordinary way for remission of their sentences in the light of their particular circumstances. The Presidential Act may have denied them an opportunity it afforded women, but it cannot be said that it fundamentally impaired their rights of dignity or sense of equal worth. The impact upon the relevant fathers, was, therefore, in all the circumstances of the exercise of the Presidential power, not unfair. The respondent, therefore, has no justified complaint under section 8(2) of the interim Constitution.

[48] Magid J came to the conclusion that the President did not discharge the burden of proving that the discrimination was not unfair. In effect, he came to that conclusion on the basis that the axe wielded by the President was too blunt. His criticism was that:

> "The President did not suggest that he drew a distinction between mothers of children in normal families both of whose parents are alive and "single parent" families. So children whose mothers were imprisoned but who were being cared for by their fathers (and possibly other close members of their families) were preferred to children who might have been left without any care at all by the incarceration of their "single parent" fathers."[69]

However, in my opinion, for reasons which have already been set out above, if the President decides to approach the issue of pardon or reprieve not in individual cases, but by reference to a category of offender, then it may be well nigh impossible to do so other than by the "blunt axe" method. In the legislative or administrative context other methods would usually be available and over or under inclusive classifications would be less likely to be held fair. I do not agree with Magid J, therefore, that on this account the President failed to discharge the burden placed upon him by the provisions of section 8(4) of the interim Constitution to establish that the discrimination was not unfair.

[49] In Kruger and Another v Minister of Correctional Services and Others,[70] a similar case to the present one, Van Schalkwyk J dismissed the application. He did so, broadly speaking, on the basis that the President, in making the order, did so in the exercise of a prerogative power, and that in the absence of mala fides, the courts were powerless to intervene. The learned Judge erred, in my opinion, in not finding that in the exercise of his or her powers, the president under the interim Constitution is obliged to adhere to all of the terms of that Constitution including the provisions of the Bill of Rights. He also failed to recognise that in the approach he adopted the President, in his order, created a category of prisoners which had the effect of discriminating against another category of prisoners.

[50] On the basis on which this judgment proceeds it is unnecessary to consider, as does Mokgoro J, whether the Presidential Act constituted a " law of general application" for the purposes of s 33(1) of the interim Constitution, and I would prefer to express no view in that regard.

[51] It remains to consider the dissenting judgment of Didcott J. It is based upon the approach adopted by this Court in JT Publishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Safety and Security and Others.[71] In that case this Court considered the circumstances in which courts should grant declaratory orders in constitutional cases. Didcott J referred to the fact that declaratory orders are discretionary and went on to say:

> "A corollary is the judicial policy governing the discretion thus vested in the Courts, a well established and uniformly observed policy which directs them not to exercise it in favour of deciding points that are merely abstract, academic or hypothetical ones."[72]

Didcott J concluded that there was no reason why this Court should not adhere to a rule that "sounds so sensible". He stated further:

> "We should no doubt regard it, like most general rules, as one that is subject in special circumstances to exceptions, in our field those necessitated now and then by factors which are fundamental to a proper constitutional adjudication."[73]

But the circumstances of the JT Publishing case differ toto caelo from those now before us. That was a case where the relief asked for on appeal was to declare legislation invalid and to place Parliament on terms to amend it. By the time judgment was delivered in this Court, the Act was about to be repealed and replaced. The question before the Court therefore had absolutely no relevance to the future and in the face of its imminent repeal the applicants could not have been granted any effective relief, not even a declaratory order. As stated by Didcott J who delivered the unanimous opinion of the Court:

72 Id at para 15.

73 Id at para 15.

> "Neither of the applicants, nor for that matter anyone else, stands to gain the slightest advantage today from an order dealing with their moribund and futureless provisions. No wrong which we can still right was done to either applicant on the strength of them. Nor is anything that should be stopped likely to occur under their rapidly waning authority."[74]

The same cannot be said in this case. Here the Court is being asked to hold on the constitutionality of presidential powers exercised under section 82(1)(k). These constitutional powers, in their exercise by the President, could have benefited the applicant. The President, conceivably could have decided to include fathers with children under the age of twelve years. Had it been unconstitutional to exclude such fathers, the applicant would at the least have been entitled to a declaratory order in the terms suggested in the judgment of Kriegler J. It follows that the decision in the JT Publishing case is distinguishable.

[52] In the result, however, it has been established that the President has exercised his discretion fairly and in a manner that was consistent with the interim Constitution. The court a quo therefore should have dismissed the application.

[53] The appeal is allowed and the order of the court a quo, save as to costs, is set aside and replaced by an order in the following terms:

> The provisions of the Presidential Act No. 17 of 27 June, 1994 relating to the remission of sentences of mothers in prison on 10 May, 1994, with children under the age of twelve years, are declared to be not inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993.

Chaskalson P, Mahomed DP, Ackermann, Langa, Madala, and Sachs JJ concur in the judgment of Goldstone J.

DIDCOTT J:

[54] This case is covered and governed, I believe, by that part of our recent decision in JT Publishing (Pty) Ltd and Another v Minister of Safety and Security and Others[1] where we held that constitutional questions fell within the field of the judicial discretion which controlled the grant of declaratory orders, and laid down as a general policy the rule that the discretion ought not to be exercised in favour of answering any such question once it was or had become, in the circumstances of the case, "merely abstract, academic or

[2] Para 15 at 1608D-F.

[55] The issue put to us in that litigation, an issue questioning the constitutionality of some statutory provisions which catered for censorship, had ceased to be a live one by the time when we decided the matter owing to the repeal in the meantime of the legislation containing them and its replacement by a substantially different scheme. No good purpose could have been served at that stage by our granting the declaration of invalidity which was sought. The question itself had become "wholly academic", as the judgment described it,[3] "exciting no interest but an historical one". And neither of the applicants for the declaration stood any longer to gain the slightest benefit or advantage from it.[4] No wrong done to either on the strength of the impugned provisions could still be righted. The danger had passed that anything which needed to be stopped might occur under their authority. Nor did any room remain for the consequential order requested in the event of the declaration, an order directing Parliament to rectify the defects thus found, since those were on the scrapheap already, together with the provisions themselves. The applicants, who asserted a devotion to freedom of expression felt in the interests of their commercial activities, would no doubt have liked nevertheless to obtain the declaration in case it turned out to be useful in some future attack launched by them on the fresh legislation. But that consideration did not even enter the reckoning.

[56] Here we see a comparable state of affairs, where events have likewise overtaken the issue raised. Unlike the legislation assailed in the earlier case, the presidential decree challenged in this one has not been repealed but still stands formally. That is a difference more apparent, however, than real. The decree was neither intended nor designed to continue operating indefinitely, or indeed for a moment longer than the limited time needed to give effect to the releases from prison for which it provided. It dealt with those once and for all, in short, having no residual force. Its energy had already been exhausted when the proceedings in the Court below were heard and decided. The decree was signed and issued some sixteen months before the first occasion and almost twenty months prior to the second one. It is scarcely speculative to assume that all the releases had been accomplished within those periods. To suggest otherwise would surely be fanciful. Nor is it conceivable that the mothers released from gaol will have to return there if we confirm Magid J's declaration of invalidity, even on the supposition that they can lawfully be rearrested then.

[57] That leaves the fathers who remain in prison. The respondent did not purport to litigate in the interests of their group or to take up the cudgels for any father but himself. His own release from custody was what he wanted. Yet the order for that which he claimed initially, but abandoned later, was never on the cards. No Court could have granted it without usurping a power entrusted solely to the first appellant and substituting its own discretion for his. The only personal advantage that the respondent might then have hoped to gain was an order requiring the first appellant to reconsider the decision taken by him on the remission of sentences, an order in other words with much the same effect as that of the consequential one granted by Magid J. The advantage was, however, illusory. For an apparently insuperable obstacle confronted the respondent. His son was not younger than twelve years when the litigation started in the Court below. The boy had reached that age already and, by the time of Magid J's judgment, his age was thirteen years. So a revised decision favouring fathers as well as mothers would not have resulted in the respondent's release from gaol unless it had been altered elsewhere too, by providing either for its retrospective operation from the date of the original decision or for an increase in the age of the children to whom it referred that was sufficient to cover his case. There is no reason to believe in the likelihood of such an alteration when the age specified in the decree had never been called into question. Indeed, that sounds most unlikely once account is taken of the store which was set all along by the interests of children younger than twelve years but no older. The upshot is that, like the applicants in the J T Publishing case, the respondent in this matter could derive no apparent benefit or advantage from the declaration which he sought and obtained in the Court below. The issue raised by him had also become by then "wholly academic, . . . exciting no interest but an historical one".

[58] Nor is a ruling on that issue required from us for the future guidance of anybody. The decree was a unique measure, taken to celebrate the inauguration of our first democratically elected President. Its repetition on any similarly auspicious occasion which may arise some day seems improbable, in the same form at any rate. It is certainly less likely than censorship to be repeated. And, should that nevertheless happen, any defects recurring then will in all probability provoke objections which can be considered and met when they arise.

[59] Factual differences between the present case and the one of J T Publishing can easily be found. None of them is significant or material, however, in my opinion. In principle, as I see them, the two matters are indistinguishable from each other.

[60] I have not overlooked the qualification to the rule dealing with declaratory orders which the J T Publishing judgment expressed when it added:[5]

> "We should no doubt regard it, like most general rules, as one that is subject in special circumstances to exceptions, in our field those necessitated now and then by factors which are fundamental to a proper constitutional adjudication."

But no such factor occurs to me now. The doors of the Courts, it is often said, should always be kept open to those with constitutional complaints. That does not mean, however, that the Courts are compelled to investigate every such complaint, no matter how pointless or inappropriate it may be in the circumstances to do so. Nor does it matter for the purposes of the rule that the issue on which a decision is sought happens to be one of constitutional importance. That is invariably the case. But the cart must not be put before the horse.

[61] I accordingly decline to enter, let alone take either side in, the debate that is being conducted within our ranks about the validity of the differentiation between fathers and mothers which marked the decree. I do so from no pusillanimous reluctance to become entangled in the controversy, but because of my conviction that we are bound by the discipline of the J T Publishing judgment not to embark on the enquiry and to hold that Magid J should likewise have abstained from doing so.

[62] For the reasons given by me, and for those alone, I concur in the part of the order proposed by Goldstone J that will allow the appeal and set aside both the declaration of invalidity and the consequential correction which Magid J ordered. I dissent, on the other hand, from the proposal to substitute a declaration of validity for the one of invalidity.

KRIEGLER J:

KRIEGLER J

[63] This is a very hard case indeed.[1] For that reason this dissent essays reluctantly, the more so because the lucidity of my colleague Goldstone J's judgment on behalf of the majority - and its commendable conclusion - render their view so attractive. They hold that: (a) a presidential pardon granted under the clemency powers afforded by s 82(1)(k) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ("the Constitution", its provisions being referred to without further identification) is subject to judicial review for its consistency with the requirements of the Bill of Rights;[2] (b) Presidential Act 17 of 1994 ("the Act"), which conferred clemency on 440 mothers of young children, passes such scrutiny; and therefore, (c) the court below erred in granting an order for its correction.

[64] My dissent is narrowly based as I agree with conclusions (a) and (c). Nonetheless my disagreement with conclusion (b), and with the reasoning underpinning it, is profound and emphatic. In my view the pardon, although issued in good faith, for ostensibly rational reasons and manifestly to the advantage of some members of a traditionally disadvantaged class, is (i) inconsistent with the prohibition against gender or sex discrimination contained in s 8(2); (ii) has not been shown to be fair; and (iii) is therefore invalid. I nevertheless agree that the appeal should succeed and that the order granted in the court below must be set aside and replaced by another. In what follows I hope to explain the route that brings me to that destination.

1 I call it a hard case because, by anyone's lights, it seems mean spirited in the extreme to scrutinise closely the validity of an act of clemency by the newly inaugurated President aimed at enabling a few hundred women prisoners, sentenced for less reprehensible crimes, to care for their young children.

2 In the course of arriving at that conclusion Goldstone J, in paragraph 49, overrules the judgment of Van Schalkwyk J in Kruger and Another v Minister of Correctional Services and Others 1995 (2) SA 803 (T). From what I say in paragraph 65 below it should be clear that I wholeheartedly agree that the decision in Kruger's case understated the scope of judicial review under the Constitution.

[65] With regard to the finding of judicial reviewability of the exercise by the President of his s 82(1)(k) powers I have little to add to the analysis by my colleague Goldstone J in paragraphs 5 to 29 of his judgment. Although I would prefer not to characterise the relevant power as executive, administrative or presidential/prerogative, it does not really matter. Nor does it make any difference whether the power is rightly seen as a residual element of the royal prerogative, or as falling in a special category of discretionary powers of the head of state exercisable otherwise than on the advice of the cabinet, or as executive/administrative acts by the head of the executive branch of government. On a fair reading of ss 4, 75, 76 and 81 (especially subsection (1)) in the context of the Constitution as a whole, the exercise by the President of the s 82(1)(k) powers is governed by the prohibition against discrimination contained in s 8(2). I therefore do not think one has to categorise those powers as "executive", thus bringing them within the ambit of s 7(1), in order to subject them to Chapter 3 review.[3] Ultimately the President,

[3] Nor, incidentally, does it make any difference, in my opinion, whether one asks whether the President's actions under s 82(1)(k) are reviewable "at common law" or under s 8. If the President acts in a manner inconsistent with the Constitution, eg without reference to the Executive Deputy Presidents or in conflict with the obligation not to discriminate unfairly, he/she both exceeds the relevant powers, bringing the ultra vires doctrine into play, and also as the supreme upholder and protector of the Constitution, is its servant. Like all other organs of state, the President is obliged to obey each and every one of its commands.

[66] With regard to the second question, namely the constitutional validity of the Act, I can also be relatively brief. That is because my dissent does not relate so much to the principles involved, nor to the proper approach to a constitutional challenge based on alleged unfair discrimination. On the contrary, I endorse the general observations in the majority judgment regarding gender discrimination. I also acknowledge that this is not only a hard case but an awkward one for the development of our equality jurisprudence, one in which its application to reality is slippery. My dissent is confined to the latter exercise. In the result my conclusion is that the President not only transgressed the provisions of s 8(2) in distinguishing between classes of parents on the basis of their gender (on which the majority seem to agree with me) but also that the presumption of unfairness attaching to that distinction has not been rebutted. That is the point at which our paths diverge.

[67] The facts appear from the judgment of my colleague Goldstone J; I need highlight only those that are pertinent to my particular approach. On 30 June 1995 the respondent commenced motion proceedings in the Durban and Coast Local Division of the Supreme triggers the nullification provision of s 4(1).

Court expressly aimed at procuring his release from prison. He attacked the constitutionality of the Act as being in violation of his rights under ss 8(1) and (2) and asked for a corresponding declaratory order under s 7(4)(a) coupled with a mandatory order for his release. Ultimately he sought only the declaratory order and a direction that the Act be corrected "in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution". The court granted the order as prayed, save that the President was given six months in which to effect the correction.

[68] There was no factual dispute raised on the papers and the case was determined on the basis of the averments made in the affidavits filed on behalf of the President.[4] In exercising the clemency power vested in him by s 82(1)(k), the President decided to do so, not on the basis of an evaluation of the merits of specific cases, but by generic classification. One of the generic lines he drew to distinguish between those upon whom the gift of clemency was to be bestowed and those not, was admittedly sex/gender based. Female parents of sub-twelve year old children were to go free but male parents not.

[69] The President decided to grant the special remission to particular categories of prisoners only after "careful consideration of many competing interests". In particular the President stated in his affidavit:

[4] I agree with Goldstone J, in paragraph 35 of the majority judgment, that the affidavits of the President and Ms Starke are properly before us.

> "5.1 I believe that it is important that due regard be had to the integrity of the judicial system and the administration of justice. Whenever remission of sentence is considered, it is necessary to bear in mind that incarceration has followed a judicial process and that sentences have been duly imposed after conviction. A random or arbitrary grant of the remission of sentences may have the effect of bringing the administration of justice into disrepute.
> 5.2 I believe further that it is of considerable importance to take into account the legitimate concerns of members of the public about the release of convicted prisoners. I am conscious of the fact that the level of crime is a matter of concern to the public at large and that there may well be anxiety about the release of persons who have not completed their sentences.
> 5.3 In granting the special remission to the various categories of prisoners mentioned in the Presidential Act, it was important to have regard to the role of the law enforcement agencies who are responsible for combating crime and the effect which the grant of remission may have on their work."

[70] The President "was motivated predominantly by a concern for children who had been deprived of the nurturing and care which their mothers would ordinarily have provided." He took account "of the special role" he believes "that mothers play in the care and nurturing of younger children" and annexed an affidavit by the National Director of the South African National Council for Child and Family Welfare, who expressed the view that identification of mothers of children under the age of twelve years for remission of sentence was "rationally and reasonably explicable as being in the best interests of the children concerned." She added that "the primary bonding with the mother and the role of mothers as the primary nurturers and care givers extends well into childhood. The reasons for this are partly historical and the role of the socialisation of women who are socialised to fulfil the role of primary nurturers and care givers of children, especially pre-adolescent children and are perceived by society as such."

[71] The President also makes plain that he acted "[a]fter taking into account the many competing and sometimes irreconcilable interests . . . honestly, in good faith and after careful deliberation." He adds that "[t]he exercise of the power of pardon or remission, is by its very nature, highly complex . . . that it would be unfortunate if unnecessary restraints were placed upon the exercise of such power because this may inhibit its exercise. It is an area in which difficult choices have to be made . . . ." Nevertheless the affidavit invites correction if it be found that the President erred in the exercise of the power in question.

[72] Accepting without hesitation or qualification that the President acted in the manner and spirit - and for the commendable motives - he describes, I believe that in determining whether or not the presumed unfairness of the Act which automatically flows from the breach of the prohibition against discrimination contained in s 8(2) has been adequately rebutted, one cannot ascribe to the President the weighing of factors he himself does not mention. Thus, in my view, it is not open to us to make our own enquiries about the prison population and then to conclude that "a very large number of men prisoners would have gained their release".[5] We have not been told and have no data to found an opinion as to how many men would or could have qualified for release if the Act had treated the sexes equally. There is even less room for a finding that the numbers would have caused public disquiet. The President said nothing of the kind on the papers; no argument to such effect was advanced on his behalf at the hearing and counsel were not asked by the Court to address the subject. It is, of course, wholly illogical to rely on current perceptions of the level of crime in drawing inferences about reaction in mid-1994 had substantially more prisoners qualified for release. We also do not know anything about the administrative bother that may or may not have been involved in weighing the family circumstances of individual prisoners, or of applying some other method of advancing the cause of young children deprived of parental care without drawing the distinction simply along the gender line. Nor does it behove us hypothetically to second guess the President as to what he would or would not have decided had he been advised that the distinction along sex/gender lines was constitutionally suspect.

[73] A point that should also be stressed is that the question is not whether we find that the objective of the Act was praiseworthy or its likely effect beneficial to some. Both are common cause on the papers. The crisp question is whether the Act, regardless of its impressive provenance and charitable appearance, complies with the demands of s 8(2). The criteria are prescribed by the Constitution; so too their application to a given piece of legislation or a specific executive act. The immediate focus is on s 8(2), read with and fortified by s 8(4); but the wider context is also important. Discrimination founded on gender or sex was manifestly a serious concern of the drafters of the Constitution. That is made plain by the Preamble (first main paragraph); the Postscript (first paragraph); the ranking of sex/gender discrimination immediately after racial discrimination in the enumeration of specifically prohibited bases for discriminating in s 8(2); in ss 119 and 120, especially 119(3), providing for the creation of a Commission on Gender Equality; and the repeated use of both sexes throughout the Constitution in emphasis of the break with the former mind set and statutory drafting style (sanctified by s 6(a) of the Interpretation Act No 33 of 1957) which used the masculine gender only.

[74] The importance of equality in the constitutional scheme bears repetition. The South African Constitution is primarily and emphatically an egalitarian constitution. The supreme laws of comparable constitutional states may underscore other principles and rights. But in the light of our own particular history, and our vision for the future, a constitution was written with equality at its centre. Equality is our Constitution's focus and organising principle. The importance of equality rights in the Constitution, and the role of the right to equality in our emerging democracy, must both be understood in order to analyse properly whether a violation of the right has occurred.

[75] The importance of equality is demonstrated by the Constitution's insistence that discrimination on a specified s 8(2) basis be presumed unfair until the contrary is established. The insistence on such rebuttal is not new to this Court. A burden of "justification" was placed on the President by s 8(4) read with s 8(2). The latter states that

> "[n]o person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language."

Section 8(4) then continues,

Although s 8(2) expressly makes the possible grounds for discrimination open ended, both provisions give special treatment to the listed grounds of distinction. In the context of s 8(2) they render a distinction couched in their terms automatically questionable, and s 8(4) reinforces this by presuming that discrimination on a listed ground is unfair. Discrimination on the basis of a s 8(2) category must be regarded as unfair unless and until a persuasive rebuttal is established to vindicate it. For it is conduct that, on the face of it, is out of step with the fundamental values of our new constitutional order. This is particularly the case where discrimination on the basis of race, sex or gender is concerned. Although the Constitution does not establish levels of scrutiny in the manner of the American Constitution, it is nevertheless worth noting that race and sex/gender are given special mention in the Preamble[6] and head the list of s 8(2) categories. The drafters of the Constitution could hardly have established a presumption of unfairness in s 8(4) only to have the burden of rebuttal under the section discharged with relative ease.

[76] Therefore, in terms of s 8(4), read both textually and contextually, unless and "until the contrary is established", a distinction drawn on the basis of gender or sex, such as the one here, must be found to be unfair. If no rebuttal is apparent, that is the end of the matter - the presumption of unfairness, which entails unconstitutionality under s 8(2), stands.[7] Where some rebuttal is proffered, one must examine it to see whether it indeed

6 The first paragraph of the Preamble expresses the need to > ". . . create a new order in which all South Africans will be entitled to a common South African citizenship in a sovereign and democratic constitutional state in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races so that all citizens shall be able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms . . . ." (emphasis added)

7 My colleague Mokgoro J has concluded that although the Act is in conflict with s 8, it is a "law of general application" within the meaning of s 33(1) and is saved by its provisions. I cannot agree with the second of those propositions and the third therefore does not arise. The exercise by the President of the powers afforded by s 82(1)(k) - even in the general manner he chose in this instance - does not make "law", nor can it be said to be "of "establishes" (ie proves) the fairness of the distinction.

[77] What kinds of facts are likely to discharge the burden of rebuttal imposed on the President by s 8(4)? I would make three observations here. First, the fact that discrimination is unintended or in good faith does not render it fair. Once the subject action or legislation is found to create adverse effects on a discriminatory basis, there is no further requirement, eg of bad faith or malice. My second observation is that the "rebutting" factors can seldom, if ever, in themselves be discriminatory or otherwise objectionable. True as it may be that our society currently exhibits deeply entrenched patterns of inequality, these cannot justify a perpetuation of inequality. A statute or conduct that presupposes these patterns is unlikely to be vindicated by relying on them. One that not only presupposes them but is likely to promote their continuation, is even less likely to pass muster. Third, factors that would or could justify interference with the right to equality in a section 33(1) analysis, are to be distinguished from those relevant to general application". The exercise of such power is non-recurrent and specific, intended to benefit particular persons or classes of persons, to do so once only, and is given effect by an executive order directed to specific state officials. I respectfully suggest that one cannot by a process of linguistic interpretation fit such an executive/presidential/administrative decision and order into the purview of s 33(1). That savings clause is not there for the preservation of executive acts of government but to allow certain rules of law to be saved.

the enquiry under section 8(4). The one is concerned with justification, possibly notwithstanding unfairness; the other is concerned with fairness and with nothing else. I turn from these general comments to the case at hand.

[78] In my respectful view, the majority errs on all three counts. First, my colleagues base their finding of fairness in part on the good faith of the President. Second, the Act is upheld despite the fact that it relies on a generalisation regarding parental roles which is the result of disadvantage and discrimination. Third, in invoking factors such as public reactions to the release of many prisoners and administrative efficiency, the majority applies a section 33(1) analysis at the point of looking for a rebuttal of unfairness.

[79] In attempting to discharge their burden under s 8(4), the appellants rely on the two affidavits I have mentioned. With regard to the discrimination between the parents of young children, their effect is limited. The emphasis, as I've indicated above, is the President's concern for children, coupled with his belief that mothers have, and are generally perceived to have, a special role in the care and nurturing of younger children. The second affidavit is directed to the latter and purports to provide empirical confirmation for the President's belief. No other purpose or rationale is provided for the decision to accord the benefit of liberty to mothers and not to fathers.

confirmed. The question then is whether the fact that in South Africa mothers are the primary care givers can establish fairness under s 8(4). In this regard I agree with the majority judgment that the fact that women generally "bear an unequal share of the burden of child rearing" cannot render it ordinarily "fair to discriminate between women and men on that basis". What I cannot endorse, is the majority's conclusion that although the discrimination inherent in the Act was based on that very stereotyping,[8] it is nevertheless vindicated. In my view the notion relied upon by the President, namely that women are to be regarded as the primary care givers of young children, is a root cause of women's inequality in our society. It is both a result and a cause of prejudice; a societal attitude which relegates women to a subservient, occupationally inferior yet unceasingly onerous role. It is a relic and a feature of the patriarchy which the Constitution so vehemently condemns. Section 8 and the other provisions mentioned above outlawing gender or sex discrimination were designed to undermine and not to perpetuate patterns of discrimination of this kind.[9] Indeed I find it startling that the appellants could have placed this fact before the Court in order to establish that their conduct does not constitute unfair discrimination. I would have thought that this is precisely the kind of motive that the respondent might have attempted to divine in the appellant's conduct in order to condemn it. It hardly has justificatory power. One of the ways in which one accords equal dignity and respect to persons[10] is by seeking to protect the basic choices they make about their own identities. Reliance on the generalisation that women are the primary care givers is harmful in its tendency to cramp and stunt the efforts of both men and women to form their identities freely.

8 The word "stereotype" appears to have its ordinary meaning in the judgments of the United States Supreme Court. One possible definition, in Mississippi University for Women v Hogan 458 US 718, 725 (1982), is "fixed notions concerning the roles and abilities of males and females". The Canadian Supreme Court is slightly clearer on the meaning of "stereotype". The enumerated and analogous grounds set out in the Charter's s 15(1) serve as indicators of discrimination because "distinctions made on these grounds are typically stereotypical, being based on presumed rather than actual characteristics." Miron v Trudel (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 189 at 200.

9 So this court argued in Brink v Kitschoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 42.

[10] See the telling passage in the judgment in Egan v Canada (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79 at 104-5 quoted in paragraph 41 of the majority judgment.

[81] Is it relevant that an inherently objectionable generalisation has been used in this case for the benefit of a particular group of women prisoners? The majority judgment regards this as an important - if not a decisive - factor in its reasoning.[11] My first response is a narrow one. It is merely to say that the President has nowhere mentioned that it was his purpose to benefit women generally or the released mothers in particular. There is no suggestion of compensation for wrongs of the past or an attempt to make good for past discrimination against women. On the contrary, the whole thrust of the President's affidavit, and the raison d'etre for the main supporting affidavit, is the interest of children. The third category of prisoners released under the Act was not women in their own right but solely in their capacity as perceived child minders.

[82] For the purposes of my next response I am prepared to accept without deciding, that in very narrow circumstances a generalisation - although reflecting a discriminatory reality - could be vindicated if its ultimate implications were equalising.[12] But I would suggest that at least two criteria would have to be satisfied for this to be the case. First, there would have to be a strong indication that the advantages flowing from the perpetuation of a stereotype compensate for obvious and profoundly troubling disadvantages. Second, the context would have to be one in which discriminatory benefits were apposite.

11 See paragraph 47.

12 The United States Supreme Court allows generalisations to justify sex-based distinctions in very narrow circumstances. See Schlesinger v Ballard 419 US 498 (1975) and Califano v Webster 430 US 313 (1977). For an important judgment where such a generalisation fails, see Mississippi University for Women v Hogan 458 US 718 (1982).

[83] I illustrate what I mean by examining how these criteria are to be applied in the instant case. In terms of the first criterion, the benefits in this case are to a small group of women - the 440 released from prison - and the detriment is to all South African women who must continue to labour under the social view that their place is in the home. In addition, men must continue to accept that they can have only a secondary/surrogate role in the care of their children. The limited benefit in this case cannot justify the reinforcement of a view that is a root cause of women's inequality in our society. In truth there is no advantage to women qua women in the President's conduct, merely a favour to perceived child minders. On the other hand there are decided disadvantages to womankind in general in perpetuating perceptions foundational to paternalistic attitudes that limit the access of women to the workplace and other sources of opportunity. There is also more diffuse disadvantage when society imposes roles on men and women, not by virtue of their individual characteristics, qualities or choices, but on the basis of predetermined, albeit time-honoured, gender scripts. I cannot agree that because a few hundred women had the advantage of being released from prison early, the Constitution permits continuation of these major societal disadvantages.

[84] The second criterion, it will be recalled, requires some connection between the discriminatory action and the advantage to the previously disadvantaged. On that basis the limited and parochial benefits flowing from the Act are dubious. From the fact that women have suffered discrimination generally, it cannot be argued that they deserve compensatory benefits in any context. I suggest that the relevant context in this case is a penal one, for the effect of the Presidential Act is felt by prisoners. It has not been suggested that women have suffered systematic discrimination in a penal context.[13] The point here is that there is an advantage unrelated to any compensable past disadvantage.

13 Indeed, having regard to my personal observations over some 45 years, I would have regarded allegations to that effect with some scepticism.

KRIEGLER J

[85] I must emphasise that I am not suggesting that gender or sex discrimination of any kind must always and inevitably be found to be irrevocably unfair.[14] There is no question that gender or sex discrimination can be shown to be fair. All I am contending is that the evidence must be persuasive. In cases such as these the United States Supreme Court requires "exceedingly persuasive justification"[15] - a rigorous test in the context of their equality provision, which makes no express mention of discrimination and contains no deemed unfairness. We should do no less. In the present case the presumption of unfairness has not been disturbed. The justification that has been tendered is manifestly inadequate. There is no warrant to strain to uphold the presidential action in question. Clearly the Act was issued in good faith, after mature reflection, after consideration of the multifarious pros and cons, and for manifestly laudable humanitarian motives. None of those factors, however, cuts any ice. On the contrary, the President's ipse dixit establishes that the decision was founded on what has come to be known as gender stereotyping. And the Constitution enjoins all organs of state - here the President - to be careful not to perpetuate the distinctions of the past based on gender type-casting. In effect the Act put the stamp of approval of the head of state on a perception of parental roles that has been proscribed. Mothers are no longer the "natural" or "primary" minders of young children in the eyes of the law, whatever tradition, prejudice, male chauvinism

---

14 I reiterate that it is in not necessary to express any view in this case on the possible interaction between rebuttal of a presumption of unfairness under s 8(4) and justification under s 33(1).

15 See United States v Virginia 1996 US LEXIS 4259 at *28 (Supreme Court of the United States June 26, 1996) (citing Mississippi University for Women v Hogan 458 US 718, 724 (1982)).

or privilege may maintain. Constitutionally the starting point is that parents are parents.

[86] I accept that my finding that the President has discriminated unfairly may not answer legitimate concerns that my conclusion may be seen as discouraging benefits directed at persons within historically disadvantaged classes. A clear disclaimer is salutary. I am not suggesting that the executive or legislature should never recognize gender or sex distinctions. Gender/sex based distinctions can, and on occasion should, be made. The caveat is simply that such distinctions must be shown not to discriminate unfairly under the Constitution - or they must be justifiable under section 33(1). Neither the legislature nor executive need feel hamstrung by my finding in this case.

[87] That leaves only the question of the appropriate order to be made. It can be answered quite simply. I have come to the same conclusion on the reviewability and constitutionality of the Act as did the learned judge in the court below. Nevertheless, even on that finding, the order was overbroad. There was nothing wrong with those parts of the Act that were not tainted by gender or sex discrimination, eg the release of certain prisoners younger than 18 years of age. The Act is constitutionally objectionable only to the extent that it discriminated on the basis of gender/sex between male and female prisoners who, as at 10 May 1994, had children under the age of twelve years. In my view the learned judge should also not have put the President on terms to rectify the Act.

Once there was no longer any prayer for the respondent's release and there was no prayer relating to the women who had (long since) been released,[16] rectification of the order would have served no useful purpose. On the other hand, the Act had constituted a breach of section 8(2) and a declaratory order to that effect under section 7(4)(a) and (b)(i) was therefore appropriate, even though it entailed no direct or discernible consequential relief for the respondent. A breach of the Constitution had occurred and a judicial declaration to that effect was appropriate. Costs were not awarded in the court below and were not mentioned before us. No more need be said on the topic.

1. The appeal is upheld;
2. The order in the court below is set aside and in its stead it is declared that Presidential Act 17 issued on 17 June 1994 constituted a breach of section 8(2) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, No 200 of 1993, to the extent that it discriminated between male and female prisoners who, on 10 May 1994, had children under the age of twelve years.

16 The order was granted on 16 February 1996, some thirty months after the Act had been issued.

KRIEGLER J

MOKGORO J:

[89] I have read the judgments of my colleagues, and I concur in the order proposed by Goldstone J. I agree that Presidential Act No. 17 of 1994 ("the Presidential Act") is reviewable by this Court, for the reasons given by him. I differ with my colleagues, however, with respect to the precise legal route taken in arriving at the order. I hold that the Presidential Act constitutes "unfair discrimination" contrary to section 8(2) of the interim Constitution ("the Constitution"), but that the unfair discrimination is justified under section 33(1) of the Constitution.

[90] Section 8 of the Constitution provides as follows:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
> (3)(a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.
> (b) . . .
> (4) Prima facie proof of discrimination on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) shall be presumed to be sufficient proof of unfair discrimination as contemplated in that subsection, until the contrary is established."

[91] The facts in this case have been set out in full in the judgment of Goldstone J. In brief, women prisoners with children under the age of 12 were granted remission of their sentences by the President, whereas their male counterparts were not. By reason of section 8(4) of the Constitution, such discrimination is presumed to be unfair discrimination, "until the contrary is established". In my view, that presumption has not been rebutted in this case.

[92] I agree with Goldstone J that the prohibition against unfair discrimination is of crucial importance in our constitutional scheme:

> "The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups."[1]

I further agree with the test proposed by him as to whether discrimination is "unfair":

MOKGORO J

"To determine whether that impact was unfair it is necessary to look not only at the group who has been disadvantaged but at the nature of the power in terms of which the discrimination was effected and, also at the nature of the interests which have been affected by the discrimination."[2]

[2] Para 43.

MOKGORO J

I disagree, however, on the application of these principles to the facts of this case. I have no doubt that the President acted in good faith, and I am sure much deliberation went into the Presidential Act.[3] The President stated that he took particular account of the need to maintain the integrity of the judicial system and the administration of justice.[4] He also considered the concerns of the public about the release of convicted prisoners.[5] The release of mothers of young children was motivated primarily by a concern for children.[6] No fathers were released, despite an acknowledgment by the government that "a minority of fathers . . . are actively involved in nurturing and caring for their children".[7] In my view, denying men the opportunity to be released from prison in order to resume rearing their children, entirely on the basis of stereotypical assumptions concerning men's aptitude at child rearing, is an infringement upon their equality and dignity.[8] The Presidential Act does not recognize the equal worth of fathers who are actively involved in nurturing and caring for their young children, treating them as less capable parents on the mere basis that they are fathers and not mothers.

MOKGORO J

[93] Section 8 of our Constitution gives us the opportunity to move away from gender stereotyping. Society should no longer be bound by the notions that a woman's place is in the home, (and conversely, not in the public sphere), and that fathers do not have a significant role to play in the rearing of their young children. Those notions have for too long deprived women of a fair opportunity to participate in public life, and deprived society of the valuable contribution women can make. Women have been prevented from gaining economic self-sufficiency, or forging identities for themselves independent of their roles as wives and mothers. By the same token, society has denied fathers the opportunity to participate in child rearing, which is detrimental both to fathers and their children. As recognized by this Court in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North and Others,[9] fathers have a meaningful contribution to make in child rearing, and I am concerned that this Court may be perceived as retreating from the valuable principles laid down in that case. It is important that those principles be adhered to, so that they may

[10] I am optimistic that changes can occur even in traditional African societies, where gender roles are particularly entrenched. There is an inherent flexibility in African customs and traditions, potentially making them responsive to changes in lifestyles. To date, however, that flexibility has been counterbalanced by the conservatism of customary law. The Constitution, however, prompts us to take an affirmative responsibility in correcting this skewed parental role division.

[94] I am unpersuaded by the emphasis in the majority judgment on the vulnerable position of mothers of young children in South Africa. While such mothers may generally be disadvantaged in society, there is no evidence that they are disadvantaged in the penal system in particular. I do not insist that there be a rigid link between the nature of disadvantage suffered by a group, and measures taken to alleviate that disadvantage. There should, however, be some correlation between the two. That correlation does not appear to exist here.[11] I therefore hold the Presidential Act to be unfair discrimination, which falls to be justified in accordance with section 33(1) of the Constitution.

[95] Section 33(1) provides in relevant part:

> "The rights entrenched in this Chapter may be limited by law of general application, provided that such limitation -
> (a) shall be permissible only to the extent that it is -
> (i) reasonable; and
> (ii) justifiable in an open and democratic society based upon freedom and equality; and
> (b) shall not negate the essential content of the right in question[.]"

[11] I do not think, for example, that the President could have released only black mothers even though, on the whole, they are a more vulnerable group than white mothers.

MOKGORO J

[96] A precondition to the applicability of section 33(1) is that the limitation of a right occur "by law of general application". Although the Presidential Act is not conventional legislation, in my view, it satisfies that precondition. The phrase "by law of general application" has not been interpreted in detail by this Court, but a broad view was taken of "law" by Kentridge AJ in Du Plessis and Others v De Klerk and Another.[12] In holding that the words "all law in force" in section 7(2) of the Constitution encapsulate common law as well as statute law, in part because the broad term "reg" is used in the Afrikaans text, Kentridge AJ noted:

> "The term 'reg' is used in other parts of chapter 3 as the equivalent of 'law', for example in s 8 ('equality before the law') and s 33(1) ('law of general application'). Express references to the common law in such sections as s 33(2) and s 35(3) reinforce the conclusion that the law referred to in s 7(2) includes the common law and that chapter 3 accordingly affects or may affect the common law. Nor can I find any warrant in the language alone for distinguishing between the common law of delict, contract, or any other branch of private law, on the one hand, and public common law, such as the general principles of administrative law, the law relating to acts of State or to State privilege, on the other."[13]

Kriegler J added that

[97] Section 2 of the Interpretation Act 33 of 1957 ("the Interpretation Act"), defines "law" as "any law, proclamation, ordinance, Act of Parliament or other enactment having the force of law", and presumptively applies to the interpretation of every such "law. . . in force" and of "all by-laws, rules, regulations or orders made under the authority of any such law".[15] Delegated legislation must be published:

> "When any by-law, regulation, rule or order is authorized by any law to be made by the President or a Minister . . . , such by-law, regulation, rule or order shall, subject to the provisions relative to the force and effect thereof in any law, be published in the Gazette."[16]

[98] Guidance as to the meaning and purpose of "law of general application" can also be obtained from decisions of the European Court of Human Rights and the Canadian Supreme Court, both of which have considered the phrase "prescribed by law" in the context of limitation of rights. The judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in The Sunday Times v The United Kingdom[17] concerned an injunction issued in accordance with the common law of contempt, which infringed a newspaper's freedom of speech. Article 10 of the European Convention of Human Rights provides, so far as is material:

> "2. [Freedom of expression], since it carries with it duties and responsibilities, may be subject to such formalities, conditions, restrictions or penalties as are prescribed by law and are necessary in a democratic society . . . ." (Emphasis added).

[99] In that case, the question arose whether a common law limitation fell within the term "prescribed by law", so as to be a permissible limitation on the right to freedom of expression.[18] The court ruled as follows:

> "In the Court's opinion, the following are two of the requirements that flow from the expression 'prescribed by law'. First, the law must be adequately accessible: the citizen must be able to have an indication that is adequate in the circumstances of the legal rules applicable to a given case. Secondly, a norm cannot be regarded as a 'law' unless it is formulated with sufficient precision to enable the citizen to regulate his conduct: he must be able - if need be with appropriate advice - to foresee, to a degree that is reasonable in the circumstances, the consequences which a given action may entail."[19]

18 Id at paras 46-53.

On the facts, the court held that the common law rule fulfilled the requirements of both accessibility and precision.[20]

[100] The views of the Canadian Supreme Court are also of assistance. Like the South African Constitution, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms (the "Canadian Charter") contains a general limitations clause, which provides that:

19 Id at para 49.

20 Id at para 53.

> "The Canadian Charter . . . guarantees the rights and freedoms set out in it subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society." (Emphasis added).[21]

That Court has consistently held rules emanating from statute, regulation and common law to be "prescribed by law".[22] The Canadian Supreme Court is divided, however, on whether rules emanating from directives or guidelines, issued by government departments or agencies but falling outside the category of officially published delegated legislation, are "prescribed by law".[23]

21 Section 1, Canadian Charter.

22 See for example R v Therens (1985) 18 DLR (4th) 655 at 680; see generally Hogg Constitutional Law of Canada 3 ed Vol 2 (Carswell, Ontario 1992), at 35-12.

23 See Hogg, id at 35-12 at n 54.

[101] The decision in Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada[24] illustrates that division. The case concerned internal government directives alleged to infringe freedom of speech. Lamer CJC considered that the limitations clause could not apply because the directives were not "law".[25] He explained that the government's internal directives and policies differ from statutes and regulations in that they are not generally published, and therefore are unknown to the public.[26] Lamer CJC added that the directives were binding only on government officials, and could be cancelled at will.[27] The views of Lamer CJC echo the following concerns of Wilson J in McKinney v University of Guelph:[28]

> "[The limitations clause] serves the purpose of permitting limits to be imposed on constitutional rights when the demands of a free and democratic society require them. These limits must, however, be expressed through the rule of law. The definition of law for such purposes must necessarily be narrow. Only those limits on guaranteed rights which have survived the rigours of the law-making process are effective."

McLachlin J, on the other hand, took a much broader view of the meaning of "law" in Committee for Commonwealth v Canada. She considered that the "prescribed by law" requirement was to eliminate from the limitations clause purview conduct which is purely arbitrary. She cautioned that:

> "From a practical point of view, it would be wrong to limit the application of [the limitations clause] to enacted laws or regulations. That would require the Crown to pass detailed regulations to deal with every contingency as a pre-condition of justifying its conduct under [the limitations clause]. In my view, such a technical approach does not accord with the spirit of the Charter and would make it unduly difficult to justify limits on rights and freedoms which may be reasonable and, indeed, necessary."[29]

[102] It can be seen then that several concerns underlie the interpretation of "prescribed by law". The need for accessibility, precision and general application flow from the concept of the rule of law. A person should be able to know of the law, and be able to conform his or her conduct to the law. Further, laws should apply generally, rather than targeting specific individuals.[30] In my view, those rule of law concerns are adequately

29 Supra n 24 at 461.

30 It should be noted that those concerns also underlie the theoretical distinction between "legislative" and "non-legislative" acts in administrative law. See Baxter Administrative Law (Juta, Cape Town 1984) at 349-51.

met by the Presidential Act.[31] The remaining question about the Presidential Act concerns its origin as executive rule making rather than as legislation, which I shall now address.

[31] I note that the Presidential Act was not published in the Gazette, as is generally required for delegated legislation. I agree with McLachlin J in Committee for Commonwealth of Canada v Canada, however, that formal publication requirements are not dispositive for the purposes of section 33(1). As regards the "general application" requirement, I consider the Presidential Act is distinguishable from the impugned legislation in Matinkinca and Another v Council of State, Ciskei and Another (1994) (1) BCLR 17 (Ck). It was held in that case (at 41) that a decree indemnifying Ciskei security forces and demonstrators for the Bisho Stadium massacre was not a law of general application. That decree applied as a retroactive release to the security forces and demonstrators involved in one specific incident. By contrast, the Presidential Act applies to all prisoners in South Africa, whenever they were convicted and wherever they were held.

MOKGORO J

[103] The origin of the Presidential Act in executive rule making rather than in a formal legislative process is not fatal to the application of section 33(1). As noted by Wilson J, supra, there are safeguards attaching to the legislative process, because legislation is the subject of a detailed and rigorous procedure, upon which many people have an opportunity to comment and vote. However, there are numerous instances of delegated legislation drafted by the executive, which legislation would undoubtedly be accepted as "law".[32] The difference between the Presidential Act, and standard instances of executive rule making, in the form of delegated legislation, is the absence of a parent statute in the former case. In standard cases of executive rule making therefore, at least the parent statute has undergone the rigours of the legislative process. That difference cannot in my view justify different treatment for the Presidential Act, which represents an exercise of public power derived directly from the Constitution. The legitimacy which attaches to delegated legislation by reason of the parent statute must attach with equal force to rules representing a direct exercise of power granted by the Constitution. The Constitution, after all, was a vigorously negotiated document.

32 See generally Baxter, supra n 30 at ch 9.

[104] I consider it undesirable to take a technical approach to the interpretation of "law of general application". As noted by McLachlin J, supra, a technical approach unduly reduces the types of rules and conduct which can justify limitations. That exclusion from section 33(1) may adversely affect the proper interpretation of the scope of rights in Chapter 3, and when such rights are regarded as breached. In other words, courts which wish to uphold action or rules as justified, but are unable to do so because of a narrow definition of "law of general application", may strain the interpretation of other sections of the Constitution in order to find the conduct did not infringe the right in question.[33] Further, the "law of general application" requirement is merely a precondition to the applicability of section 33(1). If a limitation is in substance ill-advised, that will be caught by the rigours of the limitation test itself. To conclude, the Presidential Act is an exercise of constitutional power in the form of general, publicly accessible rules which affect the rights of individuals. In my view, that is sufficient to fall within "law of general application" for the purposes of section 33(1).

[105] I shall now turn to the other requirements of section 33(1), namely whether the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society. The President has explained in his affidavit that the reason for releasing mothers was a concern for the plight of children.

[33] See Woolman in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Kenwyn 1996) at 12-19, n 1.

> "6. With regard to the grant of special remission to all mothers with minor dependent children under the age of 12 years, I was motivated predominantly by a concern for children who had been deprived of the nurturing and care which their mothers would ordinarily have provided. Having spent many years in prison myself, I am well aware of the hardship which flows from incarceration. I am also well aware that imprisonment inevitably has harsh consequences for the family of the prisoner.
> . . . .
> 8. Shortly before the signing of the Presidential Act I stated the following in a speech . . . :
> 'Our policies must turn into reality the principle that every child deserves to have a decent home and be brought up in the loving care of a family. The terrible legacy of street children has to be attended to with urgency. A collective effort has to be launched by the government, civil society and the private sector to ensure that every child is looked after, has sufficient nutrition and health care.'"

There can be no doubt that the aim of ensuring young children are looked after is legitimate.[34] The real controversy arises as to whether the Act is a proportionate response in light of the unfair discrimination suffered by fathers.

[106] Despite my reservations at its gender stereotyping, I conclude that the Presidential Act is justified. First, although fathers have not benefitted from the group pardon, they are still entitled to apply for remission on an individual basis. Second, I agree with Goldstone J that politically, it would have been virtually impossible to release all men and women with children under twelve, because of the sheer numbers involved. Further, there would have been great administrative inconvenience in engaging in a case-by-case evaluation for each mother and father as to whether they were the primary care giver for their child. Thus the basic question put to us is whether only the women should have been released, or no one released. In other words, the issue was whether some children with parents in prison be united with their parent, or no children be united with their parents. I consider the aim of easing the plight of South African children to be extremely important, and that every possible opportunity should be taken to further that aim. The temporary denial of parenthood to fathers is therefore justifiable with reference to the interests of the children whose mothers were released. Accordingly, I hold the Presidential Act to be justified in accordance with the requirements of section 33(1).

[34] This Court has affirmed the importance of children's rights. In S v Williams and Others 1995 (3) SA 632 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 861 (CC), we declared unconstitutional section 294 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 which authorised whipping for juveniles.

O'REGAN J:

[107] I have had the opportunity of reading the judgments of Goldstone J and Kriegler J. I concur fully in the judgment of Goldstone J. I have nothing to add to his analysis of the reviewability of the President's power to pardon prisoners in terms of section 82(1)(k) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, Act 200 of 1993 ("the interim Constitution"). However, I wish to add a few remarks concerning the question of whether the President discriminated unfairly when he exercised this power to remit the sentences of mothers of young children but not fathers of young children.

[108] The Respondent's argument was that in releasing mothers, but not fathers, the President discriminated on the grounds of sex. There can be no doubt that in not affording fathers the opportunity of a special remission of sentence, the President did discriminate against fathers on the basis of their sex. Section 8 of the interim Constitution provides:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
> (3) (a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.
> (b) . . .

The denial of an opportunity such as a special remission of sentence is sufficient in my view to constitute discrimination as contemplated by section 8(2). Having produced prima facie proof of discrimination on the grounds of sex, the Respondent argued (relying on section 8(4) of the interim Constitution) that that was sufficient proof of unfair discrimination in breach of section 8(2) unless the contrary was established.

[109] According to his affidavit, the President released mothers of young children because he was concerned for the welfare of children. In his view, mothers play a "special role . . . in the care and nurturing of young children". Both Goldstone J and Kriegler J have observed that the reason given by the President for the release of mothers was based on a stereotype or generalisation concerning the special role that mothers play in our society in relation to the care and rearing of children. Although the evidence upon which the President based his assertion was perfunctory, I, like Goldstone J and Kriegler J, see no reason to doubt that as a matter of fact in South African society, mothers not only bear a considerably greater proportion of the burdens of child rearing than fathers, but also that mothers, as a general rule, do have a special role in relation to the nurturing and care of children. There are, of course, some fathers who share fully in the responsibilities of child rearing.

[110] The responsibility borne by mothers for the care of children is a major cause of inequality in our society. Being responsible for the rearing of children is a great privilege, but also a great strain. Many women rear children single-handedly with no help, financial or otherwise, from the fathers of the children. The need to support children financially is one of the reasons for women seeking work outside the home. However the responsibility for child rearing is also one of the factors that renders women less competitive and less successful in the labour market. The unequal division of labour between fathers and mothers is therefore a primary source of women's disadvantage in our society.

[111] Kriegler J finds that the President's reliance on the generalisation constituted unfair discrimination, even though the discrimination was directed against fathers not mothers. He holds that only when two strict requirements are met will reliance upon such a generalisation constitute fair discrimination: where it is strongly indicated that the advantages conferred by reliance upon the generalisation outweigh the disadvantages and secondly where there is a connection between the discriminatory action and the advantage to the previously disadvantaged (at para 82). In my view, his approach is too restrictive. Even where discrimination in a particular case arises from reliance upon a stereotype or generalisation, the focus of the section 8(2) determination must remain whether the impact of the discrimination was unfair.

[112] To determine whether the discrimination is unfair it is necessary to recognise that although the long-term goal of our constitutional order is equal treatment, insisting upon equal treatment in circumstances of established inequality may well result in the entrenchment of that inequality. There are at least two factors relevant to the determination of unfairness: it is necessary to look at the group or groups which have suffered discrimination in the particular case and at the effect of the discrimination on the interests of those concerned. The more vulnerable the group adversely affected by the discrimination, the more likely the discrimination will be held to be unfair. Similarly, the more invasive the nature of the discrimination upon the interests of the individuals affected by the discrimination, the more likely it will be held to be unfair. In determining the effect of the discrimination, the reasons given by the agency responsible for the discrimination will be only of indirect relevance. However, should the discrimination in any particular case be held to be unfair, the reason for the discriminatory act may well be central to an investigation into whether the discrimination is nevertheless justified in terms of section 33 of the interim Constitution.

[113] In this case, mothers have been afforded an advantage on the basis of a proposition that is generally speaking true. There is no doubt that the goal of equality entrenched in our constitution would be better served if the responsibilities for child rearing were more fairly shared between fathers and mothers. The simple fact of the matter is that at present they are not. Nor are they likely to be more evenly shared in the near future. For the moment, then, and for some time to come, mothers are going to carry greater burdens than fathers in the rearing of children. We cannot ignore this crucial fact in considering the impact of the discrimination in this case. With respect, therefore, I cannot agree with Kriegler J that it is a "profound and troubling" disadvantage for women when the President says that mothers play a special role in nurturing children. The profound disadvantage lies not in the President's statement, but in the social fact of the role played by mothers in child rearing and, more particularly, in the inequality which results from it. Putting an end to that inequality is a major challenge for our society. There can be no doubt that where reliance upon the generalisation results in greater disadvantages for mothers, it would almost without question constitute unfair discrimination. On the other hand, were we to establish the rigid rule proposed by Kriegler J that reliance upon that generalisation even to afford some advantage to mothers would, except in very narrow circumstances, be unfair, we may well make the task of achieving the equality desired by the Constitution more difficult. On the facts of this case, I conclude that the President's reliance upon the fact of women's greater share of child rearing responsibilities in order to afford an advantage to some women has not caused any significant harm to other women.

[114] The harmful impact of the discrimination in this case was not experienced by mothers, but by fathers. However in my view, that impact was far from severe. Fathers were denied an opportunity of special remission of sentence. There is no doubt that an early release from jail is beneficial. But in assessing the impact of the discrimination, it must be remembered that their imprisonment resulted, not from the President's act in denying them remission, but from their having been convicted of criminal offences. In addition, they still have the right to apply for special remission of sentence in the light of their own circumstances. The effect of the discriminatory act was, therefore, in my view not to cause substantial harm. That harm would have been far more significant in my view if it had deprived fathers in a permanent or substantial way of rights or benefits attached to parenthood.

[115] In considering the factors relevant to a determination of unfairness, it appears that the discrimination in this case caused no significant harm to mothers and no severe harm to the interests of fathers. A further relevant factor in this case is the nature of the presidential power. In that regard, I have nothing to add to the analysis contained in the judgment of Goldstone J (at paras 44-46). That power, when exercised to confer a pardon upon groups, is resistant to individualised application. It may well have been impossible for the President to exercise it in this case in a more individualised way. In the light of all these factors, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the discrimination caused by the President remitting the sentences of mothers of young children but not the sentences of fathers of young children was not unfair.

Case CCT 4/96

WILLEM M PRINSLOO Applicant

GERHARDUS STEPHANUS VAN DER LINDE First Respondent

THE MINISTER OF FORESTRY AND WATER AFFAIRS Second Respondent

JUDGMENT

ACKERMANN J, O'REGAN J AND SACHS J:

[1] Much of South Africa is tinder dry. Veld, forest and mountain fires sweep across the land, causing immense damage to property and destroying valuable forest, flora and fauna. The Forest Act 122 of 1984 (the "Act") has as one of its principal objects the prevention and control of such fires. A major method of achieving this is to create various fire control areas where schemes of compulsory fire control are established, with special emphasis on the clearing and maintenance of fire belts between neighbouring properties.[1] Landowners in areas outside of such fire control areas are, on the other hand, encouraged but not required to embark on similar fire control measures.[2] A number of provisions prescribe criminal penalties for landowners in fire control areas who fail to fulfil their statutory obligations.[3] In addition, an offence is created in respect of persons who are wilfully or negligently responsible for fires "in the open air",[4] while it is an offence for any landowner in any area to fail to take such steps as are under the circumstances reasonably necessary to prevent the spread of fires.[5]

> "84. Presumption of negligence. - When in any action by virtue of the provisions of this Act or the common law the question of negligence in respect of a veld, forest or mountain fire which occurred on land situated outside a fire control area arises, negligence is presumed, until the contrary is proved."

2 Section 24.

3 Sections 75(7) and (8).

4 Section 75(2)(b).

5 Section 75(8)(f).

It is the constitutionality of this provision which is under consideration in the present matter.

THE REFERRAL

[3] The present matter comes before us by way of a referral made in terms of section 102(1) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993 (the "interim Constitution")[6] by Van der Walt DJP in the Transvaal Provincial Division of the Supreme Court (as it was then called). Action had been instituted in that division by the first respondent (as plaintiff) as a result of damage allegedly caused to his farmlands by the spread of a fire from the neighbouring land of the applicant (defendant in those proceedings).[7] It was common cause in this Court that the fire occurred on land situated outside a fire control area.

6 Which provides the following:

> "If, in any matter before a provincial or local division of the Supreme Court, there is an issue which may be decisive for the case, and which falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court in terms of section 98(2) and (3), the provincial or local division concerned shall, if it considers it to be in the interest of justice to do so, refer such matter to the Constitutional Court for its decision . . ."

[4] As this Court has held on a number of occasions, a court should only exercise its power under section 102(1) after it is satisfied: first, that the issue falls within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Constitutional Court; secondly, that it may be decisive for the case; and, thirdly, that it would be in the interest of justice for the referral to take place.[8]

[5] Dealing with the second requirement, Didcott J in Luitingh v Minister of Defence held that the requirement was satisfied "once the ruling given there may have a crucial bearing on the eventual outcome of the case as a whole, or on any significant aspect of the way in which its remaining parts ought to be handled".[9] In Brink v Kitshoff NO, Chaskalson P commented that this would include an issue which, if decided in favour of the party who raised it, would put an end to or materially curtail the litigation.[10] It would also include an issue such as the onus of proof in relation to the admissibility of a confession in a criminal trial, which arose in S v Zuma and Others[11] and S v Mhlungu and Others.[12] In Zuma's case the decision of the entire case in fact depended on where the onus lay. In Mhlungu's case a ruling would determine the way in which the voir dire was to be conducted, and was also necessary in fairness to the accused to enable them to decide whether or not to give evidence.

> "1.3 Dit is van wesenlike belang dat die geskilpunt of die vermoede van skuld geskep soos in Artikel 84 ongrondwetlik is al dan nie, en daarop staat gemaak kan word al dan nie, beslis word voordat die verhoor tussen die Applikant en eerste Respondent 'n aanvang neem, omdat dit sal bepaal watter getuies die gedingspartye (indien enige) gaan roep as getuies om die party wat die bewyslas dra hom daarvan te laat kwyt, en wie die beginlas om met die verhoor op die meriete te begin dra.

[7] In the case of Stevens v Stevens,[14] Wright J came to the opposite conclusion in an action which was also brought under the Act. His opinion that a referral of the constitutionality of section 84 of the Act was, at that stage, not in the interest of justice was based on the probability that either of the parties would be able, without the assistance of the presumption, to either prove or disprove the negligence of the defendant. It is neither necessary nor desirable to attempt to resolve the apparent conflict between the conclusions of Van der Walt DJP and Wright J because every case must be decided on its own particular facts and circumstances and what is essentially a judgment on the peculiar facts and pleadings before a judge requested to refer a matter in terms of section 102(1) cannot be elevated to a rule of law which is capable of automatic application to the referral of all other cases brought under the Act.

[8] Van der Walt DJP clearly formed the view, as is evident from the above reasons, that the ruling on the constitutionality of section 84 of the Act might have a crucial bearing on a significant aspect of the way in which the parties would conduct their cases. This brings it within the formulation of the requirement in Luitingh quoted above. It cannot confidently be stated that Van der Walt DJP was wrong in the judgment he formed in this regard and accordingly it cannot be concluded that this particular referral requirement was not met. That Van der Walt DJP must have considered it in the interest of justice to refer the matter at that stage follows inevitably from the reasons furnished regarding the crucial importance of deciding the incidence of onus at the commencement of the proceedings. The learned judge did not furnish explicit reasons why he considered that there was a reasonable prospect of the section being declared unconstitutional, but at the time that the referral was made there was little guidance on the construction of section 8, which is a matter of some complexity. Under these circumstances it is fair to infer that, at the time and in the context of the referral, Van der Walt DJP must have considered that there was such a reasonable prospect. In any event no useful purpose would be served in the circumstances of this particular case by considering how the applicant's prospects of success on the constitutional challenge looked at the time of the referral. Full argument has been heard on the challenge and the Court is in a position to deal with that definitely and finally. In our view the referral should be accepted and the merits of the constitutional challenge to section 84 considered.

> "2. Die geskilpunt tussen die partye is meer in die besonder die vraag of die vermoede van skuld wat geskep word deur Artikel 84 van die Boswet nie in botsing is met die fundamentele regte vervat in Hoofstuk 3 van die Grondwet nie, en meer in die besonder:
> 2.1 Die reg op gelykheid voor die reg en op gelyke beskerming deur die reg soos vervat in artikel 8(1) van die Grondwet;
> 2.2 Die verbod op diskriminasie soos vervat in artikel 8(2) van die Grondwet;
> 2.3 Die reg om onskuldig geag te word totdat skuld bewys word soos vervat word [in] Artikel 25(3)(c) van die Grondwet."

Whether there is a constitutional right to a fair civil trial and, if so, whether an onus provision such as that provided for in section 84 might infringe such right, are issues with which we are not concerned in this case and on which we need express no view. Counsel for the applicant expressly renounced reliance on any such argument.

PRESUMPTION OF INNOCENCE: SECTION 25(3)(c)

[10] In his written and oral argument, counsel for the applicant focused primarily on the third point, namely an alleged violation of the right to be presumed innocent, as contained in section 25(3)(c) of the interim Constitution. The obvious difficulty he had to overcome was that the applicant was a defendant in a civil trial and not an accused in a criminal trial. In order to circumvent this problem, he argued that the test to be adopted was an objective one, which did not depend upon the subjective situation of the applicant, but rather on the objective reach of the provision. Thus, if the impugned section, objectively speaking, was unconstitutional, it would be of no force and effect for civil as well as criminal trials. The word "action", he contended, was ambiguous and had to be read in its context, particularly in relation to the fact that the Afrikaans text used the word "geding", which corresponded to the wide English term "proceedings".[15] Furthermore, criminal prosecutions in fact frequently took place and section 84 of the Act was used to establish guilt.[16] It followed that the word "action" was wide enough to include criminal as well as civil proceedings, with the result that it infringed the rights of accused persons as protected by section 25(3)(c). Once it was invalid because of its application to criminal trials, he concluded, it lost all its force and effect and accordingly could not be invoked in civil

[11] In our opinion, counsel was wrong both in relation to his approach to interpretation and in respect of the consequences of the construction he urged upon us. We shall make the following assumptions (most of them very questionable) in his favour (without deciding the correctness of any of them): That standing of a civil claimant to challenge a "reverse onus" in a civil trial provides standing to challenge the constitutionality of a statutory reverse onus provision relating to criminal trials, even when that claimant is not in jeopardy of prosecution;[17] that the word "action" in section 84 is wide enough to encompass criminal proceedings; that there is sufficient material before this Court to enable us to determine whether a reverse onus in a criminal trial would be unconstitutional; and that in fact such a reverse onus in a criminal trial would be unconstitutional.

[12] Even on these assumptions, there is one insuperable obstacle to counsel's argument, and that is the approach to interpretation enjoined upon us by section 35(2) of the interim Constitution, which reads as follows:

> "No law which limits any of the rights entrenched in this Chapter, shall be constitutionally invalid solely by reason of the fact that the wording used prima facie exceeds the limits imposed in this Chapter, provided such a law is reasonably capable of a more restricted interpretation which does not exceed such limits, in which event such law shall be construed as having a meaning in accordance with the said more restricted interpretation."

[13] Its terms are peremptory. Our task is not to find the one "correct" interpretation of a statutory provision, but, given more than one reasonably possible construction, to prefer one which is consistent with the interim Constitution. In this respect, ambiguity does not help the applicant. On the contrary, any ambiguity must be resolved by favouring the construction which keeps the provision constitutionally alive, provided the construction is reasonable. In keeping with this approach, we have no difficulty in deciding that even if the word "action" was capable of including criminal proceedings, and even if such inclusion resulted in an unconstitutional invasion of a right to a fair criminal trial, it was also reasonably capable of a more restricted meaning which excluded criminal trials and thereby avoided unconstitutionality. It follows that in terms of section 35(2) the latter interpretation would be preferred. Even if all the assumptions made in paragraph 11 above were correct, a proposition which is open to doubt, the attack based on section 25(3)(c) would still fail.

[14] In addition, even a finding in favour of the applicant's argument concerning section 25(3)(c) would not enable him to get around a further obstacle. The very kind of situation contended for by counsel, namely that section 25(3)(c) rendered section 84 unconstitutional in part, appears to have been contemplated by the interim Constitution, and answered in quite a different way to that for which he contends. Section 98(5) of the interim Constitution provides as follows:

> "In the event of the Constitutional Court finding that any law or any provision thereof is inconsistent with this Constitution, it shall declare such law or provision invalid to the extent of its inconsistency . . ." (our emphasis)

Thus, even if this Court were to hold that section 84 necessarily included criminal as well as civil proceedings, and that the presumption in relation to criminal trials was unconstitutional, it would have to declare in any order that it made that the provisions of the section were inconsistent only to the extent that they applied to criminal proceedings.[18] The applicant can therefore not succeed in the attack based on section 25(3)(c) of the interim Constitution.

THE EQUALITY ISSUES: SECTION 8

[15] While the attack based on section 8 was not strongly pressed by counsel for the applicant, it must nevertheless be given due consideration. For present purposes the relevant provisions of Section 8 of the interim Constitution read as follows:

> "Equality.
> 8. (1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.

[18] Ferreira v Levin supra n 8 at para 131; Bernstein v Bester NNO supra n 8 at para 49.

adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.

[16] In his written argument, counsel pointed to the differentiation between defendants in veld fire cases and those in other delictual matters. According to him, this differentiation had no rational basis, because the apparent object that the legislature sought to achieve by reversing the general rule regarding the incidence of onus that whoever avers must prove, could have been, and, indeed, already was, accomplished by means of common law aids to proof. He referred in particular to the concept of res ipsa loquitur[19] and the practice of triers of fact to require less evidence to establish a prima facie case if the facts in issue are peculiarly within the knowledge of the opposing party.[20] A second differentiation which was raised by first respondent, relates to the fact that the presumption of negligence applies only in respect of fires in non-controlled areas, and not to those spreading in controlled areas, which at first blush appears to be incongruous. The challenge to constitutionality in both cases would be based either on a breach of the right to equality as guaranteed in section 8(1) or on a violation of the prohibition of discrimination contained in section 8(2). To determine whether either challenge in terms of section 8 is correct, it is necessary to consider first the proper approach to be taken to sections 8(1) and (2).

[17] If each and every differentiation made in terms of the law amounted to unequal treatment that had to be justified by means of resort to section 33, or else constituted discrimination which had to be shown not to be unfair, the courts could be called upon to review the justifiability or fairness of just about the whole legislative programme and almost all executive conduct. As Hogg puts it:

> "What is meant by a guarantee of equality? It cannot mean that the law must treat everyone equally. The Criminal Code imposes punishments on persons convicted of criminal offences; no similar burdens are imposed on the innocent. Education Acts require children to attend school; no similar obligation is imposed on adults. Manufacturers of food and drugs are subject to more stringent regulations than the manufacturers of automobile parts. The legal profession is regulated differently from the accounting profession. The Wills Act prescribes a different distribution of the property of a person who dies leaving a will from that of a person who dies leaving no will. The Income Tax Act imposes a higher rate of tax on those with high incomes than on those with low incomes. Indeed, every statute or regulation employs classifications of one kind or another for the imposition of burdens or the grant of benefits. Laws never provide the same treatment for everyone."[21]

The courts would be compelled to review the reasonableness or the fairness of every classification of rights, duties, privileges, immunities, benefits or disadvantages flowing from any law. Accordingly, it is necessary to identify the criteria that separate legitimate differentiation from differentiation that has crossed the border of constitutional impermissibility and is unequal or discriminatory "in the constitutional sense".[22]

[18] Even a cursory summary of international experience indicates that there are no universally accepted bright lines for determining whether or not an equality or non-discrimination right has been breached. The varying emphases given in different countries depend on a combination of the texts to be interpreted, modes of doctrinal articulation, historical backgrounds and evolving standards. Questions of institutional function and competence might play a role when reviewing, for example, legislation of a social and economic character.[23]

[19] In relation to the text and context of the interim Constitution, it would therefore seem that a simplistic transplantation from other countries into our equality jurisprudence of formulae, modes of classification or degrees of scrutiny, might create more problems than it solved. At the same time, we must be mindful of section 35(1) which states:

"Interpretation.

35. (1) In interpreting the provisions of this Chapter a court of law shall promote the values which underlie an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality . . ."

[20] Our country has diverse communities with different historical experiences and living conditions. Until recently, very many areas of public and private life were invaded by systematic legal separateness coupled with legally enforced advantage and disadvantage. The impact of structured and vast inequality is still with us despite the arrival of the new constitutional order. It is the majority, and not the minority, which has suffered from this legal separateness and disadvantage. While our country, unfortunately, has great experience in constitutionalising inequality, it is a newcomer when it comes to ensuring constitutional respect for equality. At the same time, South Africa shares patterns of inequality found all over the globe, so that any development of doctrine relating to section 8 would have to take account both of our specific situation and of the problems which our country shares with the rest of humanity. All this reinforces the idea that this Court should be astute not to lay down sweeping interpretations at this stage but should allow equality doctrine to develop slowly and, hopefully, surely. This is clearly an area where issues should be dealt with incrementally and on a case by case basis with special emphasis on the actual context in which each problem arises.

Canada, the United States of America, India and in international conventions and covenants.[24] That review concluded:

> ". . . that the various conventions and national constitutions are differently worded and that the interpretation of national constitutions, in particular, reflects different approaches to the concepts of equality and non-discrimination. The different approaches adopted in the different national jurisdictions arise not only from different textual provisions and from different historical circumstances, but also from different jurisprudential and philosophical understandings of equality."[25]

The Court emphasised that section 8 is the product of our own particular history, that perhaps more so than in the case of other provisions in Chapter 3 the interpretation of section 8 must be based on its own language and that our history was particularly relevant to the concept of equality.[26]

24 Supra n 10 at paras 34-9.

25 Id at para 39 per O'Regan J, a judgment concurred in by all the members of the Court.

26 Id at para 40. The preamble to the interim Constitution underlines the need for this approach.

[22] When section 8 is read as a whole it appears that the concept of equality is referred to in different ways. In section 8(1) it is described positively as a "right to equality before the law" and as a "right . . . to equal protection of the law". In section 8(2) it is formulated negatively: "No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly. . .". It may be neither desirable nor feasible to divide the various subsections or descriptions into watertight compartments. Nonetheless, it would appear that the right to "equality before the law" is concerned more particularly with entitling "everybody, at the very least, to equal treatment by our courts of law".[27] It makes clear that no-one is above or beneath the law and that all persons are subject to law impartially applied and administered. This right, or this aspect of the right guaranteed, does not apply to the present case.

[23] The idea of differentiation (to employ a neutral descriptive term) seems to lie at the heart of equality jurisprudence in general and of the section 8 right or rights in particular. Taking as comprehensive a view as possible of the way equality is treated in section 8, we would suggest that it deals with differentiation in basically two ways: differentiation which does not involve unfair discrimination and differentiation which does involve unfair discrimination. This needs some elaboration. We deal with the former first.

[24] It must be accepted that, in order to govern a modern country efficiently and to harmonise the interests of all its people for the common good, it is essential to regulate the affairs of its inhabitants extensively. It is impossible to do so without differentiation and without classifications which treat people differently and which impact on people differently. It is unnecessary to give examples which abound in everyday life in all democracies based on equality and freedom. Differentiation which falls into this category very rarely constitutes unfair discrimination in respect of persons subject to such regulation, without the addition of a further element. What this further element is will be considered later.

[25] It is convenient, for descriptive purposes, to refer to the differentiation presently under discussion as "mere differentiation". In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional state is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest "naked preferences"[28] that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional state. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the state is bound to function in a rational manner. This has been said to promote the need for governmental action to relate to a defensible vision of the public good,[29] as well as to enhance the coherence and integrity of

[26] Accordingly, before it can be said that mere differentiation infringes section 8 it must be established that there is no rational relationship between the differentiation in question and the governmental purpose which is proffered to validate it. In the absence of such rational relationship the differentiation would infringe section 8. But while the existence of such a rational relationship is a necessary condition for the differentiation not to infringe section 8, it is not a sufficient condition; for the differentiation might still constitute unfair discrimination if that further element, referred to above, is present.

[27] It is to section 8(2) that one must look in order to determine what this further element is. For reasons which will subsequently emerge it is unnecessary to consider the precise ambit or limits of this subsection. It is, however, clearly a section which deals not with all differentiation or even all discrimination but only with unfair discrimination. It does so by distinguishing between two forms of unfair discrimination and dealing with them differently.

[28] The first form relates to certain specifically enumerated grounds ("specified grounds") on the basis whereof no person may unfairly be discriminated against. The specified grounds are race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language. When there is prima facie proof of discrimination on these grounds it is presumed, in terms of subsection (4), that unfair discrimination has been sufficiently proved, until the contrary is established. These are not the only grounds which would constitute unfair discrimination. The words "without derogating from the generality of this provision", which introduce the specified grounds, make it clear that the specified grounds are not exhaustive. The second form is constituted by unfair discrimination on grounds which are not specified in the subsection. In regard to this second form there is no presumption in favour of unfairness.

[29] The question arises as to what grounds of discrimination this second form includes. A purely literal reading and application of the phrase "without derogating from the generality of this provision" would lead to the conclusion that discrimination on any ground whatsoever is proscribed, provided it is unfair. Such a reading would provide no guidance as to what unfair meant in regard to this second form of discrimination. It would provide very little, if any, guidance in deciding when a differentiation which passed the rational relationship threshold constituted unfair discrimination. It also seems unlikely that the content of the concept unfair discrimination would be left to unguided judicial judgment. We are of the view, however, that when read in its full historical and evolutionary context and in the light of the purpose of section 8 as a whole, and section 8(2) in particular, the second form of unfair discrimination cannot be given such an extremely wide and unstructured meaning.

[30] Proper weight must be given to the use of the word "discrimination" in subsection (2). The drafters of section 8 did not, for example, follow the model of the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States which, in paragraph 1 thereof, refers only to the denial of "the equal protection of the laws." Section 8(1) certainly positively enacts the encompassing and important right to "equality before the law and to equal protection of the law", but section 8 does not stop there. It goes further and in section 8(2) proscribes "unfair discrimination" in the two forms we have mentioned.

[31] The proscribed activity is not stated to be "unfair differentiation" but is stated to be "unfair discrimination". Given the history of this country we are of the view that "discrimination" has acquired a particular pejorative meaning relating to the unequal treatment of people based on attributes and characteristics attaching to them. We are emerging from a period of our history during which the humanity of the majority of the inhabitants of this country was denied. They were treated as not having inherent worth; as objects whose identities could be arbitrarily defined by those in power rather than as persons of infinite worth. In short, they were denied recognition of their inherent dignity.[32] Although one thinks in the first instance of discrimination on the grounds of race and ethnic origin one should never lose sight in any historical evaluation of other forms of discrimination such as that which has taken place on the grounds of sex and gender. In our view unfair discrimination, when used in this second form in section 8(2), in the context of section 8 as a whole, principally means treating persons differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, who are inherently equal in dignity.

[32] In Dworkin's words, the right to equality means the right to be treated as equals, which does not always mean the right to receive equal treatment.[33] We find support for the approach we advocate in the following passage from the judgment of this Court in The President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo:

> "At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked."[34]

> "This court has recognized that inherent human dignity is at the heart of individual rights in a free and democratic society . . . More than any other right in the Charter, s.15 gives effect to this notion . . . Equality, as that concept is enshrined as a fundamental human right within s.15 of the Charter, means nothing if it does not represent a commitment to recognizing each person's equal worth as a human being, regardless of individual differences. Equality means that our society cannot tolerate legislative distinctions that treat certain people as second-class citizens, that demean them, that treat them as less capable for no good reason, or that otherwise offend fundamental human dignity."[36]

[33] Where discrimination results in treating persons differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, it will clearly be a breach of section 8(2). Other forms of differentiation, which in some other way affect persons adversely in a comparably serious manner, may well constitute a breach of section 8(2) as well. It is not necessary to say more than this in the present case, for reasons which emerge later in this judgment.[37]

against unfair discrimination. The question whether, and to what extent, the protection of section 8 may be invoked by juristic persons has also been considered. None of these cases has been concerned with the constitutionality of a statutory onus provision in civil cases. Nor has an attempt been made in any of them to conduct a comprehensive analysis of the proper interpretation of section 8 and in particular the relationship between section 8(1) and 8(2). It therefore does not seem necessary for us to consider or comment on any of them individually.

[35] Turning now to the case before us, it is necessary in the first place to enquire whether the necessary rational relationship exists between the purpose sought to be achieved by section 84 of the Act and the means sought to achieve it. The objectives of the Act as set out in the long title, are "[t]o provide for . . . the prevention and combating of veld, forest and mountain fires; . . . and matters connected therewith." In essence, applicant contended that section 84 lacked rationality because it did not use the least onerous means of achieving its objectives. This approach, however, is based on two misconceptions. First, the applicant is prematurely importing a criterion for justification into a test to be applied at the infringement enquiry (definitional or threshold) stage. The question of whether the legislation could have been tailored in a different and more acceptable way is relevant to the issue of justification, but irrelevant to the question of whether there is a sufficient relationship between the means chosen and the end sought, for purposes of the present enquiry. Second, underlying the argument is an assumption that somehow there should be a "presumption of innocence" in civil matters as weighty and untouchable as that in criminal cases, so that a reverse onus in a civil matter should be as vulnerable to impeachment as one in a criminal trial.

[36] In regard to the first misconception, a person seeking to impugn the constitutionality of a legislative classification cannot simply rely on the fact that the state objective could have been achieved in a better way. As long as there is a rational relationship between the method and object it is irrelevant that the object could have been achieved in a different way. In any civil case, one of the parties will have to bear the onus on each of the factual matters material to the adjudication of the dispute. So, in the case of an aquilian claim for damages arising from a veld fire, one of the parties will bear the onus concerning negligence. As long as the imposition of the onus is not arbitrary, there will be no breach of section 8(1). In rare circumstances, it may be that the allocation of onus will impair other constitutional rights and a challenge will then arise. That is not the case here.

[37] In regard to the second misconception, an onus in a civil case cannot be equated with the overall onus of proof in criminal cases. In Mabaso v Felix[38] the Appellate Division described the fundamental difference between the incidence of the onus of proof in civil and criminal cases in the context of assault as follows:

> "In its anxiety that no accused should be punished for a crime without proof of his guilt our common law deliberately places the burden of proving every disputed issue, save insanity, on the prosecution. But in civil law . . . considerations of policy, practice, and fairness inter partes may require that the defendant should bear the overall onus of averring and proving an excuse or justification for his otherwise wrongful conduct."[39]

[38] There is indeed nothing rigid or unchanging in relation to the question of the incidence of the onus of proof in civil matters, no established "golden thread" like the presumption of innocence that runs through criminal trials.[40] As Davis AJA, quoting Wigmore, put it:

> ". . . all rules dealing with the subject of the burden of proof rest 'for their ultimate basis upon broad and undefined reasons of experience and fairness.'"[41]

As long as the rules relating to the onus are rationally based, therefore, no constitutional challenge in terms of section 8 will arise.

[39] The purpose of the Act is to prevent veld fires. There can be no doubt that the State has a legitimate and strong interest in preventing veld, forest and mountain fires. It has chosen to fulfil its responsibility by means of the scheme set out in the opening paragraph of this judgment. In fire control areas there is compulsory participation in schemes to prevent fires spreading, involving shared information, planning and execution.[42] Specific statutory duties are imposed with prescribed penalties for disobedience.[43]

[40] In non-controlled areas, on the other hand, there are opportunities for joint management on a voluntary basis only, with no obligation, and no necessity for shared management and pooled knowledge.[44] Persons are left in the dark as to what steps their neighbours have taken to avert fires. The causes of the fire and its spread will often be peculiarly within the knowledge of the neighbour. The specific duties imposed on landowners in fire control areas are accordingly counterbalanced by the general inducement contained in section 84 for those responsible for land in non-controlled areas to be specially vigilant lest they find themselves saddled with responsibility for damage caused by fire spreading from their land. The purpose of section 23 of Act 72 of 1968, the predecessor of the present section 84, was identified by Fannin J as follows:

> "It was argued on behalf of the plaintiff that the presumption was created in recognition of the peculiar difficulties faced by a person who suffers damage as a result of a fire whose origin he may be wholly unable to establish, and of the fact that, in most cases, if not all, a person from whose land a fire spreads will be in a much better position to show how and where the fire originated, whether it was lit by himself or by anyone for whose acts he is in law responsible and the manner in which the fire was dealt with, if at all, by him or by his servants or agents. This, I think, is undoubtedly correct. Furthermore, a person who has suffered as a result of a fire which has come from another's land will often not be in a position to embark upon any investigation as to the origin or cause of the fire, and will certainly have no right to enter upon that land to conduct any such investigation. That such difficulties in relation to fires have long been recognised appears from a perusal of Voet, 9.2.20, which however relates to fires in buildings."[45]

In our view, there can be no doubt that a rational relationship is demonstrated between the purpose sought to be achieved by section 84 and the means chosen.

[41] This does not end the matter, because despite the existence of the aforementioned rational relationship between means and purpose, the particular differentiation might still constitute unfair discrimination under the second form of unfair discrimination mentioned in section 8(2). The regulation effected by section 84 in the present case differentiates between owners and occupiers of land in fire control areas and those who own or occupy land outside such areas.

[45] Quathlamba (Pty.) Ltd. v Minister of Forestry 1972 (2) SA 783 (N) at 788B-D.

Such differentiation cannot, by any stretch of the imagination, be seen as impairing the dignity of the owner or occupier of land outside the fire control area. There is likewise no basis for concluding that the differentiation in some other invidious way adversely affects such owner or occupier in a comparably serious manner. It is clearly a regulatory matter to be adjudged according to whether or not there is a rational relationship between the differentiation enacted by section 84 and the purpose sought to be achieved by the Act. We have decided that such a relationship exists. Accordingly, no breach of section 8(1) or (2) has been established.

CONCLUSION

[42] In the result the applicant has not established that section 84 of the Act is in any way inconsistent with the provisions of section 8(1) or (2) or section 25(3)(c) of the interim Constitution. The case should accordingly be referred back to the Transvaal Provincial Division of the High Court. No order for costs was asked for, indeed counsel specifically agreed that none should be made, and there is no reason to make one.

[43] ORDER

1. It is declared that the provisions of section 84 of the Forestry Act 122 of 1984 are not inconsistent with the interim Constitution.
2. The case is referred back to the Transvaal Provincial Division of the High Court to be dealt with in the light of this judgment.

DIDCOTT J:

[44] The point that has been put to us for our ruling on it in these civil proceedings concerns section 84 of the Forest Act (122 of 1984), which decrees that:

> "When in any action by virtue of the provisions of this Act or the common law the question of negligence in respect of a veld, forest or mountain fire which occurred on land situated outside a fire control area arises, negligence is presumed, until the contrary is proved."

The section has been invoked in the present litigation, an action awaiting trial before the Transvaal Provincial Division of the Supreme Court, or of the High Court as it is now called, where damages are claimed at common law for the burning by a veld fire of the plaintiff's orchards and pasturage. The fire occurred outside a fire control area. It started on, or ran at all events across, land owned and controlled by the defendant. It then spread to the plaintiff's adjoining farm. The defendant is blamed for the destruction that it wrought there. He or his servants, acting in the course of their employment by him, are said to have caused that by their negligence. The effect of the section in all those circumstances, if it survives our adjudication on it, will be to load him with the burden of disproving such negligence when the action goes to trial. He contends that the section fell foul of the interim Constitution (Act 200 of 1993), however, which was in force when the proceedings began and continues to govern them.[1] Whether the section was so hit is what we must now decide.

[45] The main ground on which the defendant bases his contention is the store that he sets by section 25(3)(c) of the interim Constitution. No part of that touched civil matters. It dealt only with criminal prosecutions. The right to a fair trial was guaranteed by subsection (3), but explicitly and solely to persons accused of crimes. Paragraph (c) then proclaimed the presumption of innocence and the privilege of silence as particular features of that general right, and therefore as those enjoyable under it by such persons alone.[2] Counsel who represented the defendant maintained that subsection (3)(c) was nevertheless pertinent to the present proceedings. His argument went like this. Section 84 covered all matters indiscriminately, embracing civil and criminal ones alike. It was constitutionally objectionable in its application to criminal cases, since there it provided for a reverse onus of the kind which, on the very strength of subsection (3)(c), we had condemned in comparable situations posed on several earlier occasions, holding that the reversal violated the presumption of innocence. The defect tainted the entire section. It was consequently invalid as a whole, and thus in a civil as well as a criminal setting.

[46] The statute creates a host of crimes and a wide variety also. Negligence is specified as an element of merely one which has caught my eye, that emerging from section 75(2)(b)(iii). But it may well become a material factor elsewhere too. The additional offences that I have in mind are any requiring mens rea for their commission where culpa serves that purpose. Room of one size or another could accordingly have been found for the accommodation within section 84 of criminal prosecutions.

[47] Whether the space was filled is a different matter. That sounds doubtful, to say the least. Section 84 speaks of "any action", not of "any proceedings" as its statutory predecessors did in section 23 of the Forest Act (72 of 1968) and section 26 of the Forest and Veld Conservation Act (13 of 1941). The word "action", when used with reference to forms of legal procedure, denotes in common parlance the civil type. One does not normally describe a criminal prosecution as an "action", and we were told of no other legislation which had attached that label to any. Nor have I managed to find a single reported case where section 84 has been brought to bear on criminal proceedings. The current statute seems itself, I mention in parenthesis, to recognise the distinction in terminology. For section 83(1), which enacts its own separate presumption, applies that specifically to every "prosecution for an offence". The defendant's counsel drew our attention to the word "geding", which appeared in the Afrikaans text of section 84 as the counterpart to "action" and tended to have broader connotations. The English text was the one signed. But that is not a conclusive consideration. The Afrikaans version remains relevant, even so, to the interpretation of the section. Yet it takes the matter no further. The reason is a helpful rule of statutory construction catering for the situation that we have here, where the one text happens to be couched in terms which are wider than but encompass those of the other. The texts must then be reconciled, ordinarily at any rate and especially when they impose fresh burdens, by attributing to the legislation the narrower meaning, since that is the denominator common to both.[3] It follows that, if the English version envisages nothing but a civil "action", the rule requires "geding" to be read in the same way so that the two words may match each other.

[48] Let us suppose, however, that "action" like "geding" is a word quite capable in such a context of identifying either a civil one alone or any legal proceedings, including the criminal sort, and furthermore that their interpretation in that second and wider sense, if chosen, would result in the incompatibility of section 84 with section 25(3)(c). Another rule of statutory construction would then come into play and eliminate the choice, a special rule which section 35(2) of the interim Constitution dictated when, with regard to the Chapter containing section 25(3)(c), it stipulated that:

So that rule too would enjoin us, on the supposition which I have made, to avoid a clash between section 84 and section 25(3)(c) by putting on both words the interpretation that restricted their ambit to civil cases only.

[49] Nor, in any event, would the defendant's case have prospered from the success of his counsel in persuading us that section 84 did cover criminal prosecutions and collided with section 25(3)(c) by doing so. A declaration of nullity that dealt solely with the application of section 84 to those particular proceedings would then have been the maximum that he could obtain. For section 98(5) of the interim Constitution empowered us to go no further in condemning any law than its invalidation "to the extent of its inconsistency" with a constitutional command.[4] The defendant's lack of any apparent interest in the grant of relief so circumscribed would have disqualified him, what is more, from gaining even that.

[50] We need not decide in the end, I believe, whether section 84 purports to affect criminal trials and, if it does, whether section 25(3)(c) forbade that. I say so because, in my opinion, the reliance placed on that section has no merit on any footing and the main argument advanced on behalf of the defendant must therefore be rejected.

[51] An alternative objection which the defendant has taken to section 84 then enters the picture. He protests that its regulation of the civil actions to which it applies, when viewed on their own, was repugnant to section 8 of the interim Constitution. That section entrenched the right of every person to enjoy "equality before the law", to be afforded the "equal protection of the law", and not to be "unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly".[5] The discrimination and inequality now asserted is said to lie in the differentiation between defendants engaged in actions that are governed by section 84 and those involved in all other delictual cases casting no onus of proof on them, to the disadvantage and detriment of the former category.

[52] Complaints about discrimination and inequality have been heard frequently in the attacks launched here on statutory provisions since we began our work two years ago. We have found it unnecessary to deal with the point on some occasions, either because jurisdictional or procedural obstacles to its consideration were insuperable or because separate constitutional challenges succeeded. On others we have disposed of it. The complaint failed in S v Rens.[6] It was upheld in S v Ntuli,[7] in Brink v Kitshoff NO[8] and in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, and Others.[9] Not even then, however, have we yet developed a complete and coherent jurisprudence on the subject of equality. Sooner or later, no doubt, we shall have to enunciate one. But so complex, so subtle and so delicate a task ought not to be undertaken in a case inappropriate for it. We may otherwise overlook nuances and implications of the principle to which our thoughts are not immediately attuned. I do not regard the present case as a suitable opportunity for any such general endeavour. It suffices for our purposes there, I consider, to say no more than this. Mere differentiation can never amount, in itself and on its own, to discrimination or unequal treatment in the constitutional sense. The law differentiates between categories of people on innumerable scores which sound unobjectionable and may often be unavoidable. A few examples that spring to mind straight away are their levels of income at which the rate of the tax assessed on that is fixed, their ages when or the length of their employment before pensions become payable to them, and the criteria for their entitlement to the benefits of social welfare. What surely counts at least in those and all other instances of differentiation is always how rational in its basis, nature, scope and objectives the particular one appears to be, and sometimes how fair it also looks in those respects. It follows that I cannot imagine our denunciation of any differentiation which we evaluated as both fair and rational.

[53] In appraising the differentiation assailed by the defendant we had better try at first to get some clarity in our minds on what section 84 means when, alluding to the set of circumstances which puts into operation the presumption and its accompanying switch in the onus of proof, it describes that as the one where "the question of negligence . . . arises". The same vague phrase appeared in both section 26 of the 1941 statute and section 23 of the 1968 successor to that, and its scarcely informative use became a topic of judicial discussion in those days. Watermeyer J had this to say about section 26 in Van Wyk v Hermanus Municipality:[10]

> "It may well be, but I express no opinion on the point, that the wide meaning of the section has to be cut down in some way so as to make it operate only where there is some nexus between the fire and the person alleged to have been negligent, but if so there was in my opinion a sufficiently close nexus shown in the present case arising from the fact that the defendant was the owner, and in control, of the land upon which the fire burned, and that its servants were in attendance and attempted to extinguish it."

That passage struck Fannin J in Quathlamba (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Forestry[11] as "a useful start to the search for the answers to the questions . . . posed". Referring to section 23, the one in force by that time, his judgment then commented and elaborated on the ideas which Watermeyer J had voiced by continuing thus:[12]

> "The section does not provide that whenever negligence is alleged in any proceedings, negligence shall be presumed. The use of the word 'arises' instead of the verb 'is alleged' does, I think, provide some justification for the suggestion made by Watermeyer J, for it can hardly be said that any question of negligence in respect of a fire will really arise if there is no connection or nexus shown to have existed between the fire and the person sought to be fixed with responsibility for it. But it may be argued with some force, I think, that to require only some nexus is not enough, for unless the nexus between the fire and the person alleged to have been negligent is such as to be at the least consistent with negligence, the plaintiff will have taken the matter no further than if he had merely alleged negligence and done no more. I would prefer, therefore, to suggest that 'the question of negligence' in respect of veld or forest fires can be said properly 'to arise' in any proceedings only where-
> (a) negligence is alleged against a party to such proceedings; and
> (b) the party making such allegation has established a nexus or connection, between the fire and the party against whom the allegation is made, which is consistent with such negligence.

Thus where, as here, negligence is alleged against a defendant in civil proceedings and the fire is shown to have spread from the defendant's property, the presumption created by the section comes into operation against the defendant."

The case went on appeal under the name of Minister of Forestry v Quathlamba (Pty) Ltd.[13] Ogilvie Thompson CJ, whose judgment was the sole one delivered then, did not react in so many words to the manner in which Fannin J had approached and treated the problem. What he in turn said instead follows:[14]

"Manifestly the presumption created by the section cannot be invoked merely by averring negligence, without anything more. The contesting submissions of the parties centre around what additional averment or proof is required of a plaintiff to entitle him to call the presumption in aid. More specifically, the real enquiry is whether or not the terms of the section embrace the duty of care. For defendant it was argued that, inasmuch as negligence is the breach of a legal duty, no 'question of negligence arises' unless and until the particular duty of care which a plaintiff claims to have been breached is first established. Counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, submitted that both the duty of care and the breach thereof fall within the ambit of the section . . . . I do not find it necessary for the decision of this appeal to pursue counsel's above-mentioned conflicting submissions. For . . . the circumstances that the fire . . . was not shown to have been started by any servant of the defendant, or indeed by any human agency, does not in my opinion by itself relieve the defendant of responsibility for the damage sustained by plaintiff. Consequently, the latter's averments of negligence in relation to the fire which caused it damage, coupled with proof that the fire . . . emanated from (and also originated upon) landed property owned and controlled by defendant, sufficed, in my judgment, to bring the case within the ambit of section 23. The effect of this was that the onus thereafter rested upon defendant to show either that in the particular circumstances harm to plaintiff was not, and could not reasonably have been, foreseen or, alternatively, that, notwithstanding the exercise by him of such care as the circumstances reasonably required, defendant could not prevent the fire from extending beyond the boundaries of > its (sic) property and occasioning harm to plaintiff."

The somewhat different ways in which the two Quathlamba judgments had handled section 23 were considered in three subsequent cases. Leon J expressed the opinion in Titlestad v Minister of Water Affairs[15] that the judgment of Fannin J had been "substantially upheld" by Ogilvie Thompson CJ "with regard to the proper interpretation of section 23". So did Kannemeyer JP in Louw and Others v Long.[16] Nestadt JA, on the other hand, took this contrary view in Steenberg v De Kaap Timber (Pty) Ltd:[17]

> "Ogilvie Thompson CJ affirmed the principle that the presumption cannot be invoked merely by averring negligence. The learned Chief Justice did not, however, adopt the approach of Fannin J. It was simply held that the additional element required could be satisfied by proof that the fire originated upon land owned and controlled by the defendant."

[54] I am not sure about the correct classification of the enquiry into when and how "the question of negligence . . . arises", whether the ascertainment of that depends at its heart on the interpretation of those words or, as Ogilvie Thompson CJ seems to have considered, on their judicial application in each case to its own particular facts. Neither Quathlamba judgment, one then notices, went beyond the facts of that matter by indicating what circumstances, apart from the defendant's ownership and control of the land from which the fire had come, would or might augment the bare allegation of negligence sufficiently to trigger the presumption and its consequence. Nor am I aware of any judicial pronouncement since then which has shed further or fresh light on the difficulties encountered elsewhere in determining how the question of negligence could rightly be thought in the past to arise for the purposes of sections 26 and 23 and can truly be said to do so now for those of section 84. That problem is obviously not posed by the present case, seen in isolation. For here the defendant did own and control the land from which the fire spread to the plaintiff's farm, with the result that both Quathlamba judgments hit him. We are concerned in this investigation, however, not with the application of the presumption to any individual matter, but in principle with its general operation. Questions potentially relevant to our deliberations at that level are whether, if the necessary process is one of interpretation, section 35(2)[18] requires us to construe section 84 restrictively on the aspect of it scrutinised now and whether, if that is not the true area of enquiry, the circumstances setting the presumption in motion can and must be defined more narrowly than they were by either Ogilvie Thompson CJ or Fannin J. But those questions do not present themselves at this stage. They will become pertinent to our decision only if and when we conclude eventually that, with the effect attributed in the Quathlamba case to its precursor, the section is unconstitutional on the grounds of the second objection to it which the defendant has lodged.

[55] Something must next be said generally about the onus of proof in civil actions, and especially about its location there, so that we may then proceed to focus within that field on the import of section 84. Wigmore wrote in his treatise on Evidence:[19]

> "The characteristic . . . of this burden of proof (in the sense of a risk of nonpersuasion) in legal controversies is that the law divides the process into stages and apportions definitely to each party the specific facts which will in turn fall to him as the prerequisites of obtaining action in his favor by the tribunal. It is this apportionment which forms the important element of controversy for legal purposes. Each party wishes to know of what facts he has the risk of nonpersuasion. By what considerations is this apportionment determined? Is there any single principle or rule which will solve all > cases and afford a general test for ascertaining the incidence of this risk? By no means. It is often said that the burden is upon the party having in form the affirmative allegation. But this is not an invariable test, nor even always a significant circumstance; the burden is often on one who has a negative assertion to prove . . . . It is sometimes said that it is upon the party to whose case the fact is essential. This is correct enough, but it merely advances the inquiry one step; we must then ask whether there is any general principle which determines to what party's case a fact is essential. Still another consideration has often been advanced as a special test for solving a limited class of cases, ie the burden of proving a fact is said to be put on the party who presumably has peculiar means of knowledge enabling him to prove its falsity if it is false . . . . But this consideration furnishes no universal working rule . . . . This consideration, after all, merely takes its place among other considerations of fairness and experience as a most important one to be kept in mind in apportioning the burden of proof in a specific case. The truth is that there is not and cannot be any one general solvent for all cases. It is merely a question of policy and fairness based on experience in the different situations . . . . There is . . . no one principle, or set of harmonious principles, which afford a sure and universal test for the solution of a given class of cases. The logic of the situation does not demand such a test; it would be useless to attempt to discover or to invent one; and the state of the law does not justify us in saying that it has accepted any. There are merely specific rules for specific classes of cases, resting for their ultimate basis upon broad reasons of experience and fairness."

I have quoted at length from the book because the state of affairs existing in South Africa echoes exactly, in all its force and resonance, that description of the American one. Our common law likewise contains no comprehensive rule on the onus of proof in civil proceedings which is inflexibly free from exceptions. Here too the onus does not always lie upon the plaintiff asserting a claim but, on issues peculiar to the nature of the case, is sometimes borne by the defendant in his or her resistance to that. One thinks, for instance, of the issues raised when self-defence is pleaded in answer to a claim for damages suffered as the result of an assault, when a contract admitted or proved is said in an action for its enforcement to have been cancelled or novated, when some special defence is presented as a means of escape from liability on a bill of exchange, and when a host of other situations arise in which confessions and avoidances are familiar. Hoffmann and Zeffertt have discussed the topic in their South African Law of Evidence,[20] furnishing further examples of an onus placed on the defendant in this country and commenting on the lack of any general theory or policy to account for that site of it which seems logical, coherent and consistent. It is therefore no surprise to see that the sentences in earlier editions of Wigmore's work which are matched by the parts of my excerpt from the current one appearing in italics have been reproduced or paraphrased with approval by judges of our Appellate Division, the first passage in Mabaso v Felix[21] and the second in Pillay v Krishna and Another[22] and Nydoo en Andere v Vengtas.[23] of the causes, origins and progress of such fires when they occurred beyond the strict supervision inside fire control areas that was planned. The position of the same defendants was apparently thought in addition to be distinguishable, on the whole, from that occupied by other defendants opposing delictual claims, the general run of those in the first place and the particular group in the second who were blamed for fires that had started on or emanated from land lying within fire control areas. For no comparably peculiar knowledge or sources of information about the detailed causation of the harmful incidents resulting in the litigation could realistically be imputed, as a rule, to so vast and amorphous a category of defendants as the first lot. That goes without saying, given the infinite variety of circumstances relevant to the suits brought against them. Nor, when it came to the second category of defendants, would a prima facie responsibility imposed upon them have been warranted in the conditions prevailing throughout the controlled areas, where fire protection schemes operated, where measures devised to prevent conflagrations and their spread were in force, and where compliance with those was both compulsory and verifiable. That is a situation quite unlike the sort encountered elsewhere in which individual landowners are largely left to take their own precautions and they alone know what has or has not been done in that connection. We may agree or disagree, as we prefer, with the generality of those beliefs or with the way in which effect was given to them. But the assessment was one falling well within the zone of an essentially legislative judgment. I can find no substance whatsoever in the suggestion that the reaction of Parliament to the scene which it saw was either unfair or irrational once that is viewed in the light of the Quathlamba decisions. It follows, in my opinion, that on this leg of the course the defendant has fallen at the first hurdle.

[57] Two questions which my judgment leaves open, and a couple of possibilities occurring to me that it does not dismiss, will be mentioned in conclusion. The first question concerns the relationship between our constitutional provisions proclaiming the right to equality before and the equal protection of the law on the one hand and prohibiting unfair discrimination on the other.[24] It is whether the prohibition forms a corollary to the right which amplifies that or an independent and self-contained provision.[25] The second question asks whether the criterion of rationality suits the right alone while the one of fairness fits only the prohibition, or whether both criteria are apt for each. Neither question needs to be decided for the time being, since the defendant's case must fail irrespective of the true answer to it. I have accordingly tried to express myself in a manner which avoids suggesting a definite stance taken yet on either point. The possibilities to which I have referred, merely hypothetical ones at present, are these. The right to equality and the prohibition against unfair discrimination may well have an impact on the civil onus of proof in the highly imaginary situation where a class of litigants is generally saddled with or freed from the burden on account of their personal identities, and with no regard to the exigencies of any particular litigation or to the equipment for such of those persons or institutions. A civil onus may also be vulnerable to attack outside the perimeters of that right and prohibition, and on grounds laid elsewhere by the bill of rights,[26] once its incidence impedes the enforcement or defence of any other right entrenched there. Neither possibility is elevated by this case, however, to a real one. To expatiate on either is therefore unnecessary now.

[58] In the result I concur in the grant of the order which Ackermann J, O'Regan J and Sachs J propose in their joint judgment, the final draft of which I have read since writing this one of mine. The two judgments differ sometimes in their approach to the issues canvassed, in their emphasis and in the extent to which they elaborate on their reasoning, but not otherwise as far as I can see. The clearest difference is visible where I have felt able to reach a confident conclusion on the second part of the case without analysing in similar detail either the concepts of equality and non-discrimination or their constitutional interaction. I do not dissent, however, from the opinions which my colleagues have expressed on those points. And I had better add, since nothing has yet been said by me about the referral, that I share the view of that taken by them.

JUDGMENT

GOLDSTONE J:

Introduction

[1] In this case the constitutionality of certain provisions of the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936, as amended ("the Act"), comes before us by way of a referral from Farlam J in the Cape of Good Hope Provincial High Court[1] made in terms of section 102(1) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ("the interim Constitution").

1 Harksen v Lane & Others (C) Case No 16552/96, 25 March 1997, unreported.

[2] The referral came about in consequence of the sequestration of the estate of Mr Jürgen Harksen ("Mr Harksen"). The final sequestration order was granted in the Cape of Good Hope Provincial Division of the Supreme Court (as it then was) on 16 October 1995. The applicant in these proceedings, Mrs Jeanette Harksen ("Mrs Harksen"), was at that time married out of community of property to Mr Harksen. The first and second respondents are the trustees in the insolvent estate of Mr Harksen ("the trustees"). The third respondent is the Master of the Cape of Good Hope Provincial High Court ("the Master"). The fourth respondent is the Minister of Justice ("the Minister").

[3] There was no appearance in this Court on behalf of the trustees, the Master or the Minister. We were informed by the trustees that there were insufficient funds in the insolvent estate to allow them to brief counsel. They, as did the other respondents, informed the Court that they will abide its decision on the questions referred to it. Mr W Trengove SC and Mr D Spitz appeared on behalf of an amicus curiae, the Council of South African Banks. We are indebted to the amicus, and especially to its counsel, for the most helpful heads of argument they filed and oral submissions they made at the hearing of the referral.

> "This Constitution shall be the supreme law of the Republic and any law or act > inconsistent with its provisions shall, unless otherwise provided expressly or by necessary implication in this Constitution, be of no force and effect to the extent of the inconsistency."

Section 7(2) provided that:

> "This Chapter shall apply to all law in force . . . during the period of operation of this Constitution."

In accordance with these sections any provision of a law inconsistent with the bill of rights became invalid and of no force and effect upon the coming into operation of the interim Constitution.[2]

[5] The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 ("the 1996 Constitution") came into force on 4 February 1997. Although the matter was referred to this Court on 25 March 1997, the application for the referral was launched on 18 December 1996, prior to the coming into operation of the l996 Constitution. It was therefore "pending" on the date on which the 1996 Constitution came into operation. Item 17 of schedule 6 to the 1996 Constitution provides that:

2 Ferreira v Levin NO and Others; Vryenhoek and Others v Powell NO and Others 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC); 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 28.

> "All proceedings which were pending before a court when the new Constitution took effect, must be disposed of as if the new Constitution had not been enacted, unless the interests of justice require otherwise."

[6] In the present case it was accepted by counsel that there were no "interests of justice" which required the referral to be decided in accordance with the 1996 Constitution. I can find no ground for holding that such interests obtain in this case. It follows that the provisions and procedures of the interim Constitution apply to the matter referred and the constitutionality of the impugned sections must be decided with reference thereto.

The Relevant Provisions of the Act

[7] In this case the sections of the Act which are impugned are sections 21, 64 and 65. They are alleged to be inconsistent with certain provisions of the bill of rights to the extent that they impact on the property and affairs of a solvent spouse upon the sequestration of the estate of an insolvent spouse. At the outset, it is convenient to set out the relevant provisions of the Act.

[8] In terms of section 20(1) of the Act, the effect of the sequestration of the estate of an insolvent is to divest the insolvent of his or her estate and to vest it in the Master until a trustee has been appointed. Thereafter the estate vests in the trustee. Section 21(1) of the Act provides:

> "The additional effect of the sequestration of the separate estate of one of two spouses who are not living apart under a judicial order of separation shall be to vest in the Master, until a trustee has been appointed, and, upon the appointment of a trustee, to vest in him all the property (including property or the proceeds thereof which are in the hands of a sheriff or a messenger under a writ of attachment) of the spouse whose estate has not been sequestrated (hereinafter referred to as the solvent spouse) as if it were property of the sequestrated estate, and to empower the Master or trustee to deal with such property accordingly, but subject to the following provisions of this section."

There then follow a number of provisions[3] which are designed to protect the legitimate interests of the solvent spouse.

[9] In terms of the section[4] "spouse" refers not only to a wife or husband in the legal sense but also to a wife or husband married according to any law or custom, as well as women and men living with each other as if they were married.

[10] Section 21(2) provides that once the solvent spouse proves that his or her property falls into one of the following categories, the trustee shall release it:

(a) property of the solvent spouse acquired before her or his marriage to the insolvent or before 1 October, 1926;

3 See ss 21(2), (3), (4) and (10).

4 Section 21(13).

(b) property acquired by the solvent spouse under a marriage settlement;

(c) property acquired by the solvent spouse during the marriage by a title valid as against creditors of the insolvent;

(d) those policies of life insurance which are protected by the provisions of the Insurance Act 27 of 1943;

(e) property acquired with, or with the income or proceeds of, property referred to above.

[11] The category of property acquired by the solvent spouse during the marriage by a title valid against creditors of the insolvent was substantially widened by section 22 of the Matrimonial Property Act 88 of 1984. In terms thereof, donations between spouses, formerly invalid, were made legal and therefore enforceable. Some of the effects of that development on section 21 of the Act were considered by Kriegler J in Snyman v Rheeder NO.[5] At the outset, the learned Judge referred to a passage from the judgment of Greenberg JP in Maudsley's Trustee v Maudsley.[6] Part of that passage reads as follows:

"Apart from authority I see no reason why the words 'title valid as against creditors' should have any special meaning, and why they should not mean a title which under the provisions of the law are so valid. In other words, there is nothing in sec. 21(c) which creates any new ground of validity or invalidity and all that is effected by sec. 21 in relation to property which is claimed by the solvent spouse to fall under sec. 21(c) is that the onus is cast on the spouse to prove the validity whereas under the law before 1926 the onus rested on the trustee to prove the invalidity. One knows that before the amendment of the law in 1926, it was a common practice for traders (and perhaps others) to seek to avoid payment of their debts by putting property in their wives' names; on insolvency the burden rested on the trustee to attack the wife's title. If sec. 21 is regarded as merely shifting the onus on to the solvent spouse, it nevertheless affords some relief in the direction of preventing the evil to which I have referred. If one goes further and interprets sec. 21 as creating new substantive grounds for attacking the property of a spouse, this would amount to depriving such spouse of the benefits of the law of marriage out of community of property, and in my opinion very clear wording would be required to effect this object."

Kriegler J went on to say at 505H - 506B:

"Ek meen dat die geleerde Regterpresident se opmerkings besonder van pas is nou dat die regsverbod teen skenkings tussen egliede opgehef is. Daar moet versigtig omgegaan word met gewysdes wat gehandel het met die eertydse regsposisie. Die toets is nou subtieler aangesien die ware doel met 'n skenking nou ook ondersoek moet word.

Artikel 21(2)(c) vereis steeds bewys van 'n regsgeldige titel. Die gesonde verstand verg nog steeds dat sodanige bewys wel deeglike bewys moet wees vanweë die aanspraakmaker se eksklusiewe kennis van die tersaaklike gegewens asook vanweë die verstaanbare versoeking tot verdoeseling. Maar 'n skenking kan nou sodanige titel verleen. Daar moet beklemtoon word dat die vereiste van goeie trou nog steeds bly staan. Dit moet 'n ware skenking wees. 'n Skyntransaksie sal nog steeds nie aan die solvente eggenoot 'n regsgeldige titel verleen nie. Die vraag of 'n egte skenking nietemin deur die bepalings van art 26, 29, 30 of 31 van die Insolvensiewet getref kan word en of dit 'n aanspraak ingevolge art 21(2)(c) gebaseer op 'n skenking sou kon fnuik, > hoef nie hier uitgemaak te word nie. Ook nie die moeiliker vraag of 'n skenking aangeveg kan word as 'n vervreemding sonder teenwaarde soos bedoel in art 26 van die Wet nie."

It is also unnecessary for the purpose of this judgment to consider these interesting questions referred to by Kriegler J which concern the relationship between section 21(2) and the provisions in the Act relating to dispositions by the insolvent which may be set aside under sections 26, 29, 30 and 31 of the Act.[7] What is now relevant is that since donations between spouses are no longer illegal the category of property which the solvent spouse may reclaim has been widened considerably.

[12] In terms of section 21(3), if the solvent spouse is in the Republic and the trustee is able to ascertain her or his address, the trustee may not, without the leave of the High Court, realize property which ostensibly belongs to the solvent spouse until the expiry of six weeks written notice to that spouse of his or her intention to do so. That notice must be published in the Government Gazette and a newspaper circulating in the district where the solvent spouse resides or carries on business. The notice must invite all separate creditors of that spouse to prove their claims in the insolvent estate. Section 21(5) makes provision for such creditors of the solvent spouse to share in the proceeds of such property in priority to the separate creditors of the insolvent estate. It should be emphasised that these provisions are intended, firstly, to protect the solvent spouse from a trustee alienating property in which that spouse has good title as against the creditors of the insolvent estate; and, secondly, to protect creditors of the solvent spouse who acted to their prejudice by dealing with the solvent spouse in respect of property ostensibly hers or his and in fact that of the insolvent spouse.

[7] Those sections relate to dispositions not made for value (s 26); those having the effect of preferring one creditor above another which constitute voidable preferences (s 29); those intended to prefer one creditor above another which constitute undue preferences (s 30); and those made in collusion with another person and having the effect of prejudicing creditors or preferring one above another (s 31). Creditors also have their common law right to have transactions made in fraud of their rights set aside (the actio Pauliana).

[13] Sections 21(4) and (10) make provision for judicial intervention to protect the property of the solvent spouse in certain circumstances. Section 21(4) reads thus:

> "The solvent spouse may apply to the court for an order releasing any property vested in the trustee of the insolvent estate under subsection (1) or for an order staying the sale of such property or, if it has already been sold, but the proceeds thereof not yet distributed among creditors, for an order declaring the applicant to be entitled to those proceeds; and the court may make such order on the application as it thinks just."

Section 21(10) makes provision for the High Court to order that property of the solvent spouse will not immediately vest in either the Master or the trustee if the solvent spouse is carrying on business as a trader, apart from the insolvent spouse, or if the solvent spouse is likely to suffer serious prejudice by reason of an immediate vesting. The court may make such an order for such period as it thinks fit only if it is satisfied that the solvent spouse is willing and able to make arrangements safeguarding the interest of the insolvent estate in such property. During that period the solvent spouse must prove her or his claim to the property. The trustee will then either release the property to the solvent spouse or, if it is not released, upon expiry of the period the property shall vest in the Master or the

[14] Finally, as far as section 21 is concerned, subsection (12) provides that if the trustee in error releases any property alleged to belong to the solvent spouse, he or she shall not be debarred from subsequently proving that it belongs to the insolvent estate and recovering it.

[15] In terms of section 16(1), the registrar of the court which grants a final order of sequestration shall cause a copy of the order to be served by the deputy sheriff on the solvent spouse, who, in terms of section 16(3), is obliged within seven days to lodge a statement of his or her affairs with the Master.[8]

[16] I turn now to consider the provisions of sections 64 and 65 of the Act. In terms of section 64(1), the insolvent must attend the first and second meetings of the creditors of the insolvent estate unless he or she has previously obtained written permission from the presiding officer to be absent. Such permission may be granted after consultation with the trustee.

8 Section 19 of the Act obliges the deputy sheriff to attach and seal the movable property of the insolvent estate immediately upon receiving a copy of the provisional sequestration order and to take into her or his possession all books and records of the insolvent. It would appear to me that these provisions do not apply to the property of the solvent spouse. Section 21(1) empowers the Master or trustee, and not a deputy sheriff, to deal with the property of the solvent spouse in accordance with the vesting of that property in them. Whereas the deputy sheriff is obliged to make an inventory of the insolvent's property on its attachment, the solvent spouse is only obliged to submit the inventory of his or her property within seven days of the notice referred to in s 16(1).

[17] Section 64(2) grants the presiding officer the authority to summon any person who is known or upon reasonable ground believed to be or to have been:

(a) in possession of any property which belonged to the insolvent, the insolvent's estate or to the spouse of the insolvent before or after the sequestration of his or her estate; or

(b) indebted to the estate.

[18] This includes the summoning of persons (including the insolvent's spouse) who in the opinion of the presiding officer may be able to give any material information concerning the business, affairs or property of the insolvent or the insolvent's spouse. This may pertain to the period before and after sequestration of the insolvent's estate.

[19] At such a meeting the presiding officer, the trustee and any creditor who has proved a claim against the estate, or the agent of any of them, may interrogate under oath any person so called concerning all matters relating to the property, business and affairs of the insolvent and his or her spouse in respect of the period before or after the sequestration of the estate. The presiding officer has the discretion to disallow questions which are either irrelevant or which may unnecessarily prolong proceedings.[9]

[20] Section 65(2) goes on to provide that persons summoned to produce books or documents may invoke the law relating to privilege as applicable to a witness summoned to produce a book or document or giving evidence in a court of law.

[21] In terms of section 65(2A)(a), the presiding officer shall order that where a person testifying is obliged to answer questions which may incriminate him or her, or where he or she is to be tried on a criminal charge and the evidence may prejudice him or her at such trial, the proceedings take place in camera. Moreover, no information regarding such questions and answers may be published in any manner whatsoever, nor may such answers be admissible in subsequent criminal proceedings, except where the criminal charges involve perjury.

[22] Section 66(2) of the Act empowers the presiding officer to commit to prison a person summoned to appear under section 64 who fails to do so without a reasonable excuse. Section 66(3) empowers the presiding officer to commit to prison, inter alia, any person who:

> "[R]efuses to answer any question lawfully put to him under the said section [section 65] or does not answer the question fully and satisfactorily".[10]

[10] In D M De Lange v F J Smuts NO and Others, unreported judgment of Conradie J in the Cape of Good Hope Provincial High Court delivered on 29 August 1997, the provisions of s 66(3) of the Act were held to be unconstitutional and invalid. In terms of s 167(5) of the 1996 Constitution, the judgment has been referred to this Court for confirmation of the order of invalidity.

> "Any person shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding R500 or to imprisonment without the option of a fine for a period not exceeding six months if he is guilty of an act or omission for which he has been or might have been lawfully committed to prison in terms of subsection (2) or (3) of section 66."

The legal effect and consequences of these provisions, to the extent that they are now relevant, will be considered below.

The Facts

[24] Pursuant to the statutory vesting of her property in the Master and then the trustees, the latter caused the property of Mrs Harksen to be attached. According to her statement of affairs, that property has a value of R6 120 352,50. None of it has been released by the trustees to Mrs Harksen and it would appear that no application for such release has been made by her.

[25] Mrs Harksen was summoned, under sections 64 and 65 of the Act, to subject herself to interrogation at the first meeting of the creditors in the insolvent estate of Mr Harksen, and to produce at the meeting:

> "all documentation relating to [her] financial affairs and the financial affairs of Jürgen Harksen."

For reasons not now pertinent, the magistrate who presided at the meeting of creditors set aside the summons. However, on 9 December 1996, Farlam J set aside the ruling of the magistrate and directed Mrs Harksen to subject herself to the interrogation and to produce the documents referred to in the summons.[11] That order precipitated the present proceedings impugning the constitutionality of section 21 of the Act and those portions of sections 64 and 65 that provide for enquiries into the estate, business, affairs or property of the spouse of an insolvent person.

Necessity to Exhaust Non-Constitutional Remedies

[26] It was submitted on behalf of the amicus curiae that the referral was not appropriate because Mrs Harksen had not exhausted her non-constitutional remedies. In this regard we were referred to the judgment of this Court in Motsepe v Commissioner for Inland Revenue.[12] At para 21, Ackermann J said:

> "The referral may very well be defective for another reason. This Court has laid down the general principle that 'where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed', and has applied this principle specifically to section 102(1) referrals and obiter to applications for direct access. On an objective assessment of the present case it was unnecessary to decide the constitutional issue because Mrs Motsepe could, by following > the objection and appeal procedures provided for in the Act, have avoided the barriers imposed by ss 92 and 94 of the Act and the sequestration application could have been decided in the light of the outcome of such procedures." (Footnote omitted)

12 1997 (2) SA 898 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 692 (CC). In that case, a taxpayer impugned the constitutionality of s 92 of the Income Tax Act 58 of 1962 which provides that it is incompetent for any person to question the correctness of a statement filed by the Commissioner for Inland Revenue under s 91(1)(b) of the Act where a taxpayer fails to pay tax due by her or him. That statement may be filed by the Commissioner in a court of competent jurisdiction and has the effect of a civil judgment (s 91(1)(b)). However, the statement does not preclude a taxpayer from lodging an objection and appeal against the assessment upon which the statement of the Commissioner is founded (ss 81, 83).

Neither in the Motsepe case nor in the decisions referred to by Ackermann J did this Court lay down any hard and fast rule to the effect that in no case should referrals be made to this Court where non-constitutional remedies have not been exhausted. In any event, the present case is distinguishable. In Motsepe there was no attack by the taxpayer upon the constitutionality of the objection and appeal procedures available, that is, the non-constitutional remedies. The only remedy open to Mrs Harksen for reversing the automatic vesting of her property in the trustees was to bring an application to court under section 21, one of the sections which she seeks to have declared unconstitutional. Furthermore she would have had to submit herself to interrogation under the other sections of the Act, which she now similarly seeks to impugn. This is therefore not a case in which there were in fact any non-constitutional remedies open to her. This objection to the referral is thus without merit.

[27] It will be convenient to consider initially the attack made on the constitutionality of section 21 of the Act. Thereafter I shall consider the objections directed at sections 64 and 65.

Section 21 of the Act

[28] On behalf of Mrs Harksen, her counsel, in impugning the constitutionality of section 21 of the Act, relied upon the provisions of both section 8 ("the equality clause") and section 28 ("the property clause") of the interim Constitution. I propose to consider the property clause first.

The Property Clause

[29] Section 28 of the interim Constitution provides as follows:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to acquire and hold rights in property and, to the extent that the nature of the rights permits, to dispose of such rights.
> (2) No deprivation of any rights in property shall be permitted otherwise than in accordance with a law.
> (3) Where any rights in property are expropriated pursuant to a law referred to in subsection (2), such expropriation shall be permissible for public purposes only and shall be subject to the payment of agreed compensation or, failing agreement, to the payment of such compensation and within such period as may be determined by a court of law as just and equitable, taking into account all relevant factors, including, in the case of the determination of compensation, the use to which the property is being put, the history of its acquisition, its market value, the value of the investments in it by those affected and the interests of those affected."

[30] The submission on behalf of Mrs Harksen was that the provisions of section 21(1) of the Act constitute an expropriation of the property of the solvent spouse without any provision for compensation as required by section 28(3). The starting point of the argument is that the vesting constitutes a transfer of ownership of the rights in the property of the solvent spouse to the Master and, on appointment, to the trustee.[13] Reliance was placed upon the decision of the Appellate Division in De Villiers NO v Delta Cables (Pty) Ltd.[14] In that case Van Heerden JA discussed at some length whether the vesting of the property of the solvent spouse in the Master or a trustee, in terms of section 21(1) of the Act, had the effect of transferring ownership in that property to them. As appears from the judgment,[15] it was found not to be necessary finally to decide that question. However, Van Heerden JA, with the concurrence of the other four members of the court, expressed the firm view that full ownership in the solvent spouse's property did in fact pass to the trustee of the insolvent estate. For the purpose of this judgment I shall assume that to be the effect of section 21.

13 The ordinary meaning of the word "vests" connotes the acquisition of ownership. See Jewish Colonial Trust Ltd v Estate Nathan 1940 AD 163 at 175. Also, s 21(1) states that property of a solvent spouse so vests "as if it were property of the sequestrated estate".

[31] The word "expropriate" is generally used in our law to describe the process whereby a public authority takes property (usually immovable) for a public purpose and usually against payment of compensation.[16] Whilst expropriation constitutes a form of deprivation of property, section 28 makes a distinction between deprivation of rights in property, on the one hand (subsection (2)), and expropriation of rights in property, on the other (subsection (3)). Section 28(2) states that no deprivation of rights in property is permitted otherwise than in accordance with a law.[17] Section 28(3) sets out further requirements which need to be met for expropriation, namely, that the expropriation must be for a public purpose and against payment of compensation.

[32] The distinction between expropriation (or compulsory acquisition as it is called in some other foreign jurisdictions) which involves acquisition of rights in property by a public authority for a public purpose and the deprivation of rights in property which fall short of compulsory acquisition has long been recognised in our law. In Beckenstrater v Sand River Irrigation Board,[18] Trollip J said:

> "[T]he ordinary meaning of 'expropriate' is 'to dispossess of ownership, to deprive of 17 It is not necessary now to consider or decide the meaning of "a law" as used in this context and its relationship to the other provisions of the bill of rights.

> property' (see e.g. Minister of Defence v. Commercial Properties Ltd. and Others, 1955 (3) S.A. 324 (N) at p. 327G); but in statutory provisions, like secs. 60 and 94 of the Water Act, it is generally used in a wider sense as meaning not only dispossession or deprivation but also appropriation by the expropriator of the particular right, and abatement or extinction, as the case may be, of any other existing right held by another which is inconsistent with the appropriated right. That is the effect of cases like Stellenbosch Divisional Council v. Shapiro, 1953 (3) S.A. 418 (C) at pp. 422-3, 424; S.A.R. & H. v. Registrar of Deeds, 1919 N.P.D. 66; Kent, N.O. v. S.A.R. & H., 1946 A.D. 398 at pp. 405-6; and Minister van Waterwese v. Mostert and Others, 1964 (2) S.A. 656 (A.D.) at pp. 666-7."

[33] The Zimbabwean Constitution also provides that property may not be compulsorily acquired, save under a law which requires the acquiring authority to pay fair compensation.[19] In Hewlett v Minister of Finance and Another,[20] Fieldsend CJ considered the meaning of "acquire" in those sections of the Constitution. He referred[21] to the following dictum of Innes CJ in Transvaal Investment Co Ltd v Springs Municipality:[22]

> ". . . juristically, the word 'acquire' connotes ownership; the ordinary legal meaning implies the acquisition of dominium. To acquire a thing is to become the owner of it. No doubt it may be used in a wider sense so as to include the acquisition of a right to obtain the dominium; but the narrower meaning is the accurate and more obvious one."

> "It is true, too, that 'compulsory acquisition' is used in both English and Roman-Dutch law to denote the expropriation of property by an authority - whether State, local or public utility - usually for some public purpose, most commonly in relation to land. It is, of course, common cause that property in s 16 is not limited to land.
>
> Cases relied upon by Mr Kentridge clearly establish that it is not every deprivation of a right which amounts to a compulsory acquisition of property, as for example regulation of a landlord's rights which in effect diminished his rights (Thakur Jagannatha Baksa Singh v United Provinces 1946 AC 327 (PC)), regulations which limited an owner's right to build above a certain height on his land (Belfast Corporation v OD Cars Ltd 1960 AC 490), and legislation allowing licensed pilots to provide pilotage only if they were employed by the port authority (Government of Malaysia v Selangor Pilot Association (supra)).
> It is perhaps of some significance to note that in almost all the post-colonial constitutions granted by Britain in Africa the section reciting the fundamental freedoms protected refer to the right not to be deprived of property without compensation whereas the sections giving actual protection provide that no property of any description shall be compulsorily taken possession of and no interest in or right [over] property of any description shall be compulsorily acquired except on certain conditions including compensation. This is clear recognition that there is a distinction between deprivation and acquisition, and also an indication that not every deprivation of property must carry compensation with it. Indeed government could be made virtually impossible if every deprivation of property required compensation."

In Davies and Others v Minister of Lands, Agriculture and Water Development,[24] Gubbay CJ cited the aforesaid passages with approval and held[25] that section 11(c) of the Zimbabwe Constitution does not afford protection against deprivation of property by the State "where the act of deprivation falls short of compulsory acquisition or expropriation."

[34] The Constitution of India originally had a property clause[26] which recognised the distinction between compulsory acquisition and requisition which was held to be a less intrusive form of deprivation of property. In H.D. Vora v State of Maharashtra,[27] it was said by Bhagwati J:

27 1984 AIR 866 (SC) at 869.

> "The two concepts [compulsory acquisition and requisition] . . . are totally distinct and independent. Acquisition means the acquiring of the entire title of the expropriated owner whatever the nature and extent of that title may be. The entire bundle of rights which was vested in the original holder passes on acquisition to the acquirer leaving nothing to the former . . . . The concept of acquisition has an air of permanence and finality in that there is transference of the title of the original holder to the acquiring authority. But the concept of requisition involves merely taking of 'domain or control over property without acquiring rights of ownership' and must by its very nature be of temporary duration."

(It is unnecessary to consider whether there is a difference between the concept of requisition used in the Indian provision and deprivation used in the interim Constitution.)

[35] While the legal effect of section 21(1) may be to "transfer" ownership of the property of the solvent spouse to the Master or trustee, in order to determine whether or not such a "transfer" constitutes an expropriation of that property for the purposes of the property clause, regard must be had to the broad context and purpose of section 21 as a whole. Apart from the question as to whether the transfer of the property of the solvent spouse is for a "public" purpose, to regard the vesting under section 21(1) as an expropriation, in my opinion, is to ignore the substance of the provision. The purpose and effect is clearly not to divest, save temporarily, the solvent spouse of the ownership of property that is in fact his or hers. The purpose is to ensure that the insolvent estate is not deprived of property to which it is entitled.[28] The fact that the onus of establishing his or her ownership of the property is placed upon the solvent spouse should not in any way be confused with the purpose of the provision. In any vindicatory action the claimant has to establish ownership. The onus of proof had to be placed on either the Master or the trustee or on the solvent spouse. Having regard to which of those parties has access to the relevant facts, the onus was understandably and justifiably placed on the solvent spouse.

[36] Again, on the assumption that the effect of section 21 is to "transfer" ownership of the property of the solvent spouse to the Master or the trustee, the section does not contemplate or intend that such transfer should be permanent or for any purpose other than to enable the Master or the trustee to establish whether any such property is in fact that of the insolvent estate. Again, there is no intention to divest the solvent spouse permanently of what is rightfully hers or his or to prejudice the solvent spouse in relation to her or his property. Hence the provisions enabling the solvent spouse to seek the assistance of the court in order to obtain the release of that which is his or hers and to seek the protection of the court in the event of the trustee wishing to sell such property prior to designed to protect property which rightfully belonged to the insolvent estate from alienation by the solvent spouse, malicious damage or destruction by the solvent spouse or a third party, accidental damage or destruction, fraudulent abandonment by the solvent spouse and theft by third parties.

its release. So, too, the provision enabling the court to order the exclusion of property of the solvent spouse from the operation of a vesting order in the event that such spouse is a trader or is likely to suffer serious prejudice by reason of an immediate vesting. The whole thrust of section 21 is merely to ensure that property which properly belonged to the insolvent ends up in the estate. The statutory mechanism employed is temporarily to lay the hand of the law upon the property of both the insolvent spouse and the solvent spouse and to create a procedure for the release by the trustee or the court of that which in fact belongs to the solvent spouse.

[37] In all the circumstances which I have described, the provisions of section 21 do not have the purpose or effect of a compulsory acquisition or expropriation of the property of the solvent spouse whether by a public authority or at all. I am of the opinion therefore that there is no basis for regarding the effect of section 21 as an expropriation of the rights in the property of the solvent spouse.

[38] It follows that it is unnecessary to decide whether for the purposes of section 21 of the Act the Master or a trustee constitutes a public authority or whether the vesting is for a public purpose.

[39] If the provisions of section 21 do not amount to an expropriation then it follows that they do not contravene the provisions of section 28(3) of the interim Constitution.

Counsel for Mrs Harksen informed us during argument that they do not rely on the provisions of sections 28(1) or (2) of the interim Constitution. That carried with it the concession that if section 21 of the Act does not amount to an expropriation of the property of the solvent spouse then its constitutionality is not impugned at all by section 28. It follows that the attack on section 21 founded upon the property clause falls to be dismissed. Having reached this conclusion it is unnecessary to consider the application of the limitations clause in this context.

The Equality Clause

[40] It was further submitted on behalf of Mrs Harksen that the provisions of section 21 of the Act were in violation of the equality clause of the interim Constitution.[29] More particularly it was contended that the vesting provision constitutes unequal treatment of solvent spouses and discriminates unfairly against them; and that its effect is to impose severe burdens, obligations and disadvantages on them beyond those applicable to other

29 Section 8 provides:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
> (3) (a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.

persons with whom the insolvent had dealings or close relationships or whose property is found in the possession of the insolvent. Moreover, to the extent that section 21(10) favours solvent spouses who are "traders", it discriminates against solvent spouses who are not "traders". It was submitted further that section 21(2), which entitles a solvent spouse to claim the return of what in fact belongs to him or her, does not save the provision. There may be a number of innocent reasons why the solvent spouse is not able to establish that the property belongs to him or her. Counsel for Mrs Harksen suggested that the provisions of section 21 constituted a violation of both sections 8(1) (a denial of equality before the law and equal protection of the law) and 8(2) (unfair discrimination).

[41] Attacks on legislation which are founded on the provisions of section 8 of the interim Constitution raise difficult questions of constitutional interpretation and require a careful analysis of the facts of each case and an equally careful application of those facts to the law. It was stated in the majority judgment in Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another[30] that this Court:

> "should be astute not to lay down sweeping interpretations at this stage but should allow equality doctrine to develop slowly and, hopefully, surely. This is clearly an area where issues should be dealt with incrementally and on a case by case basis with special emphasis on the actual context in which each problem arises."

Without in any way departing from that cautious approach, it appears to me that it would be helpful now to take stock of this Court's equality jurisprudence. In this regard I shall draw particularly on our judgments in the Prinsloo case and in President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo.[31]

Section 8(1) Analysis

[42] Where section 8 is invoked to attack a legislative provision or executive conduct on the ground that it differentiates between people or categories of people in a manner that amounts to unequal treatment or unfair discrimination, the first enquiry must be directed to the question as to whether the impugned provision does differentiate between people or categories of people. If it does so differentiate, then in order not to fall foul of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution there must be a rational connection between the differentiation in question and the legitimate governmental purpose it is designed to further or achieve. If it is justified in that way, then it does not amount to a breach of section 8(1).

[43] Differentiation that does not constitute a violation of section 8(1) may nonetheless constitute unfair discrimination for the purposes of section 8(2). The foregoing is my understanding of the judgment in Prinsloo.[32] It was there stated in the majority judgment that:

> Taking as comprehensive a view as possible of the way equality is treated in s 8, we would suggest that it deals with differentiation in basically two ways: differentiation which does not involve unfair discrimination and differentiation which does involve unfair discrimination." (Footnotes omitted).

32 Above n 30 at paras 17 and 23.

GOLDSTONE J

In dealing with differentiation which does not involve unfair discrimination the Court stated:[33]

> "It must be accepted that, in order to govern a modern country efficiently and to harmonise the interests of all its people for the common good, it is essential to regulate the affairs of its inhabitants extensively. It is impossible to do so without differentiation and without classifications which treat people differently and which impact on people differently. It is unnecessary to give examples which abound in everyday life in all democracies based on equality and freedom. Differentiation which falls into this category very rarely constitutes unfair discrimination in respect of persons subject to such regulation, without the addition of a further element. . . .
> It is convenient, for descriptive purposes, to refer to the differentiation presently under discussion as 'mere differentiation'. In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional State is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional State. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the State is bound to function in a rational manner. This has been said to promote the need for governmental action to relate to a defensible vision of the public good, as well as to enhance the coherence and integrity of legislation. . . .
> Accordingly, before it can be said that mere differentiation infringes s 8 it must be established that there is no rational relationship between the differentiation in question and the governmental purpose which is proffered to validate it. In the absence of such rational relationship the differentiation would infringe s 8. But while the existence of such a rational relationship is a necessary condition for the differentiation not to infringe

33 Id at paras 24 - 26.

> s 8, it is not a sufficient condition; for the differentiation might still constitute unfair discrimination if that further element . . . is present." (Footnotes omitted)

[44] If the differentiation complained of bears no rational connection to a legitimate governmental purpose which is proffered to validate it, then the provision in question violates the provisions of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution. If there is such a rational connection, then it becomes necessary to proceed to the provisions of section 8(2) to determine whether, despite such rationality, the differentiation none the less amounts to unfair discrimination.

[45] The determination as to whether differentiation amounts to unfair discrimination under section 8(2) requires a two stage analysis. Firstly, the question arises whether the differentiation amounts to "discrimination" and, if it does, whether, secondly, it amounts to "unfair discrimination". It is as well to keep these two stages of the enquiry separate. That there can be instances of discrimination which do not amount to unfair discrimination is evident from the fact that even in cases of discrimination on the grounds specified in section 8(2), which by virtue of section 8(4) are presumed to constitute unfair discrimination, it is possible to rebut the presumption and establish that the discrimination is not unfair.[34]

What Constitutes Discrimination

[34] See Hugo at n 31.

[46] Section 8(2) contemplates two categories of discrimination. The first is differentiation on one (or more) of the fourteen grounds specified in the subsection (a "specified ground"[35]). The second is differentiation on a ground not specified in subsection (2) but analogous to such ground (for convenience hereinafter called an "unspecified" ground) which we formulated as follows in Prinsloo:

> "The second form is constituted by unfair discrimination on grounds which are not specified in the subsection. In regard to this second form there is no presumption in favour of unfairness.[36]
> . . . .

36 Above n 30 at para 28.

> Given the history of this country we are of the view that 'discrimination" has acquired a particular pejorative meaning relating to the unequal treatment of people based on attributes and characteristics attaching to them. . . . [U]nfair discrimination, when used in this second form in section 8(2), in the context of section 8 as a whole, principally means treating persons differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, who are inherently equal in dignity. [37]
> Where discrimination results in treating persons differently in a way which impairs their fundamental dignity as human beings, it will clearly be a breach of section 8(2). Other forms of differentiation, which in some other way affect persons adversely in a comparably serious manner, may well constitute a breach of section 8(2) as well.[38]

There will be discrimination on an unspecified ground if it is based on attributes or characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental dignity of persons as human beings, or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

[47] The question whether there has been differentiation on a specified or an unspecified ground must be answered objectively. In the former case the enquiry is directed at determining whether the statutory provision amounts to differentiation on one of the grounds specified in section 8(2). Similarly, in the latter case the enquiry is whether the differentiation in the provision is on an unspecified ground (as explained in para 46 above). If in either case the enquiry leads to a negative conclusion then section 8(2) has not been breached and the question falls away. If the answer is in the affirmative, however, then it is necessary to proceed to the second stage of the analysis and determine whether the discrimination is "unfair". In the case of discrimination on a specified ground, the unfairness of the discrimination is presumed, but the contrary may still be established. In the case of discrimination on an unspecified ground, the unfairness must still be established before it can be found that a breach of section 8(2) has occurred.

38 Id at para 33. For purposes of the decision in Prinsloo it was not necessary to investigate further the concept of such other differentiation.

[48] Before proceeding to the second stage of the enquiry, it is necessary to comment briefly on one aspect of the specified and unspecified grounds of differentiation which constitute discrimination. In the above quoted passage from Prinsloo it was pointed out that the pejorative meaning of "discrimination" related to the unequal treatment of people "based on attributes and characteristics attaching to them". For purposes of that case it was unnecessary to attempt any comprehensive description of what "attributes and characteristics" would comprise.

[49] It is also unnecessary for purposes of the present case, save that I would caution against any narrow definition of these terms. What the specified grounds have in common is that they have been used (or misused) in the past (both in South Africa and elsewhere) to categorize, marginalise and often oppress persons who have had, or who have been associated with, these attributes or characteristics. These grounds have the potential, when manipulated, to demean persons in their inherent humanity and dignity. There is often a complex relationship between these grounds. In some cases they relate to immutable biological attributes or characteristics, in some to the associational life of humans, in some to the intellectual, expressive and religious dimensions of humanity and in some cases to a combination of one or more of these features. The temptation to force them into neatly self-contained categories should be resisted. Section 8(2) seeks to prevent the unequal treatment of people based on such criteria which may, amongst other things, result in the construction of patterns of disadvantage such as has occurred only too visibly in our history.

What Constitutes Unfair Discrimination

[50] The nature of the unfairness contemplated by the provisions of section 8 was considered in paras 41 and 43 of the majority judgment in the Hugo case[39]. The following was stated:

> "[41] The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and > respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked.

> [43] To determine whether that impact was unfair it is necessary to look not only at the group who has been disadvantaged but at the nature of the power in terms of which the discrimination was effected and, also at the nature of the interests which have been affected by the discrimination."

In para 41 dignity was referred to as an underlying consideration in the determination of unfairness. The prohibition of unfair discrimination in the Constitution provides a bulwark against invasions which impair human dignity or which affect people adversely in a comparably serious manner. However, as L'Heureux-Dubé J acknowledged in Egan v Canada,[40] "Dignity [is] a notoriously elusive concept . . . it is clear that [it] cannot, by itself, bear the weight of s.15's task on its shoulders. It needs precision and elaboration." It is made clear in para 43 of Hugo that this stage of the enquiry focuses primarily on the experience of the "victim" of discrimination. In the final analysis it is the impact of the discrimination on the complainant that is the determining factor regarding the unfairness of the discrimination.

[51] In order to determine whether the discriminatory provision has impacted on complainants unfairly, various factors must be considered. These would include:

[40] (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79 at 106.

(a) the position of the complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage, whether the discrimination in the case under consideration is on a specified ground or not;

(b) the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it. If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the complainants in the manner indicated above, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question. In Hugo, for example, the purpose of the Presidential Act was to benefit three groups of prisoners, namely, disabled prisoners, young people and mothers of young children, as an act of mercy. The fact that all these groups were regarded as being particularly vulnerable in our society, and that in the case of the disabled and the young mothers, they belonged to groups who had been victims of discrimination in the past, weighed with the Court in concluding that the discrimination was not unfair;[41]

(c) with due regard to (a) and (b) above, and any other relevant factors, the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of complainants and whether it has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or constitutes an impairment of a comparably serious nature.

These factors, assessed objectively, will assist in giving "precision and elaboration" to the constitutional test of unfairness. They do not constitute a closed list. Others may emerge as our equality jurisprudence continues to develop. In any event it is the cumulative effect of these factors that must be examined and in respect of which a determination must be made as to whether the discrimination is unfair.

[52] If the discrimination is held to be unfair then the provision in question will be in violation of section 8(2). One will then proceed upon the final leg of the enquiry as to whether the provision can be justified under section 33 of the interim Constitution, the limitations clause. This will involve a weighing of the purpose and effect of the provision in question and a determination as to the proportionality thereof in relation to the extent of its infringement of equality.

[53] At the cost of repetition, it may be as well to tabulate the stages of enquiry which become necessary where an attack is made on a provision in reliance on section 8 of the interim Constitution. They are:

(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.

(b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two stage analysis:

(b)(i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to "discrimination"? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

(b)(ii) If the differentiation amounts to "discrimination", does it amount to "unfair discrimination"? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).

(c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause

(section 33 of the interim Constitution).

The Enquiry in the Present Case

[54] I turn now to consider the constitutionality of section 21 of the Act in the light of the foregoing analysis.

1 Differentiation

[55] That section 21 differentiates between the solvent spouse of an insolvent and other persons who might have had dealings with the insolvent is patent. It becomes necessary, therefore, to consider the governmental purpose of the section, whether that purpose is a legitimate one and, if so, whether the differentiation does have a rational connection to that purpose.

[56] A similar provision appeared (without the extended definition of "spouse") in a 1926 amendment to the Insolvency Act 32 of 1916. Its successor is section 21 of the Act. In De Villiers NO v Delta Cables (Pty) Ltd [42] Van Heerden JA said:

> "The main object of s 21(1), read with s 21(2) and (4), is, no doubt, to prevent or at least to hamper collusion between spouses to the detriment of creditors of the insolvent spouse."

42 Above n 14 at 13I.

That the provision soon appeared to have a salutary effect appears from the observation of Greenberg JP in Maudsley's Trustees v Maudsley [43] to the effect that:

As Professor Smith points out, where a trader so acted:[44]

> "[t]he onus was then on the trustee to prove that the transactions in question were in fact simulated ones, a particularly difficult task because the proprietary rights as between spouses are usually matters within their own peculiar knowledge and it might not be possible for a trustee to separate the property of one from that of the other."

[57] Since the introduction of the section 21 provision in 1926, the position of women in our society has changed radically and for a number of years section 21 of the Act has served a much wider purpose than that referred to by Greenberg JP in the Maudsley[45] case. More and more women have become economically active and contribute out of their own income or investments to the property of a common household.[46] The consequence is that nowadays, in the case of honest spouses, who are married out of community of property, it is not infrequently a matter of complexity for the spouses themselves to determine which property in their possession belongs to each of them; or, indeed, which is held in co-ownership because both contributed to the purchase price. Having regard to the close identity of interests between many married couples,[47] they do not always make nice calculations and keep accurate records of their respective contributions to property they acquire. If it is difficult for them to do so, then so much more difficult and complex is it for a trustee who comes as a complete stranger to the financial affairs of the spouses. The provisions of section 21 thus assist a trustee in the important determination of which property in the possession of "spouses" belongs to the insolvent estate, not only in cases of collusion but also in the case of honest partners to a 46 When, in 1926, the provision was inserted into the 1916 Act there can be no doubt that it was directed at property ostensibly owned by women married out of community of property. It could hardly have been otherwise as there were relatively few women at that time who had an independent income. Its purpose was not aimed at disadvantaging or prejudicing women as such. Its language was gender neutral and as more women began to have their own income its effect applied more frequently to husbands. Counsel for Mrs Harksen, correctly, in my view, did not suggest that section 21 resulted in gender discrimination.

47 In Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 47 this Court recognised the existence of a close special relationship between spouses and acknowledged that it may sometimes lead marriage or similar close relationship. This statutory mechanism is an appropriate and effective one.

[58] In his attack on the rationality of section 21(1), counsel for Mrs Harksen relied upon the statement of Berman AJ in Enyati Resources Ltd and Another v Thorne NO and Another[48] to the effect that:

> "The divesting of the property of the solvent spouse and the vesting thereof in the hands of the Master (and thereafter in the hands of the trustee) constitute a drastic and arbitrary invasion upon, and inroad into, the proprietary right of citizens . . . ."

Whilst in no way wishing to minimise the inconvenience, potential prejudice and embarrassment that the provisions of section 21 of the Act may cause to a solvent spouse, and even accepting that those consequences may be described as "drastic", I cannot agree that they are arbitrary or without rationality. In my opinion, the legislature acted rationally in taking the view that the common law and the statutory remedies relating to impeachable transactions[49] were insufficient to enable the Master or a trustee to ensure that all the property of the insolvent spouse found its way into the insolvent estate. In particular, it must be acknowledged that remedies other than that provided by section 21 cast an onus on the Master or the trustee to establish ownership of property claimed from the solvent spouse. If a claim were to be contested, inevitable delays inherent in the legal system would result. Those delays, certainly in cases of collusion, could well be fatal to the recovery of property rightfully belonging to the insolvent estate. I am not overlooking the power of the High Court to grant relief by way of an interim interdict to protect the property or relief elsewhere provided in the Act. However, that relief would require some evidence from the Master or trustee which might not necessarily be available without a time consuming enquiry.

[59] In respect of the question of onus it was stated in Prinsloo:[50]

> "In any civil case, one of the parties will have to bear the onus on each of the factual > matters material to the adjudication of the dispute. So, in the case of an aquilian claim for damages arising from a veld fire, one of the parties will bear the onus concerning negligence. As long as the imposition of the onus is not arbitrary, there will be no breach of s 8(1). In rare circumstances, it may be that the allocation of onus will impair other constitutional rights and a challenge will then arise. That is not the case here."

50 Above n 30 at para 36.

As we have seen, section 21 has the effect of transferring an onus from the Master or a trustee to the solvent spouse. As was stated earlier,[51] there is a good reason for transferring such onus to the solvent spouse in the circumstances of an insolvency of the insolvent spouse. Often facts necessary for the determination of the question of ownership will be peculiarly within the knowledge of the solvent spouse. It is thus rational that the onus should be cast upon the solvent spouse. As Didcott J said in his separate concurring judgment in the Prinsloo case:[52]

> "In our adversarial system of civil litigation one side or the other has to bear the onus of proof. Differentiation between the parties in that regard is thus inevitable. So is the disadvantage under which the side carrying the load often labours. Its location for specific issues depends not on doctrinaire considerations, but on wholly pragmatic ones."

[60] For reasons set out above there can be no doubt as to the existence of a rational connection between the differentiation created by section 21 of the Act and the legitimate governmental purpose behind its enactment. Moreover, in my opinion, reasonable procedures were introduced to safeguard the interests of the solvent spouse in his or her property. It follows that section 21 does not violate the provisions of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution.

51 Above at para 57.

52 Above n 30 at para 56.

2 Discrimination

[61] The next question is whether the differentiation between solvent spouses and other persons who had dealings with insolvents constitutes discrimination. The differentiation is not on one of the specified grounds. Whether it constitutes discrimination on one of the unspecified grounds is an objective enquiry. In my opinion, this enquiry yields an affirmative result. Other persons who had dealings with the insolvent or whose property is found in the possession of an insolvent are not affected in the same way. Their property does not become vested in the Master or the trustee and they are not burdened with the onus of proving what is their property before it is released to them. They are not prevented from disposing of their property unless and until they prove their ownership either to the satisfaction of a trustee or a court of competent jurisdiction. The differentiation does arise from their attributes or characteristics as solvent spouses, namely their usual close relationship with the insolvent spouse and the fact that they usually live together in a common household.[53] These attributes have the potential to demean persons in their inherent humanity and dignity. In this regard it might also be mentioned that they have a relationship with the insolvent spouse similar to that of children or other persons who live under the same roof. The disadvantages of section 21 do not apply to the last mentioned categories. It follows that the provisions of section 21 of the Act do discriminate against the solvent spouse of an insolvent.

53 I do not agree with the submission made on behalf of Mrs Harksen by her counsel that the effect of section 21 is to discriminate against a solvent spouse on the basis of personal intimacy.

3 Unfair Discrimination

[62] The discrimination complained of by Mrs Harksen does not fall within the fourteen specified grounds contained in section 8(2). Mrs Harksen thus bears the onus of persuading us on a balance of probabilities that the discrimination is unfair and hence outlawed by section 8(2). In the determination as to whether that onus has been discharged we must have regard to the considerations referred to in para 51 above. I shall consider each in turn.

The Position of Complainant in Society

[63] The group here affected, namely solvent spouses, is not one which has suffered discrimination in the past and is not a vulnerable one. To adopt the words of O'Regan J in the Hugo case,[54] they are not a "vulnerable . . . group adversely affected by . . . discrimination".

54 Above n 31 at para 112.

The Nature of the Provision

[64] In this case the power was exercised by Parliament which has the right and duty to protect the public interest. In the Act, the legislature gave effect to that duty by protecting the rights of the creditors of insolvent estates. That is the purpose of section 21. That purpose is not inconsistent with the underlying values protected by section 8(2).

The Effect of the Discrimination on Solvent Spouses

[65] In the consideration of the effect of section 21 one must assume that Masters and trustees will act reasonably and honestly and not wish to claim for insolvent estates that which solvent spouses are able to establish belongs to them. One must also assume that in an appropriate case the courts will intervene where they do not so act.[55] It must also be borne in mind that the statutory vesting of the property of the solvent spouse does not have as a consequence that such property is necessarily removed from the possession of the solvent spouse. It is attached by the sheriff of the magistrate's court or by a deputy sheriff. They, as it were, place the hand of the law on the property and, of course, it may not be alienated or burdened by the solvent spouse prior to its release. Where the solvent spouse claims property as his or hers and fails to adduce evidence to establish that claim on a balance of probabilities then the insolvent estate is entitled to the property. The legal presumption is that property was owned by the insolvent and not by the solvent spouse. The effect is hence that the solvent spouse has not been divested of what was her or his property. And one must remember that the facts in issue will be peculiarly within the knowledge of the spouses themselves.

55 This would apply, for example, to applications made under ss 21(4) and (10) of the Act for the release of property claimed by the solvent spouse. See also Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC); and Nel v Le Roux NO and Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC).

[66] In the event that the solvent spouse has to resort to litigation, there is inconvenience and a degree of potential embarrassment to the extent that the litigation may become public. There is also inconvenience and a burden in that the solvent spouse will usually require legal assistance. Some solvent spouses may not have the funds to employ a lawyer and in that way suffer further potential prejudice. But that is an inevitable consequence of a dispute between a trustee of an insolvent estate and a solvent spouse as to ownership of property.

[67] In my judgment the cumulative effect of these criteria, and in particular the impact of the inconvenience or prejudice on solvent spouses in the context of the Act, and having regard to the underlying values protected by section 8(2), does not justify the conclusion that section 21 of the Act constitutes unfair discrimination. Looked at from the perspective of solvent spouses, it is the kind of inconvenience and burden that any citizen may face when resort to litigation becomes necessary. Indeed it could arise whenever a vindicatory claim (whether justified or not) is brought against a person in possession of property. Again, the inconvenience and burden of having to resist such a claim does not lead to an impairment of fundamental dignity or constitute an impairment of a comparably serious nature.

[68] It follows, in my opinion, that Mrs Harksen has not established that the provisions of section 21 of the Act, especially in its context, constitute unfair discrimination.

[69] Another complaint made by Mrs Harksen is that the provisions of sections 64 and 65 of the Act offend against her constitutional rights under the equality clause, the property clause, the privacy clause (section 13) and, because of the criminal sanction created by section 139 of the Act, her rights to freedom and security of the person (section 11(1)) under the interim Constitution.

[70] The arguments put before the Court by counsel for the applicant concerning the unconstitutionality of section 21 on the grounds that it infringes the equality and property clauses of the bill of rights were repeated in respect of sections 64 and 65 of the Act. For the same reasons that I would reject these challenges to section 21 of the Act, I would reject the similar challenges to sections 64 and 65 of the Act. More particularly, leaving section 21 aside, no creditor can have a legitimate complaint to being called as a witness under sections 64 and 65. Mrs Harksen's complaint concerns her being questioned about her own property and affairs. On the basis that it is constitutional to vest the property of a solvent spouse temporarily in the Master or trustee, it follows that the solvent spouse similarly can have no legitimate complaint to being interrogated concerning her or his own property and affairs to the extent that they are relevant to the insolvent estate.

[71] As far as reliance is placed upon sections 11(1) and 13 of the interim Constitution, it is necessary to have regard to the scope of questions which the provisions of sections 64 and 65 of the Act require a person summoned to answer. It is also necessary to ascertain the nature of the offences created by section 139 of the Act.

[72] Section 65(1) of the Act provides that a person summoned under section 64 may be interrogated:

> " . . . concerning all matters relating to the insolvent or his business or affairs, whether before or after the sequestration of his estate, and concerning any property belonging to his estate, and concerning the business, affairs or property of his or her spouse: Provided that the presiding officer shall disallow any question which is irrelevant . . . ."

Thus the first limitation upon the questions which may be put to the person summoned relates to their relevance to the purpose of the meeting. That purpose is clearly the affairs of the insolvent estate. It follows that to the extent that persons may be required to answer questions concerning the business, affairs or property of the solvent spouse, the information sought must be relevant to the estate of the insolvent spouse.

[73] A second and even wider limitation is to be found in the provisions of section 139 read with section 66(3) of the Act. As already stated,[56] section 66(2) empowers the presiding officer to commit to prison a person summoned to appear under section 64 and who fails to appear at the meeting without a reasonable excuse. Similarly, under section 66(3) the presiding officer may commit to prison a person who refuses to answer a question "lawfully put" under section 65 or who does not answer the question fully and satisfactorily.

[74] In Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO[57] this Court considered the meaning and implications of the offence created by section 418(5)(b)(iii)(aa) of the Companies Act 61 of 1973, as amended. The Companies Act makes it a punishable offence for a person summoned for examination at a meeting of creditors of an insolvent company "without sufficient cause to answer fully and satisfactorily any question lawfully put to him . . .". It was claimed in that case also that a number of the rights protected under the bill of rights were invaded by those provisions. The following passages from the judgment of Ackermann J (on behalf of the whole Court) are applicable to the present attack on sections 64 and 65 of the Act:

> "There is no other provision in s 417 or s 418, or for that matter in any other provision of the Act which expressly or by necessary implication compels the examinee to answer a specific question which, if answered, would threaten any of the examinee's chap 3 rights. It must, in my view, follow from this that the provisions of ss 417 and 418 can and must be construed in such a way that an examinee is not compelled to answer a question which would result in the unjustified infringement of any of the examinee's chap 3 rights. Fidelity to s 35(2) of the Constitution requires such a construction and fidelity to s 35(3) read with s 7(4) of the Constitution requires an appropriate remedy; in the present case that the examinee should not be compelled to answer a question which would result in the infringement of a chap 3 right."[58]

The conclusion was expressed as follows:

> "Nothing could be clearer, in my view, than this. If the answer to any question put at such examination would infringe or threaten to infringe any of the examinee's chap 3 rights, this would constitute 'sufficient cause', for purposes of the above provision, for refusing to answer the question unless such right of the examinee has been limited in a way which passes s 33(1) scrutiny. By the same token the question itself would not be one 'lawfully put' and the examinee would not, in terms of this very provision, be obliged to answer it. The answer to this leg of Mr Marcus' argument is that there is, on a proper construction of these sections, and in the light of this Court's order in Ferreira v Levin, no provision in s 417 or s 418 of the Act which is inconsistent with the examinee's right to privacy in terms of s 13 of the Constitution now under consideration."[59]

58 Id at para 60.

59 Id at para 61.

[75] In Nel v Le Roux NO and Others[60] a similar conclusion was reached with regard to the provisions of section 205 of the Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 which also obliges examinees referred to therein to answer questions on penalty of a criminal sanction. It is there provided that such an examinee is not obliged to testify or to answer any particular question he or she has "a just excuse" for refusing or failing to do so. It was held by this Court that in the relevant context there was no material difference between the expression "a just excuse" in section 189 of the Criminal Procedure Act and "sufficient cause" in section 418 of the Companies Act.[61]

[76] The position is no different in the present context with respect to the sections of the Act now under consideration. A presiding officer may not commit to prison any person who with "reasonable cause" refuses to attend a meeting or a person who refuses to answer a question not "lawfully put to him". A question which would constitute an invasion of a constitutional right of an examinee cannot be said to be one "lawfully put". To paraphrase the words of Ackermann J in Nel v Le Roux NO and Others,[62] if a presiding officer at a meeting of creditors held under the Act finds that, in answering any question, the examinee's rights under chapter 3 of the interim Constitution would be infringed he or she should hold that this did not constitute a question "lawfully put" to the examinee and that a refusal to answer such a question did not therefore constitute conduct punishable by imprisonment under section 66(3) and therefore would not constitute an offence under section 139(1).

62 Id at para 9.

[77] In my opinion this analysis provides the answer to the submissions on behalf of Mrs Harksen in respect of the alleged invasion of the rights contained in sections 11(1) and 13 of the interim Constitution. They fall to be dismissed.

[78] Mr Trengove, on behalf of the amicus curiae submitted that the costs incurred by it should be paid by Mrs Harksen. I do not agree. In this case, but for the intervention by the amicus, this Court would inevitably have appointed counsel to make submissions on the constitutionality of the impugned provisions. Mrs Harksen would not have been burdened with a costs order against her in that eventuality. In my opinion, the fact that the Council of South African Banks, in order to protect their own interests, decided to consult their attorneys and seek to intervene should not prejudice Mrs Harksen.

[79] The following order is made:

1. It is declared that the provisions of section 21 and the impugned parts of sections

64 and 65 of the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936 are not inconsistent with the interim Constitution.

2. The case is referred back to the Cape of Good Hope Provincial High Court to be dealt with in the light of this judgment.

3. There is no order as to costs.

Chaskalson P, Langa DP, Ackermann J and Kriegler J concur in the judgment of Goldstone J.

O'REGAN J:

[80] I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment of Goldstone J in this matter. I am unable to agree with the order that he proposes for the reasons that I give in this judgment.

[81] At issue in this case, is the question of whether certain provisions of the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936 ("the Act") are inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993 ("the interim Constitution"). The provisions under challenge are sections 21, 64 and 65. Section 21 provides that all the property, movable and immovable, of the spouse of a person whose estate has been provisionally sequestrated shall automatically vest, first in the Master, and then in the trustee of the insolvent estate. Section 21(2) provides that a trustee shall release any property so vested once it has been proved that it is property which falls within one of the listed categories, which include property which the solvent spouse owned before the marriage; property which was received by the spouse under a marriage settlement; and property which was acquired during the marriage by a title valid as against creditors of the insolvent. Section 21(4) provides that a solvent spouse may apply to court for the release of vested property. It is clear that the spouse carries the burden of proof to establish that the property is indeed his or hers.[1] Finally, section 21(10) provides that a solvent spouse may either at the time of the provisional sequestration order or thereafter approach the court to exclude property for a period determined by the court from the effect of the vesting in circumstances where the solvent spouse is a trader or where he or she is likely to suffer serious prejudice as a result of the vesting. Such spouse will have to satisfy the court that he or she is willing and able to make arrangements to safeguard the interest of the insolvent estate in such property.

> "The officer who is to preside or who presides at any meeting of creditors may summon any person who is known or upon reasonable ground believed to be or to have been in possession of any property which belonged to the insolvent before the sequestration of his estate or which belongs or belonged to the insolvent estate or to the spouse of the insolvent or to be indebted to the estate, or any person (including the insolvent's spouse) > who in the opinion of said officer may be able to give any material information concerning the insolvent or his affairs (whether before or after the sequestration of his estate) or concerning any property belonging to the estate or concerning the business, affairs or property of the insolvent's spouse, to appear at such meeting or adjourned meeting for the purpose of being interrogated under section sixty-five."

Section 65(1) provides that:

> "At any meeting of the creditors of an insolvent estate the officer presiding thereat may call and administer the oath to the insolvent and any other person present at the meeting who was or might have been summoned in terms of sub-section (2) of section sixty-four and the said officer, the trustee and any creditor who has proved a claim against the estate or the agent of any of them may interrogate a person so called and sworn concerning all matters relating to the insolvent or his business or affairs, whether before or after the sequestration of his estate, and concerning any property belonging to his estate, and concerning the business, affairs or property of his or her spouse . . .".

The applicant objected to the portions of these provisions which I have underlined.

[83] The applicant objected to section 21 on two constitutional grounds: section 8 (the right to equality) and section 28 (the right to property) and to the identified portions of sections 64(2) and 65(1) on the grounds that they are in breach of section 13 (the right to privacy) and section 8.

Challenge to section 21 on the basis of the right to property

[84] The applicant challenged section 21 on the ground that it was in conflict with the provisions of section 28(3) of the Constitution. For the reasons given by Goldstone J (at paras 29–39 of his judgment) I agree that this challenge was ill-founded. I would emphasise, however, that counsel for the applicant stated during argument that the applicant did not seek to rely on the provisions of section 28(1) or (2) of the interim Constitution. Our finding, therefore, is that section 21 of the Act is not in breach of section 28(3) of the interim Constitution.

Challenge to section 21 on the basis of the right to equality

[85] The applicant also argued that because the vesting provisions of section 21 apply only to spouses, broadly defined,[2] and not to other persons, these provisions were in breach of section 8 of the interim Constitution. I agree with the approach to section 8 adopted by the majority in Goldstone J's judgment in this case. My disagreement with the majority lies with the application of that approach, not with the approach itself. In order to determine whether a provision falls foul of section 8, two enquiries are necessary. The first requires us to consider whether there is a rational connection between the legislative or executive purpose and the differentiation which is challenged. If there is no such rational connection, then the provision or conduct will be in breach of section 8. If there is, a second enquiry is necessary to decide whether the differentiation is in breach of section 8(2).

[2] Section 21(13) defines spouse as not only a wife or husband in the legal sense "but also a wife or husband by virtue of a marriage according to any law or custom, and also a woman living with a man as his wife or a man living with a woman as her husband, although not married to one another."

[86] Goldstone J has held that there is a rational connection between the differentiation occasioned by section 21 and the legislative purpose which underpinned it (at paras 55–60 of his judgment). I accept that the primary purpose of section 21 is that identified by the Appellate Division[3] which is to prevent collusion between spouses to the disadvantage of the creditors of the insolvent spouse.[4] I also accept that there is a rational connection between this purpose and the provisions of section 21.

[87] The second question that needs to be considered is whether section 21 is in breach of section 8(2) of the Constitution. Section 8(2) provides that:

> "No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language."

3 Now the Supreme Court of Appeal in terms of section 166(b) of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996.

4 De Villiers NO v Delta Cables (Pty) Ltd 1992 (1) SA 9 (A) at 13I; see also Maudsley's Trustees v Maudsley 1940 TPD 399 at 404.

The applicant argues that section 21 discriminates on the basis of marital status and on the basis of personal intimacy. The additional argument relating to personal intimacy arises from the extended definition of "spouse" contained in section 21(13) which provides that:

> "In this section the word 'spouse' means not only a wife or husband in the legal sense, but also a wife or husband by virtue of a marriage according to any law or custom, and also a woman living with a man as his wife or a man living with a woman as her husband, although not married to one another."

This definition extends the provisions of section 21 to marriages not generally recognised as marriages in our law.[5] It may well be that the concept of "marital status" is sufficient to capture such marriages within its ambit as well, but as will be seen, it is not necessary in this case to reach a conclusion regarding that question. For if section 21 is unconstitutional because it discriminates unfairly on the ground of marital status, it will have to be declared invalid on that basis. It would be superfluous to consider any further challenge.

[88] The effect of section 21 of the Act is that the provisional or final sequestration of the estate of an insolvent will result automatically in the estate of the insolvent's spouse being vested first in the Master and then in the trustee of the insolvent estate. This vesting

5 The difficulties that the breadth of this provision occasions are illustrated by the facts in Chaplin NO v Gregory (or Wyld) 1950 (3) SA 555 (C) at 566A, in which the court held that it could not make an order vesting in the trustee of the insolvent estate the property of a woman with whom the insolvent lived, because the insolvent was in fact still married to another woman.

is without doubt invasive of the interests of the solvent spouse. As Berman AJ said in Enyati Resources Ltd and Another v Thorne NO and Another 1984 (2) SA 551 (C) at 557H:

> "The divesting of the property of the solvent spouse and the vesting thereof in the hands of the Master (and thereafter in the hands of the trustee) constitute a drastic and arbitrary invasion upon, and inroad into, the proprietary right of citizens . . .".

No such vesting occurs in relation to other family members, no matter how closely entwined their affairs may be with the affairs of the insolvent. Nor does it occur to the property of business associates. There can be no doubt in my mind therefore that the basis for the differential treatment is the marital status of the spouse.

[89] However, "marital status" is not one of the specified grounds contained in section 8(2) of the interim Constitution. That it is not specified, does not mean that such differentiation cannot constitute unfair discrimination in terms of section 8(2). It does mean that the provisions of section 8(4) of the Constitution do not assist the applicant. That clause states:

> "Prima facie proof of discrimination on any of the grounds specified in subsection (2) shall be presumed to be sufficient proof of unfair discrimination as contemplated in that subsection, until the contrary is established."

If "marital status" were a listed ground, then differential treatment based on it would immediately be presumed to be sufficient proof of unfair discrimination. The court would still have to consider on the facts before it whether the discrimination was "unfair". To do so, the court would have to consider the impact of the conduct upon the individuals or group concerned. Factors relevant to that exercise would include the identity of the individual, and his or her membership of a group previously disadvantaged by or vulnerable to discrimination, as well as the nature of the interests affected by the discrimination.

[90] As "marital status" is not a listed ground, the applicant will first have to establish that the ground upon which the differentiation has been effected is one which may give rise to unfair discrimination. The primary prohibition in section 8(2) outlaws unfair discrimination. It contains a list of grounds which may result in such discrimination, but that list is expressly not exhaustive. Indeed, the section stipulates that the list provided shall not derogate from the generality of the provision. In interpreting section 8(2), the primary question is always whether the conduct complained about constitutes "unfair discrimination".

> "Section 8 was adopted then in the recognition that discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm. Such discrimination is unfair: it builds and entrenches inequality amongst different groups in our society. The drafters realised that it was necessary both to proscribe such > forms of discrimination and to permit positive steps to redress the effects of such discrimination. The need to prohibit such patterns of discrimination and to remedy their results are the primary purposes of s 8 and, in particular, ss (2), (3) and (4)."

And in Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC) at para 31, we reasoned that "discrimination" as contemplated by section 8(2) needs to be understood in the context of the history of this country.

> "Given the history of this country we are of the view that 'discrimination' has acquired a particular pejorative meaning relating to the unequal treatment of people based on attributes and characteristics attaching to them. We are emerging from a period of our history during which the humanity of the majority of the inhabitants of this country was denied. They were treated as not having inherent worth; as objects whose identities could be arbitrarily defined by those in power rather than as persons of infinite worth. In short, they were denied recognition of their inherent dignity." (Footnote omitted.)

We have interpreted section 8(2) as a clause which is primarily a buffer against the construction of further patterns of discrimination and disadvantage. Underpinning the desire to avoid such discrimination is the Constitution's commitment to human dignity. Such patterns of discrimination can occur where people are treated without the respect that individual human beings deserve and particularly where treatment is determined not by the needs or circumstances of particular individuals, but by their attributes and characteristics, whether biologically or socially determined.

[92] In this case, disadvantages are imposed upon solvent spouses because they are married (or deemed to be in a marriage relationship in terms of the provisions of section 21(13)). Although marital status is not a ground specified in section 8(2), it does seem to me that it is a ground which may give rise to the concerns contemplated by section 8(2). In Miron v Trudel (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 189, the Canadian Supreme Court concluded that the exclusion of unmarried partners from accident benefits available to married partners was in breach of the equality provision of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. McLachlin J held that the unifying principle to determine what grounds would constitute a breach of the Canadian Charter was the following:

> ". . . the avoidance of stereotypical reasoning and the creation of legal distinctions which violate the dignity and freedom of the individual, on the basis of some preconceived perception about the attributed characteristics of a group rather than the true capacity, worth or circumstances of the individual." (At 207.)

She went on to find that:

> ". . . discrimination on the basis of marital status touches the essential dignity and worth of the individual in the same way as other recognised grounds of discrimination violative of fundamental human rights norms. Specifically, it touches the individual's freedom to live life with the mate of one's choice in the fashion of one's choice. This is a matter of defining importance to individuals. It is not a matter which should be excluded from Charter consideration on the ground that its recognition would trivialize the equality guarantee." (At 208.)

I agree that marital status is a matter of significant importance to all individuals, closely related to human dignity and liberty. For most people, the decision to enter into a permanent personal relationship with another is a momentous and defining one. It requires related decisions concerning the nature of the relationship and its personal and proprietary consequences. In my view, these considerations are sufficient to accept that marital status may give rise to the concerns of section 8(2). Accordingly, given the disadvantages conferred by section 21 on the basis of marital status, the applicant has established discrimination for the purposes of section 8(2). Of course, having decided that the provision in this case does amount to discrimination for the purposes of section 8(2), it is still necessary to decide whether the applicant has shown that the provision amounts to unfair discrimination.

[93] I agree with Goldstone J that to determine whether the discrimination has been unfair, it is necessary to consider the impact of the discrimination on the applicant and others in her situation (at paras 51 and 53 of his judgment). To determine whether the impact was unfair it is necessary to look at the group affected by the discrimination, at the nature of the power in terms of which the discrimination was effected and also at the nature of the interests which have been affected by the discrimination. This test is similar to the test adopted by L'Heureux-Dubé J in Egan v Canada (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79 at 113-14 to determine what constitutes "discrimination" for the purposes of section 15 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[94] In this case, the group affected is married people, and, in particular, spouses of insolvents. Historically, the relationship of marriage in South Africa is one whose consequences have been closely governed by the law: African customary law and common law were the primary sources of the rules relating to marriage but in both cases those rules were affected by statutory enactments over the years. In the past, discrimination on grounds of marital status generally occurred in two ways. First, people who lived together in close personal relationships but without getting married, or who were married according to religions or customs not afforded recognition, were denied benefits ordinarily afforded to married couples. Secondly, women who were married were often the subject of discrimination. Many of the laws governing marriage were based on an assumption that women were primarily responsible for the maintenance of a household, and the rearing of children, while men's responsibilities lay outside the household. These rules therefore both reflected and entrenched deep inequalities between men and women.[6] Not infrequently women's experience of marriage therefore was (and sometimes still is) one of subordination, both in relation to the rules regulating matrimonial property (whether customary or common law) and in relation to the division of labour within the household. A strong social expectation that married women would not work outside the household also translated into patterns of discrimination against married women outside of the marriage relationship, particularly in the labour market.

[95] The historical patterns of discrimination in the context of marital status are therefore quite complex. In the case before us, the discrimination facially affects all spouses in marriages recognised by law as well as people in some relationships which are not ordinarily afforded the consequences of marital status, but which are similar to marriage relationships and deemed to be such by section 21(13). Neither of the two groups who have historically been the subject of patterns of discrimination due to marital status is therefore singled out for consideration. The applicant did not seek to establish that the provisions under challenge were indirectly discriminatory on the ground of gender. Although I have little doubt that at times provisions discriminating on the grounds of marital status will implicate a pattern of discrimination rooted in one of the patterns established in our past, I cannot conclude that that is the case here.

[96] On the other hand, the effect of the discriminatory provisions on the spouses of insolvents is substantial. All property, movable and immovable, whether the subject matter of a bequest or marriage settlement, whether the personal, business or trading effects of the spouse entirely unrelated to the affairs of the insolvent or of an intrinsically personal nature such as clothing and personal effects, is as a result of the provisions of section 21 automatically vested in the Master and then the trustee. This may happen suddenly and without notice to the spouse of the insolvent.

[97] The Appellate Division has held obiter that the effect of the vesting is to transfer full dominium in the property from the spouse to the Master or trustee (De Villiers NO v Delta Cables (Pty) Ltd 1992 (1) SA 9 (A) at 15I–J). Even if the effect of the vesting were not to result in the transfer of full dominium to the Master or trustee, but only some of the incidents of dominium, it is clear that the implications for the solvent spouse would remain severe. The solvent spouse loses rights to dispose of and control the property. He or she may not alienate, encumber or lease such property, for example, while it is subject to the vesting. If the trustee chooses, the spouse may also lose the use and enjoyment of the property. As well as the tremendous personal inconvenience and difficulty caused, the vesting may have grave implications for a spouse who carries on his or her own business or professional career.

[98] It is not surprising therefore that judges and commentators alike have considered the effect of the provisions to be extremely invasive on the rights of the spouse of an insolvent.[7] The South African Law Commission noted in its Review of the Law of Insolvency that:

> "Although section 21 endeavours to limit prejudice to the insolvent's spouse (compare subsections (2), (3), (10) and (11)), the possible hardships (financially (sic) and otherwise) brought about by the sudden vesting of property in the Master are not really eliminated."[8]

The SA Law Commission concluded that the provision was an anachronism and recommended that it be abolished.[9] Similarly, the Cork Committee in the United Kingdom rejected a proposal that the assets of both spouses should be pooled upon the insolvency of one spouse. Although this proposal was not identical to section 21, it had some similarities to it. The Committee stated:

> "We reject this proposal as an unjustified interference with individual property rights, which would produce an unfair result in many cases, and which in many respects would be a reversion to outmoded concepts of matrimonial property which have long since been abandoned. If the proposal were adopted, elementary notions of fairness would require that the other spouse's own property, not derived directly or indirectly from the debtor, should be exempt. This would not only lead in many cases to an uncertain and unsatisfactory inquiry, but would in effect tend to reintroduce the Victorian concept of 'the wife's separate property' which was abandoned almost a century ago. We regard the proposal as entirely out of line with modern attitudes to the proprietary rights of husband and wife."[10]

Both the South African Law Commission and the United Kingdom's Cork Committee considered that such provisions were overly invasive of the interests of the spouse of the insolvent and constituted an anachronism in the context of modern matrimonial property law.

[99] It is true that section 21(10), which permits the spouse to approach a court for an order excluding certain property from the effect of the vesting, does mitigate the effects of the provision to some extent. It does not in my view vitiate the onerous implications of the section however. An automatic vesting of all property occurs regardless of the relationship between the spouses or the nature of the property concerned unless the spouse undertakes litigation to prevent it. Even then, unless the court is satisfied that the spouse is able and willing to safeguard the interest of the insolvent estate, such an exclusion may not be ordered (Van Schalkwyk v Die Meester 1975 (2) SA 508 (N) at 510). A spouse must be able to safeguard the estate against all reasonably possible contingencies including alienation of the property by the solvent spouse; intentional damage to or destruction of the property by the spouse or a third party; accidental damage to the property; fraudulent abandonment of the property by the spouse and theft of the property. It is not always easy for a spouse to satisfy a court that he or she will be able to provide the necessary protection. (See Van Schalkwyk v Die Meester, above, at 510.)

[100] In my view, there can be no doubt that the interests of the solvent spouse are adversely affected by the provisions of section 21. How grave such invasion will be will depend upon the circumstances and facts of each insolvency. There is no doubt, however, that in every insolvency where a spouse's property vests in the Master or trustee, that spouse's interests are impaired. The extent of the impairment is substantial and sufficient to constitute unfair discrimination.

[101] Now that I have concluded that section 21 constitutes unfair discrimination as contemplated in section 8(2), it is necessary to consider whether the infringement occasioned by section 21 is justifiable in terms of section 33 of the interim Constitution. We have held that section 33 requires us to consider the proportionality between the invasion caused by the infringing provision and the importance, purpose and effects of that provision.[11] It is necessary therefore to consider more fully the purpose and effects of section 21 of the Act.

[11] See S v Makwanyane and Another 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at para 104.

[102] As stated above, the purposes of section 21 are to assist the trustee to finalise the estate of the insolvent, and in particular to protect the interests of the insolvent's creditors against collusion between spouses. As was stated in Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 47, "[t]here is no question that protecting creditors is a valuable and important public purpose." In addition, as was also acknowledged in that case, there can be no doubt that the close relationship between spouses may in some circumstances lead to collusion.[12] However, it is plain that section 21 catches within its net all spouses of insolvents, even those spouses innocent of collusion, and even those whom the trustee and creditors accept to be innocent of collusion. All spouses of insolvents will have to take steps to have their property excluded from the vesting or released by the trustee in order to recover their property. Not only does the provision ensnare all spouses within its net, but all property as well. No matter how remote the relationship between a piece of property and the estate of the insolvent, that property will nevertheless vest in the trustee of the insolvent unless the spouse of the insolvent takes steps to have it excluded or released. The scope of the provision is indeed sweeping in relation to spouses.

[103] On the other hand, the provision does not affect a range of people who may be in a similarly questionable relationship with the insolvent, such as other close family members, personal friends or business associates. In that sense, the provision is under inclusive in that it does not seek to prevent collusion by other people who may be equally well placed to act fraudulently. The section is therefore over broad given its purpose in relation to spouses and their property and too narrowly drawn in relation to other people.

[104] It may be that the provisions of section 21 would be acceptable if it were shown to achieve its aim of frustrating collusion between spouses. Little evidence was placed before the Court to indicate how effective the provision was in achieving such aim. It may be that such evidence is impossible to obtain. I am prepared to accept that the provision may deter collusion between spouses in at least some cases. However, it also seems plain to me that a calculated plan by fraudulent spouses would not easily be waylaid by a trustee's use of section 21. For, where spouses are set on a path of fraudulent conduct, they may dispose of any movable property without the trustee ever being aware of such property. Cash, jewellery and other valuable movables could easily be kept from the knowledge of the trustee. I find it hard to conclude in the circumstances that the sweeping nature of the provision is justified.

[105] I am bolstered in my conclusion that section 21 is not justifiable, by the fact that many jurisdictions apparently regulate the law of insolvency without reliance on any such provisions. In the United Kingdom, for example, following upon the publication of the Cork Report, the Insolvency Act, 1986 was enacted. The key technique employed by that legislation to prevent collusive conduct is to provide for a range of voidable transactions.

Transactions entered into that constitute preferential transactions or "undervalue" transactions, are voidable if entered into within a certain period of the insolvency. Where those transactions are between the insolvent and an associate, which includes spouses, relatives and business partners, the time period within which they may be set aside is considerably longer.[13] There is also a specific provision that in the circumstances of a loan by the solvent spouse to the insolvent spouse, the solvent spouse will only be repaid after all other creditors have been paid in full.[14]

[106] The approach adopted in the United Kingdom to voidable transactions has been recommended for South Africa by the SA Law Commission.[15] Such an approach recognises that a range of people other than spouses may be responsible for collusive conduct, and also seeks to create a balance between the interests of the spouse of an insolvent and other similarly situated people and the interests of creditors of the insolvent

[107] In Canada, as well, the primary mechanism to address collusion is the "reviewability" of transactions.[16] Transactions that are not at arm's length are deemed to be reviewable and persons who share a blood relationship or are related by marriage or adoption are deemed not to transact at arm's length.[17] A further rebuttable presumption deems all property in the possession of the insolvent at the time of the insolvency to belong to him or her. Any person claiming such property must institute litigation to recover the property and must prove ownership.[18]

[108] In Australia, too, there are no provisions equivalent to section 21. Once again, the insolvency legislation renders certain transactions voidable in the interests of creditors. Sections 120–123 of the Australian Bankruptcy Act 1966–1973 govern transactions entered into by the insolvent prior to bankruptcy which are void or voidable at the instance of the trustee. In New Zealand, too, the question of collusion appears to be

16 See Part IV of the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act, RSC 1985. The provisions of this legislation are supplemented by provisions of provincial legislation, for example, sections 4 and 5 of the Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act, RSO 1990 relating to suspect transactions, and by provisions of the common law, in regard to which see Koop v Smith (1915) 25 DLR 355 (SCC). In Skalbania (Trustee of) v Wedgewood Village Estates Ltd (1989) 60 DLR (4th) 43 (BCCA), a majority of the court held that the presumption deeming related persons not to transact at arm's length was irrebuttable and did not infringe either the right to equality or liberty under the Charter. regulated primarily through the mechanism of voidable transactions.[19] In both Australia and New Zealand, the legislation contains provisions similar to that existing in the United Kingdom concerning loans by the solvent spouse to the insolvent spouse.[20]

[109] In Germany, there is a presumption that movable property in the possession of the insolvent spouse or in possession of both spouses is the property of the insolvent spouse. This provision, while bearing some similarity to section 21, is far narrower in scope – it contains no automatic vesting provision; it is restricted only to movable property and where the goods are for the exclusive personal use of one of the spouses, the goods will be deemed to be the property of that particular spouse.[21] Indeed, there is only one legal system that I have been able to identify where a provision similar to section 21 operates, that is the Netherlands. Articles 61 and 62 of the Faillissementswet of 1893 (as amended) stipulate that all property of a solvent spouse will fall within the insolvent estate and will be under the control of the curator from whom the spouse may reclaim property that is his or her exclusive property.

[110] This brief survey of foreign jurisdictions suggests that a variety of mechanisms are used to achieve purposes similar to those that motivate section 21. Most common is the mechanism of the voidable transaction, often accompanied by provisions which render transactions between spouses and people similarly situated particularly suspect or suspect for longer periods of time prior to the insolvency. The absence of provisions equivalent to section 21 in many foreign jurisdictions suggests that such provisions are not an essential component of insolvency law.

[111] In summary, in determining whether section 21 meets the test for justifiability set by section 33, I must weigh the infringement of section 8(2) against the purpose and effect of section 21. As to the first, I have concluded that there is unfair discrimination against spouses. Although the extent of the infringement is not extremely offensive or egregious, it nevertheless constitutes a significant limitation of that right. On the other hand, although the purpose of section 21 is an important one, the relationship between purpose and effect is not closely drawn. In particular, the balance between the interests of the spouse of the insolvent and the interests of the creditors of the insolvent estate seems to favour the interests of creditors disproportionately. The absence of similar provisions in other legal systems seems to support the conclusion that that balance has not been achieved. In the circumstances, I conclude that section 21 does not meet the test of section 33 and is therefore inconsistent with the provisions of the interim Constitution.

Challenge to the provisions of sections 64 and 65

[112] The applicant argues that to the extent that these provisions permit the investigation of the spouse's business, affairs or property at the meetings of creditors, they are inconsistent with the right to equality and the right to privacy in the Constitution. The amicus contends that the provisions are not unconstitutional. According to the amicus the primary purpose of the extended enquiry aspects of sections 64 and 65 is to enable the trustee fully to investigate and untangle the affairs of the spouses and, in particular, to enable the trustee to identify and recover all the assets of the insolvent estate.

[113] If the focus of the provisions remains the estate of the insolvent, and not an enquiry into the independent affairs of the solvent spouse, there can be little constitutionally objectionable in the provisions.[22] There can be no doubt that a trustee needs to be given considerable leeway to identify and recover all the assets in an insolvent estate. The trustee is generally in a position of ignorance when he or she is appointed as to those affairs, and an enquiry into those affairs in the widest sense will often be needed to ensure that the trustee's task is properly completed. I do not think that a spouse can complain about questions being asked concerning his or her property, business or affairs if such questions are relevant in some way to the insolvent estate itself. Any person who has knowledge of the estate may be called upon to answer such questions.

[114] Complaint both under section 8 and section 13 of the interim Constitution could only arise, it seems to me, if questions could be asked of the spouse or someone else relating to the business, affairs or property of the spouse which bore no relevance to the insolvent estate at all. The question then is whether, upon a proper reading of sections 64 and 65 of the Act, this could happen. It is true that the provisions under challenge expressly permit the business, affairs or property of the spouse of the insolvent to be the subject of investigation at creditors' meetings. The provisions contain no express qualification to suggest that such investigation will be permitted only to the extent that it is relevant to the investigation of the insolvent estate.

[115] There has been no reported judgment of any court considering the scope of the enquiry in relation to the estate of the solvent spouse. On the other hand, it is plain that it has long been recognised that the subject matter of the investigations that take place at creditors' meetings is "the affairs of the insolvent taken in the very widest sense."[23] And that the relevance of any particular question put to a witness will be determined by the subject matter of the enquiry.[24] Section 65(1) also provides that a presiding officer must disallow questions which are irrelevant. It is also clear from the subsection and from the reported decisions that the person presiding at creditors' meetings has wide powers to call and interrogate witnesses on all relevant matters.[25]

[116] The challenged provisions need to be read in the context of the Act as a whole and in particular in the context of a clear understanding that the purpose of creditors' meetings is to facilitate the final sequestration of the estate of the insolvent. Where the business, affairs or property of a spouse is relevant to that exercise, it is clear that such matters may be the subject of interrogation. However, where such affairs are not relevant, and it is clear that they are not relevant, then questions concerning such affairs will not be permissible at a creditor's meeting. In my view, therefore, sections 64(2) and 65(1) do not permit questions to be put to the spouse of an insolvent at a creditors' meeting concerning matters falling beyond the affairs of the insolvent estate, where it is clear from the information in the possession of the trustee that those matters do indeed fall outside the subject matter of the enquiry which is the "affairs of the insolvent in the widest sense". That interpretation of the provisions seems to be consistent with the purpose and intention of the Act. If, however, I am wrong, there is no doubt that the interpretation I have proposed is an interpretation that sections 64(2) and 65(1) are reasonably capable of bearing. Therefore it is that meaning that should be adopted in the light of the provisions of section 35(2) of the interim Constitution which provides:

This approach, it seems to me, is consistent with the approach adopted by this Court in Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC) at paras 62–3 and Nel v Le Roux NO and Others 1996 (3) SA 562 (CC); 1996 (4) BCLR 592 (CC) at paras 8–9. For these reasons, therefore, I agree with Goldstone J that the challenge to the provisions of sections 64(2) and 65(1) of the Act should fail.

[117] In conclusion, therefore, I find that section 21 is inconsistent with the provisions of the interim Constitution, but that the provisions of sections 64(2) and 65(1) of the Act are not.

Madala J and Mokgoro J concur in the judgment of O'Regan J.

SACHS J:

[118] In my view, section 21 of the Insolvency Act 24 of 1936 (the "Act") represents more than an inconvenience to or burden upon the solvent spouse. It affronts his or her personal dignity as an independent person within the spousal relationship and perpetuates a vision of marriage rendered archaic by the values of the interim Constitution,[1] thereby being unfair in terms of section 8(2) of the interim Constitution. It is in this one crucial respect that I find myself unable to concur in what I consider to be an otherwise admirable exposition and analysis of the issues by Goldstone J. I agree with his analysis of the law, and disagree only with the way he applies it in the circumstances of the present case.

[119] Goldstone J holds that the differentiation between solvent spouses and other persons who had dealings with insolvents is disadvantageous to the former and that the disadvantage relates to the attributes or characteristics of solvent spouses, thereby discriminating against them.[2] He goes on, however, to find that the inconvenience or prejudice suffered by solvent spouses in the context of the Act does not lead to an impairment of their fundamental dignity or constitute an impairment of a comparably serious nature.[3] He accordingly concludes that the applicant has not established that the discrimination was unfair. I shall briefly explain why, accepting his overall approach to the matter, I find that in fact the dignity and the fundamental rights of personality of solvent spouses are adversely affected in a manner which is unfair and violates section 8(2).

3 At para 67 above.

[120] Manifestly patriarchal in origin,[4] section 21 promotes a concept of marriage in which, independently of the living circumstances and careers of the spouses, their estates are merged. If the focus of the legislation had been on members of households rather than on spouses and had related to household property rather than to whole estates, then the inconvenience such merging caused would have been substantial but would not have raised issues of unfairness. As it is, its reach is too narrow in respect of the classes of persons affected and too wide in relation to the members of the group selected and the range of property which automatically vests to be considered purely as a pragmatic device to deal with collusion of spouses or confusion of goods. Its underlying premise is that one business mind is at work within the marriage, not two. This stems from and reinforces a stereotypical view of the marriage relationship which, in the light of the new constitutional values, is demeaning to both spouses.

[121] Take the case of Jill, a cabinet minister, judge, attorney, doctor, teacher, nurse, taxi driver or research assistant. She has a career, income and estate quite separate from that

[4] This is evidenced by the language used in the interpretation of the section. Greenberg JP in Maudsley's Trustees v Maudsley 1940 TPD 399 at 404 said:

> " One knows that before the amendment of the law in 1926, it was a common practice for traders (and perhaps others) to seek to avoid payment of their debts by putting property in their wives' names; on insolvency the burden rested on the trustee to attack the wife's title."

The assumption is that husbands acquire property and use their wives as repositories so as to deceive creditors. So strong is the assumption that even in argument in the present case the solvent spouses were generally referred to in the feminine.

of her spouse Jack, who for his part has his own career, income and estate. If Jack falls down and breaks his financial crown, it is only on manifestly unfair assumptions about the nature of marriage that Jill should be compelled by the law to come tumbling after him. Their marriage vows were to support each other in sickness and in health, not in insolvency and solvency.

[122] The question, then, is not whether the trustee acts fairly in his or her application of the law, but whether the law itself, in selecting out a group defined in terms of marital relationship, is fair in its rationale, reach and impact. Any appraisal of fairness must, of course, include a balancing of fairness to the creditors with fairness to the solvent spouse. The less the solvent spouse is targeted because of assumptions made about spousal relationships and the more as a result of legitimate concern for the interests of the creditors, the less scope is there for an inference of unfairness. On this question, it is significant that the Act provides adequate mechanisms for securing assets as well as for setting aside voidable dispositions in terms of section 26, voidable preferences in terms of section 29, undue preferences in terms of section 30 or collusive transactions in terms of section 31, without gratuitously intruding on spousal autonomy by virtue of section 21. The conclusion one must draw is that the raison d'etre of the legislation is a blunderbuss application of the stereotype and not a fine-tuned satisfaction of the claims.

[123] Nor is the degree of inconvenience the critical factor. Rather, what is most relevant to the question of unfairness is the assumption which puts together what constitutional respect for human dignity[5] and privacy[6] requires be kept asunder. This is one of those areas where to homogenise is not to equalise, but to reinforce social patterns that deny the achievement of equality as promised by the Preamble[7] and section 8[8]. The intrusion might indeed seem relatively slight. Yet an oppressive hegemony associated with the grounds contemplated by section 8(2) may be constructed not only, or even mainly, by the grand exercise of naked power. It can also be established by the accumulation of a multiplicity of detailed, but interconnected, impositions, each of which, de-contextualised and on its own, might be so minor as to risk escaping immediate attention, especially by those not disadvantaged by them. The path which this Court embarked upon in Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another[9] and President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo,[10] and as confirmed in the judgment of Goldstone J in the present matter, requires it to pay special regard to patterns of advantage and disadvantage experienced in real life which might not be evident on the face of the legislation itself. As Wilson J pointed out in R v Turpin:

> ". . . it is important to look not only at the impugned legislation which has created a distinction that violates the right to equality but also the larger social, political and legal context. . . . A finding that there is discrimination will, I think, in most but perhaps not all cases, necessarily entail a search for disadvantage that exists apart from and independent of the particular legal distinction being challenged."[11]

The larger historical context is well articulated by O'Regan J. I am satisfied that the present case points to a form of disadvantage affecting what one might call the moral citizenship (independence and self-fulfilment) of persons who happen to be married.

[124] The incremental development of equality jurisprudence presaged by Prinsloo requires us to examine on a case by case basis the way in which a challenged law impacts on persons belonging to a class contemplated by section 8(2). In particular, it is necessary to evaluate in a contextual manner how the legal underpinnings of social life reduce or enhance the self-worth of persons identified as belonging to such groups. Being trapped in a stereotyped and outdated view of marriage inhibits the capacity for self-realisation of the spouses, affects the quality of their relationship with each other as free and equal persons within the union, and encourages society to look at them not as "a couple" made up of two persons with independent personalities and shared lives, but as "a couple" in which each loses his or her individual existence. If this is not a direct invasion of fundamental dignity it is clearly of comparable impact and seriousness.

[125] Counsel were unable to point to any other open and democratic society where solvent spouses are singled out for this kind of treatment.[12] Given contemporary international values, I am not surprised, and join with O'Regan J in registering my dissent.

JUDGMENT

ACKERMANN J:

Introduction

[1] This matter concerns the confirmation of a declaration of constitutional invalidity of -

(a) section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act, 1957;

(b) the inclusion of sodomy as an item in Schedule 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977 ("Schedule 1 of the CPA"); and

(c) the inclusion of sodomy as an item in the schedule to the Security Officers Act, 1987 ("the Security Officers Act Schedule");

made by Heher J in the Witwatersrand High Court on 8 May 1998.[1] These declarations were made and referred to this Court for confirmation under section 172(2)(a) of the 1996 Constitution.[2]

[2] The full order made by Heher J reads as follows:

"1. It is declared that the common-law offence of sodomy is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996.

2. It is declared that the common-law offence of commission of an unnatural sexual act is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 to the extent that it criminalises acts committed by a man or between men which, if committed by a woman or between women or between a man and a woman, would not constitute an offence.

2 The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996. The new Rules of the Constitutional Court were only promulgated on 29 May 1998 and the present referral by the High Court took place according to the procedure sanctioned by this Court in Parbhoo and Others v Getz NO and Another 1997 (10) BCLR 1337 (CC); 1997 (4) SA 1095 (CC) at paras 1 to 6.

3. It is declared that section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act, 1957 is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.

4. It is declared that the inclusion of sodomy as an item in Schedule 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977 is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.

5. It is declared that the inclusion of sodomy as an item in the Schedule to the Security Officers Act, 1987 is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.

6. The aforementioned orders, in so far as they declare provisions of Acts of Parliament invalid, are referred to the Constitutional Court for confirmation in terms of section 172(2)(a) of Act 108 of 1996."

The learned judge correctly did not refer orders (1) and (2) to this Court for confirmation because section 172(2)(a)[3] of the 1996 Constitution neither requires confirmation by the Constitutional Court of orders of constitutional invalidity of common law offences nor empowers a referral for such purpose.

[3] Which provides as follows:

"The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court."

[3] Orders (1) and (2) would ordinarily become final when the period for instituting appeal proceedings against these orders to the Supreme Court of Appeal or this Court lapsed and no such appeal proceedings had been commenced by that time. I shall deal later with the problems that can arise because the Constitution makes no provision for an obligatory referral in such cases.

[4] The first applicant is the National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality, a voluntary association of gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered people in South Africa and of 70 organisations and associations representing gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered people in South Africa. The second applicant is the South African Human Rights Commission which functions under section 184 of the 1996 Constitution.[4] The three respondents are the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Safety and Security, and the Attorney-General of the Witwatersrand. Initially the applicants sought the following relief in the High Court:

> "(a) an order declaring that the common-law offence of sodomy is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 (Act 108 of 1996) ("the Constitution") and invalid;

[4] The Human Rights Commission was established under section 115 of the interim Constitution (the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993) and continues to function as such by virtue of item 20 of Schedule 6 to the 1996 Constitution.

(b) an order invalidating any conviction for the offence of sodomy if that conviction related to conduct committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or review of the relevant judgment, is pending or the time for noting an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired;

(c) an order declaring that the common-law offence of commission of an unnatural sexual act between men is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid;

(d) an order invalidating any conviction for the offence of commission of an unnatural sexual act between men if that conviction related to conduct committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or review of the relevant judgment, is pending or the time for noting an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired;

(e) an order declaring that section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act, 1957 (Act 23 of 1957) is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid;

(f) an order setting aside any conviction for the offence of contravening section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act 1957 (Act 23 of 1957), if that conviction related to conduct committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or review of the relevant judgment is pending or the time for noting an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired;

(g) an order declaring the inclusion of sodomy as an item in Schedule 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977 (Act 51 of 1977) is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid;

(h) an order invalidating any act performed after 27 April 1994 under authority of the inclusion of sodomy as an item in Schedule 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act (Act 51 of 1977);

(i) an order declaring that the inclusion of sodomy as an item in the Schedule to the Security Officers Act, 1987 (Act 92 of 1987) is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid;

(j) an order invalidating any act performed after 27 April 1994 under authority of the inclusion of sodomy as an item in the Schedule to the Security Officers Act (Act 92 of 1987);

(k) an order granting the Applicants further and/or alternative relief;

(l) only if this application should be opposed, an order directing the Respondent or Respondents so opposing to pay the First Applicant's costs."

[5] The second and third respondents at no stage opposed the application. The first respondent initially opposed the application on very limited grounds. When, however, the applicants withdrew their prayers (h) and (j) above, before the hearing in the High Court commenced, the first respondent withdrew such opposition and consequently no order for costs was sought by the applicants. At a later stage of the High Court proceedings, the applicants abandoned the relief sought in prayers (b) and (d). Without abandoning the relief sought in prayer (f), the applicants did not pursue such relief in the High Court because they were of the view that only the Constitutional Court had jurisdiction to grant relief having the generalised effect of this prayer. These matters are alluded to because of the difficulties arising from the orders sought from this Court, which will be dealt with later in this judgment.

[6] The second and third respondents were not represented at the hearing before this Court, despite being invited to do so in the directions of the President under rule 15(5) of the Constitutional Court Rules.[5] On behalf of the first respondent, the State Attorney intimated that the first respondent abided by the orders made in the High Court, that no written argument would be lodged on his behalf as requested in the President's directions and that he would be represented at the hearing "to assist the court in the event the court puts any questions to his representative." At the hearing the first respondent was represented by Ms Masemola. The Centre for Applied Legal Studies was admitted as amicus curiae under rule 9, lodged heads of argument and was allowed to present oral argument before the Court.

[7] The CPA and various other statutes contain provisions linked to certain offences which are not expressly identified in such provisions, but are merely described as offences listed in Schedule 1 of the CPA. The effect of the inclusion of the offence of sodomy in Schedule 1 is, amongst other things, the following:

(i) Section 37(1)(a)(iv) of the CPA empowers any police official to take fingerprints, palm-prints or footprints of any person on whom a summons has been served in respect of the offence of sodomy;

(ii) Section 40(1)(b) of the CPA allows a peace officer to arrest any person with or without a valid warrant, if the officer reasonably suspects that that person has committed sodomy;

(iii) Section 42(1)(a) of the CPA allows a private person to arrest any person with or without a valid warrant if the private person reasonably suspects the individual has committed sodomy;

(iv) Section 49(2) of the CPA allows a person authorised to arrest an individual suspected of having committed sodomy to kill the suspect if, upon attempting to arrest the suspect, such person cannot arrest the suspect, or the suspect flees, and there is no other way to arrest the suspect or to prevent him from fleeing;

(v) Sections 60(4)(a), 60(5)(e) and 60(5)(g) of the CPA provide that bail may be refused to an accused who is likely to commit sodomy and, in determining whether that will happen, the Court may take into account that the accused has a disposition to do so or has previously committed sodomy while released on bail;

(vi) Section 185A(1) of the CPA provides for the protection of witnesses who have given or who are likely to give material evidence with reference to the offence of sodomy;

(vii) Section 3(1)(b) of the Interception and Monitoring Prohibition Act, 127 of 1992 (read with the definition of "serious offence" under section 1 of that Act), allows the state to intercept postal articles and private communications necessary for investigating sodomy;

(viii) Section 13(8) of the South African Police Service Act, 68 of 1995 gives wide powers to members of the South African Police Service to erect roadblocks in the prevention, detection and investigation of the offence of sodomy;

(ix) Section 1(8) and (9) of the Special Pensions Act, 69 of 1996 disqualifies persons convicted of the offence of sodomy from receiving or continuing to receive a pension in terms of section 1 of that Act;

(x) Section 2(1)(c) of the Special Pensions Act precludes a surviving spouse or surviving dependent from receiving a surviving dependant's pension if the pensioner has been convicted of the offence of sodomy.

[8] In terms of the Security Officers Act certain negative consequences follow if a person is found guilty of certain offences or commits certain acts listed in the Schedule to such Act. The offence of sodomy is listed in such schedule. The effect of the inclusion of the offence of sodomy in the Security Officers Act Schedule is the following:

(i) Under section 12(1)(b) of the Security Officers Act any person convicted of sodomy is prohibited from registering as a security officer.

(ii) Under section 15(1)(a)(i) the registration of a security officer who is found guilty of sodomy may be withdrawn.

(iii) Under section 20(1)(b) a security officer who commits sodomy may be found guilty of improper conduct.

[9] Although the constitutionality of the common law offence of sodomy is not directly before us, a finding of constitutional invalidity is an indispensable and unavoidable step in concluding that the provisions referred to in paragraphs (4) and (5) of the order are constitutionally invalid. In this indirect sense the correctness or otherwise of the High Court's finding regarding the offence of sodomy is before this Court and has to be decided.

provisions of the two Constitutions dealing with the guarantee of equality. Both are relevant for issues to be dealt with later. Section 8 of the interim Constitution,[6] to the extent presently relevant, provided:

> "(1) Every person shall have the right to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law.
> (2) No person shall be unfairly discriminated against, directly or indirectly, and, without derogating from the generality of this provision, on one or more of the following grounds in particular: race, gender, sex, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture or language.
>
> (3) (a) This section shall not preclude measures designed to achieve the adequate protection and advancement of persons or groups or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, in order to enable their full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms.

Section 9 of the 1996 Constitution stipulates:

6 The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1993.

"(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.

(2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

(3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

The High Court Judgment

[11] Heher J, in the High Court, based his judgment declaring the common law crime of sodomy to be inconsistent with the 1996 Constitution exclusively on the breach of the right to equality. So too did Farlam J (Ngcobo J concurring) in S v K,[7] a case heavily relied on by Heher J in coming to the conclusion that the common law crime of sodomy ceased to exist after the coming into effect of the interim Constitution[8]. Before the new constitutional order came into operation in our country, the common law offence of sodomy differentiated between gays and heterosexuals and between gays and lesbians. It criminally proscribed sodomy between men and men, even in private between consenting adults, but not between men and women; nor did it proscribe intimate sexual acts in private between consenting adult women. As far as there being any rational connection between such differentiation and a legitimate government purpose,[9] Heher J simply held that:

> ". . . respondents have not suggested a reasoned basis for the differentiation which may further the aims of government and I am unable to think of any."[10]

Heher J pointed out that if the differentiation was on one of the grounds listed in section 9(3) of the 1996 Constitution (in the present case on the ground of "sexual orientation") it was presumed to be unfair (under section 9(5)). He immediately proceeded to consider whether the offence of sodomy was justified under section 36 of the 1996 Constitution, without expressly considering the question whether, notwithstanding the presumption under section 9(3), it had been established that the discrimination was fair. He found (by necessary implication) that no such justification existed and held that the crime in question could not withstand constitutional scrutiny in as much as "no rational basis for [its] retention . . . can be offered."[11]

As is pointed out in para 18 below it is not in all cases obligatory to embark on the rational connection analysis.

[12] Heher J's approach to the common law offence of committing an unnatural sexual act was different. Having found, under section 9(1) of the 1996 Constitution, that there was no connection between the differentiation involved in this offence and any legitimate governmental purpose, he immediately turned to the question of justification. He concluded that there was no justification for maintaining the common law crime of committing an unnatural sexual act by a man or between men, if such act would not constitute an offence if committed by a woman, between women or between a man and a woman; and made a declaration of constitutional inconsistency accordingly.

> "(1) A male person who commits with another male person at a party any act which is calculated to stimulate sexual passion or to give sexual gratification, shall be guilty of an offence.
> (2) For the purposes of subsection (1) 'a party' means any occasion where more than two persons are present.
> (3) The provisions of subsection (1) do not derogate from the common law, any other provision of this Act or a provision of any other law."

[11] Id at 750E.

The High Court found that these provisions manifested a twofold differentiation. First, differentiation on the grounds of "sex (gender)" because the provisions criminalised only certain conduct by men; no acts of an equivalent nature performed by women or by men and women together are criminalised under the Act. Second, on grounds of sexual orientation, because "the target of the section is plainly men with homosexual tendencies albeit that the wording is wide enough to embrace heterosexuals."[12] Neither basis for differentiation, the judgment proceeds, bears a rational connection to any legitimate governmental purpose. As both are listed in section 9(3) unfairness is presumed, and without considering whether fairness had been established, Heher J immediately proceeded to consider whether the violation of section 9 could be justified under section 36.[13] He found that it could not.[14] Having found the offence of sodomy to be constitutionally invalid Heher J concluded, as an inescapable consequence (and correctly so on that premise), that the inclusion of sodomy in Schedule 1 of the CPA and in the Security Officers Act was likewise constitutionally invalid.

The Constitutional Validity of the Common Law Offence of Sodomy

[14] I shall for the moment deal only with sodomy which takes place in private between consenting males. The long history relating to the ways in which the South African criminal common law differentiated in its treatment of gays as opposed to its treatment of heterosexuals and lesbians, prior to the passing of the interim Constitution, has already been dealt with in at least three judgments of the High Court.[15] The conclusions can be briefly stated. The offence of sodomy, prior to the coming into force of the interim Constitution, was defined as "unlawful and intentional sexual intercourse per anum between human males", consent not depriving the act of unlawfulness, "and thus both parties commit the crime".[16] Neither anal nor oral sex in private between a consenting adult male and a consenting adult female was punishable by the criminal law. Nor was

The qualification "prior to the coming into force of the interim Constitution" is added because of the fact that certain academic writers have argued that, notwithstanding the fact that sodomy in private between consenting adult males did not survive as an offence in the face of the interim Constitution, there are instances of sodomy, for example the cases of "male" anal rape which occurs without the consent of the victim or where the victim is incapable of giving consent, which survive as sodomy. See, for example, Milton South African Law of Criminal Law and Procedure vol II 3ed (Juta, Cape Town 1996) at 250 and Snyman Criminal Law 3ed (Butterworths, Durban 1995) at 341.

any sexual act, in private, between consenting adult females so punishable.

The Infringement of the Equality Guarantee

The Equality Analysis.

[15] In what follows I will proceed on the assumption that the equality jurisprudence and analysis developed by this Court in relation to section 8 of the interim Constitution[17] is applicable equally to section 9 of the 1996 Constitution, notwithstanding certain differences in the wording of these provisions. It is relevant to mention at this point that Mr Davis, who appeared for the amicus curiae, submitted that a more substantive interpretation should be given to the provisions of section 9(1) of the 1996 Constitution than this Court has given to the provisions of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution. Mr Davis did not suggest that the outcome of this referral should be other than supported by Mr Marcus. His argument went to the reasoning used to arrive at that result. I shall deal with these submissions later in this judgment.

[16] Neither section 8 of the interim Constitution nor section 9 of the 1996 Constitution envisages a passive or purely negative concept of equality; quite the contrary. In Brink v Kitshoff NO, O'Regan J, with the concurrence of all the members of the Court, stated:

17 Namely in Brink v Kitshoff NO 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC); 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC); Harksen v Lane NO and Others 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC); 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); Larbi-Odam and Others v MEC for Education (North West Province) and Another 1997 (12) BCLR 1655 (CC); 1998 (1) SA 745 (CC); and Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC); 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC).

> "Section 8 was adopted then in the recognition that discrimination against people who are members of disfavoured groups can lead to patterns of group disadvantage and harm. Such discrimination is unfair: it builds and entrenches inequality amongst different groups in our society. The drafters realised that it was necessary both to proscribe such forms of discrimination and to permit positive steps to redress the effects of such discrimination. The need to prohibit such patterns of discrimination and to remedy their results are the primary purposes of section 8 and, in particular, subsections (2), (3) and (4)."[18]

[17] In Prinsloo[19] and in Harksen[20] a multi-stage enquiry was postulated as being necessary when an attack of constitutional invalidity was based on section 8 of the interim Constitution. In Harksen the approach was summarised as follows:

> "At the cost of repetition, it may be as well to tabulate the stages of enquiry which become necessary where an attack is made on a provision in reliance on section 8 of the interim Constitution. They are:

18 Above n 17 at para 42.

20 Above n 17.

(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.

(b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two stage analysis:

(i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

(ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation.

If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).

(c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (section 33 of the interim Constitution)."[21]

[18] This does not mean, however, that in all cases the rational connection inquiry of stage (a) must inevitably precede stage (b). The stage (a) rational connection inquiry would be clearly unnecessary in a case in which a court holds that the discrimination is unfair and unjustifiable. I proceed with the enquiry as to whether the differentiation on the ground of sexual orientation constitutes unfair discrimination. Being a ground listed in section 9(3) it is presumed, in terms of section 9(5), that the differentiation constitutes unfair discrimination "unless it is established that the discrimination is fair." Although nobody in this case contended that the discrimination was fair, the Court must still be satisfied, on a consideration of all the circumstances, that fairness has not been established.

[19] Although, in the final analysis, it is the impact of the discrimination on the complainant or the members of the affected group that is the determining factor regarding the unfairness of the discrimination, the approach to be adopted, as appears from the decision of this Court in Harksen, is comprehensive and nuanced. In Harksen, after referring to the emphasis placed on the impact of the discrimination in his judgment in Hugo, Goldstone J went on to say:

> "The nature of the unfairness contemplated by the provisions of section 8 was considered in paragraphs 41 and 43 of the majority judgment in the Hugo case.

In paragraph 41 dignity was referred to as an underlying consideration in the determination of unfairness. The prohibition of unfair discrimination in the Constitution provides a bulwark against invasions which impair human dignity or which affect people adversely in a comparably serious manner.

. . . .

In order to determine whether the discriminatory provision has impacted on complainants unfairly, various factors must be considered. These would include:

(a) the position of the complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage, whether the discrimination in the case under consideration is on a specified ground or not;

(b) the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it. If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the complainants in the manner indicated above, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question. In Hugo, for example, the purpose of the Presidential Act was to benefit three groups of prisoners, namely, disabled prisoners, young people and mothers of young children, as an act of mercy. The fact that all these groups were regarded as being particularly vulnerable in our society, and that in the case of the disabled and the young mothers, they belonged to groups who had been victims of discrimination in the past, weighed with the Court in concluding that the discrimination was not unfair;

(c) with due regard to (a) and (b) above, and any other relevant factors, the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of complainants and whether it has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or constitutes an impairment of a comparably serious nature.

These factors, assessed objectively, will assist in giving 'precision and elaboration' to the constitutional test of unfairness. They do not constitute a closed list. Others may emerge > as our equality jurisprudence continues to develop. In any event it is the cumulative effect of these factors that must be examined and in respect of which a determination must be made as to whether the discrimination is unfair."[22] (Footnotes omitted).

The Impact of the Discrimination Resulting from the Criminalisation of Sodomy on the Members of the Group(s) Affected person's (esp. political or psychological) attitude or adjustment in relation to circumstances, ideas, etc; determination of one's mental or emotional position." As to "sexual orientation", I adopt the following definition put forward by Cameron:

23 Edwin Cameron "Sexual Orientation and the Constitution: A Test Case for Human Rights" (1993) 110 SALJ 450. The article is a revised version of an inaugural lecture delivered by the author on 27 October 1992 on the acceptance by him of an ad hominem professorship in law at the University of the Witwatersrand. Despite the fact that it was conceived some 18 months prior to the adoption of the interim Constitution, its depth and lucidity of analysis is just as instructive in the present era when sexual orientation has indeed achieved constitutional protection. I have followed Cameron's use of the expressions "gay", "lesbian" and "homosexual".

> ". . . sexual orientation is defined by reference to erotic attraction: in the case of heterosexuals, to members of the opposite sex; in the case of gays and lesbians, to members of the same sex. Potentially a homosexual or gay or lesbian person can therefore be anyone who is erotically attracted to members of his or her own sex."[24]

[21] The concept "sexual orientation" as used in section 9(3) of the 1996 Constitution must be given a generous interpretation of which it is linguistically and textually fully capable of bearing. It applies equally to the orientation of persons who are bi-sexual, or transsexual and it also applies to the orientation of persons who might on a single occasion only be erotically attracted to a member of their own sex.[25]

> "The experience of subordination - of personal subordination, above all - lies behind the vision of equality."[26]

24 Id at 452.

25 A similar wider meaning is supported by Kentridge in Chaskalson and Others Constitutional Law of South Africa, Revision Service 2 (1998) at 14-26 where the learned author states:

> "Culture, sexual orientation, gender and even sex are not necessarily immutable. Rather than extending protection only to immutable human features, it should be recognized that certain choices are so important to self-definition that these too should be protected."

> "It is easy to say that everyone who is just like 'us' is entitled to equality. Everyone finds it more difficult to say that those who are 'different' from us in some way should have the same equality rights that we enjoy. Yet so soon as we say any . . . group is less deserving and unworthy of equal protection and benefit of the law all minorities and all of . . . society are demeaned. It is so deceptively simple and so devastatingly injurious to say that those who are handicapped or of a different race, or religion, or colour or sexual orientation are less worthy."[27]

> "Even when these provisions are not enforced, they reduce gay men . . . to what one author has referred to as 'unapprehended felons', thus entrenching stigma and encouraging discrimination in employment and insurance and in judicial decisions about custody and other matters bearing on orientation." 27 Per Cory J, delivering part of the joint judgment of the Canadian Supreme Court in Vriend v Alberta (an as yet unreported judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada, File No: 25285, delivered on 2 April 1998) at para 69.

The European Court of Human Rights has correctly, in my view, recognised the often serious psychological harm for gays which results from such discriminatory provisions:

> "[o]ne of the effects of criminal sanctions against homosexual acts is to reinforce the misapprehension and general prejudice of the public and increase the anxiety and guilt feelings of homosexuals leading, on occasions, to depression and the serious consequences which can follow . . ."[29]

So has the Supreme Court of Canada in Vriend v Alberta:[30]

> "Perhaps most important is the psychological harm which may ensue from this state of affairs. Fear of discrimination will logically lead to concealment of true identity and this must be harmful to personal confidence and self-esteem. Compounding that effect is the implicit message conveyed by the exclusion, that gays and lesbians, unlike other individuals, are not worthy of protection. This is clearly an example of a distinction which demeans the individual and strengthens and perpetrates [sic] the view that gays and lesbians are less worthy of protection as individuals in Canada's society. The potential harm to the dignity and perceived worth of gay and lesbian individuals constitutes a particularly cruel form of discrimination."

These observations were made in the context of discrimination on grounds of sexual orientation in the employment field and would apply with even greater force to the criminalisation of consensual sodomy in private between adult males.

[24] But such provisions also impinge peripherally in other harmful ways on gay men which go beyond the immediate impact on their dignity and self-esteem. Their consequences -

> "legitimate or encourage blackmail, police entrapment, violence ('queer-bashing') and peripheral discrimination, such as refusal of facilities, accommodation and opportunities."[31]

[25] The impact of discrimination on gays and lesbians is rendered more serious and their vulnerability increased by the fact that they are a political minority not able on their own to use political power to secure favourable legislation for themselves.[32] They are accordingly almost exclusively reliant on the Bill of Rights for their protection.

[26] I turn now to consider the impact which the common law offence of sodomy has on gay men in the light of the approach developed by this Court and referred to in paragraph 19 above:

> "Traditionally disadvantaged groups such as women and blacks both constitute a majority of the South African population. Gays and lesbians, by contrast, are by definition a minority. Paradoxically, their perpetuation as a social category is dependent on the survival of the procreative heterosexual majority. Their seclusion from political power is in a sense thus ordained, and they will never on their own be able to use political power to secure legislation in their favour."

(a) The discrimination is on a specified ground. Gay men are a permanent minority in society and have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage. The impact is severe, affecting the dignity, personhood and identity of gay men at a deep level. It occurs at many levels and in many ways and is often difficult to eradicate.

(b) The nature of the power and its purpose is to criminalise private conduct of consenting adults which causes no harm to anyone else. It has no other purpose than to criminalise conduct which fails to conform with the moral or religious views of a section of society.

(c) The discrimination has, for the reasons already mentioned, gravely affected the rights and interests of gay men and deeply impaired their fundamental dignity.

[27] The above analysis confirms that the discrimination is unfair.[33] There is nothing which can be placed in the other balance of the scale. The inevitable conclusion is that the discrimination in question is unfair and therefore in breach of section 9 of the 1996

Similarly, the more invasive the nature of the discrimination upon the interests of the individuals affected by the discrimination, the more likely it will be held to be unfair."

Constitution.

The Common-law Offence of Sodomy as an Infringement of the Rights to Dignity and Privacy

[28] Thus far I have considered only the common-law crime of sodomy on the basis of its inconsistency with the right to equality. This was the primary basis on which the case was argued. In my view, however, the common-law crime of sodomy also constitutes an infringement of the right to dignity which is enshrined in section 10 of our Constitution. As we have emphasised on several occasions,[34] the right to dignity is a cornerstone of our Constitution. Its importance is further emphasised by the role accorded to it in section 36 of the Constitution which provides that:

> "The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom. . .".

ACKERMANN J

Dignity is a difficult concept to capture in precise terms.[35] At its least, it is clear that the constitutional protection of dignity requires us to acknowledge the value and worth of all individuals as members of our society. The common-law prohibition on sodomy criminalises all sexual intercourse per anum between men: regardless of the relationship of the couple who engage therein, of the age of such couple, of the place where it occurs, or indeed of any other circumstances whatsoever. In so doing, it punishes a form of sexual conduct which is identified by our broader society with homosexuals. Its symbolic effect is to state that in the eyes of our legal system all gay men are criminals. The stigma thus attached to a significant proportion of our population is manifest. But the harm imposed by the criminal law is far more than symbolic. As a result of the criminal offence, gay men are at risk of arrest, prosecution and conviction of the offence of sodomy simply because they seek to engage in sexual conduct which is part of their experience of being human. Just as apartheid legislation rendered the lives of couples of different racial groups perpetually at risk, the sodomy offence builds insecurity and vulnerability into the daily lives of gay men. There can be no doubt that the existence of a law which punishes a form of sexual expression for gay men degrades and devalues gay men in our broader society. As such it is a palpable invasion of their dignity and a breach of section 10 of the Constitution.

[29] Counsel for the applicant argued, in the alternative, that the provisions were in breach of section 14 of the Constitution, the right to privacy. In so doing, however, the applicant adopted the reasoning of Cameron:

> "[T]he privacy argument has detrimental effects on the search for a society which is truly non-stigmatizing as far as sexual orientation is concerned. On the one hand, the privacy argument suggests that discrimination against gays and lesbians is confined to prohibiting conduct between adults in the privacy of the bedroom. This is manifestly not so. On the other hand, the privacy argument may subtly reinforce the idea that homosexual intimacy is shameful or improper: that it is tolerable so long as it is confined to the bedroom — but that its implications cannot be countenanced outside. Privacy as a rationale for constitutional protection therefore goes insufficiently far, and has appreciable drawbacks even on its own terms."[36]

[30] It seems to me that these remarks should be understood in the context in which they were made. They were made during an inaugural lecture given on 27 October 1992 at the time that negotiations concerning the new Constitution were imminent. At the time, there was considerable discussion as to what rights should or should not be included in a Bill of Rights, and the subject of the lecture was the question of how sexual orientation ought to be protected in the new Constitution. The author was asserting that sexual orientation should be treated as a ground for non-discrimination in the new Constitution and that reliance on privacy alone would be inadequate. Cameron's concern that discrimination against gay men ought not to be proscribed on the ground of the right to privacy only, is understandable. I would emphasise that in this judgment I find the offence of sodomy to be unconstitutional because it breaches the rights of equality, dignity and privacy. The present case illustrates how, in particular circumstances, the rights of equality and dignity are closely related, as are the rights of dignity and privacy.

[31] It does not seem to me that we should conclude from these remarks that where our law places a blanket criminal ban on certain forms of sexual conduct, it does not result in a breach of privacy. That cannot, in my view, be the correct interpretation of those remarks. This court has considered the right to privacy entrenched in our Constitution on several occasions. In Bernstein v Bester,[37] it was said that rights should not be construed absolutely or individualistically in ways which denied that all individuals are members of a broader community and are defined in significant ways by that membership:

> "In the context of privacy this would mean that it is only the inner sanctum of a person, such as his/her family life, sexual preference and home environment, which is shielded from erosion by conflicting rights of the community . . . . Privacy is acknowledged in the truly personal realm, but as a person moves into communal relations and activities such as business and social interaction, the scope of personal space shrinks

accordingly."[38]

[32] Privacy recognises that we all have a right to a sphere of private intimacy and autonomy which allows us to establish and nurture human relationships without interference from the outside community. The way in which we give expression to our sexuality is at the core of this area of private intimacy. If, in expressing our sexuality, we act consensually and without harming one another, invasion of that precinct will be a breach of our privacy. Our society has a poor record of seeking to regulate the sexual expression of South Africans. In some cases, as in this one, the reason for the regulation was discriminatory; our law, for example, outlawed sexual relationships among people of different races. The fact that a law prohibiting forms of sexual conduct is discriminatory, does not, however, prevent it at the same time being an improper invasion of the intimate sphere of human life to which protection is given by the Constitution in section 14. We should not deny the importance of a right to privacy in our new constitutional order, even while we acknowledge the importance of equality. In fact, emphasising the breach of both these rights in the present case highlights just how egregious the invasion of the constitutional rights of gay persons has been. The offence which lies at the heart of the discrimination in this case constitutes at the same time and independently a breach of the rights of privacy and dignity which, without doubt, strengthens the conclusion that the discrimination is unfair.

Justification

[33] Although section 36(1)[39] of the 1996 Constitution differs in various respects from section 33 of the interim Constitution[40] its application still involves a process, described

39 Which provides thus:

> "The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including-
> (a) the nature of the right;
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and
> (e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose."

40 More particularly in that the prohibition against the negation of "the essential content of the right in question" in section 33(1)(b) and the "necessary" requirement in the proviso to section 33(1) have been omitted from section 36(1) of the 1996 Constitution.

in S v Makwanyane and Another[41] as the ". . . weighing up of competing values, and ultimately an assessment based on proportionality . . . which calls for the balancing of different interests."

41 Above n 34 at para 104.

[34] In Makwanyane the relevant considerations in the balancing process were stated to include ". . . the nature of the right that is limited, and its importance to an open and democratic society based on freedom and equality; the purpose for which the right is limited and the importance of that purpose to such a society; the extent of the limitation, its efficacy and, particularly where the limitation has to be necessary, whether the desired ends could reasonably be achieved through other means less damaging to the right in question."[42] The relevant considerations in the balancing process are now expressly stated in section 36(1) of the 1996 Constitution to include those itemised in paragraphs (a) to (e) thereof. In my view this does not in any material respect alter the approach expounded in Makwanyane, save that paragraph (e) requires that account be taken in each limitation evaluation of "less restrictive means to achieve the purpose [of the limitation]."[43] Although section 36(1) does not expressly mention the importance of the right, this is a factor which must of necessity be taken into account in any proportionality evaluation.

43 See De Lange v Smuts NO and Others 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC); 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC) at para 86.

[35] The balancing of different interests must still take place. On the one hand there is the right infringed; its nature; its importance in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom; and the nature and extent of the limitation. On the other hand there is the importance of the purpose of the limitation. In the balancing process and in the evaluation of proportionality one is enjoined to consider the relation between the limitation and its purpose as well as the existence of less restrictive means to achieve this purpose.[44]

[37] Against this must be considered whether the limitation has any purpose and, if so, its importance. No valid purpose has been suggested. The enforcement of the private moral views of a section of the community, which are based to a large extent on nothing more than prejudice, cannot qualify as such a legitimate purpose. There is accordingly nothing, in the proportionality enquiry, to weigh against the extent of the limitation and its harmful impact on gays. It would therefore seem that there is no justification for the limitation.

[38] As far as religious views and influences are concerned I would repeat what was stated in S v H:[45]

> "There is still a substantial body of theological thought which holds that the basic purpose of the sexual relationship is procreation and for that reason also proscribes contraception. There is an equally strong body of theological thought that no longer holds the view. Societal attitudes to contraception and marriages which are deliberately childless are also changing. These changing attitudes must inevitably cause a change in attitudes to homo-sexuality."

[45] Above n 15 at 125A-B.

It would not be judicially proper to go further than that in the absence of properly admitted expert evidence. I think it necessary to point out, in the context of the present case, that apart from freedom of expression,[46] freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion are also constitutionally protected values under the 1996 Constitution.[47] The issues in this case touch on deep convictions and evoke strong emotions. It must not be thought that the view which holds that sexual expression should be limited to marriage between men and women with procreation as its dominant or sole purpose, is held by crude bigots only. On the contrary, it is also sincerely held, for considered and nuanced religious and other reasons, by persons who would not wish to have the physical expression of sexual orientation differing from their own proscribed by the law[48]. It is nevertheless equally important to point out, that such views, however honestly and sincerely held, cannot influence what the Constitution dictates in regard to discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation.

on human dignity, equality and freedom which would lead me to a different conclusion. In fact, on balance, they support such a conclusion. In many of these countries there has been a definite trend towards decriminalisation.

[40] In 1967 in England and Wales,[49] and in 1980 in Scotland,[50] sodomy between consenting adult males in private was decriminalised. However, in Northern Ireland the criminal law relating to sodomy remained unchanged. In 1981, in Dudgeon v United Kingdom,[51] the European Court of Human Rights held that the sodomy laws of Northern Ireland was in breach of the article 8[52] privacy provisions of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the European Convention") to the extent that they criminalised sodomy between adult consenting males in private. In 1982 Northern Ireland amended its laws accordingly.[53] The same conclusion was reached

[41] In S v Makwanyane[56] the President of the Court pointed out that because of the "margin of appreciation" allowed to the national authorities by the European Court of Human Rights, the jurisprudence of the European Court would not necessarily be a safe guide as to what would be appropriate under section 33(1) of the interim Constitution.[57] This is particularly true in the case where the European Court finds that there is no infringement of a Convention right. It was to this situation in particular that the President was, in my view, addressing himself. But when the European Court finds that there has been a contravention, it reaches this finding after due regard has been had to the particular national authority's margin of appreciation. This suggests that there must be a very clear breach.

[42] If nothing else, the judgments in Dudgeon and Norris are indicative of the changes in judicial and social attitudes in recent years. In Dudgeon, a judgment delivered nearly seventeen years ago, the following was stated:[58]

> "As compared with the era when [the] legislation was enacted, there is now a better understanding, and in consequence an increased tolerance, of homosexual behaviour to the extent that in the great majority of the member-States of the Council of Europe it is no longer considered to be necessary or appropriate to treat homosexual practices of the > kind now in question as in themselves a matter to which the sanctions of the criminal law should be applied; the Court cannot overlook the marked changes which have occurred in this regard in the domestic law of the member-States." (Footnote omitted).

[43] Article 3.3 of the German Grundgesetz (GG)[59] does not include sexual orientation as a ground on which a person may not be "favoured or disfavoured". Under section 175 of the German Criminal Law Code ("CLC") of 1935 a man who committed a sexual act ("Unzucht treibt") on another man or permitted a sexual act to be committed on himself was punishable with imprisonment; an exception could be made in the case of a man under 21 years of age. Section 175a prescribed minimum and maximum sentences for particular cases of "Unzucht treiben".[60] This section was repealed in 1969.

[44] Section 175 of the CLC was finally repealed in 1994, with the consequence that private consensual sexual relations between males are no longer criminalised. All men and women under the age of 16 now receive the same protection under section 182 of the CLC in respect of sexual acts, whether they are heterosexual, gay or lesbian.[61]

59 Article 3 reads thus:

> "(1) All persons shall be equal before the law.
> (2) Men and women shall have equal rights. The state shall promote the actual implementation of equal rights for women and men and take steps to eliminate disadvantages that now exist.
> (3) No person shall be favoured or disfavoured because of sex, parentage, race, language, homeland and origin, faith, or religious or political opinions. No person shall be disfavoured because of disability."

60 For example, where it was procured by violence or under threat of harm to life or limb section 175a(1)1 prescribed a maximum sentence of ten years.

61 See also Troendle Strafgesetzbuch 48e Auflage, section 182, Rn 1.

[45] Laws prohibiting homosexual activity between consenting adults in private have been eradicated within 23 member states that had joined the Council of Europe by 1989 and of the ten European countries that have joined since (as at 10 February 1995) nine had similarly decriminalised sodomy either before or shortly after their membership applications were granted.[62]

62 Robert Wintemute Sexual Orientation and Human Rights (Clarendon Press, Oxford 1995). Wintemute also points out at 4-5 that discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation had already been prohibited in the state constitutions of Mato Grosso and Sergipe in Brazil in 1989. In 1992 and 1993 respectively the German Länder of Brandenburg and Thüringen introduced provisions in their constitutions expressly prohibiting discrimination based on sexual orientation. Other than the South African Constitution I am not aware that such constitutional protection has been given in any national constitution; Wintemute confirms this.

[46] In Australia, all the states, with the exception of Tasmania, had by 1992 decriminalised sexual acts in private between consenting adults and some had also passed anti-discrimination laws which prohibited discrimination on the ground, amongst others, of sexual orientation.[63] However, in Toonen v Australia[64] the United Nations Human

63 South Australia became the first state to decriminalise homosexual conduct between consenting adults in 1972, followed by the Australian Capital Territory in 1976, Victoria in 1981, and both the Northern Territory and New South Wales in 1984. (See B Gaze & M Jones Law, Liberty and Australian Democracy (The Law Book Company, Sydney Ltd 1990) at 363.) Sections 5(1) and 29(3) of the 1984 South Australia Equal Opportunity Act (South Australia Act 95 of 1984) prohibits discrimination on the ground of "sexuality", which is defined to include heterosexuality, homosexuality, bisexuality or transsexuality. South Australia thus also became the first state to recognise sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. Western Australia decriminalised private adult gay sex in the Law Reform (Decriminalisation of Sodomy) Act No 32 of 1989. In 1991, the Australian Capital Territory enacted the Discrimination Act, No 81 of 1991. Section 7 of this Act explicitly includes sexuality as a prohibited ground of discrimination. Queensland, where homosexual conduct had been illegal until 1990, enacted its Anti-Discrimination Act in 1991, prohibiting discrimination on the ground of "lawful sexual activity". This was followed in 1992 by the Northern Territory's Anti Discrimination Act in 1992, No 80 of 1992. Section 19(1)(c) of this Act declared sexuality a prohibited ground of discrimination.

64 Communication Number 488/1992 (31 March 1994) UN Human Rights Committee Document No. CCPR/C/50/D/488/1992.

Rights Committee found that the Tasmanian laws prohibiting sexual activity between men violates the privacy provision of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR),[65] which entered into force for Australia on 25 December 1991.

65 Article 17 of the ICCPR determines:

> "(1) No one shall be subject to arbitrary or unlawful interference with his privacy, family, home or correspondence, nor to unlawful attacks on his honour and reputation.
> (2) Everyone has the right to the protection of the law against such interference or attacks."

[47] The Toonen finding inspired the national Human Rights (Sexual Conduct) Act[66] in 1994, promulgated to implement Australia's international obligations under article 17 of the ICCPR. Article 4(1) of this Act provides that "[s]exual conduct involving only consenting adults acting in private is not to be subject, by or under any law of the Commonwealth, a State or a Territory, to any arbitrary interference with privacy within the meaning of Article 17. . .". 1994 also saw New South Wales amending its Anti-Discrimination Act[67] to include a provision banning discrimination on the ground of homosexuality. Tasmania repealed the offending sections in its Criminal Code (the subject of the Toonen finding) in 1997. This marked the final decriminalisation of consensual homosexual sex in Australia.

67 Act 48 of 1977.

[49] Despite the fact that section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter[71] does not expressly include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination, the Canadian Supreme Court has held that sexual orientation is a ground analogous to those listed in section 15(1):

68 The Homosexual Law Reform Act 33 of 1986 removed criminal sanctions against consensual homosexual conduct between males by repealing offending sections of the Crimes Act of 1961. These were replaced by provisions criminalising sexual relations with a boy under the age of 16; sexual relations with mentally subnormal people; and indecent assault.

69 Article 19 New Zealand Bill of Rights Act 1990 reads:

> "19. Freedom from discrimination -
> (1) Everyone has the right to freedom from discrimination on the grounds of colour, race, ethnic or national origins, sex, marital status, or religious or ethical belief.
> (2) Measures taken in good faith for the purpose of assisting or advancing persons or groups of person disadvantaged because of colour, race, ethnic or national origins, sex, marital status, or religious or ethical belief do not constitute discrimination."

70 Other prohibited grounds of discrimination in section 21 include sex, marital status, religious belief, ethical belief, colour, race, ethnic or national origins, disability, age, political opinion, employment status and family status.

71 Section 15 (1) reads:

> "Every individual is equal before and under the law and has the right to the equal protection and equal benefit of the law without discrimination and, in particular, without discrimination based on race, national or ethnic origin, colour, religion, sex, age or physical disability."

"In Egan, it was held, on the basis of 'historical social, political and economic disadvantage suffered by homosexuals' and the emerging consensus among legislatures (at para 176), as well as previous judicial decisions (at para 177), that sexual orientation is a ground analogous to those listed in s. 15(1)."[72]

[50] In Canada, consensual adult sodomy ("buggery") and so-called "gross indecency" were decriminalised by statute in 1969 in respect of such acts committed in private between persons 21 years and older.[73] Currently section 159(1) and (2) of the Canadian Criminal Code, R.S.C. 1985, c. C-46 provides the following:

> "(1) Every person who engages in an act of anal intercourse is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding ten years or is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.
> (2) Subsection (1) does not apply to any act engaged in, in private, between
>
> (a) husband and wife, or
> (b) any two persons, each of whom is eighteen years of age or more, both of whom consent to the act."

According to Canadian law -

73 Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1968-69, SC 1968-69, c. 38, s. 7. "Buggery" applied to both same-sex and opposite-sex anal intercourse. '[G]ross indecency' applied to sexual acts between any two persons, and "therefore potentially to all sexual activity between men or between women, and to opposite-sex oral intercourse." (See Wintemute above n 62 at 150.)

"[a]nyone who is 14 or older, whether married or not, can consent to most forms of non-exploitative sexual conduct, including vaginal intercourse, without criminal consequences."[74]

74 (1995) 30 CRR (2d) 112 (Ontario Court of Appeal).

[51] In R v M (C)[75] the Ontario Court of Appeal held that section 159 infringes section 15(1) of the Charter. Abella JA based her finding on the ground of sexual orientation and Goodman and Catzman JJA on grounds of age. The learned Justices all agreed that the infringement was not justifiable under section 1 of the Charter. Abella JA, in her judgment dealing with the infringement of section 15(1) concluded that the distinction in age found in section 159 imposes a burden based on sexual orientation and arbitrarily disadvantages gay men by:

> "denying to them until they are 18 a choice available at the age of 14 to those who are not gay, namely, their choice of sexual expression with a consenting partner to whom they are not married."

She held that it has an adverse impact on them and arbitrarily and stereotypically perpetuates rather than narrows the gap for a historically disadvantaged group.[76]

[52] The above survey shows that in 1967 a process of change commenced in Western democracies in legal attitudes towards sexual orientation. This process has culminated, in many jurisdictions, in the decriminalisation of sodomy in private between consenting adults. By 1996 sodomy in private between consenting adults had been decriminalised in the United Kingdom and Ireland, throughout most of Western Europe, Australia (with the exception of Tasmania), New Zealand and Canada.

[53] An exception to this trend is the United States of America, as illustrated by the judgment of the Supreme Court in Bowers v Hardwick.[77] In this case, a sharply divided Court, by a majority of five to four, declared itself unpersuaded that the sodomy laws of some 25 states should be invalidated.

[54] Bowers v Hardwick has been the subject of sustained criticism.[78] It is interesting to note that in the recent case of Romer v Evans,[79] the United States Supreme Court has, without referring to its decision in Bowers v Hardwick, struck down an amendment to the Colorado State Constitution which prohibited public measures designed to protect persons based on their sexual orientation.

78 See, for example, Tribe American Constitutional Law 2ed 1428 and T Grey "Bowers v Hardwick Diminished" (1997) 68 University of Colorado Law Review 373.

[55] For purposes of the present case I consider it unnecessary to consider such criticism nor what the present standing of Bowers is in the United States. Our 1996 Constitution differs so substantially, as far as the present issue is concerned, from that of the United States of America that the majority judgment in Bowers can really offer us no assistance in the construction and application of our own Constitution. The 1996 Constitution contains express privacy and dignity guarantees[80] as well as an express prohibition of unfair discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation, which the United States Constitution does not. Nor does our Constitution or jurisprudence require us, in the way that the United States Constitution requires of its Supreme Court, in the case of ". . . rights not readily identifiable in the Constitution's text," to ". . . identify the nature of the rights qualifying for heightened judicial protection".[81]

[56] There are other democratic countries beside the United States which have not yet decriminalised sodomy in private between consenting adult males. Unlike the constitutions of these countries, however, our 1996 Constitution specifically mentions "sexual orientation" as a listed ground in section 9(3) on which the state may not unfairly discriminate, it being presumed (until the contrary is established) that discrimination on such ground constitutes unfair discrimination and thus a breach of section 9.[82]

82 Section 9(5).

[57] A number of open and democratic societies have turned their backs on the criminalisation of sodomy in private between adult consenting males, despite the fact that sexual orientation is not expressly protected in the equality provisions of their constitutions. Their reasons for doing so, which are referred to above, fortify the conclusion which I have reached that the limitation in question in our law regarding such criminalisation cannot be justified under section 36(1) of the 1996 Constitution. I would have reached this conclusion if the right to equality alone had been breached. The fact that the constitutional rights of gay men to dignity and privacy have also been infringed places justification even further beyond the bounds of possibility.

Submission on Behalf of the Amicus Curiae

[58] It is convenient at this stage to deal with the submissions advanced on behalf of the amicus curiae. As already mentioned above it is not suggested that these submissions would or should lead to a result any different from that contended for by Mr Marcus on behalf of the applicant. The thrust of Mr Davis's submissions was that this Court's interpretation of section 8(1) of the interim Constitution is inadequate in that it does not give sufficient weight or emphasis to what he called substantive equality. He contended that section 9(1) differed substantially from its predecessor chiefly because the words "and benefit" had been added to the words "equal protection".

[59] There is no substance in this last submission. Whatever the proper construction of section 9 as a whole may be, the addition of the words "and benefit" in section 9(1) has not resulted in any change of substance in its objectives. Section 9(1) makes clear what was already manifestly implicit in section 8(1) of the interim Constitution, namely, that both in conferring benefits on persons and by imposing restraints on state and other action, the state had to do so in a way which results in the equal treatment of all persons. It was indeed so decided in Hugo's case, where a benefit granted to the mothers of children below the age of twelve years, but not to the fathers of such children, was held to constitute discrimination for purposes of section 8(2) of the interim Constitution and presumed to be unfair, because the discrimination was based on a combination of grounds listed in section 8(2).[83]

[60] Before dealing with Mr Davis's remaining submissions, it is necessary to comment on the nature of substantive equality, a contested expression which is not found in either of our Constitutions. Particularly in a country such as South Africa, persons belonging to certain categories have suffered considerable unfair discrimination in the past. It is insufficient for the Constitution merely to ensure, through its Bill of Rights, that statutory provisions which have caused such unfair discrimination in the past are eliminated. Past unfair discrimination frequently has ongoing negative consequences, the continuation of which is not halted immediately when the initial causes thereof are eliminated, and unless remedied, may continue for a substantial time and even indefinitely. Like justice, equality delayed is equality denied.

[61] The need for such remedial or restitutionary measures has therefore been recognised in sections 8(2) and 9(3) of the interim and 1996 Constitutions respectively. One could refer to such equality as remedial or restitutionary equality. In addition, as was recognised in Hugo, treating people identically can sometimes result in inequality:

83 Above n 17 at paras 32 and 108.

> "We need, therefore, to develop a concept of unfair discrimination which recognises that although a society which affords each human being equal treatment on the basis of equal worth and freedom is our goal, we cannot achieve that goal by insisting upon identical treatment in all circumstances before that goal is achieved. Each case, therefore, will require a careful and thorough understanding of the impact of the discriminatory action upon the particular people concerned to determine whether its overall impact is one which furthers the constitutional goal of equality or not. A classification which is unfair in one context may not necessarily be unfair in a different context."[84]

It is in this latter way that we have encapsulated the notion of substantive as opposed to formal equality.

[62] Section 9 of the 1996 Constitution, like its predecessor, clearly contemplates both substantive and remedial equality. Substantive equality is envisaged when section 9(2) unequivocally asserts that equality includes "the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms." The State is further obliged "to promote the achievement of such equality" by "legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination," which envisages remedial equality. This is not to suggest that principles underlying remedial equality do not operate

84 Above n 17 at para 41. In a footnote to the above passage the following is stated:

> " It is the logical corollary of the principle that 'like should be treated like', that treating unlike alike may be as unequal as treating like unlike. See the discussion in Kentridge 'Equality' in Chaskalson et al Constitutional Law of South Africa (Juta & Co Ltd, Kenwyn 1996) at para 14.2."

elsewhere. This was clearly recognised in Harksen when, in dealing with the purpose of the provision or power as a factor to be considered in deciding whether the discriminatory provision has impacted unfairly on complainants, Goldstone J held:

> "If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the complainants in the manner indicated above, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question. In Hugo, for example, the purpose of the Presidential Act was to benefit three groups of prisoners, namely, disabled prisoners, young people and mothers of young children, as an act of mercy. The fact that all these groups were regarded as being particularly vulnerable in our society, and that in the case of the disabled and the young mothers, they belonged to groups who had been victims of discrimination in the past, weighed with the Court in concluding that the discrimination was not unfair ..."[85] (Footnote omitted).

[63] It is clear, moreover, that under section 8(1) of the interim Constitution the inquiry would encompass both direct and indirect differentiation. This must necessarily follow from the reference in section 8(2) to "direct and indirect discrimination". That was implicitly held in Harksen (where the Court did not have to deal with indirect discrimination) and explicitly in Walker; the latter being a case where indirect discrimination was present and where Langa DP, on behalf of the Court, held that the

section 8(1) test was satisfied.[86]

[64] In my opinion Mr Davis's remaining contentions cannot be sustained for the following reasons:

(a) This Court has given effect to substantive equality in its interpretation of section 8 of the interim Constitution;

(b) That analysis is no less applicable to section 9 of the 1996 Constitution and the additional words "and benefit" in section 9(1) take the matter no further;

(c) There is accordingly no need to fashion a new interpretation of section 9(1) of the 1996 Constitution. Indeed, in this judgment I have engaged in a substantive analysis in support of the conclusion for which both Mr Marcus and Mr Davis contend.

[65] Thus far consideration has been given only to the criminal proscription of sodomy in private between consenting males. The common law definition of sodomy is more extensive, however, and is not limited to private consensual sex per anum between adult males. It also applies to anal sex under circumstances where one male has not consented or when one partner is below the age of consent; cases of so-called "anal rape" or "male rape", whether the victim is an adult male or a male child or infant.[87]

87 See Milton South African Criminal Law and Procedure vol II, Common-law Crimes 3ed (Juta, Cape Town 1996) at 254-5 and Snyman Criminal Law 3ed (Butterworths, Durban 1995) at 341.

[66] I am not aware of any jurisdiction which, when decriminalising private consensual sex between adult males, has not retained or simultaneously created an offence which continues to criminalise sexual relations per anum even when they occur in private, where such occur without consent or where one partner is under the age of consent. The legislature usually fixes a minimum age for the parties to enjoy the benefit of the decriminalisation. The need for retaining some control, even over consensual acts of sodomy committed in private, was recognised in Dudgeon v United Kingdom.[88] So too, in Canada, for example, anal intercourse is criminalised in general terms by statute and the only acts excluded are those committed in private between husband and wife, or between any two persons, each of whom is eighteen years of age or more, both of whom consent to the act.[89] It must be emphasised, however, that provisions so made have invariably been by way of statute.

89 See para 50 above for the relevant provisions of the statute.

[67] The question which arises is whether, in declaring the common-law offence of sodomy to be constitutionally invalid, this Court should do so only to the extent that the offence is inconsistent with the Constitution or whether this Court has the power to declare the offence invalid in its entirety. The latter was the course adopted by Heher J, notwithstanding the fact that the applicants had in argument limited their claim to relief in relation to consensual acts committed in private.[90] Section 172(1)(a)[91] of the 1996 Constitution only permits a court having the competence to do so to declare a law that is inconsistent with the Constitution invalid "to the extent of its inconsistency". Beyond that the Court is not empowered to go. It is notionally possible to declare the offence of sodomy invalid to the extent that it relates to sexual relations per anum in private between consenting males who are over the age of consent and capable of giving such consent. That is, however, not necessarily the end of the inquiry.

91 Section 172(1)(a) provides:

"When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court -

(a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency. . .”

[68] We have on occasion declared statutory provisions to be constitutionally invalid, despite the fact that this has involved a complicated formulation of the extent to which a provision was inconsistent with the Constitution.[92] Yet notional partial inconsistency is not on its own sufficient to justify such a limited order of constitutional invalidity; the issue of severability has also to be addressed. In this regard Kriegler J, in Coetzee v Government of the Republic of South Africa and Others; Matiso and Others v Commanding Officer, Port Elizabeth Prison and Others, formulated the following test for the Court:

> "Although severability in the context of constitutional law may often require special treatment, in the present case the trite test can properly be applied: if the good is not dependent on the bad and can be separated from it, one gives effect to the good that remains after the separation if it still gives effect to the main objective of the statute. The

92 Thus in Ferreira v Levin above n 34 at para 157 the following order was made:

"1. The provisions of section 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act 1973 are, with immediate effect declared invalid, to the extent only that the words:

'and any answer given to any such question may thereafter be used in evidence against him'

in section 417(2)(b) apply to the use of any such answer against the person who gave such answer, in criminal proceedings against such person, other than proceedings where that person stands trial on a charge relating to the administering or taking of an oath or the administering or making of an affirmation or the giving of false evidence or the making of a false statement in connection with such questions and answers or a failure to answer lawful questions fully and satisfactorily."

> test has two parts: first, is it possible to sever the invalid provisions and, second, if so, is what remains giving effect to the purpose of the legislative scheme?"[93]

[69] In the present case we are of course dealing with the constitutional inconsistency and invalidity of a common-law offence, but I can see no valid reason why the constitutional principles underlying the above approach should not, suitably adapted, also apply to the instant case where, on a direct application of the Bill of Rights, we have found the very core of the offence to be constitutionally invalid. There can be no doubt that the existence of the common-law offence was not dictated by the objective of punishing "male rape". The sole reason for its existence was the perceived need to criminalise a particular form of gay sexual expression; motives and objectives which we have found to be flagrantly inconsistent with the Constitution. The fact that the ambit of the offence was extensive enough to include "male rape" was really coincidental. The core of the offence was to outlaw gay sexual expression of a particular kind.

[70] We are entitled, in my view, to have regard to criminal law policy in the context of the common-law formation and development of the offence in question. If, at the time of the common-law recognition of the offence in question, legal and societal norms were such that gay sexual expression was not considered something which ought to be criminally proscribed, it is very difficult to conceive that this particular offence would have come into existence purely in order to criminalise male rape. Such an offence would in any event have been punishable as a form of assault, as indeed was anal intercourse with a woman without her consent.

[71] If one applies this approach at the present time, the same conclusion follows. Subject to the qualifications which will be expressed later in this judgment regarding the retrospectivity of the orders of constitutional invalidity, neither the coherence of the common law, nor judicial policy, requires the continued existence of a severely truncated form of the common-law offence. Acts of male rape still constitute crimes at common law, whether in the form of indecent assault or assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm. These are the criminal forms by means of which anal intercourse with a woman, without her consent, is punished. The competent punishments which can be imposed for such offences have not been restricted by statute and the severity of such punishments can be tailored to the severity of the offences committed. While refraining from any comment, one way or the other, on the constitutional validity of the age limits or differential age limits prescribed in section 14 of the Sexual Offences Act, it must be pointed out that its provisions do protect persons below a certain age against both heterosexual and homosexual acts of a prescribed nature being performed with them.

Declaring the offence to be invalid in its entirety will leave no hiatus in the criminal law.

[72] The Minister has not appealed against the unqualified order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court nor has there been any suggestion in argument on his behalf that we ought to interfere with its ambit. As indicated above, other democratic countries have dealt with male rape by way of new statutory provisions in this regard. Whether or not our legislature will follow that example is a matter for it to decide. For all the above reasons I am of the view that there is no adequate justification for making a limited declaration of invalidity in regard to the common-law offence of sodomy and that consequently there is no warrant for interfering with the ambit of the order made in the High Court in declaring the offence of sodomy constitutionally invalid in its entirety.

[73] Although, as indicated earlier in this judgment, the correctness of paragraph 1 of the High Court's order is not formally before this Court, we are obliged to consider its correctness, or the extent of its correctness, in order to consider the terms on which paragraphs 4 and 5 of the order ought to be confirmed. In my view this Court has the power to do so, inasmuch as it is an issue unavoidably connected with a decision on a constitutional matter for purposes of section 167(3)(b) of the 1996 Constitution. As a constitutional matter within its power, the Court is obliged under section 172(1)(a) to declare the offense in question invalid to the extent of its inconsistency with the Constitution. I would accordingly endorse paragraph 1 of the High Court's order declaring the common law offence of sodomy to be inconsistent with the 1996

[74] For the sake of convenience, the provisions of section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act are again quoted:

> "(1) A male person who commits with another male person at a party any act which is calculated to stimulate sexual passion or to give sexual gratification, shall be guilty of an offence.
> (2) For the purposes of subsection (1) 'a party' means any occasion where more than two persons are present.
> (3) The provisions of subsection (1) do not derogate from the common law, any other provision of this Act or a provision of any other law."

[75] The absurdly discriminatory purpose and impact of the provision can be demonstrated by numerous examples. One will suffice. A gay couple attend a social gathering attended by gay, lesbian and heterosexual couples. The gay man, in the presence of the other guests, kisses his gay partner on the mouth in a way "calculated to stimulate" both his and his partner's "sexual passion" and to give both "sexual gratification". They do no more. A lesbian and a heterosexual couple do exactly the same. The gay couple are guilty of an offence. The lesbian and heterosexual couples not. Cameron has rightly commented on the absurdity and tragic-comic consequences of this enactment.[94]

[76] There being no similar provision in relation to acts by women with women, or acts by men with women or by women with men, the discrimination is based on sexual orientation and therefore presumed to be unfair. The impact intended and caused by the provision is flagrant, intense, demeaning and destructive of self-realisation, sexual expression and sexual orientation. Because of the infinite variety of acts it encompasses

94 Cameron above n 23 at 455 where the following is stated:

> "The results of this enactment have at times been comical. Its jurisprudence includes a solemn decision by two judges of the Supreme Court that 'a party' did not come about when a police major, visiting a well-known gay sauna in Johannesburg for entrapment purposes, barged in on a cubicle where two men were engaging in sexual acts and turned on the light. The court held - in a liberal decision - that the two men's jumping apart when the major switched on the light prevented a 'party' from being constituted. [S v C 1987 (2) SA 76 (W) at 81I-J.] The outcome is a happy illustration of the absurdities attempts to enforce laws of this kind necessarily give rise to."

in its prohibition, the impact is broad and far-reaching. In relation to this provision, there is even less that can be said to counter the presumption of unfairness than in the case of sodomy. The section amounts to unfair discrimination and, for fundamentally the same reasons that were expressed above in relation to sodomy, the section cannot be justified under section 36(1) of the 1996 Constitution. There is nothing before us to show that the provision was motivated by anything other than rank prejudice and had as its purpose the stamping out of these forms of gay erotic self-expression. In my view Heher J correctly held that the provisions of section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act are inconsistent with section 9 of the Constitution and invalid.

The Constitutional Validity of Including the Offence of Sodomy in Schedule 1 of the CPA and in the Schedule to the Security Officers Act

[77] Once it is found that the offence of sodomy is inconsistent with the Constitution, its inclusion in the above schedules must necessarily also be constitutionally inconsistent. I would accordingly confirm paragraphs 4 and 5 of the High Court's order declaring that the inclusion of sodomy is inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa 1996 and invalid.

[78] I have had the opportunity of reading the concurring judgment prepared by Sachs J. I agree with the sentiments expressed therein.

[79] Before dealing with the appropriate order to be made, it is necessary to return to the matter mentioned in passing in paragraph 3 of this judgment, namely the difficulties that can arise because the 1996 Constitution does not provide for an obligatory referral when a common-law offence is declared to be constitutionally invalid by a High Court. The present case is an apt illustration. In a very formal sense, the High Court's order regarding the constitutional invalidity of the common-law offence of sodomy is not before this Court. Yet it is impossible to consider the confirmation of the orders relating to the inclusion of sodomy in the relevant schedules to the CPA and the Security Officers Act apart from the order relating to the offence of sodomy itself. It would be constitutionally intolerable if an order by a High Court striking down the offence in its entirety had to be left standing while at the same time this Court confirmed the striking down of the offence, as included in the schedules referred to, but only to a limited extent. Fortunately, for the reasons already given,[95] we are able in the particular circumstances of this case to consider the constitutional validity of the common-law offence of sodomy itself. Analogous problems arise in regard to the degrees of retrospectivity of the orders.

[80] It is fortuitous that the same High Court in the same case dealt with the common-law offence and the statutory provisions incorporating the common-law offence. It need not have been so. The common-law offence could have been declared constitutionally invalid in one case and the statutory provision in another, but both in the same High Court. This Court would then have been faced with the additional problem, when presented on confirmation with only the statutory provision, that the common-law offence had been dealt with in another case.

[81] An equally undesirable result could follow if there were conflicting decisions in different High Courts regarding the constitutional validity of the same common-law offence, or the extent of its invalidity, there being no express constitutional mechanism whereby such conflict could, as a matter of course, be finally determined for the entire country.

[82] For these reasons, it seems to me that parties to proceedings in which declarations of unconstitutionality are made should, when considering whether an appeal is appropriate, pay particular attention to the terms of the order made as well as to questions of unconstitutionality. There may be circumstances where an appeal against the terms of the order is appropriate even where there is no dispute concerning the conclusion of unconstitutionality itself.

The Order

[83] For present purposes, the relevant provisions of section 172 of the Constitution read thus:

> "(1) When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court-
>
> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including-
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.
> (2) (a) The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court.
> (d) Any person or organ of state with a sufficient interest may appeal, or apply, directly to the Constitutional Court to confirm or vary an order of constitutional invalidity by a court in terms of this subsection."

[84] Subsection (1)(b) differs in various respects from section 98(5), (6) and (7) of the interim Constitution.[96] For present purposes the significant differences are as follows:

[96] Sections 98(5), (6) and (7) of the interim Constitution provide as follows:

> "(5) In the event of the Constitutional Court finding that any law or any provision thereof is inconsistent with this Constitution, it shall declare such law or provision invalid to the extent of its inconsistency: Provided that the Constitutional Court may, in the interests of justice and good government, require Parliament or any other competent authority, within a period specified by the Court, to correct the defect in the law or provision, which shall then remain in force pending correction or the expiry of the period so specified.
> (6) Unless the Constitutional Court in the interests of justice and good government orders otherwise, and save to the extent that it so orders, the declaration of invalidity of a law or a provision thereof -
>
> (a) existing at the commencement of this Constitution, shall not invalidate anything done or permitted in terms thereof before the coming into effect of such declaration of invalidity; or
> (b) passed after such commencement, shall invalidate everything done or permitted in terms thereof.
> (7) In the event of the Constitutional Court declaring an executive or administrative act or conduct or threatened executive or administrative act or conduct of an organ of state to be unconstitutional, it may order the relevant organ of state to refrain from such act or conduct, or, subject to such conditions and within such time as may be specified by it, to correct such act or conduct in accordance with this Constitution."

(a) In regard to a declaration of constitutional invalidity of a law or a provision thereof, section 98(6) of the interim Constitution regulated the consequences of such a declaration differently, depending on whether the law was in existence at the time the interim Constitution came into effect or whether it was passed thereafter. The 1996 Constitution draws no such distinction.

(b) The effect of a declaration of invalidity (subject to the Constitutional Court's power to order otherwise) is dealt with more extensively under the interim Constitution in subparagraphs (a) and (b) of section 98(6). Under the 1996 Constitution, and in the absence of a contrary order by a competent court, nothing more is provided other than that it has retrospective effect. I infer this from the fact that the power of a competent court to make an order in this regard under section 172(1)(b)(i) is to limit "the retrospective effect of the order of constitutional invalidity," interpreted against the background of the principle of the objective theory of constitutional invalidity adopted in Ferreira v Levin[97], namely, that a pre-existing law which is inconsistent with the Constitution becomes invalid the moment the relevant provisions of the Constitution come into effect[98].

(c) The power of a competent court to make an order differing from that provided for

97 Above n 34 at paras 26-29, in particular at para 28.

98 This is of course subject to the express power granted to a competent court under section 172(1)(b)(ii) to make "an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect."

by the Constitution are differently formulated. Under the interim Constitution the provisions of section 98(6)(a) and (b) were dominant, the Constitutional Court being empowered to order otherwise than as provided in these paragraphs "in the interests of justice and good government". Under the 1996 Constitution the dominant provision of section 172(1)(b)(i) is to the effect that a competent court:

> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity;"

[85] The reasons why the applicants did not proceed with the relief sought in paragraphs (b) and (d) of their Notice of Motion[99] is explained as follows in the judgment of the High Court:

> "[Applicants] submitted that the effect of the invalidity of the common-law crimes should be considered [in] individual cases which have not yet been finalised. The concern of the applicants in this regard was that the common-law crimes prohibited some conduct which may remain prohibited despite the Constitution. If, for example, a person has been convicted of sodomy (rather than indecent assault) for an act of 'male

99 The full relief initially sought in the Notice of Motion is quoted in paragraph 4 above. Paragraphs (b) and (d) read as follows:

> "(b) an order invalidating any conviction for the offence of sodomy if that conviction related to conduct committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or review of the relevant judgment, is pending or the time for noting an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired;
> (d) an order invalidating any conviction for the offence of commission of an unnatural sexual act between men if that conviction related to conduct committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or review of the relevant judgment, is pending or the time for noting an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired".

> rape' his sodomy conviction should not be set aside without being replaced by an appropriate new conviction for indecent assault. In the opinion of the applicants' counsel the broad relief sought by their clients in paragraphs (b) and (d) did not facilitate that process and they accordingly abandoned the claim to that relief."[100]

[86] The reason why the applicants did not in the result persist with the relief sought in paragraph (f)[101] of their Notice of Motion in the High Court is reflected as follows in the judgment of that Court:

> ". . . problems of the sort posed by the common-law crimes are not presented by the invalidation of convictions in terms of section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act. The applicants submitted however that only the Constitutional Court had jurisdiction to grant relief which would have the generalised effect of the relief sought in paragraph (f) and, if they were correct in this submission, they would in due course approach the Constitutional Court for an appropriate order."[102]

[87] Although in argument before this Court, counsel for the applicants did not abandon the contention that only this Court has the power to make such an order, they did not vigorously pursue it. In my view the submission cannot be sustained. All courts competent to make declarations of constitutional invalidity have the power to make an appropriate order under section 172(1)(b)(i) if such order, in the circumstances of a particular case, is "just or equitable". This was in fact so held in S v Ntsele.[103] The real issue is whether, in the circumstances of this case, an order limiting the retrospectivity of the declaration of invalidity would indeed be just and equitable, on a proper construction of that concept in the context of the section and the Constitution as a whole.

[88] To the extent that a court of first instance has this power, such court must grapple with its exercise. This is necessary because in a given case it might be necessary to receive evidence in order to decide whether, and in what manner, such power should be exercised. It is essential that the court of first instance receive and if necessary adjudicate on such evidence, and not a court of appeal or this Court on confirmation. The importance of following such a procedure has been stressed by this Court in similar contexts on a number of occasions.[104]

[89] The above observations afford some indication of the complexities of deciding whether to limit the retrospectivity of the order and, if deciding to limit it, what order would be just and equitable. There are other difficulties, some of which were raised with counsel in argument. In the result the Court considered it advisable to invite both the applicants and the Minister to submit written argument on the most appropriate order required by the circumstances of this case. Such written arguments were duly delivered by these parties and we have considered them. It is necessary to deal with the various paragraphs of the High Court order separately.

[90] In this judgment the conclusion has already been reached that this offence should be declared constitutionally invalid in its entirety. This conclusion has been reached by a direct application of the Bill of Rights to a common-law criminal offence, not by a process of developing the common law.

[91] We reached this conclusion, despite the fact that the constitutional invalidity of the common-law offence of sodomy was not itself directly before us, because it was an indispensable and unavoidable step in concluding that the inclusion of this offence in the various statutory schedules was constitutionally invalid[105]. It was therefore a constitutional matter that the Court was compelled to decide in terms of section 172(1) of the 1996 Constitution. The Court is obliged by section 172(1)(a) in the light of this finding to make an order of invalidity. Section 172(1)(b) then empowers the Court to make any order that is "just and equitable". It is in any event impossible to make an order under section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution which is just and equitable in relation to the invalidity of the inclusion of the offence in the statutory schedules, without at the same time making such an order in relation to the constitutional invalidity of the offence itself. In order for this Court to discharge its duty properly under section 172(1)(b) in the former case, it is obliged to do so in the latter case as well. There are public interest concerns involved in this regard which go beyond the interests of the parties in the present case.

The parties can in any event suffer no prejudice. It is clear that, at the time, they were under a misapprehension as to what their concessions in relation to the order meant and also as to the effect of the order made by Heher J. All the parties requested the Court, in relation to the constitutional invalidity of the offence itself, to exercise its powers under section 172(1)(b). In my view we are constitutionally obliged to do so in the present case.

105 See paras 9 and 73 above.

[92] The criterion for the order which a court is competent to make under section 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution pursuant to a declaration of constitutional invalidity is that it must be "just and equitable". The criterion under section 98(6) of the interim Constitution was "the interests of justice and good government". There has as yet been no comprehensive judgment of this Court on the meaning of "just and equitable" in section 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution, although it has been alluded to in S v Ntsele[106] and De Lange v Smuts NO and Others.[107] Nor is it necessary to attempt such a comprehensive task in the present case.

[93] In Ntsele's case,[108] Kriegler J, dealing with the 1996 Constitution, stated that the principal features which have to be considered when contemplating the possibility of a retrospective order had been crisply summarised in the following passage from O'Regan J's judgment in S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso:[109]

> "Central to a consideration of the interests of justice in a particular case is that successful litigants should obtain the relief they seek. It is only when the interests of good government outweigh the interests of the individual litigants that the court will not grant relief to successful litigants. In principle too, the litigants before the court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants (see US v Johnson 457 US 537 (1982); Teague v Lane 489 US 288 (1989)). On the other hand, as we stated in S v Zuma (at para 43), we should be circumspect in exercising our powers under section 98(6)(a) so as to avoid unnecessary dislocation and uncertainty in the criminal justice process. As Harlan J stated in Mackey v US 401 US 667 (1971) at 691:
> > 'No one, not criminal defendants, not the judicial system, not society as a whole is benefited by a judgment providing a man shall tentatively go to jail today, but tomorrow and every day thereafter his continued incarceration shall be subject to fresh litigation on issues already resolved.'
>
> As a general principle, therefore, an order of invalidity should have no effect on cases which have been finalised prior to the date of the order of invalidity."

109 1995 (12) BCLR 1579 (CC); 1996 (1) SA 388 (CC) at para 32.

It was not the intention in Ntsele's case to suggest that the tests for retrospectivity or non-retrospectivity were identical under the interim and the 1996 Constitutions. But both Bhulwana's case and Ntsele's case were concerned with the constitutional invalidity of reverse onus provisions in the Drug and Drug Trafficking Act 140 of 1992, and it was in this context that Kriegler J observed that the above quoted observations in Bhulwana's case " . . . are directly in point here and the type of order we granted in that case is equally appropriate here."[110]

[94] The interests of good government will always be an important consideration in deciding whether a proposed order under the 1996 Constitution is "just and equitable", for justice and equity must also be evaluated from the perspective of the state and the broad interests of society generally. As in Ntsele's case, it might ultimately be decisive as to what is just and equitable. At the same time the test under the 1996 Constitution is a broader and more flexible one, where the concept of the interests of good government is but one of many possible factors to consider.

ACKERMANN J

[95] The present is the first case in which this Court has had to consider the retrospectivity of an order declaring a statutory or common-law criminal offence to be constitutionally invalid. The issues involved differ materially from those in cases where reverse onus provisions have suffered this fate. In the latter cases an unqualified retrospective operation of the invalidating provisions could cause severe dislocation to the administration of justice and also be unfair to the prosecution who had relied in good faith on such evidentiary provisions.[111] In addition, the likely result of such an unqualified order would be numerous appeals with the possibility of proceedings having to be brought afresh.[112] In each case the issue would arise as to whether the accused in question would have been convicted, or could be convicted in the absence of reliance on the particular reverse onus provision. In hearings afresh, the necessary evidence to secure a conviction in the absence of the evidentiary provision in question might no longer be available.[113]

[96] In the present case the situation is different. From the perspective of adult gay men who have been convicted of sodomy where this occurred consensually and in private, (to which I shall for convenience refer as "consensual sodomy") it seems manifestly and grossly unjust and inequitable that such convictions should not be capable of being set aside. People have been convicted of an offence which ceased to exist when the 1996 Constitution came into effect. In fact, because of the principle of objective constitutional invalidity, the offence ceased to exist when the interim Constitution came into force on 27 April 1994, because there is no doubt that this Court, for all the reasons set forth in this judgment, would have declared the common-law offence of sodomy to be inconsistent with at least the provisions of section 8 of the interim Constitution, had a constitutional challenge been brought under it. Competent courts have wide powers under section 172(1)(b) to make orders that are "just and equitable". The chance fact that a constitutional challenge against the offence of sodomy was not brought under the interim Constitution should not deter us, in the particular circumstances of this case, from giving full retrospective effect, to 27 April 1994, to an order which justice and equity clearly require.

[97] An unqualified retrospective order could easily have undesirable consequences. Persons might act directly under the order to have convictions set aside without adequate judicial supervision or institute claims for damages. The least disruptive way of giving relief to persons in respect of past convictions for consensual sodomy is through the established court structures. On the strength of the order of constitutional invalidity such persons could note an appeal against their convictions for consensual sodomy, where the period for noting such appeal has not yet expired or, where it has, could bring an application for condonation of the late noting of an appeal or the late application for leave to appeal to a court of competent jurisdiction. In this way effective judicial control can be exercised. Although this might result in cases having to be reopened, it will in all probability not cause dislocation of the administration of justice of any moment.

[98] We should, however, limit the retrospective effect of the order declaring the offence of sodomy to be constitutionally invalid to cases of consensual sodomy. In respect of all other cases of sodomy, the order should be limited to one which takes effect from the date of this judgment. This is essential, in my view, to prevent persons convicted of sodomy which amount to "male rape" from having their past convictions set aside. To permit this would be neither just nor equitable. In the absence of such a limitation confusion might arise, upon a conviction being set aside in such cases, as to whether a conviction of indecent assault or assault with intent to do grievous bodily harm, could validly be substituted.

[99] In substance this order has as little prospect of causing disruption as the order in relation to the common-law offence of sodomy if it is given a similar qualified retrospective effect.

The Order Declaring the Inclusion of Sodomy as an Item in Schedule 1 of the CPA to be Constitutionally Invalid

[100] The effect of including the offence of sodomy in this Schedule has been set forth in paragraph 7 above. The implication of an order declaring sodomy to be constitutionally invalid differs according to the particular section of the CPA or other statute to which Schedule 1 of the CPA relates, and different considerations apply in deciding the question of retrospectivity.

[101] Section 37(1)(a)(iv) of the CPA; section 3(1)(b) of the Intercepting and Monitoring Prohibition Act, 127 of 1992 (read with the definition of "serious offence" under section 1 of that Act); and section 13(8) of the South African Police Service Act, 68 of 1995 (the effect whereof has been summarised in paragraph 7 (i), (vii) and (viii) respectively above) all relate to actions by means of which evidence could have been obtained and used against an accused who might have been convicted of sodomy. It must be emphasised that giving such an order qualified retrospective effect does not mean that evidence obtained by means of the above provisions was necessarily inadmissible in any such trials or will necessarily be inadmissible in future. That is an issue to be decided by the court seized of any matter pursuant to the above order and will be decided by such court having regard, where applicable, to the provisions of section 35(5) of the Constitution, which provides:

> "Evidence obtained in a manner that violates any right in the Bill of Rights must be excluded if the admission of that evidence would render the trial unfair or otherwise be detrimental to the administration of justice."

[102] The effect of sections 40(1)(b), 42(1)(a), 49(2), 60(4)(a), 60(5)(e), 60(5)(g), and 185A(1) of the CPA has been summarised in paragraph 7 (ii), (iii), (iv), (v) and (vi) above. These provisions of the CPA, with the exception of those applying to bail,[114] all relate to actions which are completed before the accused is brought to trial, or, as in the case of section 185A, stand quite outside the trial. These provisions can have no effect on the fairness of the ensuing trial itself, and to give the order retrospective effect in respect of them could conceivably open the door for civil claims against those who have performed them. Where persons performing the acts did so in good faith and on the acceptance of the validity of the provisions in question, as they related to the offence of sodomy, it would not ordinarily be just or equitable to give the order any retrospective operation at all, for the reasons stated in De Lange v Smuts NO and Others.[115] If the persons concerned acted in bad faith the fact that the order in this case does not operate retrospectively would not debar any action which an accused (or his or her estate in the case of section 49(2) of the CPA) might have had on the grounds of acts performed mala fide. As far as the bail provisions are concerned similar considerations would apply. They could only very obliquely affect the accused's so-called "right to a speedy trial"[116] under section 35(3)(d) of the Constitution, where the accused's appropriate remedy, namely to be granted bail in order to ameliorate the harmful consequences of delays in the trial, would be unaffected.[117] In relation to all these provisions, the argument for giving the declaration of invalidity no retrospective effect is powerful. It is not, however, possible to envisage all the possible consequences flowing from a declaration of invalidity

115 Above n 43 at para 105, where the following was stated:

> "Moreover, if the order is granted any retrospective effect it could raise uncertainties as to whether a person unconstitutionally committed to prison in the past had a claim for damages in respect of a committal which was unassailable at common law at the time and ordered in good constitutional faith. If it were to transpire that the retrospective operation of the order does not provide a cause of action for damages, then persons unconstitutionally detained in the past suffer no prejudice in relation to damages. If it has the effect of giving rise to such a claim, then it seems to be a most undesirable consequence, having regard to the fact that the committal took place in good faith."

and it is therefore considered prudent, in the appropriate order, to confer a discretion on a court of competent jurisdiction.

[103] The effect of section 1(8) and (9) and section 2(1)(c) of the Special Pensions Act, 69 of 1996 has been summarised in paragraph 7 (ix) and (x) above. They relate to monetary claims against the state arising directly from the operation of the statute in question and there are no grounds of justice or equity justifying any limitation on the retrospective operation of the order. No reason has been suggested why the state should not discharge its full obligations under the Special Pensions Act on the basis that the provisions relating to the offence of sodomy became constitutionally invalid as from the date on which the interim Constitution came into operation, at least in respect of consensual sodomy in private between adult males. It is not just or equitable, however, if such retrospectivity were to give rise to any cause of action against any individual who applied the provisions relating to sodomy in these sections of the Act in good faith before the date of this order. Consequently it would also be prudent to confer a discretion on a court of competent jurisdiction.

The Order Declaring the Inclusion of Sodomy as an Item in the Schedule to the Security Officers Act to be Constitutionally Invalid in paragraph 8 above. It prohibits a person convicted of sodomy from registering as a security officer, or exposes him to having such registration withdrawn, and such conviction may lead to a finding of improper conduct for purposes of the Act. Justice and equity would seem to require an order having full retrospective effect, at least in respect of consensual sodomy in private between adult males. There is little or any likelihood of disruption. Its consequence would merely be to correct the registration of persons convicted and the setting aside of any findings of improper conduct based on the conviction for such offence. At the same time, however, it would not be just or equitable if such retrospective operation gave rise to any cause of action against any individual who applied the provisions relating to sodomy in these sections of the Act in good faith before the date of this order and here, too, it would be prudent to confer a discretion on a court of competent jurisdiction.

[105] Although counsel for the applicants have conducted an audit of statutory provisions in order to identify those statutes which incorporate the offence of sodomy or otherwise rely thereon they could, understandably, give no firm assurance that the statutory provisions identified in this case are the only ones falling into this category. The possibility exists that there are further statutory provisions of this nature. It is inadvisable to attempt to make an order in the abstract relating to such statutes and the extent to which the constitutional invalidity of the offence of sodomy, as applied to such statutes, should have retrospective effect. This is a matter best left to the High Courts to deal with on a case by case basis should the need arise.

1.1. The common law offence of sodomy is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 and invalid.

1.2. In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution, it is ordered that the order in paragraph 1.1 shall not invalidate any conviction for the offence of sodomy unless that conviction relates to conduct constituting consensual sexual conduct between adult males in private committed after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or a review of, the relevant judgment is pending, or the time for noting of an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired, or condonation for the late noting of an appeal or late filing of an application for leave to appeal is granted by a court of competent jurisdiction.

1.3 In all cases of sodomy which do not relate to conduct constituting consensual sexual conduct between adult males in private, the order in 1.1 will come into effect on the date of this judgment.

2.1. Section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act, 1957 is declared to be inconsistent with the 1996 Constitution and invalid.

2.2. In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution, it is ordered that the order in paragraph 2.1 shall not invalidate any conviction in terms of section 20A of the Sexual Offences Act, 1957 unless that conviction was related to conduct that took place after 27 April 1994 and either an appeal from, or a review of, the relevant judgment is pending, or the time for noting of an appeal from that judgment has not yet expired, or condonation for the late noting of an appeal or late filing of an application for leave to appeal is granted by a court of competent jurisdiction.

3.1. The inclusion of the common-law offence of sodomy in Schedule 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977 is declared to be inconsistent with the provisions of the 1996 Constitution and invalid.

3.2 In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, it is declared that the order referred to in para 3.1 shall not invalidate anything done in reliance on the inclusion of "sodomy" in the schedule, as incorporated in the provisions of section 37(1)(a)(iv) of the Criminal Procedure Act, 51 of 1977; section 3(1)(b) of the Intercepting and Monitoring Prohibition Act, 127 of 1992 (read with the definition of "serious offence" under section 1 of that Act); and section 13(8) of the South African Police Service Act, 68 of 1995, unless a court of competent jurisdiction decides that it is just and equitable that conduct pursuant to such reliance shall be declared invalid, provided that due regard must be had to the provisions of section 35(5) of the 1996 Constitution.

3.3 In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, it is declared that the order referred to in para 3.1 shall, in all cases other than those mentioned in paragraph 3.2 above, not invalidate anything done in reliance on the inclusion of "sodomy" in the schedule, unless a court of competent jurisdiction decides that it is just and equitable that conduct pursuant to such reliance shall be declared invalid.

4.1. The inclusion of the common-law offence of sodomy in schedule 1 of the Security Officers Act, 92 of 1987 is declared to be inconsistent with the provisions of the 1996 Constitution and invalid.

4.2. In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, it is declared that the order referred to in paragraph 4.1 shall not invalidate anything done in reliance on the inclusion of "sodomy" in the schedule of the Security Officers Act, 1987, unless a court of competent jurisdiction decides that it is just and equitable that conduct pursuant to such reliance shall be declared invalid.

Chaskalson P, Langa DP, Goldstone J, Kriegler J, Mokgoro J, O'Regan J and Yacoob J all concur in the judgment of Ackermann J

ACKERMANN J

SACHS J:

[107] Only in the most technical sense is this a case about who may penetrate whom where. At a practical and symbolical level it is about the status, moral citizenship and sense of self-worth of a significant section of the community. At a more general and conceptual level, it concerns the nature of the open, democratic and pluralistic society contemplated by the Constitution. In expressing my concurrence with the comprehensive and forceful judgment of Ackermann J, I feel it necessary to add some complementary observations on the broader matters. I will present my remarks - in a preliminary manner as befits their sweep and complexity - in the context of responding to three issues which emerged in the course of argument. The first concerns the relationship between equality and privacy, the second the connection between equality and dignity, and the third the question of the meaning of the right to be different in the open and democratic society contemplated by the Constitution.

Equality and Privacy

[108] It is important to start the analysis by asking what is really being punished by the anti-sodomy laws. Is it an act, or is it a person? Outside of regulatory control, conduct that deviates from some publicly established norm is usually only punishable when it is violent, dishonest, treacherous or in some other way disturbing of the public peace or provocative of injury. In the case of male homosexuality however, the perceived deviance is punished simply because it is deviant. It is repressed for its perceived symbolism rather than because of its proven harm. If proof were necessary, it is established by the fact that consensual anal penetration of a female is not criminalised. Thus, it is not the act of sodomy that is denounced by the law, but the so-called sodomite who performs it; not any proven social damage, but the threat that same-sex passion in itself is seen as representing to heterosexual hegemony.[118]

118 As Foucault commented in a celebrated formulation:

> "As defined by the ancient civil or canonical codes, sodomy was a category of forbidden acts, their perpetrator was nothing more than the juridical subject of them. The nineteenth-century homosexual became a personage, a past, a case history, and a childhood, in addition to being a type of life, a life form, and a morphology, with an indiscreet anatomy and possibly a mysterious physiology. Nothing that went into his total composition was unaffected by his insidious and indefinitely active principle; written immodestly on his face and body because it was a secret that always gave itself away. It was consubstantial with him, less as a habitual sin than as a singular nature. We must not forget that the psychological, psychiatric, medical category of homosexuality was constituted from the moment it was characterised - Westphal's famous article of 1870 on 'contrary sexual relations' can stand as its date of birth - less by a type of sexual relations than by a certain quality of sexual sensibility, a certain way of inverting the masculine and the feminine in oneself. Homosexuality appeared as one of the forms of sexuality when it was transposed from the practice of sodomy onto a kind of interior androgyny, a hermaphrodism of the soul. The sodomite had been a temporary aberration, the homosexual was now a species." Foucault The History of Sexuality Volume One: An Introduction (1978) in Pantazis "The Problematic Nature of Gay Identity" (1996) 12 SA Journal of Human Rights 291 at 298.

[109] The effect is that all homosexual desire is tainted, and the whole gay and lesbian community is marked with deviance and perversity. When everything associated with homosexuality is treated as bent, queer, repugnant or comical, the equality interest is directly engaged. People are subject to extensive prejudice because of what they are or what they are perceived to be, not because of what they do. The result is that a significant group of the population is, because of its sexual non-conformity, persecuted, marginalised and turned in on itself. I have no doubt that when the drafters of the Bill of Rights decided expressly to include sexual orientation in their list of grounds of discrimination that were presumptively unfair,[119] they had precisely these considerations in mind. There

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

could be few stronger cases than the present for invoking the protective concern and regard offered by the Constitution.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

[110] Against this background it is understandable that the applicants should urge this Court to base its invalidation of the anti-sodomy laws on the ground that they violated the equality provisions in the Bill of Rights. Less acceptable however, is the manner in which applicants treated the right to privacy, presenting it in their written argument[120] as a poor second prize to be offered and received only in the event of the Court declining to invalidate the laws because of a breach of equality. Their argument may be summarised as follows: privacy analysis is inadequate because it suggests that homosexuality is shameful and therefore should only be protected if it is limited to the private bedroom; it tends to limit the promotion of gay rights to the decriminalisation of consensual adult sex, instead of contemplating a more comprehensive normative framework that addresses discrimination generally against gays; and it assumes a dual structure - public and private - that does not capture the complexity of lived life, in which public and private lives determine each other, with the mobile lines between them being constantly amenable to repressive definition.[121]

[111] These concerns are undoubtedly valid. Yet, I consider that they arise from a set of assumptions that are flawed as to how equality and privacy rights interrelate and about the manner in which privacy rights should truly be understood; in the first place, the approach adopted by the applicants subjects equality and privacy rights to inappropriate sequential ordering, while secondly, it undervalues the scope and significance of privacy rights. The cumulative result is both to weaken rather than strengthen applicants' quest for human rights, and to put the general development of human rights jurisprudence on a false track.

120 In his oral presentation counsel for the applicants indicated that his concern was not with the privacy argument in itself, but the way in which the judgment on privacy might be couched. It is to this concern that I address myself.

[112] I will deal first with the question of inappropriate separation of rights and sequential ordering, that is, with the assumption that in a case like the present, rights have to be compartmentalised and then ranked in descending order of value. The fact is that both from the point of view of the persons affected, as well as from that of society as a whole, equality and privacy cannot be separated, because they are both violated simultaneously by anti-sodomy laws. In the present matter, such laws deny equal respect for difference, which lies at the heart of equality, and become the basis for the invasion of privacy. At the same time, the negation by the state of different forms of intimate personal behaviour becomes the foundation for the repudiation of equality. Human rights are better approached and defended in an integrated rather than a disparate fashion. The rights must fit the people, not the people the rights. This requires looking at rights and their violations from a persons-centred rather than a formula-based position, and analysing them contextually rather than abstractly.[122]

[122] It was in this spirit that L'Heureux-Dubé J in Egan v. Canada (1995) 29 CRR (2d) 79 at 120 remarked:

> "In reality, it is no longer the 'grounds' that are dispositive of the question of whether discrimination exists, but the social context of the distinction that matters. [C]ontext is of primary importance and that abstract 'grounds of distinction' are simply an indirect method to achieve a goal which could be achieved more simply and truthfully by asking the direct question: 'Does this distinction discriminate against this group of people?' "

[113] One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgement that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both,[123] that is, globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly.[124] The objective is to determine in a qualitative rather than a quantitative way if the group concerned is subjected to scarring[125] of a sufficiently serious nature as to merit constitutional intervention. Thus, black foreigners in South Africa

123 This approach seems to be contemplated by the words "on one or more grounds" in section 9(3). See n 2 above.

124 Critical race feminists are at the forefront of the movement towards a contextual treatment and understanding of the lives of those who face multiple discrimination. A major thrust of the critical race genre is to focus on the multileveled identities and multiple consciousness of women of colour, in particular, who are often discriminated against on the basis of race, gender and economic class. In doing so, critical race feminism draws attention to the need for conscious consideration of fundamental rights within the context of persons whose identities may involve the intersection of race, gender, class, sexual orientation, physical disadvantage or other characteristics which often serve as the basis for unfair discrimination. See, for example, a recent anthology: Wing (ed) Critical Race Feminism, a reader (New York University Press, New York and London 1997).

> "It is a peculiar sensation, this double-consciousness, this sense of always looking at one's self through the eyes of others, of measuring one's soul by the tape of the world that looks on in amused contempt and pity. One ever feels his twoness - an American, a Negro." Du Bois The Souls of Black Folk: Essays and Sketches (Dado, Mead and New York, 1979) at 3 quoted in Minnow Making all the Difference: Inclusion, Exclusion, and American Law (Cornell University Press, Ithaca and London, 1990) at 68.

Williams refers to the same near schizophrenic experience speaking of:

> ". . . the phenomenon of multiple consciousness, multiple voice, double-voicedness - the shifting consciousness which is the daily experience of people of color and of women. When I was younger, I use to associate that dreamy, many sided feeling of the world with fears that I was schizophrenic. Now that I am older (and postmodern) I think that there is much sanity in that world- view. If indeed we are mirrors of each other in this society, if I have a sense of self-concept that is in any way whatsoever dependent upon the regard of others, upon the looks that I sometimes get in other people's eyes as judgment of me - if these others indeed supply some part of my sense of myself, then it makes a certain amount of social sense to be in touch with, rather than unconscious of, that doubleness of myself, that me that stares back in the eyes of others." in Williams "Response to Mari Matsuda" (1989) 11 Womens Rights Law Reporter might be subject to discrimination in a way that foreigners generally, and blacks as a rule, are not; it could in certain circumstances be a fatal combination. The same might possibly apply to unmarried mothers, or homosexual parents, where nuanced rather than categorical approaches would be appropriate. Alternatively, a context rather than category-based approach might suggest that overlapping vulnerability is capable of producing overlapping discrimination. A notorious example would be African widows, who historically have suffered discrimination as blacks, as Africans, as women, as African women, as widows and usually, as older people, intensified by the fact that they are frequently amongst the lowest paid workers.[126]

126 See Simons African Women: Their Legal Status in South Africa C Hurst & Co, London 1968) at 285: "Women carry a double burden of disabilities. They are discriminated against on the grounds of both sex and race. The two kinds of discrimination interact and reinforce each other." See generally the chapter on "Widows in Distress".

[114] Conversely, a single situation can give rise to multiple, overlapping and mutually reinforcing violations of constitutional rights. The case before us is in point. The group in question is discriminated against because of the one characteristic of sexual orientation. The measures that assail their personhood are clustered around this particular personal trait. Yet the impact of these laws on the group is of such a nature that a number of different protected rights are simultaneously infringed. In these circumstances it would be as artificial in law as it would be in life to treat the categories as alternative rather than interactive. In some contexts, rights collide and an appropriate balancing is required.[127] In others, such as the present, they inter-relate and give extra dimension to the extent and impact of the infringement. Thus, the violation of equality by the anti-sodomy laws is all the more egregious because it touches the deep, invisible and intimate side of people's lives. The Bill of Rights tells us how we should analyse this interaction: in technical terms, the gross interference with privacy will bear strongly on the unfairness of the discrimination,[128] while the discriminatory manner in which groups are targeted for invasions of privacy will destroy any possibility of justification for such invasions.[129]

> "(1) The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, . . ."

[115] The depreciated value given in argument to invalidation on the grounds of privacy, treating it as a poor relation of equality, was a result of adopting an impoverished version of the concept of privacy itself. In my view, the underlying assumptions about privacy were doubly flawed, being far too narrow in their understanding, on the one hand, and far too wide in their implications, on the other. I will deal first with the undue narrowness of understanding.

[116] There is no good reason why the concept of privacy should, as was suggested, be restricted simply to sealing off from state control what happens in the bedroom, with the doleful sub-text that you may behave as bizarrely or shamefully as you like, on the understanding that you do so in private.[130] It has become a judicial cliché to say that privacy protects people, not places.[131] Blackmun J in Bowers, Attorney General of Georgia v. Hardwick et al[132] made it clear that the much-quoted "right to be left alone" should be seen not simply as a negative right to occupy a private space free from government intrusion, but as a right to get on with your life, express your personality and

130 The judgment of Ackermann J above at paras 29-32 helpfully explains the context in which Cameron came to make the distinction between equality and privacy. It also contains trenchant observations on the importance of protecting private intimacy with which I fully associate myself.

Just as "liberty must be viewed not merely 'negatively or selfishly as a mere absence of restraint, but positively and socially as an adjustment of restraints to the end of freedom of opportunity' ",[134] so must privacy be regarded as suggesting at least some responsibility on the state to promote conditions in which personal self-realisation can take place.

[117] The emerging jurisprudence of this Court is fully consistent with such an affirmative approach. In Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO Ackermann J pointed out that the scope of privacy had been closely related to the concept of identity and that "rights, like the right to privacy, are not based on a notion of the unencumbered self, but on the notion of what is necessary to have one's autonomous identity . . . In the context of privacy this means that it is . . . the inner sanctum of the person such as his/her family life, sexual preference and home environment which is shielded from erosion by conflicting rights of the community."[135] Viewed this way autonomy must mean far more than the right to occupy an envelope of space in which a socially detached individual can act freely from interference by the state. What is crucial is the nature of the activity, not its site. While recognising the unique worth of each person,[136] the Constitution does not presuppose that a holder of rights is as an isolated, lonely and abstract figure possessing a disembodied and socially disconnected self. It acknowledges that people live in their bodies, their communities, their cultures, their places and their times. The expression of sexuality requires a partner, real or imagined. It is not for the state to choose or to arrange the choice of partner, but for the partners to choose themselves.

135 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC); 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC) at paras 65 and 67 quoting Forst at n 90. The learned judge went on to observe that:

> "[T]his implies that community rights and the rights of fellow members place a corresponding obligation on a citizen, thereby shaping the abstract notion of individualism towards identifying a concrete member of civil society. Privacy is acknowledged in the truly personal realm, but as a person moves into communal relations and activities . . . the scope of personal space shrinks accordingly."

It should be noted that personal space is not equated with physical space, although there can be a relation between the two. See Mistry above n 14 at para 21.

[118] At the same time, there is no reason why the concept of privacy should be extended to give blanket libertarian permission for people to do anything they like provided that what they do is sexual and done in private. In this respect, the assumptions about privacy rights are too broad. There are very few democratic societies, if any, which do not penalise persons for engaging in inter-generational, intra-familial, and cross-species sex, whether in public or in private. Similarly, in democratic societies sex involving violence, deception, voyeurism, intrusion or harassment is punishable (if not always punished), or else actionable, wherever it takes place (there is controversy about prostitution and sado-masochistic and dangerous fetishistic sex).[137] The privacy interest is overcome because of the perceived harm.

137 For a psychoanalyst's view see Young "Is 'Perversion' Obsolete?" (1996) Psychology in Society (PINS) (21) 5 at 12. He argues that the concept of perversion gave way to that of pluralism, but that there are still limits to what is acceptable in sexual behaviour.

[119] The choice is accordingly not an all-or-nothing one between maintaining a spartan normality, at the one extreme, or entering what has been called the post-modern supermarket of satisfactions, at the other.[138] Respect for personal privacy does not require disrespect for social standards.[139] The law may continue to proscribe what is acceptable and what is unacceptable even in relation to sexual expression and even in the sanctum of the home, and may, within justifiable limits, penalise what is harmful and regulate what is offensive. What is crucial for present purposes is that whatever limits are established they do not offend the Constitution.

Equality and Dignity

SACHS J

[120] It will be noted that the motif which links and unites equality and privacy, and which, indeed, runs right through the protections offered by the Bill of Rights, is dignity.[140] This Court has on a number of occasions emphasised the centrality of the concept of dignity and self-worth to the idea of equality.[141] In an interesting argument,[142] the Centre for Applied Legal Studies (the Centre) has mounted a frontal challenge to this approach, arguing that the equality clause is intended to advance equality, not dignity, and that the dignity provisions in the Bill of Rights[143] should take care of protecting dignity. This was part of an invitation to the Court to re-visit its whole approach to equality jurisprudence, shifting from what the Centre called the defensive posture of reliance on unlawful discrimination under section 9(3)[144] to what it claimed to be an affirmative position of promoting equality under the broad provisions of section 9(1). The [121] Ackermann J has, I believe, dealt convincingly with the assertion that the Court has failed to promote substantive as opposed to formal equality. Indeed, his judgment is itself a good example of a refusal to follow a formal equality test, which could have based invalidity simply on the different treatment accorded by the law to anal intercourse according to whether the partner was male or female. Instead, the judgment has with appropriate sensitivity for the way anti-gay prejudice has impinged on the dignity of members of the gay community, focussed on the manner in which the anti-sodomy laws have reinforced systemic disadvantage both of a practical and a spiritual nature. Furthermore, it has done so not by adopting the viewpoint of the so-called reasonable lawmaker who accepts as objective all the prejudices of heterosexual society as incorporated into the laws in question, but by responding to the request of the applicants to look at the matter from the perspective of those whose lives and sense of self-worth are affected by the measures.[146] I would like to endorse, and I believe, strengthen this argument by referring to reasons of principle and strategy why, when developing equality jurisprudence, the Court should continue to maintain its focus on the defined anti-discrimination principles of sections 9(3), (4) and (5), which contain respect for human dignity at their core.

[122] The textual pointers against the Centre's argument to the effect that section 9(1) should be interpreted so as to carry virtually the whole burden of securing equality, have been crisply identified in Ackermann J's judgment.[147] There are, I believe, additional considerations supporting a structured focus on non-discrimination as the heart of implementable equality guarantees:[148] institutional aptness,[149] functional effectiveness,[150] technical discipline,[151] historical congruency,[152] compatibility with international practice[153] and conceptual sensitivity.

147 See above at paragraphs 15-19. It should be noted that the question of substantive socio-economic claims has been directly attended to by means of the express inclusion of a number of socio-economic rights in the Bill of Rights coupled with an indication of the responsibility of the legislature to ensure their realisation within resource possibilities. See sections 26 (housing), 27 (health care, food, water and social security) and 29 (education) of the 1996 Constitution.

148 "We promote equality by reducing discrimination, and we reduce discrimination by reducing the gap between advantage and historic, arbitrary disadvantage." See Abella AJ in R v M (C) (1995) 30 CRR (2d) 112 at 119.

150 Hogg comments:

> "A study prepared in 1988, only three years after the coming into force of s 15 . . . found 591 cases (two-thirds of which were reported in full) in which a law had been challenged on the basis of s 15. Most of the challenges seemed unmeritorious, and most were unsuccessful; but the absence of any clear standards for the application of s 15 encouraged lawyers to keep trying to use s. 15 whenever a statutory distinction worked to the disadvantage of a client." in Hogg*Constitutional Law of Canada* 3 ed (Carswell Professional Publishing, Canada 1992) at 1162.

151 Sections 9(3), (4) and (5) of the 1996 Constitution provide the structure for focused and candid judicial analysis.

152 The extensive list of grounds of discrimination specifically enumerated in section 9(3) underlines the special weight given by the Bill of Rights to combatting unfair discrimination in the many guises it has been wont to adopt.

153 Far from the concept of non-discrimination being weak and negative, Sieghart refers to it as possibly the strongest principle of all to be found in international human rights law. See Sieghart The International Law of Human Rights (Clarendon Press, Oxford 1983), referred to in In re: the Education Bill of 1995 (Gauteng) 1996 (4) BCLR 537 (CC); 1996 (3) SA 165 (CC) at para 71.

[123] By developing its equality jurisprudence around the concept of unfair discrimination this Court engages in a structured discourse centred on respect for human rights and non-discrimination.[154] It reduces the danger of over-intrusive judicial intervention in matters of broad social policy, while emphasising the Court's special responsibility for protecting fundamental rights in an affirmative manner. It also diminishes the possibility of the Court being inundated by unmeritorious claims, and best enables the Court to focus on its special vocation, to use the techniques for which it has a special aptitude, and to defend the interests for which it has a particular responsibility. Finally, it places the Court's jurisprudence in the context of evolving human rights concepts throughout the world, and of our country's own special history.

[124] Contrary to the Centre's argument, the violation of dignity and self-worth under the equality provisions can be distinguished from a violation of dignity under section 10 of the Bill of Rights.[155] The former is based on the impact that the measure has on a person because of membership of an historically vulnerable group that is identified and subjected to disadvantage by virtue of certain closely held personal characteristics[156] of its members; it is the inequality of treatment that leads to and is proved by the indignity. The violation of dignity under section 10, on the other hand, contemplates a much wider range of situations. It offers protection to persons in their multiple identities and capacities. This could be to individuals being disrespectfully treated, such as somebody being stopped at a roadblock. It also could be to members of groups subject to systemic disadvantage, such as farm workers in certain areas, or prisoners in certain prisons, such groups not being identified because of closely held characteristics, but because of the situation they find themselves in. These would be cases of indignity of treatment leading to inequality, rather than of inequality relating to closely held group characteristics producing indignity.

[125] Once again, it is my view that the equality principle and the dignity principle should not be seen as competitive but rather as complementary. Inequality is established not simply through group-based differential treatment, but through differentiation which perpetuates disadvantage and leads to the scarring of the sense of dignity and self-worth associated with membership of the group. Conversely, an invasion of dignity is more easily established when there is an inequality of power and status between the violator and the victim.

[126] One of the great gains achieved by following a situation-sensitive human rights approach is that analysis focuses not on abstract categories, but on the lives as lived and the injuries as experienced by different groups in our society. The manner in which discrimination is experienced on grounds of race or sex or religion or disability varies considerably - there is difference in difference. The commonality that unites them all is the injury to dignity imposed upon people as a consequence of their belonging to certain groups. Dignity in the context of equality has to be understood in this light. The focus on dignity results in emphasis being placed simultaneously on context, impact and the point of view of the affected persons. Such focus is in fact the guarantor of substantive as opposed to formal equality.

best guide as to when, and with respect to what interests, society is likely to stigmatise individuals as members of an inferior caste or view them as not belonging to the community. Because prejudice spawns prejudice, and stereotypes produce limitations that confirm the stereotype on which they are based, a history of unequal treatment requires sensitivity to the prospect that its vestiges endure . . . as in many important legal distinctions, 'a page of history is worth a volume of logic' ".[157] In the case of gays, history and experience teach us that the scarring comes not from poverty or powerlessness, but from invisibility. It is the tainting of desire, it is the attribution of perversity and shame to spontaneous bodily affection, it is the prohibition of the expression of love, it is the denial of full moral citizenship in society because you are what you are, that impinges on the dignity and self-worth of a group.

157 City of Cleburn Text. v Cleburn Living Center (1985) 473 US 432 at 473, quoting Holmes J in New York Trust Co. et. al. v Eisner (1921) 256 U.S. 345 at 349. The stereotyping in itself need not result in discrimination. The stereotype of the level-headed, unemotional man as being the best person to hold positions of leadership, has served many men well enough. It is when stereotypes are coupled with disadvantage that they become constitutionally offensive. Such disadvantage may take material forms, but need not do so; the Bill of Rights recognises that we do not live by bread alone. Indeed, there is no evidence before us that gays are either wealthier or poorer than the rest of society. Nor are they as individuals necessarily less represented than straights in the corridors of political, economic, social, cultural, judicial or security force power. The disadvantage they suffer comes not from a consequence of prejudice, it comes from prejudice itself. The complexity of the problems relating to stereotyping is illustrated by the contrasting positions adopted in Hugo above n 24 by Kriegler J at paras 80-86 and O'Regan J at para 111.

[128] This special vulnerability of gays and lesbians as a minority group whose behaviour deviates from the official norm is well brought out by Cameron in the germinal article to which my learned colleague refers.[158] Gays constitute a distinct though invisible section of the community that has been treated not only with disrespect or condescension but with disapproval and revulsion; they are not generally obvious as a group, pressurised by society and the law to remain invisible;[159] their identifying characteristic combines all the anxieties produced by sexuality with all the alienating effects resulting from difference; and they are seen as especially contagious or prone to corrupting others. None of these factors applies to other groups traditionally subject to discrimination, such as people of colour or women, each of whom, of course, have had to suffer their own specific forms of oppression. In my view, the learned author is quite correct when he concludes that precisely because neither power nor specific resource allocation are at issue, sexual orientation becomes a moral focus in our constitutional order. For this same reason, the question of dignity is in this context central to the question of equality.

SACHS J

[129] At the heart of equality jurisprudence is the rescuing of people from a caste-like status and putting an end to their being treated as lesser human beings because they belong to a particular group. The indignity and subordinate status may flow from institutionally imposed exclusion from the mainstream of society or else from powerlessness within the mainstream; they may also be derived from the location of difference as a problematic form of deviance in the disadvantaged group itself, as happens in the case of the disabled.[160] In the case of gays it comes from compulsion to deny a closely held personal characteristic. To penalise people for being what they are is profoundly disrespectful of the human personality and violatory of equality. This aspect would not be well captured, if at all, by the Centre's approach, which falls to be rejected.

The Treatment of Difference in an Open Society

[130] Although the Constitution itself cannot destroy homophobic prejudice it can require the elimination of public institutions which are based on and perpetuate such prejudice. From today a section of the community can feel the equal concern and regard of the Constitution and enjoy lives less threatened, less lonely and more dignified. The law catches up with an evolving social reality. A love that for a number of years has dared openly to speak its name in bookshops, theatres, film festivals and public parades, and that has succeeded in becoming a rich and acknowledged part of South African cultural life, need no longer fear prosecution for intimate expression. A law which has facilitated homophobic assaults and induced self-oppression, ceases to be. The courts, the police and the prison system are enabled to devote the time and resources formerly spent on obnoxious and futile prosecutions, to catching and prosecuting criminals who prey on gays and straights alike. Homosexuals are no longer treated as failed heterosexuals but as persons in their own right.

[131] Yet, in my view the implications of this judgment extend well beyond the gay and lesbian community. It is no exaggeration to say that the success of the whole constitutional endeavour in South Africa will depend in large measure on how successfully sameness and difference are reconciled, an issue central to the present matter.

[132] The present case shows well that equality should not be confused with uniformity; in fact, uniformity can be the enemy of equality. Equality means equal concern and respect across difference. It does not pre-suppose the elimination or suppression of difference. Respect for human rights requires the affirmation of self, not the denial of self. Equality therefore does not imply a levelling or homogenisation of behaviour but an acknowledgment and acceptance of difference.[161] At the very least, it affirms that consequences arising from difference.

[133] Section 9 of the Constitution is unambiguous: discrimination on the grounds of being gay or lesbian, is presumptively unfair and a violation of fundamental rights. This judgment holds that in determining the normative limits of permissible sexual conduct, homosexual erotic activity must be treated on an equal basis with heterosexual, in other words, that the same-sex quality of the conduct must not be a consideration in determining where and how the law should intervene. Commentators have suggested that respect for the equality principle goes further in two respects. The first is that the gay and lesbian community must have full access to decision-making on the questions at issue, so that their experiences, sense of right and wrong and proposals for effective law-making are given equal consideration when the outcome is determined[162]. Secondly, the selection

162 The theme of equality of voice is brought out by Dworkin in "Equality, Democracy and Constitution" (1990) Vol XXVIII, No. 2 Alberta Law Review 324 at page 337-41 where he argues that:

> "In a genuine democracy, the people govern not statistically but communally . . . [w]hen we insist that a genuine democracy must treat everyone with equal concern, we take a decisive step towards a deeper form of collective action in which 'we the people' is understood to comprise not a majority but everyone acting communally . . . but the idea that in an integrated community the collective life cannot include moulding the judgments of its individual members as distinct from what they do, has a distinct near-definitional importance because it sets minimal conditions for any community, of any kind, that aspires to integration rather than to monolith . . . .If the collective ambition is selective and discriminatory - if it aims only to eliminate certain beliefs collectively judged wrong or degrading - then it destroys integration for those citizens who are the objects of reform . . . "

Trakman argues similarly in "Section 15: Equality? Where" (1995) 6:4 Constitutional Forum 112 at 121.

> "If Section 15 [the equality clause in the Charter of Rights] has meaning, that meaning resides in the condition of communal life to which equality is directed. That condition presupposes that all persons within society are entitled to participate in that communal life with comparative equality. This condition of equality does not require that everyone share exactly equally in the social 'good'. Equality entitles different segments of society to enjoy different qualities of lives with comparative, not symmetrical, equality. Comparative equality also means that no one segment of society is entitled to define the quality of the 'good' life for all in the image of itself. Whatever its object, the legislature in a democratic society is disentitled to identify itself with the interests of select communities so as to produce comparative inequality for other communities."

of issues for investigation must not be selected and treated on the basis of stereotypes and prejudice. It is not necessary to pronounce on these complex issues in this case.

[134] The acknowledgment and acceptance of difference is particularly important in our country where group membership has been the basis of express advantage and disadvantage. The development of an active rather than a purely formal sense of enjoying a common citizenship depends on recognising and accepting people as they are. The concept of sexual deviance needs to be reviewed. A heterosexual norm was established, gays were labelled deviant from the norm and difference was located in them.[163] What the Constitution requires is that the law and public institutions acknowledge the variability of human beings and affirm the equal respect and concern that should be shown to all as they are. At the very least, what is statistically normal ceases to be the basis for establishing what is legally normative. More broadly speaking, the scope of what is constitutionally normal is expanded to include the widest range of perspectives and to acknowledge, accommodate and accept the largest spread of difference. What becomes normal in an open society, then, is not an imposed and standardised form of 163 Minow above n 8 argues that equality for those deemed different is precluded by five unstated and unacceptable assumptions namely that: Difference is intrinsic not a comparison; the norm need not be stated; the observer can see without a perspective; other perspectives are irrelevant; and the status quo is natural, uncoerced and good. Her focus was principally on disability rights, but the critique would seem to apply to the manner in which gay conduct has been described.

[135] The invalidation of anti-sodomy laws will mark an important moment in the maturing of an open democracy based on dignity, freedom and equality. As I have said, our future as a nation depends in large measure on how we manage difference. In the past difference has been experienced as a curse, today it can be seen as a source of interactive vitality. The Constitution acknowledges the variability of human beings (genetic and socio-cultural), affirms the right to be different, and celebrates the diversity of the nation.[164]

[136] A state that recognises difference does not mean a state without morality or one without a point of view. It does not banish concepts of right and wrong, nor envisage a world without good and evil. It is impartial in its dealings with people and groups, but is not neutral in its value system. The Constitution certainly does not debar the state from enforcing morality. Indeed, the Bill of Rights is nothing if not a document founded on deep political morality.[165] What is central to the character and functioning of the state,

164 The Preamble of the Constitution reads:

> ". . . believe that South Africa belongs to all who live in it, united in our diversity." There are many provisions that deal with associational, cultural, religious and language rights as well as rights relating to belief and expression, all of which highlight the rich diversity of our country. See for example sections 6, 18, 29, and 31 of the Constitution. See also Gauteng Education above n 36 at paras 49 and 52.

however, is that the dictates of the morality which it enforces, and the limits to which it may go, are to be found in the text and spirit of the Constitution itself.[166]

> "When governments define the ambits of morality, as they do when they enunciate laws, they are obliged to do so in accordance with constitutional guarantees, not with unwarranted assumptions."

SACHS J

[137] The fact that the state may not impose orthodoxies of belief systems on the whole of society has two consequences.[167] The first is that gays and lesbians cannot be forced to conform to heterosexual norms; they can now break out of their invisibility and live as full and free citizens of South Africa. The second is that those persons who for reasons of religious or other belief disagree with or condemn homosexual conduct are free to hold and articulate such beliefs. Yet, while the Constitution protects the right of people to continue with such beliefs, it does not allow the state to turn these beliefs - even in moderate or gentle versions - into dogma imposed on the whole of society.

[138] In my view, the decision of this Court should be seen as part of a growing acceptance of difference in an increasingly open and pluralistic South Africa. It leads me to hope that the emancipatory effects of the elimination of institutionalised prejudice against gays and lesbians will encourage amongst the heterosexual population a greater sensitivity to the variability of the human kind. Having made these observations, I express my full concurrence in Ackermann J's judgment and order.

JUDGMENT

ACKERMANN J:

Introduction

[1] This matter raises two important questions. The first is whether it is unconstitutional for immigration law to facilitate the immigration into South Africa of the spouses of permanent South African residents but not to afford the same benefits to gays and lesbians in permanent same-sex life partnerships with permanent South African residents. The second is whether, when it concludes that provisions in a statute are unconstitutional, the Court may read words into the statute to remedy the unconstitutionality. These questions arise from the provisions of section 25(5) ("section 25(5)") of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991 (the "Act") and the application of the provisions of section 172(1)(b) of the 1996 Constitution (the "Constitution") should section 25(5) be found to be inconsistent with the Constitution. Section 25(5) reads:

> "Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (4), but subject to the provisions of subsections (3) and (6), a regional committee may, upon application by the spouse or the dependent child of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic, authorize the issue of an immigration permit."

[2] Section 25(5) was declared constitutionally invalid and consequential relief granted by the Cape of Good Hope High Court (the "High Court")[1] (per Davis J, Conradie J and Knoll AJ concurring) in the form of the following order:

> "1. That Section 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991 is declared invalid to the extent that the benefit conferred exclusively on spouses is inconsistent with section 9(3) in that on the grounds of sexual orientation it discriminates against same sex life partners.
> 2. That the declaration of invalidity of section 25(5) is suspended for a period of twelve months from the date of confirmation of this order to enable parliament to correct the inconsistency.
> 3. That the exclusion of same sex life partners from the benefits conferred by section 25(5) of the [Act] constitute[s] special circumstances requiring the grant of an application for exemption made in terms of section 28(2) of the Act by a same sex life partner of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic. This part of the order shall remain in force for as long as it takes parliament to correct the inconsistency.
> 4. That under section 172(2)(b) of the Constitution second and further applicants are exempted, in terms of section 28(2) of the Act, from the provisions of section 23 thereof.
> 5. No action may be taken against them in terms of the Act arising out of their living working or studying in the Republic.
>
> That Respondents are to pay, jointly and severally the applicants' costs including the cost of two counsel."

[3] This order was made pursuant to an application by the fourteen appellants/applicants (hereinafter referred to as the "applicants") against the three respondents, namely the Minister, the Deputy Minister and the Director-General of Home Affairs (hereinafter referred to collectively as the "respondents" and individually as the "Minister", the "Deputy Minister" and the "DG" respectively) in which the applicants sought an order in the following terms:

> "1 Reviewing and setting aside or correcting the decision of the First Respondent to deny the Seventh Applicant an extension of the exemption granted on 23 April 1997 in terms of section 28(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991, as amended, in consequence of his abiding same-sex relationship with the Thirteenth Applicant; and
> 2 Reviewing and setting aside or correcting the decision of the First Respondent to deny the Second to Sixth Applicants an exemption in terms of section 28(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991, as amended, in consequence of their abiding same-sex relationships with the Eighth to Twelfth Applicants respectively; and
>
> 3 Reviewing and setting aside or correcting the decision of the First Respondent, alternatively the Third Respondent, that special circumstances no longer exist in terms of section 28(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991 as amended, to accommodate the same-sex life partners of South African citizens involved in committed relationships; and
> 4 Directing the Third Respondent to accept, process and refer the applications of the Second to Seventh Applicants for an immigration permit in terms of section 25(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991 as amended on terms no less favourable than those applicable to married couples under Section 25 of the Act, to the appropriate Immigrants Selection Board for consideration;
> 5 Declaring section 25 of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991 as amended, to be inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act, Act 108 of 1996, and therefore invalid to the extent of its inconsistency;

6 Directing the First Respondent to extend the exemptions already granted to the Seventh Applicant in terms of section 28(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991 as amended, pending any amendment to the Aliens Control Act to comply with the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act, Act 108 of 1996;

7 Directing the First Respondent to grant to the Second to Sixth Applicants exemptions in terms of section 28(2) of the Aliens Control Act, Act 96 of 1991 as amended, pending any amendment to the Aliens Control Act to comply with the provisions of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act, Act 108 of 1996;

(8) Declaring that the failure of the First Respondent to recognise committed same-sex relationships as a special circumstance in terms of section 28(2) of the Act [is] unconstitutional.

[4] The applicants have appealed to this Court under the provisions of section 172(2)(d) of the Constitution[2] seeking a variation of the order granted by the High Court. They have simultaneously applied for confirmation[3] of the whole order, except those parts against which the appeal is brought and "those parts of the order, if any, which are not subject to confirmation by this court in terms of sections 167(5) and 172(2) of the Constitution." The respondents then appealed against the entire judgment and order of the High Court.

The High Court's refusal of a postponement to the respondents

[5] The respondents did not file any answering affidavits in the High Court. Less than twenty-four hours before the matter was due to be heard by the High Court, the respondents sought a postponement of the hearing. They tendered costs on the attorney and client scale, coupled with an undertaking that the status quo with regard to the second to thirteenth applicants would persist until the final determination of the matter. The purpose was, according to the respondents, to:

> ". . . file comprehensive answering affidavits, as this Honourable Court would otherwise be left with little assistance regarding the purpose and practical implementation of the statutory provisions in question and the Government's reasons for opposing this application. These include issues of ripeness and the meaning, nature and purpose of the fundamental rights on which the Applicants rely, any issues of justification which arise, and the nature of the interim and final relief described in the Applicants' heads of argument . . ."

The High Court refused the application for postponement.

[6] The relevant surrounding facts are detailed in the judgment of the High Court and need not be repeated here; their gist is summarised in the following passage of Davis J's judgment:

> "In this case the respondents were served with the applicants' papers some seven months before the matter came before this Court. Persistent efforts were made by the applicants to remind the respondents of their obligations not only to this Court but ultimately to the Constitutional Court. No explanation was provided as to why the respondents had chosen to ignore the proceedings for more than seven months. Mr Mokoena's [the DG's] affidavit simply states that the cabinet decided the day before the hearing that the application should be opposed and that important matters were raised."[4]

[7] Davis J also correctly pointed out that this Court has made it clear[5] that any evidence that the State considers relevant to an issue of the constitutional invalidity of a statutory provision ought to be adduced before the High Court first hearing the matter.[6] The learned Judge held that such consideration, however important, did not in itself justify the granting of a postponement which had to be based on clear principle. Davis J pointed out that no reasons at all had been furnished for the respondents' failure to observe the rules of court, that they had treated their obligations to the court with disdain and had ignored the rights of the applicants to a resolution of their claims and that accordingly the application had been dismissed.[7]

[8] The respondents sought in this Court to revisit the refusal of this application in two ways. First, they applied on notice of motion for an order with, amongst others, the following terms:

"1. Condoning the [respondents'] failure to file their Answering Affidavit in the

2. Granting the [respondents] leave to file their Answering Affidavit together with the annexures thereto;
3. Alternatively to prayer 2 above, remitting the matter to the Court a quo for rehearing of the application;

. . . . "

If the relief sought in paragraph 2 of the above notice of motion were to be granted, their founding affidavit in the application in this Court would stand as answering affidavit in the High Court application. The respondents did not attempt to make out a case, nor argue, for the reception of the founding affidavit as new evidence on appeal,[8] or as material falling under Constitutional Court Rule 30(1).[9]

[9] Secondly, and in the alternative to the above, they applied for an amendment of their notice of appeal in order to introduce a further ground of appeal, namely, that the High Court "in exercising its discretion erred in rejecting the [respondents'] application for postponement." The effect of this would be to set aside the orders made by the High Court and to have the matter remitted to the High Court, either to reconsider the application for the filing of an answering affidavit or to reconsider the application in the light of the respondents' answering affidavit. Although there is a brief passing reference to the former application in the respondents' written

[9] Rule 30(1) provides:

> "Any party to any proceedings before the Court and an amicus curiae properly admitted by the Court in any proceedings shall be entitled, in documents lodged with the registrar in terms of these rules, to canvass factual material which is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and which do not specifically appear on the record: Provided that such facts -
> (a) are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible; or,

argument, neither application was even alluded to in the respondents' oral argument in this Court, despite the fact that both applications were comprehensively and vigorously opposed in the applicants' written argument, in which both are characterised as being without merit, constituting an abuse and their dismissal sought with costs on an attorney and own client scale.

[10] Both these applications have, as their ultimate objective, the nullification of the High Court order and a re-hearing of the issue on the basis of the respondents' answering affidavit. The first application is wholly misconceived. Short of setting aside on appeal an order made by another court and substituting a different order, this Court has no jurisdiction to make an order on behalf of another court properly seized of a matter or to condone, on behalf of such court, non-compliance with the rules of procedure to which such court is subject. The second application and the ground of appeal which it seeks to introduce, are without merit, for the reasons which follow.

[11] A court of appeal is not entitled to set aside the decision of a lower court granting or refusing a postponement in the exercise of its discretion merely because the court of appeal would itself, on the facts of the matter before the lower court, have come to a different conclusion; it may interfere only when it appears that the lower court had not exercised its discretion judicially, or that it had been influenced by wrong principles or a misdirection on the facts, or that it had reached a decision which in the result could not reasonably have been made by a court properly directing itself to all the relevant facts and principles.[10] On its face, the complaint embodied in the ground of appeal sought to be introduced by the amendment does not meet this test because it alleges only an error in the exercise of its discretion by the High Court. Even assuming, however, that such ground correctly formulates the test which would permit interference by this Court, the respondents have got nowhere near to establishing such a ground, on the facts before the High Court. No such vitiating error on the part of the High Court was contended for by the respondents in their written or oral argument before this Court and none can, on the papers, be found. In fact I am of the view that the High Court correctly dismissed the application for good and substantial reasons and that both the applications in this Court relating to such dismissal ought to be refused. The question of the appropriate costs order will be dealt with at the conclusion of this judgment.

[12] Before reaching the constitutional issue in this matter it is necessary to consider the contentions raised by the respondents that the High Court should not have decided the issue of the constitutional validity of section 25(5) because it was not ripe for decision. But even this preliminary issue requires a consideration of the statutory framework and the facts relevant to the issue to be determined.

[13] As its long title indicates, the Act is wide-ranging and provides for "the control of the admission of persons to, their residence in, and their departure from, the Republic; and for matters connected therewith." For purposes of the present case it is sufficient to refer to chapter III, which deals with residence in the Republic and domicile, and to certain of its relevant provisions. Section 24(1) of the Act establishes an Immigrants Selection Board which consists of the central committee and at least one regional committee (a "regional committee") for each of the provinces of the Republic. An important provision, for purposes of this case, is section 23 which deals with "aliens", an "alien" being defined in section 1(1) as "a person who is not a South African citizen", and which provides as follows:

> "Subject to the provisions of sections 28 and 29, no alien shall-
> (a) enter or sojourn in the Republic with a view to permanent residence therein, unless he or she is in possession of an immigration permit issued to him or her in terms of section 25; or
> (b) enter or sojourn in the Republic with a view to temporary residence therein, unless he or she is in possession of a permit for temporary residence issued to him or her in terms of section 26."

[14] For present purposes the exceptions enacted in section 29 are not germane, but the exemptions provided for in section 28 are, and to the extent relevant stipulate:

> "28(2) Notwithstanding the provisions of this Act, the Minister may, if he or she is satisfied that there are special circumstances which justify his or her decision, exempt any person or category of persons from the provisions of section 23, and for a specified or unspecified period and subject to such conditions as the Minister may impose, and may do so also with retrospective effect.
> (3) . . .
> (5) The Minister may, notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in this Act, issue to any person whose exemption is withdrawn under subsection (4), an appropriate temporary residence permit referred to in section 26 to sojourn in the Republic or any particular part of the Republic."

[15] It is in the above legislative context that the provisions of section 25 must be understood and evaluated:

> "25 Immigration Permit

(1) [An application by an alien for an immigration permit is to be submitted to the DG.]

(2) [Such application is in turn submitted by the DG to a regional committee, who may not consider the application unless the applicant intends taking up permanent residence within the province in respect of which that regional committee has been appointed.]

(3) [Unless contrary to the provisions of the Act] the regional committee concerned may authorize the issue to the applicant of [an immigration] permit and make the authorization subject to the condition that the applicant shall pursue his or her occupation in the province in which he or she intends to take up permanent residence, for a minimum period of 12 months, and any other condition which the committee may deem necessary.

(4) The regional committee concerned may authorize the issue to the applicant of an immigration permit if the applicant-

(a) (i) is of a good character; and

(ii) will be a desirable inhabitant of the Republic; and

(iii) is not likely to harm the welfare of the Republic; and

(iv) does not and is not likely to pursue an occupation in which, in the opinion of the regional committee, a sufficient number of persons are available in the Republic to meet the requirements of the inhabitants of the Republic; or

(b) is a destitute, aged or infirm member of the family of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic who is able and undertakes in writing to maintain him or her.

(5) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (4), but subject to the provisions of subsections (3) and (6), a regional committee may, upon application by the spouse or the dependent child of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic, authorize the issue of an immigration permit.

(6) A regional committee may, in the case of a person who applies for an immigration permit and who has entered into a marriage with a person who is permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic, less than two years prior to the date of his or her application, refuse to authorize such a permit unless the committee is satisfied that such marriage was not contracted for the purpose of evading any provision of this Act.

(7) [Requires, subject to the discretion of the DG to extend the period, that the person to whom the immigration permit is issued must] enter the Republic for the purpose of permanent residence therein within a period of six months from the date of issue of the permit . . .

(8) If any person to whom a permit has been issued in terms of subsection (7) does not enter the Republic for the purpose of permanent residence therein within a period of six months from the date of issue of such permit or within the further period which the [DG] may determine, the validity of such permit shall lapse.

(9)(a) [Provides for the issue to an alien, who has been permitted under this Act to temporarily sojourn in the Republic in terms of a permit referred to in section 26(1)(b),of an immigration permit] mutatis mutandis as if he or she were outside the Republic, and upon the issue of that permit he or she may reside permanently in the Republic.

(b) Notwithstanding the provisions of paragraph (a), a regional committee may authorize a permit in terms of this section to any person who has been permitted under section 26(1) to temporarily sojourn in the Republic, if such person is a person referred to in subsection (4)(b) or (5).

(10) [Provides for the rejection and renewal of applications for an immigration permit.]

(11) [Provides for the reconsideration of an application at the request of the DG.]

(12) [Establishes the circumstances under which a regional committee refers an application to the central committee for consideration or reconsideration.]

(13) [Sets out the powers of the central committee on considering or reconsidering an application.]

(14) [Criminalises certain conduct in relation to the application for and the issuing of an immigration permit.]

(15) [Provides for certain procedural powers of the DG.]"

The attack on the constitutional validity of section 25(5) concentrated on the fact that it enables preferential treatment to be given to a foreign national[11] applying for an immigration permit who is "the spouse . . . of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic", but not to a foreign national who, though similarly placed in all other respects, is in a same-sex life partnership with a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic.

[11] The term "alien" to describe a non-citizen is outmoded and modern writings and international legislation use the term "foreign national" (see, J Baloro "Immigration and Emigration" in Joubert et al The Law of South Africa (Lawsa) first reissue (Butterworths, 1998) vol 11 para 39 footnote 1), which expression will be employed in this judgment to connote "alien" as defined in the Act.

[16] The first applicant is a voluntary association of individual gay, lesbian, bisexual and transgendered people in South Africa and of 69 organisations and associations representing such people. Its principal objectives include the promotion of equality before the law for all persons, irrespective of their sexual orientation; the reform and repeal of laws that discriminate on the basis of such orientation; the promotion and sponsoring of legislation to ensure equality and equal treatment of people in respect of their sexual orientation; and to challenge by means of litigation, lobbying, advocacy and political mobilisation, all forms of discrimination on the basis of such orientation. The second to seventh applicants, none of whom is a South African citizen, are the "same-sex life partners"[12] of the eighth to the thirteenth applicants respectively. The eighth to the thirteenth applicants (the "South African partners") are all permanently and lawfully resident in South Africa. The fourteenth applicant is the Commission for Gender Equality.[13]

12 The import of this expression will be dealt with later in this judgment.

13 The statutory body established as such under section 187 of the Constitution.

[17] Because none is a South African citizen, the second to seventh applicants must all, for purposes of the Act, be regarded as "aliens".[14] Their same-sex life partnerships with their respective South African partners are of differing duration[15] and not all identical in content. They all have certain features in common. Each relationship is an overt, same-sex life partnership which is intimate and mutually interdependent. This emerges more explicitly in the case of certain of the applicants. The third applicant and her South African partner have lived together in a joint household since March 1995, jointly purchased a home in February 1998, share living expenses, have joint insurances, and regulate their relationship by a domestic partnership agreement. Their emotional, physical and material interdependence is, like other applicants,[16] such that they would marry each other if the law permitted them to do so. The fourth applicant and his partner celebrated a public affirmation of their relationship attended by family members and friends. The seventh and the thirteenth applicants are reciprocal beneficiaries in each others' wills. If the second applicant is not granted permanent residence in South Africa, the eighth applicant would emigrate in order to pursue the relationship.[17]

[18] After the 1994 elections the first applicant initiated discussions with the DG on a number of issues, including the failure to recognise same-sex relationships for purposes of immigration

14 See section 1(1) of the Act cited in paragraph 13 above.

15 The fifth applicant's relationship had been established for a little longer than one year when the High Court application was brought. The others have all been longer; the second respondent's relationship as well as that of the fourth respondent have been longer than four years.

16 For example the second, fourth and fifth applicants and their respective partners.

17 The eleventh applicant would likewise emigrate in order to pursue his relationship with the fifth applicant if the latter were not permitted to remain in South Africa.

permits under section 25(4), (5) and (6) of the Act. Pursuant to these discussions, which apparently developed into a cordial working relationship, a written confirmation was given to the first applicant on behalf of the DG that:

> ". . . all the requests for exemptions in terms of section 23(b) of the Aliens Control Act . . . will be considered on merit."

Although the reference to section 23(b) of the Act is somewhat obscure, it is clear from the context that what was being referred to was an exemption under section 28 of the Act from the requirements of section 23(b).

[19] Notwithstanding the above confirmation, the first applicant continued making representations for the express statutory recognition of same-sex relationships for purposes of sections 25(4), (5) and (6) of the Act. In consequence thereof at least thirteen temporary exemptions were granted between April and November 1997 under section 28(2) of the Act to foreign same-sex partners of lesbian or gay South Africans who were seeking permanent residence in the Republic. The exemptions were granted by an official duly delegated by the Minister and in each case it was stated that the temporary exemption had been granted for a period of twelve months "to await the outcome of the memorandum submitted to the Minister of Home Affairs" and that the grantor was "satisfied that special circumstances exist which justify such an exemption" under the provisions of section 28(2) from the requirements of section 23(b) of the Act.

January 1998 in a blanket refusal of such exemptions to foreign same-sex partners of South African permanent residents. This refusal was embodied in a letter of the same date from the DG to the first applicant in which the following was, amongst other things, stated:

> "In terms of section 28[2] of the Act the Minister may only grant exemptions where there are special circumstances which justify such a decision. In view of the steady flow of applications for exemptions, one can hardly argue that special circumstances exist in any of these cases as contemplated by the said section of the Act.
> The mere fact that the Aliens Control Act, 1991, does not cater for same-sex relationships cannot be considered as 'special circumstances' for the purposes [of] exercising the powers of exemption under that Act. In view of the above consideration, it has been decided not to grant exemptions under section 28[2] of the Act merely to accommodate alien partners in same-sex relationships." [Emphasis in the original]

The first applicant took various steps on behalf of certain of the applicants and other foreign partners in same-sex relationships to ameliorate their position in regard to the granting of exemptions under section 28(2) of the Act and otherwise, but to no avail, and ultimately the application was launched in the High Court.

The ripeness of the matter for hearing

[21] Although, in the High Court, the question of mootness[18] was also raised by the

18 A case is moot and therefore not justiciable, if it no longer presents an existing or live controversy which should exist if the Court is to avoid giving advisory opinions on abstract propositions of law. Such was the case in JT Publishing (Pty) Ltd and Another v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 1996 (12) BCLR 1599 (CC); 1997 (3) SA 514 (CC), where Didcott J said the following at para 17:

> "[T]here can hardly be a clearer instance of issues that are wholly academic, of issues exciting no interest but an historical one, than those on which our ruling is wanted have now become."

respondents, there has been no appeal against the High Court's dismissal of this argument. While the concept of ripeness is not precisely defined, it embraces a general principle that where it is possible to decide any case, civil or criminal, without reaching a constitutional issue, that is the course which should be followed.[19]

> "[w]hile the 'ripeness' doctrine is concerned with cases which are brought too early, the 'mootness' doctrine is relevant to cases which are brought, or reach the hearing stage, too late, at a time when the issues are no longer 'live'."

[22] On the issue of ripeness the argument followed much the same line as in the High Court. The contention was that the only remedy pursued by the second to seventh applicants was the obtaining of exemptions under section 28(2) of the Act. The decision regarding an exemption was one to be taken by the Minister. The applicants in question have never applied for an immigration permit under the provisions of section 25 of the Act, which application has to be dealt with by a regional committee and not the Minister. Without having followed such a course, so the argument ran, the applicants had not forced a determination of the issue as to whether a foreign national same-sex partner of a permanent and lawful resident in South Africa was entitled to be treated as a spouse and to the preferential treatment envisaged by section 25(5). The applicants had accordingly failed to pursue a non-constitutional remedy which, if successful, might have rendered it unnecessary to consider the constitutional validity of section 25(5). Such failure was in conflict, so it was contended, with the general principle, referred to in the previous paragraph, that where it is possible to decide any case without reaching a constitutional issue, that course should be followed.

[23] According to the respondents' argument, it was reasonably possible that a regional committee might, under section 39(2) of the Constitution,[20] interpret "spouse" in section 25(5) of the Act as including a same-sex life partner, thus making it unnecessary to consider the constitutional validity of the subsection. In my view the word "spouse" cannot, in its context, be so construed. There is, it is true, a principle of constitutional interpretation that where it is reasonably possible to construe a statute in such a way that it does not give rise to constitutional inconsistency, such a construction should be preferred to another construction which, although also reasonable, would give rise to such inconsistency.[21] Such a construction is not a reasonable one, however, when it can be reached only by distorting the meaning of the expression being considered.

21 De Lange v Smuts NO and Others 1998 (7) BCLR 779 (CC); 1998 (3) SA 785 (CC) at para 85 and Bernstein and Others v Bester and Others NNO 1996 (4) BCLR 449 (CC); 1996 (2) SA 751 (CC) at para 59 and the authorities cited in footnotes 85 and 87.

[24] There is a clear distinction between interpreting legislation in a way which "promote[s] the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights" as required by section 39(2) of the Constitution and the process of reading words into or severing them from a statutory provision which is a remedial measure under section 172(1)(b), following upon a declaration of constitutional invalidity under section 172(1)(a). I deal later with the constitutional permissibility of reading words into a statutory provision.[22] What is now being emphasised is the fundamentally different nature of the two processes. The first process, being an interpretative one, is limited to what the text is reasonably capable of meaning. The latter can only take place after the statutory provision in question, notwithstanding the application of all legitimate interpretative aids, is found to be constitutionally invalid.

[25] The High Court correctly concluded that "spouse" as used in subsection 25(5) was not reasonably capable of the construction contended for by the respondents. The word "spouse" is not defined in the Act, but its ordinary meaning connotes "[a] married person; a wife, a husband."[23] The context in which "spouse" is used in section 25(5) does not suggest a wider meaning. The use of the expression "marriage" in section 25(6) and the special provisions relating to a person applying for an immigration permit and "who has entered into a marriage with a person who is permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic, less than two years prior to the date of his or her application" is a further indication that "spouse", as used in section 25(5), is used for a partner in a marriage. There is also no indication that the word "marriage" as used in the Act extends any further than those marriages that are ordinarily recognised by our law. In this regard reference may be made to the recent House of Lords decision in Fitzpatrick (A.P.) v Sterling Housing Association Ltd[24] where "spouse" likewise could not be given such an extensive meaning and Quilter v Attorney-General[25] where the statute at issue did not define "marriage" but the New Zealand Court of Appeal unanimously held that textual indications prevented the term from being construed to include same-sex unions.

[26] Had the word "spouse" been used in a more extensive sense in section 25(5) of the Act, it would have been unnecessary to provide specifically in section 1(1) that marriage "includes a customary union". It is significant that the definition of "customary union" namely:

> ". . . the association of a man and a woman in a conjugal relationship according to indigenous law and custom, where neither the man nor the woman is party to a subsisting marriage, which is recognised by the Minister in terms of subsection (2);"

is based on an opposite-sex relationship. Under all these circumstances it is not possible to construe the word "spouse" in section 25(5) as including the foreign same-sex partner of a permanent and lawful resident of the Republic. The applicants were accordingly not able in law to pursue successfully a non-constitutional remedy, based on such a construction of "spouse". Accordingly the respondents' contention that the constitutional issue was not ripe for hearing was rightly dismissed by the High Court.

Introduction

[27] It is convenient to deal at the outset with a submission advanced on the respondents' behalf which is central to their approach to the case and their categorisation of the issues concerning the constitutionality of section 25(5). Mr Patel, who together with Ms Moroka and Mr Dhlamini appeared for the respondents, submitted that the Republic, as a sovereign independent state, was lawfully entitled to exclude any foreign nationals from the Republic; that it had an absolute discretion to do so which was beyond the reach of the Constitution and the courts; and that, to the extent that Parliament legislated to permit foreign nationals to reside in South Africa, it did so in the exercise of such discretion and that the provisions of such legislation were equally beyond the reach of the Constitution and the courts.[26] He submitted that this was recognised by the Constitution in that certain provisions of the Bill of Rights conferred significant rights only on citizens of the Republic. Thus only a citizen has the right to "enter, to remain in and to reside anywhere in the Republic";[27] to "a passport";[28] to certain political rights;[29] and to choose a "trade, occupation or profession freely".[30]

27 Section 21(3).

28 Section 21(4).

29 Section 19.

[28] Such an argument, even if correct, would not assist the respondents, because in the present case we are not dealing with such a category of foreign nationals, but with persons who are in intimate life partnerships with persons who are permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic (to whom I shall refer as "South Africans"). This is a significant and determinative difference. The failure of the Act to grant any recognition at all to same-sex life partnerships impacts in the same way on the South African partners as it does on the foreign national partners. In my view this case can, and ought properly to be decided, on the basis of whether section 25(5) unconstitutionally limits the rights of the South African partners, namely the eighth to the thirteenth respondents. In an important line of decisions, the Zimbabwean Supreme Court has held that the constitutional right of citizens to freedom of movement is contravened when the foreign national spouses of such citizens are denied permission to reside in Zimbabwe.[31] We do not reach the question of freedom of movement in the present case but it is important to note that the issue of the contravention in the Zimbabwean cases was considered in relation to the rights of the citizen spouse residing in Zimbabwe.

[29] Such an approach presents no procedural or substantive difficulty. It is true that the parties seeking immigration permits are the foreign national partners. On the objective theory of unconstitutionality adopted by this Court[32] a litigant who has standing may properly rely on the objective unconstitutionality of a statute for the relief sought, even though the right unconstitutionally infringed is not that of the litigant in question but of some other person. Thus the second to the seventh applicants are entitled to rely on any unconstitutional infringement of any of the rights of the South African partners (the eighth to the thirteenth applicants) which has been brought about by the failure of the Act to grant any recognition to same-sex life partnerships. Obviously the South African partners may also invoke such infringement themselves.

The limitation by section 25(5) of the section 9 right to equality and the section 10 right to dignity

[30] Section 9 of the Constitution provides:

> "Equality
> (1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
>
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

(5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

Section 10 provides:

"Human dignity

Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[31] Davis J found that section 25(5) constituted a clear limitation of the section 9 guarantee against unfair discrimination because it differentiated on the grounds of sexual orientation; under section 9(5) such differentiation, being a ground specified in section 9(3), is presumed to be unfair unless the contrary is established; and that the contrary had not been established.[33] The High Court considered it unnecessary to deal with the other grounds on which section 25(5) had been attacked. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others[34] (the "Sodomy case") this Court pointed out that in particular circumstances the rights of equality and dignity are closely related and found the criminal offence of sodomy to be unconstitutional because it breached both rights.[35] In the present case the rights of equality and dignity are also closely related and it would be convenient to deal with them in a related manner.

35 Id at para 30. The Court also held that the right to privacy had been breached, which is not relevant to the present case.

[32] In dealing with the equality challenge I shall follow the approach laid down by this Court in various of its judgments as collated and summarised in Harksen v Lane NO and Others[36] and as applied to section 9 of the Constitution in the Sodomy case.[37] The differentiation brought about by section 25(5) is of a negative kind. It does not proscribe conduct of same-sex life partners or enact provisions that in themselves prescribe negative consequences for them. The differentiation lies in its failure to extend to them the same advantages or benefits that it extends to spouses. The applicants' complaint, as upheld by the High Court, is in effect that section 25(5) is "under-inclusive [because] it confers a benefit on a class that is defined too narrowly in that the class fails to include all members that have an equality-based right to be included."[38] This is, for purposes of establishing a breach of the right to equality, constitutionally irrelevant. Section 9(1)

> "makes clear what was already manifestly implicit in section 8(1) of the interim Constitution, namely that both in conferring benefits on persons and by imposing restraints on State and other action, the State had to do so in a way which results in the equal treatment of all persons."[39]

[33] Before this Court the respondents challenged the conclusion reached by the High Court that the omission in section 25(5) of spousal benefits to same-sex life partners was a differentiation based on the ground of sexual orientation. It was submitted on their behalf that the differentiation was based on the ground that they were non-spouses, which had nothing to do with their sexual orientation, and that accordingly, because the differentiation was on "non-spousal" grounds, rather than on marital status, it did not constitute unfair discrimination. There is no merit in this submission, because as indicated above in paragraph 25, spouse is defined with regard to marriage and is but the name given to the partners to a marriage.

[34] In the alternative it was argued that, even if the differentiation was on grounds of marital status, there was nothing that prevented gays and lesbians from contracting marriages with persons of the opposite sex, thus becoming and acquiring spouses and accordingly being entitled to the spousal benefits under section 25(5). Therefore, so the submission proceeded, the fact that they did not enjoy the advantages of a spousal relationship was of their own choosing. What the submission implies is that same-sex life partners should ignore their sexual orientation and, contrary thereto, enter into marriage with someone of the opposite sex.

39 The Sodomy case above n 34 at para 59.

[35] I am unable to accede to this line of argument. It confuses form with substance and does not have proper regard for the operation, experience or impact of discrimination in society. Discrimination does not take place in discrete areas of the law, hermetically sealed from one another, where each aspect of discrimination is to be examined and its impact evaluated in isolation. Discrimination must be understood in the context of the experience of those on whom it impacts. As recognised in the Sodomy case -

[36] Moreover, the submission fails to recognise that marriage represents but one form of life partnership. The law currently only recognises marriages that are conjugal relationships between people of the opposite sex. It is not necessary, for purposes of this judgment, to investigate other forms of life partnership. Suffice it to say that there is another form of life partnership which is different from marriage as recognised by law. This form of life partnership is represented by a conjugal relationship between two people of the same sex. The law currently does not recognise permanent same-sex life partnerships as marriages. It follows that section 25(5) affords protection only to conjugal relationships between heterosexuals and excludes any protection to a life partnership which entails a conjugal same-sex relationship, which is the only form of conjugal relationship open to gays and lesbians in harmony with their sexual orientation.

[37] A notable and significant development in our statute law in recent years has been the extent of express and implied recognition the legislature has accorded same-sex partnerships. A range of statutory provisions have included such unions within their ambit. While this legislative trend is significant in evincing Parliament's commitment to equality on the ground of sexual orientation,[41] there is still no appropriate recognition in our law of the same-sex life partnership, as a relationship, to meet the legal and other needs of its partners.

41 See, for example, the use of the expressions "spouse, partner or associate" in section 6(1)(f) of the Independent Media Commission Act 148 of 1993 and sections 5(1)(e) and (f) of the Independent Broadcasting Authority Act 153 of 1993 and the fact that, for purposes of these provisions, "spouse" includes "a de facto spouse"; "life-partner" in sections 3(7)(a)(ii), 3(8) and 7(5) of the Lotteries Act 57 of 1997 and section 27(2)(c)(i) the Basic Conditions of Employment Act 75 of 1997; the definition of spouse in section 31 of the Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996 to mean "the partner . . . in a marriage relationship" which latter relationship is defined to include "a continuous cohabitation in a homosexual or heterosexual partnership for a period of at least 5 years"; the definition of "family responsibility" in section 1 of the Employment Equity Act 55 of 1998 which includes "responsibility of employees in relation to their spouse or partner"; the definition of "dependant" in the Medical Schemes Act 131 of 1998 which includes the "the spouse or partner, dependant children or other members of the member's immediate family in respect of whom the member is liable for family care and support"; and the definition of "spouse" in section 8(6)(e)(iii)(aa) of the Housing Act 107 of 1997 which includes "a person with whom the member lives as if they were married or with whom the member habitually cohabits" and sections 9(4) and 11(5)(b) of the South African Civil Aviation Authority Act 40 of 1998 and "life partners" in sections 10(2) and 15(9) of the Road Traffic Management Corporation Act 20 of 1999.

[38] It follows that same-sex partners are in a different position from heterosexual partners who have not contracted a marriage and have not become spouses. As will be emphasised later in this judgment, it is unnecessary in this case to deal at all with the position of such unmarried heterosexual partners. The respondents' submission that gays and lesbians are free to marry in the sense that nothing prohibits them from marrying persons of the opposite sex, is true only as a meaningless abstraction. This submission ignores the constitutional injunction that gays and lesbians cannot be discriminated against on the grounds of their own sexual orientation and the constitutional right to express that orientation in a relationship of their own choosing.[42]

[39] There is much to be said for the view that the discrimination in section 25(5) is on the ground of sexual orientation. As previously pointed out, the section 25(5) protection is not extended to the only form of conjugal relationship in which gays and lesbians are able to participate in harmony with their sexual orientation, namely, same-sex life partnerships. A similar conclusion was reached by the Canadian Supreme Court in Canada (Attorney-General) v Mossop,[43] Egan v Canada[44] and M v H.[45]

[40] The better view, however, in my judgment, is that the discrimination in section 25(5) constitutes overlapping or intersecting discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation and marital status, both being specified in section 9(3) and presumed to constitute unfair discrimination by reason of section 9(5) of the Constitution. As Sachs J correctly pointed out in the Sodomy case:[46]

> "One consequence of an approach based on context and impact would be the acknowledgement that grounds of unfair discrimination can intersect, so that the evaluation of discriminatory impact is done not according to one ground of discrimination or another, but on a combination of both, that is globally and contextually, not separately and abstractly." [footnotes omitted]

I also agree with the following observations by L'Heureux-Dubé J in Mossop:[47]

> "This argument [of Lamer CJC] is based on an underlying assumption that the grounds of 'family status' and 'sexual orientation' are mutually exclusive. However . . . [i]t is increasingly recognized that categories of discrimination may overlap and that individuals may suffer historical exclusion on the basis of both race and gender, age and physical handicap, or some other combination. The situation of individuals who confront multiple grounds of disadvantage is particularly complex . . . Categorizing such discrimination as primarily racially oriented, or primarily gender-oriented, misconceives the reality of discrimination as it is experienced by individuals. Discrimination may be experienced on many grounds, and where this is the case, it is not really meaningful to assert that it is one or the other. It may be more realistic to recognize that both forms of discrimination may be present and intersect."

The prerequisite of marriage before the benefit is available points to that element of the discrimination concerned with marital status, while the fact that no such benefit is available to gays and lesbians engaged in the only form of conjugal relationship open to them in harmony with their sexual orientation represents discrimination on the grounds of sexual orientation. I propose dealing with the present case on this basis.

The impact of the discrimination on the affected applicants

[41] As affirmed in the Sodomy case the determining factor regarding the unfairness of discrimination is, in the final analysis, the impact of the discrimination on the complainant or the members of the affected group. The approach to this determination is a nuanced and comprehensive one in which various factors come into play which, when assessed cumulatively and objectively, will assist in elaborating and giving precision to the constitutional test of unfairness.[48] Important factors to be assessed in this regard (which do not however constitute a closed list) are:

(a) the position of complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage;

(b) the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it.

48 Above n 34 at para 19.

If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the complainants in their fundamental human dignity or in a comparably serious respect, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether the complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question.

(c) with due regard to (a) and (b) above, and any other relevant factors, the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of complainants and whether it has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or constitutes an impairment of a comparably serious nature.[49]

It is noteworthy how the Canadian Supreme Court has, in the development of its equality jurisprudence under section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter, come to see the central purpose of its equality guarantee as the protection and promotion of human dignity.[50]

50 In Law v Canada (Minister of Employment and Immigration) (1999) 170 DLR (4th) 1, Iacobucci J, writing for a unanimous Supreme Court stated the following at paras 52-4:

> ". . . [I]n the articulation of the purpose of s. 15(1) . . . a focus is quite properly placed upon the goal of assuring human dignity by the remedying of discriminatory treatment.
>
>
> [T]he equality guarantee in s. 15(1) is concerned with the realization of personal autonomy and self-determination. Human dignity means that an individual or group feels self-respect and self-worth. It is concerned with physical and psychological integrity and empowerment. Human dignity is harmed by unfair treatment premised upon personal traits or circumstances which do not relate to individual needs, capacities, or merits. It is enhanced by laws which are sensitive to the needs, capacities, and merits of different individuals, taking into account the context underlying their differences.
>

of the above understanding of its purpose. The overriding concern with protecting and promoting human dignity in the sense just described infuses all elements of the discrimination analysis."

[42] In the Sodomy case this Court dealt with the seriously negative impact that societal discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation has had, and continues to have, on gays and their same-sex partnerships,[51] concluding that gay men are a permanent minority in society and have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage.[52] Although the main focus of that judgment was on the criminalisation of sodomy and on other proscriptions of erotic expression between men, the conclusions regarding the minority status of gays and the patterns of discrimination to which they have been and continue to be subject are also applicable to lesbians. Society at large has, generally, accorded far less respect to lesbians and their intimate relationships with one another than to heterosexuals and their relationships. The sting of past and continuing discrimination against both gays and lesbians is the clear message that it conveys, namely, that they, whether viewed as individuals or in their same-sex relationships, do not have the inherent dignity and are not worthy of the human respect possessed by and accorded to heterosexuals and their relationships. This discrimination occurs at a deeply intimate level of human existence and relationality. It denies to gays and lesbians that which is foundational to our Constitution and the concepts of equality and dignity, which at this point are closely intertwined, namely that all persons have the same inherent worth and dignity as human beings, whatever their other differences may be. The denial of equal dignity and worth all too quickly and insidiously degenerates into a denial of humanity and leads to inhuman treatment by the rest of society in many other ways. This is deeply demeaning and frequently has the cruel effect of undermining the confidence and sense of self-worth and self-respect of lesbians and gays.

[43] Similar views, with which I agree, were expressed in Vriend v Alberta,[53] where Cory J[54] expressed himself thus:[55]

> "It is easy to say that everyone who is just like 'us' is entitled to equality. Everyone finds it more difficult to say that those who are 'different' from us in some way should have the same equality rights that we enjoy. Yet so soon as we say any . . . group is less deserving and unworthy of equal protection and benefit of the law all minorities and all of . . . society are demeaned. It is so deceptively simple and so devastatingly injurious to say that those who are handicapped or of a different race, or religion, or colour or sexual orientation are less worthy."

Although the Court was divided in Egan on the disposition of the case, no disagreement was expressed with the views expressed in this passage from the joint dissenting judgment of Cory and Iacobucci JJ.

[44] This Court has recognised that "[t]he more vulnerable the group adversely affected by the discrimination, the more likely the discrimination will be held to be unfair."[56] Vulnerability in turn depends to a very significant extent on past patterns of disadvantage, stereotyping and the like. This is why an enquiry into past disadvantage is so important. In a passage endorsed in M v H,[57] Iacobucci J in the Law case[58] expressed this tellingly as follows:

> "[P]robably the most compelling factor favouring a conclusion that differential treatment imposed by legislation is truly discriminatory will be, where it exists, pre-existing disadvantage, vulnerability, stereotyping or prejudice experienced by the individual or group [citations omitted]. These factors are relevant because, to the extent that the claimant is already subject to unfair circumstances or treatment in society by virtue of personal characteristics or circumstances, persons like him or her have often not been given equal concern, respect, and consideration. It is logical to conclude that, in most cases, further differential treatment will contribute to the perpetuation or promotion of their unfair social characterization, and will have a more severe impact on them, since they are already vulnerable."

In the present case, like in M v H,[59] there is significant pre-existing disadvantage and vulnerability.

[45] I turn now to deal with the discriminatory impact of section 25(5) on same-sex life partners. I agree with the submission advanced on respondents' behalf that section 25(5) is manifestly aimed at achieving the societal goal of protecting the family life of "lawful marriages" (which I understand to mean marriages which are formally valid and contracted in good faith and not sham marriages for the purposes of circumventing the Act) and certain recognised customary unions, by making provision for family re-unification and in particular by entitling spouses of persons permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic to receive permanent residence permits. The pertinent question that immediately arises is what the impact of being excluded from these protective provisions is on same-sex life partners.

[46] The starting point is to enquire what the nature of such family life is in the case of spouses that section 25(5) specially protects and benefits. For purposes of this case it is unnecessary to consider comprehensively the nature of traditional marriage and the spousal relationship. It is sufficient to indicate that under South African common law a marriage "creates a physical, moral and spiritual community of life, a consortium omnis vitae"[60] which has been described as:

> ". . . an abstraction comprising the totality of a number of rights, duties and advantages accruing to spouses of a marriage . . . These embrace intangibles, such as loyalty and sympathetic care and affection, concern . . . as well as the more material needs of life, such as physical care, financial support, the rendering of services in the running of the common household or in a support-generating business . . . ."[61]

61 Per Erasmus J in Peter v The Minister of Law and Order 1990 (4) SA 6 (E) at 9 G.

As Sinclair and Heaton point out,[62] the duties of cohabitation and fidelity flow from this relationship. In Grobbelaar v Havenga[63] it was held that "[c]ompanionship, love, affection, comfort, mutual services, sexual intercourse — all belong to the married state. Taken together, they make up the consortium."

[47] It is important to emphasise that over the past decades an accelerating process of transformation has taken place in family relationships as well as in societal and legal concepts regarding the family and what it comprises. Sinclair and Heaton,[64] after alluding to the profound transformations of the legal relationships between family members that have taken place in the past, comment as follows on the present:

> "But the current period of rapid change seems to 'strike at the most basic assumptions' underlying marriage and the family.
> . . . .
> Itself a country where considerable political and socio-economic movement has been and is taking place, South Africa occupies a distinctive position in the context of developments in the legal relationship between family members and between the state and the family. Its heterogeneous society is 'fissured by differences of language, religion, race, cultural habit, historical experience and self-definition' and, consequently, > reflects widely varying expectations about marriage, family life and the position of women in society." [Internal citations omitted]

[48] In other countries a significant change in societal and legal attitudes to same-sex partnerships in the context of what is considered to constitute a family has occurred. Evidence of these changes are to be found in the jurisprudence dealing with equality issues in countries such as Canada,[65] Israel,[66] the United Kingdom[67] and the United States.[68] In referring to these judgments from the highest courts of other jurisdictions I do not overlook the different nature of their histories, legal systems and constitutional contexts nor that, in the last two cases, the issue was one essentially of statutory construction and not constitutional invalidity. Nevertheless, these judgments give expression to norms and values in other open and democratic societies based on human dignity, equality and freedom which, in my view, give clear expression to the growing concern for, understanding of, and sensitivity towards human diversity in general and to gays and lesbians and their relationships in particular. This is an important source from which to illuminate our understanding of the Constitution and the promotion of its informing norms.[69]

[49] The impact of section 25(5) is to reinforce harmful and hurtful stereotypes of gays and lesbians. At the heart of these stereotypes whether expressly articulated or not, lie misconceptions based on the fact that the sexual orientation of lesbians and gays is such that they have an erotic and emotional affinity for persons of the same sex and may give physical sexual expression thereto with same-sex partners:

69 Section 39(1) provides in its relevant parts:

> "When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum -
> (a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;
> (c) may consider foreign law."

> "There are two predominant narratives that circulate within American society that help to explain the difficulty that lesbians and gays face in adopting children and establishing families. First, there is the story of lesbians and gays that centres on their sexuality. Whether because of disgust, confusion, or ignorance about homosexuality, lesbian and gay sexuality dominates the discourse of not only same-sex adoption, but all lesbian and gay issues. The classification of lesbians and gays as 'exclusively sexual beings' stands in stark contrast to the perception of heterosexual parents as 'people who, along with many other activities in their lives, occasionally engage in sex.' Through this narrative, lesbians and gays are reduced to one-dimensional creatures, defined by their sex and sexuality."[70] [Footnote omitted]

Such false classifications must be rejected. Our law has never proscribed consensual sexual acts between women in private[71] and the laws criminalising certain consensual sexual acts between males in private and certain acts in public have been declared constitutionally invalid.[72]

[50] A second stereotype, often used to bolster the prejudice against gay and lesbian sexuality, is constructed on the fact that a same-sex couple cannot procreate in the same way as a heterosexual couple. Gays and lesbians are certainly individually permitted to adopt children under the provisions of section 17(b) of the Child Care Act 74 of 1983[73] and nothing prevents a gay couple or a lesbian couple, one of whom has so adopted a child, from treating such child in all ways, other than strictly legally, as their child. They can certainly love, care and provide for the child as though it was their joint child.

[51] From a legal and constitutional point of view procreative potential is not a defining characteristic of conjugal relationships. Such a view would be deeply demeaning to couples (whether married or not) who, for whatever reason, are incapable of procreating when they commence such relationship or become so at any time thereafter. It is likewise demeaning to couples who commence such a relationship at an age when they no longer have the desire for sexual relations. It is demeaning to adoptive parents to suggest that their family is any less a family and any less entitled to respect and concern than a family with procreated children. I would even hold it to be demeaning of a couple who voluntarily decide not to have children or

> "A child may be adopted —
>
> . . .

sexual relations with one another; this being a decision entirely within their protected sphere of freedom and privacy.

[52] I find support for this view in the following conclusions of L'Heureux-Dubé J (with whom Cory and McLachlin JJ concurred) in Mossop:[74]

> "The argument is that procreation is somehow necessary to the concept of family and that same-sex couples cannot be families as they are incapable of procreation. Though there is undeniable value in procreation, the Tribunal could not have accepted that the capacity to procreate limits the boundaries of family. If this were so, childless couples and single parents would not constitute families. Further, this logic suggests that adoptive families are not as desirable as natural families. The flaws in this position must have been self-evident. Though procreation is an element in many families, placing the ability to procreate as the inalterable basis of family could result in an impoverished rather than an enriched version."

[53] The message that the total exclusion of gays and lesbians from the provisions of the sub-section conveys to gays and lesbians and the consequent impact on them can in my view be conveniently expressed by comparing (a) the facts concerning gays and lesbians and their same-sex partnerships which must be accepted, with (b) what the subsection in effect states:

(a) (i) Gays and lesbians have a constitutionally entrenched right to dignity and equality;

(ii) Sexual orientation is a ground expressly listed in section 9(3) of the Constitution and under section 9(5) discrimination on it is unfair unless the contrary is established;

74 Above n 43 at 710 c-e and the judgment of Thomas J in Quilter above n 25 at 534.

(iii) Prior criminal proscription of private and consensual sexual expression between gays, arising from their sexual orientation and which had been directed at gay men, has been struck down as unconstitutional;

(iv) Gays and lesbians in same-sex life partnerships are as capable as heterosexual spouses of expressing and sharing love in its manifold forms including affection, friendship, eros and charity;

(v) They are likewise as capable of forming intimate, permanent, committed, monogamous, loyal and enduring relationships; of furnishing emotional and spiritual support; and of providing physical care, financial support and assistance in running the common household;

(vi) They are individually able to adopt children and in the case of lesbians to bear them;

(vii) In short, they have the same ability to establish a consortium omnis vitae;

(viii) Finally, and of particular importance for purposes of this case, they are capable of constituting a family, whether nuclear or extended, and of establishing, enjoying and benefiting from family life which is not distinguishable in any significant respect from that of heterosexual spouses.

(b) The subsection, in this context, in effect states that all gay and lesbian permanent residents of the Republic, who are in same-sex relationships with foreign nationals, are not entitled to the benefit extended by the subsection to spouses married to foreign nationals in order to protect their > family and family life. This is so stated, notwithstanding that the family and family life which gays and lesbians are capable of establishing with their foreign national same-sex partners are in all significant respects indistinguishable from those of spouses and in human terms as important to gay and lesbian same-sex partners as they are to spouses.

[54] The message and impact are clear. Section 10 of the Constitution recognises and guarantees that everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected. The message is that gays and lesbians lack the inherent humanity to have their families and family lives in such same-sex relationships respected or protected. It serves in addition to perpetuate and reinforce existing prejudices and stereotypes. The impact constitutes a crass, blunt, cruel and serious invasion of their dignity. The discrimination, based on sexual orientation, is severe because no concern, let alone anything approaching equal concern, is shown for the particular sexual orientation of gays and lesbians.

[55] We were pressed with an argument, on behalf of the Minister, that it was of considerable public importance to protect the traditional and conventional institution of marriage and that the government accordingly has a strong and legitimate interest to protect the family life of such marriages and was entitled to do so by means of section 25(5). Even if this proposition were to be accepted it would be subject to two major reservations. In the first place, protecting the traditional institution of marriage as recognised by law may not be done in a way which unjustifiably limits the constitutional rights of partners in a permanent same-sex life partnership.

[56] In the second place there is no rational connection between the exclusion of same-sex life partners from the benefits under section 25(5) and the government interest sought to be achieved thereby, namely the protection of families and the family life of heterosexual spouses. No conceivable way was suggested, nor can I think of any, whereby the appropriate extension of the section 25(5) benefits to same-sex life partners could negatively effect such protection. A similar argument has been roundly rejected by the Canadian Supreme Court,[75] which Court has also stressed, correctly in my view, that concern for the protection of same-sex partnerships in no ways implies a disparagement of the traditional institution of marriage.[76]

75 In M v H above n 45 at para 109 Iacobucci J, writing for the Court, said the following:

> "Even if I were to accept that Part III of the Act is meant to address the systemic sexual inequality associated with opposite-sex relationships, the required nexus between this objective and the chosen measures is absent in this case. In my view, it defies logic to suggest that a gender-neutral support system is rationally connected to the goal of improving the economic circumstances of heterosexual women upon relationship breakdown. In addition, I can find no evidence to demonstrate that the exclusion of same-sex couples from the spousal support regime of the FLA in any way furthers the objective of assisting heterosexual women."

76 In Mossop above n 43 at 712 d L'Heureux-Dubé J said the following:

> "[I]n some ways, the debate about family presents society with a false choice. It is possible to be pro-family without rejecting less traditional family forms. It is not anti-family to support protection for non-traditional families. The traditional family is not the only family form and non-traditional family forms may equally advance true family values."

The same learned judge confirmed this view in Miron v Trudel above n 65 at para 100:

"[L]egislatures have intervened in a wide variety of contexts to protect individuals' vested interests in relationships of some permanence and interdependence. These interventions are not anti-marriage. They simply acknowledge that the family unit is evolving in response to changing times."

[57] There is nothing in the scales to counteract such conclusion. I accordingly hold that section 25(5) constitutes unfair discrimination and a serious limitation of the section 9(3) equality right of gays and lesbians who are permanent residents in the Republic and who are in permanent same-sex life partnerships with foreign nationals. I also hold, for the reasons appearing throughout this judgment and culminating in the conclusion reached at the beginning of this paragraph, that section 25(5) simultaneously constitutes a severe limitation of the section 10 right to dignity enjoyed by such gays and lesbians. Having come to this conclusion it is unnecessary to consider whether any of the freedom of movement rights of the eighth to the thirteenth applicants, guaranteed under section 24 of the Constitution, have been limited in any way by section 25(5).

Justification

[58] I now apply the section 36(1) justification analysis, incorporating that of proportionality applied to the balancing of different interests, as enunciated in S v Makwanyane and Another[77] and as adapted for the 1996 Constitution in the Sodomy case.[78] The rights limited, namely equality and dignity, are important rights going to the core of our constitutional democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom.[79] The forming and sustaining of intimate personal relationships of the nature here in issue are for many individuals essential for their own self-understanding and for the full development and expression of their human personalities. Although expressed in a different context and when marital status was not a ground specified in section 8(2) of the interim Constitution, the following remarks of O'Regan J in Harksen,[80] are apposite:

> "I agree that marital status is a matter of significant importance to all individuals, closely related to human dignity and liberty. For most people, the decision to enter into a permanent personal relationship with another is a momentous and defining one."

The effect of omitting same-sex life partnerships from section 25(5) limits the above rights at a deep and serious level.

[59] There is no interest on the other side that enters the balancing process. It is true, as previously stated, that the protection of family and family life in conventional spousal relationships is an important governmental objective, but the extent to which this could be done would in no way be limited or affected if same-sex life partners were appropriately included under the protection of section 25(5). There is in my view no justification for the limitation in the present case and it therefore follows that the provisions of section 25(5) are inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.

[60] It is important to indicate and emphasise the precise ambit of the above holding. The Court is in the present case concerned only with partners in permanent same-sex life partnerships. The position of unmarried partners in permanent heterosexual partnerships and their omission from the provisions of section 25(5) was never an issue in the case nor was any argument addressed thereon. The Court does not reach the latter issue in this case and I express no view thereon, leaving it completely open. Nor does the Court in this case reach the issue of whether, or to what extent, the law ought to give formal institutional recognition to same-sex partnerships and this issue is similarly left open.

[61] The High Court was faced with the difficult task of devising an appropriate remedy consequent upon its finding section 25(5) to be constitutionally invalid because of what it omitted.

[62] As far as the declaration of invalidity is concerned the High Court considered that three options were open to it. The first was to remedy the constitutional invalidity of section 25(5) by introducing ("reading in") words into the section in such a way that its provisions also applied to persons in same-sex life partnerships. The High Court decided against such remedy as an appropriate one, principally because it was of the view that it was not possible to define with a sufficient degree of precision the words that had to be inserted in section 25(5) in order for it to comply with the Constitution.[81] The second was postulated as follows:

> "Were a declaration of invalidity to provide that the section is inconsistent with the Constitution to the extent that it confers an exclusive benefit on spouses and hence discriminates on the grounds of sexual orientation, the rest of the section could remain valid. Thus spouses as defined in terms of the Act at present would continue to enjoy a

The third was to "declare the section in its entirety to be invalid."[83] The High Court purported to adopt the second option because it appeared -

> ". . . preferable to frame the declaration of invalidity so as to save a legitimate purpose (that is, acknowledging the importance of some forms of permanent relationships) rather than to deny a benefit to all who deserve it. But this perpetrates discrimination in respect of certain forms of permanent relationships. Thus legislative action is required to remedy the position and ensure that no unjustified discrimination is permitted by the Act,"[84] and accordingly drafted paragraph 1 of its order to read:

84 Id at 296 C - D.

> "Section 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991 is declared invalid to the extent that the benefit conferred exclusively on spouses is inconsistent with section 9(3) in that on grounds of sexual orientation it discriminates against same sex-life partners".[85]

The High Court suspended this order for a period of twelve months "from the date of confirmation of this order to enable Parliament to correct the inconsistency" and made the further orders quoted in paragraph 2 of this judgment.

[63] While appreciating the novelty and difficulty of framing an appropriate order in the circumstances of the present case, one is driven to conclude that the High Court did not, in effect, through paragraph 1 of its order, bring about the invalidity of any portion of section 25(5). This is so for two reasons. It appears clearly from its motivation for the second option (which it adopted) that it aimed, through its order, to preserve the benefits of the section for spouses and was intent on giving an order to achieve this object. This was in fact also the effect of the order, the interpretation of which is complicated by the fact that it conflates reasons for the order with its operative terms. The device of notional severance can effectively be used to render inoperative portions of a statutory provision, where it is the presence of particular provisions which is constitutionally offensive and where the scope of the provision is too extensive and hence constitutionally offensive, but the unconstitutionality cannot be cured by the severance of actual words from the provision. An order giving effect to and embodying such notional severance in the case of constitutional invalidity was made for the first time in Ferreira v Levin NO and Others; Vryenhoek and Others v Powell NO and Others.[86]

86 Above n 19 where, in paragraph 1 of the order at para 157 of the judgment, the following declaration is made:

> "The provisions of section 417(2)(b) of the Companies Act 1973 are, with immediate effect declared invalid, to the extent only that the words
>
> in section 417(2)(b) apply to the use of any such answer against the person who gave such answer, in criminal proceedings against such person, other than proceedings where that person stands trial on a charge relating to the administering or taking of an oath or the administering or making of an affirmation or the giving of false evidence or the making of a false statement in connection with such questions and answers or a failure to answer lawful questions fully [64] Where, however, the invalidity of a statutory provision results from an omission, it is not possible, in my view, to achieve notional severance by using words such as "invalid to the extent that", or other expressions indicating notional severance. An omission cannot, notionally, be cured by severance. This is implicit in the constitutional jurisprudence of Canada and the United States dealt with later in this judgment and has been expressly so held in Germany.[87] The only logical equivalent to severance, in the case of invalidity caused by omission, is the device of reading in. In the present case there are only two options; declaring the whole of section 25(5) to be invalid or reading in provisions to cure such invalidity.

[65] In fashioning a declaration of invalidity, a court has to keep in balance two important considerations. One is the obligation to provide the "appropriate relief " under section 38 of the Constitution, to which claimants are entitled when "a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened".[88] Although the remedial provision considered by this Court in Fose[89] was that of the interim Constitution,[90] the two provisions are in all material respects identical and the following observations in that case are equally applicable to section 38 of the Constitution:

> "Given the historical context in which the interim Constitution was adopted and the extensive violation of fundamental rights which had preceded it, I have no doubt that this Court has a particular duty to ensure that, within the bounds of the Constitution, effective relief be granted for the infringement of any of the rights entrenched in it. In our context an appropriate remedy must mean an effective remedy, for without effective remedies for breach, the values underlying and the rights entrenched in the Constitution cannot properly be upheld or enhanced. Particularly in a country where so few have the means to enforce their rights through the courts, it is essential that on those occasions when the legal process does establish that an infringement of an entrenched right has occurred, it be effectively vindicated. The courts have a particular responsibility in this regard and are obliged to 'forge new tools' and shape innovative remedies, if needs be, to achieve this goal."[91] [Footnote omitted]

88 The relevant part of section 38 reads as follows:

> "Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights..."

90 Section 7(4)(a) provided the following:

> "When an infringement of or threat to any right entrenched in this Chapter is alleged, any person referred to in paragraph (b) shall be entitled to apply to a competent court of law for appropriate relief, which may include a declaration of rights."

91 Above n 89 at para 69. The footnote omitted from the end of the quotation in the text, reads as follows:

> "See the observations of Verma J in the Nilabati Behera case (supra) n 123 as quoted in para 51 (supra) and the remarks of Harlan J in the Bivens case supra n 25 at 407 quoted in paras 33, 34 and n 67 (supra). In Nelles v Ontario (1989) 60 DLR (4th) 609 at 641-2

Lamer J observed as follows:
'When a person can demonstrate that one of his Charter rights has been infringed, access to a court of competent jurisdiction to seek a remedy is essential for the vindication of a constitutional wrong. To create a right without a remedy is antithetical to one of the purposes of the Charter which surely is to allow courts to fashion remedies when constitutional infringements occur.'"

The Court's obligation to provide appropriate relief, must be read together with section 172(1)(b) which requires the Court to make an order which is just and equitable.

[66] The other consideration a court must keep in mind, is the principle of the separation of powers and, flowing therefrom, the deference it owes to the legislature in devising a remedy for a breach of the Constitution in any particular case. It is not possible to formulate in general terms what such deference must embrace, for this depends on the facts and circumstances of each case. In essence, however, it involves restraint by the courts in not trespassing onto that part of the legislative field which has been reserved by the Constitution, and for good reason, to the legislature. Whether, and to what extent, a court may interfere with the language of a statute will depend ultimately on the correct construction to be placed on the Constitution as applied to the legislation and facts involved in each case.[92]

[67] I am persuaded by Mr Trengove's submission that, as far as deference to the legislature is concerned, there is in principle no difference between a court rendering a statutory provision constitutional by removing the offending part by actual or notional severance, or by reading words into a statutory provision. In both cases the parliamentary enactment, as expressed in a statutory provision, is being altered by the order of a court. In the one case by excision and in the other by addition.

[68] This chance difference cannot by itself establish a difference in principle. The only relevant enquiry is what the consequences of such an order are and whether they constitute an unconstitutional intrusion into the domain of the legislature. Any other conclusion would lead to the absurdity that the granting of a remedy would depend on the fortuitous circumstance of the form in which the legislature chose to enact the provision in question. A legislature could, for example, extend certain benefits to life-partners generally and exclude same-sex life partners by way of express exception. In such case there would be no objection to declaring the exception invalid, where a court was satisfied that such severance was, on application of whatever the appropriate test might be, constitutionally justified in relation to the legislature. It would be absurd to deny the reading in remedy, where it was equally constitutionally justified in relation to the legislature, simply because of its form.

[69] There is nothing in the Constitution to suggest that form must be placed above substance in a way that would result in so glaring an anomaly. The supremacy clause, section 2, does not enact that "words" inconsistent with the Constitution are invalid but rather that inconsistent "law" is. Similarly section 172(1)(a) obliges a competent court to declare that "any law . . . that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency" and not "any words" or "any words in any law". The same conclusion regarding the nature and permissibility of reading in as a constitutional remedy was reached by the Canadian Supreme Court in the leading case of Schachter v Canada.[93]

93 (1992) 93 DLR (4th) 1 per Lamer CJC for the Court at 12 h to 13 h.

[70] I accordingly conclude that reading in is, depending on all the circumstances, an appropriate form of relief under section 38 of the Constitution and that

> ". . . whether a court 'reads in' or 'strikes out' words from a challenged law, the focus of the court should be on the appropriate remedy in the circumstances and not on the label used to arrive at the result."[94]

The real question is whether, in the circumstances of the present matter, reading in would be just and equitable and an appropriate remedy.

94 Knodel v British Columbia (Medical Services Commission) (1991) 91 CLLC ¶ 17, 023 at 16, 343, [1991] 6 WWR 728; 58 BCLR (2d) 356 (SC) per Rowles J, as quoted with approval by Lamer CJC in Schachter's case above n 93 at 13 f.

[71] I am strengthened in this conclusion by the fact that in several jurisdictions, courts have held that they do possess the power to read words into statutes where appropriate. In Schachter,[95] the leading Canadian case, the Supreme Court of Canada held that a court may read words into a statute in appropriate circumstances and set out principles to guide such decisions. Since then, Canadian courts have read words into statutes on several occasions.[96] Courts in the United States also accept that they have the power to read words into statutes to provide remedies for unconstitutionality.[97] The Israeli Supreme Court[98] and the German Constitutional Court[99] have also made similar orders.

[72] Criticism has also been expressed of a model for remedy selection, with respect to under-inclusive provisions, which assumes that there is no constitutional norm, albeit inchoate, which can guide such selection. While it is impossible to reflect adequately, in any summary, the richness and depth of the contentions advanced in this regard by Caminker, the following passages capture important aspects of their thrust and are relevant to the present enquiry:

> " . . . [G]iven the presence of an inchoate substantive norm and the absence of structural values obliging judicial passivity, the current model's assumption that courts conclude their 'essentially judicial' role simply by mandating equal treatment through either extension or nullification is false. Though both remedies are formally adequate, one is substantively preferred; courts (at least temporarily) can further actualize constitutional norms by choosing the preferred remedy.

99 The Court had previously declined to make such an order but in a landmark decision in November 1998 it adopted an approach which essentially constituted the reading in of words to a statute. Reported in 1999 NJW 557.

> Setting the remedial starting point in this manner maintains respect for the legislature's authority to participate in the remedial decision; the potential for subsequent legislative review 'vitiates any objection that the Supreme Court, in fashioning interstitial rules, violates separation of powers principles vis-a-vis Congress.' Indeed, employing the norm-based model not only will better execute the judiciary's proper remedial function, but it also will enrich the legislature's contribution by enhancing its subsequent deliberative process. When selecting a particular remedy according to this model, a court necessarily will discuss candidly the source and strength of the constitutional preference expressed by relevant inchoate norms. This discussion will inform the ensuing legislative deliberations and generate normative claims for leaving the court's starting point undisturbed; the legislature therefore is more likely to take account of both constitutional values and policy preferences when formulating its ultimate remedial response."[100][Footnotes omitted]

[73] Having concluded that it is permissible in terms of our Constitution for this Court to read words into a statute to remedy unconstitutionality, it is necessary to summarise the principles which should guide the court in deciding when such an order is appropriate. In developing such principles, it is important that the particular needs of our Constitution and its remedial requirements be constantly borne in mind.

[74] The severance of words from a statutory provision and reading words into the provision are closely related remedial powers of the Court. In deciding whether words should be severed from a provision or whether words should be read into one, a court pays careful attention first, to the need to ensure that the provision which results from severance or reading words into a statute is consistent with the Constitution and its fundamental values and secondly, that the result achieved would interfere with the laws adopted by the legislature as little as possible. In our society where the statute books still contain many provisions enacted by a Parliament not concerned with the protection of human rights, the first consideration will in those cases often weigh more heavily than the second.

[75] In deciding to read words into a statute, a court should also bear in mind that it will not be appropriate to read words in, unless in so doing a court can define with sufficient precision how the statute ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. Moreover, when reading in (as when severing) a court should endeavour to be as faithful as possible to the legislative scheme within the constraints of the Constitution. Even where the remedy of reading in is otherwise justified, it ought not to be granted where it would result in an unsupportable budgetary intrusion.[101] In determining the scope of the budgetary intrusion, it will be necessary to consider the relative size of the group which the reading in would add to the group already enjoying the benefits. Where reading in would, by expanding the group of persons protected, sustain a policy of long standing or one that is constitutionally encouraged, it should be preferred to one removing the protection completely.[102]

[76] It should also be borne in mind that whether the remedy a court grants is one striking down, wholly or in part; or reading into or extending the text, its choice is not final. Legislatures are able, within constitutional limits, to amend the remedy, whether by re-enacting equal benefits, further extending benefits, reducing them, amending them, "fine-tuning" them[103] or abolishing them. Thus they can exercise final control over the nature and extent of the benefits.[104]

103 As it was put in Westcott, above n 97.

104 See, for example, Caminker, above n 97 at 1187 where the following is aptly stated:

> "Whether a court creates graveyards or vineyards, its choice is not final. Where courts nullify provisions, legislatures can respond by enacting extended and hence constitutional versions; where courts extend provisions, legislatures can subsequently repeal them. Thus, the legislature retains final control over the extension/nullification decision.

Still, a court must implement a remedy which acts as a 'starting point' for legislative review." [Footnotes omitted]

[77] I turn finally to the application of the principles or guidelines, referred to above, to the facts and legislative unconstitutionality in the present case. The striking down of section 25(5) will have the unfortunate result of depriving spouses, as presently defined, from the benefits conferred by the section; it will indeed be "equality with a vengeance" and create "equal graveyards".[105] This consequence cannot properly be addressed by the device of suspending such order for a fixed period of time. The above unfortunate consequences would ensue if Parliament did nothing and the suspension lapsed with the effluxion of time.

[78] More important perhaps, is the fact that, normatively, such an order would convey an impression that achieving equality by striking down the benefits which spouses presently enjoy would be a constitutionally permissible result. It is unnecessary and undesirable to decide, in the present case, whether the failure to afford spouses the benefits that they currently enjoy by virtue of the provisions of section 25(5) would be constitutionally defensible. It would be equally undesirable to suggest the contrary by making a striking down order.

[79] In any event the benefits conferred on spouses express a clear policy of the government to protect and enhance the family life of spouses. This policy extends back at least 69 years, for the provisions of section 3(1)(b)(v) of the Immigration Quota Act 8 of 1930 provided a comparable benefit, although less fully and in a more discriminatory manner.[106] The indications are therefore strong that, had Parliament considered the most appropriate way for it to remedy the unconstitutionality of section 25(5), it would have chosen a remedy which did not deprive spouses of their current benefits under the section. This view is fortified by the fact that the government is, in other areas, giving effect to its legislative obligations under the equality clause in respect of same-sex partners.[107] All these considerations indicate that, if reasonably possible, a striking down order should not be the remedy resorted to.

106 The relevant part of section 3(1) reads:

> "Subject to the provisions of sub-section (2) of this section it shall be competent for the board in any calender year to permit in its discretion any person born in any particular country not specified in the Schedule to this Act to enter the Union for permanent residence therein, notwithstanding that the maximum number of persons born in that country which may, under section one, be permitted to enter the Union, have already been granted permission to enter the Union during that year:
> Provided -
> (b) that every person so admitted -
> (i) is of good character; and
> (ii) is in the opinion of the board likely to become readily assimilated with the inhabitants of the Union and to become a desirable citizen of the Union within a reasonable period after his entry into the Union; and
> (iii) is not likely to be harmful to the economic, or industrial welfare of the Union; and
> (iv) does not and is, in the opinion of the board, not likely to pursue a profession, occupation, trade or calling in which, in the opinion of the board, a sufficient number of persons is already engaged in the Union to meet the requirements of the inhabitants of the Union; or
> (v) is the wife or a child under twenty-one years of age, or a destitute or aged parent or grandparent of a person permanently and lawfully resident in the Union who is able and undertakes to maintain him or her." [Emphasis supplied]

107 See the statutes referred to in n 41 above.

[80] The group that reading in would add to "spouses" in section 25(5), namely same-sex life partners, must be very small in comparison to the group benefited by the section. No statistics were provided by any of the litigants to quantify this, but it is safe in my view to make this assumption. The government's policy behind the section 25(5) benefit would thus be left intact by a reading in remedy and the budgetary implications would be minuscule.

[81] In my view the observations made in Fose[108] which were quoted above[109] are of particular application in the present case. In order for the norms and values lying at the heart of our Constitution to be made concrete, it is particularly important for the Court in this case to afford an effective remedy, which will also be seen to be effective, to the eighth to thirteenth applicants, and people similarly placed within the context of section 25(5). If, in order to do this properly, new tools have to be forged and innovative remedies shaped, this must be done.

[82] An appropriate remedy in the present case must vindicate the rights of permanent same-sex life partners to establish a family unit that, while retaining the characteristic features derived from its same-sex nature, receives the same protection and enjoys the same concern from the law and from society generally as do marriages recognised by law. But it must vindicate at more than an abstract level. It must operate to eradicate these stereotypes. Our constitutional commitment to non-discrimination and equal protection demands this. There is a wider public dimension. The bell tolls for everyone, because

> "[t]he social cost of discrimination is insupportably high and these insidious practices are damaging not only to the individuals who suffer the discrimination, but also to the very fabric of our society."[110]

The most effective way of achieving this in the present case is by a suitable reading in order, if this is reasonably possible.

110 Per L'Heureux Dubé J in Mossop above n 43 at 698 b. See also the plea by Thomas J in Quilter above n 25 at 550:

> "If [the basic human rights of minority groups are being denied], it is important to spell that denial out if the basic dignity of everyone in a more enlightened age is to be secured."

[83] The only bar to such an order in this case would be if it were not possible to define with sufficient precision how section 25(5) ought to be extended in order to comply with the Constitution. What constitutes sufficient precision must depend on the facts and the demands of each case. In deciding what sufficient precision is, one must not lose sight of the fact that the reading in is not a final act. It is important to point out in this context that if the remedy decided upon by a court were the striking down of section 25(5), coupled with a suspension order, the question of interim relief to protect the successful applicants would present the same problems concerning the precise formulation of such an interim order as does the remedy of reading in. It was for this reason that the Court in Miron[111] declined to make a suspended striking down order coupled with a constitutional exemption as a form of relief.[112]

111 Above n 65.

[84] The legislature is empowered to amend or fine-tune any extension that the Court, through its order, might make to section 25(5), or to do so with regard to any related or relevant provision, in order to give more accurate effect to its policy, provided it does so in a manner which is not inconsistent with the Constitution. Equal protection and non-discrimination as guaranteed under section 9 do not require identical treatment.[113] The family unit of a same-sex life partnership is different from the family unit of spouses and to treat them identically might in fact, in certain circumstances, result in discrimination. Spouses in a conventional marriage are in a legal relationship acknowledged by the law in a particular way and the existence of the conventional marriage is capable of easy and virtually incontestable proof; the legal relationship can also not be terminated without the intervention of the courts. Same-sex life partnerships are as yet not recognised or protected in a comparable manner by the law. In order to ensure equal protection and non-discrimination for persons in such different family units it might be necessary to treat them differently.[114]

[85] Reasonable legislative and administrative steps may be taken to prevent abuse of section 25(5) and evasion of the provisions of the Act generally. Section 25(6) is such a step for it provides that

> "[a] regional committee may, in the case of a person who applies for an immigration > permit and who has entered into a marriage with a person who is permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic, less than two years prior to the date of his or her application, refuse to authorize such a permit unless the committee is satisfied that such marriage was not contracted for the purpose of evading any provision of this Act."

Should the provisions of section 25(5) be extended to include permanent same-sex life partners, it would likewise be permissible for Parliament and the executive to take reasonable steps to prevent persons falsely purporting to be in same-sex life partnerships from evading the provisions of the Act.

[86] Against the background of what has been said above I am satisfied that the constitutional defect in section 25(5) can be cured with sufficient precision by reading in, after the word "spouse", the following words: "or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership," and that it should indeed be cured in this manner. Permanent in this context means an established intention of the parties to cohabit with one another permanently. In my view, such a reading in, seen in the light of what has been said above concerning the legislature's right to fine-tune the section as so extended and other provisions that may be relevant thereto, does not intrude impermissibly upon the domain of the legislature.

[87] It is necessary to emphasise again that the Court need only provide the reading in remedy for excluded same-sex life partners, because it is only in relation to them that the Court was called upon to decide, and only in relation to them that it has been decided above, that their exclusion from the provisions of section 25(5) is constitutionally invalid. Apart from those cases where the Constitution makes express provision to the contrary, a court decides constitutional disputes and makes, where appropriate, orders of constitutional invalidity, only on the issues presented to it and not as a matter of abstract constitutional adjudication. When a statutory provision has been partially invalidated by way of notional severance, the hypothetical possibility always exists that subsequently, because of the issues and contentions then placed before the court, the ambit of the constitutional invalidity might have to be extended. Likewise, after reading in matter to cure a constitutionally invalid under-inclusive provision, the possibility exists that, for identical reasons, a court may have to extend the reading in, in order to cure the constitutional invalidity. There is in principle no difference between these two possibilities. The conclusion I have reached in this case is that section 25(5) is unconstitutional in that it fails to include within its benefits a group entitled to such benefits. The order to be made affords relief to such group. This does not mean that other groups are not entitled to the benefits provided by section 25(5).

[88] Whoever in the administration of the Act is called upon to decide whether a same-sex life partnership is permanent, in the sense indicated above, will have to do so on the totality of the facts presented. Without purporting to provide an exhaustive list, such facts would include the following: the respective ages of the partners; the duration of the partnership; whether the partners took part in a ceremony manifesting their intention to enter into a permanent partnership, what the nature of that ceremony was and who attended it; how the partnership is viewed by the relations and friends of the partners; whether the partners share a common abode; whether the partners own or lease the common abode jointly; whether and to what extent the partners share responsibility for living expenses and the upkeep of the joint home; whether and to what extent one partner provides financial support for the other; whether and to what extent the partners have made provision for one another in relation to medical, pension and related benefits; whether there is a partnership agreement and what its contents are; and whether and to what extent the partners have made provision in their wills for one another. None of these considerations is indispensable for establishing a permanent partnership. In order to apply the above criteria, those administering the Act are entitled, within the ambit of the Constitution and bearing in mind what has been said in this judgment, to take all reasonable steps, by way of regulations or otherwise, to ensure that full information concerning the permanent nature of any same-sex life partnership, is disclosed.

The Order

[89] No case has been made out for the suspension of an order giving effect to such reading in. Permanent same-sex life partners are entitled to an effective remedy for the breach of their rights to equality and dignity. In the circumstances of this case an effective remedy is one that takes effect immediately. At the same time, if the order were to have retrospective effect, it might cause uncertainty concerning the validity of decisions taken and acts performed in the past, in good faith and in reliance on the provisions of the Act as they then read, with regard to applications under the Act by partners in permanent same-sex life partnerships. In my view such uncertainty ought, if possible, to be avoided by limiting the order so that it has no retrospective effect. Such an order can cause no prejudice to partners in permanent same-sex life partnerships who wish to seek afresh, or persist with seeking, relief under the Act, for nothing prevents them from doing so immediately after the order is granted. It is therefore just and equitable to make such a limiting order.

Costs

[90] Mr Trengove submitted that the costs which should be awarded to the applicants in respect of the two abortive interlocutory applications in this Court should include the costs of two counsel and should be taxed on the scale as between attorney and own client for two reasons; first, because they constitute an abuse of court process and, second, because they are manifestly without merit.

[91] The fact that both applications are manifestly without merit appears from what has already been said. The High Court is rightly critical in its judgment of the conduct of the respondents in the High Court proceedings, their dilatory approach to the litigation, and their attempt at the last moment to delay the hearing of the case. The same criticism can be directed to their belated attempt to raise new issues through the two abortive interlocutory applications to which I have referred at the commencement of this judgment, and their failure to explain why, even at the stage of the hearing of the matter before this Court, they had for a period of over 14 months failed to lodge an answer to the factual averments made in the main application.

[92] The wasted costs occasioned by these applications form part of the costs which the respondents will be required to pay. What is in issue is whether the applications constitute an abuse of the process of the court which merits the making of an order that the costs of the applications be paid as between attorney and client.

[93] If the argument addressed to this Court by the respondents concerning the merits of the appeal had revealed the same lack of substance and apparent disregard for the rights of the applicants I would have had no hesitation in ordering them to pay costs as between attorney and client, notwithstanding the fact that such costs are rarely awarded on appeal.[115]

[94] As far as the merits of the appeal are concerned, however, there is no criticism of the respondents' conduct. They raised issues of substance, and it cannot be said that their decision to oppose the confirmation of the order made by the High Court, and to appeal against the order made, was frivolous.

[95] The two applications were concerned with collateral issues which could be disposed of summarily and took up very little time. There are some wasted costs occasioned by the respondents having had to consider the issues raised in the interlocutory applications and to respond to them on affidavit. In relation to the costs of the appeal as a whole, however, such costs will be comparatively slight.

[96] It is regrettable that the state should have considered it appropriate to raise before this court issues of such little merit as those contained in the two abortive applications. Its conduct in doing so, however, taken in the context of the appeal as a whole, does not constitute such a serious abuse of the process of the Court as would warrant an order that the costs of such applications be paid on an attorney and client basis.

Summary

[97] Section 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991, by omitting to confer on persons, who are partners in permanent same-sex life partnerships, the benefits it extends to spouses, unfairly discriminates, on the grounds of their sexual orientation and marital status, against partners in such same-sex partnerships who are permanently and lawfully resident in the Republic. Such unfair discrimination limits the equality rights of such partners guaranteed to them by section 9 of the Constitution and their right to dignity under section 10. This limitation is not reasonable or justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom and accordingly does not satisfy the requirements of section 36(1) of the Constitution. This omission in section 25(5) of the Act is therefore inconsistent with the Constitution. It would not be an appropriate remedy to declare the whole of section 25(5) invalid. Instead, it would be appropriate to read in, after the word "spouse" in the section, the words "or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership". The reading in of these words comes into effect from the making of the order in this judgment.

[98] The following order is made:

1. The applications of the respondents for

    (a) condonation of their failure to file answering affidavits in the High Court;

    (b) leave to file their answering affidavits;

    (c) the matter concerning the filing of answering affidavits to be remitted to the High Court; and

(d) an amendment of their notice of appeal are dismissed with costs, including the costs of two counsel, such costs to be paid by the respondents jointly and severally.

2. The appeal of the applicants succeeds and paragraphs 1, 2 and 3 of the order made by the High Court are set aside and replaced with the following:

2.1 the omission from section 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991, after the word "spouse", of the words "or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership," is declared to be inconsistent with the Constitution;

2.2 section 25(5) of the Aliens Control Act 96 of 1991, is to be read as though the following words appear therein after the word "spouse":

"or partner, in a permanent same-sex life partnership".

3. The orders in paragraph 2 only come into effect from the moment of the making of this order.

4. Paragraphs 4, 5 and the costs part of the High Court order are confirmed.

5. The costs of the proceedings in this Court, including the costs of two counsel, are to be paid by the respondents, jointly and severally.

CONSTITUTIONAL COURT OF SOUTH AFRICA

Case CCT 63/03

MINISTER OF FINANCE First Applicant

THE POLITICAL OFFICE BEARERS PENSION FUND Second Applicant

versus

FREDERIK JACOBUS VAN HEERDEN Respondent

Heard on : 24 February 2004

Decided on : 29 July 2004

JUDGMENT

MOSENEKE J:

Introduction

[1] This case raises important constitutional issues of equality, restitutionary measures and unfair discrimination. These issues arise within the context of a challenge to the constitutionality of certain rules of the Political Office-Bearers Pension Fund (the Fund) that provided for differentiated employer contributions in respect of members of Parliament and other political office-bearers between 1994 and 1999.

[2] The constitutional attack is mounted on two grounds. The first is that the relevant rules of the Fund offend the equality provisions of the Constitution because they are unfairly discriminatory. The second ground is that, in any event, the Fund as a whole is a nullity because it was not validly established under section 190A of the interim Constitution[1] or section 219 of the Constitution.[2] The equality challenge is

[1] Section 190A provides:

> "(1) There shall be paid out of and as a charge on the pension fund referred to in subsection (2) to a political office-bearer upon his or her retirement as a political office-bearer, or to his or her widow or widower or dependent or any other category of persons as may be determined in the rules of such pension fund upon his or her death, such pension and pension benefits as may be determined in terms of the said rules.
> (2) A pension fund shall be established for the purposes of this section after consultation with a committee appointed by Parliament, and such a fund shall be registered in terms of and be subject to the laws governing the registration and control of pension funds in the Republic.
> (3) All political office-bearers shall be members of the said pension fund.
> (4) Contributions to the said fund by members of the fund shall be made at a rate to be determined in the rules of the fund, and such contributions shall be deducted monthly from the remuneration payable to members as political office-bearers.
> (5) Contributions to the said fund by the State shall be made at a rate to be determined by the President, and such contributions shall be paid monthly from the National Revenue Fund and the respective Provincial Revenue Funds, according to whether a member serves at national or provincial level of government.
> (6) In this section "political office-bearer" means —
> (a) an Executive Deputy President;
> (b) a Minister or Deputy Minister;
> (c) a member of the National Assembly or the Senate;
> (d) the Premier or a member of the Executive Council of a province;
> (e) a member of a provincial legislature;
> (f) a diplomatic representative of the Republic who is not a member of the public service; or
> (g) any other political office-bearer recognised for purposes of this section by an Act of Parliament."

[2] Section 219 states:

> "(1) An Act of Parliament must establish a framework for determining —
> (a) the salaries, allowances and benefits of members of the National Assembly, permanent delegates to the National Council of Provinces, members of the Cabinet, Deputy Ministers, traditional leaders and members of any councils of traditional leaders; and
> (b) the upper limit of salaries, allowances or benefits of members of provincial legislatures, members of Executive Councils and members of Municipal Councils of the different categories.
> (2) National legislation must establish an independent commission to make recommendations concerning the salaries, allowances and benefits referred to in subsection (1).
> (3) Parliament may pass the legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).
> (4) The national executive, a provincial executive, a municipality or any other relevant authority may implement the national legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).

contested on the basis that the differentiation in the rules of the Fund is not unfairly discriminatory because it constitutes a "tightly circumscribed affirmative action measure" permissible under the equality provisions of our Constitution.

[3] The claimant is Mr Frederik Jacobus van Heerden (respondent). He served as a National Party member of the old Parliament from 1987 to 1994. With the advent of the new democratic Parliament in 1994, he was returned to office for the same political party as member of the National Assembly until April 1999. Like many parliamentarians whose term straddled the old and new Parliaments, he is a member of the Fund and of the Closed Pension Fund (CPF).[3] He purports to act also on behalf of 145 other similarly placed members of the Fund. Thring J, sitting in the Cape High Court (High Court), upheld the claim and declared the provisions of rule 4.2.1 of the Fund to be unconstitutional and invalid in Van Heerden v The Speaker of Parliament and Others (the High Court judgment).[4] The Minister of Finance, the first applicant, and the Fund, the second applicant, are aggrieved by this decision and seek leave of this Court to appeal against it.

Factual background

[4] From 1983 to 1994, the pension benefits of members of the tricameral Parliament and of other political office-bearers were regulated by statute.[5] In 1993, at the Kempton Park constitutional negotiations,[6] the ruling party of the time raised concern regarding the security of existing pensions of political office-bearers. There had been speculation by parliamentarians and other political office-bearers of the time that the new political regime may not continue to pay their pension benefits. The negotiating parties agreed that a pension fund exclusive to members of the old Parliament and other political office-bearers of the time would be established and fully funded to pay defined benefits to its members, whether they were re-elected or not as members of the first democratic Parliament of 1994.

[5] Pursuant to this agreement, legislation established the CPF.[7] It came into operation on 5 January 1994. As its name intimates, the CPF had several exclusionary features. Only members of Parliament and political office-bearers who held office before 1994 could become its members.[8] No new members could be admitted. It follows that persons who were elected to Parliament for the first time in the 1994

[7] Closed Pension Fund Act 197 of 1993.

[8] This is because the CPF only provided benefits to people already provided for by the previous Pension Act. This included all existing parliamentarians and office bearers. The relevant part of section 3 of the CPF Act provides:

> "(1) Every person who receives a pension in terms of a pension provision or who on the termination of membership of the Pension Scheme or on the vacation of the office mentioned in section 13 of the Constitution or on the death of such person becomes entitled to the payment of a pension, shall be a member of the fund."

general elections were excluded. A further significant feature is that members of the old Parliament who on the 26 April 1994 had not served for a period of seven and a half years were entitled only to a gratuity.[9]

[6] Yet another distinguishing feature of the CPF is its financing provisions. The pension liability of the CPF to its beneficiaries was to be fully financed by public funds and not based on employer or employee contributions.[10] As a result, after January 1994, its members were not required to make any contributions to the CPF irrespective of whether they were returned to office or not in the 1994 general elections.

[7] Another relevant sequel to the negotiations at Kempton Park was the establishment of a Special Pension Fund to provide for people who had undergone sacrifices in order to bring about the new democratic order.[11]

[9] Section 9(1)(a) of the previous Pension Act provides for the payment of office bearers with more than five years of pensionable service. Section 9(1)(b) provides for a lesser payment to office bearers with less than five years pensionable service. Under section 8(a), ordinary members of Parliament could only receive pension payments if they had served seven and a half years of pensionable service, but instead received a gratuity if they had served for less than five years under section 11(2). The result was that benefits accruing to members of less than 5 years were substantially less.

[10] Section 9 of the Closed Pension Fund Act. This was confirmed in an affidavit by Alant, former Adjunct Minister of Finance:

> "[D]ie Geslote Pensioenfonds is mettertyd ten volle befonds. Die betaling van al die pensioene van al die lede van die Geslote Pensioenfonds is dus ten volle verseker."

[11] The Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996 provides for pensions of not more than R30 000 per annum for individuals aged between 45 and 64 years at the time of enactment. Within this age band, individuals with 7 years of qualifying service would receive a pension of R14 400 per annum, whilst individuals with 15 years service would receive a pension of R24 000 per annum.

[8] As the new democratic Parliament of April 1994 convened, it and its members had no pension arrangements. A new pension fund for the new Parliament had to be brought into being. This was in fact a constitutional obligation under section 190A of the interim Constitution.[12] Clearly, this constitutional obligation could not be achieved at the outset. The setting up of a new pension fund was a venture that would take time. As an interim measure, all concerned agreed that from 27 April 1994, the National Assembly and each of its members would contribute 12,5% and 7,5% of a member's pensionable annual income respectively towards the pension fund to be formed.[13] Pending the creation of the envisaged pension fund, employer and member contributions were paid to the Public Investment Commission, subject to the accrued aggregate capital and interest thereon being refundable to the pension fund to be formed.

[9] For reasons not immediately apparent, four years elapsed before Parliament turned its attention to its own new pension scheme. In June 1998, Parliament supported recommendations on the formation of the new pension fund, with four political parties in Parliament dissenting.[14] On 3 August 1998 a parliamentary committee[15] tabled before the National Assembly a further report on the nature, benefits and management of the new pension fund.[16] The report included a proposal that pension contributions by employers for the period 27 April 1994 to 30 April 1999 should be paid retrospectively on a differentiated basis to new and continuing political office-bearers. On 13 August 1998, the report was debated and adopted by the National Assembly with only one party dissenting.[17] Towards the end of 1998, only a few months before the end of the first term of the new Parliament, the Fund was established but took effect retrospectively from 27 April 1994. The rules of the new fund were finalised and registered in terms of section 4(4) of the Pension Funds Act.[18] Predictably, the main object of the Fund was to provide for retirement, death and other benefits for serving and retired parliamentarians.[19]

[13] These employer and employee contributions were based on the Melamet Report, a report delivered by the Interim Committee of Inquiry into Conditions of Remuneration of Elected Members of the National and Provincial Governments. This Committee was appointed in 1994 by the State President to make recommendations on remunerations, pending the establishment of a commission under section 207 of the interim Constitution. The Committee was chaired by Justice Melamet. The Report, delivered on 30 April 1994, recommended that members contribute 7,5% of their pensionable salary, and that government contribute 12,5% of the pensionable salary towards retirement benefits (at 33-5).

[14] The National Party, the Democratic Party, the Freedom Front and the Pan-Africanist Congress of Azania.

The rules of the Fund

[10] The rules of the Fund create three categories of members. Rule 2 spells out the categories:

> "'Category A Member' shall mean a Member who has been notified to the Trustees by the Employer as a Member who has not reached age 49 years and who is not a member of the Closed Pension Fund.

[19] Rule 1.3 of the Fund.

> 'Category B Member' shall mean a Member who has been notified to the Trustees by the Employer as a Member who has reached age 49 years and who is not a member of the Closed Pension Fund.
> 'Category C Member' shall mean a Member who is a member of the Closed Pension Fund."

The rules require that each member must make a contribution to the Fund towards retirement benefits at a monthly and uniform rate of one-twelfth of 7,5% of his or her annual pensionable salary. However, the contributions payable by the various employers[20] within the Fund are calculated according to a differentiated scale. Rule 4.2.1 prescribes the variance in this manner:

> "The Employer shall make contributions towards the retirement benefit of each Member in its Service at the rate of:
> (a) in the case of a Category A Member, one twelfth of 17 per cent of his Pensionable Salary;
> (b) in the case of a Category B Member
> (i) for the period of 27 April 1994 to 30 April 1999, one twelfth of 20 per cent of his Pensionable Salary;
> . . . .
> (c) in the case of a Category C Member

[20] Rule 2 of the Fund defines "employer" as:

"an Employer admitted to the Fund with the consent of the Minister and shall include: The National Assembly; The National Council of Provinces; The nine Provincial Legislatures; Any department of State where Political Office-Bearers are in Service."

"Political office bearer" is in turn defined as:

> "(a) an Executive Deputy President;
> (b) a Minister or Deputy Minister;
> (c) a member of the National Assembly or National Council of Provinces (Senate);
> (d) the Premier or a member of the Executive Council of a province;
> (e) a member of the Provincial Legislature;
> (f) a diplomatic representative of the Republic who is not a member of the public service; or > (g) any person recognised as a Political Office-Bearer for the purposes of Section 190A of the Interim Constitution."

> (i) for the period of 27 April 1994 to 30 April 1999, one twelfth of 10 per cent of his Pensionable Salary".

From 1 May 1999, the differentiation between the three categories fell away, and the contribution of employers became standardised for all members at a rate of one-twelfth of 17 percent of their annual pensionable salaries.

[11] The nub of the respondent's unfair discrimination complaint is that over the designated five years the differentiated employer contributions scheme improperly disfavours him and other category C members who are in receipt of pensions from the CPF, in comparison with new parliamentarians who are either below or above 49 years of age and do not receive pension benefits from the CPF.

The High Court

[12] The High Court found that the challenged provisions are not mere "differentiation" but rather "discriminatory in nature" because for five years lower employer contributions were paid for the less favoured class of members of the Fund to which they all belonged and contributed equally, with the result that the less favoured class of members will receive substantially smaller pensions than will members of the favoured classes. It also found the differentiation to be "prima facie unfair" because first, it is arbitrary as no reason is advanced for it and secondly, it is based on intersecting grounds of race and political affiliation — the latter a matter of conscience and belief — all being prohibited grounds listed in section 9(3) of the Constitution.[21]

[13] The High Court reasoned that a person who relies on section 9(2) to justify discriminatory measures bears the "onus" of establishing on a balance of probabilities that the measures have been taken to promote the achievement of equality and that "generally speaking it cannot be an easy onus to discharge". The discrimination, it held, has to be "convincingly justified" to discharge the presumption of unfairness under section 9(5).

[14] The High Court found that the Minister and the Fund had failed to discharge the "onus" that the impugned measures are justified under section 9(2) because the measures relied upon do not bear a rational connection to the end they purport to achieve. It held that there is no "causal nexus" between means and ends because it has not been shown that in order to benefit members of the favoured categories less must be given to the disfavoured category.

[15] The High Court took the view that even if the measures were assumed to be directed at promoting the achievement of equality they were unlikely to do so because on "various calculations . . . the alleged inequality between categories A and B, on the one hand and category C, on the other, subsisted."[22] It also held that even accepting that the disfavoured members (category C) are now better off than the other categories (A and B) that would not cure the defect in the ameliorative measures. It concluded that the measures were not only "haphazard, random and overhasty" but also "arbitrary". The High Court held the differentiated employer contributions to be unconstitutional and declared them invalid. However, no order was made regulating the consequences of the declaration of invalidity on the Fund and its members.

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[16] The High Court dismissed the assertion by the Minister and the Fund that certain interested parties to the proceedings had not been joined and condoned the delay on the part of the claimant in instituting the claim. Since the claimant had succeeded on other grounds, the High Court found it unnecessary to decide the merits of the claim that the Fund had been improperly established in breach of the President's constitutional obligations under section 190A of the interim Constitution.

Equality submissions

[17] Before us, the gravamen of the applicants' complaint is that the High Court misconceived the true nature of the equality protection recognised by our Constitution, by resorting to a formal rather than a substantive notion of equality. They argued that the purpose of the differentiated scheme of employer benefits was to advance equality by identifying three separate indicators of need for increased pension benefits over a finite period. In that way the scheme rationally pursues a legitimate governmental purpose of distributing pensions on an equitable basis.

[18] The applicants urged us to have regard to the actual impact of the differentiated employer contribution scheme. Its effect on the respondent and members of his class is that they remain considerably privileged and better off in respect of their pension benefits than members of the favoured categories A and B. Moreover, it was submitted, the scheme is neither unfair nor invasive of the dignity of anyone. The complaint of the respondent and his class is not one that says the scheme invades their dignity but rather one propelled by financial benefit out of public funds and a desire to maintain historical privilege.

[19] In this Court, the argument advanced by the respondent had three components. He argued that ameliorative measures under section 9(2) of the Constitution, if based on any of the anti-discrimination grounds listed in section 9(3), constitute, in his words, "positive discrimination" and must be presumed unfair. The party implementing the measures must show them to be fair. The differentiation here, he argues, is informed by race because the scheme has a disproportionate impact on 143 white, coloured and Indian members of Parliament as against two black members.[23] He urged us to take the view that the applicants have failed to rebut the resultant presumption of unfairness of the discriminatory measures.

[20] A further contention of the respondent is that the scheme is unfair because the state does not allege that in order to benefit the favoured group it was essential that the disfavoured group should receive lower employee benefits. In his view, limited resources do not necessitate the scheme, as the state cannot credibly claim that it cannot afford to pay pension contributions for all members at the same level. After all from 1999 it did. In emphasising the point that the state is not out of pocket, the respondent draws attention to an announcement by the Minister on 12 November 2003, a date after the judgment of the High Court, that the national treasury plans to put aside as a budget item R400 million for additional service benefits for members of Parliament and of provincial legislatures.

[21] The respondent concedes the correctness of the comparative actuarial calculations, presented by the Minister and the Fund, which indicate that members of Parliament who are also members of the CPF are better off than those who are not despite the increased employer contribution. It is contended, however, that this is not so in all cases. The respondent points to 15 category C members who are saddled with membership of the CPF without the benefit of generous pensions.[24] He regards these cases as jammergevalle.[25] He argues that in testing the constitutional invalidity of the challenged scheme, an objective approach would require that the position of all members affected by the challenged measure should be considered. As a result, he [24] In their papers, the state and the Fund provide pension details of the disfavoured, category C members. They contend that only 13 to 17 members may be properly regarded as in receipt of meagre pension benefits from the CPF and for that reason are loosely referred to as jammergevalle.

[25] This phrase loosely translated means "the unfortunate ones".

submitted, the adverse impact of the scheme on the jammergevalle is sufficient to render the employer contributions scheme as a whole unfairly discriminatory.

Equality and unfair discrimination

[22] The achievement of equality goes to the bedrock of our constitutional architecture.[26] The Constitution commands us to strive for a society built on the democratic values of human dignity, the achievement of equality, the advancement of human rights and freedom.[27] Thus the achievement of equality is not only a guaranteed and justiciable right in our Bill of Rights but also a core and foundational value; a standard which must inform all law and against which all law must be tested for constitutional consonance.[28]

[23] For good reason, the achievement of equality preoccupies our constitutional thinking. When our Constitution took root a decade ago our society was deeply divided, vastly unequal and uncaring of human worth. Many of these stark social and

The importance of equality (although specifically in relation to gender) has also been recognised in the regional and international sphere; see Heyns (ed) Human Rights Law in Africa Vol 1 (Martinus Nijhoff Publishers, Boston 2004) at 845-50.

[27] Sections 1(a) and 7(1) of the Constitution.

[28] Some academic writers draw attention to the place of the right to equality as a constitutional value, which goes beyond the individual or personal affront of the claimant. See Albertyn and Goldblatt "Facing the challenge of transformation: difficulties in the development of an indigenous jurisprudence of equality" (1998) 14 SAJHR 248 at 272-3. See also Gutto Equality and Non-Discrimination in South Africa: The Political Economy of Law and Law Making (New Africa Books, Cape Town 2001) at 128, who discusses equality as a core or foundational value.

economic disparities will persist for long to come. In effect the commitment of the Preamble is to restore and protect the equal worth of everyone; to heal the divisions of the past and to establish a caring and socially just society. In explicit terms, the Constitution commits our society to "improve the quality of life of all citizens and free the potential of each person".[29]

[24] Our supreme law says more about equality than do comparable constitutions. Like other constitutions, it confers the right to equal protection and benefit of the law and the right to non-discrimination. But it also imposes a positive duty on all organs of state to protect and promote the achievement of equality[30] — a duty which binds the judiciary too.[31]

[25] Of course, democratic values and fundamental human rights espoused by our Constitution are foundational. But just as crucial is the commitment to strive for a society based on social justice.[32] In this way, our Constitution heralds not only equal protection of the law and non-discrimination but also the start of a credible and abiding process of reparation for past exclusion, dispossession, and indignity within the discipline of our constitutional framework.

[26] The jurisprudence of this Court makes plain that the proper reach of the equality right must be determined by reference to our history and the underlying values of the Constitution.[33] As we have seen a major constitutional object is the creation of a non-racial and non-sexist egalitarian society underpinned by human dignity, the rule of law, a democratic ethos and human rights.[34] From there emerges a conception of equality that goes beyond mere formal equality and mere non-discrimination which requires identical treatment, whatever the starting point or impact.[35] Of this Ngcobo J, concurring with a unanimous Court, in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v The Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Others[36] observed that:

> "In this fundamental way, our Constitution differs from other constitutions which assume that all are equal and in so doing simply entrench existing inequalities. Our Constitution recognises that decades of systematic racial discrimination entrenched by the apartheid legal order cannot be eliminated without positive action being taken to achieve that result. We are required to do more than that. The effects of discrimination may continue indefinitely unless there is a commitment to end it."[37]

[27] This substantive notion of equality recognises that besides uneven race, class and gender attributes of our society, there are other levels and forms of social differentiation and systematic under-privilege, which still persist. The Constitution enjoins us to dismantle them and to prevent the creation of new patterns of disadvantage.[38] It is therefore incumbent on courts to scrutinise in each equality claim the situation of the complainants in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or adds to group disadvantage in real life context,[39] in order to determine its fairness or otherwise in the light of the values of our Constitution. In the assessment of fairness or otherwise a flexible but "situation-sensitive"[40] approach is indispensable because of shifting patterns of hurtful discrimination and stereotypical response in our evolving democratic society. The unfair discrimination enquiry requires several stages. These are set out by this Court in Harksen v Lane NO and Others.[41]

Restitutionary measures

[28] A comprehensive understanding of the Constitution's conception of equality requires a harmonious reading of the provisions of section 9. Section 9(1) proclaims that everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law. On the other hand, section 9(3) proscribes unfair discrimination by the state against anyone on any ground including those specified. Section 9(5) renders discrimination on one or more of the listed grounds unfair unless its fairness is established. However, section 9(2) provides for the achievement of full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms and authorises legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons or categories of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. Restitutionary measures, sometimes referred to as "affirmative action", may be taken to promote the achievement of equality. The measures must be "designed" to protect or advance persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination in order to advance the achievement of equality.

[29] Section 9(1) provides: "Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law." Of course, the phrase "equal protection of the laws" also appears in the 14th Amendment of the US Constitution. The American jurisprudence has, generally speaking, rendered a particularly limited and formal account of the reach of the equal protection right.[42] The US anti-discrimination approach regards affirmative action measures as a suspect category which must pass strict judicial scrutiny. The test requires that it be demonstrated that differentiation on the grounds of race is a necessary means to the promotion of a compelling or overriding state interest. A rational relationship between the differentiation and a state interest would be inadequate.[43] Our equality jurisprudence differs substantively from the US approach to equality. Our respective histories, social context and constitutional design differ markedly. Even so, the terminology of "affirmative action" has found its way into general use and into a number of our statutes directed at prohibiting unfair discrimination and promoting equality, such as the Employment Equity Act 55 of 1998 and the Promotion of Equality and the Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000. But in our context, this terminology may create more conceptual and other difficulties than it resolves. We must therefore exercise great caution not to import, through this route, inapt foreign equality jurisprudence which may inflict on our nascent equality jurisprudence American notions of "suspect categories of state action" and of "strict scrutiny". The Afrikaans equivalent "regstellende aksie" is perhaps juridically more consonant with the remedial or restitutionary component of our equality jurisprudence.

[42] See, for example, Washington v Davis 426 US 229 (1976) and General Electric Co v Gilbert 429 US 125 (1976). Section 15(1) of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms also protects equality "before and under the law" and warrants "equal protection and equal benefit of the law". For its authoritative interpretation see, for example, R v Turpin [1989] 1 SCR 1296.

[43] Compare McLaughlin v Florida 379 US 184 (1964) at 191. Also see a critical discussion of the relevant American precedent in Van Wyk et al Rights and Constitutionalism: The New South African Legal Order (Juta and Co, Cape Town 1994) at 198-9.

[30] Thus, our constitutional understanding of equality includes what Ackermann J in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Another[44] calls "remedial or restitutionary equality".[45] Such measures are not in themselves a deviation from, or invasive of, the right to equality guaranteed by the Constitution. They are not "reverse discrimination" or "positive discrimination"[46] as argued by the claimant in this case. They are integral to the reach of our equality protection. In other words, the provisions of section 9(1) and section 9(2) are complementary; both contribute to the constitutional goal of achieving equality to ensure "full and equal enjoyment of all rights".[47] A disjunctive or oppositional reading of the two subsections would frustrate the foundational equality objective of the Constitution and its broader social justice imperatives.

[31] Equality before the law protection in section 9(1) and measures to promote equality in section 9(2) are both necessary and mutually reinforcing but may sometimes serve distinguishable purposes, which I need not discuss now. However, what is clear is that our Constitution and in particular section 9 thereof, read as a whole, embraces for good reason a substantive conception of equality inclusive of measures to redress existing inequality. Absent a positive commitment progressively to eradicate socially constructed barriers to equality and to root out systematic or institutionalised under-privilege, the constitutional promise of equality before the law and its equal protection and benefit must, in the context of our country, ring hollow.

[32] The High Court favoured the approach that in effect, the measures under attack were not mere differentiation but discriminatory and that they must be convincingly justified because they are premised on grounds listed in section 9(3) and therefore attract an onus "that cannot be easy to discharge". In Public Servants Association of

[47] Section 9(2). See also National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality above n 40 at para 62: "Substantive equality is envisaged when section 9(2) unequivocally asserts that equality includes 'the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms'."

South Africa and Others v Minister of Justice and Others,[48] Swart J, in dealing with the "affirmative action" claim of the government in that case, adopted an equivalent route in the interpretation and application of section 8(3)(a) of the interim Constitution. I am unable to agree with that approach. Legislative and other measures that properly fall within the requirements of section 9(2) are not presumptively unfair. Remedial measures are not a derogation from, but a substantive and composite part of, the equality protection envisaged by the provisions of section 9 and of the Constitution as a whole. Their primary object is to promote the achievement of equality. To that end, differentiation aimed at protecting or advancing persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination is warranted provided the measures are shown to conform to the internal test set by section 9(2).

Onus of proof and section 9(2)

[33] It seems to me plain that if restitutionary measures, even based on any of the grounds of discrimination listed in section 9(3), pass muster under section 9(2), they cannot be presumed to be unfairly discriminatory.[49] To hold otherwise would mean that the scheme of section 9 is internally inconsistent or that the provisions of section 9(2) are a mere interpretative aid or even surplusage.[50] I cannot accept that our

[49] For writers who seem to favour the view that once measures have been shown to qualify as designed to protect and advance groups previously disadvantaged they are not open to constitutional attack on the grounds of fairness or disproportionality, see Du Plessis and Corder above n 46; Kentridge above n 46; Cachalia above n 46; Rycroft above n 46; De Waal et al above n 46; Van Wyk above n 43 at 207-9. For the opposite view, see Pretorius above n 46.

[50] Van Reenen above n 46, who argues that in the light of the substantive notion of the equality which may be gathered from all the provisions of our Constitution, the provisions of section 9(2) are a redundant interpretative aid since restitutionary measures are implicit in the notion of equality contemplated in section 9(1).

Constitution at once authorises measures aimed at redress of past inequality and disadvantage but also labels them as presumptively unfair. Such an approach, at the outset, tags section 9(2) measures as a suspect category that may be permissible only if shown not to discriminate unfairly. Secondly, such presumptive unfairness would unduly require the judiciary to second guess the legislature and the executive concerning the appropriate measures to overcome the effect of unfair discrimination.

[34] Following the reasoning in Public Servants Association,[51] the High Court made much of the presumption of unfairness against the differentiated pension scheme and the burdensome onus it attracts. I have concluded that legislative and other measures, which properly fall within the provision of section 9(2), do not attract any such burden.

[35] It follows that the High Court is clearly mistaken in approaching this matter on the limited basis that it need not decide whether and the extent to which members of Parliament who were members of the CPF were better off than those who were not,[52] since the applicants had omitted to make certain averments, which the court regarded as essential to discharge the section 9(5) onus.

[36] The pivotal enquiry in this matter is not whether the Minister and the Fund discharged the presumption of unfairness under section 9(5), but whether the measure in issue passes muster under section 9(2). If a measure properly falls within the ambit of section 9(2) it does not constitute unfair discrimination. However, if the measure does not fall within section 9(2), and it constitutes discrimination on a prohibited ground, it will be necessary to resort to the Harksen test in order to ascertain whether the measures offend the anti-discrimination prohibition in section 9(3).

[37] When a measure is challenged as violating the equality provision, its defender may meet the claim by showing that the measure is contemplated by section 9(2) in that it promotes the achievement of equality and is designed to protect and advance persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. It seems to me that to determine whether a measure falls within section 9(2) the enquiry is threefold. The first yardstick relates to whether the measure targets persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination; the second is whether the measure is designed to protect or advance such persons or categories of persons; and the third requirement is whether the measure promotes the achievement of equality.

[38] The first question is whether the programme of redress is designed to protect and advance a disadvantaged class. The measures of redress chosen must favour a group or category designated in section 9(2). The beneficiaries must be shown to be disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. In the present matter, the Minister and the Fund submitted that the differentiated contribution scheme was set up to promote the attainment of equality between members of the CPF and new members who were in the past excluded on account of race and or political affiliation. This objective they would advance by identifying three separate indicators of need for increased pensions for new parliamentarians. On the facts, however, it is clear that not all new parliamentarians of 1994 belong to the class of persons prejudiced by past disadvantage and unfair exclusion. An overwhelming majority of the new members of Parliament were excluded from parliamentary participation by past apartheid laws on account of race, political affiliation or belief. [53]

[39] The starting point of equality analysis is almost always a comparison between affected classes. However, often it is difficult, impractical or undesirable to devise a legislative scheme with "pure" differentiation demarcating precisely the affected classes. Within each class, favoured or otherwise, there may indeed be exceptional or "hard cases" or windfall beneficiaries. That however is not sufficient to undermine the legal efficacy of the scheme. The distinction must be measured against the majority and not the exceptional and difficult minority of people to which it applies. In this regard I am in respectful agreement, with the following observation of Gonthier J, in Thibaudeau v Canada: [54]

[53] The uncontested evidence of the Chief Director of the Directorate of Pensions Administration of the Department of Finance and Deputy Chairperson of the Fund, Mr Maritz, is that:

> "The overwhelming majority of new political office bearers had been excluded from access to political office under the tri-cameral regime (and thereby from the generous benefits of the Closed Pension Fund) by virtue of either their race or their political affiliation or both their race and their political affiliation."

[54] 29 CRR (2d) 1 (SCC). See also Miron v Trudel 29 CRR (2d) 189 (SCC).

> "The fact that it may create a disadvantage in certain exceptional cases while benefiting a legitimate group as a whole does not justify the conclusion that it is prejudicial."[55]

[40] In the context of a section 9(2) measure, the legal efficacy of the remedial scheme should be judged by whether an overwhelming majority of members of the favoured class are persons designated as disadvantaged by unfair exclusion. It is clear that the existence of exceptional cases or of the tiny minority of members of Parliament who were not unfairly discriminated against under the apartheid regime, but who benefited from the differential pension contribution scheme, does not affect the validity of the remedial measures concerned.

[41] The second question is whether the measure is "designed to protect or advance" those disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. In essence, the remedial measures are directed at an envisaged future outcome. The future is hard to predict. However, they must be reasonably capable of attaining the desired outcome. If the remedial measures are arbitrary, capricious or display naked preference they could hardly be said to be designed to achieve the constitutionally authorised end.[56] Moreover, if it is clear that they are not reasonably likely to achieve the end of advancing or benefiting the interests of those who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, they would not constitute measures contemplated by section 9(2).

Also compare the remarks of Van der Westhuizen J in Stoman v Minister of Safety and Security and Others 2002 (3) SA 468 (T) at 480B-D.

[42] In Public Servants Association,[57] Swart J, in interpreting section 8(3)(a) of the interim Constitution, held that:

> "The measures must be designed to achieve something. This denotes . . . a causal connection between the designed measures and the objectives."[58]

In the present matter Thring J followed this approach and held that no such causal nexus is present because the sponsor of the differentiated employer contribution scheme does not say that less had to be paid for the disfavoured category in order to give more to the favoured group. I cannot support this approach. Section 9(2) of the Constitution does not postulate a standard of necessity between the legislative choice and the governmental objective. The text requires only that the means should be designed to protect or advance. It is sufficient if the measure carries a reasonable likelihood of meeting the end. To require a sponsor of a remedial measure to establish a precise prediction of a future outcome is to set a standard not required by section 9(2). Such a test would render the remedial measure stillborn, and defeat the objective of section 9(2).

[43] It is untenable to require, as Thring J did, that a sponsor of remedial measures must show a necessity to disfavour one class in order to uplift another. The provisions of section 9(2) do not prescribe such a necessity test because remedial measures must be constructed to protect or advance a disadvantaged group. They are not predicated on a necessity or purpose to prejudice or penalise others, and so require supporters of the measure to establish that there is no less onerous way in which the remedial objective may be achieved. The prejudice that may arise is incidental to but certainly not the target of remedial legislative choice. On the facts of this case, the members of the disfavoured class, barring a few, are beneficiaries of a generous publicly funded pension scheme which pre-dates the differential measure. The favoured categories are, in the main, not. The disfavoured category was and, as the High Court observed, remains better situated than its new parliamentary counterparts as far as state-funded pension benefits go.

[44] The third and last requirement is that the measure "promotes the achievement of equality". Determining whether a measure will in the long run promote the achievement of equality requires an appreciation of the effect of the measure in the context of our broader society. It must be accepted that the achievement of this goal may often come at a price for those who were previously advantaged. Action needs to be taken to advance the position of those who have suffered unfair discrimination in the past. As Ngcobo J observed in Bato Star:

> "The measures that bring about transformation will inevitably affect some members of the society adversely, particularly those coming from the previously advantaged communities."[59]

However, it is also clear that the long-term goal of our society is a non-racial, non-sexist society in which each person will be recognised and treated as a human being of equal worth and dignity. Central to this vision is the recognition that ours is a diverse society, comprised of people of different races, different language groups, different religions and both sexes. This diversity, and our equality as citizens within it, is something our Constitution celebrates and protects. In assessing therefore whether a measure will in the long-term promote equality, we must bear in mind this constitutional vision. In particular, a measure should not constitute an abuse of power or impose such substantial and undue harm on those excluded from its benefits that our long-term constitutional goal would be threatened.

Discussion

[45] At the threshold, the challenged pension contribution scheme differentiates among its members. The differentiation is based on several indicators. However, the discontent of the respondent is confined to the distinction made between state pension contributions in respect of pre- and post-1994 parliamentarians. In my view, we are obliged to look at the scheme as a whole. We must bear in mind its history of transition from the old to the new 1994 Parliament; the duration, nature and purpose of the scheme; the position of the complainant and the impact of the disfavour on the respondent and his class.

[46] The scheme has a finite lifespan of five years. It is a transitional, limited and temporary tool to allocate public resources. Its effect is retrospective. Nothing significant turns on that. The scheme was set up late in the life of the first democratic Parliament. Properly so, the pension benefits of all concerned were best protected by a retrospective date of commencement. Otherwise all members would have found themselves without pension benefits, although they had served Parliament for nearly four and a half years since April 1994.

[47] The scheme creates several classes of members in regard to employer pension contributions. The first class (category A) focuses on parliamentarians younger than 49 years of age, who are not members of the CPF. They receive employer contributions of 17% of their annual pensionable salary. Their colleagues older than 49 years (category B) who are not members of the CPF get a higher contribution of 20%. The third class (category C) receives pension benefits from the CPF and is allocated employer contributions of 10%. Lastly, the class of those over 49 years (category B) who left office in 1999 continue to receive a 5% employer contribution for five years after they left office. Those of the same class who remained in office receive no comparable benefit.

[48] It is clear to me that the differentiated scale of employer contributions was one decided and applied to ameliorate past disadvantage related to the pension benefits need of new political office-bearers, premised on three indicators. First, members who did not have access to the generous benefits of the CPF, as a class, had a greater need for pension benefits than the class of members who were already in receipt of these benefits. The inequality of pensions between the overwhelming majority of new parliamentarians and the vast majority old parliamentarians arises from past unjustified legislative and other exclusions of the former. That, in a large measure, explains the line drawn between new and old parliamentarians. Although the class of the new parliamentarians of 1994 is drawn predominantly from disadvantaged backgrounds, it is racially and gender diverse and drawn from different political parties.

[49] Within the class of new parliamentarians a sharper indicator of need is utilised. Members over the age of 49 years (category B) being, as a class, closer to retirement, had a greater need for increased pension benefits than members under that age (category A). The older class was accordingly given 20% employer contributions while the younger class received 17% contributions.

[50] Thirdly, within the class of category B, members who left office in 1999, as a class, had a greater need for increased pension benefits than those who remained in office because the latter would continue to accumulate benefits under the Fund. The class that left office in 1999 accordingly continued to receive a 5% employer contribution for five years after they left office. The class that remained in office received no comparable benefit because the latter would continue to accumulate benefits under the Fund.

[51] Within each class of members of the Fund, individual variations are to be expected. Conceivably some new members of Parliament who do not receive pensions from the CPF may have accumulated pension benefits before joining Parliament. Conversely, some old parliamentarians may not receive pensions as generous as most members of the CPF. Comparable individual variations may be found amongst younger members who leave office early or older members who are elected to office several times. In my view, none of these possible exceptions to the three membership categories diminishes the efficacy of the indicators as general guides to the payment of the relative increased pension benefits.

[52] I am satisfied that the evidence demonstrates a clear connection between the membership differentiation the scheme makes and the relative need of each class for increased pension benefits. The scheme was designed to distribute pension benefits on an equitable basis with the purpose of diminishing the inequality between privileged and disadvantaged parliamentarians. In that sense the scheme promotes the achievement of equality. It reflects a clear and rational consideration of the need of the members of the Fund and serves the purpose of advancing persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

[53] The high watermark of the respondent's complaint is that the impact of this differentiation on him and others in his position is that he will earn from the Fund less pension than otherwise. That is so.[60] The argument the respondent did not advance is that, as a class, new parliamentarians who are members of the Fund earn an average annual pension higher than that earned by him and his class of parliamentarians who are also members of the CPF. He cannot credibly advance that assertion. The [60] The respondent points out that an "ordinary member" of Parliament with an annual pensionable salary of R211 385 would be entitled to R335 000 at June 1999 if he or she was a category A member, R425 000 if he or she was a category B member who left office in 1999, and R370 000 if he or she remained in office. By contrast, a category C member would earn only R240 000 by that time.

actuarial evidence tendered by the Minister and the Fund[61] demonstrates that the applicant and his class remain a privileged class of public pension beneficiaries notwithstanding the challenged remedial measures. Their pensions are indeed generous and several times more generous than they would, on their pensionable annual salaries, have been entitled to under comparable public sector pension funds. Moreover, they are considerably more generous than pensions payable out of the Special Pension Fund to people who had undergone sacrifices in order to bring about the new democratic order.[62] [54] The respondent does not claim that he and his class of parliamentarians are in any sense vulnerable or marginalized or that in the past they were unfairly excluded or discriminated against. Nor do I think that he and his class were. He does not complain that the scheme is invasive of his dignity or of any of the members of the CPF. There is no evidence to suggest any indignity. His claim appears to be propelled by a desire to earn more in circumstances where his pensions benefit is well ahead of that of his newer colleagues in parliament, despite the remedial measures challenged.

Jammergevalle

[61] This is according to the uncontested evidence of the actuary, Mr Potgieter and Mr Maritz.

[62] Based on actuarial figures in the High Court, the CPF benefits are, in general, just under 3 times more generous than those paid to category B members, 3,81 times more generous than pension funds paid out in the private sector, and 4 to 5 times more generous than pensions provided under the Special Pensions Act. The average amount paid out to CPF members was R104 596, 68. For amounts payable under the Special Pension Fund see above n 11.

[55] Jammergevalle is an appellation that both counsel used to describe the class of some 15 members[63] of the Fund who were also members of the CPF, but did not receive the generous payments that accrued to the overwhelming majority of parliamentarians who are members of the CPF. Their terminal benefits were calculated in accordance with a formula under section 11 of the Members of Parliament and Political Office-Bearers Pension Scheme Act.[64] Ordinary members of the old Parliament who had rendered less than seven and a half years service at April 1994 were entitled to no more than a gratuity. Other office-bearers with less than five years of service at April 1994 also fall into the category. It is thus clear that within category C not all members receive generous benefits from the CPF. Their relatively limited terms of office before the advent of the new Parliament earned them only a lump gratuity payment in the CPF. Nonetheless, under the differentiated scheme of the Fund, they fall within the disfavoured category C membership.

[56] The question is whether the adverse impact of the employer contribution scheme on jammergevalle is such as to render it unfairly discriminatory. One must, however, keep in mind that they are a notional sub-class comprising approximately 10% of the total class of 146 category C members of the Fund, even on their argument. In many respects they do not, in terms of state funded pension benefits, share the financial attributes of 90% of the respondent and class he seeks to represent. Put differently, jammergevalle are unrepresentative of the class complaining of unfair

[63] This is according to the respondent. The Minister and the Fund claim that there may be as few as 13 members who may be said to fall in that class. Nothing important turns on this marginal difference.

discrimination and are therefore not an appropriate comparator. The comparison to be made must be with the overwhelming majority of the class asserting the equality claim. I am satisfied that the circumstances of this sub-class of category C members do not invalidate the legal efficacy of the scheme of the Fund.

Conclusion

[57] I have come to the conclusion that it is in the interests of justice to grant this application for leave to appeal from the decision of the High Court. The order of the High Court declaring rule 4.2.1 of the Fund unconstitutional and invalid cannot be supported. The appeal has merit and must be upheld.

Section 190A of the interim Constitution

[58] In his fourth set of affidavits before the High Court, the respondent raised a new cause of action that the Fund as a whole is invalid as it was not properly established under section 190A or its employer contributions are not set at a rate determined by the President.

[59] The High Court declined to decide this cause of action because it had disposed of the matter on the basis of unfair discrimination. In its further judgment on the application for leave to appeal and for a certificate in terms of the old Rule 18 of this Court,[65] the High Court took the view that the section 190A contention did not form part of its reasons for judgment and thus cannot be the subject of any appeal. I respectfully agree that "an argument in support of an appeal on this ground would be virtually impossible to formulate in logic." However, in this Court the respondent persisted in this argument.

[60] The crux of the respondent's contention is that the Fund has no legal effect because it was not established in terms of section 190A or, if it was, the levels of employer contributions to the Fund were set by cabinet resolution and not by the President as required by section 190A(5). In response, the Minister and the Fund disavowed any reliance on section 190A for the establishment of the Fund. They argue that mere reference to section 190A in the affidavit of one of their deponents[66] does not convey that the Fund was created under that constitutional provision.

[61] It appears to me plain that the Fund could not be established under the provisions of section 190A. The Fund came into force on 23 September 1998.[67] Section 190A was repealed on 4 February 1997, the day the final Constitution took effect.[68] Accordingly, the question whether the level of employer contributions of the impugned rules of the Fund was set by the cabinet rather than the President in accordance with the requirements of section 190A(5) does not arise. The legal power to set up a pension fund could not possibly arise from a repealed and therefore lifeless

[66] In a supporting affidavit, Maritz, in giving the history to the Fund stated that "the creation of a new pension fund for political office bearers . . . was, in fact, a constitutional obligation imposed by section 190A of the interim Constitution."

[67] The Fund was adopted at a Cabinet meeting on this day.

[68] Schedule 7 to the Constitution specifically repeals the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Second Amendment Act 3 of 1994, which had introduced section 190A into the interim Constitution.

constitutional provision, irrespective of the mistaken views or preferences of those concerned. The impugned pension scheme could not be set up pursuant to the repealed provisions of section 190A of the interim Constitution.

Section 219 of the Constitution and section 8 of the Remuneration Act

[62] Before us the respondent advanced a new reason why the Fund as a whole should be invalidated. He argues that levels of challenged employer contributions were determined by the cabinet and not in compliance with section 219[69] of the Constitution and section 8[70] of the Remuneration of Public Office-Bearers Act (the Remuneration Act).[71]

[70] Section 8 provides:

> "Pension benefits
> (1) There shall be paid out of and as a charge against the pension fund of which an office bearer is a member, such pension and other benefits as may be determined in terms of the law or rules governing such pension fund.
> (2) The amount of the contribution to be made to the pension fund by the national government, of which a Deputy President, a Minister, a Deputy Minister, a member of the National Assembly or a permanent delegate is a member, shall be determined by the Minister of Finance after taking into consideration the recommendations of the Commission, and such amount shall annually be paid from monies appropriated by Parliament for that purpose.
> (3)(a) The upper limit of the contribution to be made to the pension fund of which a Premier is a member, shall be determined by the President by proclamation in the Gazette after taking into consideration the recommendations of the Commission.
> (b) The provincial legislature concerned shall by resolution, if the provincial legislature is then sitting, or if it is in recess, within 30 days of its next ensuing sitting, determine the amount of the contribution and such amount shall annually be paid from monies appropriated for that purpose by the provincial legislature concerned.
> (4)(a) The upper limit of the contribution to be made to the pension fund of which a member of the Executive Council or a member of a provincial legislature is a member, shall be determined by the President by proclamation in the Gazette after taking into consideration the recommendations of the Commission.
> (b) The Minister of Finance shall determine the amount of the contribution by notice in the Gazette and such amount shall annually form a charge against the Provincial Revenue Fund.
> (5) (a) The upper limit of the contribution to be made to the pension fund of which a member of a Municipal Council is a member, shall be determined by the Minister after taking into consideration the recommendations of the Commission.
> (b) The Municipal Council, after consultation with the pension fund concerned, shall determine the amount of the contribution and such amount shall annually form a charge against and be paid from the budget of the municipality concerned.

[63] It is so that the Constitution does not contain a direct equivalent of section 190A. Unlike section 190A of the interim Constitution, section 219 of the Constitution enjoins Parliament to create a legislative framework for determining salaries, allowances and benefits of members of the National Assembly and other persons holding public office. Such legislation is the Remuneration Act. Section 8(2) of the Remuneration Act requires the Minister of Finance to determine the amount of the contributions to be made to the pension fund by the national government, after taking into consideration the recommendations of the Independent Commission for the Remuneration of Public Office-Bearers (Remuneration Commission), established in terms of the Independent Commission for the Remuneration of Public Office-Bearers Act (Commission Act),[72] which legislation came into operation on 29 June 1998.

[64] The respondent raised the contention on section 219 for the first time before us on appeal. None of the facts relevant to the issue are traversed in the affidavits lodged in the High Court. Neither the Minister nor the Fund had a proper opportunity to deal with the matter in written argument or during the hearing before us. The matter is not an issue in the appeal. There is no application for direct access. The matter is not properly before us and must be dismissed without deciding its merits.

(6) The provisions of this section shall, subject to any other Act of Parliament to the contrary, not apply to a traditional leader, a member of a provincial House of Traditional Leaders and a member of the National House of Traditional Leaders."

Unreasonable delay and non-joinder

[65] The applicants urged us to uphold the appeal on the ground that the High Court ought to have disallowed the respondent's claim because there was unreasonable delay in bringing it before court. They also raised issues of non-joinder, contending that provincial legislatures and the President should have been joined as parties. In the light of the decision I have come to on the merits of the case, it is unnecessary to decide these issues.

Costs

[66] The applicants sought an order for costs against the respondent. The respondent has raised issues of broad public concern and constitutional importance. In circumstances such as these, this Court seldom makes a cost order.[73] I am, therefore, not minded to grant an adverse cost order against the respondent.

Order

The following order is made:

(a) The application for leave to appeal against the judgment and order of the High Court made on 12 June 2003 is granted.

(b) The appeal is upheld.

(c) The order of the High Court of 12 June 2003 declaring the provisions of rule 4.2.1 of the Political Office-Bearers Pension Fund to be unconstitutional and invalid including its order as to costs is set aside.

(d) No order as to costs of the present application is made.

Chaskalson CJ, Langa DCJ, Madala J, O'Regan J, Sachs J, Van der Westhuizen J and Yacoob J concur in the judgment of Moseneke J.

MOKGORO J:

Introduction

[67] I have read the judgment prepared by my colleague Moseneke J. I agree with the order that he proposes as well as his findings in relation to section 190A of the interim Constitution and section 219 of the Constitution. I also agree with his conclusion that the impugned measure does not violate section 9 of the Constitution,[1]

[1] Section 9 of the Constitution reads as follows:

> "Equality —(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

but am unable to agree with the route taken to arrive at this conclusion. Whereas Moseneke J concludes that section 9(2) of the Constitution applies to this case, I am of the view that the facts of this case are to be decided in terms of section 9(3) of the Constitution.

[68] The facts of this case have been clearly set out in the main judgment.[2] The High Court upheld the claim of Mr Van Heerden (the respondent) that the differentiation between the amounts of contributions of members of the Political Office-Bearers Fund (POBF) amounted to unfair discrimination on the basis of race and political affiliation. As the main judgment makes clear, the High Court held that the state bears an onus to show that the impugned measures fall under section 9(2) of the Constitution. The High Court held that the applicant (the Minister) had failed to discharge this onus. One of the main reasons for this finding was that the Minister had failed to show that it was necessary to require that the various employers identified under the Fund's rules contribute less to the pensions of category C members in order for category A and B members to receive greater contributions. In other words, the High Court held that there was no causal connection between the benefit to the new members of Parliament and the disadvantage to the old members. Moseneke J has dealt sufficiently with the issue that the High Court's approach to section 9(2) and the nature of the burden to be discharged were incorrect. I agree with the analysis and conclusions of Moseneke J in this regard.

Arguments in this Court

[69] The Minister argues that the High Court adopted an approach to the interpretation of section 9 which is based on the notion of formal equality. In contradistinction to the notion of formal equality it was argued that the Constitution embraces substantive equality which permits remedial measures to be enacted to address past unfair discrimination. According to the Minister, the differentiation that occurs under the rules of the POBF constitutes a positive measure to create equity amongst parliamentarians in respect of the pensions that they will ultimately draw. This measure, it was argued, is of the type envisaged by section 9(2) of the Constitution because it aims to advance persons previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination and in so doing promotes the achievement of equality.

[70] Before this Court, the respondent persists with his argument that the measure unfairly discriminates on the basis of race and political affiliation. The respondent argues that any measure, which is restitutionary in nature but discriminates against persons on one of the listed grounds, attracts the presumption of unfairness in terms of section 9(5). The state must show the measures to be fair in order successfully to resist his equality challenge. The respondent further argues that the state has failed to show that it cannot afford to pay all parliamentarians equally and, as such, has failed to show the necessity of discriminating in the way that the POBF does. As a consequence, so the argument goes, the measure is unfair and unconstitutional.

[71] The role of the right to equality in our new dispensation cannot be overstated. Apartheid was not merely a system that entrenched political power and socio-economic privilege in the hands of a minority nor did it only deprive the majority of the right to self actualisation and to control their own destinies. It targeted them for oppression and suppression. Not only did apartheid degrade its victims, it also systematically dehumanised them, striking at the core of their human dignity. The disparate impact of the system is today still deeply entrenched.

[72] It was with this in mind that the interim Constitution recognised in its preamble the need to create a society "in which there is equality between men and women and people of all races so that all citizens shall be able to enjoy and exercise their fundamental rights and freedoms". The Constitution now makes clear the fundamental importance of equality in our constitutional framework by establishing that one of the fundamental values upon which our society is founded is the "achievement of equality".[3] As this Court held in Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another:

> "Our country has diverse communities with different historical experiences and living conditions. Until recently, very many areas of public and private life were invaded by systematic legal separateness coupled with legally enforced advantage and disadvantage. The impact of structured and vast inequality is still with us despite the

[3] The relevant part of section 1 of the Constitution reads:

> "Republic of South Africa —The Republic of South Africa is one, sovereign, democratic state founded on the following values:

> arrival of the new constitutional order. It is the majority, and not the minority, which has suffered from this legal separateness and disadvantage."[4]

[73] It is no mistake that our Constitution uses the phrase "achievement of equality". The tremendous indignity and political oppression that characterised the years of apartheid was coupled with the systemic entrenchment of economic disadvantage for millions of South Africans. The vast majority of this country's wealth remained then and remains still, as a consequence of the entrenched disadvantage, in the hands of a minority. Sprawling and over-crowded informal townships inhabited by poor and jobless people without property to call their own and without many of the basic amenities necessary for a dignified human existence sit beside most affluent neighbourhoods with people who have access to the best schools, the best jobs and the best opportunities. The use of the phrase "achievement of equality" therefore recognises that the creation of democracy and equal treatment before the law are not enough to foster substantive equality. Unless the disparity that currently exists is consciously and systematically obliterated, it can easily be overlooked and will as a result continue to define our society for a long time to come.

[74] In Brink v Kitshoff NO[5] this Court remarked that

> "[a]s in other national constitutions, section 8 is the product of our own particular history. Perhaps more than any of the other provisions in chap 3, its interpretation must be based on the specific language of section 8, as well as our own constitutional > context. Our history is of particular relevance to the concept of equality. The policy of apartheid, in law and in fact, systematically discriminated against black people in all aspects of social life. Black people were prevented from becoming owners of property or even residing in areas classified as 'white', which constituted nearly 90% of the landmass of South Africa; senior jobs and access to established schools and universities were denied to them; civic amenities, including transport systems, public parks, libraries and many shops were also closed to black people. Instead, separate and inferior facilities were provided. The deep scars of this appalling programme are still visible in our society. It is in the light of that history and the enduring legacy that it bequeathed that the equality clause needs to be interpreted."[6]

Although these remarks refer to section 8 of the interim Constitution they are equally apposite today.

Restitutionary measures

[75] Moseneke J is indeed correct when he points out that the provisions of section 9 must be understood against the backdrop of the circumstances highlighted above and the need to foster substantive equality. Section 9(2) in particular was enacted with the idea that true equality can never be said to exist until the patterns of disparity which were created in the past have been eradicated. The measures it envisages therefore form an integral part of our overall conception of equality. When in 1994 democracy was established in South Africa the right to equality for all South Africans was constitutionally protected. However, section 9(2) acknowledges that our notion of substantive equality requires measures to be enacted to make up for that part of the past which cannot simply be corrected by removing the legal bars to equality of treatment.

[6] Id at para 40.

[76] For this reason, I join Moseneke J in his criticism of the High Court's approach to section 9(2). To require the state to demonstrate that it is necessary to give less to one group in order to advance another would be to undermine the scheme of section 9(2). The reason for the enactment of section 9(2) is to authorise restitutionary measures for the advancement of those previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. Whenever a group is given certain advantages it must follow that it receives more than others in the context of the particular measure which is being enacted. But the measure will not necessarily be enacted with the aim of taking from one group to give to another. The logical consequence of the respondent's submissions is that practically no measure may be enacted of a restitutionary nature because each time the state attempts to do so it will, more often than not, fail to prove the necessity of giving more to one person or group than another. The approach of the High Court presupposes that it will only be permissible to favour a particular group if there are insufficient resources to give equally to everyone. The Minister is correct when he argues that the approach of the High Court is premised on a notion of formal equality which is at odds with the vision of substantive equality in our Constitution. It would be contrary to the spirit of section 9(2) and inimical to its purpose to require the state to show that it has insufficient resources to give advantages equally, every time that it attempts to enact a restitutionary measure which advances those previously disadvantaged.

[77] I further agree with the judgment of Moseneke J in its approach to the interaction between section 9(2) and section 9(3). The whole structure of our equality clause and the important aim of substantive equality would be undermined by an approach which requires the state to show that measures which aim at advancing the substantive notion of equality and fostering a society which no longer resembles that of the South Africa of old are fair. It is an invariable consequence of enacting measures that advance certain groups that other groups will be disadvantaged in that regard, albeit that this would not be the intention of such measures. More often than not, such disadvantage will be on the basis of one of the listed grounds in section 9(3). The logical consequence of the approach advanced by the respondent is that practically all restitutionary measures would attract a presumption of unfairness. This cannot be what section 9(2) envisages. An interpretation of the Constitution which renders certain provisions redundant should be avoided.

[78] I wish to make one further observation about the difference between section 9(2) and section 9(3). Section 9(2) is forward looking and measures enacted in terms of it ought to be assessed from the perspective of the goal intended to be advanced. The measures must promote the achievement of equality by advancing those previously disadvantaged in the manner envisaged. This is not to say that the interests of those not advanced by the measure must necessarily be disregarded. However, the main focus in section 9(2) is on the group advanced and the mechanism used to advance it.

[79] Our equality jurisprudence in terms of section 9(3) is, however, different. When assessing a measure under section 9(3), the focus is on the group or person discriminated against. Here, the impact on the complainant and his or her position in society is of utmost importance. The aim of the challenged measure and whether it advances a legitimate government purpose will of course be important. However, the main focus is on the complainant and the impact of the measure on him or her.

[80] This distinction is in my view important. It would frustrate the goal of section 9(2) if measures enacted in terms of it paid undue attention to those disadvantaged by the measure when that disadvantage is merely an invariable result and not the aim of the measure. The goal of transformation would be impeded if individual complainants who are aggrieved by restitutionary measures could argue that the measures unfairly discriminated against them because of their undue impact on them. As Ngcobo J said in Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Others:[7]

> "There are profound difficulties that will be confronted in giving effect to the constitutional commitment of achieving equality. We must not underestimate them. The measures that bring about transformation will inevitably affect some members of the society adversely, particularly those coming from the previously advantaged communities. It may well be that other considerations may have to yield in favour of achieving the goal we fashioned for ourselves in the Constitution."[8]

It is for this reason that the equality jurisprudence developed by this Court in the context of section 9(3) is unsuited to analysis under section 9(2). The test as established by cases such as Harksen v Lane NO and Others[9] and President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo[10] would focus unduly on the position of the complainant to be appropriate to a section 9(2) analysis.

[81] Because of this distinction it is important that a measure purportedly enacted under section 9(2) fits properly within it. If measures are incorrectly defended under it, insufficient weight will be given to the position of the complainant. Conversely, if the equality jurisprudence under section 9(3) is built into the test for section 9(2), the process of transformation, as envisaged by the Constitution, will be unduly hampered.

The correct approach to section 9(2)

[82] Given my view that section 9(2) measures ought not to be tested against section 9(3), it is clearly necessary to ascertain what requirements a section 9(2) measure must meet. I endorse the three aspects of the review standard identified by Moseneke J in the main judgment, namely that "[t]he first yardstick relates to whether the measure targets persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination; the second is whether the measure is designed to protect or advance such persons or categories of persons; and the third requirement is whether the measure promotes the achievement of equality."[11]

[83] I further support the approach of the main judgment to the question of the purpose of the measure[12] and also the connection between the means employed and the end sought to be achieved.[13] I cannot, however, support the approach taken by Moseneke J to what he describes as the "first yardstick" – that the measure must be aimed at advancing persons or categories of persons previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

[84] In a case such as the present, an applicant will approach the courts and claim that a particular measure unfairly discriminates against him or her. If, as a defence, the state successfully demonstrates that a measure falls within the ambit of section 9(2), the state in my view is relieved of the burden to show that the measure is fair, which it might otherwise have borne. Because a restitutionary measure which discriminates at all will almost certainly discriminate on the basis of one of the listed grounds, if it were not for section 9(2), a restitutionary measure would invariably attract a presumption of unfairness. Section 9(2) therefore relieves the state of having to show that the discrimination in question is fair. It is important that this should be so, for the reasons regarding transformation mentioned above. It would be inimical to the pursuit of substantive equality if the state was required to show that each restitutionary measure that it enacted was fair, as would be required by section 9(3).

[85] Another aspect of section 9(2) is that it allows a person or categories of people to be advanced. This is important because of the nature of the unfair discrimination that was perpetrated by apartheid. The approach of apartheid was to categorise people and attach consequences to those categories. No relevance was attached to the circumstances of individuals. Advantages or disadvantages were metered out according to one's membership of a group. Recognising this, section 9(2) allows for measures to be enacted which target whole categories of persons. Therefore a person or groups of persons are advanced on the basis of membership of a group. The importance of this is that it is unnecessary for the state to show that each individual member of a group that was targeted by past unfair discrimination was in fact individually unfairly discriminated against when enacting a measure under section 9(2). It is sufficient for a person to be a member of a group previously targeted by the apartheid state for unfair discrimination in order to benefit from a provision enacted in terms of section 9(2).

[86] On this understanding of section 9(2), it is clear that various consequences attach to the state when invoking it. The state need not show that any discrimination caused by the measure is fair, or that each individual member of the advanced group actually suffered past disadvantages as long as an individual was part of a group targeted. Because section 9(2) relieves the state of these burdens, it is my view that care should be taken to ensure that measures enacted under it actually do fall within the ambit intended by the section. If the aim of the section is to advance persons or groups previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination, the section should be used for that purpose alone. To do otherwise would be to allow the section to be used to enact measures which should not be tested under section 9(2) because they benefit persons who do not belong to groups previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

[87] Section 9(2) is a unique constitutional provision which has been enacted to respond decisively to the particular history of inequality and the impact of that history on our society. It makes clear that restitutionary measures are part of the scheme for the realisation of substantive equality. A measure which is part of the framework for the advancement of equality cannot ever be said to discriminate unfairly. That being the case, once a measure can properly be said to satisfy the internal test in section 9(2) and fall within the ambit of the section, the scrutiny that other measures are subjected to in terms of section 9(3) does not apply. Once the state successfully demonstrates that a measure falls within section 9(2), that measure is constitutionally compliant without any further justification. That being the case, section 9(2) must be used only in appropriate cases and with great circumspection. The vision of substantive equality and the need for transformation cannot be underestimated. For that reason section 9(2), as an instrument for transformation and the creation of a truly equal society, is powerful and unapologetic. It would therefore be improper and unfortunate for section 9(2) to be used in circumstances for which it was not intended. If used in circumstances where a measure does not in fact advance those previously targeted for disadvantage, the effect will be to render constitutionally compliant a measure which has the potential to discriminate unfairly. This cannot be what section 9(2) envisages.

[88] The main judgment is compelling in its argument that a measure will fall under section 9(2) if the "overwhelming majority of members of the favoured class are persons designated as disadvantaged by unfair exclusion".[14] By this reasoning, a measure will still fall under section 9(2) even if some of those who benefit from it were not members of groups targeted for unfair discrimination in the past. Moseneke J might be correct when he says that "the existence of exceptional cases or of the tiny minority of members of Parliament who were not unfairly discriminated against under the apartheid regime, but who benefited from the differential pension contribution scheme, does not affect the validity of the remedial measures concerned."[15] However, it is not necessary for me to decide the correctness of this test for determining a category or group of persons under section 9(2) because it is my view that this case does not concern exceptional cases or tiny minorities.

[89] As already indicated, it is not necessarily the case, and I leave this question open, that every person in whose favour a restitutionary measure has been enacted must be shown to be a member of a group which has previously been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. However, in the light of my remarks about the importance of section 9(2) and the burden that it removes from the state, it is my view that a measure must be more carefully crafted in relation to the group targeted for advancement than the present one, to fall under section 9(2).

[90] In this case, there are two possible grounds of previous disadvantage which this measure might have been enacted to redress: race and political affiliation. The notion of discrimination on the basis of political affiliation is complex. It might seem on the surface as if the majority of Members of Parliament (MPs) who joined for the first time in 1994 were previously unable to be members, on the basis of their political affiliation or belief. However, it is my view that this is not a conclusion which is supported by the evidence. Nor, in my view, is it capable of being supported by such evidence. The majority of parliamentarians who joined the legislatures in 1994 were black. Black people were prohibited by law on account of their race from standing for national election in South Africa and were only permitted to do so in the so-called independent homelands. They therefore did not have any choice whatsoever about standing for national elections.

[91] Unlike some of the white MPs who stood for election for the first time in 1994, who might claim that even though as whites they were entitled to vote under the old dispensation their disgust with the system prevented them from participating, black persons, even if they had no objection to running for Parliament, by law had no choice. It is artificial to say, therefore, that such black persons were previously disadvantaged on the basis of political affiliation. If black people had not been prohibited from voting or standing for national office prior to 1994, it might be that some of those MPs elected for the first time in 1994 might have run for office previously, as some did in the homelands. Even if this is unlikely it is impossible to speculate about decisions people might have taken when in reality they had no choice.

The prohibition on standing for office based on race was so integral to the system of apartheid that it is hard to speculate what might have been, had black people been allowed to vote at national level.

[92] The political affiliation argument is based on the premise that a person was excluded on the basis of his or her belief. It was introduced in this case to explain why white people could justifiably benefit from the restitutionary measure in the POBF. The idea is that the white beneficiaries, who ran for office for former liberation movements in 1994, could not participate in Parliament prior to 1994 not because of a legal bar but because of an ideological distaste for the system. Unlike their black counterparts, they were not discriminated against under the law. Their non-participation in the parliamentary process arose from a choice that they made – a choice which must be acknowledged for its significance in the fight for democracy and the very equality envisaged by section 9(2). The significance of this choice should not be underemphasised. Be that as it may, since it has not been ascertained or shown whether this is the case for the vast majority of MPs elected for the first time in 1994, it is my view that the POBF cannot be seen as a restitutionary measure aimed at redressing previous discrimination on the basis of political affiliation.

[93] I turn to the question of race as a basis for advancement. On the evidence before this Court, it seems that there were 251 members elected to the National Legislature for the first time in 1994. There were therefore 251 people who benefited from the higher pension rate provided for in the POBF. Of these, 53 were white. This means that 79 per cent of the beneficiaries of the higher rate were black. However, within this group were also black people who were not excluded from membership of Parliament during apartheid. Because of the system's approach to race classification, they were permitted to be part of the tri-cameral Parliament. Therefore, although it seems that 79 per cent of the new members were previously excluded on the basis of their race, the figure may be significantly less. In my view, and I limit my remarks to the facts of this case, the evidence does not show that the advanced group are in the overwhelming majority designated in terms of race. It has also not been shown that this is the case in terms of political affiliation. In my view, unless a measure is shown to stand the internal test in section 9(2), it does not qualify as a section 9(2) measure.

The scheme of the equality clause

[94] In the present matter, the respondent approached the High Court claiming that the differentiation in terms of the POBF unfairly discriminated against him on the basis of race and political affiliation. In response, the Minister did not contend that the measure constitutes fair discrimination or mere differentiation. Rather, the Minister raised section 9(2) as a defence and argued that the measure was restitutionary in nature. This raises the question whether the Minister must stand or fall by his submissions. It also raises the question whether the fact that the Minister relied on section 9(2) precludes a court from finding that the measure, although not restitutionary in the terms of section 9(2), is nevertheless fair having subjected it to equality analysis in terms of section 9(3).

[95] The main judgment has made it clear that section 9(2) is part of a unified view of the right to equality in section 9. I support that view. A measure enacted in terms of section 9(2) is not an exception to our notion of equality; it is an integral part of it. From this must follow that section 9 must be viewed as a whole and any matter which engages the issue of equality engages the whole section. This is not to say that all five subsections will always be relevant to every enquiry. Certain forms of discrimination might be so irrational that they do not even survive challenge in any of the terms of section 9. Other forms might attract a presumption of unfairness which can be rebutted. A measure might fall squarely under section 9(2) in which case it will not attract a presumption of unfairness and will not need to be tested in terms of section 9(3). What is important is to avoid a notion of equality which divides section 9 into artificial parts.

[96] In the present matter, the Minister has relied on facts in support of his contention that the measure falls under section 9(2). These facts in my view also support a finding that the discrimination in this case is fair. As I have found above, the measure does not meet the requirements of section 9(2). However, as I make clear below, it is my view that the measure does not constitute unfair discrimination. Many of the factors that Moseneke J advances in his judgment in support of his contention that the differentiation in the POBF is an acceptable restitutionary measure are, in my view, relevant to the fairness of the measure.[16] Given that section 9 must be viewed as a whole and given that the Minister relies on facts which demonstrate that the measure is fair, it would not be logical to hold that the appeal on the basis of section 9(2) must either be upheld or dismissed altogether.

Section 9(3)

[97] Nothing in section 9(2) limits the circumstances in which the state can enact measures to advance a purpose other than to remedy disadvantage caused by past unfair discrimination. Such measures will then need to be tested in terms of section 9(3). It is important to observe that a measure might resemble a restitutionary measure because it is aimed at creating equity between groups of persons but falls short of protection in terms of section 9(2). This would be the case when any of the three requirements identified by Moseneke J are not fulfilled. In view of the approach I take of the group targeted for disadvantage in the past, the inclusion of those not so targeted affects the group in a way that disqualifies it for advancement under a section 9(2) remedial measure. Such a measure may, generally on the basis of justification in terms of section 9(3) and particularly in view of the objective of the measure, pass muster. The evidence for advancement of the group or for justification may be the same or it may be different, depending on the circumstances of each case. It would be untenable to strike the measure down only because it does not fall under section 9(2) when it could be decided under section 9(3). Doing so would frustrate any programme designed for the achievement of equity.

[98] The measure created by rule 4.2.1 is most certainly aimed at the achievement of equity. However it falls short of all the requirements of section 9(2) in that it fails to target a group previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. In my view it must thus be tested against section 9(3) of the Constitution.

[99] In Harksen v Lane NO[17] the Court considered the following to be relevant to whether discrimination is unfair:

> "(a) [T]he position of the complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage, whether the discrimination in the case under consideration is on a specified ground or not;
> (b) the nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it. If its purpose is manifestly not directed, in the first instance, at impairing the complainants in the manner indicated above, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question. In Hugo, for example, the purpose of the Presidential Act was to benefit three groups of prisoners, namely, disabled prisoners, young people and mothers of young children, as an act of mercy. The fact that all these groups were regarded as being particularly vulnerable in our society, and that in the case of the disabled and the young mothers, they belonged to groups who had been victims of discrimination in the past, weighed with the Court in concluding that the discrimination was not unfair;
> (c) with due regard to (a) and (b) above, and any other relevant factors, the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of complainants and whether it has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or constitutes an impairment of a comparably serious nature."

Various factors are therefore relevant to an analysis of unfair discrimination. Of importance is the position of the complainants in society and whether they have suffered in the past from patterns of disadvantage. So too, whether the discrimination in the case under consideration is on a specified ground. The nature of the provision or power and the purpose sought to be achieved by it is also important. The question to be asked is whether the provision is aimed at an important societal goal. Unlike under section 9(2), other factors to emphasise include the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of the complainants and whether the discrimination is of a serious nature and impairs the fundamental dignity of the complainants.

[100] It is my view that there is clearly discrimination on the facts of this case, but that such discrimination is not on a listed ground. The discrimination is between those members who served in Parliament prior to 1994 and those who did not. However, it is possible to assume in favour of the respondent that the discrimination in question is based on one of the listed grounds, either race or political affiliation.

[101] Assuming in favour of the respondent that the discrimination is based on race or political affiliation attracts the presumption that the measure unfairly discriminates. Even so, I am of the view that the measure is fair. The main judgment points out that the actuarial evidence before this Court shows that the respondent and the majority of his group "remain a privileged class of public pension beneficiaries notwithstanding the challenged remedial measures."[18] This suggests that the consequences of the measure do not impact unduly on the interests of the respondent. In fact, the respondent concedes that the majority of members of Parliament who are members of the Closed Pension Fund (CPF) are better off than those who benefit from the increased contributions in terms of the POBF. He argues, however, that there are sufficient exceptions – referring to the so-called 'jammergevalle'[19] – to conclude that the measure is unfair. I return to the case of the 'jammergevalle' below. In so far as the respondent has correctly conceded that the majority of members of the CPF are in fact better off than their colleagues who joined Parliament for the first time in 1994 as a result of their membership of the CPF, it cannot be said that they are victims of unfair discrimination. It cannot be said that a measure which creates no disadvantages unfairly discriminates unless it attracts one of the other characteristics which this Court has held in previous equality cases to constitute a violation of section 9, such as a negative impact on the complainant's dignity. Moseneke J correctly points out that the measures do not impact negatively on the dignity of the complainants.[20] The scheme does not have an impact on their dignity, because it does not negatively impact on the complainants' sense of self worth. Furthermore, the respondent conceded in argument that the only loss suffered was pecuniary in nature. His motivation for contesting the measure was indeed to earn more.

[102] Another factor of importance is whether the measure advances an important societal goal or whether it is aimed at impairing the complainant. It is clear that the current measure advances an important societal goal. It is aimed at creating equity between new MPs and those members of the current Parliament who, because of the fact that they were also members of the tri-cameral Parliament, are members of the CPF. It cannot be contested that a person who was not unfairly excluded in the past could have chosen to run for a right-wing party for the first time in 1994 and still benefit from the POBF. The scheme was instituted to benefit all newcomers, rather than those excluded on the basis of their race or political affiliation, because it was seen as a government concern that new MPs did not have a substantial pension to fall back on in their retirement. That is a legitimate objective in terms of section 9(3). The scheme in no way targets the complainants, nor does it seek to impair them.

Jammergevalle

[103] While acknowledging that the majority of parliamentarians who receive lower contributions in terms of the POBF are actually still better off because of their membership of the CPF, the respondent argues that the existence of the 'jammergevalle' – those members of the POBF who are worse off even though they are members of the CPF because of when they joined Parliament – is sufficient to render the scheme unfair.

[104] There is a dispute between the parties as to the number of 'jammergevalle'. According to the respondent, 15 people fall into this category. According to the Minister, however, only 13 people are in fact worse off – a difference which is rather insignificant. Regardless of whether 15 or 13 people are affected, I am of the view that the measure is fair. As the main judgment holds, in any legislative scheme which differentiates between classes, there will be hard cases. These hard cases should not prevent a court from concluding that a measure is not unfair and is therefore constitutionally compliant.

[105] I have cautioned that, in the context of section 9(2), great care must be taken to define the group because of the nature of the subsection and the advantage of not having to justify the measure on the part of the author of the remedial measure in invoking it. It is my view that the facts of this case are such that the measure is not one envisaged by section 9(2). The basis for this conclusion is that a significant number of the beneficiaries are not members of a category previously disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. There is a significant difference between a finding that a measure must be tightly crafted to fall under section 9(2) because of its specific requirements and the consequences which attach to that section and a finding that the existence of exceptional circumstances does not render an otherwise fair measure unfair. My conclusion in this regard is not at odds with my conclusion that the 'jammergevalle' do not constitute an obstacle to finding the present measure to be fair. The conclusion in respect of section 9(2) is based on the narrow purpose for which it was designed and its special place in our equality jurisprudence in view of the history of inequality in our society. The conclusion in respect of the 'jammergevalle' is based on an acknowledgment that, under our section 9(3) jurisprudence, to allow hard cases to undermine otherwise constitutionally compliant schemes would place a burden on government that would unduly impede its ability to transform our society.

Conclusion

[106] A consideration of the factors mentioned above leads me to the conclusion that the measure in this case does not unfairly discriminate against the respondent. I would therefore agree with the order proposed by Moseneke J and also uphold the appeal.

Sachs J and Skweyiya J concur in the judgment of Mokgoro J.

NGCOBO J:

Introduction

[107] At the centre of this application for leave to appeal are the provisions of rule 4.2.1 read with the relevant definitions of the rules of the Political Office-Bearers Pension Fund (the Fund). The impugned rules provide for differentiated employer contributions in respect of members of Parliament. They treat members of Parliament who came to Parliament for the first time in 1994 (new members) more favourably than those who were members of Parliament prior to 1994 (old members). The respondent attacked these rules on the grounds that they discriminate unfairly against old members. The applicant resisted this attack on the grounds that the rules constituted a "limited affirmative action measure" in favour of new members of Parliament under section 9(2) of the Constitution. The High Court found that the impugned rules did not fall under section 9(2) and concluded that the impugned rules violate the equality clause of the Constitution. The main judgment finds that the rules fall under section 9(2) and are therefore within the constitutional bounds.

[108] The main judgment holds that for a measure to come under section 9(2) it must meet three requirements, namely, it must: (a) target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by unfair discrimination; (b) be designed to protect or advance such persons; and (c) promote the achievement of equality. With this, I agree. I doubt whether section 9(2) applies to the facts of this case. In particular, I doubt whether on the facts of this case the requirement that the measure must target persons or categories of persons who have been disadvantaged by discrimination has been met. The beneficiaries of the measure included persons who were not disadvantaged by past discrimination. This issue was not fully argued in this Court. However, in the view I take of the central question whether the impugned rules discriminate unfairly against the respondent, I consider it unnecessary to reach any firm conclusion in this regard.

[109] The fact that a remedial measure under constitutional challenge does not come under section 9(2) of the Constitution does not necessarily mean that it violates the equality clause. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice[1] this Court held that the principles underlying remedial equality do not operate only in the context of section 9(2). It follows therefore that the constitutional validity of the impugned rules must still be determined in light of the equality guarantee. The respondent contended that the impugned rules unfairly discriminate against him and those similarly situated and are therefore irrational. This contention must be considered in the light of the equality guarantee.

Equality Analysis

[110] The relevant provision of the Constitution in section 9 provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

[111] The proper approach to the question whether the impugned rules violate the equality clause involves three basic enquiries: first, whether the impugned rules make a differentiation that bears a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose; and if so, second, whether the differentiation amounts to unfair discrimination; and if so, third, whether the impugned rules can be justified under the limitations provision.

If the differentiation bears no such rational connection, there is a violation of section 9(1) and the second enquiry does not arise. Similarly, if the differentiation does not amount to unfair discrimination, the third enquiry does not arise.[2] It is to the first enquiry that I now turn.

Rationality of Differentiation

[112] It is common cause that the impugned rules differentiate between old and new members of Parliament in relation to parliamentary pension benefits. The need for differentiation arose because old members of Parliament were members of the Closed Pension Fund (CPF) and thus entitled to pension benefits from that fund. New members of Parliament were excluded from the CPF and thus were not entitled to any benefits under that fund. When the new fund was created after April 1994, old members of Parliament became entitled to benefits under the new fund. This resulted in the old members of Parliament being entitled to parliamentary benefits from two pension funds. The differentiation in contributions to be made in respect of different categories of members was designed to bring about equity in the spread of parliamentary pension benefits amongst old and new political office-bearers.

[113] The legitimacy of this purpose cannot be gainsaid. There was inequality in the entitlement to pension benefits in that old members of Parliament were entitled to benefits from a parliamentary pension fund from which new members were excluded. Nor can there be any doubt as to the existence of a rational connection between the differentiation created by the impugned rules and the legitimate governmental purpose. It follows therefore that the contention by the respondent that the differentiation was irrational must fail. The question which falls to be determined is whether this differentiation amounted to unfair discrimination.

Discrimination

[114] It was contended on behalf of the respondent that race was an important factor in the differentiation. There can be no question that the differentiation had a disproportionate impact on persons who were previously classified as white, coloured and Indian. These racial groups were the only racial groups that were eligible to be members of the tri-cameral parliament. It is also clear from the papers that one of the primary considerations in adopting the impugned rules was the fact that an overwhelming majority of those who were excluded from the CPF were excluded from the tri-cameral parliament because of race and political affiliation.

[115] In all the circumstances we are concerned here with a differentiation on a listed ground. But the rules are facially neutral as far as race and political affiliation is concerned. This finding raises a rebuttable presumption that the impugned rules indirectly discriminate unfairly against the respondent. The ultimate question, however, is whether in fact the impugned rules indirectly discriminate unfairly as contended by the respondent.

Do the impugned rules discriminate unfairly?

[116] At the heart of our equality guarantee is the prohibition of unfair discrimination and remedying the effects of past unfair discrimination. Human dignity is harmed by unfair treatment that is premised upon personal traits or circumstances that do not relate to the needs, capacities and merits of different individuals. Often such discrimination is premised on the assumption that the disfavoured group is not worthy of dignity. At times, as our history amply demonstrates, such discrimination proceeds on the assumption that the disfavoured group is inferior to other groups.[3] And this is an assault on the human dignity of the disfavoured group. Equality as enshrined in our Constitution does not tolerate distinctions that treat other people as "second class citizens, that demean them, that treat them as less capable for no good reason or that otherwise offend fundamental human dignity".[4]

[117] In President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo, this Court outlined the purpose of the equality clause, in particular, the prohibition of unfair discrimination and said:

> "The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of unfair discrimination lies recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a

[3] In Moller v Keimoes School Committee and Another 1911 AD 635 at 643, the Appellate Division acknowledged this:

> "As a matter of public history we know that the first civilised legislators in South Africa came from Holland and regarded the aboriginal natives of the country as belonging to an inferior race, whom the Dutch, as Europeans, were entitled to rule over, and whom they refused to admit to social or political equality. We know also, that while slavery existed, the slaves where blacks and that their descendents, who form a large proportion of the coloured races of South Africa, were never admitted to social equality with the so-called whites."

[4] Egan v Canada (1995) 29 CRR (2nd) 79, cited with approval by this Court in President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC), 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at para 41.

> society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups. The achievement of such a society in the context of our deeply inegalitarian past will not be easy, but that that is the goal of the Constitution should not be forgotten or overlooked."[5]

[118] However, it is not every distinction or differentiation in treatment which falls foul of the equality guarantee. Legislatures, to govern effectively, may treat different individuals and groups in different ways. In Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another,[6] this Court accepted that in order to govern a modern country efficiently and to harmonise the interests of all its people for common good, it may be necessary for government to make distinctions. Such distinctions will "very rarely" constitute unfair discrimination to such regulation, without the addition of a further element.[7]

[119] Our concept of equality therefore recognises that at times it may be necessary to treat people differently for example when it is necessary to recognise the different social or economic situations in which individuals are situated. This is a recognition of the fact that treating unequals as if they are equals may produce inequality. Our concept of unfair discrimination therefore recognises that:

> …"[A]lthough a society which affords each human being equal treatment on the basis of equal worth and freedom is our goal, we cannot achieve that goal by insisting upon identical treatment in all circumstances before that goal is achieved. Each case, therefore, will require a careful and a thorough understanding of the impact of discriminatory action upon the particular people concerned to determine whether its > overall impact is one which furthers the constitutional goal of equality or not. A classification which is unfair in one context may not necessarily be unfair in a different context."[8]

[120] As noted previously,[9] it is also important to note that the principles of remedial equality do not only operate in the context of section 9(2) of the Constitution. This Court has recognised that they are relevant in deciding whether the discriminatory provisions have impacted unfairly on complainants.[10] Thus in Harksen when dealing with the purpose of the provision or power as a factor to be considered in deciding whether discrimination has impacted unfairly on the complainant, this Court held that:

> "If its purpose is manifestly not directed, at the first instance, at impairing the complainants in the manner indicated above, but is aimed at achieving a worthy and important societal goal, such as, for example, the furthering of equality for all, this purpose may, depending on the facts of the particular case, have a significant bearing on the question whether complainants have in fact suffered the impairment in question."[11]

[121] The question which falls to be determined therefore is the impact of discrimination on the respondent and those similarly situated. And in determining this question relevant considerations include the position of the respondent and those similarly situated in society, the purpose sought to be achieved by the discrimination, the extent to which the rights or the interests of the respondent have been affected and whether the discrimination has impaired the human dignity of the respondent.[12] It is to that enquiry that I now turn.

The position of the members of the affected group in society

[122] The majority of the group affected is not one which has suffered discrimination in the past.[13] Members of this group are all politicians, and have some political power. This group cannot, in my view, be said to be a vulnerable group. That in itself does not render the discrimination fair.

The nature and the purpose of the power exercised by Parliament

[123] In adopting the impugned rules, Parliament was fulfilling its constitutional obligation to create a pension fund for political office-bearers. Under the interim Constitution this obligation was imposed by section 190A.[14] Under the Constitution

[12] Harksen at para 50 and Hoffman at para 27.

[14] Section 190A provides:

> "(1) There shall be paid out of and as a charge on the pension fund referred to in subsection (2) to a political office-bearer upon his or her retirement as a political office-bearer, or to his or her widow or widower or dependent or any other category of persons as may be determined in the rules of such pension fund upon his or her death, such pension and pension benefits as may be determined in terms of the said rules.
> (2) A pension fund shall be established for the purposes of this section after consultation with a committee appointed by Parliament, and such a fund shall be registered in terms of and be subject to the laws governing the registration and control of pension funds in the Republic.
> (3) All political office-bearers shall be members of the said pension fund.
> (4) Contributions to the said fund by members of the fund shall be made at a rate to be determined in the rules of the fund, and such contributions shall be deducted monthly from the remuneration payable to members as political office-bearers.
> (5) Contributions to the said fund by the State shall be made at a rate to be determined by the President, and such contributions shall be paid monthly from the National Revenue Fund and the respective Provincial Revenue Funds, according to whether a member serves at national or provincial level of government.
> (6) In this section "political office-bearer" means —
> (a) an Executive Deputy President;
> (b) a Minister or Deputy Minister;

that obligation is imposed by section 219.[15] The purpose of the impugned rules is, broadly speaking, to give effect to this constitutional obligation.

[124] The purpose behind the impugned rules is given as follows by Mr Maritz, the Chief Director in the Directorate of Pensions Administration of the Department of Finance and Deputy-Chairperson of the Political Office-Bearers Pension Fund, the Third Respondent herein:

> "15. The pension arrangements which applied in respect of political office bearers after the commencement of the 1983 tri-cameral Parliament were contained in the Members of Parliament and Political Office Bearers Pension Scheme Act 112 of 1984 ("the 1984 Act"). The pension scheme established in terms

> (e) a member of a provincial legislature;
> (f) a diplomatic representative of the Republic who is not a member of the public service; or
> (g) any other political office-bearer recognised for purposes of this section by an Act of Parliament."

[15] Section 219 states:

> "(1) An Act of Parliament must establish a framework for determining —
> (a) the salaries, allowances and benefits of members of the National Assembly, permanent delegates to the National Council of Provinces, members of the Cabinet, Deputy Ministers, traditional leaders and members of any councils of traditional leaders; and
> (b) The upper limit of salaries, allowances or benefits of members of provincial legislatures, members of Executive Councils and members of Municipal Councils of the different categories.
> (2) National legislation must establish an independent commission to make recommendations concerning the salaries, allowances and benefits referred to in subsection (1).
> (3) Parliament may pass the legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).
> (4) The national executive, a provincial executive, a municipality or any other relevant authority may implement the national legislation referred to in subsection (1) only after considering any recommendations of the commission established in terms of subsection (2).

of the 1984 Act was a so called "pay as you go" scheme. This meant that no special fund was established for the payment of contributions. Rather, in terms of the 1984 Act, ordinary members of Parliament were required to pay 7% (seven percent) of their pensionable salary to the State Revenue Fund. When a member of Parliament retired, he or she became entitled to pension benefits in terms of the Act, and these benefits were paid out of the State Revenue Fund. No specific pension fund was established for purposes of payment of pensions in terms of the 1984 Act.

16. During the negotiations held in Kempton Park in the early 1990's, for the establishment of a democratic government in South Africa and the determination of a democratic constitution, the question of the pensions of members of the previous Parliament was raised. It was agreed that a closed pension fund would be established, and the actuarial interest of every member and existing pensioner of the pension scheme established under the 1984 Act would be determined and paid into that fund by the State. Consequent upon this agreement, the Closed Pension Fund Act 197 of 1993 was passed, ("the Closed Pension Fund Act") in terms of which the Closed Pension Fund was established. The total actuarial liability of that fund was about R773 700 000, 00 (SEVEN HUNDRED AND SEVENTY MILLION RAND) as at 1 February 1994. This liability which was funded to an amount of some R440 000 000, 00 (FOUR HUNDRED AND FORTY MILLION RAND) by the issuing of government stock, and the remaining obligation of some R333 700 000, 00 (THREE HUNDRED AND THIRTY THREE MILLION SEVEN HUNDRED THOUSAND RAND) by way of monies voted by Parliament under the budget vote of the Department of Finance. The latter amount was payed over several years together with interest of some R220 000 000, 00 (TWO HUNDRED AND TWENTY MILLION RANDS).

17. The Closed Pension Fund Act came into operation on 5 January 1994. As its name suggested, the membership of the Closed Pension Fund was closed from the inception of the Fund – it was limited to persons who, in their capacity as political office bearers of the South African state prior to the interim Constitution, received pensions, or were entitled to pension benefits in that capacity. Persons who were not already members of the Closed Pension Fund, and who were elected to Parliament or the provincial legislatures in the first democratic elections in April 1994, did not thereby become members of the Closed Pension Fund.

18. In addition to being a closed fund, the Closed Pension Fund was an extremely generous fund. I attach marked "PM1" an affidavit of ERICH POTGIETER, the actuary of the Third Respondent. In annexure PM1 POTGIETER analyses the benefits provided by the Closed Pension Fund and shows that they were more than 2.5 times as generous as those provided by the Third Respondent to Category B members (the most privileged class of members of the Third Respondent), and just under 4 times as generous as the benefits provided by the typical defined benefit pension funds operating in the private sector.

19. Because the Closed Pension Fund was closed, after the first democratic elections in April 1994, it became necessary for a new pension dispensation to be established for members of Parliament and other political office bearers. The creation of a new pension fund for political office bearers ("the new fund") was, in fact, a constitutional obligation imposed by section 190A of the interim Constitution."

[125] And the rationale for the differentiation is given as follows by Mr Maritz:

"27 The rationale for the differentiation is the following:

27.1 With more pressing calls on the public purse and the expansion of Parliament and the creation of the provincial legislatures after the 1994 elections it was not affordable to create a pension scheme providing political office bearers with benefits as generous as those provided under the 1984 Act and the Closed Pension Fund.

27.2 The limited resources available for the pensions of political office bearers had to be spread in an equitable fashion.

27.3 Members of the Closed Pension Fund were already in receipt of generous pension benefits which were far in excess of those available to new political office bearers.

27.4 The overwhelming majority of new political office bearers had been excluded from access to political office under the tri-cameral regime (and thereby from access to the generous benefits of the Closed Pension Fund) by virtue of either their race or their political affiliation or both their race and their political affiliation.

27.5 In this context, the differentiated scheme of employer contributions under the Rules of the Third Respondent was designed to benefit new political office bearers whose exclusion from the benefits of the Closed Pension Fund by virtue of historical circumstances left them with a need for more generous pension benefits than their colleagues who had access to Closed Pension Fund benefits.

27.6 Within the class of new political office bearers, the differentiated scheme also conferred additional benefits on office bearers who were over the age of 50 and whose advanced age accordingly increased their immediate need for more generous pension benefits.

27.7 Consistent with its origins in a particular transitional historical context, the differentiation effected by the scheme was a limited affirmative action measure which operated only for the first five years of the democratic era. From 1 May 1999 there was to be a uniform employer contribution of 17% in respect of all members of the Third Respondent."

[126] From what Mr Maritz says, it is clear that as at April 1994 members of Parliament and other political office-bearers who held office prior to 1994 enjoyed extremely generous pension benefits under the CPF. The CPF was fully funded by public funds. This fund was especially reserved for the benefit of this group. Persons elected to Parliament for the first time in 1994 were excluded from this fund. It was, as its name suggests, a closed fund. But for that exclusion, new members would have been entitled to join the same fund and benefit from its generous provisions. After the first democratic elections it became necessary to establish a new pension scheme for members of Parliament and other political office-bearers. Parliament was under a constitutional duty to do so.

[127] But the reality was that old members of Parliament already had a generous, publicly funded pension scheme. This had to be kept in mind when creating a new pension scheme. Old members of Parliament could not be excluded from the new pension fund simply on the basis that they were entitled to pension benefits from a closed fund. They were entitled to benefit under the new pension scheme. Yet, if they were included, they would now be entitled to two parliamentary pension benefits while new parliamentarians were only entitled to one. This put the respondent and those in his group in a better position financially than the new members. To have afforded old parliamentarians the same benefits, would have resulted in inequality because they had an unequal start. The challenge confronting the government was how to spread the limited resources available for the pensions of political office-bearers "in an equitable fashion".

[128] In confronting this challenge, the government took into consideration a number of factors including the limited resources available, the fact that old parliamentarians were already in receipt of generous pension benefits which were far in excess of those available to new political office-bearers, the fact that the overwhelming majority of new political office-bearers have been excluded from access to political office under the tri-cameral regime (and thereby from access to the generous benefits of the Closed Pension Fund) by virtue of either their race or their political affiliation or both their race and their political affiliation, and the need to ensure that newcomers to Parliament are not worse off financially than the old members of Parliament. All this is relevant to the consideration of the impact of the discrimination.

[129] Other factors that are relevant in the consideration of the impact of discrimination on old members include the following: its aim was to achieve a worthy and important societal goal of furthering equality in the entitlement to pension benefits, the rules sought to minimize the gap in the pension benefits between old and new members of Parliament. The discrimination was of limited duration. It was to last until 1999 after which every parliamentarian would receive the same pension benefits. The impact of the discrimination was financial, they received less from the new fund compared to new members, but benefited also from a parliamentary fund from which new members were excluded.

[130] It is doubtful whether in fact the respondent and those similarly situated have suffered any financial prejudice at all as a result of the measure. The respondent does not seriously dispute the fact that members of the CPF were entitled to generous benefits. Instead, he has sought to distinguish the various benefits to which individual members of the CPF are entitled to. The amount of pension benefits to which a member is entitled is no doubt affected by the number of years as a member of the fund concerned. This may therefore result in certain members of the CPF being entitled to less than others in the group. This, in my view, does not detract from the fact that they are all entitled to benefits under the CPF.

[131] In my judgment the cumulative effect of all of this, and in particular, the impact of the discrimination on old members of Parliament, and having regard to the underlying values protected by the equality clause, does not justify the conclusion that the impugned rules constitute unfair discrimination. They were manifestly not directed at impairing the dignity of the old members of Parliament. In my view, it is a kind of discrimination that any citizen may face when there is a need to take into account the different financial circumstances in which individuals are situated. Any burden that is imposed by the impugned rules does not "lead to an impairment of fundamental dignity or constitute an impairment of a comparable serious nature".[16]

[132] There is a small group of old parliamentarians, who were described in argument as the "jammergevalle", and who it is said did not get the generous benefits because they had served less than seven and a half years in the old Parliament. What sets this group apart from the new members is that they were also beneficiaries of the CPF. It was therefore in the same category as old parliamentarians. The purpose of the impugned rules was not to place the new members in the same position in terms of the benefits in which they would have been but for lack of prior parliamentary membership. The rules do no more than to recognise that old parliamentarians were entitled to two parliamentary pension benefits while new members were only entitled to one. The rules made this distinction in order to take into account the different circumstances of the old and new members of Parliament in relation to parliamentary pension benefits. Old parliamentary members had a head start in respect of such benefits while the new ones did not. To have treated them equally in these circumstances would have perpetuated the inequality. In my view, the distinction made by the rules was not unfair.

[133] It follows, in my view, that the impugned rules do not constitute unfair discrimination. In the event, the constitutional challenge must fail.

[134] For these reasons I concur in the order proposed by Moseneke J.

Sachs J concurs in the judgment of Ngcobo J.

SACHS J:

[135] Paradoxical as it may appear, I concur in the judgment of Moseneke J on the one hand, and the respective judgments of Ngcobo J and Mokgoro J, on the other, even though they disagree on one major issue and arrive at the same outcome by apparently different constitutional routes. As I read them the judgments appear eloquently to mirror each other. In relation to philosophy, approach, evaluation of relevant material and ultimate outcome, they are virtually identical. In relation to starting point and formal road travelled, they are opposite. The majority judgment comes to the firm conclusion that the composition of the new Parliament overwhelmingly pointed to members having been disadvantaged by race discrimination and political affiliation, and therefore started and finished its enquiry within the framework of the affirmative action provisions of section 9(2). The two minority judgments baulked at the idea of categorising the new parliamentarians as disadvantaged by discrimination, and started and completed their analysis within the non-discrimination provisions of section 9(3). In my view it is no accident that even though they started at different points and invoked different provisions they arrived at the same result. Though the formal articulation was different the basic constitutional rationale was the same. I agree with this basic rationale. I would go further and say that the core constitutional vision that underlies their separate judgments suggests that the technical frontier that divides them should be removed, allowing their overlap and commonalities to be revealed rather than to be obscured. If this is done, as I believe the Constitution requires us to do, then the apparent paradox of endorsing seemingly contradictory judgments is dissolved. Thus, I endorse the essential rationale of all the judgments, and explain why I believe that the Constitution obliges us to join together what the judgments put asunder.

[136] The main difficulty concerning equality in this case is not how to choose between the need to take affirmative action to remedy the massive inequalities that disfigure our society, on the one hand, and the duty on the state not to discriminate unfairly against anyone on the grounds of race, on the other. It is how, in our specific historical and constitutional context, to harmonise the fairness inherent in remedial measures with the fairness expressly required of the state when it adopts measures that discriminate between different sections of the population. I agree with Mokgoro J that the main focus of section 9(2) of the Constitution is on the group advanced and the mechanism used to advance it, while the primary focus under section 9(3) is on the group of persons discriminated against. I do not however regard sections 9(2) and 9(3) as being competitive, or even as representing alternative approaches to achieving equality. Rather, I see them as cumulative, interrelated and indivisible. The necessary reconciliation between the different interests of those positively and negatively affected by affirmative action should, I believe, be done in a manner that takes simultaneous and due account both of the severe degree of structured inequality with which we still live, and of the constitutional goal of achieving an egalitarian society based on non-racism and non-sexism.

[137] In this context, redress is not simply an option, it is an imperative. Without major transformation we cannot 'heal the divisions of the past and establish a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights.[1] At the same time it is important to ensure that the process of achieving equity is conducted in such a way that the baby of non-racialism is not thrown out with the bath-water of remedial action. Thus while I concur fully with Moseneke J that it would be illogical to permit a presumption of unfairness derived from section 9(3) (read with section 9(5)), to undermine and vitiate affirmative action programmes clearly authorised by section 9(2), by the same token I believe it would be illogical to say that unfair discrimination by the state is permissible provided that it takes place under section 9(2).

[138] The illogic can best be cured if the frontier between sections 9(2) and 9(3) is dismantled rather than fortified. If the emphasis is on establishing an egalitarian continuum rather than defining cut-off points it becomes possible to avoid categorical or definitional skirmishing over precisely what is meant by persons or categories of persons disadvantaged by discrimination. Once this is done one can see that though on the surface the majority and minority judgments appear to represent quite distinct ways of reasoning, they are in fact united by the same underlying constitutional logic. In my view, it is not by happenstance that they achieve the same outcome. They use the same historical and philosophical premises, give weight to virtually identical material factors and make their evaluations on the same principled bases. It is not the body of the argument which is different, but the manner in which it is clothed; should it wear the apparel of section 9(2), or should it present itself in the dress of section 9(3)?

[139] If sections 9(2) and (3) are read in conjunction and in a comprehensive and contextual way in the light of the egalitarian constitutional values and goals as set out above, section 9(3) ceases to be viewed as a stand-alone provision and falls to be interpreted in the light of the constitutional vision established by section 9(2). Section 9(2), for its part, ceases to function in a categorical or definitional way with dramatic consequences for the evaluation to be made. Section 9(2) should be seen as an integral and overarching constitutional principle established by section 9, rather than as a discreet element within it that serves as an autonomous and sealed off launching-pad for state action. It would, in my view, do a disservice to section 9(2) to treat it as a fantastical constitutional device for leaping over the gritty hurdles of hard social reality and escaping from basic equality analysis. It is not a magic analytical slipper which, if no toes protrude, converts the wearer into a sovereign princess unrestrained by any notions of fairness and beyond the bounds of ordinary constitutional scrutiny.

[140] As Moseneke J trenchantly makes clear section 9(2) is not agnostic on the question of fairness. It confronts the issue of discrimination in an unambiguous, head-on manner which provides express direction. It gives properly devised affirmative action programmes a clear constitutional nod. They do not constitute unfair discrimination. They do not fall foul of the prohibition against such discrimination, not because they are exempt, but because they are not unfair. So understood, the section leaves no doubt that the more snugly a race-based measure fits into section 9(2), the more difficult it will be to challenge its constitutionality. Conversely, the less comfortable the fit, the less impervious the measure will be to attack. It is not a question of all-or-nothing, but one of purpose, context and degree. To my mind, where different constitutionally protected interests are involved, it is prudent to avoid categorical and definitional reasoning and instead opt for context-based proportional interrelationships, balanced and weighed according to the fundamental constitutional values called into play by the situation.

[141] The overall effect of section 9(2), then, is to anchor the equality provision as a whole around the need to dismantle the structures of disadvantage left behind by centuries of legalised racial domination, and millennia of legally and socially structured patriarchal subordination. In this respect it gives clear constitutional authorisation for pro-active measures to be taken to protect or advance persons disadvantaged because of ethnicity, social origin, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, culture and other factors which have operated and continue to operate to disadvantage persons or categories of persons.

[142] The section functions in a manner that gives a clear constitutional pronouncement on issues which have divided legal thinking throughout the world in relation to problems concerning equal protection under the law. The whole thrust of section 9(2) is to ensure that equality be looked at from a contextual and substantive point of view, and not a purely formal one. As this Court has frequently stated, our Constitution rejects the notion of purely formal equality, which would require the same treatment for all who find themselves in similar situations. Formal equality is based on a status-quo-oriented conservative approach which is particularly suited to countries where a great degree of actual equality or substantive equality has already been achieved. It looks at social situations in a neutral, colour-blind and gender-blind way and requires compelling justification for any legal classification that takes account of race or gender. The substantive approach, on the other hand, requires that the test for constitutionality is not whether the measure concerned treats all affected by it in identical fashion. Rather it focuses on whether it serves to advance or retard the equal enjoyment in practice of the rights and freedoms that are promised by the Constitution but have not already been achieved. It roots itself in a transformative constitutional philosophy which acknowledges that there are patterns of systemic advantage and disadvantage based on race and gender that need expressly to be faced up to and overcome if equality is to be achieved. In this respect, the context in which the measure operates, the structures of advantage and disadvantage it deals with, the impact it has on those affected by it and its overall effect in helping to achieve a society based on equality, non-racialism and non-sexism, become the important signifiers.

[143] It also means that where disadvantage was imposed because of race, then race may appropriately be taken into account in dealing with such disadvantage (the same would apply to gender, disability, language and so on). It accordingly makes it clear that properly designed race-conscious and gender-conscious measures are not automatically suspect, and certainly not presumptively unfair, as the High Court held.

[144] Remedial action by its nature has to take specific account of race, gender and the other factors which have been used to inhibit people from enjoying their rights. In pursuance of a powerful governmental purpose it inevitably disturbs, rather than freezes, the status quo. It destabilises the existing state of affairs, often to the disadvantage of those who belong to the classes of society that have benefited from past discrimination.

[145] Yet, burdensome though the process is for some, it needs to be remembered that the system of state-sponsored racial domination not only imposed injustice and indignity on those oppressed by it, it tainted the whole of society and dishonoured those who benefited from it. Correcting the resultant injustices, though potentially disconcerting for those who might be dislodged from the established expectations and relative comfort of built-in advantage, is integral to restoring dignity to our country as a whole. For as long as the huge disparities created by past discrimination exist, the constitutional vision of a non-racial and a non-sexist society which reflects and celebrates our diversity in all ways, can never be achieved. Thus, though some members of the advantaged group may be called upon to bear a larger portion of the burden of transformation than others, they, like all other members of society, benefit from the stability, social harmony and restoration of national dignity that the achievement of equality brings.

[146] It follows from the above analysis that I do not believe it is necessary or appropriate to engage in agonising analysis over whether strictly speaking the new parliamentarians constituted a category of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination. A substantive approach to equality eschews preoccupation with formal technical exactitude. It is algebraic rather than geometric, relational rather than linear. Its rigour lies in determining in a rational, objective way the impact the measures will have on the position in society and sense of self-worth of those affected by it. The critical factor is not sameness or symmetry, but human dignity, a quality which by its very nature prospers least when caged. In a matter like the present it should accordingly not make any significant difference whether one starts one's analysis from the vantage point of those former disadvantaged, or of those who have been advantaged. Nor should there be a Chinese wall between the two. It follows that reading sections 9(2) and 9(3) together, the outcome should be the same, whatever the technical point of departure.

[147] Even if section 9(2) had not existed, I believe that section 9 should have been interpreted so as to promote substantive equality and race-conscious remedial action. Other legal opinions might have been different. Section 9(2) was clearly inserted to put the matter beyond doubt. The need for such an express and firm constitutional pronouncement becomes understandable in the light of the enormous public controversies and divisions of judicial opinion on the subject in other countries. Such divisions had become particularly pronounced in the United States. The intensity of the debate in the Supreme Court was eloquently captured by Marshall J in The City of Richmond v Croson Co.[2] The majority[3] in that matter held that the USA was a colour-blind and race-neutral country, so that affirmative action programmes based on race should be subject to the same strict scrutiny applied to overtly discriminatory and racist practices. Challenging this view and underlining the distinction between measures taken to enforce racism and those taken to overcome it, he wrote:

[3] The court by a 5-4 majority struck down a programme designed to ensure that black contractors, coming from 50% of the population would increase their share of municipal contracts from less than 1% to 30%, unless an objector could show that no such contractor was available to do the job adequately.

> "Racial classifications 'drawn on the presumption that one race is inferior to another or because they put the weight of government behind racial hatred and separatism' warrant the strictest judicial scrutiny because of the very irrelevance of these rationales.(reference omitted). By contrast, racial classifications drawn for the purpose of remedying the effects of discrimination that itself was race based have a highly pertinent basis: the tragic and indelible fact that discrimination against blacks and other racial minorities in this Nation has pervaded our Nation's history and continues to scar our society. As I stated in Fullilove: 'Because the consideration of race is relevant to remedying the continuing effects of past racial discrimination, and because governmental programs employing racial classifications for remedial purposes can be crafted to avoid stigmatization …such programs should not be subjected to conventional "strict scrutiny"- scrutiny that is strict in theory, but fatal in fact.' (reference omitted).
> In concluding that remedial classifications warrant no different standard of review under the Constitution than the most brutal and repugnant forms of state-sponsored racism, a majority of this Court signals that it regards racial discrimination as largely a phenomenon of the past, and that government bodies need no longer preoccupy themselves with rectifying racial injustice. I, however, do not believe this Nation is anywhere close to eradicating racial discrimination or its vestiges. In constitutionalizing its wishful thinking, the majority today does a grave disservice not only to those victims of past and present racial discrimination in this Nation whom government has sought to assist, but also to this Court's long tradition of approaching issues of race with the utmost sensitivity."[4]

[148] Our Constitution pre-empted any judicial uncertainty on the matter by unambiguously directing courts to follow the line of reasoning that Marshall J relied on,[5] and that the majority of the US Supreme Court rejected. In South Africa we are far from having eradicated the vestiges of racial discrimination. In the present matter, for the reasons given in all the judgments, the High Court was clearly wrong in utilising an approach steeped in the notions of formal equality. It was this inappropriate vision that led it to presume unfairness and strike down the pension scheme at issue. I have no doubt that our Constitution requires that a matter such as the present be based on principles of substantive not formal equality, and that the critiques in the majority and minority judgments of the High Court's approach are well founded. Where I differ from my colleagues is in preferring to treat sections 9(2) and 9(3) as overlapping and indivisible rather than discreet.

[149] Applying section 9 in an holistic manner to the present matter, and in particular integrating sections 9(2) and 9(3), leads me to the conclusion that in most if not all cases like the present, the very factors that would answer the question whether a measure was designed to promote equality under section 9(2), would serve to indicate whether it was unfair under section 9(3). Thus, a measure taken for improper or corrupt motives would not pass muster under either section, even if done under the guise of advancing the disadvantaged. Similarly, a scheme that was so lacking in thought and organisation as seriously to threaten the very functioning and survival of the enterprise involved, would lack rationality, and could not be said to advance or be fair to anybody, let alone the disadvantaged. A more difficult problem could arise where a measure advances the interests of one disadvantaged group as against another; the present case does not require an attempt to deal with the historical, social and legal issues involved. More relevant to the present matter is where the measure advances the disadvantaged but in so doing disadvantages the advantaged. As the majority of this Court pointed out in Walker,[6] members of the advantaged group are not excluded from equality protection:

> "The respondent belongs to a group that has not been disadvantaged by the racial policies and practices of the past. In an economic sense, his group is neither disadvantaged nor vulnerable, having been benefited rather than adversely affected by discrimination in the past. . . .The respondent does however belong to a racial minority which could, in a political sense, be regarded as vulnerable. It is precisely individuals who are members of such minorities who are vulnerable to discriminatory treatment and who, in a very special sense, must look to the Bill of Rights for protection. When that happens a Court has a clear duty to come to the assistance of the person affected."[7]
>
> "No members of a racial group should be made to feel that they are not deserving of equal 'concern, respect and consideration' and that the law is likely to be used against them more harshly than others who belong to other race groups."[8]

[150] At the same time the judgment pointed out:

> 'Courts should, however, always be astute to distinguish between genuine attempts to promote and protect equality on the one hand and actions calculated to protect pockets of privilege at a price which amounts to the perpetuation of inequality and disadvantage to others on the other.'[9]

to the values of non-racialism. Clearly they do not allow section 9(2) to be interpreted in a way which says: provided the measure affecting the advantaged persons (whites, men, heterosexuals, English-speakers) is designed to advance the disadvantaged, the former can be treated in an abusive or oppressive way that offends their dignity and tells them and the world that they are of lesser worth than the disadvantaged.

[152] Serious measures taken to destroy the caste-like character of our society and to enable people historically held back by patterns of subordination to break through into hitherto excluded terrain, clearly promote equality (section 9(2)), and are not unfair (section 9(3)). Courts must be reluctant to interfere with such measures, and exercise due restraint when tempted to interpose themselves as arbiters as to whether the measure could have been proceeded with in a better or less onerous way. At the same time, if the measure at issue is manifestly overbalanced in ignoring or trampling on the interests of members of the advantaged section of the community, and gratuitously and flagrantly imposes disproportionate burdens on them, the courts have a duty to interfere. Given our historical circumstances and the massive inequalities that plague our society, the balance when determining whether a measure promotes equality is fair will be heavily weighted in favour of opening up opportunities for the disadvantaged. That is what promoting equality (section 9(2)) and fairness (section 9(3)) require. Yet some degree of proportionality, based on the particular context and circumstances of each case, can never be ruled out. That, too, is what promoting equality (section 9(2)) and fairness (section 9(3)) require.

[153] Applying the above approach to the present matter, I have no doubt that the scheme under attack comfortably clears the promoting equality/fairness bar. There is nothing to suggest that it was adopted with improper motives, or that it was unduly punitive or manifestly and grossly disproportionate in its impact. The fact that the same remedial purpose could have been achieved in other and possibly better ways would not be enough to invalidate it.

[154] The survivors of the old Parliament had benefited from an extremely generous, one-off scheme which had been negotiated on their behalf at Kempton Park. It remained intact as a guarantee that their agreement to accept the new democratic constitutional dispensation would not have the result of leaving them economically high and dry. The majority of the new generation of members of Parliament had been excluded by law from standing for office under the old dispensation. Others of this generation had refused to be part of a racist and oppressive regime, indeed had resisted it, often at great personal cost. I see nothing discriminatory, unfair or antithetical to the achievement of equality, in their taking special steps in these particular circumstances to ensure for themselves a reasonable measure of financial security. Indeed, the measure emphasises the needs of those who at a relatively advanced age were entering Parliament for the first time. In a period of dramatic historical transition from one parliamentary dispensation to a completely different one, these were special measures adopted to deal with real economic problems facing the overwhelming majority of the new members. At the same time the old parliamentarians lost nothing. Neither their purse nor their dignity was assailed. They were not being punished for having been part of the old apartheid set-up. They were simply being excluded from some special benefits that were given on objectively justifiable grounds to the new parliamentarians. I accordingly agree with the neat manner in which Ngcobo J evaluates the position in this regard.

[155] I would just wish to add that for the new scheme to have distinguished on grounds of race or previous political affiliation between individual persons in this large and diverse new generation of members of Parliament, would have been divisive and invidious. The one-off boost to their pension entitlements was, in my view, appropriately accomplished on the basis of a broad sweep which included the new generation as a whole.

[156] Had there been a suggestion of special benefits being paid simply because of past political affiliation, then serious questions of equal protection would have arisen. The reward of the generations that fought for the new democratic dispensation was to achieve the right to stand for office in a new constitutional democracy. It was not a cash bonus for having backed the winning side, to be smuggled in under the guise of affirmative action. Similarly, if there had been an issue of hand-outs given simply on the basis of race, section 9 would clearly have been engaged. In reality, however, Parliament chose none of these paths. It adopted a measure that met objective criteria, served an important remedial governmental objective and was substantially related to the achievement of that objective. The measure promoted equality and was fair. The egalitarian principles of section 9 were upheld and, indeed, advanced by it.

[157] Basing myself heavily on the reasons in the other judgments, but formatting them in a different way, I accordingly agree that the decision of the High Court to invalidate the pension scheme must be set aside, and support the order made by Moseneke J.

JUDGMENT

SKWEYIYA J:

Introduction

[1] This appeal and confirmatory proceedings concern the interpretation and constitutionality of section 2(1), read with section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 (the Act) which, in substance, confers on surviving spouses

the right to claim maintenance from the estates of their deceased spouses if they are not able to support themselves. The first respondent (Mrs Robinson) contends that the survivor of a stable permanent relationship between two persons of the opposite sex who had not been married to each other during their lifetime, but nevertheless lived a life akin to that of husband and wife, should be afforded the same protection that is afforded to the survivor of a marriage under the provisions of section 2(1) of the Act.

[2] The central question for consideration in this matter is whether the protection which the Act affords to a "survivor"[1] should be withheld from survivors of permanent life partnerships. The High Court (Cape Provincial Division) found that the exclusion of the surviving partner of a permanent life partnership from the ambit of the Act was unconstitutional.[2] The present proceedings follow from that order.

Factual background

[3] Mrs Robinson was in a permanent life partnership with the late Mr Shandling, an attorney and senior partner at CK Friedlander Shandling Volks (the law firm), from 1985 until the latter's death in 2001. They were never married and no children were born of their relationship. During the lifetime of the deceased, they had jointly occupied a flat situated in Cape Town on a continuous basis from early 1989 until the deceased's death. She remained in occupation of the flat until the end of December 2002.

[4] The deceased had previously been married to Edith Freedman (Mrs Shandling), in 1950. Three children were born of their marriage, two sons, Martin and Adrian, and a daughter, Lauren. Mrs Shandling passed away on 27 January 1981 due to lung cancer. The couple's children, now majors, have established families of their own in the United States of America.

[5] The description by Mrs Robinson of their relationship is, in broad terms, accepted by the appellant (Mr Volks). She states that to a large extent the deceased had supported her financially. He gave her R5000 per month in order to cover household necessities and would deposit money into her account whenever she needed it. He also provided her with petrol money from the law firm's account and paid for her car maintenance. She was accepted as a dependant on his medical aid scheme from January 2000. During the relationship she worked intermittently as a freelance journalist and artist. This employment brought in some small income which she used on general living expenses, gifts for the deceased and personal expenses. She also worked on a voluntary basis at Fine Music Radio as a newsreader, programme compiler and presenter.

[6] Once a year, the deceased would travel to the United States to visit his three major children and grandchildren and on one occasion she accompanied him.

Whenever there were social functions at the law firm or at the radio station they would accompany each other. They were accepted as a couple and had many mutual friends. The deceased suffered from bi-polar disorder/manic depression, and over the years she had nursed him through illness and taken him to hospital.

[7] In terms of the deceased's will, Mr Volks, a partner in the law firm, was appointed as the executor of the deceased estate. The balance in the estate for distribution to Mrs Robinson, his three children, his domestic worker, and three staff members of the law firm, was R413 665.37. The bequest to Mrs Robinson constituted a Toyota motor vehicle, the contents of the flat which they occupied in Cape Town, other than those items that were chosen by and reserved for his three children, and a sum of R100 000. In terms of the will, Mrs Robinson was entitled to remain in the house for a period not exceeding nine months.

[8] In April 2002 Mrs Robinson sought legal advice from the Women's Legal Centre (the Centre) about her rights to claim maintenance from the deceased estate. After consulting with Mr Volks in his capacity as the executor, the Centre advised her that the residue in the estate was minimal and that she should not pursue her claim. In June 2003 she received a copy of the Final Liquidation and Distribution Account, which reflected a residue of R248 533.87. In accordance with the deceased's will, the residue would devolve upon his three children.

[9] During August 2003 the Centre wrote letters to Mr Volks and to the fourth respondent, the Master of the High Court (the Master), advising them of their client's claim. The appellant's attorneys rejected the claim on the basis that Mrs Robinson was not a "spouse" for the purposes of the Act.[3]

[10] After this response, Mrs Robinson launched a two-part application in the High Court. Part A sought an urgent interdict preventing Mr Volks from winding up and distributing the assets in the estate, pending the determination of the constitutional challenge to the Act, which relief was sought in Part B of the application. The application for the interdict was not opposed and was granted by the High Court.

[11] The application relating to the constitutional challenge was set down for a later date subject to the filing of an amended notice of motion, further papers and heads of argument. The Women's Legal Centre Trust (the Trust) filed an application to intervene in this application. That application was not opposed and the Trust was admitted as the second applicant in the proceedings. Both Mrs Robinson and the Trust relied upon the provisions of section 38 of the Constitution for standing. They

[3] The letter of refusal stated:

> "prima facie it would appear that the deceased and your client considered their position during the lifetime of the deceased and elected not to enter into a marriage in accordance with the laws of South Africa. That election, included implicitly, if not expressly, the choice not to have the automatic consequences of the laws of marriage apply to their relationship. The provisions contained in the Last Will of the deceased dated 24th December 1999 are consistent with that election."

alleged that they were acting in their own interests; on behalf of partners in permanent life partnerships; and in the public interest.[4]

The contentions of the parties in the High Court

[12] In an amended notice of motion, Mrs Robinson and the Trust sought an order declaring that she was the "survivor" of the late Mr Shandling for the purposes of the Act, and therefore entitled to lodge a claim for maintenance under the Act. In the event that it was found that she did not qualify as a "survivor" for the purposes of the Act by virtue of not being "the surviving spouse in a marriage dissolved by death", they sought an order declaring that the exclusion of the survivor of permanent life partnerships from the provisions of the Act was unconstitutional. They contended that this exclusion violated the provisions of sections 9(3)[5] and 10[6] of the Constitution, in that it discriminated unfairly on the ground of marital status, and infringed her right to dignity. In this regard they submitted that the definition of the words "survivor", "spouse" and "marriage" in the Act should include a reference to survivors of permanent life partnerships.

[4] Section 38 of the Constitution confers standing and provides as follows:

> "Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are ─
> (a) anyone acting in their own interest;
> (b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name;
> (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons;
> (d) anyone acting in the public interest; and
> (e) an association acting in the interest of its members."

[5] Section 9 of the Constitution is set out in para 47 below.

[6] Section 10 reads as follows:

> "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[13] In relation to the declaration of invalidity sought, Mr Volks argued that the reading-in of words to the Act was unacceptable. He argued that the entire structure of the Act was premised on the concept of marriage and protects surviving spouses of such a marriage. Thus reading-in, in the form sought, did not deal properly with these provisions, nor did they fit in with the structure of the Act.

[14] Mr Volks argued that in the event that the court found that the Act was inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid, it would not be just and equitable for an order to apply to permanent life partnerships in respect of which the partner had already died. He argued for an order which would only have prospective effect. He argued that a retrospective order would not sufficiently protect the freedom and dignity of the deceased. He also argued that the relief sought by Mrs Robinson and the Trust may affect other legislation like the Administration of Estates Act.[7]

[15] He argued further that Mrs Robinson chose to live with Mr Shandling without entering into a marriage although there was no legal or other impediment to marrying. There was therefore no reason in law or in principle why the laws of marriage should be imposed upon the deceased, his estate, and his heirs. He argued that it would constitute an infringement of the deceased's freedom and dignity to have the consequences of marriage imposed in circumstances where there was a clear choice not to enter into a marriage relationship. As evidence of this choice on the part of the deceased, he referred to a statement that Mr Shandling made to him that "if he were ever single again he would not marry". Mr Volks also relied on the fact that he referred to Mrs Robinson as "my friend" in his will, whereas he referred to his deceased wife, Mrs Shandling, as "my wife".

[16] Mr Volks also contended that Mr Shandling, in terms of his will, had made a choice as to how his assets would be disposed of. He did this with an understanding that the laws of marriage would not apply to his estate. His freedom and dignity would be violated if his choice as to how to dispose of his assets were to be overridden by a court permitting a claim for maintenance against his estate. Indeed his right not to be arbitrarily deprived of property in terms of section 25(1) of the Constitution would be infringed.

[17] In short, he argued that the deceased's freedom and dignity would be violated if his fundamental life choices, not to marry and to dispose of his property as he wanted, were to be overridden by a court permitting a maintenance claim against his estate. He submitted that different considerations may have applied if the deceased had died intestate, but that this was not the case. For these reasons, he urged that even if the Act were thought to involve discrimination, the discrimination was not unfair. Alternatively, the discrimination, if unfair, would be justifiable under section 36(1) of the Constitution.

[18] In response, Mrs Robinson submitted that for all intents and purposes they had lived their lives as a married couple, and that she was at all times prepared to marry Mr Shandling. In any event, she went on to state that the fact that they were not married is not a material consideration which a court should have regard to in determining whether she was entitled to maintenance under the Act. In determining this question she argued for the court to consider the nature of their relationship, and cited the following criteria:

> "a) our commitment to a shared household;
> b) the financial and other dependence between us;
> c) the duration of our relationship;
> d) the roles we played in our relationship in relation to each other."

[19] In reply to the argument on choice in relation to property disposition, she argued that if they were married and he had disinherited her or had left insufficient means for her maintenance, she would have been entitled to claim maintenance under the Act. She also contended that the Act was intended to provide for vulnerable widows or persons in her position where testators did not properly provide for their dependants.

The decision of the High Court

[20] The High Court noted that there are significant differences between a marriage and a permanent life partnership. In this regard the court stated:

> "Apart from the profound religious significance attached to the institution of marriage, there are important definitional differences. For example, upon the > conclusion of a marriage ceremony, the relationship between the two parties has immediate legal significance. In the case of a domestic life partnership, the determination of the nature of the relationship can only take place after a lengthy period of time, only after the lapse of which period, the criteria enunciated above by both Goldblatt [2003 (120) SALJ 610 at 625] and L'Heureux-Dubé J [Nova Scotia (Attorney General) v Walsh 2002 SCC 83 at paras 126-36] can be shown to exist. In this case, the enquiry requires the benefit of evidence which illustrates that the relationship is of a permanent nature, at which stage, it can be concluded that the parties are involved in a domestic life partnership."[8] (references inserted)

[21] Based on the nature of the relationship between Mrs Robinson and the late Mr Shandling, the High Court concluded that it was clear

> "that, well before Mr Shandling's death, a life partnership existed between the two and that they regarded themselves as being involved in a permanent and intimate life partnership."[9]

[22] Adopting the equality test formulated in Harksen v Lane NO and Others,[10] the High Court found that the Act differentiated between married spouses and unmarried cohabitants on the listed ground of marital status and therefore unfair discrimination was presumed. It held that there were no justificatory grounds for the unfair discrimination, and concluded that Mrs Robinson's right to equality had been unfairly eroded.

[23] The High Court stated that it was trite that one of the core commitments of our constitutional society was the recognition of the dignity of difference, which accords respect to the existence of domestic partnerships and those who live in them. The court stated that:

> "If there were clear evidence that parties expressly, by choice, decided to eschew any possible financial benefits which flowed from a marriage and, for this reason (or notwithstanding this position), chose to live within the context of a domestic life partnership, there may be an argument, . . . that a surviving partner such as [Mrs Robinson] could not successfully launch a constitutional challenge to the Act."[11]

The court concluded that, in this case

> "there is little beyond the speculation of [Mr Volks] that a conscious choice was made by [Mr Shandling] and [Mrs Robinson] to live in terms of a relationship in which none of the benefits of marriage now sought were to apply."[12]

[24] Relying on certain factual information in an article by Goldblatt[13] to the effect that for a range of reasons domestic partnerships were a significant part of South African family life, Davis J stated:

> "To ignore the arrangement and impose a particular religious view on their world is to undermine the dignity of difference and to render the guarantee of equality somewhat illusory insofar as a significant percentage of the population is concerned."[14]

He therefore held that the breach of both the rights to equality and dignity could not be justified.

[25] The High Court made an order in the following terms:

> "1. It is declared that: The omission from the definition of 'survivor' in [section] 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 of the words 'and includes the surviving partner of a life partnership' at the end of the existing definition is unconstitutional and invalid.

Proceedings before this Court

[26] At the hearing counsel for Mr Volks informed the Court that they had decided, after consultation with him, to withdraw the appeal and opposition to the confirmation proceeding in so far as this related to the equality challenge. In other words, Mr Volks conceded the correctness of the unconstitutionality of the provision in issue, as found by the High Court. It is unfortunate that the Court was not informed of this before the date of hearing. It is also regrettable that we were not able to hear full argument from any party supporting the constitutionality of the provision. It would also seem that the heirs have not been informed of this decision.

[28] Mrs Robinson and the Trust, in their heads of argument, sought confirmation of the order in its entirety. However, in oral argument counsel indicated that they were of the view that if words were to be read-in, they would require that the Act be extended to cover partners only where there was a reciprocal duty of support present, not dissimilar from the reading-in remedy ordered by this Court in Satchwell.[16]

[29] The third respondent, the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development (the Minister), and the Master had issued a notice of intention to abide the decision of the High Court. Yet, in this Court they submitted heads of argument and made oral submissions challenging the confirmation of the remedy given in the High Court. They argued for judicial restraint in light of the current law reform process being explored in this area by the South African Law Reform Commission (the Commission). They also argued that the order should not be retrospective or, if it were to be, that it should be limited so as to alleviate what may amount to an insurmountable administrative burden on the Master, given that it is the Master's office which is tasked in most instances with the administration, winding up and distribution of deceased estates.

[30] The Centre for Applied Legal Studies (CALS) argued in favour of confirmation. Much of their argument was directed at the vulnerability of women in cohabitation relationships. They also argued for a remedy which would extend the Act to cover polygynous cohabitation relationships, where for instance the male partner was still married during the duration of his cohabitation with another.

Further evidence

[31] CALS seeks to persuade us to accept certain additional evidence aimed largely at demonstrating the vulnerability of women in existing relationships between unmarried cohabitants, and of the fact that few women have the choice about whether they should marry. The admission of additional evidence is regulated by the provisions of rule 31 of the rules of this Court.[17] Subsection 1 provides as follows:

[17] Government Gazette 25643 GN R 1603, 31 October 2003.

> "(1) Any party to any proceedings before the Court and an amicus curiae properly admitted by the Court in any proceedings shall be entitled, in documents lodged with the Registrar in terms of these rules, to canvass factual material that is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and that does not specifically appear on the record: Provided that such facts -
>
> (a) are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible; or
> (b) are of an official, scientific, technical or statistical nature capable of easy verification."

[32] In the case of In Re Certain Amicus Curiae Applications: Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others,[18] the Court considered the predecessor to rule 31[19] and held:

> "That Rule permits a duly admitted amicus 'to canvass factual material which is relevant to the determination of the issues before the Court and which do not specifically appear on the record'. However, this is subject to the condition that such facts 'are common cause or otherwise incontrovertible' or 'are of an official, scientific, technical or statistical nature, capable of easy verification'. This Rule has no application where the facts sought to be canvassed are disputed. A dispute as to the facts may and, if genuine, usually will demonstrate that they are not 'incontrovertible' or 'capable of easy verification'. Where this is so, the material will be inadmissible."[20] (footnote omitted)

[33] The whole of the report tendered by the amicus cannot be considered to consist merely of evidence of a statistical or incontrovertible nature, or which is common cause. It is apparent that the conclusions and solutions offered are not incontrovertible.[21] Furthermore, Mr Volks does not accept that the evidence sought to be introduced is necessarily incontrovertible or uncontroversial. Indeed the report in its own words notes:

> "As is evident from our methodology, our findings are not representative but simply indicate trends which confirm our general assumptions about cohabitation."[22] (my emphasis)

In the executive summary the study was defined as "qualitative primary research amongst poor 'African' and 'Coloured' communities".[23]

[34] Moreover, the entire study consisted of interviews with only 68 people in eight sites. This non-representative sampling, which was not quantitative but qualitative and was conducted in only eight poor communities, cannot be said to be statistical or scientific evidence capable of easy verification, nor can it be said to be incontrovertible. A more representative study might well lead to different conclusions.

[35] The evidence is not directly relevant to the issue before us. That issue is whether the protection afforded to survivors of marriage under section 2(1) of the Act should be extended to the survivors of permanent life partnerships. The admission of the evidence would impermissibly broaden the case before us. It cannot be admitted.

The history and purpose of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990

[36] This Act has its own unique history which is relevant to its goal or object. In Glazer v Glazer, NO[24] the Appellate Division refused to extend the principle applied in Carelse v Estate De Vries,[25] that a father's estate was liable to support his children, to cases of a spouse requiring support to enable her to claim maintenance from her deceased husband's estate.[26]

[37] The Act emanates from the recommendations of the Commission's report: "Review of the Law of Succession: The introduction of a legitimate portion or the granting of a right to maintenance to the surviving spouse" (Project 22), submitted in August 1987. The Commission was of the view that the institution of a legitimate portion would not be the appropriate solution to the problem, and recommended instead that a claim for maintenance be given by operation of the law. It is regrettable that it took as many as three years before the recommendations of the report were given effect to.

[38] In terms of section 2(1) of the Act a surviving spouse will, in so far as he is not able to provide therefor from his own means and earnings, have a claim against the deceased spouse's estate "for the provision of his reasonable maintenance needs until his death or remarriage." "Own means" of the surviving spouse includes

> "any money or property or other financial benefit accruing to the survivor in terms of the matrimonial property law or the law of succession or otherwise at the death of the deceased spouse".[27]

The claim by the surviving spouse will be dealt with in accordance with the Administration of Estates Act.[28]

[39] The purpose of the provision is plain. The challenged law is intended to provide for the reasonable maintenance needs of parties to a marriage that is dissolved by the death of one of them. The aim is to extend an invariable consequence of marriage beyond the death of one of the parties. The legislation is intended to deal with the perceived unfairness arising from the fact that maintenance obligations of parties to a marriage cease upon death. The challenged provision is aimed at eliminating this perceived unfairness and no more. The obligation to maintain that exists during marriage passes to the estate. The provision does not confer a benefit on the parties in the sense of a benefit that either of them would acquire from the state or a third party on the death of the other. It seeks to regulate the consequences of marriage and speaks predominantly to those who wish to be married. It says to them:

[28] Above n 7.

"If you get married your obligation to maintain each other is no longer limited until one of you dies. From now on, the estate of that partner who has the misfortune to predecease the survivor will continue to have maintenance obligations."

Interpretation

[40] Before evaluating the constitutional challenge, it is necessary to interpret the relevant provisions of the Act in the light of its history. Section 2(1) of the Act provides:

> "If a marriage is dissolved by death after the commencement of this Act the survivor shall have a claim against the estate of the deceased spouse for the provision of his reasonable maintenance needs until his death or remarriage in so far as he is not able to provide therefor from his own means and earnings." (my emphasis)

Mrs Robinson and the Trust argued both in the High Court and in this Court that the Act could be interpreted so as to include heterosexual cohabitants. However, for the reasons considered below, I agree with the conclusion of the High Court that the Act is not reasonably capable of being so interpreted.

[41] It is patent from the definition in the Act that, "survivor" means "the surviving spouse in a marriage dissolved by death." It would seem that the only possible meaning for "marriage" when viewed in the context of the Act is one recognised either by the law or by a religion.[29] This is evident both from the use of the words "spouse" and "marriage" dissolved by death.

[29] See in general Daniels v Campbell NO and Others 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC); 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC).

[42] Furthermore, in Satchwell[30] this Court was very definitive in its interpretation of the term "surviving spouse" in the Judges Remuneration and Conditions of Employment Act,[31] and stated:

> "There is no definition of the word 'spouse' in the provisions under attack. In the circumstances the ordinary wording of the provisions must be taken to refer to a party to a marriage that is recognised as valid in law and not beyond that. . . . The context in which 'spouse' is used in the impugned provisions does not suggest a wider meaning, nor do I know of one. Accordingly, a number of relationships are excluded, such as same-sex partnerships and permanent life partnerships between unmarried heterosexual cohabitants."[32] (my emphasis)

[43] In addition, section 2(1) refers to the provision of maintenance until "death or remarriage". This would be illogical if the phrase "surviving spouse" included survivors of permanent life partnerships, who generally may not have been previously married and could therefore not get remarried.

[44] As noted by this Court in the Hyundai[33] case:

> "On the one hand, it is the duty of a judicial officer to interpret legislation in conformity with the Constitution so far as this is reasonably possible. On the other hand, the Legislature is under a duty to pass legislation that is reasonably clear and > precise, enabling citizens and officials to understand what is expected of them. A balance will often have to be struck as to how this tension is to be resolved when considering the constitutionality of legislation. There will be occasions when a judicial officer will find that the legislation, though open to a meaning which would be unconstitutional, is reasonably capable of being read 'in conformity with the Constitution'. Such an interpretation should not, however, be unduly strained."[34] (footnotes omitted)

[45] I find that an interpretation of the Act that would include permanent life partnerships would be "unduly strained" and manifestly inconsistent with the context and structure of the text. The Act is incapable of being interpreted so as to include permanent life partners.

Equality challenge

[46] The basis of the High Court's finding of unconstitutionality is that the Act excludes permanent life partners from its protection and thereby violates the anti-discrimination provision in section 9(3) of the Constitution.

[47] Section 9 provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

[34] Id at para 24.

(3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

(5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[48] In the Harksen[35] case this Court laid out the general approach to equality analysis and said:

"(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of [section] 8(1).[36] Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.

(b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two-stage analysis:

(i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

(ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a > specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation.

> If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of [section] 8(2).[37]
> (c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (section 33 of the interim Constitution)."[38]

[49] The question for determination in this case is whether the exclusion of survivors of permanent life partnerships from the protection of the Act constitutes unfair discrimination. The Act draws a distinction between married people and unmarried people by including only the former. We are not concerned with the exclusion of survivors of gay and lesbian relationships, nor are we concerned with survivors of polygynous relationships.

[50] Although it is arguable whether the distinction or differentiation amounts to discrimination, I am prepared to accept that it amounts to discrimination based on marital status. That being the case, the discrimination is presumed to be unfair in terms of section 9(5) of the Constitution. The question however is whether it is indeed unfair discrimination.

[51] In determining whether discrimination is unfair one must consider the differences between the two groups. Although there is no right to marry and to found a family contained in Chapter 2 of the Constitution marriage as an institution is recognised therein. This is clear from the provisions of section 15(3)(a)(i) of the Constitution.[39] The constitutional recognition of marriage is an important starting point for determining the question presented in this case.

[52] Marriage and family are important social institutions in our society. Marriage has a central and special place, and forms one of the important bases for family life in our society.[40] In this regard O'Regan J notes in Dawood[41] that:

> "Marriage and the family are social institutions of vital importance. Entering into and sustaining a marriage is a matter of intense private significance to the parties to that

[39] Section 15 guarantees the right to freedom of religion, belief and opinion and provides:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief, and opinion.
> (2) Religious observances may be conducted at state or state-aided institutions, provided that:
> (a) those observances follow rules made by the appropriate public authorities;
> (b) they are conducted on an equitable basis; and > (c) attendance at them is free and voluntary.
> (3) (a) This section does not prevent legislation recognising ─
> (i) marriages concluded under any tradition, or a system of religious, personal or family law; or > marriage for they make a promise to one another to establish and maintain an intimate relationship for the rest of their lives which they acknowledge obliges them to support one another, to live together and to be faithful to one another. Such relationships are of profound significance to the individuals concerned. But such relationships have more than personal significance, at least in part because human beings are social beings whose humanity is expressed through their relationships with others. Entering into marriage therefore is to enter into a relationship that has public significance as well.
> (ii) systems of personal and family law under any tradition, or adhered to by persons professing a particular religion.

> The institutions of marriage and the family are important social institutions that provide for the security, support and companionship of members of our society and bear an important role in the rearing of children. The celebration of a marriage gives rise to moral and legal obligations, particularly the reciprocal duty of support placed upon spouses and their joint responsibility for supporting and raising children born of the marriage. These legal obligations perform an important social function. This importance is symbolically acknowledged in part by the fact that marriage is celebrated generally in a public ceremony, often before family and close friends."[42]

[42] Id at paras 30-1.

[43] The concept of marriage as a civil right has been advanced by some American courts in a variety of circumstances, for example, Skinner v. Oklahoma 316 US 535, 541 (1942); Perez v. Lippold 198 P.2d 17, 20-1 (1948). See also Loving v. Virginia 388 US 1 (1967), where Chief Justice Warren speaking for the majority of the Supreme Court included language describing marriage as one of the basic civil rights of man.

See further Noonan, who in "The Family and the Supreme Court" (1973) 23 Catholic University Law Review 255 at 273 comments as follows on the Loving v. Virginia case:

> "The vital personal right recognized by Loving v. Virginia is not the right to a piece of paper issued by a city clerk. It is not the right to exchange magical words before an agent authorized by the state. It is the right to be immune to the legal disabilities of the unmarried and to acquire the legal benefits accorded to the married. Lawful marriage in the society's hierarchy of values recognized by Boddie v. Connecticut and in the host of laws yet unchallenged – the tax law, the common law of property, the law of evidence – is a constellation of these immunities and privileges. To say that legal immunities and legal benefits may not depend upon marriage is to deny the vital right. To say that Equal Protection requires the equal treatment of the married and the unmarried in all respects is to deny the hierarchy of values of our society."

In addition, Article 23(2) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights provides that "[t]he right of men and women of marriageable age to marry and to found a family shall be recognised"; and Article 18 of the African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights provides that "[t]he family shall be the natural unit and basis of society. It shall be protected by the State which shall take care of its physical health and moral."

[54] From this recognition, it follows that the law may distinguish between married people and unmarried people. Indeed, this Court in Fraser[44] noted:

> "In the context of certain laws there would often be some historical and logical justification for discriminating between married and unmarried persons and the protection of the institution of marriage is a legitimate area for the law to concern itself with."[45]

The law may in appropriate circumstances accord benefits to married people which it does not accord to unmarried people.

[55] Mrs Robinson never married the late Mr Shandling. There is a fundamental difference between her position and spouses or survivors who are predeceased by their husbands. Her relationship with Mr Shandling is one in which each was free to continue or not, and from which each was free to withdraw at will, without obligation and without legal or other formalities. There are a wide range of legal privileges and obligations that are triggered by the contract of marriage. In a marriage the spouses' rights are largely fixed by law and not by agreement, unlike in the case of parties who cohabit without being married.

[56] The distinction between married and unmarried people cannot be said to be unfair when considered in the larger context of the rights and obligations uniquely attached to marriage. Whilst there is a reciprocal duty of support between married persons, no duty of support arises by operation of law in the case of unmarried cohabitants. The maintenance benefit in section 2(1) of the Act falls within the scope of the maintenance support obligation attached to marriage. The Act applies to persons in respect of whom the deceased person (spouse) would have remained legally liable for maintenance, by operation of law, had he or she not died.

[44] Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, and Others 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC); 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC).

[45] Id at para 26.

[57] It must be borne in mind that the legislature, by enacting the law, in fact qualified the right to freedom of testation. It said that freedom of testation would be limited to the extent that where marriage obliged the parties to it to maintain each other, freedom of testation ought not to result in the termination of the obligation upon death. The question we have to answer is whether it was unfair for the legislature not to qualify freedom of testation further, by creating a posthumous duty to maintain on cohabitants.

[58] In his judgment Sachs J envisages two categories of people within this broad class of unmarried cohabitants against whom the disputed law is unfairly discriminatory.[46] The first category is the people who by written instrument or by necessary implication agree to live together, to maintain each other and to give each other support of every kind. It is contended that for the law not to oblige survivors of relationships in this category to be maintained entails unfair discrimination against the survivor simply because the survivor does not have the piece of paper which is the marriage certificate.[47] That is an over-simplification. Marriage is not merely a piece of paper. Couples who choose to marry enter the agreement fully cognisant of the legal obligations which arise by operation of law upon the conclusion of the marriage. These obligations arise as soon as the marriage is concluded, without the need for any further agreement. They include obligations that extend beyond the termination of marriage and even after death. To the extent that any obligations arise between cohabitants during the subsistence of their relationship, these arise by agreement and only to the extent of that agreement. The Constitution does not require the imposition of an obligation on the estate of a deceased person, in circumstances where the law attaches no such obligation during the deceased's lifetime, and there is no intention on the part of the deceased to undertake such an obligation.

[59] The second category referred to by Sachs J is the relationship in which the deceased male partner refused to marry the woman who cared for him, put everything into the relationship and gave her heart and soul to it, bringing up a number of children born of the relationship between them in the process.[48] I have sympathy for surviving partners who fall within this category. The conduct of the male partner is unconscionable in these cases. There is a strong argument that partners ought to be obliged to maintain each other during their lifetime in certain circumstances.

[60] I conclude that it is not unfair to make a distinction between survivors of a marriage on the one hand, and survivors of a heterosexual cohabitation relationship on the other. In the context of the provision for maintenance of the survivor of a marriage by the estate of the deceased, it is entirely appropriate not to impose a duty upon the estate where none arose by operation of law during the lifetime of the deceased. Such an imposition would be incongruous, unfair, irrational and untenable.

The right to dignity

[61] It was also contended that the failure to make provision for the people in the class to which Mrs Robinson belongs offends the dignity of members of that class. Section 10 of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[62] I do not agree that the right to dignity has been infringed. Mrs Robinson is not being told that her dignity is worth less than that of someone who is married. She is simply told that there is a fundamental difference between her relationship and a marriage relationship in relation to maintenance. It is that people in a marriage are obliged to maintain each other by operation of law and without further agreement or formalities. People in the class of relationships to which she belongs are not in that position. In the circumstances, it is not appropriate that an obligation that did not exist before death be posthumously imposed.

Vulnerability and economic dependence

[63] Structural dependence of women in marriage and in relationships of heterosexual unmarried couples is a reality in our country and in other countries.[49] Many women become economically dependent on men and are left destitute and suffer hardships on the death of their male partners.

[64] Much of the argument and many of the passages of the judgment of Sachs J express concern for the plight of vulnerable women in cohabitation relationships. This concern arises because women remain generally less powerful in these relationships. They often wish to be married, but the nature of the power relations within the relationship makes a translation of that wish into reality difficult. This is because the more powerful participants in the relationship would not agree to be bound by marriage. The consequences are that women are taken advantage of and the essential contributions by women to a joint household through labour and emotional support is not compensated for.

> "The position of women in society today is closely related to their role within the family. An understanding of woman's oppression accordingly requires a description and analysis of the position of women in today's privatised family. As Mary McIntosh rightly has observed, 'ultimately the very construction of men and women as separate and opposed categories takes place within, and in terms of, the family'. Women are expected to be dependent on men. Their role is geared to the household. They are responsible for child care, as well as for the care of the aged and handicapped. Their domestic labour is seen as non-productive, not real work. Women, particularly married women, have to be housewives: if they do not carry out the service roles depicted here they are 'bad' housewives, but housewives nevertheless. Furthermore, as Kate Millett noted, 'sex role is sex rank'. 'As long as woman's place is defined as separate, a male-dominated society will define her place as inferior'." (footnotes omitted)

[65] I agree that the women in this category suffer considerably. But it is not the under-inclusiveness of section 2(1) which is the cause of their misery. The plight of a woman who is the survivor in a cohabitation relationship is the result of the absence of any law that places rights and obligations on people who are partners within relationships of this kind during their lifetimes. I accept that laws aimed at regulating these relationships in order to ensure that a vulnerable partner within the relationship is not unfairly taken advantage of are appropriate.

[66] In the case of the very poor and the illiterate the effects of vulnerability are more pronounced. The vulnerability of this group of women is, in my view, part of a broader societal reality that must be corrected through the empowerment of women and social policies by the legislature. It is a widespread problem that needs more than just implementation of what, in their case, would be no more than palliative measures. It needs more than the extension of benefits under section 2(1) to survivors who are predeceased by their partners. Unfortunately the reality is that maintenance claims in a poverty situation are unlikely to alleviate vulnerability in any meaningful way.

[67] Both dissenting judgments make it plain that there are many ways in which these relationships can be regulated. It is not for us to decide how this should be done. In any event, this case is not concerned with the provision that should be made to ensure that partners in relationships other than marriage treat each other fairly during their lifetime. That does not mean, however, that fairness in the case of people who are married will be the same as fairness between parties to a permanent life partnership. It is up to the legislature to make provision for this.

[68] As I have already said, it is not unfair not to impose a duty upon the estate of a deceased where no duty of that kind arose by operation of law during the lifetime of that person. I have a genuine concern for vulnerable women who cannot marry despite the fact that they wish to and who become the victims of cohabitation relationships. I do not think however that their cause is truly assisted by an extension of section 2(1) of the Act or that vulnerable women would be unfairly discriminated against if this were not done. The answer lies in legal provisions that will make a real difference to vulnerable women at a time when both partners to the relationship are still alive. Once provision is made for this, the legal context in which section 2(1) falls to be evaluated will change drastically.

Costs

[69] Neither Mr Volks nor Mrs Robinson and the Trust sought costs in this Court. However, Mrs Robinson and the Trust argued that the Minister and the Master, who had originally abided the decision of the High Court, but who at a very late stage sought to tender evidence and argument in this Court, should be ordered to pay the costs of the appellant on a punitive scale. They argued that the effect of their late intervention would have caused additional costs to Mr Volks which would inevitably be drawn from the estate. However, Mr Volks abides the decision of this Court in regard to this latter issue and does not seek a costs order against the Minister and the Master. There can be no doubt that it is regrettable that they did not intervene in the proceedings earlier. However, no postponement was occasioned by their late intervention, and generally it is helpful to the Court for the state's attitude to constitutional challenges to legislation to be before it. Although the desirability of having that information before the Court cannot excuse non-compliance with its rules, I am of the view that in this case it would be inappropriate to make the costs order sought by Mrs Robinson and the Trust against the Minister and the Master. In the circumstances, I conclude that no order should be made as to costs in this matter.

Order

[70] I make the following order:

(a) The order of the High Court declaring section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 inconsistent with the Constitution is not confirmed.

(b) The appeal is upheld.

Chaskalson CJ, Langa DCJ, Moseneke J, Ngcobo J, Van der Westhuizen J and Yacoob J concur in the judgment of Skweyiya J.

NGCOBO J:

[71] Section 2(1) read with section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990 (the Act), confers on surviving spouses the right to claim maintenance from the estates of their deceased spouses if they are unable to support themselves. The question presented in this case is whether this right should also be conferred upon survivors of permanent life partnerships between two persons of the opposite sex who were not married to each other but nevertheless lived a life that was akin to that of husband and wife. The High Court (Cape of Good Hope Division) took the view that it should. It therefore concluded that the exclusion of survivors of such partnerships from the protection of the Act is unconstitutional. The present proceedings are a sequel.

[72] Mrs Robinson, the first respondent, is a survivor of a permanent life partnership. Her deceased partner is Mr Shandling, who was a senior partner at a Cape Town law firm. Mrs Robinson took the view that survivors of such a relationship are entitled to the protection afforded to surviving spouses by the Act. She lodged a claim for maintenance under the Act against the estate of the deceased. The executor of the estate of the deceased, the appellant, rejected the claim, taking the view that such survivors do not fall within the ambit of the protection afforded by the Act. The rejection of the claim prompted, amongst other things, a constitutional challenge directed at the provisions of the Act.

[73] The High Court found that the provisions of the Act are incapable of being construed in a manner that would bring survivors of permanent life partnerships within the ambit of the Act. The problem, the High Court appears to have found, lay in the definition of the word "survivor" in section 1 of the Act, which did not include persons involved in permanent life partnerships. This exclusion, the court found, unfairly discriminated against survivors of permanent life partnerships on the basis of marital status. It therefore concluded that section 2(1) read with the definition of "survivor" in section 1 of the Act is unconstitutional in that it contravenes sections 9 and 10 of the Constitution. It is this conclusion that is now in issue before this Court.

[74] Section 9 of the Constitution provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.
> (3) The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.
> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

And section 10 of the Constitution provides: "Everyone has inherent dignity and the right to have their dignity respected and protected."

[75] That the Act differentiates between survivors of marriages and survivors of permanent life partnerships is patent. The provisions of the Act are aimed at providing maintenance and support for survivors of marriages. The legitimacy of this governmental purpose cannot be gainsaid. Nor can it be doubted that the differentiation that the Act makes is rationally connected to that purpose. The next question is whether the differentiation between survivors of marriages and survivors of permanent life partnerships constitutes unfair discrimination.

[76] For the purposes of this judgment, I am prepared to accept that the differentiation involved here constitutes discrimination. The differentiation is on the ground of marital status, a ground listed in subsection 9(3) of the Constitution. That being the case, the discrimination is presumed to be unfair under subsection 9(5). The ultimate question for determination therefore is whether the provisions of section 2(1) read with section 1 of the Act do in fact discriminate unfairly against survivors of permanent life partnerships.

[77] The proper approach to the equality analysis is that set out in the President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo[1] and Harksen v Lane NO and Others[2] cases.

[78] The nature of unfairness contemplated by the provisions of section 9 of the Constitution has been considered by this Court, albeit in the context of section 8 of the interim Constitution, the predecessor to section 9. In the Hugo case, this Court held that:

> "The prohibition on unfair discrimination in the interim Constitution seeks not only to avoid discrimination against people who are members of disadvantaged groups. It seeks more than that. At the heart of the prohibition of unfair discrimination lies a recognition that the purpose of our new constitutional and democratic order is the establishment of a society in which all human beings will be accorded equal dignity and respect regardless of their membership of particular groups."[3]

[79] Dignity is an underlying consideration in the determination of unfairness. Thus in the Harksen case, this Court held that "[t]he prohibition of unfair discrimination in the Constitution provides a bulwark against invasions which impair human dignity or which affect people adversely in a comparably serious manner."[4] While legislation may make distinctions, those "distinctions that treat certain people as second-class citizens, that demean them, that treat them as less capable for no good reason, or that otherwise offend fundamental human dignity"[5] cannot be tolerated. In the final analysis, it is the impact of discrimination on the survivors of permanent life partnerships that is the determining factor regarding the unfairness of the discrimination in this case.[6]

[80] The starting point in determining the fairness or otherwise of the discrimination involved in this case is the Constitution itself. Although our Constitution contains no express provision protecting the institution of marriage, it nevertheless recognises the right freely to marry and to raise a family. In Dawood and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Thomas and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others, this Court commented as follows on the absence of an express provision protecting the right to family life or the right of spouses to cohabit:

> "The omission of such a right from the Constitution was challenged during the first certification proceedings on the basis that such a right constituted a 'universally accepted fundamental right' which in terms of Constitutional Principle II had to be entrenched in the Constitution. The Court observed from its survey of international instruments that States are obliged in terms of international human rights law to protect the rights of persons freely to marry and raise a family. However, it also observed that these obligations are achieved in a great variety of ways in different human rights instruments.
> The Court therefore concluded that the new constitutional text, although it contained no express clause protecting the right to family life, nevertheless met the obligations imposed by international human rights law to protect the rights of persons freely to marry and to raise a family."[7] (footnotes omitted)

[81] There can be no doubt that our Constitution recognises the institution of marriage. This much is apparent from section 15(3)(a)(i) of the Constitution which in substance makes provision for the recognition of "marriages concluded under any tradition, or a system of religious, personal or family law." This Court too has recognised the importance of marriage as an institution. One need only refer to the Dawood case, where this Court said the following concerning the institution of marriage:

> "Marriage and the family are social institutions of vital importance. Entering into and sustaining a marriage is a matter of intense private significance to the parties to that marriage for they make a promise to one another to establish and maintain an intimate relationship for the rest of their lives which they acknowledge obliges them to support one another, to live together and to be faithful to one another. Such relationships are of profound significance to the individuals concerned. But such relationships have more than personal significance, at least in part because human beings are social beings whose humanity is expressed through their relationships with others. Entering into marriage therefore is to enter into a relationship that has public significance as well.
> The institutions of marriage and the family are important social institutions that provide for the security, support and companionship of members of our society and bear an important role in the rearing of children. The celebration of a marriage gives rise to moral and legal obligations, particularly the reciprocal duty of support placed upon spouses and their joint responsibility for supporting and raising children born of the marriage. These legal obligations perform an important social function. This importance is symbolically acknowledged in part by the fact that marriage is celebrated generally in a public ceremony, often before family and close friends."[8] (footnotes omitted)

[8] Dawood id at paras 30-1.

[82] The constitutional recognition of the right freely to marry and the institution of marriage is consistent with the obligations imposed on our country by international and regional human rights instruments which impose obligations upon states to respect and protect marriage. The African [Banjul] Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights, 1981[9] recognises the importance of marriage and the family. Article 18(1) provides that the "family shall be the natural unit and basis of society." The relevant part of article 18 provides that:

> "1. The family shall be the natural unit and basis of society. It shall be protected by the State which shall take care of its physical and moral health.
> 2. The State shall have the duty to assist the family which is the custodian of morals and traditional values recognized by the community."[10]

[83] Under article 23(4) of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 1966 (ICCPR),[11] States Parties are required to "take appropriate steps to ensure equality of rights and responsibilities of spouses as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution." Article 23 of the ICCPR provides that:

> "1. The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State.

[9] Adopted on 27 June 1981 by the Eighteenth Assembly of the Heads of State and Government of the Organization of African Unity and entered into force on 21 October 1986.

[10] The importance of the family in the context of the African Charter is also apparent from the duties which individuals have under the Charter. These duties appear, for example, in article 27(1) which provides that "[e]very individual shall have duties towards his family and society . . . ."; and article 29(1) which provides that "[t]he individual shall also have the duty [t]o preserve the harmonious development of the family and to work for the cohesion and respect of the family; to respect his parents at all times, to maintain them in case of need".

[11] Adopted by General Assembly resolution 2200A (XX1) of 16 December 1966 and entered into force on 23 March 1976.

2. The right of men and women of marriageable age to marry and to found a family shall be recognized.
3. No marriage shall be entered into without the free and full consent of the intending spouses.
4. States Parties to the present Covenant shall take appropriate steps to ensure equality of rights and responsibilities of spouses as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution. In the case of dissolution, provision shall be made for the necessary protection of any children."

[84] So too does article 16 of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, 1948[12] provide that:

"(1) Men and women of full age, without any limitation due to race, nationality or religion, have the right to marry and to found a family. They are entitled to equal rights as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution.
(2) Marriage shall be entered into only with the free and full consent of the intending spouses.
(3) The family is the natural and fundamental group unit of society and is entitled to protection by society and the State."

[85] These regional and international instruments underscore the importance of marriage as an institution and the right freely to marry. They underscore the duty of states like ours, which are signatories to these instruments, to "take appropriate steps to ensure equality of rights and responsibilities of spouses as to marriage, during marriage and at its dissolution."[13] Therefore, both the Constitution and international instruments impose an obligation on our country to protect the institution of marriage.

[12] Adopted and proclaimed by General Assembly resolution 217A (III) of 10 December 1948.

[13] Article 23(4) of the ICCPR. The emphasis is mine.

[86] It seems to me to follow from this recognition of the institution of marriage that the law may, in appropriate circumstances, distinguish between married people and unmarried people. This much was recognised by this Court in Fraser v Children's Court, Pretoria North, and Others,[14] where the Court observed:

[87] Once it is accepted that marriage is a constitutionally recognised institution in our constitutional democracy, it follows that the law may legitimately afford protection to marriage. And in appropriate circumstances the law may afford protection to married people which it does not accord to unmarried people. This seems to me to be the logical consequence of the recognition of the institution of marriage. But there are other considerations that are relevant to the determination of the fairness or otherwise of the discrimination involved in this case.

[88] One of the factors that is relevant to the determination of unfairness is the purpose sought to be achieved by the impugned provisions. The purpose of the provisions of the Act is manifestly not directed at impairing the dignity of the survivors of permanent life partnerships. It is primarily directed at ensuring that surviving spouses who are in need of maintenance and who are unable to support themselves, do get maintenance. One of the invariable consequences of marriage is a reciprocal duty of support. During the subsistence of the marriage, the deceased spouse is under a duty to support and maintain the surviving spouse. What the provisions of the Act merely do is to ensure that this duty continues after the death of one of the spouses. It does this by transferring this duty to the estate of a deceased spouse.

[14] 1997 (2) SA 261 (CC); 1997 (2) BCLR 153 (CC).

[89] It is not without significance that indigenous law, which is part of our law, also protects widows. Under indigenous law, the duty to maintain and support the widow survives the death of the husband. Thus upon the death of a husband, the duty to maintain and support the widow falls upon indlalifa. This duty remains with indlalifa regardless of whether the deceased husband left enough assets from which to maintain and support the widow. Recently, I had occasion to observe that:

> "The perpetuation and preservation of the family unit and succession to the position and status of the deceased therefore lie at the heart of succession in indigenous law. Like his predecessor, indlalifa becomes the nominal owner of the family property, and is required to administer it on behalf of and for the benefit of the family. Indlalifa acquires the duty to maintain and support the widow and minor children. In dealing with family property, indlalifa has to consult the widow who had the right to restrain him from dissipating family assets. When there are insufficient assets to maintain the family, indlalifa had to use his own resources to provide maintenance."[16] (footnotes omitted)

[90] It is therefore plain that the impact of the provisions of the Act on surviving spouses is to protect their right to receive maintenance and support from the deceased spouse by transferring the duty to support and maintain onto the estate of a deceased spouse. It is true that surviving partners of permanent life partnerships are not afforded this protection. But, although this may constitute a disadvantage, it does not take away the right of a surviving partner of a permanent life partnership from receiving a sum of money from the estate of a deceased partner. Indeed, the provisions of the Act do not prevent partners in a permanent life partnership from leaving sums of money to each other in their respective wills, which can be used for maintenance. We know for example that the deceased in this case left Mrs Robinson a sum of money in his will.

[91] There is a further consideration that is equally relevant. The law places no legal impediment to heterosexual couples involved in permanent life partnerships from getting married. All that the law does is to put in place a legal regime that regulates the rights and obligations of those heterosexual couples who have chosen marriage as their preferred institution to govern their intimate relationship. Their entitlement to protection under the Act, therefore, depends on their decision whether to marry or not. The decision to enter into a marriage relationship and to sustain such a relationship signifies a willingness to accept the moral and legal obligations, in particular, the reciprocal duty of support placed upon spouses and other invariable consequences of a marriage relationship. This would include the acceptance that the duty to support survives the death of one of the spouses.

[92] The Act does not say who may enter into a marriage relationship. The Act simply attaches certain legal consequences to people who choose marriage as their contract. There is a choice at the entry level. The law expects those heterosexual couples who desire the consequences ascribed to this type of relationship to signify their acceptance of those consequences by entering into a marriage relationship. Those who do not wish such consequences to flow from their relationship remain free to enter into some other form of relationship and decide what consequences should flow from their relationships.

[93] The other consideration is that marriage is a matter of choice. Marriage is a manifestation of that choice and more importantly, the acceptance of the consequences of a marriage. It is more than a piece of paper. As this Court observed in the Dawood case:

> "The celebration of a marriage gives rise to moral and legal obligations, particularly the reciprocal duty of support placed upon spouses and their joint responsibility for supporting and raising children born of the marriage. These legal obligations perform an important social function. This importance is symbolically acknowledged in part by the fact that marriage is celebrated generally in a public ceremony, often before family and close friends."[17]

[94] People involved in a relationship may choose not to marry for a whole variety of reasons, including the fact that they do not wish the legal consequences of a marriage to follow from their relationship. It is also true that they may not marry because one of the parties does not want to get married. Should the law then step in and impose the legal consequences of marriage in these circumstances? To do so in my view would undermine the right freely to marry and the nature of the agreement inherent in a marriage. Indeed it would amount to the imposition of the will of one party upon the other. This is equally unacceptable.

[95] Another consideration that is relevant is the difficulty of establishing the existence of a permanent life partnership. The point at which such partnerships come into existence is not determinable in advance. In addition, the consequences of such partnerships are determined by agreement between the parties. Unless these have been expressly agreed upon, they have to be inferred from the conduct of the parties. What happens at the dissolution of such partnerships is far from clear. All of this points to the need to regulate permanent life partnerships. This does not mean that a law designed to regulate marriages is unconstitutional simply because it does not regulate permanent life partnerships.

[96] The provisions of the Act may have denied the surviving partners of permanent life partnerships the protection it affords to surviving spouses, but it cannot be said that it fundamentally impairs their rights of dignity or sense of equal worth. The impact of the discrimination upon the surviving partners is, therefore, in all the circumstances not unfair. It follows that the provisions of the Act are not inconsistent with sections 9 and 10 of the Constitution. In the event, the order of invalidity made by the High Court cannot be confirmed.

[97] For these reasons I concur in the order proposed in the judgment of Skweyiya J.

Chaskalson CJ, Langa DCJ, Moseneke J, Van der Westhuizen J and Yacoob J concur in the judgment of Ngcobo J.

MOKGORO AND O'REGAN JJ:

[98] We have had the opportunity of reading the judgments in this matter prepared by Skweyiya J and Sachs J. We are unable to agree with the order proposed by Skweyiya J. We agree with the conclusion reached by Sachs J but for different reasons which we set out in this judgment.

[99] The crisp constitutional issue we have to decide is whether section 2(1) of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990 (the Act) read with the definition of "survivor" in section 1 of that Act constitutes unfair discrimination and is inconsistent with the Constitution as found by the Cape High Court (the High Court).[1] Section 2(1) provides that:

[1] Robinson and Another v Volks NO and Others 2004 (6) SA 288 (C); 2004 (6) BCLR 671 (C).

> "If a marriage is dissolved by death after the commencement of this Act the survivor shall have a claim against the estate of the deceased spouse for the provision of his reasonable maintenance needs until his death or remarriage in so far as he is not able to provide therefor from his own means and earnings."

The word "survivor" is defined in section 1 of the Act as "the surviving spouse in a marriage dissolved by death". The High Court found that this narrow definition of "survivor" rendered the provision discriminatory to the extent that it did not afford a maintenance claim to the surviving partner of a permanent life partnership. The High Court accordingly made an order reading in the following words to the definition of survivor in section 1 – "and includes the surviving partner of a life partnership" as well as two further orders reading in definitions of "spouse" and "marriage".[2] We must decide whether to confirm that order.

[2] The order made by the High Court read as follows:

> "1. It is declared that: the omission from the definition of 'survivor' in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 of the words 'and includes the surviving partner of a life partnership' at the end of the existing definition is unconstitutional and invalid.
>
> 2. The definition of 'survivor' in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990, is to be read as if it included the following words after the words 'dissolved by death';
> 'and includes the surviving partner of a life partnership'.
> 3. The omission from the definition in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 of the following, at the end of the existing definitions, is unconstitutional and invalid:
> '"Spouse" for the purposes of this Act shall include a person in a permanent life partnership';
> '"Marriage" for the purposes of this Act shall include a permanent life partnership'.
> 4. Section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act 27 of 1990 is to be read as though it included the following at the end of the existing definition;
> '"Spouse" for the purposes of this Act shall include a person in a permanent life partnership';
> '"Marriage" for the purposes of this Act shall include a permanent life partnership'.
> 5. The order in paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 above shall have no effect on the validity of any acts performed in respect of the administration of a deceased estate that has finally been wound up by the date of this order."

[100] The facts of the case have been set out in the judgments of both Skweyiya J and Sachs J. To recap in brief, Mrs Robinson and Mr Shandling (the deceased), who had both been previously married, formed a relationship in which they lived together from 1985 until his death in November 2001. The relationship thus lasted sixteen years. They did not marry although there was no legal impediment to marriage. For the last twelve years of Mr Shandling's life, they lived in a flat owned by a Shandling family trust. Their relationship was monogamous and Mrs Robinson characterised the relationship as a "permanent life or domestic partnership". The applicant in this Court, Mr Volks, the executor of Mr Shandling's deceased estate (the executor) did not dispute the characterisation of the relationship as a "permanent life partnership".

[101] In his will, Mr Shandling referred to Mrs Robinson as his "friend". He also mentioned his former wife whom he referred to as "my wife Edith Rose". He bequeathed certain of his assets, totalling approximately one third of his estate, to Mrs Robinson. The residue of his estate was left to his three children in different proportions. In addition to the bequests made in her favour, Mrs Robinson applied to the executor for her to be treated as a surviving spouse for the purposes of section 2(1) of the Act, which would entitle her to maintenance. That application was refused by the executor on the grounds that she did not fall within the terms of section 2(1) as she had not been married to Mr Shandling.

[102] Mr Shandling was a senior partner in a firm of attorneys in Cape Town while Mrs Robinson worked intermittently as a freelance journalist and artist. Mrs

Robinson averred that Mr Shandling supported her financially during the subsistence of their relationship and paid all household expenses. Mrs Robinson was also added as a dependant to Mr Shandling's medical aid from 2000.

[103] Mrs Robinson states that Mr Shandling had been diagnosed as suffering from bi-polar disorder before their relationship commenced and that she nursed him through the mood swings that are characteristic of this disorder. She also nursed him in his final illness. It is quite clear from the evidence given by Mrs Robinson, and not disputed by the executor, that Mr Shandling and Mrs Robinson lived together for sixteen years, supporting one another both financially and emotionally and that both considered the relationship to be a permanent one. The High Court found on the facts that Mr Shandling and Mrs Robinson had entered into a permanent and intimate life partnership.

[104] In deciding whether this finding is correct, we consider the following factors to be determinative in this case: the length of the period of cohabitation which was sixteen years, the fact that Mr Shandling paid Mrs Robinson an allowance to cover household expenses and was generally responsible for the payment of all the costs of running the household, the fact that Mr Shandling had declared Mrs Robinson to be his dependant for the purposes of medical aid, the undisputed close and intimate relationship between them, and the fact that Mrs Robinson nursed Mr Shandling through bouts of ill-health. In our view, these facts make it plain that both Mr Shandling and Mrs Robinson considered themselves to constitute a permanent life partnership in which they undertook duties of mutual support and care for one another. It is also clear, however, that they chose not to marry. We must assume that it was Mr Shandling who chose not to marry as Mrs Robinson says that she was at all times willing to be married. We cannot ascertain Mr Shandling's reasons for not marrying from the affidavits before us. In our view, however, the fact that they did not marry does not mean that they had not established a permanent life partnership.

[105] Section 9(3) of our Constitution prohibits discrimination on the grounds of marital status. It provides:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[106] The institution of marriage is an important social institution which has extensive legal consequences under the two legal regimes which regulate marriage in South Africa, the common law and African customary law. The social importance of marriage has been recognised by this Court in several cases. In Dawood and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Shalabi and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others; Thomas and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Others,[3] for example, this Court held:

> "The institutions of marriage and the family are important social institutions that provide for the security, support and companionship of members of our society and bear an important role in the rearing of children. The celebration of a marriage gives rise to moral and legal obligations, particularly the reciprocal duty of support placed upon spouses and their joint responsibility for supporting and raising children born of the marriage. These legal obligations perform an important social function. This importance is symbolically acknowledged in part by the fact that marriage is celebrated generally in a public ceremony, often before family and close friends."[4]

The celebration of a marriage thus confers extensive legal duties and rights upon the parties to the marriage as a matter of law. As a matter of social relations, it often results in the founding of a family which provides essential human companionship, mutual support and security to the members of that family. However, not every family is founded on a marriage recognised as such in law. Yet members of such families often play the same roles as in families which are founded on marriage and provide companionship, support and security to one another.

[107] The law has tended to privilege those families which are founded on marriages recognised by the common law. Historically, marriages solemnised according to the principles of African customary law were not afforded recognition equal to the recognition afforded to common law marriages,[5] though this has begun to change.[6]

[5] Marriages in terms of African customary law were referred to as "black customary unions" in section 35 of the Black Administration Act, 38 of 1927 and were not recognised as legal marriages. Accordingly, a widow of a customary marriage was held not to have a claim in delict for the loss of support caused by the death of her husband. See Suid-Afrikaanse Nasionale Trust en Assuransie Maatskappy Bpk v Fondo 1960 (2) SA 467 (A). The position was different in customary law, see Vakubi Ngqongqozi and Another v Noselem Nyalambisa and Others 4 NAC 32 (1919). See the comment by Dlamini "Claim By Widow of Customary Union for Loss of Support" (1984) 101 SA Law Journal 34.

Similarly, marriages solemnised in accordance with the principles of Islam or Hinduism were also not recognised as lawful marriages[7] though this too is now altering.[8] The prohibition of discrimination on the ground of marital status was adopted in the light of our history in which only certain marriages were recognised as deserving of legal regulation and protection. It is thus a constitutional prescript that families that are established outside of civilly recognised marriages should not be subjected to unfair discrimination.

[108] Where relationships which are socially and functionally similar to marriage are not regulated in the same way as marriage, discrimination on the grounds of marital status will arise. In this case, we have concluded that the cohabitation relationship of Mrs Robinson and Mr Shandling was a relationship that constituted a permanent life partnership in which the parties had undertaken mutually to support one another, both financially and otherwise. We concluded, therefore, that their relationship was socially and functionally similar to marriage. To the extent that the law regulates its consequences differently from that of marriage, the law will be prima facie discriminatory. The question that then arises is whether that discrimination is unfair. In each case where it is shown that a relationship that is socially and functionally similar to marriage is treated differently from marriage, a careful contextual analysis will be necessary to determine whether the discrimination is indeed unfair.

[109] It will be helpful to start by considering the legal rules governing marriage. Before we do so, however, it is important to note that the rules governing marriage both under common law and under African customary law have been the subject of intense debate in the last few decades. The focus of that debate has been a realisation that many of the rules of marriage in both systems were discriminatory on the grounds of gender and sex. Some of the rules were expressly and obviously discriminatory, such as the rule of common law which provided that a woman married in community of property had limited contractual capacity and that her husband, the bearer of the marital power, was entitled to manage their common estate on his own without referring to her at all.[9] Or the rule of customary law which provided that women may ordinarily not inherit property.[10]

[110] Other rules regulating marriage were discriminatory against women, not expressly, but in effect. In particular these rules often failed to acknowledge the division of labour within the household, in terms of which women bore primary and often sole responsibility for the maintenance of the household and caring for children and elderly members of the family. The responsibilities so often borne by women across all South African communities, whether wealthy or poor, and regardless of colour, meant that women were less likely to be able to participate in the labour market as successfully as men. (Indeed practices in the labour market as well were often discriminatory, further hampering women's ability to participate.) The effect of the unequal division of labour in the household, and discriminatory practices in the labour market, meant that at the termination of a marriage, whether by death or divorce, women were often more materially vulnerable than men. This was caused by the fact that during the marriage women were often less able than men to accumulate property, and were also less able to compete in the labour market.

[111] The Legislature has sought to remedy this inequality over the last twenty years with a range of legislative enactments governing the regulation of matrimonial property both during the subsistence of the marriage and upon its termination,[11] as well as provisions extending the duty of support that arises on marriage to after the death of one of the spouses (the provision in question in this case),[12] and seeking to improve the procedures whereby the duty of support may be enforced.[13] This brief account of recent developments in the law of marriage makes it plain that marriage itself is an institution which is legally evolving. That evolution reflects and responds to changes in the broader community. The discussion of the rights of marriage that follows is based largely, but not exclusively, on the current common law rules regulating marriage.

[112] Marriage, as presently constructed in common law,[14] constitutes a contract between a man and a woman in which the parties undertake to live together,[15] and to support one another.[16] Marriage is voluntarily undertaken by the parties, but it must be undertaken in a public and formal way and once concluded it must be registered. Formalities for the celebration of a marriage are set out in the Marriage Act.[17] A marriage must be conducted by a marriage officer,[18] to whom objections may be directed. If objections to the marriage are lodged, the marriage officer must satisfy herself or himself that there are no legal obstacles to the marriage.[19] Those wishing to get married must produce copies of their identity documents, or alternatively make affidavits in the prescribed form.[20] Marriages must take place in a church or other religious building, or in a public office or home, and the doors must be open.[21] Both parties must be present[22] as well as at least two competent witnesses.[23] A particular formula for the ceremony is provided in the Marriage Act,[24] but other formulae, such as religious rites, may be approved by the Minister.[25] Once the marriage has been solemnised, both spouses, at least two competent witnesses, and the marriage officer must sign the marriage register.[26] A copy of the register must then be transmitted to the Department of Home Affairs to be officially recorded.[27] These formalities make certain that it is known to the broader community precisely who gets married and when they get married. Certainty is important for the broader community in the light of the wide range of legal implications that marriage creates, as we shall now describe.

[113] One of the most important invariable consequences of marriage is the reciprocal duty of support. It is an integral part of the marriage contract and has immense value not only to the partners themselves but to their families and also to the broader community. The duty of support gives rise to the special rule that spouses, even those married out of community of property, can bind one another to third parties in relation to the provision of household necessaries which include food, clothing, medical and dental services.[28] The law sees the spouses as life partners and jointly and severally responsible for the maintenance of their common home. This obligation may not be excluded by antenuptial contract.

[28] See the general discussion in Sinclair The Law of Marriage Volume 1 (Juta, 1996) at 442-452; and Van Heerden et al above n 9 at 235ff.

[114] Another invariable legal consequence of the marriage is the right of both parties to occupy the joint matrimonial home. This obligation is clearly based on the premise that spouses will live together. The party who owns the home may not exclude or evict the other party from the home. Limited exceptions to this rule have been created under the Domestic Violence Act.[29]

[115] The way in which the marriage affects the property regime of the parties to the marriage is variable at common law. The ordinary common law regime is one of community of property including profit and loss in terms of which the parties to a marriage share one joint estate which they manage jointly. Historically, of course, our common law provided that the power to manage the estate ("the marital power") vested in the husband. This rule was altered by statutory intervention in 1984.[30] Major transactions affecting the joint estate must now be carried out with the concurrence of both parties.[31]

[29] Act 116 of 1998. See in particular subsections 7(1)(c) and (d). Note also that the Domestic Violence Act provides remedies to cohabiting partners. Section 1 of the Act defines "domestic relationship" to include people who "(whether they are of the same or of the opposite sex) live or lived together in a relationship in the nature of marriage, although they are not, or were not, married to each other, or are not able to be married to each other" (section (b) of the definition).

[30] See section 11 of the Matrimonial Property Act, 88 of 1984. The abolition of the marital power was only extended to marriages between African people in 1988 – see the Marriage and Matrimonial Property Amendment Act, 3 of 1988. Both these statutes only abolished the marital power prospectively. In 1993 the General Law Fourth Amendment Act, 132 of 1993 abolished the marital power in all marriages which had been solemnised before the 1984 and 1988 Matrimonial Property Acts had come into force. See also the full discussion in Sinclair above n 28 at 126-130.

[31] See subsections 15(2) and 15(3) of the Matrimonial Property Act, 88 of 1984. Joint estates must now be administered in terms of chapter III of the Act.

parents have an ineluctable duty to support their children (and children have a reciprocal duty to support their parents). The duty to support children arises whether the children are born of parents who are married or not.

[117] Because of the social importance of marriage in our community, the law also attaches a range of other consequences to marriage – for example, insolvency law provides that where one spouse is sequestrated, the estate of the other spouse also vests in the Master in certain circumstances,[32] the law of evidence creates certain rules relating to evidence by spouses against or for one another,[33] and the law of delict recognises damages claims based on the duty of support.[34] The rules that govern marriage have developed over a long period of time. More recently, as pointed out in the judgment of Sachs J, Acts of Parliament which attach benefits to marriage, also confer them upon cohabitants who are not married, variously referred to in legislation as "life partners", "partners" and "cohabitants".[35]

[32] See, for example, section 21(1) of the Insolvency Act, 24 of 1936, and the consideration of that provision by this Court in Harksen v Lane NO and Others 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC). Interestingly, section 21(13) provides that the word "spouse" in section 21 is to be read to include "a woman living with a man as his wife or a man living with a woman as her husband, although not married to one another".

[33] Section 195 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 51 of 1977 provides, subject to certain exceptions, that the spouse of an accused is a competent, but not compellable, witness for the prosecution. Section 196 provides that the spouse of an accused is a competent witness for the defence, but may not be compelled to give evidence by a co-accused of the accused spouse. Interestingly, section 195(2) of the Criminal Procedure Act provides that for the purposes of evidence in criminal proceedings "marriages" include customary law marriages and marriages concluded under any system of religious law, but not cohabitation.

[34] The aquilian action entitles a spouse whose spouse has been killed or injured by the wrongful act of a third party to recover damages for the patrimonial loss suffered. A claim for loss of the non-material aspects of consortium does not lie. See Union Government (Minister of Railways and Harbours) v Warneke 1911 AD 657; Marine and Trade Insurance Co Ltd v Mariamah and Another 1978 (3) SA 480 (A).

[35] See paras 175-176 of the judgment of Sachs J.

[118] From the above, it is clear that marriage is an institution of great legal significance. This significance arises both from the important social role that marriage plays in our society and from its public and formal character which make it a reliable criterion for the conferral of obligations and rights. We are unable to agree with Skweyiya J to the extent that he suggests that in determining whether discrimination on the grounds of marital status is unfair or not, one can take the view that it is not unfair to discriminate between relationships to which the law attaches the obligations of support and cohabitation and those relationships to which the law does not attach such consequences. In our view, this approach defeats the important constitutional purpose played by the prohibition on discrimination on the grounds of marital status. For if it does not constitute unfair discrimination to regulate marriage differently from other relationships in which the same legal obligations are not imposed upon the partners to that relationship by the law, marriage will inevitably remain privileged. We do not consider this would serve the constitutional purpose of section 9(3), and its prohibition of unfair discrimination on the grounds of marital status.

[119] It has become apparent that more and more people in South Africa live together without being married.[36] In the 2001 Census, 2.3 million people described themselves as "living together like married partners" although they were not married. This constitutes approximately 8% of the adult population. However, although cohabitating partners have received some piecemeal attention by Parliament over the last ten years,[37] no comprehensive legislative regulation of the consequences of cohabitation has yet taken place. The South African Law Reform Commission, however, has been engaged in researching the matter and has prepared a comprehensive discussion paper on it.[38]

[120] Of course, the circumstances of cohabitants can vary significantly. Some may be living together with no intention of permanence at all, others may be living together because there is a legal or religious bar to their marriage, others may be living together on the firm and joint understanding that they do not wish their relationship to attract legal consequences, and still others may be living together with the firm and shared intention of being permanent life partners. Moreover, one cohabiting relationship may change its joint character and purpose so that partners who may originally not intend to be living together as permanent life partners may over time alter that intention and intend to live together as permanent life partners.

[121] Often cohabitation will be a long-term arrangement between two people. Because such relationships are similar to marriage, and because they will be based on many of the same social practices that underpin marriage, many of the gender inequalities that are attendant upon marriage, and described above,[39] will also be attendant upon these relationships. It is quite likely that after a long period of cohabitation, in which the parties have lived together, and even raised children jointly, the person in the relationship, often, but not necessarily the woman, who has been responsible for the maintenance of the household and caring for children will be more vulnerable in relation to material and financial matters than the other partner. The termination of the cohabitation relationship whether by death or separation will often prejudice that person in the absence of any equitable regulation of the property affairs of the partners upon termination.

[122] Some cohabitation relationships, such as that between Mrs Robinson and Mr Shandling, play a role very similar to marriage in our society. However, because they are not formally celebrated in a manner that is capable of easy proof or ascertainment, attaching legal consequences automatically to such relationships may be less practicable. To resolve this problem some societies have provided for the registration of cohabitation relationships in a manner similar to marriage.[40]

[123] There are thus differences between marriage and cohabitation even where cohabitation plays a similar social function to marriage. These differences mean that the mere fact that the law regulates marriage relationships differently from cohabitation relationships does not mean that the law, to the extent that it discriminates on the grounds of marital status, will constitute unfair discrimination. To determine whether the law does constitute unfair discrimination requires us to follow the approach to unfairness established by this Court in a series of cases.[41] Three things need to be considered: (a) the position of complainants in society and whether they have previously suffered from patterns of disadvantage; (b) the nature of the provision and the purpose sought to be achieved by it; and (c) the extent to which the discrimination has affected the rights or interests of the complainants and whether it has led to an impairment of their fundamental human dignity or has caused them some other harm of a comparably serious nature.

[124] Although discrimination against cohabiting partners has not been equal to the discrimination relating to race and gender, cohabiting partners have been excluded from legal recognition as we have described above. Moreover, cohabiting partners have been and still are the subject of stigma and disapproval in our community, though this stigma is on the wane in some sectors of our society. A further important factor in this case is that the group of cohabiting partners under consideration are those who, upon the death of their partner, are unable to provide for their own reasonable maintenance needs from their own resources. We are, by definition therefore, concerned with survivors of a cohabitation relationship in financial need. We conclude for these reasons that the cohabiting partners under consideration in this case are a vulnerable group. We turn now to consider the circumstances of cohabiting partners under our law at present.

[41] See, for example, President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC); 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC) at paras 41-43; Harksen above n 32 at paras 51-54 of the SALR and paras 50-53 of the BCLR.

[125] At present our law makes no express provision for the regulation of the affairs of cohabiting partners upon termination of their relationship. In several other jurisdictions, the law of implied or constructive trusts has been used to re-allocate property rights between partners at the termination of a cohabitation relationship to achieve equity.[42] This remedy is not available in our law, given the different legal basis of the law of trusts in South African law.[43] However, the common law rules governing universal partnership may in some circumstances assist the partners at termination. A universal partnership is a contract in which the parties agree to put in common all their property, both that which they presently own and that which they are to acquire in the future.[44] In Ally v Dinath,[45] the court held that a universal partnership like other contracts could be tacitly concluded. Establishing that a contract has been concluded tacitly is of course not straightforward.[46]

[42] See the discussion in Sinclair above n 28 at 274-277; see also Neave "Living Together – The Legal Effects of the Sexual Division of Labour in Four Common Law Countries" (1991) 17 Monash University Law Review 14 at 17.

[43] See Cameron et al Honoré's South African Law of Trusts 5 ed (Juta, 2002) at 110.

[44] There are in fact two types of universal partnership known in our law, the societas universorum bonorum and the universorum quae ex quaestu veniunt. See Isaacs v Isaacs 1949 (1) SA 952 (C) at 955. The former is an agreement in terms of which the parties agree to pool all their existing and future property, and the latter is an agreement in which the parties agree to pool all property they receive during the term of the partnership. We are referring to the societas universorum bonorum in the text.

[45] 1984 (2) SA 451 (T) at 454F-455A.

[46] There is some doubt as to the precise test to be met in establishing the existence of a tacit contract. See the approach set out in Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd and Another v Ocean Commodities Inc and Others 1983 (1) SA 276 (A) at 292B, but see the comments in Joel Melamed and Hurwitz v Cleveland Estates (Pty) Ltd; Joel Melamed and Hurwitz v Vorner Investments (Pty) Ltd 1984 (3) SA 155 (A) at 164G-165H and also Mühlmann v Mühlmann 1984 (3) SA 102 (A). Not much turns on this uncertainty for our purposes.

[126] Another legal remedy that may be available to assist a cohabiting partner on the termination of the relationship arises from the law governing unjustified enrichment.[47] One partner may be able to show that the other partner has been enriched during the existence of the relationship by tangible improvements made to the property of the one partner by the other.[48] It might even be that the enrichment action could be developed to accommodate other forms of contributions made by partners to one another during the subsistence of their relationship. However, the law has not yet developed in this direction. The scope of the law of unjustified enrichment need not be further considered.

[127] Accordingly, at present, there are only a few common law rules which may have the potential to regulate the rights of parties upon the termination of a cohabitation relationship, no matter how longstanding that relationship. These remedies do not as presently recognised provide a comprehensive, certain and coherent set of principles to protect cohabitants. Moreover, there are no express statutory provisions at all to regulate the affairs of cohabitants upon termination of their relationship by the death of one party. Accordingly, at termination by the death of one of the parties, the surviving partner is left without effective legal recourse, unless she or he can formulate a claim based on the principles of the common law described above. This situation arises, despite the fact that it is clear that the relationship of cohabitation was one in which the parties had undertaken mutual duties of support and one in which patterns of vulnerability and dependence had been established, such that the death of one party may put the other in great difficulty.

[48] In Nortje v Pool NO 1966 (3) SA 96 (A) it was held that where tangible improvements which increase the market value of the property are made by one person to the property of another, a claim in unjustified enrichment will lie. The same case held that there was no general claim for unjustified enrichment in our law. See, however, Kommissaris van Binnelandse Inkomste v Willers 1994 (3) SA 283 (A) where the court held that Nortje's case does not necessarily exclude the further extension of liability for unjustified enrichment.

[128] The determination whether the discrimination caused by section 2(1) affects cohabiting partners unfairly needs to be understood in the context of the fact that there are no comprehensive, certain or clear legal remedies that can ameliorate the circumstances of the surviving cohabitant upon termination of the relationship by the death of one of the cohabitants. The absence of any other legal remedy coupled with the discriminatory impact of section 2(1) will mean that often surviving cohabiting partners will be left vulnerable and unprotected upon the termination of their cohabitation arrangements by the death of their partner, even where their relationship had subsisted for a long period of time.

[129] Upon termination of a marriage by death, on the other hand, there are a range of rules which govern the rights of the parties. When one spouse dies intestate, the other spouse is entitled to inherit the entire estate if the deceased spouse is not survived by any descendants.[49] If the deceased spouse is survived by a descendant, then the spouse is entitled to inherit either a child's portion of that spouse's estate[50] or a minimum amount established by the Minister for Justice and Constitutional

[50] A child's portion is calculated by producing a number calculated by identifying the number of descendants and adding one to it to represent the spouse. The cash value of the estate is then divided by that number.

Development from time to time.[51] The amount is currently set at R125 000.[52] Of course, the provisions of the Intestate Succession Act apply only if the deceased spouse does not make a will.

[51] See section 1 of the Intestate Succession Act which provides:

> "(1) If after the commencement of this Act a person (hereinafter referred to as the 'deceased') dies intestate, either wholly or in part, and—

[130] In addition to the provisions regulating succession, section 2(1) of the Act provides that a spouse in financial need may claim maintenance from the estate of his or her deceased spouse until his or her death or remarriage. As both Sachs J and Skweyiya J note in their judgments, this provision was enacted in 1990 to amend the situation then prevailing under the common law. At that time, the common law held that the duty of support between spouses did not survive the death of one spouse. Accordingly, a spouse had no claim against the estate of his or her deceased spouse, even when in dire financial need, and if the estate would have been able to provide maintenance.[53]

[131] There is a significant difference, therefore, between the way in which the law regulates the rights of spouses who survive a marriage, and the manner in which it regulates the rights of partners who survive a cohabitation relationship. There can be no doubt that there is a range of ways in which the rights of partners surviving cohabitation relationships could be regulated. There are many different examples to be found in other legal systems.[54] In particular, the Legislature may be minded to regulate different forms of cohabitation differently. For example, it may conclude that registered cohabitation relationships will be more comprehensively regulated than other forms of cohabitation. The various possibilities are canvassed extensively in the Law Reform Commission report referred to earlier.[55] It is unnecessary and premature in our view to consider the full range of forms of regulation that may be considered by the Legislature and to consider their constitutionality for as yet there is no statutory regulation.

[132] From the foregoing it becomes plain that cohabiting partners are a vulnerable group, and that in the absence of any other forms of legal regulation, the fact that they are excluded from the provisions of section 2(1) can have a grave impact on the interests of cohabiting partners. That impact will be particularly grave where the partnership is a permanent life partnership in which partners have undertaken reciprocal duties of support, where the surviving partner is in need, and there has been no equitable distribution to the surviving partner from the estate of the deceased partner. It is our conclusion that, in the absence of any regulation in such circumstances, the effect of limiting the scope of section 2(1) to married spouses only will constitute unfair discrimination within the meaning of section 9(3) of the Constitution.

[133] Were there some regulation to provide equitable protection to cohabitants who have been in relationships which can be said to perform a similar social function to marriage, the provisions of section 2(1) may not have constituted unfair discrimination. Given however that there is no regulation to ensure some equitable protection for cohabitants, particularly those who have been in long-term relationships where patterns of dependence have been established, the failure of section 2(1) to apply to such relationships constitutes, in our view, unfair discrimination.

[134] It should be emphasised that this conclusion does not mean that the Legislature is required to regulate cohabitation relationships in the same way that it regulates marriage. In particular, the Legislature need not extend the provisions of section 2(1) to all cohabitation relationships. As indicated earlier, marriage is a particular form of relationship, concluded formally and publicly with specified and clear consequences. Many people who choose to cohabit may do so specifically to avoid those consequences. In our view, the Legislature is entitled to take this into account when it regulates cohabitation relationships. However, cohabitation relationships that endure for a long time can produce patterns of dependence and vulnerability which in the light of the substantial and increasing number of people in cohabitation relationships cannot be ignored by the Legislature without offending the constitutional prohibition on unfair discrimination on the grounds of marital status.

[135] The unfairness of the discrimination in this case lies not primarily in the fact that cohabiting partners are not afforded equivalent rights to marriage as stipulated in section 2(1) of the Act, but in the fact that neither section 2(1) nor any other legal rule regulates the rights of surviving partners to cohabitation relationships which were socially and functionally similar to marriage, when those relationships are terminated by death and where that surviving partner is in financial need. In our view, given that section 2(1) of the Act and other legal provisions extensively regulate the rights of spouses in the event of the termination of a marriage by death, but there are no statutory provisions at all regulating the rights of cohabitants upon the termination of their relationships by death, the law discriminates against surviving partners of cohabitation relationships who are in financial need.

[136] We have concluded that the discrimination is unfair. The next question that arises is whether that unfair discrimination can be said to be reasonable and justifiable within the contemplation of section 36 of the Constitution.[56] The purpose of the legislation is to alter the common law rules governing marriage to protect the surviving spouse from penury upon the death of the other spouse. In our view, this is an important purpose. However, that purpose can be achieved without excluding surviving partners of cohabitation relationships in which duties of support had been mutually undertaken, whether tacitly or expressly, and where those surviving partners are in financial need, from similar protection. It is not clear why marriage only need be protected. The need to provide protection to such surviving partners is all the more acute in the light of the prevailing common law principle that provides that such partners would not be able to enter into legally enforceable contractual obligations to support one another after the termination of their partnership by the death of one of them. The law prohibits contracts between individuals which seek to regulate their

> "Limitation of rights.—(1) The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including—
> (a) the nature of the right;
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and

affairs or relationships posthumously.[57] To the extent that the purpose of providing legal protection to a surviving spouse but not to a surviving cohabitant might be to preserve the religious attributes of marriage, this cannot be an acceptable purpose in terms of our Constitution. While marriage plays an important role in our society, and most religions cherish it, the Constitution does not permit rights to be limited solely to advance a particular religious perspective. We conclude therefore that the unfair discrimination is not justifiable within the terms of section 36.

Remedy

[137] It is necessary to consider the appropriate remedy. Section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution requires a court when deciding a constitutional matter to declare any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution to be invalid to the extent of its inconsistency.[58] Section 172(1)(b) also permits a court to make an order that is just and equitable. The difficulty we face in this case is that, for the reasons given earlier in this judgment, the discrimination we have found may be cured by the Legislature in [57] Pacta successoria, as they are called, are prohibited in terms of our common law. There is no uniform view on whether such contracts are merely unenforceable (see Salzer v Salzer 1919 EDL 221; Van Jaarsveld v Van Jaarsveld's Estate 1938 TPD 343) or contrary to public policy and therefore invalid (Nieuwenhuis v Schoeman's Estate 1927 EDC 266). For a general discussion see the discussion in Christie The Law of Contract in South Africa 4 ed (Butterworths, 2001) at 415-6. It is not necessary to engage in this debate here and it is sufficient, for the purposes of this case, simply to highlight that such contracts are not enforceable in South African law.

---

[58] Section 172(1) of the Constitution reads as follows:

> "When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court—
>
> (a) must declare that any law or conduct that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency; and
>
> (b) may make any order that is just and equitable, including—
>
> (i) an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity; and

a variety of ways and that those ways need not be identical to the manner in which marriages are currently regulated. To cure the unfairness of the discrimination identified in this case the Legislature should make provision to ensure that on the termination of a longstanding cohabitation relationship by death, an equitable arrangement is reached in relation to the financial position of the survivor so that the dependence or vulnerability of the survivor which has arisen through the relationship of cohabitation is appropriately redressed. This equitable arrangement could be achieved, either by an equitable distribution of the property of the cohabitants,[59] or by rules relating to maintenance. The Legislature is in the best position to determine the precise nature of that regulation. We accordingly consider that the order of constitutional invalidity should be suspended to give the Legislature an opportunity to cure the constitutional defect.

[138] All this may be so, yet section 172(1) nevertheless obliges us to capture the scope of the unconstitutionality as precisely as we can. It may be that if the context were to change, what would constitute "unfair discrimination" may also change. We are, however, constitutionally obliged to formulate an order of invalidity as precisely as we can in the light of the circumstances that currently obtain. If the Legislature were not to take steps to cure the defect within the time stipulated and also not seek an extension of the suspension of the order, the order of invalidity would come into effect. It is important for this reason too that the scope of the unconstitutionality be as carefully drawn as possible.

[139] In the light of the reasoning on the merits above, we consider that the unconstitutionality in section 2(1) lies in the definition given to "spouse" in section 1 of the Act. In our view, were that definition to be read to include "and includes the surviving partner of a permanent heterosexual life partnership terminated by the death of one partner in which the partners undertook reciprocal duties of support and in circumstances where the surviving partner has not received an equitable share in the deceased partner's estate", the unconstitutionality would be cured. It should be emphasised that, were this order to come into operation, a partner would only be able to claim maintenance in the circumstances contemplated by section 2(1). The surviving partner would have to show that he or she was not able to provide for his or her reasonable maintenance needs from his or her own means and earnings.

[140] It should be noted that this definition limits the scope of the relief to a narrow class of cohabitation relationships only – those that are permanent heterosexual life partnerships in which the parties have undertaken reciprocal duties of support.[60] It was argued by the respondents and the amicus in this Court that basing the relief only on parties who have expressly or tacitly undertaken duties of support, which was also the approach adopted by this Court in Satchwell's case,[61] was not correct because family law should not be governed by contractual principles and the common law should instead be developed to give rise to an automatic legal duty of support between the parties to permanent life partnerships. The difficulty with this submission is that the development of the common law as proposed by the amicus was not relief sought in this litigation. The relief sought in this case was a declaration of constitutional invalidity in respect of section 2(1) of the Act. Developing the common law as proposed by the amicus is quite different relief which it would be inappropriate to grant on appeal, in circumstances where it is has not been considered by any other court. Accordingly, the submission made by the amicus must fail.

[60] This case is concerned with heterosexual cohabitation relationships only. It does not concern gay and lesbian life partnerships. The result of a constitutional challenge to section 2(1) of the Act on the basis of unfair discrimination on the ground of sexual orientation may be different to the challenge launched in this case.

[141] In our view, the proposed order identifies the relationships which perform most closely a similar social function to marriage and the relief should not extend beyond them, though of course it is open to the Legislature to regulate other cohabitation relationships. Moreover, we limit the relief to circumstances in which a partner in such a relationship has not been afforded any equitable distribution from his or her partner's estate. We do this because we consider that even where a life partnership performs a similar social function to marriage, it is not constitutionally necessary for the Legislature to regulate that partnership in the same way as it regulates a marriage. The key issue for the Constitution is to ensure that some provision is made equitably to regulate the circumstances of a cohabiting partner upon the death of the other partner. In the circumstances of this matter, it is prudent to leave the Legislature as free as constitutionally possible to determine the appropriate form of regulation.

[142] In this case, as it happens, Mrs Robinson was provided for in Mr Shandling's will. That will recognised her contribution to the partnership and her potential financial vulnerability upon the death of Mr Shandling by leaving to her approximately one third of his estate. In our view, this constitutes an adequate equitable division of the property of Mr Shandling, such as not to entitle Mrs Robinson to any further relief within the terms of the order we propose. In these circumstances, we do not consider it appropriate to make an order for interim relief. In our view, this is an area which should best be regulated by the Legislature and it would be difficult and perhaps inadvisable to seek to provide an interim regime pending the Legislature's intervention.

[143] We would therefore agree with Sachs J, though for different reasons, that the applicants have established that section 2(1) of the Act is unfairly discriminatory in that neither it nor any other provision of the law regulates the rights of surviving partners of cohabitation relationships. We would put the Legislature on terms to resolve this. Given the complexity of the task, we consider that two years is an appropriate period to give the Legislature to cure the defect in the current legislation.

[144] Neither the applicant nor the respondents sought costs against one another. The respondents did seek costs against the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development on an attorney and client basis in the light of the fact that she abided the outcome of the litigation in the High Court and then sought to lodge evidence in this Court and oppose the relief. Given that this judgment is not supported by a majority of the members of this Court who heard the matter, it is not necessary for us to consider whether it would be appropriate to award costs on the basis sought by the respondents.

[145] We have had an opportunity, since writing this judgment, to read the judgment prepared by Ngcobo J. We cannot agree with it. In our view, the approach he adopts privileges marriage relationships in a manner that cannot be consistent with the express constitutional prohibition of unfair discrimination on the grounds of marital status. For these reasons, we propose the following order, which confirms in substance the order of the High Court, but subjects the order to a period of two years' suspension.

The Order

1. It is declared that the omission from the definition of "survivor" in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990 of the words "and includes the surviving partner of a permanent heterosexual life partnership terminated by the death of one partner in which the partners undertook reciprocal duties of support and in circumstances where the surviving partner has not received an equitable share in the deceased partner's estate" at the end of the existing definition is unconstitutional and invalid.

2. The definition of "survivor" in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990, is to be read as if it included the following words after the words "dissolved by death" –

> "and includes the surviving partner of a permanent heterosexual life partnership terminated by the death of one partner in which the partners undertook reciprocal duties of support and in circumstances where the surviving partner has not received an equitable share in the deceased partner's estate."

3. The omission from the definition in section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990 of the following, at the end of the existing definitions, is unconstitutional and invalid –

> "Spouse" for the purposes of this Act shall include a person in a permanent heterosexual life partnership;
>
> "Marriage" for the purposes of this Act shall include a permanent heterosexual life partnership.

4. Section 1 of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act, 27 of 1990 is to be read as though it included the following at the end of the existing definition –

> "Spouse" for the purposes of this Act shall include a person in a permanent heterosexual life partnership;

"Marriage" for the purposes of this Act shall include a permanent heterosexual life partnership.

5. The orders contained in paragraphs 1, 2, 3 and 4 are suspended for a period of 2 years from the date of this order to enable the Legislature to take steps to cure the constitutional defects identified in this judgment.

6. Any party may approach this Court, on notice to all other parties, for an extension of the period of suspension provided for in paragraph 5 of this order before the period of suspension elapses.

7. Should the Legislature choose not to enact legislation as contemplated in paragraph 5, the order of invalidity that shall come into operation two years after the date of this order shall have no effect on the validity of any acts performed in respect of the administration of a deceased estate that has finally been wound up by the date upon which the order of invalidity comes into effect.

SACHS J:

Introduction

[146] This case raises complex social and legal questions about the interaction between freedom of choice and equality in intimate relationships.

[147] The problem does not lie in defining the technical legal question to be answered: does the fact that the Constitution prohibits unfair discrimination on the ground of marital status, mean that the exclusion of the survivor of a committed, permanent and intimate life partner from the benefits of the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act[1] (the Act) amounts to unfair discrimination against her?

[148] Similarly, it is not difficult to illustrate the practical issues involved: to take a not unusual situation, should a person who has shared her home and life with her deceased partner, borne and raised children with him, cared for him in health and in sickness, and dedicated her life to support the family they created together, be treated as a legal stranger to his estate, with no claim for subsistence because they were never married? Should marriage be the exclusive touchstone of a survivor's legal entitlement as against the rights of legatees and heirs?

[149] The source of the complexity appears to lie elsewhere. In my view this is one of those cases in which however forceful the reasoned text might be, it is the largely unstated subtext which will be determinative of the outcome. The formal legal issue

[1] Act 27 of 1990. Section 2(1) of the Act provides:

> "If a marriage is dissolved by death after the commencement of this Act the survivor shall have a claim against the estate of the deceased spouse for the provision of his reasonable maintenance needs until his death or remarriage in so far as he is not able to provide therefor from his own means and earnings."

Section 9(3) of the Constitution provides that:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth." [My emphasis].

before us is embedded in an elusive, evolving and resilient matrix made up of varied historical, social, moral and cultural ingredients. At times these emerge and enter explicitly into the legal discourse. More often they exercise a subterranean influence, all the more powerful for being submerged in deep and largely unarticulated philosophical positions.

[150] Thus the judgment of Skweyiya J, which has majority support, holds that the issue is whether it amounts to unfair discrimination to impose a duty upon the deceased estate to maintain a surviving spouse on the one hand, and not, on the other to impose that duty upon the deceased estate where the deceased bore no such duty by operation of law during his or her lifetime to maintain the partner in a heterosexual partnership. The answer, the judgment decides, is that such discrimination is not unfair.

[151] I find myself in disagreement with the judgment both as to the approach utilised and to the conclusion reached, and totally so. This is not because I would challenge the legal logic used, which appears to be impeccable within the framework adopted. It is because I would locate the issue in a completely different legal landscape. I do not accept that it is appropriate to examine the entitlements of the surviving cohabitant in the context of what the common law would provide during the lifetime of the parties. To do so is to employ a process of definitional reasoning which presupposes and eliminates the very issue which needs to be determined, namely, whether for the limited socially remedial purposes intended to be served by the Act, unmarried survivors could have a legally cognisable interest which founds a constitutional right to equal benefit of the law.

[152] In my view, the question of the fairness of excluding such survivors from such benefits falls to be assessed not in the narrow confines of the rules established by matrimonial law, but rather within the broader and more situation-sensitive framework of the principles of family law, principles that are evolving rapidly in our new constitutional era. By its very nature, the quality of fairness, like that of mercy and justice, is not strained. The enquiry as to what is fair in our new constitutional democracy accordingly does not pass easily through the eye of the needle of black-letter law. Judicial dispassion does not exclude judicial compassion; the question of fairness must be rigorously dealt with, but in a people-centred and not a rule-centred way.

[153] The issues raised are novel. A wide range of jurisprudential perspectives are implicated. Because I differ fundamentally with the majority with regard to the point of departure and the context of the enquiry I have found it necessary to set out my views at some length. The first part of this judgment seeks to delineate and establish the jurisprudential setting in which I believe the issues should be located. The second part sets out my reasons for holding that the Act does in fact discriminate unfairly against survivors of committed life partnerships.

PART ONE

ESTABLISHING THE LEGAL LANDSCAPE

(i) The philosophical context: freedom of choice and equality

[154] Respect for human autonomy undoubtedly implies that the law must honour the choices that people make, including the decision whether or not to marry. A central argument advanced in the appellant's written submissions, and, I believe, the philosophical premise underlying the majority judgment (as well as the basis for the judgment of Ngcobo J, which I have had the opportunity to read), is as follows: By opting not to marry, thereby not accepting the legal responsibilities and entitlements that go with marriage, a person cannot complain if she is denied the legal benefits she would have had if she had married. Having chosen cohabitation rather than marriage, she must bear the consequences. Just as the choice to marry is one of life's defining moments, so, it is contended, the choice not to marry must be a determinative feature of one's life. These are powerful considerations.

[155] Sinclair[2] indicates her respect for such an argument, which implies that freedom of choice demands that cohabitation be preserved as an alternative to marriage and not simply become a different type of marriage. She goes on, however, to negate this contention. On the premise that two people set up a home together, live in a stable, permanent, affective relationship that emulates marriage, and intend to deal fairly with one another, the law's objective, she states, should be to achieve equity between the parties.[3] This, she adds, should be accomplished both during the currency of the partnership and after the death of one of the partners. She cites Rhode who points out that a balance must be struck

> "between liberty and equality in intimate associations, between flexibility and certainty in legal rules, and between tolerance for diversity and encouragement of stability in family life . . . . The tradeoff between liberty and equality becomes less stark if liberty is defined not as freedom to do what we want when we want, but rather as freedom to form relationships of mutual trust and commitment, relationships that presuppose some obligations of honesty and fair dealing. Flexibility and certainty are more readily reconciled if we do not demand a single framework for all intimate associations, but rather search for legal guidelines that will distinguish casual from committed relationships. In the absence of explicit agreements, criteria such as the duration of the relationship, the degree of the parties' financial interdependence, and, most importantly, the presence of children, could help provide some consistency across cases."[4]

[156] In my view this balanced, flexible and nuanced approach accords well with the multi-faceted character of our new constitutional order. Respecting autonomy means giving legal credence not only to a decision to marry but to choices that people make about alternative lifestyles. Such choices may be freely undertaken, either expressly or tacitly. Alternatively, they might be imposed by the unwillingness of one of the parties to marry the other. Yet if the resulting relationships involve clearly acknowledged commitments to provide mutual support and to promote respect for stable family life, then the law should not be astute to penalise or ignore them because they are unconventional. It should certainly not refuse them recognition because of any moral prejudice, whether open or unconscious, against them.

[157] It is instructive to look at the manner in which the Canadian Supreme Court has grappled with the relevance of choice in relation to cohabitation. In Miron[5] the majority[6] found that, while in theory the individual is free to choose to marry or not to marry, in practice the reality may be otherwise. It noted further that since the object of the legislation in question was to sustain families when one of their members was injured in an accident, this should be the focus of the issue, rather than what the marital status of the claimant was.[7] The court stated that:

> "If the issue had been viewed as a matter of defining who should receive benefits on a basis that is relevant to the goal or functional values underlying the legislation, rather than marriage equivalence, alternatives substantially less invasive of Charter rights might have been found."[8]

Accordingly, the exclusion of unmarried partners from an accident benefit which was available to married partners, violated the Charter. In the result, the definition of 'spouse' had to be read so as to include cohabiting partners. Writing as part of the majority in that case L'Heureux-Dubé J challenged the assumption that most unmarried persons living in a relationship of some interdependence and duration are indeed exercising a 'free choice'.

> "This silent and oft-forgotten group constitutes couples in which one person wishes to be in a relationship of publicly acknowledged permanence and interdependence and the other does not . . . . It is small consolation, indeed, to be told that one has been > denied equal protection under the Charter by virtue of the fact that one's partner had a choice."[9]

[158] By way of contrast, in the more recent case of Walsh[10] the court decided[11] that merely choosing to cohabit was insufficiently indicative of an intention by cohabitants to share and contribute to each other's assets and liabilities,[12] and therefore the exclusion of cohabiting partners from sharing in the division of matrimonial property by the Nova Scotia Matrimonial Property Act did not violate the Charter.

[159] The judgment of Bastarache J emphasises how context-related the significance of choice will be. Because of its relevance to the matter before us I quote extensively from it:

> "This Court has recognized both the historical disadvantage suffered by unmarried cohabiting couples as well as the recent social acceptance of this family form. As McLachlin J noted in Miron . . .
>
> > 'There is ample evidence that unmarried partners have often suffered social disadvantage and prejudice. Historically in our society, the unmarried partner has been regarded as less worthy than the married partner. The disadvantages inflicted on the unmarried partner have ranged from social ostracism through denial of status and benefits. In recent years, the disadvantage experienced by persons living in illegitimate relationships has greatly diminished. Those living together out of wedlock no longer are made to carry the scarlet letter.

[12] Above n 10 at para 54.

> Nevertheless, the historical disadvantage associated with this group cannot be denied.'

Since Miron, . . . significant legislative change has taken place at both the federal and provincial levels. Numerous statutes that confer benefits on married persons have been amended so as to include within their ambit unmarried cohabitants. Nevertheless, social prejudices directed at unmarried partners may still linger, despite these significant reforms. In light of those social prejudices, this Court recognized in Miron, that one's ability to access insurance benefits was not reducible to simply a matter of choice. L'Heureux-Dubé J., in her concurring judgment, reasoned as follows, at para.102:

> 'To recapitulate, the decision of whether or not to marry is most definitely capable of being a very fundamental and personal choice. The importance actually ascribed to the decision to marry or, alternatively, not to marry, depends entirely on the individuals concerned. For a significant number of persons in so-called "non-traditional" relationships, however, I dare say that notions of "choice" may be illusory. It is inappropriate, in my respectful view, to condense the forces underlying the adoption of one type of family unit over another into a simple dichotomy between "choice" or "no choice". Family means different things to different people, and the failure to adopt the traditional family form of marriage may stem from a multiplicity of reasons — all of them equally valid and all of them equally worthy of concern, respect, consideration, and protection under the law.' [Emphasis in original.]

Where the legislation has the effect of dramatically altering the legal obligations of partners, as between themselves, choice must be paramount. The decision to marry or not is intensely personal and engages a complex interplay of social, political, religious and financial considerations by the individual. While it remains true that unmarried spouses have suffered from historical disadvantage and stereotyping, it simultaneously cannot be ignored that many persons in circumstances similar to those of the parties, that is, opposite sex individuals in conjugal relationships of some permanence, have chosen to avoid the institution of marriage and the legal consequences that flow from it.

> To ignore [the] differences among cohabiting couples presumes a commonality of intention and understanding that simply does not exist. This effectively nullifies the individual's freedom to choose alternative family forms and to have that choice respected and legitimated by the state. Examination of the context in which the discrimination claim arises . . . involves a consideration of the relationship between the grounds and the claimant's characteristics or circumstances."[13] [Reference omitted.]

[160] The point is made even more explicitly in Walsh by Gonthier J, who draws a sharp distinction between re-arrangement of property relations, on the one hand, and providing spousal support, on the other. Referring to the Maintenance and Custody Act which provides for maintenance, and is dependent on the need of the applicants and their capacity to provide for themselves and each other, he states that:

> "It is true that in M.v.H., [1999] 2 S.C.R. 3, at para. 177, I recognized that there is 'a growing political recognition that cohabiting opposite-sex couples should be subject to the spousal support regime that applies to married couples because they have come to fill a similar social role.' However, I want to underline the fundamental difference between spousal support, based on the needs of the applicant, and the division of matrimonial assets. While spousal support is based on need and dependency, the division of matrimonial assets distributes assets acquired during marriage without regard to need.
> The division of matrimonial assets and spousal support have different objectives. One aims to divide assets according to a property regime chosen by the parties, either directly by contract or indirectly by the fact of marriage, while the other seeks to fulfil a social objective: meeting the needs of spouses and their children."[14]

It is not necessary to consider whether in South African circumstances, where welfare provisions are extremely limited, employment opportunities restricted and the common law has as of yet taken only tentative steps to encompass the equivalent of the notion of a constructive or resulting trust as the basis for [161] It is relevant that the distinction drawn by Gonthier J was not based on whether payment of a benefit to an unmarried cohabitant was to be made by the state or to come out of the deceased's estate, and thereby possibly affect the entitlement of heirs. It focused on the special importance to be attributed to need and spousal support after a life-long conjugal relationship with the deceased has come to an end. As a result, on his approach claims for spousal support could legitimately compete with inheritance rights. No general marriage equivalence is required to establish the specific right to spousal support. What matters is the functional value of the legislation based on acknowledgment of a similar social role to that served by marriage.

[162] The jurisprudential importance of context in deciding whether a distinction between married and unmarried persons can fairly be made, has also been underlined by this Court. In Fraser,[15] which dealt with a provision that excluded unmarried fathers from the category of persons whose consent had to be sought for adoption, Mohamed DP stated:

> "In the context of certain laws there would often be some historical and logical justification for discriminating between married and unmarried persons and the

granting a share of the family home to the survivor, and the doctrine of unjustified enrichment has not been developed to provide appropriate relief, the decision in Walsh is consistent with our law. See also Goldblatt who contends that the existing matrimonial property regimes should serve only as a guide to courts, which should be given a broad discretion to redistribute property on the basis of equity, taking into account the various material and non-material contributions of the parties, the form of the partnership and any other factor which the legislature or the courts consider to be useful. In the case of intestate and testate succession, a domestic partner should be entitled to his/her share of the partnership estate. In the case of intestate succession, the deceased's partner should also be entitled to a spouse's share of the deceased estate. > protection of the institution of marriage is a legitimate area for the law to concern itself with. But in the context of an adoption statute where the real concern of the law is whether an order for the adoption of the child is justified, a right to veto the adoption based on the marital status of the parent could lead to very unfair anomalies.

> It is . . . evident that not all unmarried fathers are indifferent to the welfare of their children and that in modern society stable relationships between unmarried parents are no longer exceptional."[16] [My emphasis.]

By analogy, I believe that a de-contextualised approach to the status of unmarried survivors of intimate life partnerships inevitably leads to very unfair anomalies. The survivor of an empty shell marriage will have a claim while the survivor of a caring and committed life partnership that produced a real family, would be left destitute.

(ii)The socio-legal context: patriarchy and poverty

[163] In Fraser this Court stressed the need for a nuanced and balanced consideration of our society in which the demographic picture will often be quite different from that on which 'first world' western societies are premised. As Mohamed DP pointed out:

> "The socio-economic and historical factors which give rise to gender inequality in South Africa are not always the same as those in many of the 'first-world' countries described."[17] [Footnote omitted.]

This Court has on numerous occasions stressed the importance of recognising patterns of systematic disadvantage in our society when endeavouring to achieve substantive and not just formal equality.[18] The need to take account of this context is as important in the area of gender as it is in connection with race,[19] and it is frequently more difficult to do so because of its hidden nature. For all the subtle masks that racism may don, it can usually be exposed more easily than sexism and patriarchy, which are so ancient, all-pervasive and incorporated into the practices of daily life as to appear socially and culturally normal and legally invisible. The constitutional quest for the achievement of substantive equality therefore requires that patterns of gender inequality reinforced by the law be not viewed simply as part of an unfortunate yet legally neutral background. They are intrinsic, not extraneous, to the interpretive enquiry.

[164] It should be remembered that many of the permanent life partnerships dissolved by death today would have been established in past decades, when conditions were even harsher than they are now, and people had far less choice concerning their life circumstances. Thus, in respect of most of the significant transactions potentially affecting present-day claims for maintenance, the social reality would have been that in a considerable number of families the man would have regarded himself as the head of the household with the right to take all major decisions concerning the family. It would have been he who effectively decided whether he and his partner should register their relationship in terms of the law. If she refused to do what he wanted, he could have been the one to threaten violence or expulsion, with little chance of the law intervening.[20] Because he would in many cases have been the party to go out to work while she stayed at home to look after the children and attend to his needs, it would have been he who accumulated assets, and he who had the proprietary right to determine how they were to be disposed of after his death.

[165] It should be remembered too that the migrant labour system had a profoundly negative effect on family life. An essential ingredient of segregation and apartheid, it involved the deliberate and targeted destruction of settled and sustainable African family life in rural areas so as to provide a flow of cheap labour to the mines and the towns.[21] The chaotic, unstable and oppressive legal universe in which the majority of the population were as a consequence compelled by law and policy to live had a severe impact on the way many families were constituted and functioned. Repeal of the racist laws which sustained the system, and entry into the new constitutional era, opened the way to fuller lives for those whose dignity had been assailed, and gave them renewed opportunity to take responsibility for their lives. Yet it did not in itself correct the imbalances inside the family or eliminate the desperate poverty that is still so prevalent.

[166] Sinclair states that because there is exiguous welfare to protect the victims of breakdown of intimate relationships, neither public law nor private law, on its own, is adequate, and a combination of responses from both is called for.[22] Dealing specifically with the failure of the state to provide protection for the vulnerable parties in cohabiting families, she concludes:

> "[T]here are no easy solutions to the problem of poverty. Both intervention to regulate and refraining from doing so manifest choices made by the state about the plight of its people. Not intervening, in the context of cohabitation, manifests a choice to allow substantial suffering to continue unalleviated. Far from a liberal, enlightened stance, this choice would permit the strong to remain strong and the weak and vulnerable to be removed from the consciousness of the law in the name of respect for individual autonomy."[23] [Footnote omitted.]

(iii) The historical and jurisprudential context: from matrimonial law to family law

[167] In a case like the present it is vital to draw a distinction between matrimonial law and family law. The difference between the two is helpfully analysed in a Discussion Paper recently issued on the question of domestic partnerships by the South African Law Reform Commission[24] (the SALRC Paper). The SALRC Paper points out that many of the features of marriage which are assumed to have been present from time immemorial are actually of more recent origin. What is clear, [24] South African Law Reform Commission 'Domestic Partnerships' Discussion Paper 104 Project 118. (The closing date for comments was 1 December 2003). At the hearing of this matter much attention was paid to whether a report of a survey done by the Gender Research Project of the Centre for Applied Legal Studies on Cohabitation and Gender in the South African Context – Implications for Law Reform, November 2001 should be admitted. I agree with the view that it is generally inappropriate to admit such evidence at a late stage in the proceedings. I accordingly find it unnecessary to go beyond the SALRC Paper as a dependable and public source for relevant factual information.

however, is that marriage in its many forms has enjoyed a uniquely privileged status, while domestic partnerships have been virtually unrecognised.[25] The SALRC Paper observes that opposite-sex partners were a largely invisible group as far as the legal system was concerned: any acknowledgment of their existence tended to be characterised by scathing references to their attempts to 'masquerade as husband and wife'. They were excluded from the rights and obligations which attached automatically to marriage, and it was not even clear whether any agreements which they entered into in order to create parallel rights and obligations, were legally enforceable.[26]

[168] The SALRC Paper notes that over the years, however, there has been an increasing focus on the rights of opposite and same-sex partners, and domestic partnerships have come to be perceived as functionally if not formally similar to marriage. It observes that the increased recognition of intimate relationships outside of marriage started in South African law with the imposition of support obligations created in domestic partnership agreements and continued with the use of principles of unjust enrichment to provide property rights and to extend statutorily defined benefits similar to partnerships.[27]

[25] Id at 3 para 1.2.2.

[26] Id at 3 para 1.2.3.

[27] Id at 4 para 1.2.6.

[169] The SALRC Paper comments that initially the extension was rather grudging and seemed primarily designed to 'pass the buck' from the welfare authorities to the family,[28] and goes on to state:

> "Given South Africa's conservative and Calvinistic background, it is not surprising that acceptance of domestic partnerships occurred at a slower and more reluctant rate than in countries like Canada, Sweden, England and the United States of America. There is, however, mounting dissatisfaction with the failure of the law to adapt to changing patterns of domestic partnership."[29] [Footnote omitted.]

> "[L]aw and social policy reforms should aim to provide for both cohabiting couples in general as well as . . . new family types. This must be done whilst acknowledging gender inequality and serious levels of violence against women."[30] [Footnote omitted.]

[170] The SALRC Paper concludes that legal regulation is needed since the existing law contains inadequate mechanisms to address disputes arising from cohabitation relationships. The significant numbers involved mean that the Napoleonic adage that "cohabitants ignore the law and the law ignores them" is no longer acceptable.[31]

[29] Id at 5 para 1.2.8. The SALRC Paper also notes at 17 para 2.1.8-10 that South African statistics also demonstrate the rising trend in domestic partnerships. Even conservative statistics indicate that a very large number of people live in domestic partnerships in South Africa. Statistical data show that only about 40% of Africans and Coloured women are married. In the 1996 Census the figures for people living together in the different population groups were as follows: African: 1 056 992; Coloured: 132 180; Indian/Asian: 7119; White: 84 027; Unspecified: 8181. Even allowing for imprecision, the Paper states, we must recognise that there are large numbers of people in dependence-producing relationships who are ignored by the law.

[31] Id at 17 para 2.1.10. A similar point is made in a report by the Law Commission of Canada which calls for recognition and support for all close personal adult relationships. Entitled "Beyond Conjugality", it states that:

> "[M]arriages still constitute a predominant choice for opposite-sex conjugal unions. Nevertheless, opposite-sex cohabitation – whether as an alternative to marriage, as a prelude to marriage or as a sequel to marriage – is a growing phenomenon that now has widespread social acceptance.

Where a domestic partnership has created responsibilities for, and expectations of, the parties, the law should play a role in enforcing the responsibilities and realising the expectations of the parties that are in conflict.[32]

[171] Academic opinion also strongly favours recognition by the law of domestic partnerships.[33] Thus Goldblatt states that families need to be understood in terms of the functions that they perform rather than in terms of traditional categories. If we move away from defining relationships in terms of marriage, we can look at the actual functions that they perform in society.[34] She contends that the purpose of family law is to protect vulnerable members of families and to ensure fairness between the parties in family disputes. Women and children are vulnerable groups in our society and often become poorer when families break down. The lack of legal protection afforded to domestic partnerships increases the vulnerability of these groups living within such arrangements. She concludes that a domestic partnership is but one amongst many different types of family and should be included within the definition of family for the purposes of family law.[35]

[172] The new way of looking at family law represents an emphatic shift from what the SALRC Paper refers to as a definitional approach to conjugal rights and responsibilities, towards a functional one. (I believe that it is this shift that lies at the centre of my divergence from the majority judgment). According to the definitional argument, only those who comply with the current definition of marriage are entitled to the rights and obligations attached to marriage, and only a legally valid marriage can create a family worthy of legal protection.[36] The SALRC Paper offers its own reply. Against this argument, it states, one may put what has been referred to as the functional response, which emanates from the argument that marriage changes over time and that the time has come for marriage to be redefined.[37]

[173] The SALRC Paper goes on to say that supporters of the functional argument advocate the definition of marriage according to the function that it serves and argue that other relationships can also fulfil the functions that are traditionally conceived to be attributes of marriage only.[38] Such an approach looks beyond biology and the legal requirement of marriage by considering the way in which a group of people function. As a result it has been said that

> "[w]hen supporters of the definitional argument assume that couples who have made a public commitment by way of marriage are the only ones who have a legal responsibility to each other, and would be more likely to provide a child with stability and security, they are under a wrong impression. . . . [E]ven married relationships are not guaranteed for life and do end with inevitable accompanying negative consequences."[39]

It is also submitted that it is an

> "unjustified generalisation to contend that unmarried couples . . . are not committed to their relationships . . . . Therefore, to regard marriage as a guarantee that the family created thereby would have certain characteristics is a misrepresentation [as these] characteristics could also be present in other relationships."[40]

[174] The SALRC Paper suggests that conditions in South Africa today require a shift from a purely definitional approach to marriage to a functional approach to the family

> "[b]ecause the exclusive nature of the common-law definition of marriage does not reflect social reality, [and it has thus] become necessary under certain legislation to adopt a functional approach to defining family status, with the result that couples who do not fit the traditional family model may be deemed spouse of one another." [41]

According to the SALRC Paper, the South African courts (and the legislator) should determine whether or not to extend common law and other legal protections to family members on this basis. It asserts furthermore that such an approach will lead to greater fairness, will bring law in line with reality and is more likely to harmonise the law with the values underlying the Constitution.[42]

(iv) The legislative context

[175] Recent legislation has given extensive, if ad hoc, recognition to conjugal relationships outside of marriage. The acknowledgment of domestic partnerships can be traced in the pre-constitutional era to the Insolvency Act of 1936. It is noteworthy that the Constitution itself accepted this type of family unit by providing that a detained person, including a sentenced prisoner, has the right to communicate with, and be visited by, that person's spouse or partner.[43] Since 1994 a flurry of statutes has recognised domestic partnerships. These include the Medical Schemes Act of 1998, the Prevention of Domestic Violence Act of 1998, the Housing Act of 1997, the Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Act of 1997 and the Basic Conditions of Employment Act of 1997.[44]

[42] Id at 178 para 7.1.64.

[43] Section 35(2)(f)(i).

[44] The following is an incomplete overview of the statutes indicating the legislator's acknowledgment of domestic partnerships:

The Insolvency Act 24 of 1936. Section 21(13) provides that the word "spouse" not only means wife or husband in the legal sense, but includes wife or husband by virtue of marriage according to any law or custom, and also a woman living with a man as his wife or a man living with a woman as her husband, although not married to one another.

The Independent Media Commission Act 148 of 1993. Section 6(1)(f) prohibits a person from being appointed or remaining a commissioner if such a person or his or her spouse, partner or associate holds an office in or with or is employed by any person or company, organization or other body, which has a direct or indirect financial interest in the telecommunications, broadcasting, or printed media industry.

The Pensions Fund Act 24 of 1956. Although section 1 (as amended by section 6 of the Pensions Fund Amendment Act 22 of 1996) does not expressly define a domestic life partner as a "dependant" in relation to a member, it does make provision for persons who are factually (but not legally) dependent on the member for maintenance. It may as a result be inferred that a person whose life partner was a member of the fund may be included as a dependant for the purpose of the Act.

The Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996. The definition of "spouse" in section 31(2)(iii) of the Act refers to "the partner . . . in a marriage relationship" which latter relationship is defined to include "a continuous cohabitation in a homosexual or heterosexual partnership for a period of at least 5 years".

The Constitution of the Republic of South Africa. Section 35(2)(f)(i), dealing with the rights of arrested, detained and accused persons, provides that such person has the right to communicate with and to be visited by his or her spouse or partner.

The Lotteries Act 57 of 1997. Section 3(7)(a)(ii), states (inter alia) that a person shall not be appointed or remain a board member if such person through his spouse or life partner (inter alia) has or obtains a direct or indirect financial interest in any lottery or gambling or associated activity. Section 3(8) states that a member of the board or his or her spouse or life partner, may not for a period of 12 months after the termination of membership of the board take up employment or receive any benefit from persons making certain applications in terms of this Act.

Compensation for Occupational Injuries and Diseases Amendment Act 130 of 1993. Section 1 states that a "dependant of an employee" includes, if there is no widow or widower, "a person with whom the employee was at the time of the employee's death living as husband and wife".

Basic Conditions of Employment Act 75 of 1997. Section 27(2)(c)(i) provides that an employer must provide an employee, at the request of the latter, three days paid leave, which the employee is entitled to take in the event of the death of the employee's spouse or life partner.

The Housing Act 107 of 1997. Section 8(6)(e)(ii)(aa) (prior to its repeal) provided that a "spouse" included a person with whom the member lived as if they were married or with whom the member habitually cohabited.

The South African Civil Aviation Authority Act 40 of 1998. Section 9(4) states that if a member of the Board, or his or her immediate family member, life partner or business associate, has any direct or indirect financial interest in any matter to be dealt with at any meeting of the Board, that member must then (inter alia) disclose the interest, not attend board meetings during consideration of the matter and may not take part as a member of the Board in the consideration of the matter. Section 11(5)(b) states that the Chief Executive Officer or his or her spouse, immediate family member, life partner or business associate, may not hold any direct or indirect financial interest in any civil aviation activity or the civil aviation industry without approval or unless such approval is open to public inspection.

The Employment Equity Act 55 of 1998. Section 1 which defines "family responsibility" includes "responsibility of employees in relation to their spouse or partner, their dependent children or other members of their immediate family who need their care or support".

The Domestic Violence Act 116 of 1998. In section 1 a "domestic relationship" is defined as a relationship between a complainant and a respondent who are of the same or opposite sex and who live/lived together in a relationship in the nature of marriage, although they are not married to each other.

The Medical Schemes Act 131 of 1998. Section 24(2)(e) states that the Council shall not register a medical scheme unless it is satisfied that the medical scheme will not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against any person on arbitrary grounds which include marital status.

The Road Traffic Management Act 20 of 1999. Section 10(2) also states that where a member of the board or (inter alia) his or her life partner has any direct or indirect financial interest in any matter to be dealt with at a meeting of the board then that member should comply with all the provisions under that section and section 15 (9) states that a chief executive officer or (inter alia) his or her life partner, may not hold any direct or indirect financial interest in any road traffic activity without approval or unless such approval is open to public inspection.

The Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000. Section 1 refers to "family responsibility" in relation to a complainant's spouse, partner, dependant, child or other members of his or her family in respect of whom the member is liable for care and support.

[176] Of special importance are the Employment Equity Act of 1998 (the Employment Act) and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act of 2000 (the Equality Act). These were adopted by Parliament to give legislative expression to the need to achieve equality in South Africa. Covering as they do a wide range of activities and situations, they represent particularly strong legislative acknowledgment of the status of domestic partnerships. Thus, the Employment Act provides in section 1 that the definition of "family responsibility" includes "responsibility of the employees in relation to their spouse or partner, their dependent children or other members of their immediate family who need their care or support."

[177] Similarly the Equality Act provides in its definition section that "family responsibility" means "responsibility in relation to a complainant's spouse, partner, dependant, child or other members of his or her family in respect of whom the member is liable for care and support." The Act goes on to state that "'marital status' includes the status or condition of being single, married, divorced, widowed or in a relationship, whether with a person of the same or the opposite sex, involving a commitment to reciprocal support in a relationship." A key element of this definition is the acknowledgment of a relationship involving a commitment to reciprocal support. Though one does not use legislation to interpret the Constitution, the existence of express legislative purposes aimed at extending the ameliorative reach of the law, must be a factor to be considered in terms of evolving notions as to what is fair and unfair.

[178] The fact that many if not all statutes adopted in recent times dealing with the rights of conjugal partners expressly include non-married partners within their ambit, is indicative of a new legislative approach consistent with new values, and as the SALRC Paper suggests, with the spirit, purport and object of the Constitution. As was said in Daniels:[45]

> "The fact that many statutes adopted in recent times dealing with married persons expressly include parties to Muslim unions under their provisions is indicative of a new approach consistent with constitutional values. The existence of such provisions in other statutes does not imply that their absence in the Acts before us has special significance. The Intestate Succession Act and the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act were both last amended before the era of constitutional democracy arrived. The fact that the new democratic Parliament has not as yet included Muslim marriages expressly within the purview of the protection granted by the Acts, accordingly, cannot be interpreted so as to exclude them contrary to the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution."[46]

[46] Id at para 27. [The statutes] include (See Daniels id) [Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 25 of 1965 (s 10A recognises religious marriages for the purposes of the law of evidence); Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 (s 195(2) recognises religious marriages for the purposes of the compellability of spouses as witnesses in criminal proceedings); Pension Funds Act 24 of 1956 (s 1(b)(ii): definition of "dependant"); Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996 (s 31(b)(ii): definition of "dependant"); Government Employees Pension Law Proclamation 21 of 1996 (s 1(b)(ii): definition of "dependant" and Schedule 1 item 1.19, definition of "spouse"); Demobilisation Act 99 of 1996 (section 1(vi)(c): definition of "dependant"); Value-Added Tax Act 89 of 1991 (Notes 6 and 7 to item 406.00 of Schedule 1 recognise religious marriages for the purposes of tax exemptions in respect of goods imported into South Africa); Transfer Duty Act 40 of 1949 (s 9(1)(f) read with the definition of "spouse" in section 1 exempts from transfer duty property inherited by the surviving spouse in a religious marriage); and Estate Duty Act 45 of 1955 (s 4(q) read with the definition of "spouse" in section 1 exempts from estate duty property accruing to the surviving spouse in a religious marriage).

[179] The increased legislative recognition being given to cohabitation suggests that cohabitation has achieved a particular status of its own. This status gives it something of a marriage-like character, without equating it for all purposes to marriage. Unlike marriage, the legal response to cohabitation is not dictated by general laws. In practice it will depend upon the qualitative and quantitative nature of the cohabitation and the particular legal purpose for which it is being claimed, or denied, that a couple is cohabiting. A distinction will usually be drawn, for example, between short-term and long-term cohabitation, between the casual affair and the stable relationship, between relationships which have resulted in the birth of children and those which have not, and between couples who live together and couples who do not. Marriage law in this respect is different: you are either married with all the legal consequences that follow, or you are not. Your life circumstances are irrelevant. The consequences are to that extent invariable. By way of contrast, Parry[47] observes it is not perhaps surprising that the legal response to relationships outside marriage has been as variable as the relationships themselves. [48]

[180] Finally, government policy is clearly committed towards dealing with families in functional rather than definitional terms. Thus the Department of Population and Welfare Development defines family as follows:

> "Family: Individuals who either by contract or agreement choose to live together intimately and function as a unit in a social and economic system. The family is the > primary social unit which ideally provides care, nurturing and socialisation for its members. It seeks to provide them with physical, economic, emotional, social, cultural and spiritual security."[49]

Conclusion

[181] The SALRC Paper, the thrust of legislation and academic opinion all point in the same direction. It is towards establishing a new legal landscape consistent with the values of diversity, tolerance of difference and the concern for human dignity expressed in the Constitution. The emphasis shifts from locating conjugal rights and responsibilities exclusively within the tight framework of formalised marriages, towards embracing a wider canvass of rights and responsibilities so as to include all marriage-like, intimate and permanent family relationships. The problem at the heart of this case is that although the law has advanced rapidly in granting recognition to cohabitants in relation to public life and in respect of third parties, it has done little, if anything, to regulate relationships amongst themselves.

[182] One further introductory point needs to be made. At the hearing of the present matter none of the parties argued in principle against granting recognition to maintenance claims by cohabitant survivors. The intervention by the state was limited to seeking to ensure that the remedy does not have the effect of pre-empting comprehensive and thought-through legislative reform in the area.

FRAMING AND RESOLVING THE LEGAL QUESTION

(i) The origin and purpose of the Act

[183] It is in the above context that I turn to the question of whether the exclusion of non-married members of intimate life partnerships from the benefits of the Act constitutes unfair discrimination against them. It is convenient to begin the enquiry by examining the circumstances in which the Act was passed. Its genesis explains its object, which was to overcome a perceived source of injustice stemming from limitations of the common law.

[184] The decision of the Appellate Division in Glazer v Glazer N.O.[50] established that under the common law (as interpreted in 1963) no duty to support a disinherited surviving spouse rested on the deceased spouse's estate. In the course of his judgment, Steyn CJ said:

> "It is one thing to hold a divorced guilty husband liable for the maintenance of an innocent wife. To grant a needy widow a share in her husband's deceased estate or maintenance out of the assets in his estate, merely because she is indigent and without regard to other circumstances which may have influenced him in deliberately making no provision for her, is a somewhat different matter. The recognition of the obligation in the one case would not tend to prove the existence of a right in the other case."[51]

Pleas were long made for legislative intervention to overcome the harsh effects of implacably subordinating a widow's rights to her deceased husband's freedom of testation. They finally bore fruit in the form of the Act. The Act emanated from the recommendations of the South African Law Commission[52] to the effect that the institution of a legitimate portion[53] would not be the appropriate solution to the problem, and that a claim for maintenance should be given to the surviving spouse by operation of law. Rejecting the notion that the testator would not have disinherited the widow without good reason and that considerations of morality should play a role, the Commission stressed that the only consideration should be that of need.[54]

[185] It is convenient to set out once again the provisions of section 2(1) of the Act. They read:

> "If a marriage is dissolved by death after the commencement of this Act the survivor shall have a claim against the estate of the deceased spouse for the provision of his reasonable maintenance needs until his death or remarriage in so far as he is not able to provide therefor from his own means and earnings."

In terms of section 1 of the Act "survivor" is defined as "the surviving spouse in a marriage dissolved by death."

[53] That is, a portion of the estate secured for the widow or other defined members of the family that cannot be disposed of by will.

[54] Above n 52 at 34. See also Keyser "Law of Persons and Family Law" in 1990 Annual Survey of South African Law.

[186] In Daniels this Court recently observed that although linguistically gender-neutral, in substantive terms the Act[55] benefited mainly widows rather than widowers. The Court went on to say:

> "The value of non-sexism is foundational to our Constitution and requires a hard look at the reality of the lives that women have been compelled to lead by law and legally-backed social practices. This, in turn, necessitates acknowledging the constitutional goal of achieving substantive equality between men and women. The reality has been and still in large measure continues to be that in our patriarchal culture men find it easier than women to receive income and acquire property."[56] [Footnotes omitted.]

The Court stressed that the Act be seen as a measure intended primarily to rescue widows from possible penury. I would add that the survivor's need for maintenance is particularly acute if she finds herself penniless at a time of emotional bereavement accompanied by a dramatic change in life circumstances. To the extent, then, that the widow has a claim against the estate at least for her basic needs to be satisfied, the choice by the deceased not to provide for her by will (or simply the consequences of his failure to make a will) is to be overridden or disregarded.

(ii) The nature of the constitutional enquiry

[187] It is against this particular legal background, and within the broad legal landscape delineated in Part One of this judgment, that the question in this matter must be asked: given the manifest remedial purposes of the Act and the constitutional requirement of ensuring equal protection and benefit of the law, must the Act's ambit be extended to cover survivors of permanent life partnerships that have not been consecrated by marriage?

[55] Together with the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987.

[188] In what the SALRC Paper referred to as the Calvinistic and conservative atmosphere of the pre-constitutional era, the answer to this question would have been simple. People living in extra-marital unions would have been condemned at worst as living in sin, and at best as being irresponsible. They would have been disentitled from claiming any benefit whatsoever under the law. Today, however, we are not bound by the original intent of the legislators. We are living in an open and democratic society in which pluralism and diversity are acknowledged,[57] different forms of family life are tolerated by society and recognised by the law, and the right to equality is listed before any other right in our Constitution.

[189] Section 9(1) of the Constitution states that:

> "Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law."

This provision is given further texture by section 9(3) which provides:

> "The state may not unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds, including race, gender, sex, pregnancy, marital status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth."

[57] See Christian Education South Africa v Minister of Education 2000 (4) SA 757 (CC); 2000 (10) BCLR 1051 (CC).

Section 9(5) goes on to say that:

> "Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

The Constitution accordingly declares that everyone has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law, and expressly forbids unfair discrimination on the ground of marital status. So the legal issue before us is whether the non-inclusion of unmarried cohabitants under the Act violates their constitutional right not to be discriminated against on the ground of marital status.

[190] The restriction of the benefit to married survivors only, clearly differentiates them from unmarried survivors who share with them the status of bereavement and need after the death of their intimate life partner. All that distinguishes them is their marital status: the one group was married, and the other was not. This Court has held that once there is differentiation on one of the listed grounds, there is discrimination.[58] The only issue remaining, then, is whether the discrimination is fair.

(iii) The framework of the enquiry

[191] In considering the fairness of the Act it becomes vital to decide what the framework of the enquiry should be. In my view, the very nature of the equality enquiry requires a framework of reference that goes beyond the classificatory landscape established by the impugned measure itself. As Wilson J pointed out in the Canadian case of R v Turpin:

[58] See Pretoria City Council v Walker 1998 (2) SA 363 (CC); 1998 (3) BCLR 257 (CC) at para 35, where the argument (by myself) that at least some degree of prejudice or disadvantage had to be shown in order to establish discrimination, was rejected by the majority of the Court, which held that once there is differentiation on one of the listed grounds, discrimination is to be presumed.

> "[I]t is important to look not only at the impugned legislation which has created a distinction that violates the right to equality but also the larger social, political and legal context . . . . A finding that there is discrimination will, I think, in most but perhaps not all cases, necessarily entail a search for disadvantage that exists apart from and independent of the particular legal distinction being challenged."[59]

The larger socio-legal context has already been described. I will now examine the larger constitutional and legal context. In particular, I will give the reasons why I believe that the context for the analysis should be that of family law, and not just that of matrimonial law.

[192] The point of identifying differentiation on the grounds of marital status is to save from unfair treatment those families that cannot invoke the protections provided by matrimonial law. By implication, the enquiry must shift from the relatively precise, circumscribed and rule-governed terrain of matrimonial law to the wider and evolving fields of family law. It is important to note that the present case does not involve any attack on the rules and principles of matrimonial law. Indeed, the challenge is not to any malevolence in the Act, but to the limits of its beneficence.

[193] Supporting the need for enlarging the scope of family law, Goldblatt underlines in a helpful analysis that families need to be understood on the basis of the functions that they perform, rather than in terms of traditional categories. If we move away from defining relationships in terms of marriage, we can look at the actual functions that they perform in society.[60] The question asked is: where a domestic partnership has created responsibilities for, and expectations of, the parties, should the law play a role in enforcing the responsibilities and realising the expectations of the parties that are in conflict?[61]

[194] Goldblatt states further that the purpose of family law is to protect vulnerable members of families and to ensure fairness between the parties in family disputes. Women and children are vulnerable groups in our society and often become poorer when families break down.[62] A domestic partnership is but one amongst many different types of family and should be included within the definition of family for the purpose of family law. These relationships produce a sense of responsibility and commitment and create dependence between the parties. It also implies that the partners intend the relationship to be stable and enduring.[63]

[61] Id at 617. Goldblatt adds that the notion of separation of public and private spheres is advanced to justify non-intervention on the basis that the realm of the family should be seen as private (at 616). It is argued that the law should not intervene in this private sphere save to protect freedom as to whether to marry or not, with the consequences that follow, and freedom of testation. (It was this approach that underlay the reasoning of Steyn CJ in Glazer (above n 50*)*. Goldblatt argues, however, that such a libertarian ideology should not be allowed to perpetuate inequality by giving the powerful the opportunity to remain outside the law's reach with regard to domestic relationships. She contends, correctly in my view, that the lack of legal protection afforded to domestic partnerships increases the vulnerability of the groups living within such arrangements (at 611).

[195] Goldblatt notes that more than a million South Africans are in non-marital relationships with their intimate partners. These 'domestic partnerships' play a crucial role in meeting the financial, emotional, reproductive and other needs of their members. There are many reasons why people, often across race and class divides, cohabit without marrying. One of the main reasons for the prevalence of such relationships in South Africa is the extent of migrancy in our country.[64] She observes that many men marry in the rural areas and form domestic partnerships in the urban areas which are often lengthy and committed.[65]

[196] The issue in the present matter, then, is not whether it is fair for the state to single out married partners for claims of maintenance, as opposed, say, to siblings or parents or life-long friends of the deceased. Nor is it to decide whether widows are entitled to special consideration not accorded to other persons who might be alone, elderly and in need. It is, first, to examine the specific purpose that the Act is intended to serve in the context of the overall objectives of family law. Then it is to determine whether in substantive terms the committed life partner of the deceased bears the same relationship to the deceased in every respect as a married partner, save for not having gone through the formalities of marriage. Finally, it is to decide if such person in such circumstances can fairly be excluded from that benefit.

(iv) Marital status as a ground of unfair discrimination

[64] Id at 610.

[65] Id

[197] In considering the question of fairness I do not believe that a mechanical application of the presumption of unfairness provided by section 9(5) of the Constitution takes the matter very far. Rather, analysis should begin with identification of the specific kinds of marginalisation and exclusion which led to the identification of marital status as a constitutionally outlawed ground of unfair discrimination.

[198] These would include the directly discriminatory practices of the past, such as penalising women for being married (e.g. women teachers and civil servants who automatically lost their employment on marriage on the basis that they could not hold down a job and look after their husbands and children at the same time); or penalising women for not being married (e.g. for bringing disgrace on an institution, neighbourhood, building or workplace by having a child 'out of wedlock'); or treating married women as losing the autonomy they formerly had as single women, because from marriage onwards they required their husband's consent for various legal transactions. Alternatively, certain posts, such as ambassadorships, were as a matter of practice reserved for married people only. In addition, there were indirect forms of disadvantage affecting people not living as a married couple. Thus single parents, widows and widowers could be denied housing, or suffer from tax or social security disadvantages or be refused mortgages because they did not fit the format of the married and male-headed-couple household.

[199] Two points need to be noted. First, it is women rather than men who in general suffered disadvantage because of their status of being married or not married. Any investigation of unfairness resulting from marital status would accordingly have to take account of the manner in which patriarchy resulted in elements of structured advantage and disadvantage being associated with the status of being and not being married.

[200] The second is that by the time the Constitution was adopted, legal disabilities associated with being married had been eliminated from the common law. Nevertheless, marital status was expressly identified in section 9(3) as one of the grounds of potential discrimination. This would seem to suggest that it was included precisely to protect the rights of people who were vulnerable not because they were married, but because they were not married. It is not easy to see why, if it was not regarded as a prototypical source of unfair discrimination in our society, marital status was itemised in section 9(3) in the first place. By implication its inclusion problematises the vulnerability of the unmarried, and directs constitutional attention to the specific difficulties they face. The obvious classes of people requiring protection against unfair discrimination in this category would be single parents, divorcees, widows, gay and lesbian couples and cohabitants.

[201] Once more it will be instructive to look at the manner in which the Canadian Supreme Court has approached the question. In Miron,[66] where the applicants challenged an accident compensation statute on the grounds that it provided for the needs of married dependents only, McLachlin J held as follows:

> "Exclusion of unmarried partners from accident benefits available to married partners under the policy violates s. 15(1) of the Charter. Denial of equal benefit on the basis of marital status is established in this case, and marital status is an analogous ground of discrimination for purposes of s. 15(1). First, discrimination on that basis touches the essential dignity and worth of the individual in the same way as other recognized grounds of discrimination violative of fundamental human rights norms. Second, marital status possesses characteristics often associated with recognized grounds of discrimination under s. 15(1). Persons involved in an unmarried relationship constitute an historically disadvantaged group, even though the disadvantage has greatly diminished in recent years. A third characteristic sometimes associated with analogous grounds, namely distinctions founded on personal, immutable characteristics, is also present, albeit in attenuated form. While in theory, the individual is free to choose whether to marry or not to marry, in practice the reality may be otherwise. Since the essential elements necessary to engage the overarching purpose of s. 15(1) — violation of dignity and freedom, an historical group disadvantage, and the danger of stereotypical group-based decision-making — are present, discrimination is made out."[67]

[202] The point was reinforced in the same matter by L'Heureux-Dubé J, who stated that the question whether or not persons in relationships analogous to marriage have typically suffered historical disadvantage is not clear-cut, partly because the modern phenomenon of common law cohabitation as an alternative to marriage is a comparatively recent one. She went on to observe that the subgroups within the ground of marital status that have typically suffered the most historical disadvantage and marginalisation are individuals who are single parents, or are divorced or separated. The mere fact that the common law spouses are not in the first group that comes to mind when considering historical disadvantage does not mean, however, that such relationships have escaped completely from societal opprobrium.[68] She concluded that in fact

> "non-traditional relationships outside of marriage have in the past generally been frowned upon and considered undesirable by large portions of society. Only recently have they come to be increasingly accepted. That they have become more accepted does not mean, however, that they are now accepted without reservation into the mainstream of society.
> I therefore have no difficulty concluding that persons in opposite-sex relationships analogous to marriage have suffered, and continue to suffer, some disadvantage, disapproval and marginalization in society, and are therefore somewhat sensitive to legislative distinctions having prejudicial effects."[69]

[203] South African society has indeed become far more tolerant than it once was towards different ways of creating families, including cohabitation not formalised in marriage. Yet there can be no doubt that many prejudices of the past linger on, particularly against women who are seen as not conducting their lives in a manner befitting their culture or religion. A certain degree of conventional disdain coupled with moral disapproval is still directed at unmarried couples. By the very nature of their unconventional relationship they are regarded as either immoral, irresponsible or defiant. This will be irrespective of the actual degree of commitment, seriousness and stability of their family relationships.

[69] Id at 469-70.

[204] It is important to stress at this point that the issue is not whether members of religious or cultural communities should as a matter of faith be free to regard marriage as a sacred contract which constitutes the only acceptable gateway to legitimate sexual intimacy and cohabitation. Nor is it to query the corollary right of such believers to condemn those who are guilty of what they may regard as fornication and adultery. Clearly their entitlement as part of their religious belief to criticise what they regard as misconduct remains unchallenged. The question, rather, is whether the state should be bound by such concerns. Going further, it is whether the state is required or entitled by these, or by more secular considerations, to give exclusive recognition for purposes of spousal maintenance to married survivors only. In seeking to answer this question, I will consider why the state gives pre-eminence to the institution of marriage, examine the constitutional values that marriage both embodies and promotes, and then ask whether these require that marriage be given absolute status under the Act.

(v) The institution of marriage

[205] In Satchwell[70] this Court acknowledged the role of marriage in society in the following terms:

> "In terms of our common law, marriage creates a physical, moral and spiritual community of law which imposes reciprocal duties of cohabitation and support. The > formation of such relationships is a matter of profound importance to the parties, and indeed to their families and is of great social value and significance."[71]

As the SALRC Paper comments, the rights and obligations associated with marriage are vast. Besides the religious and social importance of marriage, marriage as an institution was (at the time the SALRC Paper was produced) the only source of socio-economic benefits such as the right to inheritance, medical insurance coverage, adoption, access to wrongful death claims, spousal benefits, bereavement leave, tax advantages and post-divorce rights.[72] The SALRC Paper adds that marriage is also important in regulating the legitimacy of children and the financial relationship between the parties on breakdown of the relationship.[73]

[206] As this Court said in Dawood,[74] "[t]he decision to enter into a marriage relationship and to sustain such a relationship is a matter of defining significance for many if not most, people . . . ." I would add that our painful history provides additional reasons why the institution of marriage should receive support. In the pre-democratic era the racist policies of the state involved disgraceful use of the law in ways that showed profound disrespect for the marriages of the majority. Thus the migrant labour system, administered under racist laws and enforced by racist courts, deliberately targeted the self-sufficiency and autonomy of rural African families, forcing married men to live in what were called bachelor quarters in the towns. Prohibitions on inter-racial marriage and the refusal of the law to recognise Hindu and Muslim marriages prevented people from marrying persons of their choice and from receiving recognition of the marriage rites and ceremonies appropriate to their beliefs. A host of laws permitted gross intrusion by police and state officials into the intimate lives of the majority, who as a result were compelled to live in chaotic social and legal circumstances. Special support for marriage today accordingly helps heal the ravages of the past. It promotes social stability and supports dignity by giving state recognition to fundamental choices people make about their lives.

[207] Formalisation of marriages provides for valuable public documentation. The parties are identified, the dates of celebration and dissolution are stipulated, and all the multifarious and socially important steps which the public administration is required to make in connection with children and property, are facilitated. Furthermore, the commitment of the parties to fulfil their responsibilities is solemnly and publicly undertaken. This is particularly important in imposing clear legal duties on the party who is in the stronger position economically. And, since the economically advantaged party is usually the man, the result in general terms is that the solemnisation of marriage tends to favour gender equality rather than the reverse.

[208] There can accordingly be no doubt that the institution of marriage is entitled to very special recognition and protection by the law. The issue, however, is not whether marriage should in many respects be privileged. Clearly it has to be. The question is whether it must be exclusive.

[209] For convenience, I will refer to the principle of restricting claims under the Act to married survivors only, as the 'exclusivity principle'. The first constitutional issue, then, is whether the exclusivity principle is compatible with the prohibition of unfair discrimination on the grounds of marital status. If it is held to be unfair, the next matter for decision is whether such unfairness is justifiable under section 36 of the Constitution.[75] It is not easy to separate the question of fairness from that of justification, since each involves elements of proportionate balancing, and inevitably there will be overlap between them. Nevertheless I will deal with each in turn, on the basis that the focus of fairness is on the impact on the interests of those affected, while the emphasis in the case of justification is on the public interest.

(vi) The fairness of limiting the benefits of the Act to married persons only

[75] Section 36 (1) states the following:

> "The rights in the Bill of Rights may be limited only in terms of law of general application to the extent that the limitation is reasonable and justifiable in an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom, taking into account all relevant factors, including —
> (a) the nature of the right;
> (b) the importance of the purpose of the limitation;
> (c) the nature and extent of the limitation;
> (d) the relation between the limitation and its purpose; and
> (e) less restrictive means to achieve the purpose."

[210] Any consideration of the fairness of the exclusivity principle must take account of this Court's emphasis on the need to recognise diversity of family formations in South Africa. In the First Certification case[76] the Court stated that:

> "Families are constituted, function and are dissolved in such a variety of ways, and the possible outcomes of constitutionalising family rights are so uncertain, that constitution-makers appear frequently to prefer not to regard the right to marry or to pursue family life as a fundamental right that is appropriate for definition in constitutionalised terms."[77]

In Dawood[78] O'Regan J said that:

> "[F]amilies come in many shapes and sizes. The definition of the family also changes as social practices and traditions change. In recognising the importance of the family, we must take care not to entrench particular forms of family at the expense of other forms."[Footnote omitted.]

Ackermann J made similar statements in National Coalition (2),[79] dealing with the rights of same-sex life partners:

> "It is important to emphasise that over the past decades an accelerating process of transformation has taken place in family relationships, as well as in societal and legal concepts regarding the family and what it comprises. Sinclair and Heaton, after alluding to the profound transformations of the legal relationships between family members that have taken place in the past, comment as follows on the present:

>
> Itself a country where considerable political and socio-economic movement has been and is taking place, South Africa occupies a distinctive position in the context of developments in the legal relationship between family members and between the State and the family. Its heterogeneous society is "fissured by differences of language, religion, race, cultural habit, historical experience and self-definition" and, consequently, reflects widely varying expectations about marriage, family life and the position of women in society.'" [Reference omitted.]

Similarly, Skweyiya J in Du Toit[80] emphasised:

> "[F]amily life as contemplated by the Constitution can be provided in different ways and that legal conceptions of the family and what constitutes family life should change as social practices and traditions change."[Reference omitted.]

[211] In each of the above matters there was a specific legal issue which prompted a general observation about the need to adopt a flexible and evolutionary approach to family life.[81] I do not think it is appropriate to cherry-pick statements from the above cases simply on the basis that they appear to be favourable to any particular outcome in the present matter. Though all highlight the importance of the courts not being

[80] Du Toit and Another v Minister of Welfare and Population Development and Others (Lesbian and Gay Equality Project as Amicus Curiae) 2003 (2) SA 198 (CC); 2002 (10) BCLR 1006 (CC) at para 19.

[81] Thus, in the First Certification case the question was whether the failure of the Bill of Rights expressly to include a right to marry and constitute a family was inconsistent with one of the principles binding on the Constitutional Assembly. In Dawood the reminder about diversity and not entrenching particular forms of family, was expressed. National Coalition (2) and Du Toit were both concerned with same-sex couples who, in terms of the common law definition of marriage and in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961, were not able to get their unions recognised as marriages even if they so wished. The same jurisprudential movement away from giving legal recognition only to registered marriages was reflected in Daniels, which dealt in part with the Act which is being considered in the present matter.

bound by traditional views of how families should properly be constituted, none deals expressly and directly with the issue of the rights of unmarried heterosexual life partners. Indeed, each case underlines how important its specific social, historical and legal context is.[82]

[212] The one unifying theme lurking in the evolving approach to all the different forms of family units being created is that the general purpose of family law is to promote stability, responsibility and equity in intimate family relations. In this context it is significant that the specific objective of the Act is to furnish a preferred claim to a survivor who is not otherwise provided for and finds herself in need. In the present matter, hardship on its own, even if associated with the status of not being married, would not in itself be sufficient to establish unfairness. The Constitution does not seek to take to its bosom and respond to all the inequities to be found in our society. Not every unfairness in life becomes unfairness in law. In order for unfairness in a constitutional sense to be established, there must be a specific link between the survivor's intimate relationship with the deceased, her state of need, the overall appropriateness in the circumstances of debarring her from being able to claim maintenance, and the resulting impact on her dignity of re-inforcing the negative type-casting of her as an unworthy person because she was not married.

[82] Thus the cases concerning the rights of same-sex partners can be distinguished from the present one on the basis that gay and lesbian couples could not marry, even if they wished to do so. At the same time, these cases established that difficulties of proving that such unions constituted permanent life partnerships, could be overcome, and gave guidance as to how this should be done. In Daniels, on the other hand, there was no legal impediment to persons who were Muslim from formalising their marriages under the Marriage Act, which they could do either by following up their religious ceremonies with a civil one, or else by being married by an Imam who was recognised as a marriage officer. The exercise of choice not to regularise the unions under the Marriage Act had to be understood in the context of the hegemonic exclusion from recognition of Muslim marriages effected by the common law as applied by the courts in the pre-constitutional era. There was thus no reason for interpreting the word "spouse" in the Act (as well as in the Intestate Succession Act) so as not to include them. In that matter, then, the fact that they chose not to formalise their marriages under the Marriage Act did not debar them from claiming maintenance under the Act (or a share of the estate under the Intestate Succession Act). I will go no further than suggesting that the cases provide three indications of indirect relevance to the issues before us. The first is that, while pronouncing emphatically on the need not to straight-jacket families in conventional forms, this Court has expressly refrained from taking any position for or against the recognition of heterosexual unmarried life partnerships. The second is that in relation to questions of how to prove the existence of permanent life partnerships, one may say that in the case of a non-formalised union, where there is a judicial will, there will be a judicial way, and problems of proof will be overcome. The third is that a choice not to formalise one's relationship under the Marriage Act will not inevitably and of itself extinguish a claim by a survivor to maintenance under the Act (Daniels above n 45). It is the context that must be decisive, and in particular the social, political and legal factors which are said to have produced the discriminatory treatment resulting in unfairness.

[213] The critical question accordingly must be: is there a familial nexus of such proximity and intensity between the survivor and the deceased as to render it manifestly unfair to deny her the right to claim maintenance from the estate on the same basis as she would have had if she and the deceased had been married? I believe that there are in fact at least two circumstances in which, applying this test, it would be unfair to exclude permanent, non-married life partners from the benefits of the Act.

[214] The first would be where the parties have freely and seriously committed themselves to a life of interdependence marked by express or tacit undertakings to provide each other with emotional and material support. The unfairness of the exclusion would be particularly evident if the undertakings had been expressed in the form of a legal document. Such a document would satisfy the need to have certainty, at least inasmuch as it establishes a clear commitment to provide mutual support within their respective means and according to their particular needs. Like a marriage certificate, the document would thus both prove the seriousness of the commitment and at the same time satisfy the need for certainty.

[215] What should be central, however, is the serious content of the mutual commitment and not the particular form in which it is expressed. Thus the undertaking could be inferred from conduct that clearly established a relationship acknowledging a mutual duty of support. In Satchwell[83] Madala J pointed out that:

> "[H]istorically our law has only recognised marriages between heterosexual spouses. This narrowness of focus has excluded many relationships which create similar obligations and have a similar social value.
> The law attaches a duty of support to various family relationships, for example, husband and wife, and parent and child. In a society where the range of family formations has widened, such a duty of support may be inferred as a matter of fact in certain cases of persons involved in permanent, same-sex life partnerships. Whether such a duty exists or not will depend on the circumstances of each case."[84]

These sentiments were directed specifically at the situation of same-sex couples. I believe that a similar approach would be apposite in the case of cohabitants. What Satchwell establishes is that one can infer as a matter of fact whether a duty exists, not from any principle of the common law, but from the actual life circumstances of the parties in each case.

[216] Unless the purpose of the Maintenance Act is to stigmatise unmarried life partners as being beyond the pale, I can see little reason in fairness why the responsibility for maintenance should not survive the death of a partner where either by express or by tacit agreement, each has undertaken as part of their relationship to support the other within his or her means. If anything, the element of voluntarism and autonomy is particularly strong in these circumstances. Resistant to acknowledging the need to respect such undertakings are notions in society of 'living in sin' and 'bohemianism', reminiscent of stereotypical notions imposed by the intransigent 'Calvinist and conservative' public morality of yesteryear. Whether consciously expressed or unconsciously held, these are inappropriate for an open and democratic society that acknowledges diversity of lifestyle and bases itself on respect for human dignity, equality and freedom.

[217] In considering the claims of manifestly meritorious survivors any eagerness to uphold mainstream respectability must accordingly cede to the need to acknowledge the reality of committed, if heterodox, family relationships. The issue should not be seen exclusively as one of the sanctity of marriage, or simply of the important social purpose that marriage serves, but as one of the integrity of the family relationship. Conventional condemnation of such relationships, though less powerful than it used to be, is a dangerous backcloth against which to consider fundamental rights. The danger lies precisely in the apparently natural and commonsensical character of regarding marriage as normal and anything outside of it as deviant, thoughtless, bizarre or objectionable.

[218] Secondly, I am of the view that responsibility for maintenance can arise not only from express or tacit agreement but directly from the nature of the particular life partnership itself. The critical factor will be whether the relationship was such as to produce dependency for the party who, in material terms at least, was the weaker and more vulnerable one (and who, in all probability, would have been unable to insist that the deceased enter into formal marriage). The reciprocity would be based on care and concern rather than on providing equal support in material or financial terms.

[219] One thinks of the woman who bore children fathered by the deceased, looked after them in infancy, saw them through school, cared for the home, attended to the needs of the deceased and nursed him through sickness and the infirmities of old age. While he earned and accumulated assets, she nurtured the family and remained penniless. Because of the way in which our patriarchal society has allocated roles and responsibilities, it will not have been unusual for the deceased to have accumulated assets and paid towards the upkeep of the home, while the survivor contributed what she had to offer, namely, her care and sweat equity. The deceased might in fact have resisted requests by her that they get married in terms of their religion or before a magistrate. Yet whether or not she can show that she sought marriage and he did not, the crucial fact remains that there is a direct relationship between her present need and her past relationship with the deceased. In the words of the Equality Act, what matters is whether in the relationship there was a commitment to reciprocal support.

[220] In the not uncommon circumstances mentioned above the nexus between the survivor and the estate is so strong that I do not think any meaningful distinction can be drawn between what is legally unfair and what is socially and morally unfair. It must be borne in mind that the claim is not being brought to establish unfairness under the common law, or even to show that the common law itself is unfair. The issue is whether the statute, interpreted in the light of the common law as it stands, impacts unfairly on a class of persons because of their marital status. Had the purpose of the Act been primarily to promote marriage as an institution, it might not have been unfair to exclude unmarried people from its reach. The purpose of the Act, however, was to provide a statutory claim against the estate for recently bereaved widows in need. The key ingredients are the familial relationship, intimacy and need. Taking them in combination, in the circumstances of the very typical example given above, I conclude that to exclude the survivor simply because she has no marriage certificate, is not only socially harsh, it is legally unfair.

[221] Maintenance by its nature is concerned with survival. Relegation to poverty, coupled with the imputation of having been a lawless interloper in the life of the deceased, severely affronts the dignity of the survivor. The indignity is all the greater where the relationship with the deceased was marked by intense mutuality of concern and freely given reciprocal support.[85] Where legal formulae function in a

[85] The disrespect is intensified if the only question asked relates to who contractually undertook to provide money or goods. Contributions are made according to ability and in response to need. In Satchwell what was at issue was a potentially sizeable claim for a survivor's pension chargeable against the public purse. In these circumstances the need to establish reciprocity of spousal-like undertakings of support was particularly strong. In the case of a claim based on subsistence needs against the very estate that the survivor contributed to through years of devoted support, the material interdependency should be seen as part of a broad mutual undertaking to provide the kind of reciprocal support that binds intimate partners together.

stereotypical manner that is impertinent to those affected, serious equality issues are engaged. As so often happens in cases where prejudice is habitual and mainstream, the hurt to those affected is not even comprehended by those who cause it, and passes unnoticed by members of the mainstream.

[222] I should add that while it is true that caring for one's family is one of life's great joys, and as such calls for no extra reward, fairness does not inevitably translate into sacrifice. As this Court said in Baloyi,[86] the purpose of constitutional law is to convert misfortune to be endured into injustice to be remedied.[87] It would indeed be a perverse interpretation of family law that obliged one to disregard the fact that the circumstances of need in which a typical survivor might find herself, were produced precisely by her selfless devotion to the deceased and their family during his lifetime. I believe it is socially unrealistic, unduly moralistic and hence constitutionally unfair, for the Act to discriminate against the powerless and economically dependent party, now threatened with destitution, on the basis that she should either have insisted on marriage or else withdrawn from the relationship.

[223] The issues are not simple. There is a great social need to promote marriage as an institution which provides stability, security and predictability for intimate family relations. By so doing our society stresses the importance of people taking responsibility for their lives, and showing respect for the fact that they are members of a law-governed and interdependent community. It encourages self-reliance and self empowerment; helps people escape from a world made up of victimisers and victims into one consisting of free and equal people; and induces the previously disadvantaged and subordinated to advance in life by calling on their inner strengths rather than allowing themselves to fall into dependence on external support.

[86] Above n 20.

[224] At the same time it is necessary to acknowledge and respond in a sensitive and practical manner to the fact that people have had to accommodate themselves to harsh and diverse life circumstances over which they may have had little control. Many have been obliged to shoulder burdens heavier than any notion of fairness would tolerate. All measures aimed at redistribution of such uneven loads, whether through family law or welfare law, risk being criticised as being calculated to undermine self-reliance. Yet, while over-paternalism can be disempowering and negate the very objective of achieving equality, what has disparagingly been called the concept of judicial tough love[88] can be unduly insensitive to the actual and overwhelming problems people have had to face in life. The knowledge that the law will intervene to provide basic justice will in fact assist such people to overcome a sense of helplessness and fatalism. That, indeed, is why courts intervene to protect fundamental rights. In so doing they enhance rather than undermine dignity and self-respect.

[88] Roberts Clarence Thomas and the Tough Love Crowd (New York University Press, 1995).

[225] The reality against which the Act must be interpreted is that many recently bereaved, elderly, and poor women find themselves with no assets or savings other than their clothing and cooking utensils, little chance of employment and only the prospect of a state old-age pension to keep them from penury. Thus, while it is necessary to emphasise the importance of people taking responsibility for their lives, and to acknowledge the extraordinary self-reliance shown by many women in the face of extreme hardship, the law cannot ignore the fact that lack of resources has left many women with harsh options only. Their choice has been between destitution, prostitution and loneliness, on the one hand, and continuing cohabitation with a person who was unwilling or unable to marry them on the other. Any consideration of the fairness or otherwise of excluding from maintenance claims people who chose the latter path, must take account of this.

[226] It follows from the above that the exclusivity principle operates unfairly in at least two broadly defined sets of circumstance, neither of which is so far-fetched, hypothetical or unusual as to escape the net of constitutional concern. In each case the unfairness operates both directly and indirectly. In direct terms it treats the unmarried claimants in a way that disrespects the actual commitment they have shown to their families through a lifetime of endeavour, while excluding them from being potential beneficiaries under the Act. Furthermore, it tells the world that there is something unworthy and not respectable about them because they had a family without getting married. Indirectly, it impacts on all persons living in permanent intimate life partnerships outside of marriage. It reinforces the stereotype that, irrespective of the actual character of their relationship and the reality of their commitment to each other, they are all irresponsible and unconcerned about the need to live in a good family relationship that is infused with love, concern and mutual support.

[227] There might well be other circumstances in which it would be unfair to stigmatise a surviving cohabitant as being unworthy of claiming spousal maintenance. The two examples given, however, are sufficient to establish that the Act is invalid for under-inclusivity. I conclude therefore that the blanket nature of the exclusivity principle results in unfair discrimination in conflict with section 9(3) of the Constitution.

Justifiability

[228] There appear to be two possible arguments based on public interest which could be advanced in favour of justifying retention of the exclusivity principle, in spite of the fact that it operates unfairly.

[229] The first is connected with problems of proof. The argument is that the absence of a marriage certificate makes it difficult to determine whether the life partnership ever existed or whether it continued until the death of the deceased. There are undoubtedly great advantages in terms of certainty that flow from the registration of marriages, and concomitant disadvantages related to difficulties of proof which would result from the proposed recognition for certain purposes of non-formalised cohabitation.

[230] It needs to be remembered, however, that the claim for maintenance stems from the social regard to be given to commitment, intimacy, interdependency and stability in the family. In the case of a married survivor these will be presumed to have existed as a matter of law. However brief, unstable and non-intimate the marriage might have been, the certificate alone would suffice to grant a claim. In the case of the unmarried survivor, on the other hand, the partnership relationship would have to be proved as a matter of fact.

[231] As the SALRC Paper makes clear, the problems of proof are far from insuperable.[89] The many statutes that have encompassed the rights of cohabitants since the achievement of democracy presuppose that appropriate proof can be found. The SALRC Paper shows[90] that there is rich international experience[91] that can be

[90] Id chapter 6 at 72-158.

[91] The Property (Relationships) Act 1984 (NSW) of New South Wales, Australia provides a useful example of a broad definition coupled with indicators for use by the court. Section 4 of the Act states the following:

"De facto relationships

(1) For the purposes of this Act, a de facto relationship is a relationship between two adult persons:

(a) who live together as a couple, and
(b) who are not married to one another or related by family.

(2) In determining whether two persons are in a de facto relationship, all the circumstances of the relationship are to be taken into account, including such of the following matters as may be relevant in a particular case:

(a) the duration of the relationship,
(b) the nature and extent of common residence,
(c) whether or not a sexual relationship exists,
(d) the degree of financial dependence or interdependence, and any arrangements for financial support, between the parties,
(e) the ownership, use and acquisition of property,
(f) the degree of mutual commitment to a shared life,
(g) the care and support of children,
(h) the performance of household duties, drawn on. In addition it is possible to build on and adapt the factors already enunciated by this Court in relation to problems of proof concerning same-sex committed life partnerships.[92]

[232] In my view, then, such difficulties of proof as exist might be of relevance to the remedy that should be crafted. They do not justify the continuation of unfair treatment to manifestly meritorious survivors who find themselves in need after a lifetime of devotion to the family relationship.

[233] The second and more substantial contention put forward to justify the exclusivity principle is that any departure from it would undermine the institution of marriage, which must be supported at all costs. As this judgment has indicated, the

(i) the reputation and public aspects of the relationship.

(3) No finding in respect of any of the matters mentioned in subsection (2)(a)-(i), or in respect of any combination of them, is to be regarded as necessary for the existence of a de facto relationship, and a court determining whether such a relationship exists is entitled to have regard to such matters, and to attach such weight to any matter, as may seem appropriate to the court in the circumstances of the case.

(4) Except as provided by section 6, a reference in this Act to a party to a de facto relationship includes a reference to a person who, whether before or after the commencement of this subsection, was a party to such a relationship."

[92] In National Coalition (2) above n 79 at para 88, the following factors were considered in order to decide whether a same-sex life partnership is permanent: "the respective ages of the partners; the duration of the partnership; whether the partners took part in a ceremony manifesting their intention to enter into a permanent partnership, what the nature of that ceremony was and who attended it; how the partnership is viewed by the relations and friends of the partners; whether the partners share a common abode; whether the partners own or lease the common abode jointly; whether and to what extent the partners share responsibility for living expenses and the upkeep for the joint home; whether and to what extent one partner provides financial support for the other; whether and to what extent the partners have made provision for one another in relation to medical, pension and related benefits; whether there is a partnership agreement and what its contents are; and whether and to what extent the partners have made provision in their wills for one another." The Court noted that "[n]one of these considerations are indispensable for establishing a permanent partnership."

I would add that in the case of heterosexual permanent partnerships proof would generally be easier. There would be a much greater likelihood of children, and not having had to cope with homophobia, the partners would have been freer to associate in public as an intimate couple.

institution of marriage plays a particularly important role in South Africa today and must without doubt be supported by the law. It is not clear to me, however, how marriage is dignified through the imposition of unfairness on those who for one reason or another live their lives outside of it.

[234] The law would continue to privilege marriage, even if partnerships are given limited recognition. The purpose of family law is to promote stability and fairness in family relationships. Marriage is the most widely recognised and most straightforward way of achieving this. The law recognises this fact. Mere production of a marriage certificate is sufficient to establish the degree of commitment and seriousness that the Act requires. No proof need be provided of permanency, intimacy, cohabitation, fidelity or shared lives. The law attributes to marriage all these qualities in irrebutable fashion. It will continue to privilege married survivors. Thus, even if the executors of the estate could show that none of the above qualities existed in fact, the survivor would still be able to lodge a claim for maintenance, simply on the basis that she and the deceased had been married.

[235] Furthermore, whether or not Parliament decides one day to narrow or eliminate the gap between married couples and unmarried life partners, I do not believe that in the interim the institution of marriage can only survive if alternative forms of family organisation are disregarded in all circumstances. Indeed, the element of voluntariness which lies at the heart of marriage is threatened rather than enhanced if people feel coerced into marrying for fear of adverse consequences if they fail to do so.

[236] It follows that the continued blanket exclusion of domestic partners from the ambit of the Act, irrespective of the degree of commitment shown to the family by the survivor, cannot be justified. The Act is accordingly invalid to the extent that it excludes unmarried survivors of permanent intimate life partnerships as identified above, from pursuing claims for maintenance.

PART THREE

THE REMEDY

[237] The Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development points out that a law reform process is currently underway which seeks to make a determination on whether domestic partnerships should be protected, and if so, exactly how that protection should be secured. She states that the South African Law Reform Commission is considering proposals for law reform with regard to the following issues:

- whether domestic partnerships should be legally recognised and regulated;
- whether marital rights and obligations should be further extended to domestic partnerships;
- whether a scheme of registered partnerships should be introduced;

- whether marital rights, obligations and benefits should require registration or marriage and which should depend only on the existence of a domestic relationship;
- whether legislation should provide for same-sex marriage; and
- whether marital rights and obligations should be further extended to people living in interdependent relationships having no sexual element.

There are various options currently being considered by the South African Law Reform Commission. These may be broadly divided into the following categories:

1.1. Same sex partnerships;

1.2. Registered partnerships; or

1.3. Unregistered partnerships.

The Minister accordingly avers that the backdrop against which relief by this Court must be viewed is that it should not stifle the law reform process that is currently underway.

[238] I find these arguments persuasive. The very factor which gives rise to constitutional concern, namely, the huge variety of non-standard family relationships in South Africa, is the one that makes crafting a remedy in the present matter particularly difficult. Problems of proof arise, and although not insuperable, as the gay and lesbian permanent life partnership cases showed, they pose difficulties. There are problems about de facto polygamy. There are difficulties of overlap and interaction between various statutes, as well as potential impact on the common law.

Third parties stand to be affected. It has implications for inheritance law. Above all, we are concerned with sensitive social issues requiring maximum impact from all concerned. They cry out for democratic debate and legislative solution. I believe that over-ambitious judicial prescription could impede comprehensive legislative reform and retard rather than advance the achievement of fairness in this field.

[239] In these circumstances I believe the best way forward is to follow a non-prescriptive remedial path. I would declare the Act to be unconstitutional to the extent of the inconsistency outlined in this judgment, and suspend the operation of the declaration of invalidity for two years. This would give Parliament a free hand as to how the under-inclusiveness of the Act should best be remedied.

[240] The question then arises as to whether a special order would need to be made to vindicate any entitlement of the applicant in this matter. I believe not. This is not because I have doubts as to whether her relationship was of a kind that merited the protection of the Act. Acceptance of a duty of mutual support was built into the relationship of interdependence between herself and the deceased. This was not a casual affair but a committed, enduring and intensely intimate[93] marriage-like relationship, one that survived over many years all the stresses of the bipolar condition which affected the moods of the deceased. She provided what she had to offer,

[93] As the Canadian Law Commission points out in its report on recognising and supporting close personal adult legal relationships:

> "People value their close personal relationships for the quality of care and support they provide. Intimates usually provide the most meaningful forms of care and support, such as sharing resources to provide food, shelter and clothing, providing personal services and guidance, attending to emotional needs, volunteering information or advice, or using abilities or skills to offer assistance in solving problems." Above n 31.

namely, companionship, management of the household and personal support in every way, while he contributed companionship and a regular allowance for her needs and the needs of the household. Tacitly, if not expressly, a clear duty of mutual support was undertaken. What deprives her of the right to be a claimant now is the fact that reasonable provision has in fact been made for her under the will.

[241] It should be noted, however, that an important part of her objective in bringing the case (with the support of the Women's Legal Centre) was to highlight the marginalisation by the law of women cohabitants in situations similar to hers. I believe that guided by the principles outlined above, the legislature is constitutionally obliged to determine and provide for the circumstances in which permanent life partnerships should qualify for maintenance. In the result, to the extent that in my view the litigation should lead to a declaration of invalidity on the grounds of under-inclusivity, the applicant should have the satisfaction of succeeding in her moral objective, if not in her material one.

[242] Since preparing this judgment I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment by Mokgoro and O'Regan JJ. In succinct terms, and through a close examination of how family law operates in the broad landscape of our legal system today, it captures core aspects of the reasoning which I believe should govern this matter. Though I prefer to locate the issues in a wider context, I align myself with the specific considerations they advance, and concur in the order they propose.

JUDGMENT

NKABINDE J:

Introduction

[1] Before us is an application for confirmation of a declaration of constitutional invalidity of section 1(4)(f) of the Intestate Succession Act[1] (the Act) made by Van Reenen J in the Western Cape High Court, Cape Town.[2] The declaration has been referred to this Court pursuant to section 172(2)(a) of the Constitution.[3] The impugned provisions were found to exclude widows of polygynous[4] marriages celebrated according to the tenets of the Muslim religious faith in a discriminatory manner from the protection of the Act. In essence, this case concerns the proprietary consequences of a polygynous Muslim marriage within the context of intestate succession.

[2] The pertinent parts of the order of the High Court read:

> "23.2 It is declared that section 1(4)(f) of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 is inconsistent with the Constitution, to the extent that it makes provision for only one spouse in a Muslim marriage to be an heir in the intestate estate of their deceased husband.
>
> 23.3 Section 1(4)(f) of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 is to be read as though the whole of it was substituted by the following:
>
> 'In the application of sections 1(1)(c)(i) to the estate of a deceased person who is survived by more than one spouse:

[1] 81 of 1987.

[2] Reported as Hassam v Jacobs NO and Others [2008] 4 All SA 350 (C).

[3] Section 172(2)(a) provides:

> "The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court."

[4] "Polygyny" means having more than one wife whereas "polygamy" means having more than one wife or husband see Concise Oxford English Dictionary 7ed (Oxford University Press 2005). According to the tenets of Muslim personal law, only men may have more than one spouse, so it is more accurate to speak of polygyny than polygamy. See the helpful discussion of these terms in Bennett Customary Law in South Africa (Juta, Cape Town 2004) at 243.

(a) A child's share in relation to the intestate estate of the deceased, shall be calculated by dividing the monetary value of the estate by a number equal to the number of the children of the deceased who have either survived or predeceased such deceased person but are survived by their descendants, plus the number of spouses who have survived such deceased;

(b) Each surviving spouse shall inherit a child's share of the intestate estate or so much of the intestate estate as does not exceed in value the amount fixed from time to time by the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development by notice in the Gazette, whichever is the greater; and

(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of sub-para (b) above, where the assets in the estate are not sufficient to provide each spouse with the amount fixed by the Minister, the estate shall be equally divided between the surviving spouses.'"

Brief facts

[3] The facts relating to this case have been set out in the judgment of the High Court and need not be restated in detail.[5] It suffices, for the purpose of this judgment, to state that the applicant was married to Mr Ebrahim Hassam (the deceased) in accordance with Muslim rites. The deceased married a second wife, Mrs Mariam Hassam, also according to Muslim rites without the applicant's knowledge or consent. The deceased died intestate in August 2001. His death certificate shows that he was "never married". The first respondent refused to regard the applicant as a spouse for the purposes of the Act.

[5] Above n 2 at paras 2-4.

[4] The first respondent is cited in his official capacity as the executor of the deceased's estate. He abides by the decision of this Court. The Master of the High Court is the second respondent, while the deceased's second wife is cited as the third and fourth respondent; she is cited both in her personal capacity and in her capacity as the mother and natural guardian of the three minor children born of her marriage with the deceased. Neither opposes the application. The fifth respondent, the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development (the Minister), filed written submissions and supported the application for confirmation of the order of the High Court. The Muslim Youth Movement of South Africa (the MYM)[6] and the Women's Legal Centre Trust (the Trust),[7] which were admitted as amici curiae, filed helpful submissions and supported the confirmation of the declaration of constitutional invalidity.

Proceedings in the High Court

[5] The applicant approached the High Court and initially sought an order, among other things, entitling her to be recognised as a spouse and surviving spouse of the deceased for the purposes of the Act and the Maintenance of Surviving Spouses Act (Maintenance Act),[8] respectively, and directing the executor of the deceased's estate to give effect to that recognition. She also sought costs in the event the application was opposed.

[6] The executor questioned the validity of the applicant's marriage to the deceased. In particular, he questioned whether their marriage was still extant at the time of the deceased's death. If it was, it was contended that the deceased would have been involved in a "polygamous relationship" with the applicant and Mrs Mariam Hassam. Save for the executor, none of the respondents had placed the validity of the deceased's marriage to the applicant in dispute. The High Court, relying on the rule enunciated in Plascon-Evans Paints Ltd v Van Riebeeck Paints (Pty) Ltd,[9] found that the marriage was extant at the time of the deceased's death.[10] No one has challenged this finding and we proceed on the basis that the marriage subsisted at the time of the deceased's death. The applicant also challenged the constitutional validity of section 1(4) of the Act.[11] She maintained that the word "spouse" in that section should include a husband or wife married in terms of Muslim rites regardless of whether the marriage is monogamous or polygynous. By excluding her from the definition of "spouse" because she was party to a polygynous union, the applicant contended that the Act unfairly limits her right to religious freedom and equality before the law.

> "According to this rule a court in motion proceedings, in determining whether a case is made out, must examine the undisputed averments of the applicant together with the averments of the respondent."

[11] In a notice in terms of Rule 16A of the Uniform Rules of Court in which she had also challenged the constitutional validity of certain provisions of the Maintenance Act. She contended that the term "survivor" in this Act should be read to include a surviving spouse or spouses of a polygynous Muslim union. The High Court did not declare the impugned provisions of the Maintenance Act unconstitutional and little therefore need be said further about it.

[7] The High Court then considered the constitutionality of the impugned provision against the factual backdrop that the applicant was a party to a polygynous Muslim marriage who sought to inherit intestate following the death of her husband. Having had regard to Daniels v Campbell NO and Others,[12] the High Court considered whether an interpretation which fails to accord widows in polygynous Muslim marriages the benefits provided for in the Act passes constitutional muster. The High Court held:

> "Marriages concluded under Muslim private law are potentially polygynous as the male in such a union, subject to compliance with the onerous prescripts of the Qur'an, is permitted to marry more than one woman. Unless the concept 'spouse' . . . [is] construed to encompass also widows of polygynous Muslim marriages the practical effect would be that the widows of such marriages will be discriminated against solely because of the exercise by their deceased husbands of the right accorded them by the tenets of a major faith to marry more than one woman. Such discrimination would not only amount to a violation of their rights to equality on the basis of marital status, religion (it being an aspect of a system of religious personal law) and culture but would also infringe their right to dignity . . . [D]iscrimination of that kind is presumptively unfair unless valid grounds exist under Section 36 of the Constitution for limiting their rights as regards equality and human dignity."[13] (Emphasis added.)

[8] In concluding, the High Court held that the exclusion of widows of polygynous Muslim marriages from the benefits of the Act would be unfairly discriminatory and in conflict with the equality provisions in the Constitution. The provisions of the Act, the High Court remarked, "save for section 1(4)(f), are readily capable of being [12] [2004] ZACC 14; 2004 (7) BCLR 735 (CC); 2004 (5) SA 331 (CC). In this case the right to benefit intestate was extended to women in de facto monogamous Muslim marriages.

[13] Above n 2 at para 16. The High Court also found that "no governmental purpose that could be advanced by such a differentiation has been raised or appears to be self-evident."

applied to spouses in polygynous marriages in that each spouse would be entitled to a child's portion of the estate, if there are descendants and an equal share if there are none."[14]

In this Court

[9] The applicant's argument was largely devoted to the equality provisions in the Constitution. It was submitted that the facts clearly demonstrate unfair discrimination in respect of widows of polygynous Muslim marriages because a failure to include such widows within the ambit of the Act differentiates in three ways, between—

1. widows married in terms of the Marriage Act[15] and those in polygynous Muslim marriages;
2. widows in monogamous Muslim marriages and those in polygynous Muslim marriages; and
3. widows in polygynous customary marriages[16] and those in polygynous Muslim marriages.

The applicant argued that widows in her position are unfairly discriminated against on the listed grounds of gender, marital status and religion.

[10] Relying on S v Jordan and Others (Sex Worker Education & Advocacy Task Force and Others as Amici Curiae)[17] the applicant contended that the failure to include spouses of polygynous Muslim marriages within the ambit of the Act indirectly discriminates against women in those marriages on the ground of gender. This discrimination stems from the reality that women constitute a particularly vulnerable segment of the population and that, in practice, the Act benefits mainly widows rather than widowers. They submitted further that the Act operates to the detriment of Muslim women but not Muslim men because only Muslim men may have multiple spouses under Islamic Law.

[11] Relying on Daniels, the applicant submitted that discrimination occurs on the ground of marital status in instances where legislative protection is withheld from certain relationships. In withholding certain protections provided for in the Act from persons in polygynous Muslim marriages, the applicant submitted that she is being discriminated against on the ground of marital status.

[12] In relation to the ground of religion, the applicant submitted that the exclusion of persons in polygynous Muslim marriages from the ambit of the Act will result in an infringement of sections 15, 30 and 31 of the Constitution. The conclusion of a polygynous Muslim marriage is an element of the right and freedom associated with religious and cultural choices. The failure of the Act to recognise such marriages thus also constitutes discrimination on the ground of religion.

[17] [2002] ZACC 22; 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC); 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC). In that case the Court dealt with the criminal sanction which imposed differential liability on prostitutes as compared to their clients. The majority per Ngcobo J held that the impugned provision was not unconstitutional. The minority, per O'Regan and Sachs JJ, linked this differentiation to a pattern of gender disadvantage and thereby found it to constitute unfair discrimination.

[13] The applicant contended that there is no rational relationship between the differentiation in question and a legitimate governmental purpose proffered to validate it because the scheme in the Act confers benefits and imposes burdens unevenly. These submissions were supported by the Minister, the Trust and the MYM. The applicant further contended that the failure to interpret the word "spouse" so as to include widows whose marriages are celebrated in accordance with Muslim rites infringes the rights to freedom of religion, conscience, belief and opinion, and to the enjoyment of culture under sections 15(1)[18] and 31(1)[19] of the Constitution, respectively.

[14] The MYM's contentions were largely devoted to freedom of religion and culture. It was contended that women in polygynous Muslim marriages still suffer the serious effects of non-recognition. It was argued that this unequal treatment constitutes unfair discrimination on the grounds of religion. The MYM argued further that their non-recognition prejudices widows of polygynous Muslim marriages in that it fails to have regard to their lived reality and to accommodate diversity within a heterogeneous society.

[18] Section 15(1) reads:

> "Everyone has the right to freedom of conscience, religion, thought, belief and opinion."

[19] Section 31(1) reads:

> "Persons belonging to a cultural, religious or linguistic community may not be denied the right, with other members of the community –
>
> (a) to enjoy their culture, practise their religion and use their language; and
> (b) to form, join and maintain cultural, religious and linguistic associations and other organs of civil society."

[15] As to remedy, the parties contended that an order similar to that made in Bhe,[20] which would cater for the recognition of women in polygynous Muslim marriages as spouses for the purposes of intestate succession, would be appropriate.

[16] Before I identify the issues for determination in this matter, it is important to stress what this case is not about.

[17] This case, properly understood, is not concerned with the constitutional validity of polygynous marriages entered into in accordance with Muslim rites. The applicant advanced argument on sections 15, 30 and 31 of the Constitution. In the view I hold of the matter, it is not necessary to become entangled in the religious and cultural debates in this matter. It should also be emphasised that this judgment does not purport to incorporate any aspect of Sharia law into South African law.

[18] This Court in Daniels dealt with monogamous Muslim marriages for the purposes of the Act, but left open the issue regarding the inclusion of polygynous Muslim marriages. This judgment deals with the latter.

[19] I now turn to deal with the issues raised.

Issues

[20] The following issues arise for consideration:

a) Does the exclusion of spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages from the intestate succession regime as established by the Act violate section 9(3) of the Constitution? In particular:

   i. Does the exclusion constitute discrimination?

   ii. If so, does it constitute unfair discrimination?

   iii. If so, is this unfair discrimination justifiable under section 36 of the Constitution?

b) If this exclusion violates section 9(3) of the Constitution, can the word "spouse" in the Act be read to include spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages?

c) If such an interpretation is not possible, what is the appropriate relief?

[21] It is convenient to now deal with the equality analysis and jurisprudence that has developed over the years through the pronouncements of this Court.

Equality jurisprudence

[22] This Court has on numerous occasions dealt with challenges to legislative enactments that were said to infringe the right to equality under section 9 of the Constitution. The resultant jurisprudence has developed into a comprehensive set of principles, which have been applied on numerous occasions and within a variety of contexts.[21] Section 9 provides:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

[21] See in this regard Van der Merwe v Road Accident Fund and Others [2006] ZACC 4; 2006 (6) BCLR 682 (CC); 2006 (4) SA 230 (CC); Hoffmann v South African Airways [2000] ZACC 17; 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC); 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC); National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and Another v Minister of Justice and Others [1998] ZACC 15; 1998 (12) BCLR 1517 (CC); 1999 (1) SA 6 (CC); Harksen v Lane NO and Others [1997] ZACC 12; 1997 (11) BCLR 1489 (CC); 1998 (1) SA 300 (CC); Prinsloo v Van der Linde and Another [1997] ZACC 5; 1997 (6) BCLR 759 (CC); 1997 (3) SA 1012 (CC); President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Hugo [1997] ZACC 4; 1997 (6) BCLR 708 (CC); 1997 (4) SA 1 (CC); and Brink v Kitshoff NO [1996] ZACC 9; 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC); 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC). See also Minister of Finance and Another v Van Heerden [2004] ZACC 3; 2004 (11) BCLR 1125 (CC); 2004 (6) SA 121 (CC) at para 27, Moseneke J, as he then was, eloquently described the duty on every court when embarking on an analysis in terms of section 9. He stated that it is—

> "incumbent on courts to scrutinise in each equality claim the situation of the complainants in society; their history and vulnerability; the history, nature and purpose of the discriminatory practice and whether it ameliorates or adds to group disadvantage in real life context, in order to determine its fairness or otherwise in the light of the values of our Constitution." (Footnote omitted.)

status, ethnic or social origin, colour, sexual orientation, age, disability, religion, conscience, belief, culture, language and birth.

(4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

(5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[23] The equality analysis was summarised in Harksen[22] as follows:

"(a) Does the provision differentiate between people or categories of people? If so, does the differentiation bear a rational connection to a legitimate government purpose? If it does not then there is a violation of section 8(1). Even if it does bear a rational connection, it might nevertheless amount to discrimination.

(b) Does the differentiation amount to unfair discrimination? This requires a two stage analysis:

(i) Firstly, does the differentiation amount to 'discrimination'? If it is on a specified ground, then discrimination will have been established. If it is not on a specified ground, then whether or not there is discrimination will depend upon whether, objectively, the ground is based on attributes and characteristics which have the potential to impair the fundamental human dignity of persons as human beings or to affect them adversely in a comparably serious manner.

(ii) If the differentiation amounts to 'discrimination', does it amount to 'unfair discrimination'? If it has been found to have been on a specified ground, then unfairness will be presumed. If on an unspecified ground, unfairness will have to be established by the complainant. The test of unfairness focuses primarily on the impact of the discrimination on the complainant and others in his or her situation. If, at the end of this stage of the enquiry, the differentiation is found not to be unfair, then there will be no violation of section 8(2).

(c) If the discrimination is found to be unfair then a determination will have to be made as to whether the provision can be justified under the limitations clause (section 33 of the interim Constitution)."[23]

The approach to legislative interpretation

[24] Section 39(2)[24] of the Constitution enjoins every court to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights when, inter alia, interpreting any legislation.[25] South African history, as this Court has stated in Brink,[26] is of particular relevance to the concept of equality. In Daniels, this Court held that "[d]iscriminatory interpretations deeply injurious to those negatively affected were in the conditions of the time widely accepted in the courts. They are no longer sustainable in the light of our Constitution."[27] (Footnote omitted.)

[23] Id at para 53. Although the Court in Harksen was concerned with section 8 of the interim Constitution, that section is the equivalent of section 9 of the Constitution albeit with some difference in wording. In National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality, this Court stated that the postulated enquiry does not mean that—

> "in all cases the rational connection inquiry of stage (a) must inevitably precede stage (b). The stage (a) rational connection inquiry would be clearly unnecessary in a case in which a court holds that the discrimination is unfair and unjustifiable." (Above n 21 at para 18.)

This approach was also adopted in Hoffmann where this Court, per Ngcobo J, proceeded directly to a section 9(3) analysis because it was clear that the law in question was discriminatory. (Above n 21 at para 20.)

[24] Section 39(1) and (2) provide:

> "(1) When interpreting the Bill of Rights, a court, tribunal or forum –
>
> (a) must promote the values that underlie an open and democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom;
> (b) must consider international law; and
>
> (c) may consider foreign law.
> (2) When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights."

[25] See also in this regard the majority decision in Daniels above n 12 at para 43.

[26] Brink above n 21 at para 40.

[27] Above n 12 at para 20.

[25] The approach adopted in Daniels has been reaffirmed by this Court in a number of its subsequent decisions.[28] Ngcobo J in Daniels, correctly observed that apartheid legislation was—

> "construed in the context of a legal order that did not respect human dignity, equality and freedom for all people. Discrimination fuelled by prejudice was the norm. Black people were denied respect and dignity. They were regarded as inferior to other races."[29] (Footnote omitted.)

The prejudice directed at the Muslim community is evident in the pronouncement by the Appellate Division in Ismail v Ismail.[30] The Court regarded the recognition of polygynous unions solemnised under the tenets of the Muslim faith as void on the ground of it being contrary to accepted customs and usages, then regarded as morally binding upon all members of our society. Recognition of polygynous unions was seen as a retrograde step and entirely immoral. The Court assumed, wrongly, that the non-recognition of polygynous unions was unlikely to "cause any real hardship to the members of the Muslim communities, except, perhaps, in isolated instances."[31] That interpretive approach is indeed no longer sustainable in a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights enshrined in our Constitution. The assumption made in Ismail, with respect, displays ignorance and total disregard of the lived realities prevailing in Muslim communities and is consonant with the inimical attitude of one group in our pluralistic society imposing its views on another.

[28] See for example, Van der Merwe above n 21 at para 66 where this Court held, among other things, that "when the constitutional validity of a law is challenged by invoking one or more guarantees in the Bill of Rights contextual analysis is often all important." (Footnote omitted.)

[29] Above n 12 at para 48.

[30] 1983 (1) SA 1006 (AD).

[31] Id at 1024H-1025A.

[26] Contrasting the ethos which informed the boni mores before the new constitutional order with that which informs the current constitutional dispensation, the question remains whether affording protection to spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages under the Act can be regarded as a retrograde step and entirely immoral? The answer is a resounding No. I emphasise that the content of public policy must now be determined with reference to the founding values underlying our constitutional democracy, including human dignity and equality, in contrast to the rigidly exclusive approach that was based on the values and beliefs of a limited sector of society as evidenced by the remarks in Ismail.[32]

[27] In assessing the constitutional validity of the impugned legislative provisions in this case, regard must also be had to the diversity of our society which provides a blue print for our constitutional order and influences the interpretation of our supreme law – the Constitution – which in turn shapes ordinary law. Our diversity is also affirmed in the preamble to the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act,[33] the aim of which is to facilitate our transition into "a democratic society, united in its diversity, marked by human relations that are caring and compassionate, and guided by the principles of equality, fairness, equity, social progress, justice, human dignity and freedom."[34]

[33] 4 of 2000.

[34] The importance of diversity was acknowledged by this Court in Minister of Home Affairs and Another v Fourie and Another; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and Others v Minister of Home Affairs and Others [2005] ZACC 19; 2006 (3) BCLR 355 (CC); 2006 (1) SA 524 (CC) at para 60.

[28] The interpretive approach enunciated by this Court will ensure the achievement of the progressive realisation of our "transformative constitutionalism".[35] This approach resonates with the founding values now informing the assessment of the prevailing boni mores of our society and thus affords the necessary protection to those adversely affected by the exclusion under the Act. Those values have been aptly described by Mahomed CJ in Amod v Multilateral Vehicle Accident Fund (Commisision for Gender Equality Intervening)[36] as the "new ethos of tolerance, pluralism and religious freedom".[37]

[29] Having delineated the approach according to which the impugned provision should operate and be understood, I now turn to the determination of the issues.

a) Does the exclusion of spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages from the intestate succession regime as established by the Act violate section 9(3) of the Constitution?

[30] The High Court found that the exclusion of spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages does not pass constitutional muster. I agree. The rights to equality before the law and to equal protection of the law are foundational. The Constitution, as the jurisprudence of this Court demonstrates, prohibits the breach of equality not by mere fact of difference but rather by that of discrimination.[38] This nuance is of importance so that the concept of equality is not trivialised or reduced to a simple matter of difference.

[35] See Klare "Legal Culture and Transformative Constitutionalism" (1998) 14 SAJHR 146. Our Constitution has been characterised among other things, as a transformative document. The concept of "transformative constitutionalism" has over the past decade found considerable resonance in our jurisprudence. See in this regard Minister of Health and Another v New Clicks South Africa (Pty) Ltd and Others (Treatment Action Campaign and Another as Amici Curiae) [2005] ZACC 14; 2006 (8) BCLR 872 (CC); 2006 (2) SA 311 (CC) at para 232; S v Mhlungu and Others [1995] ZACC 4; 1995 (3) SA 867 (CC); 1995 (7) BCLR 793 (CC) at para 8; S v Makwanyane and Another [1995] ZACC 3; 1995 (3) SA 391 (CC); 1995 (6) BCLR 665 (CC) at paras 9 and 301-2. [37] Id at para 20.

[31] The marriage between the applicant and the deceased, being polygynous, does not enjoy the status of a marriage under the Marriage Act. The Act differentiates between widows married in terms of the Marriage Act and those married in terms of Muslim rites; between widows in monogamous Muslim marriages and those in polygynous Muslim marriages; and between widows in polygynous customary marriages and those in polygynous Muslim marriages. The Act works to the detriment of Muslim women and not Muslim men.

[32] I am satisfied that the Act differentiates between the groups outlined above.

[33] Having found that the Act differentiates between widows in polygynous Muslim marriages like the applicant, on the one hand and widows who were married in terms of the Marriage Act, widows in monogamous Muslim marriages and widows in polygynous customary marriages on the other, the question arises whether the differentiation amounts to discrimination on any of the listed grounds in section 9 of the Constitution. The answer is yes. As I have indicated above our jurisprudence on equality has made it clear that the nature of the discrimination must be analysed

contextually and in the light of our history. It is clear that in the past, Muslim marriages, whether polygynous or not, were deprived of legal recognition for reasons which do not withstand constitutional scrutiny today. It bears emphasis that our Constitution not only tolerates but celebrates the diversity of our nation.[39] The celebration of that diversity constitutes a rejection of reasoning such as that to be found in Seedat's Executors v The Master (Natal),[40] where the court declined to recognise a widow of a Muslim marriage as a surviving spouse because a Muslim marriage, for the very reason that it was potentially polygynous, was said to be "reprobated by the majority of civilised peoples, on grounds of morality and religion".[41]

[34] The effect of the failure to afford the benefits of the Act to widows of polygynous Muslim marriages will generally cause widows significant and material disadvantage of the sort which it is the express purpose of our equality provision to avoid.[42] Moreover, because the denial of benefits affects only widows in polygynous marriages concluded pursuant to Muslim rites and not widowers (because Muslim personal law does not permit women to have more than one husband), the discrimination also has a gendered aspect. The grounds of discrimination can thus be understood to be overlapping on the grounds of, religion, in the sense that the particular religion concerned was in the past not one deemed to be worthy of respect; marital status, because polygynous Muslim marriages are not afforded the protection other marriages receive; and gender, in the sense that it is only the wives in polygynous Muslim marriage that are affect by the Act's exclusion.

[35] This conclusion does not mean that the rules of Muslim personal law, if enacted into law in terms of section 15(3) of the Constitution, would necessarily constitute discrimination on the grounds of religion, for the Constitution itself accepts diversity and recognises that to foster diversity, express provisions for difference may at times be necessary. Nor does this conclusion foreshadow any answer on the question as to whether polygynous marriages are themselves consistent with the Constitution. Whatever the answer to that question may be, one we leave strictly open now, it could not result in refusing appropriate protection to those women who are parties to such marriages. Such a result would be to lose sight of a key message of our Constitution: each person is of equal worth and must be treated accordingly.

[36] I hasten to mention that the position of widows in monogamous Muslim marriages has, however, since Daniels, been somewhat ameliorated by their recognition as spouses under the Act. However, women in polygynous Muslim marriages still suffer serious effects of non-recognition. The distinction between spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages and those in monogamous Muslim marriages unfairly discriminates between the two groups.

[37] By discriminating against women in polygynous Muslim marriages on the grounds of religion, gender and marital status, the Act clearly reinforces a pattern of stereotyping and patriarchal practices that relegates women in these marriages to being unworthy of protection. Needless to say, by so discriminating against those women, the provisions in the Act conflict with the principle of gender equality which the Constitution strives to achieve. That cannot, and ought not, be countenanced in a society based on democratic values, social justice and fundamental human rights.

[38] The purpose of the Act would clearly be frustrated rather than furthered if widows to polygynous Muslim marriages were excluded from the benefits of the Act simply because their marriages were contracted by virtue of Muslim rites. The constitutional goal of achieving substantive equality will not be fulfilled by that exclusion. These women, as was the case with the applicant, often do not have any power over the decisions by their husbands whether to marry a second or a third wife.[43]

[39] It follows therefore that the exclusion of widows in polygynous Muslim marriages from the protection of the Act is constitutionally unacceptable because it excludes them simply on the prohibited grounds. In any event, it would be unjust to grant a widow in a monogamous Muslim marriage the protection offered by the Act and to deny the same protection to a widow or widows of a polygynous Muslim

[43] It is not insignificant that South Africa ratified on 17 December 2004 the Protocol to the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights on the Rights of Women in Africa which came into operation on 25 November 2005. Article 6 provides for the promotion and protection of the rights of women in polygynous marriages. Available at http://www.african-union.org; http://www.dfa.gov.za/foreign/index.html, accessed on 25 May 2009. This serves to highlight the vulnerability of women in polygynous marriages and their plight will only be ameliorated if they fall within the ambit of the law, which in many instances excludes women in polygynous marriages.

marriage. Discrimination on each of the listed grounds in section 9(3) is presumed to be unfair unless justified.[44]

[40] The question now arises as to whether this unfair discrimination can be justified under section 36 of the Constitution.

[41] In deciding this question regard must be had to the nature of the rights infringed, the nature of the discriminatory conduct, the provisions themselves, as well as the impact of the discrimination on those who are adversely affected. In this case, the group discriminated against are women who are a particularly vulnerable group in Muslim communities. These women are severely prejudiced by their exclusion from the protection under the Act. Cachalia[45] generally describes the consequences of non-recognition for those spouses:

> "The consequences of non-recognition are serious, particularly for the wife. Although a couple may regard themselves as married according to the tenets of their religion, the law treats them as strangers. There is therefore no legal nexus between them: there is no joint estate and any nuptial agreement is void; there are no financial obligations between the spouses inter se and no claim for loss of support accrues to the dependent spouse on the death of her 'husband'; she has no claim for maintenance on divorce or against her husband's deceased estate; she is effectively disinherited if her husband dies intestate".[46]

[44] Section 9(5) of the Constitution.

[45] Firoz Cachalia "Citizenship, Muslim family law and a future South African constitution: a preliminary enquiry" (1993) 56 THRHR 392.

[46] Id at 399.

[42] The exclusion of the applicant, and others similarly positioned, from the protection of the Act limits their rights under section 9 of the Constitution. The limitation of their equality rights in the circumstances is unjustifiable. It should be noted that the Minister advanced no justification for the limitation of the right to equality in this instance.

[43] Having found that the exclusion of widows in polygynous Muslim marriages constitutes unfair discrimination, the next question is whether the word "spouse" in the Act is capable of being interpreted as including spouses in such marriages. Logically speaking, if, as the High Court found, the word "spouse" is capable of being so interpreted, that would be the end of the matter. Because of the view I take of the matter, however, it is necessary to consider the issue before dealing with the remedy.

b) Can the word "spouse" in the Act be read to include spouses in polygynous Muslim marriages?

[44] It is convenient to set out the provisions of section 1(1)(a) – (f) in full. It provides:

> "(1) If after the commencement of this Act a person (hereinafter referred to as the 'deceased') dies intestate, either wholly or in part, and—
>
> (a) is survived by a spouse, but not by a descendant, such spouse shall inherit the intestate estate;
>
> (b) is survived by a descendant, but not by a spouse, such descendant shall inherit the intestate estate;
>
> (c) is survived by a spouse as well as a descendant—
>
> (i) such spouse shall inherit a child's share of the intestate estate or so much of the intestate estate as does not exceed in value the amount fixed from time to time by the Minister of Justice by notice in the Gazette, whichever is the greater; and

(ii) such descendant shall inherit the residue (if any) of the intestate estate;

(d) is not survived by a spouse or descendant, but is survived—

(i) by both his parents, his parents shall inherit the intestate estate in equal shares; or

(ii) by one of his parents, the surviving parent shall inherit one half of the intestate estate and the descendants of the deceased parent the other half, and if there are no such descendants who have survived the deceased, the surviving parent shall inherit the intestate estate; or

(e) is not survived by a spouse or a descendant or parent, but is survived—

(i) by—

(aa) descendants of his deceased mother who are related to the deceased through her only, as well as by descendants of his deceased father who are related to the deceased through him only; or

(bb) descendants of his deceased parents who are related to the deceased through both such parents; or

(cc) any of the descendants mentioned in subparagraph (aa), as well as by any of the descendants mentioned in subparagraph (bb), the intestate estate shall be divided into two equal shares and the descendants related to the deceased through the deceased mother shall inherit one half of the estate and the descendants related to the deceased through the deceased father shall inherit the other half of the estate; or

(ii) only by descendants of one of the deceased parents of the deceased who are related to the deceased through such parent alone, such descendants shall inherit the intestate estate;

(f) is not survived by a spouse, descendant, parent, or a > descendant of a parent, the other blood relation or blood relations of the deceased who are related to him nearest in degree shall inherit the intestate estate in equal shares."

> (Emphasis added.)

[45] In considering the question above, we cannot turn the clock back to 1987 when the Act was enacted or even to 1917 and 1983 when Seedat's and Ismail were decided, respectively. At the time of the enactment of the above provisions, the only marriages to which the legislature sought to afford protection were civil marriages recognised under the Marriage Act. We must now consider the meaning of the word "spouse" in the Act in light of its current place and effect in South Africa and particularly its effect on Muslim communities. Although the word "spouse" is not defined in the Act, it ought to be read through the prism of the Constitution.

[46] Marriage, as a social institution, is important to all members of South African society, irrespective of skin colour or religious background. Marriages concluded under Muslim rites are potentially polygynous as a man is permitted, subject to the Qur'anic prescripts, to marry more than one woman.[47] The significance attached to polygynous unions solemnised in accordance with the Muslim religious faith is by no means less than the significance attached to a civil marriage under the Marriage Act or an African customary marriage. Similarly, the dignity of the parties to polygynous

[47] See in this regard 'Abdur Rahman I. Doi, Sharia: The Islamic Law (Ta Ha Publications, London 1984) at 146, where the author quotes the following Qur'anic verse:

> "If you fear you shall not be able to deal justly with the orphans, marry the women of your choice, two, or three or four. But if you fear that you shall not be able to deal justly with them, then only one." (Emphasis added.)

Muslim marriages is no less worthy of respect than the dignity of parties to civil marriages or African customary marriages.

[47] The shift in legislative policy, as clearly pointed out by the majority in Daniels,[48] and judicial policy as is evident in Bhe[49] and Khan,[50] are also indicative of trends consistent with the constitutional values. The majority in Daniels remarked that the existence of such provisions in other statutes does not imply that their absence in the Act and the Maintenance Act has special significance. The fact that the new democratic Parliament has not as yet included Muslim marriages expressly within the purview of the protection granted by those Acts, the Court held, cannot be interpreted so as to exclude them, contrary to the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution.

[48] On the approach delineated above, the majority in Daniels, per Sachs J, held that the ordinary meaning of the word "spouse" in the Act also encompasses surviving [48] Above n 12 at fn 40. Examples of this shift include:

> "Civil Proceedings Evidence Act 25 of 1965 (s 10A recognises religious marriages for the purposes of the law of evidence); Criminal Procedure Act 51 of 1977 (s 195(2) recognises religious marriages for the purposes of the compellability of spouses as witnesses in criminal proceedings); Pension Funds Act 24 of 1956 (s 1(b)(ii): definition of 'dependent'); Special Pensions Act 69 of 1996 (s 31(b)(ii): definition of 'dependent'); Government Employees Pension Law Proclamation 21 of 1996 (s 1(b)(ii): definition of 'dependent' and Schedule 1 item 1.19, definition of 'spouse'); Demobilisation Act 99 of 1996 (s 1 (vi)(c): definition of 'dependent'); Value Added Tax Act 89 of 1991 (Notes 6 and 7 to item 406.00 of Schedule 1 recognises religious marriages for the purposes of tax exemptions in respect of goods imported into South Africa); Transfer Duty Act 40 of 1949 (s 9(1)(f) read with the definition of 'spouse' in s 1 exempts from transfer duty, property inherited by the surviving spouse in a religious marriage); Estate Duty Act 45 of 1955 (s 4(q) read with the definition of 'spouse' in s 1 exempts from estate duty property accruing to the surviving spouse in a religious marriage)."

See also section 2(3) of the Recognition of Customary Marriages Act 120 of 1998. It provides that, "[i]f a person is a spouse in more than one customary marriage, all valid customary marriages entered into before the commencement of this Act are for all purposes recognised as marriages."

[49] Above n 16 at paras 116 and 136.

[50] Khan above n 32 at 283C-D where the court stated that, "partners in a Muslim marriage, married in accordance with Islamic rites (whether monogamous or not) are entitled to maintenance".

spouses of marriages contracted according to Muslim rites.[51] The Court opted for a broad and inclusive construction of the concept which extended the application of the Act to include the surviving spouse of a monogamous Muslim marriage entered into in accordance with Muslim rites. The Court held that the constitutional values of equality, tolerance and respect for diversity point strongly in favour of giving the word "spouse" a broad and inclusive construction. It remarked that any other interpretation would result in a violation of the widow's rights to equality in relation to marital status, religion and culture and would therefore violate their right to dignity. In my view, the circumstances of that case, allowed for such an interpretation for it was only due to the religion of the parties that their marriage was without recognition, thus there was no undue strain on the language. On the facts of the present case, to read the word "spouse" so as to include multiple spouses would be a significant departure from the ordinary, commonly understood meaning of the word, as it is used in the Act. Therefore, the word "spouse" as it is used in the Act is not capable of being understood to include more than one partner to a marriage. In consequence, we must read in words to cure the defects.

c) Appropriate remedy

[49] Having concluded that section 1 of the Act constitutes an unjustifiable infringement of section 9(3) of the Constitution, I must now consider an appropriate remedy. The constitutional defect in the impugned provision is manifest. It exists because the word "spouse" in the Act excludes widows to polygynous Muslim marriages, thus denying them the protection intended for vulnerable women in our society. The dictates of justice and equity require this Court to grant an effective remedy which shall vindicate their rights.

[50] Section 172(1) of the Constitution requires a court, when deciding a constitutional matter within its power, to declare that any law that is inconsistent with the Constitution is invalid to the extent of its inconsistency. It further provides that a court may make any order that is just and equitable, including an order limiting the retrospective effect of the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions to allow the competent authority to correct the defect.

[51] In S v Bhulwana; S v Gwadiso[52] this Court stressed that litigants should be granted effective relief and that it is undesirable to restrict the relief to the litigants before a court. It said:

> "Central to a consideration of the interests of justice in a particular case is that successful litigants should obtain the relief they seek. . . . In principle too, the litigants before the Court should not be singled out for the grant of relief, but relief should be afforded to all people who are in the same situation as the litigants".[53] (Citations omitted.)

[52] People in the position of the applicant cannot be made to wait to be afforded the protection they are entitled to. The failure to regulate their affairs upon intestacy, as we have seen in this case, does and will continue to have a profoundly detrimental effect on them. This cannot be allowed.

[53] As the text stands now, the word "spouse" is not reasonably capable of being understood to include more than one spouse in the context of a polygynous marriage. The omission of the words "spouses" is therefore inconsistent with the Constitution and those words thus need to be added to the Act so as to cure the defect. Accordingly, I would add the words "or spouses" after each use of the word "spouse" in the Act.

[54] Whilst the declaration of invalidity must be confirmed, albeit in a slightly different manner, the order of the High Court does not entirely remedy the defects in the Act so as to ensure that just and equitable relief is finally granted to those affected and those who might potentially be affected. The extent of the defect appears in the draft order proposed by the parties.[54] The draft requires reading words into the Act to give immediate relief, which has a degree of retrospective effect.

[54] The draft order reads:

> "1. Paragraphs 23.1.4, 23.2 and 23.3 of the High Court's order are set aside.
>
> 2. It is declared that s 1 of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it does not include the surviving partner in a polygynous Muslim marriage in the protection it affords to a 'spouse'.
>
> 3. This defect is remedied as follows:
>
> 3.1 The word 'spouse' in s 1 of the Intestate Succession Act must be read to include the surviving partner in a polygynous Muslim marriage.
>
> 3.2 In the application of ss 1(1)(c)(i) and 1(4)(f) of the Intestate Succession Act to the estate of a deceased person who is survived by more than one spouse,
> (a) a child's share in relation to the intestate estate of the deceased, shall be calculated by dividing

[55] The question is whether it is just and equitable to make an order of invalidity that should date back to 1994 when the interim Constitution became operative. As the Court stated in Bhe,[55] the declaration of constitutional invalidity must be retrospective to 27 April 1994 in order to avoid patent injustice. The appropriate remedy is to grant an order, the retrospective effect of which should be limited to estates that have not yet been finally wound up.

Costs

[56] The High Court ordered that the costs of the application should be paid out of the estate of the deceased. In this Court, the applicant seeks costs of the application. The issue in this matter must be seen against the background of the decisions of this

3.3 This order operates retrospectively with effect from 27 April 1994 except that it does not invalidate any transfer of ownership prior to the date of this order, of any property pursuant to the distribution of the residue of an estate, unless it is established that, when transfer was effected, the transferee was on notice that the property in question was subject to a legal challenge on the grounds upon which the applicant brought the present application.

Court and its judicial policy in Bhe and *Daniel*s. Although the Minister stressed that his Ministry had started a process that will lead to law reform in the area that has resulted in this litigation, he did not come to Court to oppose the confirmation of the declaration of invalidity of the impugned provisions. The Minister should, in my view, pay the applicant's costs, including those costs occasioned by the employment of two counsel as well as the applicant's costs in the High Court. This is so because the applicant launched these proceedings to vindicate her constitutional rights. Moreover, she has been wholly successful.

Order

[57] In the result, I make the following order:

1. The application for confirmation is granted.
2. The order made by the Western Cape High Court, Cape Town, on 18 July 2008 is confirmed to the extent set out below.
3. Paragraphs 23.1.4, 23.2 and 23.3 of the order of the Western Cape High Court, Cape Town, are set aside and substituted as follows:

    3.1. It is declared that section 1 of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it does not include more than one spouse in a polygynous Muslim marriage in the protection it affords to "a spouse".

    3.2. Section 1 of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 must be read as though the words "or spouses" appear after the word "spouse" wherever it appears in section 1 of the Intestate Succession Act.

3.3. In the application of sections 1(1)(c)(i) and 1(4)(f) of the Intestate Succession Act 81 of 1987 to the estate of a deceased person who is survived by more than one spouse:

a) a child's share in relation to the intestate estate of the deceased shall be calculated by dividing the monetary value of the estate by a number equal to the number of the children of the deceased who have either survived or predeceased such deceased person but are survived by their descendants, plus the number of spouses who have survived such deceased;

b) subject to paragraph (c), each surviving spouse shall inherit a child's share of the intestate estate or so much of the intestate estate as does not exceed in value the amount fixed from time to time by the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development by notice in the Gazette, whichever is the greater; and

c) where the assets in the estate are not sufficient to provide each spouse with the amount fixed by the Minister, the estate shall be equally divided amongst the surviving spouses.

3.4. The declaration of invalidity operates retrospectively with effect from 27 April 1994 except that it does not invalidate any transfer of ownership prior to the date of this order of any property pursuant to the distribution of the residue of an estate, unless it is established that, when transfer was effected, the transferee was on notice that the property in question was subject to a legal challenge on the grounds upon which the applicant brought the present application.

4. If serious administrative or practical problems arise in implementation of this order, any interested person may approach this Court for a variation of this order.

5. The fifth respondent is ordered to pay the applicant's costs of this application and of the application in the Western Cape High Court, Cape Town, including costs occasioned by the employment of two counsel.

Introduction

[1] This is an application for leave to appeal to this Court against a decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal[1] upholding a judgment of the High Court in Pretoria.[2] In terms of the latter judgment an application by the second respondent to have an arbitrator's award made an order of court was granted, and an application by the applicant for the review and setting aside of the award was dismissed.

Factual Background

[2] The applicant, Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd (Mphaphuli), conducts business at Polokwane, Limpopo as an electrical infrastructure contractor. The first respondent, Mr Andrews (the arbitrator), is a quantity surveyor and project manager in Johannesburg. The second respondent, Bopanang Construction CC (Bopanang), carries on business at Witbank, Mpumulanga.

[3] Mphaphuli was the main contractor on a project of Eskom (the national electricity supplier) for the electrification of certain rural villages in Limpopo. On 16 May 2002 Mphaphuli and Bopanang concluded a written contract in terms of which the latter was engaged as a subcontractor to undertake certain of the work entailed in the project. On 16 January 2003, prior to completion of the work assigned to it, Bopanang vacated the site. Another entity, AA Electrical Ltd, was engaged to complete the work, and also to do certain remedial work. Disputes arose between the parties concerning the execution by Bopanang of the work undertaken by it, and whether either party was liable to make payment to the other.

[4] During April 2003 Bopanang issued summons out of the High Court claiming payment from Mphaphuli in the sum of R656 934,44 in respect of the work done by it (less payments on account). Bopanang also launched an urgent application for a temporary interdict preventing Eskom from paying out certain moneys to Mphaphuli. These proceedings were settled on the basis that an interim interdict would issue and the dispute between the parties referred to arbitration.

[5] At a preliminary meeting on 21 July 2003 Mphaphuli and Bopanang agreed to appoint the arbitrator to undertake the arbitration and to exchange pleadings. On 1 August 2003 Bopanang submitted its statement of claim in which it claimed payment of the said amount of R656 934,44 (together with interest on the component amounts thereof from various dates), made up as reflected in the invoices annexed to the statement of claim. Attached to and forming part of the statement of claim were the papers filed by Bopanang in the High Court in the application referred to in paragraph 4 above. In those papers Bopanang had confirmed on oath that the invoices constituted an accurate record of the work it had done.

[6] Mphaphuli filed its statement of defence (alleging, inter alia, repudiation of the agreement by Bopanang) together with a counterclaim for moneys allegedly overpaid to Bopanang. Bopanang filed a reply to Mphaphuli's statement of defence and a plea to the counterclaim. A meeting was held between the parties and the arbitrator on 7 October 2003. The arbitrator was furnished with copies of all the pleadings that had been filed.

[7] On 16 October 2003 the parties finalised the terms of the reference to arbitration in a written agreement. Its relevant terms were as follows:

"ARBITRATION AGREEMENT

Whereas [Bopanang] instituted an arbitration action against [Mphaphuli] in terms whereof [Bopanang] claimed payment of an amount of R656 934,44; interest on the amount of R143 395,53 at 0.5% per week from 6 October 2002; interest on the amount of R208 937,54 at 0.5% per week from 21 April 2003; interest on the amount of R304 601,37 at 0.5% per week from 21 April 2003 and costs of suit;

And whereas [Mphaphuli] opposed the action and inter alia claimed payment of whatever amount appears to have been overpaid by [Mphaphuli] to [Bopanang];

And whereas the parties have reached an agreement regarding the finalisation of the arbitration proceedings and the mandate to be given to the Arbitrator, Mr Nigel Andrews;

Now therefore the parties agree as follows:

1. PURPOSE OF ARBITRATION

The purpose of the arbitration is to determine whether payment is due in terms of the contract concluded between the parties, and if it is determined that payment is in fact due, the extent of such payment due, having regard to the scope of the agreement; any agreed amendments or instructions for amendments thereto by [Mphaphuli] or ESKOM; the value of the work that has been done by [Bopanang]; the effect of any defects, if any, and the rectification thereof; any and all payments made to [Bopanang]. Therefore a final assessment of moneys reasonably due by any one of the parties to the other needs to be made by the arbitrator.

2. AWARD OF ARBITRATOR IS FINAL AND BINDING

The final award made by the arbitrator as described in clause 1 above shall be final and binding on the parties.

3. PAYMENT TO BE MADE IN TERMS OF AWARD OF ARBITRATOR

Any payment to be made by any of the parties in terms of the award made by the arbitrator shall be due and payable to the other party within 21 calendar days of the date of the written award made by the arbitrator.

4. PROVISION OF DOCUMENTATION

The parties record that the arbitrator has already been provided with a bundle of documentation forming part of [Bopanang's] Particulars of Claim. In addition hereto, each party shall be entitled to submit such documentation as it may deem necessary to the arbitrator by not later than 10 October 2003 [sic].

5. REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL DOCUMENTATION

The arbitrator shall be entitled to require from any of the parties to make such further documentation available as he may require. The parties shall provide such requested documentation within 3 (three) days from such written request of the arbitrator.

6. LIASON WITH ESKOM

The arbitrator shall be entitled to liaise with ESKOM's duly authorised representatives, and to request any documentation with regard to this project from ESKOM, who is hereby authorised by both parties to make such documentation available.

7. INSPECTION AND MEASUREMENT

The arbitrator shall commence with the inspection and measurement of the work done on site on or about 27 October 2003. Each party shall provide their reasonable cooperation with the aim of completing the process as speedily as possible, and shall appoint representatives to attend the physical inspection and measurement.

. . . .

10. FULL AGREEMENT

This agreement constitutes the full and complete agreement reached between the parties and no variation, amendment, alteration, addition or omission shall be valid and binding on the parties unless reduced to writing and signed by all the parties or their duly authorised representatives."

[8] The arbitrator published his award on 23 August 2004. In terms thereof Mphaphuli was liable to Bopanang in the sum of R339 998, 82, with interest thereon as from 6 October 2002.

High Court proceedings

[9] On receipt of the award Mphaphuli's then attorney addressed a letter to the arbitrator stating that certain aspects of the award would require clarification and proposing a round table discussion thereanent. The response of the arbitrator was that the arbitration agreement did not provide for such a process. On 16 September 2004 Mphaphuli's attorney advised Bopanang's attorney that instructions had been received to take the matter on review to the High Court. Attempts by Mphaphuli to secure Bopanang's agreement for the remittal of the matter to the arbitrator were unsuccessful.

[10] When no application for review was forthcoming, Bopanang, on 18 October 2004, applied to the High Court in terms of section 31(1) of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965[3] (Arbitration Act) for the award to be made an order of court and for judgment in its favour in the sum of R339 998, 83, plus interest.

[11] The application was opposed by Mphaphuli, which filed its answering affidavit on 13 December 2004. At the same time it launched a separate application in terms of section 32(2) of the Arbitration Act,[4] seeking relief in the form of an order—

[3] Sections 31(1) and (3) provide as follows:

> "(1) An award may, on the application to a court of competent jurisdiction by any party to the reference after due notice to the other party or parties, be made an order of court.
>
> . . . .
>
> (3) An award which has been made an order of court may be enforced in the same manner as any judgment or order to the same effect."

[4] Section 32(2) provides as follows:

> "The court may, on the application of any party to the reference after due notice to the other party or parties made within six weeks after the publication of the award to the parties, on good cause shown, remit any matter which was referred to arbitration, to the arbitration tribunal for reconsideration and for the making of a further award or a fresh award or for such other purpose as the court may direct."

(i) reviewing and setting aside the award; and

(ii) remitting the matter to the arbitrator for a review of the award having regard to the issues raised in the founding affidavit.

Both the arbitrator and Bopanang were cited as respondents in this application.

[12] On 7 March 2005 the arbitrator lodged his reasons and what purported to be the record in the arbitration proceedings with the Registrar, in accordance with High Court Rule 53(1)(b).[5] The document filed with the Registrar reads as follows:

> "FIRST RESPONDENT'S REASONS IN TERMS OF RULE 53(1)(b).
>
> TAKE NOTICE that First Respondent hereby furnishes his reasons, as set out in the following documents:
>
> 1. First Respondent's decision dated 23 August 2004, annexed to Applicant's Founding Affidavit as Annexure 'L4';
>
> 2. Letter by First Respondent to Niland and Pretorius Inc. dated 18 October 2004, annexed to Applicant's Founding Affidavit as Annexure 'L8'; and
>
> 3. Preliminary site measurements dated 23 August 2004 attached hereto as Annexure 'NA1'.
>
> TAKE NOTICE further that First Respondent does not wish to supplement such reasons at this time."

[13] Mphaphuli's Pretoria attorney sought instructions from its Polokwane attorney regarding the site measurements included in the record and the possible

[5] The Rule required the arbitrator to lodge the record, together with such reasons as he may wish to furnish, with the Registrar within 15 days after receipt of the notice of motion, and to notify the applicant that he had done so.

supplementation or amendment of the founding affidavit and amendment of the notice of motion. The response was that the measurements were referred to Mphaphuli but that the latter did not consider that they took the matter any further; accordingly, the matter should be enrolled as soon as possible. The Pretoria attorney thereupon advised Bopanang's attorney that Mphaphuli did not wish to amend, add to or vary the terms of its notice of motion in terms of Rule 53(4),[6] and the filing of the opposing affidavits was called for. This was done by both the arbitrator and Bopanang on 18 May 2005.

[14] On 5 August 2005 Mphaphuli, having engaged new attorneys, filed an amended notice of motion supported by an affidavit styled a supplementary founding affidavit. The substantive relief sought was—

(i) an order reviewing and setting aside the award;

(ii) a declarator that Bopanang was indebted to Mphaphuli in certain stated sums, together with an order that the award be substituted with an order that Bopanang pay the said sums; and

(iii) as an alternative to (ii), an order remitting the matter to the arbitrator to review his award having regard to the issues raised in the original founding affidavit and the supplementary founding affidavit.

[6] The Rule provides as follows:

> "The applicant may within 10 days after the Registrar has made the record available to him, by delivery of a notice and accompanying affidavit, amend, add to or vary the terms of his notice of motion and supplement the supporting affidavit."

[15] There was also a prayer for condonation of the late bringing of the initial application and for the late filing of the amended notice of motion and the supplementary founding affidavit.[7]

[16] Both the arbitrator and Bopanang filed further answering affidavits in response to the supplementary founding affidavit of Mphaphuli. The latter in turn filed affidavits in reply thereto. It also filed affidavits in reply to the first answering affidavits of the arbitrator and Bopanang (filed in response to the original founding affidavit of Mphaphuli). Mphaphuli's reply to the further answering affidavit of the arbitrator elicited a rejoinder affidavit from the latter.

[17] On 18 January 2006 Mphaphuli filed a further amended notice of motion in which the third (alternative) prayer, referred to in paragraph 14 above, was substituted with a prayer for an order referring the dispute between the parties for trial, alternatively, for the hearing of oral evidence. A further prayer was added, for an order that the six week period stipulated in section 32(2)[8] be extended to provide for the admission of Mphaphuli's original founding affidavit, as supplemented by its supplementary founding affidavit.

[7] As recorded in n 4 above, an application in terms of section 32(2) for the remittal of a matter to the arbitrator is required to be brought within six weeks of the publication of the award. Similarly, section 33(2) provides that an application for the setting aside of an award on any of the grounds set out in section 33(1) must be brought within six weeks of the publication of the award. (The full text of section 33(1) is reproduced in n 14 below.)

Section 38 of the Arbitration Act provides as follows:

> "The court may, on good cause shown, extend any period of time fixed by or under this Act, whether such period has expired or not."

[8] Above n 4.

[18] The two applications were heard together by the High Court. In the result, the Court granted Bopanang the relief it sought and dismissed Mphaphuli's application on the merits. In the course of its judgment the High Court recorded its dismissal of Mphaphuli's applications for condonation on the grounds both of an absence of a proper explanation for the delay and, more particularly, of a lack of merit in the cause of action invoked by Mphaphuli. (It may be noted that, as the High Court itself commented, the refusal of condonation had the result that there was in fact no application by Mphaphuli before it. The correct order would have been that the application be struck from the roll, not its dismissal. Be that as it may.)

The Supreme Court of Appeal proceedings

[19] The Supreme Court of Appeal upheld the High Court's decision not to grant condonation to Mphaphuli. While commenting that that should have been the end of the matter, the Court went on to give consideration to aspects relating to the merits. On that score, too, it found against Mphaphuli. It accordingly dismissed the appeal against the High Court judgment.

Condonation in this Court

[20] Mphaphuli's application for leave to appeal was filed one day late (although it was served timeously on the respondents). The reason for the late filing was unexpected pressing business exigencies on the last day for filing, resulting in the unavailability of the deponent to the affidavit in support of the application until late during that day. A proper case for condonation has been made out.

[21] The arbitrator and Bopanang also seek condonation for the late filing of their answering affidavits. In each case this was occasioned in the main by the intervention of the annual holiday season and the consequent unavailability of counsel. The grant of condonation is not opposed by Mphaphuli. A proper case for condonation has been made out.

The application for leave to appeal

[22] This Court only has jurisdiction to hear a matter if it is a constitutional matter or if it raises an issue connected with a decision on a constitutional matter.[9] That, however, is not decisive.[10] In addition, it must be shown that it is in the interests of justice that the application be granted.[11] Whether it is in the interests of justice for leave to appeal to be granted is based on a careful weighing up of all relevant factors, including the interests of the public and the prospects of success.[12]

[23] On behalf of Mphaphuli it was argued that, having regard to the judgments of both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal, the application for leave to appeal raises a series of constitutional issues regarding the relationship between arbitrations, the courts and the Constitution. In particular, it was contended that three main issues arise:

(a) To what extent are the courts entitled and required to exercise some control over arbitration awards before adopting them as their own and making them orders of court?

(b) By concluding an arbitration agreement, can parties be taken to have waived fundamental aspects of their right to a fair hearing in terms of section 34 of the Constitution,[13] and if so, under what circumstances?

(c) What is the correct approach to the grounds of review set out in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act,[14] when that section is properly interpreted in the light of the right to a fair hearing contained in section 34 of the Constitution?

It was stressed that the three aspects bear on Mphaphuli's right to a fair and impartial hearing in terms of the Arbitration Act read with section 34 of the Constitution.

[13] Section 34 reads as follows:

> "Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum."

[14] Section 33(1) provides as follows:

> "Where—
>
> (a) any member of an arbitration tribunal has misconducted himself in relation to his duties as arbitrator or umpire; or
> (b) an arbitration tribunal has committed any gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration proceedings or has exceeded its powers; or
> (c) an award has been improperly obtained,

[24] Other than providing that a constitutional matter includes any issue involving the interpretation, protection or enforcement of the Constitution,[15] the Constitution itself does not define what a constitutional matter is. The decision whether a constitutional matter is at issue or whether an issue is connected with a decision on a constitutional matter reposes in this Court.[16]

[25] In my view a number of constitutional matters are at issue. First, the case involves the interpretation of section 34 of the Constitution and its application to arbitrations held in terms of the Arbitration Act. Allied thereto is the question of the correct approach to the grounds of review set out in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act properly interpreted in the light of the right to a fair and impartial hearing guaranteed in section 34 of the Constitution. Relevant to these questions is an application of the provisions of section 39(2) of the Constitution.[17] Second, the question arises whether, and to what extent, the parties, by entering into an arbitration agreement, are to be taken to have waived the constitutional right (entrenched in the Bill of Rights) to a fair and impartial hearing. Third, the role of the courts in confirming or setting aside arbitration awards involves the administration of justice, and that too is a constitutional issue. As was said in the early case of Burns & Co v Burne[18] (where an arbitrator's award was sought to be assailed on grounds similar to those invoked by Mphaphuli in the present matter): ". . . the matter is not one affecting only the parties to this particular dispute, but it concerns the administration of justice generally."

[18] 1922 NPD 461 at 462.

[26] That the administration of justice is concerned is borne out by the following considerations:

(a) Arbitration awards made orders of court may be enforced in the same manner as any judgment or order to the same effect, including execution by state mechanisms.

(b) Arbitrators have no powers to enforce their awards and the effectiveness of the private process therefore rests on the binding, even coercive, powers the state entrusts to its courts.

(c) State execution of court orders, an integral part of the resolution of disputes between parties, and which is antithetical to self-help, is an important facet of the rule of law,[19] a core constitutional precept.

[27] Because the courts are requested to adopt, support and trigger the enforcement of arbitration awards, it is permissible for, and incumbent on, them to ensure that arbitration awards meet certain standards to prevent injustice.[20]

Ltd* [1958] 1 WLR 271 at 278.

[28] In Telcordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Ltd[21] the Supreme Court of Appeal stressed the need, when courts have to consider the confirmation or setting aside of arbitral awards, for adherence to the principle of party autonomy, which requires a high degree of deference to arbitral decisions and minimises the scope for intervention by the courts. The decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal in the present matter was informed by this principle.[22] Resolving, for the purposes of the present case, the tension between this principle and the duty of the courts to ensure, before ordering that an arbitration award be enforced by the state, that the award was obtained in a manner that was procedurally fair, as required by section 34 of the Constitution,[23] is the key constitutional issue that arises in this case.

[29] Two further issues require mention. First, the question whether the arbitrator acted as an arbitrator or a valuer, is an issue connected with the constitutional matters referred to above. Second, to the extent that the refusal by the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal to grant Mphaphuli condonation is to be ascribed to a failure properly to consider constitutional imperatives, a constitutional issue is involved. At the very least, the question is an issue connected with the constitutional matters referred to above.

Interests of justice

[23] Above n 13. The question of the applicability of section 34 to the present matter is considered below [69]-[78].

[30] The matter is of obvious importance to the parties. However, it has implications that go substantially beyond the narrow interests of the parties. As already recorded, the matter also concerns the administration of justice generally; and it does so in an area that is extremely important in the commercial world: recourse to arbitration proceedings to resolve disputes is extensive and is increasing. Moreover, important constitutional issues arise, including the extent to which an agreement such as that with which this matter is concerned can be read as amounting to a waiver of a constitutional right (the right to a fair and impartial hearing) in respect of which this Court has the benefit of the recent judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Telcordia[24] together with the judgment of the same court in the present matter. It may be noted that while Mphaphuli did not in explicit language advert to a constitutional issue in the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal, the aspects invoked by it, by their nature, raised the constitutional issues referred to.[25]

[31] As will appear below, Mphaphuli has reasonable prospects of success in the appeal.

[32] I conclude accordingly that it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal.

Condonation in the High Court

[24] Above n 21.

[25] Cf Bato Star Fishing (Pty) Ltd v Minister of Environmental Affairs and Tourism and Others [2004] ZACC 15; 2004 (4) SA 490 (CC); 2004 (7) BCLR 687 (CC) at para 27 which dealt pertinently with the provisions of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000.

[33] The judgment of the High Court recorded that three applications by Mphaphuli for condonation required to be considered:

(a) condonation of the late filing of Mphaphuli's replies to the answering affidavits of the arbitrator and Bopanang filed in response to Mphaphuli's initial founding affidavit;

(b) condonation of the late filing of Mphaphuli's supplementary founding affidavit;

(c) condonation of the late filing of the initial founding affidavit in view of the provisions of the Arbitration Act.

[34] As already recorded, condonation was refused on the grounds both of an absence of a proper explanation for the late filing and of the lack of merits in Mphaphuli's case. The former inquiry also embraced a consideration of the nature of the contents of the documents in question. At this stage only the first inquiry will be addressed. The merits will be considered separately at a later stage. However, it may be recorded that, as will appear below, the merits of Mphaphuli's case also favoured the grant of condonation.

[35] It is necessary briefly to list what complaints were raised in the two founding affidavits. Reference will, however, only be made to aspects that are relevant for purposes of this judgment.

[36] In the initial affidavit, Mphaphuli alleged that the arbitrator had awarded Bopanang amounts for work not done by it, nor even claimed by it, and amounts in excess of those claimed by it, and had not made allowance for remedial work done by AA Electrical.

[37] In the supplementary affidavit, Mphaphuli alleged that the arbitrator failed to perform his mandate in a number of respects, that he committed manifest material errors, that he failed to afford Mphaphuli a fair hearing, and that he was biased or at least that his conduct gave rise to a reasonable perception of bias. On this score Mphaphuli, in the first place, in substance repeated the allegations referred to in the preceding paragraph, giving details in amplification thereof, including the alleged non-adherence by the arbitrator to the pleadings and the terms of the agreement between the parties, and the award by him of interest on the total amount of the capital sum awarded as from 6 October 2002 while, at best, only the sum of approximately R140 000,00 was owing on that date. In addition, Mphaphuli invoked the fact that, as the record of the arbitration proceedings revealed, the arbitrator had held three "secret" meetings with the representatives of Bopanang without the knowledge and attendance of Mphaphuli as well as the fact, also revealed by the record, that correspondence having a material bearing on the dispute between the parties (to which Mphaphuli had not been made privy, and in which certain allegedly false and misleading information had been imparted by Bopanang) had passed between the arbitrator and Bopanang. In the result, the arbitrator had also misconducted himself or committed gross irregularities in the conduct of the arbitration and/or had exceeded his powers.

[38] Apart from the contents of the various affidavits filed by Mphaphuli, a further aspect dealt with in the judgment of the High Court was the fact that after the arbitrator had notified the parties that the record had been lodged with the Registrar, Mphaphuli's then attorney advised Bopanang's attorney that Mphaphuli did not intend to amend its notice of motion. The Court noted that there was no indication that either Mphaphuli or its attorney had demanded sight of the record. The Court further commented that Mphaphuli was in any event in possession of all the documents contained in the record. The Court then recorded its finding that Mphaphuli had through its attorney taken a considered and informed decision not to amend its notice of motion.

[39] This approach cannot be endorsed. First, the record filed by the arbitrator with the Registrar was wholly deficient, and what was filed was not of any assistance to Mphaphuli in respect of the supplementation of its initial founding affidavit. Second, the comment that Mphaphuli was in any event in possession of all the documents contained in the record (or which should have been contained in the record) constituted a misdirection on the part of the Court: specifically, Mphaphuli was not in possession of the documents which revealed the material additional aspects adverted to in paragraph 37 above. Third, Mphaphuli recorded that it had not been consulted by the attorney in respect of the question of amending its notice of motion, and the attorney in question confirmed that he had had no mandate on that score and that he had acted in ignorance. It is not necessary to consider the question whether Mphaphuli was bound by the actions of its attorney. The communication by the attorney to his counterpart did not constitute a waiver of the right to amend the notice of motion and to supplement the grounds relied upon for the relief sought in the sense that the issue could not thereafter be revisited (nor did the High Court suggest otherwise).

[40] For purposes of the present judgment it is necessary only to consider the applications for condonation of the late filing of the initial founding affidavit and of the supplementary founding affidavit.

[41] In its papers Mphaphuli set out comprehensive explanations of the delays in question. Save in one respect, to be referred to below, the High Court judgment did not advert to these explanations. Instead, the High Court focused its attention on the substantive contents of the affidavits and its interpretation thereof (an aspect to which I revert later). The basis of the finding that there was no proper explanation for the delays does not appear from the judgment.

[42] In sum, the explanation tendered by Mphaphuli for the late filing of the supplementary affidavit was as follows:

(a) On 8 June 2005 an employee of Mphaphuli's current attorneys attended at the office of the Registrar. On inspection of the court file it was discovered that it only contained the pleadings in the matter, but no record. Enquiries of members of the Registrar's staff elicited the answer that despite a search for the record, it could not be located.

(b) Mphaphuli's attorneys then contacted the arbitrator's attorneys in order to procure a copy of the record. Agreement between the attorneys was reached that upon receipt of such copy from the arbitrator, the Registrar would be deemed to have made the record available to Mphaphuli for the purpose of Rule 53(3).[26] The record was collected and received by Mphaphuli on 18 July 2005. (The supplementary affidavit was filed on 5 August 2005, some four days beyond the 10 day period prescribed in Rule 53(4). It should be noted further that it was this record that revealed the additional aspects of the meetings and correspondence referred to in paragraph 37 above.)

(c) The arbitration record was voluminous, extending to more than 400 pages. Supplementation of Mphaphuli's papers required close scrutiny of the record and a comparison thereof with other relevant documentation. The process was extremely time consuming and it was not feasible for it to be completed within 10 days.

(d) No prejudice to the other parties resulted from the late filing.

(e) Mphaphuli would, however, be unjustly prejudiced if denied the opportunity of amplifying its case on the basis of the contents of the record.

[26] Rule 53(3) provides inter alia that the Registrar shall make available to the applicant the record despatched to him upon such terms as the Registrar thinks appropriate to ensure its safety.

[43] The only comments in the High Court judgment bearing on this explanation are that there was no indication that Mphaphuli or its attorney had demanded sight of the record filed with the Registrar, that Mphaphuli through its attorney took a considered decision not to amend its notice of motion or to supplement its founding affidavit and that it was only when a new set of attorneys appeared on the scene that Mphaphuli relied on the "so-called unavailability of the record to now amend its papers and to practically bring a new case before court."

[44] The comments are unpersuasive. On the other hand the explanation furnished by Mphaphuli adequately explains the delay in question.

[45] The High Court held that with the supplementary founding affidavit Mphaphuli was in fact bringing a completely new application on completely different grounds from those relied on in the initial founding affidavit. That is, of course, so (subject thereto that allegations made earlier, and amplified in the later affidavit, were incorporated in support of the new application). But what the High Court appears to have overlooked is that the new case was dictated by what the record of the arbitration proceedings revealed. I deal further with this aspect when considering the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal. Suffice it to say at this stage that in the circumstances the raising of the new case was justified, and it constituted no reason to refuse condonation. In adopting a contrary view the High Court erred. In doing so it failed, as will be shown below, to consider the true nature of the case presented by Mphaphuli: In short, it viewed Mphaphuli's case as an attempt in effect to appeal against the award of the arbitrator in that it also engaged aspects that otherwise had a bearing on the merits of the award and it failed to recognise that what Mphaphuli invoked was the fundamental right to a fair hearing, although it did recognise that alleged bias on the part of the arbitrator was relied upon. (The manner in which the High Court dealt with the last aspect is referred to below.)[27]

[46] The High Court further commented that Mphaphuli's two affidavits in reply to the answering affidavits of the arbitrator and Bopanang in response to the supplementary founding affidavit, again sought to make out a new case and further and more detailed grounds of review were put forward. In this regard, however, the High Court substantially misread the affidavits and misdirected itself. In the main the affidavits, first, answered the allegations by the arbitrator and Bopanang and, second, restated and amplified allegations it had already made, without raising new matter. In limited respects new matter was raised, but this was of a relatively minor nature.

[47] In sum, the explanation tendered by Mphaphuli for the late filing of the initial founding affidavit was as follows:

(a) The affidavit was filed approximately 14 weeks after publication of the award, and was accordingly some eight weeks out of time.

(b) The dispute arose in January 2003 and was referred to arbitration during October 2003. The arbitration award was published in August 2004. In this context, so it was contended, the further delay of some two months in bringing the review application was not an unduly long period.

(c) The fundamental basis of the review application was the schedule prepared by Mphaphuli and annexed to the founding affidavit marked "L7". The preparation of the schedule entailed an enormous amount of work, requiring inter alia a comparison of Bopanang's invoices and supporting documentation containing the quantities of the supply and installation of material claimed by it, with the quantities awarded by the arbitrator. The exigencies of Mphaphuli's normal business activities also hampered the preparation of the schedule, which required to be completed to enable Mphaphuli's attorneys to proceed with the review application.

(d) The attorneys made bona fide attempts to resolve the matter and thus obviate the necessity of bringing the review application. Communications were addressed to the arbitrator and Bopanang on 13 and 14 October 2004 in which Mphaphuli's objections to the award were made known. Mphaphuli could not, however, secure agreement that the reference be remitted to the arbitrator in terms of section 32(1) of the Arbitration Act.[28]

(e) Mphaphuli conducts business in Polokwane, a considerable distance from Pretoria, and difficulties in communication with its attorneys contributed to the time taken to prepare and finalise the papers.

(f) No prejudice suffered by Bopanang weighed against the grant of condonation.

[28] Section 32(1) makes provision for the parties to remit by written agreement any matter which was referred to arbitration, to the arbitrator for reconsideration.

(It may be repeated that the review application included a prayer for the remittal of the matter to the arbitrator, relief for which section 32(2) of the Arbitration Act makes provision.)[29]

[48] As already recorded, the High Court did not advert to the above explanation. In my judgement, an adequate explanation for the delay in question was furnished. In so finding I have not lost sight of the fact that, already in its own application and in its response to Mphaphuli's initial founding affidavit, Bopanang raised the issue of an absence of an application for an extension of time, and that same was only sought when the supplementary affidavit was filed.

[49] In Giddey NO v JC Barnard and Partners[30] this Court had occasion to deal with the question of the exercise of a discretion by the High Court in terms of the provisions of Rule 47(3), which empowers a court to require a litigant to furnish security for the costs of its opponent in the litigation in question. It was noted, inter alia, that for courts to function fairly, they must have rules that regulate their proceedings; these rules often require parties to take certain steps on pain of being prevented from proceeding with a claim or a defence; to that extent they constitute a limitation of the right to access to court; in the absence of a constitutional challenge to a particular rule having that effect a litigant's only complaint can be that the Rule was not properly applied by the court; very often the interpretation and application of the Rule will require a consideration of the provisions of the Constitution, as section 39(2) of the Constitution instructs;[31] a court that fails adequately to consider the relevant constitutional provisions will not have properly applied the rules at all.[32]

[29] Above n 4.

[50] Where the exercise of a discretion in the application of a rule contemplates that the court may choose from a range of options, it is a discretion in the strict sense.[33] The ordinary approach on appeal to the exercise of such a discretion is that the appellate court will not consider whether the decision reached by the court of first instance was correct, but will only interfere in limited circumstances; for example, if it is shown that the discretion has not been exercised judicially or has been exercised based on a wrong appreciation of the facts or wrong principles of law.[34]

[51] The issue of condonation in the present case required the exercise of a discretion in the strict sense. In the light of what has been set out earlier (and leaving aside considerations relating to the merits) the refusal of the High Court to grant the condonation sought was vitiated by misdirection, did not constitute a judicial exercise of discretion and resulted in an impermissible and unconstitutional denial of Mphaphuli's right of access to court. The refusal accordingly falls to be reversed.

Condonation in the Supreme Court of Appeal

[52] The Supreme Court of Appeal stated as follows:

[31] Section 39(2) of the Constitution provides as follows: "When interpreting any legislation, and when developing the common law or customary law, every court, tribunal or forum must promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights."

[32] Above n 30 at para 16.

[33] Id at paras 19-23.

[34] Id.

> "The grounds for any review, as well as the facts and circumstances upon which a litigant wishes to rely, have to be set out in its founding affidavit amplified insofar as may be necessary by a supplementary affidavit after the receipt of the record from the presiding officer, obviously based on the new information that has since become available.[35] The original founding affidavit filed by Lufuno comprised ten pages excluding annexures. Lufuno abused its right to amplify in this case by filing a supplementary affidavit of 80 pages in which it raised all manner of new allegations.
> The only new information that emerged from the record of the arbitration proceedings filed by Andrews in terms of rule 53(1)(b) was what Lufuno described as evidence of three 'secret meetings' between Andrews and Bopanang's representative. That new information could hardly justify the lengthy supplementary affidavit that had been filed, ostensibly in terms of rule 53(4). Leaving aside for the moment the secret meetings to which I will return, Lufuno sought in effect to make out a completely new case in its supplementary affidavit. That plainly was not authorised by rule 53 or by any other principle of our law. In those circumstances, it seems to me, the court below can hardly be faulted for having exercised its judicial discretion against Lufuno under s 38 of the Act. It has not been suggested that the discretion was exercised capriciously or upon a wrong principle or upon any other ground justifying interference by a court of appeal. That, one would have thought, would have been the end of the matter".[36] (Footnotes amended.)

[53] In a number of respects these comments cannot be endorsed. The first and fundamental aspect is that there can, in my view, be no objection in principle to a new case being made out in terms of Rule 53(4) where the record in question provides justification therefor.[37]

> "The grounds for any review as well as the facts and circumstances upon which the applicant wishes to rely have to be set out in the founding affidavit. These may be amplified in a [54] Second, neither the use of the word "abused" nor the comment "all manner of new allegations" was justified. Prolix in certain respects the affidavit may have been, but that is another matter, and an analysis of the affidavit (which, incidentally, also embraced the grounds for the applications for condonation) does not reveal that any material allegation therein was not germane to the case being put forward. As stated above, Mphaphuli was entitled to raise the allegations in terms of Rule 53(4), and it was also entitled to incorporate and amplify previously registered complaints, insofar as they were relevant, in support of the new case made out in the supplementary affidavit.

[55] Third, evidence of the three meetings was not the only new information disclosed by the record. In addition, evidence of correspondence between the arbitrator and Bopanang, to which Mphaphuli was not made privy, was also revealed. The Supreme Court of Appeal made no reference thereto. (Nor for that matter did the High Court.)

[56] The Supreme Court of Appeal approached the question of condonation on a restricted basis: in essence what it held (wrongly) to be an impermissible attempt by Mphaphuli to make out a new case in its supplementary affidavit. No consideration was given to the explanation of Mphaphuli for the delay, nor to constitutional imperatives.

supplementary founding affidavit after receipt of the record from the presiding officer, obviously based on the new information which has become available." (Footnote omitted.)

[57] In my view, therefore, while the Supreme Court of Appeal did go on to consider aspects relating to Mphaphuli's complaints on the merits of its case (an aspect to which I revert later), its endorsement of the High Court's refusal of condonation cannot be supported.

Certain aspects arising out of the judgments of the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal

[58] It is unnecessary to consider in any detail the comments of the High Court concerning Mphaphuli's not having been entitled in effect to appeal against the arbitrator's award, which comments were valid (and in fact the High Court recorded that Mphaphuli abandoned any relief which would have fallen under the rubric of an appeal). That is not the case that Mphaphuli asks this Court to consider.

[59] Two observations require to be made, however, concerning the High Court's apparent interpretation of the arbitrator's mandate. First, as will be shown later, it was not simply, as the High Court judgment suggests, a matter of inspection and re-measurement. Second, the statement by the Court, said to be based on what the arbitrator had alleged, that after the re-measurement the parties reached agreement as to the work actually done by Bopanang, must be viewed against a reading of the arbitrator's affidavits in their entirety. While there are statements in his affidavits to the effect that the re-measurement would be conclusive as the parties had reached agreement on the work done by Bopanang and that was the work measured, he in fact elsewhere made it clear that after the re-measurement (on which he said there was agreement) he was still required to embark on a determination of what part of the work re-measured had actually been done by Bopanang (on which there was not agreement). An earlier comment by the arbitrator had recorded that on the correspondence a "huge factual dispute" had arisen as to what remedial work had been done by AA Electrical and what work had actually been done by Bopanang, and it was imperative that he resolve that dispute as well.

[60] Similarly, certain comments by the Supreme Court of Appeal concerning the nature of Mphaphuli's case appear to have been misplaced. Paragraph 14 of the judgment reads, in part, as follows:

> "The legal principles applicable to an enquiry of this kind were recently set out by Harms JA on behalf of this court.[38] Applying those principles to the facts of this case, which I have set out in some detail in this judgment, illustrates, to my mind, that Lufuno fundamentally misconceived the nature of its relief. Moreover, Lufuno's founding papers assumed, erroneously so – as was subsequently conceded by it – that the private arbitration process was an administrative one, which had to be lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair.[39] That fundamental misapprehension permeated its founding application, which as I shall presently show, it subsequently sought in its supplementary papers, to remedy. The parties clearly intended Andrews to have exclusive authority to decide whatever questions were submitted to him and that each was precluded by virtue of the provisions of clause 2 of the arbitration agreement from appealing against his decision. The parties had accordingly waived the right to have the merits of their dispute re-litigated or reconsidered."[40] (Footnotes added.)

[38] Reference was made to Telcordia above n 21.

[39] Reference was made to Total Support Management (Pty) Ltd v Diversified Health Systems (SA) Pty Ltd [2002] ZASCA 14; 2002 (4) SA 661 (SCA) at para 25.

[40] The reference was to Telcordia above n 21 at para 50.

[61] The first observation to be made is that, on the basis set out in paragraphs 15 and 16 of the judgment,[41] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that Mphaphuli's "attempt" to remedy what was referred to as its "fundamental misapprehension" was unsuccessful in that the "attempt" sought, impermissibly, to make out a new case in its later papers. I have already shown[42] that that approach was fundamentally flawed. The second observation is that the case that Mphaphuli seeks this Court to consider does not entail a re-litigation or reconsideration of the merits of the dispute.

[62] Mphaphuli's submission is in essence that it did not receive a fair hearing from the arbitrator and that at least a reasonable perception of bias on the part of the arbitrator arose. The submission is not only founded on the three meetings referred to earlier, the only aspect adverted to by both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal; it is also based on the correspondence between the arbitrator and Bopanang to which Mphaphuli was not made privy, as well as on aspects of the award made in favour of Bopanang by the arbitrator.

[63] Despite the conclusion reached by the Supreme Court of Appeal on the issue of condonation it went on to consider certain issues relating to the merits.

[64] The Court held[43] that Mphaphuli could only challenge the award by invoking the statutory provisions contained in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act,[44] "as any further ground of review, either at common law or otherwise, had by necessary implication been waived by it." In this regard it followed the approach in Telcordia.[45]

[65] In Telcordia the Supreme Court of Appeal held inter alia that—

(a) private arbitrations would, as a starting point, fall within the ambit of section 34 of the Constitution;[46]

(b) the rights contained in the section "may be waived unless the waiver is contrary to some other constitutional principle or otherwise contra bonos mores;"[47]

(c) by agreeing to arbitration, parties waive their rights pro tanto; they usually waive the right to a public hearing;[48]

(d) by agreeing to arbitration the parties to a dispute necessarily agree that the fairness of the hearing will be determined by the provisions of the Arbitration Act and nothing else;[49] and

(e) by agreeing to arbitration the parties limit interference by the courts to the grounds of procedural irregularities set out in section 33(1) of the Act, and, by necessary implication, they waive the right to rely on any further ground of review, "common law" or otherwise.[50]

[66] After an earlier comment that Mphaphuli, relying primarily on the "secret meetings", alleged that the arbitrator exhibited conscious bias in favour of Bopanang,[51] the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal proceeded as follows:

> "Were an arbitrator to discuss the merits of the matter with one of the parties to the exclusion of the other that, ordinarily at any rate, would constitute a serious irregularity, which may without more warrant the award being set aside.[52] But, against the backdrop of the arbitration agreement and the context of the arbitrator's mandate, those meetings were quite innocuous and had no effect whatsoever on Andrews. To describe them as 'secret meetings', as Lufuno does, is to give them a sinister connotation that is wholly unwarranted. The purpose of those meetings was simply to verify certain figures and to clarify the use of certain items. That fell within the parameters of Andrews' mandate. That being so, even if he had been wrong those would have been errors of the kind committed within the scope of his mandate.[53]
> Proof that Andrews misconducted himself in relation to his duties or committed a gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration is a prerequisite for the setting aside of the award. An error of fact or law, or both, even a gross error, would not per se

[51] Lufuno Mphaphuli above n 1 at para 16.

[52] Reference was made to S v Roberts 1999 (4) SA 915 (SCA) at para 23, which reads, in part, as follows:

> "That justice publicly be seen to be done necessitates, as an elementary requirement to avoid the appearance that justice is being administered in secret, that the presiding judicial officer should have no communication whatever with either party except in the presence of the other: R v Maharaj 1960 (4) SA 256 (N) at 258B-C. That is so fundamentally important that the discussion between the magistrate and the prosecutor in the instant case warranted on its own, without anything more, the setting aside of the sentence. Had such a discussion occurred before conviction in this matter there can be no question but that the conviction would have been fatally irregular: S v Seedat 1971 (1) SA 789 (N) at 792F."

[53] Reference was made to Telcordia above n 21 at para 86 which reads as follows:

> "Likewise, it is a fallacy to label a wrong interpretation of a contract, a wrong perception or application of South African law, or an incorrect reliance on inadmissible evidence by the arbitrator as a transgression of the limits of his power. The power given to the arbitrator was to interpret the agreement, rightly or wrongly; to determine the applicable law, rightly or wrongly; and to determine what evidence was admissible, rightly or wrongly. Errors of the kind mentioned have nothing to do with him exceeding his powers; they are errors committed within the scope of his mandate. To illustrate, an arbitrator in a 'normal' local arbitration has to apply South African law but if he errs in his understanding or application of local law the parties have to live with it. If such an error amounted to a transgression of his powers it would mean that all errors of law are reviewable, which is absurd." (Footnote omitted.)

justify the setting aside of the award.[54] It followed that Lufuno had to go further than that. For, as Smalberger ADP put it:

> 'A gross or manifest mistake is not per se misconduct. At best it provides evidence of misconduct . . . which, taken alone or in conjunction with other considerations, will ultimately have to be sufficiently compelling to justify an inference (as the most likely inference) of what has variously been described as "wrongful and improper conduct" . . . "dishonesty" and "mala fides or partiality" . . . and "moral turpitude".'[55]

Lufuno asserted bias. It was for it to establish a reasonable apprehension of bias.[56] The threshold for a finding of real or perceived bias is high.[57] The bias complained of was, according to Lufuno, grounded in the relationship between Andrews and Bopanang. Why Andrews would have shown an inclination to favour the one party to the dispute does not emerge on the papers. The three 'secret meetings', as I have just illustrated, were not only innocuous but also occurred within the scope of Andrews' mandate. The proceedings, on any yardstick, were thus not infected by them. No other overt act is relied upon in support of the proposition that the proceedings were contaminated and that the award is therefore susceptible to attack. Simply put, there are no reasonable grounds to think that Andrews might have been biased. It must follow that the award, on this score, is immune from interference."[58] (Footnotes amended.)

arbitration, waive their rights to invoke any grounds of review beyond those provided for in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act. More specifically, the question is whether the parties agree that the fairness of the hearing will be determined solely by the provisions of the Act and are precluded from invoking the provisions of section 34 of the Constitution, which enshrines the right to a fair and impartial hearing.

[69] A preliminary question is whether section 34 of the Constitution applies to private arbitrations. In Total Support[59] the Supreme Court of Appeal commented that while at first blush it may seem that the fairness requirements of section 34 do apply to consensual or private arbitrations, closer analysis may lead to a different conclusion. The Court further noted that—

> "[i]t is a moot point whether the words 'another independent and impartial tribunal or forum' in their contextual setting apply to private proceedings before an arbitrator or whether they must be restricted to statutorily established adjudicatory institutions."[60]

The context referred to was the fact, as it was stated to be, that the word "fair" in the section qualifies "public hearing", and it was noted that parties to a private arbitration may by agreement exclude any form of public hearing. However, the further comment was that the ambit and application of the section had not been fully argued and its proper interpretation had therefore to be left open.

[59] Above n 39 at paras 27-8.

[60] Id at para 27.

[70] However, in my view, the word "fair" qualifies any "hearing" and not only a "public hearing", and the circumstance that the parties may waive the right to a public hearing (a proposition that was not disputed by counsel for Mphaphuli and in Telcordia it was stated that that was the usual position)[61] does not appear to be a reason why it should be questioned whether private arbitrations are subject to the provisions of the section, specifically the fairness requirements set out therein.

[71] As already recorded,[62] in Telcordia the Supreme Court of Appeal took the view that section 34 was applicable to arbitrations, which, it noted, was in accordance with the approach in the European Court of Human Rights, as per the decision in Suovaniemi v Finland.[63] The conclusion in Telcordia commends itself for acceptance. As counsel for Mphaphuli argued, the right provided for in section 34 is plainly capable of application in the private sphere, and it would be extraordinary if in deciding whether or not to make an arbitration award an order of court a judicial officer could turn a blind eye to a lack of fairness on the basis that section 34 was not of application.

[72] It is not clear why in Telcordia the Supreme Court of Appeal held that by agreeing to arbitration parties to a dispute necessarily agree that the fairness of the hearing will be determined by the provisions of the Arbitration Act and nothing else, or that they limit interference by the courts to the grounds of procedural irregularities set out in section 33(1) of the Act and by necessary implication waive the right to rely on any further ground of review. It is so, as was commented in Total Support,[64] that even if the fairness requirement of section 34 of the Constitution applies to private arbitrations there is nothing which precludes the parties themselves from defining what is fair. I have difficulty, however, with the comment following thereon, that the fairness requirement is satisfied where parties who resort to arbitration agree to forego a right of appeal and accept that the well-known and well-established principles governing arbitration will apply and that therefore viewing the Arbitration Act through the prism of the Bill of Rights does not justify any departure from those principles (if the comment is to be interpreted as offering support for the approach adopted in Telcordia).

[73] The principle of party autonomy, stressed in Telcordia, which requires a high degree of deference to arbitral decisions, and which implicitly informed the approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal in the present matter, is not a weighty consideration against a conclusion that the fairness requirement of section 34 is of application to arbitrations. Telcordia itself, and the authorities it referred to in emphasising the principle,[65] were matters which concerned errors of fact or law to which the well-known and well-established principles governing arbitrations do apply. Procedural irregularities giving rise to unfairness are, however, a horse of a different colour.

[74] In my view, there is no reason why the fairness requirement of section 34 of the Constitution cannot co-exist with the requirements imported by the provisions of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act. On the contrary, there is every reason why co-existence should be accepted: the fairness requirement in section 34 is part of a fundamental constitutional right incorporated into the Bill of Rights and it is properly to be engrafted onto the principles applicable to arbitrations.

[75] This conclusion is in accordance with the principle that in interpreting any legislation the courts are enjoined to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights,[66] including the right to a fair and impartial hearing guaranteed by section 34.[67]

[76] Reference may also be had to the South African Law Reform Commission Report on Domestic Arbitration,[68] in which recommendations were made concerning the contents of a proposed new Arbitration Act.

(a) In paragraphs 1.03 – 05 the Report records the following:

(i) the objective of a domestic arbitration is to obtain the fair resolution of disputes by an independent arbitral tribunal without unnecessary delay or expense;

[66] Section 39(2) of the Constitution, quoted above at n 31.

[67] See, for example, Investigating Directorate: Serious Economic Offences and Others v Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others: In re Hyundai Motor Distributors (Pty) Ltd and Others v Smit NO and Others [2000] ZACC 12; 2001 (1) SA 545 (CC); 2000 (10) BCLR 1079 (CC) at paras 22-6.

[68] South African Law Reform Commission Project 94 "Domestic Arbitration" Report: May 2001.

(ii) the second objective should be the promotion of party autonomy (arbitration being a consensual process in that the primary source of the arbitrator's jurisdiction is the arbitration agreement between the parties);

(iii) the third objective should be balanced powers for the courts: court support for the arbitral process is essential, the price thereof being supervisory powers for the court to ensure due process.

(b) In the summary of the Commission's recommendations it is stated:

> "True to the principle of party autonomy the tribunal's statutory powers can be excluded or modified by the parties in their arbitration agreement. They are also subject to the tribunal's statutory duty to conduct the proceedings in a fair and impartial manner."

[77] In Sidumo and Another v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd and Others,[69] a case dealing with statutory arbitrations under the Labour Relations Act[70] (the LRA), Ngcobo J made comments to the following effect. In order to give effect to the intention that, as far as possible, arbitration awards would be final and only interfered with in very limited circumstances, the drafters of the LRA, in section 145(2)(a) thereof, chose to provide for narrow grounds of review similar to those provided for in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act, and did so aware of the jurisprudence under the latter Act.[71] But they were equally aware that in construing the provisions of section

[71] Sidumo above n 69 at para 245.

145(2)(a), in particular the ambit of the grounds of review in the section, the Labour Courts would have regard inter alia to the right to fair labour practices guaranteed to everyone in terms of section 23 of the Constitution and the interpretative injunction contained in section 39(2) of the Constitution.[72] The crucial inquiry (in assessing irregularities) is whether the conduct of the decision-maker complained of prevented a fair trial of issues.[73] The requirements of fairness in the conduct of arbitration proceedings are consistent with the LRA and the Constitution: section 138(1) of the LRA enjoins the commissioner to determine the dispute fairly; section 34 of the Constitution enshrines the right of everyone to, inter alia, a fair hearing. The right to a fair hearing before a tribunal lies at the heart of the rule of law, and a fair hearing before a tribunal is a pre-requisite for an order against an individual, and this is fundamental to a just and credible legal order.[74]

[78] Similarly, O'Regan J stated that it was beyond doubt that the functions performed by a commissioner in an arbitration under the LRA clearly fall within the terms of section 34 of the Constitution.[75] In my judgement, private arbitrations are, as a starting point, not to be subjected to a lower standard of procedural fairness – once an arbitration award is made an order of court the legal effect thereof is identical to that of an arbitration award under the LRA.

[79] I conclude therefore that the mere fact of a submission to arbitration does not import a waiver of the fairness requirement. This conclusion finds support in Suovaniemi.[76]

[80] In the above discussion I have assumed that the constitutional right to a fair hearing may validly be waived.[77]

[81] The conclusion reached in paragraph 79 above is in accordance with common law principles regarding waiver of rights. Waiver is first and foremost a matter of intention; the test to determine intention to waive is objective, the alleged intention being judged by its outward manifestations adjudicated from the perspective of the other party, as a reasonable person.[78] Our courts take cognisance of the fact that persons do not as a rule lightly abandon their rights.[79] Waiver is not presumed; it must be alleged and proved; not only must the acts allegedly constituting the wavier

[76] Above n 63. This case concerned an arbitration and the applicability of Article 6(1) of the European Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms, which provides: "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations . . . everyone is entitled to a fair . . . hearing . . . by an independent and impartial tribunal".

At page 5 of the decision the following statement appears:

> "There is no doubt that a voluntary waiver of court proceedings in favour of arbitration is in principle acceptable from the point of view of Article 6 . . . Even so such a waiver should not necessarily be considered to be a waiver of all rights under Article 6."

In the result, it was held, on the facts, that there had been an enforceable waiver of the right to challenge the award on the basis of the alleged lack of impartiality of one of the arbitrators.

[77] See the discussion on the permissibility of the waiver of certain constitutional rights in Mohamed and Another v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa and Another Intervening) [2001] ZACC 18; 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC); 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at paras 61-8.

be shown to have occurred, but it must also appear clearly and unequivocally from those facts or otherwise that there was an intention to waive.[80] The onus is strictly on the party asserting waiver; it must be shown that the other party with full knowledge of the right decided to abandon it, whether expressly or by conduct plainly inconsistent with the intention to enforce it. Waiver is a question of fact and is difficult to establish.[81]

[82] What should be emphasised is that, as will appear from the authorities referred to below, the fairness rights invoked by Mphaphuli lie at the core of a legitimate arbitration and it would require extremely strong evidence for a conclusion to be sustained that Mphaphuli waived such rights. Yet, neither the arbitrator nor Bopanang alleged, let alone proved, that there had been a waiver of rights sufficient to allow the arbitrator to engage with Bopanang in the absence of Mphaphuli.

Arbitrator or valuer

[83] It was argued on behalf of Bopanang in the Supreme Court of Appeal (and in this Court too, albeit without vigour), that in this matter an arbitration stricto sensu was not intended, that in fact the arbitrator acted as a valuer and not as an arbitrator whose position was governed by the provisions of the Arbitration Act. Accordingly, the arbitrator had not been required to act in a quasi-judicial capacity in the discharge of his duties, but had merely to exercise an honest judgement.[82] While commenting that it seemed that the parties intended the Arbitration Act to apply to their dispute, the Supreme Court of Appeal found it unnecessary to decide the issue whether the arbitrator had in fact been a valuer, on the basis that this would not have affected its decision on the merits.[83] Suffice it to say that, while elements of the functions of a valuer might have been embraced in the arbitrator's mandate (and while it is understandable that the parties preferred to appoint someone who had expertise in the field covering their dispute), it is clear on a conspectus of all the circumstances that the arbitrator was required to act and in fact acted as an arbitrator (hence, Bopanang's application in terms of section 31 of the Arbitration Act for the award to be made an order of court). He was accordingly obliged to act in a quasi-judicial capacity.[84]

The arbitrator's duty to act in a quasi-judicial capacity

[84] A review of cases dealing with arbitrations reveals that the courts have emphasised the requirement of procedural fairness in the conduct of arbitral proceedings, where an arbitrator acts in a quasi-judicial capacity. It will be sufficient to consider some of these cases to illustrate the point. Needless to say of course that what they say must be understood in the context in which the issue arose.

[82] See Estate Milne v Donohoe Investments (Pty) Ltd and Others 1967 (2) SA 359 (A) at 373H-374C; and Chelsea West (Pty) Ltd and Another v Roodebloem Investments (Pty) Ltd and Another 1994 (1) SA 837 (C) at 843E.

[84] See the comprehensive discussion of the different approaches required of arbitrators and valuers in Chelsea West, above n 82. I revert later to consider specific aspects arising out of the approach required of an arbitrator.

[85] In Lazarus v Goldberg and Another[85] the following passage appears:

> "According to the practice of the Roman-Dutch law, a submission to arbitration (Verblyf) was always subject to the conditio tacita that the arbitrator should proceed according to law and justice. Although our modern practice has somewhat departed from that of the Roman-Dutch law, in regard to the procedure for setting aside an award, the above principle, which has been well expressed by Cloete J, still exists at the present day. In Croll qq. Kerr v. Brehm (2 Searle at p. 229), that learned Judge says:
> > 'Nothing is more clearly laid down in the textbooks than that arbitrators are judges in deciding the matters submitted to them, and that they ought to follow those broad rules laid down for judicial investigation; and no rule is more clear than that they should not proceed to examine parties or witnesses in the presence only of one party, that nothing may be done inaudita altera parte – so as to give the opposite party the opportunity of answering or rebutting such evidence.'
>
> A similar view was taken by Bell and Watermeyer JJ, in the same case, which is one quite in point in the present instance, and must be considered as a leading authority on the subject. This principle has always been strictly observed by the Court, even although, as put by Watermeyer J in Croll's case, 'substantial justice has been done between the parties', as appears from MacDonald & Co v Gordon & Co (1 R 251) and subsequent cases, as well as from the passage from Russell on Arbitration (7th ed. p. 191), cited at the Bar."[86]

[86] Citing a series of earlier cases, South African and English, the decisions in Shippel v Morkel and Another[87] and Chelsea West[88] followed suit. In the former case Van Winsen J is reported as follows:

[85] 1920 CPD 154.

[87] 1977 (1) SA 429 (C).

"Voet, 4.8.1., states that 'there is a great correspondence between arbitrations and judicial proceedings' and that 'there is the same sequence of proceeding and proof' as in judicial proceedings (Gane's trans., vol. 1, p. 737); Van Leeuwen, bk. 5. ch. 94 (Kotzé trans.), says that arbitrators are required to 'pronounce an award according to the requirements of law and custom'. Our Courts have accepted that in deciding upon matters submitted to them arbitrators are required to follow, at any rate in broad outline, the precepts which govern the procedure employed in the course of judicial proceedings . . . . This would also appear to be the position in England . . . .

The similarity between proceedings in Court and before an arbitrator are also apparent from the terms of the Arbitration Act, 42 of 1965.

It can thus be said with confidence that it is well established by the cases in our Courts that the procedural rules applicable in an arbitration require that the proceedings should not be conducted in the absence of one of the parties. This appears from numerous cases in the South African Courts . . . .

Save in certain types of arbitration, the same principle has been applied by the English Courts . . . .

As Mr. Marais for second respondent rightly points out this rule can be modified were the parties to agree that the arbitrator be permitted to hear evidence in the absence of one of the parties. He submits that by clause 4 of the submission to arbitration the arbitrator may proceed ex parte 'in the event of either party failing after reasonable notice to . . . attend the hearing'.

If it could have been said that evidence has been received before the arbitrator in the absence of one party under the circumstances contemplated by clause 4 then that would have afforded protection to such proceedings."[89]

[87] In the latter case Seligson AJ expressed himself as follows:

[88] Above n 82.

[89] Above n 87 at 434A-G.

"The position of an arbitrator in the true sense is very different [from that of a valuer]. He acts in a quasi-judicial capacity and must conduct himself accordingly. Whilst not obliged to observe the precision and forms of a court of law, the arbitrator must proceed in such a manner '. . . as to ensure a fair administration of justice between the parties' . . . . This includes the duty to afford the parties a proper hearing. Inherent therein is that the arbitrator must not examine parties or witnesses or conduct a hearing in the absence of one or either of the parties. If he does so he commits an irregularity which will result in his award being set aside. This rule has been established in a long line of cases . . .

> 'Courts of law jealously guard the rights of a person to be present at and heard at proceedings to which he is a party, and will only tolerate a departure from the rule which recognises this right in very special circumstances.'"[90]

[88] In Burns & Co[91] the following passage appears:

"Amongst the rules governing the administration of justice there is the elementary one which is stated in "Russell on Awards", 8th Ed. 134, in the following language:

> 'Except in the few cases where it is unavoidable, as where the arbitrator is justified in proceeding ex parte, both sides must be heard, and each in the presence of the other. However immaterial the arbitrator may deem a point to be, he should be very careful not to examine a party or a witness upon it, except in the presence of the opponent. If he err in this respect he exposes himself to the gravest censure, and the smallest irregularity is often fatal to the award.'

Nor does it matter whether the arbitrator was influenced by it. Lord ELDON, L.C. in Walker v. Forbisher, 6 Ves., 70, in setting aside an award, on the ground that evidence had been improperly admitted, although the arbitrator swore that the evidence had no effect on his award, said that no Court should permit an arbitrator to decide so delicate a matter as to whether a witness examined in the absence of one of > the parties had an influence on him or not; and in Drew v. Drew, 2 Macq, 1 Lord CRANWORTH said that the principles of universal justice required that the person who is to be prejudiced by the evidence ought to be present to hear it taken; and that an arbitrator entirely misconceived his duty who took upon himself to hear evidence behind the back of the party interested in controverting it.

> It has been decided by a long string of cases that infringement of that rule by an arbitrator is misconduct within the meaning of section 18 of our Arbitration Act, 24 of 1898. That being the principle of law which we are bound to apply".[92]

[89] In the result the arbitrator's award was declared abortive on the grounds that the arbitrator took evidence in the absence of one of the parties and that he had received a communication from one of the parties bearing on the merits of the matter. On the latter score the judgment included the following comment:

> "That may or may not have influenced the arbitrator in changing the view which he had expressed in the afternoon that an allowance should be made for this particular work. He says that it did not. But, as was said by Lord ELDON it is not permissible to say whether it did or not. That letter never came to the knowledge of the respondent until the award was made."[93]

[90] A similar approach was adopted in Sapiero and Another v Lipschitz and Others,[94] as appears from the following passage:

> "It is also a question whether the whole award is not bad on the ground of irregularity. Although it is true that an arbitration is usually regarded as a somewhat informal procedure still there are certain legal principles which govern that procedure. One of these principles is that no evidence must be given or produced

[92] Id at 462-3.

[93] Id at 464.

[94] 1920 CPD 483.

> before the arbitrator or the umpire in the absence of any one of the parties. It is common cause in this case that a certain letter was placed before Mr. Potgieter [the arbitrator] and that he read it. That letter was undoubtedly placed before Mr. Potgieter by Mr. Hotz with the object of influencing him. Mr. Potgieter very properly returned the letter to Mr. Hotz and said that he would take no notice of it but would decide the matter independently of the letter. The Court cannot now, however, go into the question as to whether Mr. Potgieter was influenced by the letter or not. I hold that the mere production and reading of that letter in the absence of the respondents constitute good ground for them to object to the award being made a rule of court."[95]

[91] In Naidoo v Estate Mahomed and Others[96] it was said, with reference to Burns & Co, that where an arbitrator hears evidence from one party in the absence of the opponent such action—

> "offends against the fundamental principles of justice, and although he may not appreciate in himself that he was doing an injustice, he in fact commits an injustice towards the other party to the submission, and his action would . . . be improper although not necessarily dishonest."[97]

[92] Even an agreement in the reference to arbitration that the arbitrator may take evidence without both parties being present does not dispense with the duty to observe the prescripts of natural justice. The headnote in Landmark Construction (Pvt) Ltd v Tselentis[98] reads as follows:

> "The parties had agreed to submit a dispute arising from a building contract to an arbitrator and it was agreed that further evidence would be taken without the presence > of both parties at its taking. It appeared that the arbitrator had taken such evidence but had not apprised the respondent of the fact nor the contents of such evidence. In an application to have the award made an order of Court and a counter-application to have it set aside,

>
> Held, that, in deciding to receive further evidence, the arbitrator had to observe the requirements of natural justice, i.e. the need to apprise the parties of the content of the evidence so as to afford them a suitable opportunity for rebutting it or otherwise dealing with it, remained undisturbed.
>
> Held, accordingly, that the application should be dismissed and the counter-application should be granted."

[93] The principle that nothing must be done in the absence of any of the parties to the arbitration is nicely encapsulated in the following passage by McKenzie:[99]

> "The rule that nothing must be done inaudita altera parte has been strictly applied. Courts have refused to uphold awards in the following circumstances: where a party was given no opportunity of presenting his case, or was absent during the hearing, or during the giving of certain evidence; where a party was absent from a meeting with the arbitrators at which no new matter was introduced; and where one party was absent when another put a letter before the arbitrator who read it and handed it back with the remark that he would take no notice of it in reaching his decision. In one case where the parties had agreed that evidence could be taken without both parties being present, an award was nevertheless set aside on the grounds that where such evidence was taken the other party should have been apprised of the fact and given an opportunity to rebut such evidence. Where, however, a party was absent at a meeting of arbitrators at which the latter were not exercising any discretion or any judicial functions, but were merely calculating certain figures upon an agreed basis, it was held that there was no irregularity in the proceedings."[100]

[99] The Law of Building and Engineering Contracts and Arbitration 5ed (Juta: Cape Town, 1994).

[100] Id at 188-9.

[94] The same approach, in a criminal context, was taken by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Roberts,[101] and in this Court in S v Jaipal[102] where the following comment was made:

> "As stated above, contact between judicial officers and one party to the trial in the absence of the other does not accord with the ideals and imperatives of independent courts that function impartially and free from interference."[103]

[95] The common law principles applicable to arbitrations set out above are, in my judgement, not at odds with the Constitution; rather, the converse. It is to be emphasised that notwithstanding the parallels drawn between arbitrations and court proceedings in the authorities referred to, it is not suggested, nor does this judgment in any way do so, that the same level of procedural fairness required in court proceedings is to be required in arbitration proceedings. It is accepted that the concept of fairness in arbitrations is context-related.

[96] The arbitration agreement[104] in the present matter provided for the arbitrator to receive such documentation as either party wished to place before him, by a date preceding the commencement of the arbitration hearing, to require the parties to make

Facts relating to the meetings and correspondence

[97] Two preliminary observations may be made. First, in their written submissions counsel for Mphaphuli echoed its stance in describing the meetings and correspondence in question as "secret". (During argument counsel preferred the less emotive and neutral epithet of "ex parte" when referring to the meetings and the correspondence.) This approach flowed from the fact that Mphaphuli only became aware of the meetings and the correspondence after receipt of the arbitration record. Had the review proceedings not been instituted, Mphaphuli would not have come to know thereof. Second, it is unnecessary in this judgment to give consideration to the first of the three meetings in question: counsel did not press reliance thereon during argument.

The two meetings

[98] It is common cause that the arbitrator held two further ex parte meetings with Bopanang, in the absence of Mphaphuli, at which matters relating to the arbitration were discussed, namely on 2 June 2004 and on 29 July 2004 (the latter meeting being shortly before the arbitrator published his award on 23 August 2004).

[99] The deponent to Mphaphuli's supplementary founding affidavit in the High Court states, inter alia, as follows: Mphaphuli has no idea what was discussed by the arbitrator and Bopanang at the meetings, other than what was stated by the arbitrator in his chronology. No notes of the contents of the meetings or the nature of the discussions were ever furnished to it. It presumed, however, that Bopanang furnished the arbitrator with comments.

[100] In its supplementary answering affidavit in the High Court, Bopanang stated, in respect of the meeting of 2 June 2004, inter alia, as follows: On 29 April 2004 the arbitrator sent a query to both parties indicating that it was not clear to him where particular items were to be installed as it was unclear from the drawings as to their intended usage. (It may be interposed here that in response to the query Mphaphuli, on 26 May 2004, furnished the arbitrator with a list of estimates of items which had been installed, but not measured; the list was copied by the arbitrator to Bopanang.) The arbitrator had clearly become confused when he could not find the relevant items specified in the schedule of quantities with reference to the drawings. Bopanang pointed out "the aforegoing" to the arbitrator during a telephonic conversation, but he found it difficult to follow the explanation. Bopanang then volunteered to visit the arbitrator at his office as it would be easier to furnish an explanation inter praesentes. That visit took place and the explanation was given. For that purpose Bopanang furnished the arbitrator with an explanatory sketch. The arbitrator recorded the explanation. Quantities were not addressed at the meeting as the items had already been measured. All that Bopanang did was to explain the "practical realities" – why the particular items were there although same could not be related to the drawings. The technical aspects addressed were only for a better understanding by the arbitrator of the matters in question and in no way affected the quantities. As the items had already been measured the discussion did not concern the merits of the award, but only served to enlighten the arbitrator to a better understanding of the measurements already done and agreed to between the parties. The discussion, which was not of long duration, did not at all affect the ultimate award. Mphaphuli, knowing full well that the relevant items had already been measured, only had itself to blame if it elected not to point out to the arbitrator what the position was and to respond on the aspects of the technical issues in question.

[101] In respect of the meeting of 29 July 2004 Bopanang stated inter alia as follows: On 23 July 2004 Bopanang's attorney addressed a letter to the arbitrator inquiring about the progress in the matter. The arbitrator's written response, dated 26 July 2004, recorded that he had arranged a meeting with "Gerhard" (Bopanang's representative) on 29 July 2004 "to resolve the final outstanding issues" (my emphasis), and that the adjudication would follow shortly thereafter. These developments were to be seen against the background of the arbitrator's earlier request, on 9 July 2004, to both parties "to confirm certain outstanding queries". Bopanang responded by way of certain handwritten notes on the documentation received from the arbitrator. The arbitrator experienced difficulty in securing a response from Mphaphuli and therefore had "difficulties pertaining to the technical aspects". The quantities were already established by way of re-measurement and deductions therefrom and agreed to by the parties. A telephonic conversation between Bopanang and the arbitrator brought the latter's apparent confusion to the fore. It was apparent that the arbitrator did not understand the structures and the materials used, as measured. Again, it proved difficult to furnish an explanation over the telephone and Bopanang then tendered its "technical explanation" to the arbitrator at his offices on 29 July 2004. The meeting lasted a maximum of thirty minutes and did not canvas the quantities already measured and agreed to on site, but only why the particular items had to be installed. The discussion had nothing to do with the merits or the ambit of the arbitrator's mandate, but only served "to enlighten him to a better understanding of the issues involved" (my emphasis). The ultimate award was not affected, the measurements having already been done.

[102] In his supplementary answering affidavit in the High Court the arbitrator confirmed the statements of Bopanang and intimated that he did not wish to comment further on Mphaphuli's averments, save that he added that the purpose of the meetings was "simply to calculate certain figures, and to clarify the use of certain items by the parties". He averred further that at no stage during the meetings was he expected to "exercise a judicial function or discretion".

[103] The arbitrator acknowledged, however, that when he arranged the meeting of 29 July 2004 with Bopanang:

> "I was during that period busy consolidating and finalising the results of our inspection and measurements with the aim of making the award. In this process, I picked up further crucial queries relating to the fundamental method of determining > the total length of the cables . . . which I immediately forwarded to the parties under cover of a letter dated 27 July 2004."

He further stated:

> "After receipt of the above information [i.e. the responses from the parties to his queries, including what was conveyed to him orally by Bopanang], I was in a position to determine what work had been done by the Second Respondent and what amount (if any) Applicant owed it. I accordingly sat down and, after due consideration of all the facts placed before me, I firstly consolidated the results of our inspections and measurements on a single spreadsheet. Thereafter and on the basis of the figures contained therein, I completed the award."

[104] In response to the supplementary answering affidavits the deponent to Mphaphuli's replying affidavits pointed out, inter alia, that there were contradictions in the explanations proffered by Bopanang and the arbitrator and he registered a non-acceptance of the explanations. More importantly, the deponent placed on record that "the clarification of the use of certain items" related to allegations of fact which were still in dispute between the parties and were material to the dispute between them. A further averment was that the second meeting had resulted in the arbitrator rejecting certain of Mphaphuli's submissions in respect of Bopanang's claims and that "misconceptions" revealed in the arbitrator's findings could have been avoided had he liaised with Eskom. Bopanang's reply thereto was that Mphaphuli was impermissibly seeking to have his opinions preferred to those of the arbitrator. The response missed the point, that procedural unfairness was the subject of the complaint. In this regard it bears repetition that in its supplementary founding affidavit Mphaphuli averred, and it was not denied, that Bopanang's comments to the arbitrator were at no stage communicated to it, Mphaphuli.

[105] It is apposite to add further that, by contrast, all discussions which the arbitrator had with Mphaphuli were held in the presence of Bopanang. This was pertinently alleged by Mphaphuli in its supplementary founding affidavit, and was not placed in dispute by either the arbitrator or Bopanang.

The correspondence

[106] The first aspect requiring mention is that in its first answering affidavit Bopanang pertinently alleged that the arbitrator had "requested further information and/or documentation from both parties always with copies thereof and replies sent to the other party." (My emphasis.)

[107] In its supplementary founding affidavit Mphaphuli confirmed that the record disclosed that all of its written comments in response to the arbitrator's various queries were copied to Bopanang or its attorneys. Initially, all correspondence from Bopanang to the arbitrator was similarly copied to Mphaphuli. (In my judgement, this procedure speaks volumes of the intention of the parties when concluding the arbitration agreement.) However, the arbitrator subsequently failed to adhere to the policy of copying communications received from Bopanang to Mphaphuli. Specifically, reference was made to three letters. Included was a letter dated 12 December 2003, addressed by Bopanang to the arbitrator in response to a request for submissions on various aspects. Therein Bopanang criticised the contents of a fault report by Eskom dated 13 March 2003 and claims for remedial work made by AA Electrical. Counsel offered no submissions in respect of this letter, however, and focused on the two letters referred to below.

[108] The first was a letter dated 24 February 2004, addressed by Bopanang's attorneys to the arbitrator in which comments were furnished on, inter alia, certain claims registered by AA Electrical and certain transformer areas. It was correctly contended that these issues were closely connected to the arbitrator's assessment of amounts due. The arbitrator stated that the failure to favour Mphaphuli with a copy of the letter was the result of a bona fide oversight on his part.

[109] The second was a letter dated 19 July 2004, addressed by Bopanang to the arbitrator. It had been preceded by a letter dated 9 July 2004, addressed by the arbitrator to both parties in which a detailed list of queries was set out. Bopanang's letter of 9 July 2004 to the arbitrator furnished detailed answers to and comments on the arbitrator's queries.

[110] The queries raised by the arbitrator were substantive and technical in nature. They related, inter alia, to the following aspects:

(a) the occurrence of strain assemblies;

(b) whether a terminal assembly would occur at each pole, other than where it would be an intermediate assembly;

(c) whether Bopanang supplied Delta structures for the remaining transformers supplied by other entities.

[111] It was Mphaphuli's averment that Bopanang's comments to the arbitrator contained numerous material misrepresentations and allegations some of which were false or misleading, and all of which significantly influenced the arbitrator's award. Had Bopanang's comments been made available to it, Mphaphuli would have been able to point out to the arbitrator where the comments were false and/or misleading.

[112] By contrast, so Mphaphuli further averred, its comments on the query letter of the arbitrator, which were furnished on 16 August 2004, were copied to Bopanang's attorneys. This averment was not placed in dispute.

[113] In its supplementary answering affidavit Bopanang registered the complaint that it was not afforded the opportunity of responding to Mphaphuli's comments in that, in forwarding same to Bopanang, the arbitrator stated that no further submissions would be allowed unless specifically requested. It is clear, however, that no such request was made. If it had been, it would have had to be granted. Bopanang tendered no further response to the allegations of Mphaphuli set out above. In particular, it did not deny that its letter contained numerous material representations, or that some of them were false or misleading, or that they all significantly influenced the arbitrator's award.

[114] As with the first letter, the arbitrator ascribed his omission to forward a copy of Bopanang's response to his list of queries to Mphaphuli to a bona fide oversight on his part.

[115] The further response of the arbitrator to Mphaphuli's allegations proceeded as follows. He was not aware of any false and/or misleading allegations in Bopanang's comments, and in the absence of specific allegations on that score, he was unable to comment on the materiality or otherwise of his omission to copy Bopanang's comments to Mphaphuli. The arbitrator did not deny that the letter contained representations that were material to his award.

[116] In its replying affidavit Mphaphuli indicated various allegedly incorrect statements in Bopanang's reply to the arbitrator's queries. Counsel highlighted three aspects. I briefly note each in turn, together with the arbitrator's response thereto (contained in the rejoinder affidavit filed by the arbitrator in the High Court). The reason I do so will appear later.

[117] The first related to terminal assemblies and Mphaphuli indicated that on this score Bopanang's comments were incorrect in certain respects. The arbitrator's response was, however, that his award was in fact in accordance with Mphaphuli's objections.

[118] Mphaphuli's second objection was that Bopanang did not, as claimed, supply any Delta structures for transformers supplied by other contractors (as had in fact earlier been conveyed by Mphaphuli to the arbitrator on 26 May 2004). It was pointed out that Delta structures are installed only where a particular type of transformer is involved, and there were only three such transformers in the whole project. It was further stated that in terms of the arbitrator's award there were no transformers installed in eight of the 19 transformer zones, yet the arbitrator awarded 19 Delta structures with transformers despite the fact that Bopanang only claimed 14.

[119] The arbitrator responded as follows: In his letter of 9 July 2004 he had specifically asked whether Bopanang had supplied the Delta structures for the main transformers supplied by other contractors. The response of Bopanang was unequivocal and affirmative. Mphaphuli did not answer the question, and from its silence the arbitrator inferred that the contractor had indeed supplied these Delta structures. He found it difficult to understand how Mphaphuli could say that Bopanang had supplied no Delta structures: the price list initially contained a quantity of 19, which implied one Delta structure per transformer zone; the transformers were physically measured on site and the number (of Delta structures) included in the award was therefore correct.

[120] It may be noted en passant that this response of the arbitrator, contained in his rejoinder affidavit, was not in accordance with his response in his initial answering affidavit. Although this latter response referred also to the letter of 9 July 2004, it appears that the arbitrator's comments therein related to the replies he received to an earlier letter of 29 April 2004. The comments read as follows:

> "I specifically requested the parties in my letters dated 29 April 2004 and 9 July 2004 to inform me what the estimated quantities thereof were and also to indicate who installed the Delta structures for the remaining transformers. In its reply, [the reference is to the letter of 26 May 2004 referred to in paragraph 118 above], Applicant [Mphaphuli] indicated that none of these items were used. I did not receive a specific response from Second Respondent [Bopanang]. However, I rejected Applicant's response for the simple reason that the pricing list makes it clear that all transformers had to be installed on Delta structures. Second respondent installed 19 transformers and for that reason I allowed for a corresponding number of Delta structures." (Footnotes omitted.)

[121] The third objection related to the quantity of strain assemblies. The complaint was that the arbitrator should have ascertained the correct state of affairs from Eskom's specifications and drawings.

[122] The arbitrator's response was that the Eskom drawings did not form part of the record as same had never been placed before him. He emphasised that what was on site was physically measured and his award was based on those results.

The arbitrator's mandate in respect of amounts to be awarded to Bopanang [123] It will be remembered that when the parties reached agreement that their dispute be referred to arbitration they further agreed to exchange pleadings. Pursuant thereto Bopanang submitted its statement of claim in which it claimed payment of the sum of R656 934,44 (together with interest on the component amounts thereof from various dates), made up as reflected in the invoices annexed to the statement of claim. Incorporated in the statement of claim were the papers filed by Bopanang in the High Court in its application for an interdict against Eskom, which included an affidavit by Bopanang's representative verifying that the invoices constituted an accurate record of the work it had done. Further pleadings were filed by both parties. At the meeting with the arbitrator on 7 October 2003 he was furnished with copies of all the pleadings that had been filed.[105]

[124] It is a fair inference that the above history was the genesis of the contents of the preamble to the arbitration agreement,[106] which recorded the details of Bopanang's claim as set out in its statement of claim.

[125] It is common cause that the arbitrator, in making his award, failed to adhere to the pleadings and that, in the first place, he in fact awarded Bopanang a series of amounts in excess of what it had claimed. Involved were some nine items in respect of which, in each case, the arbitrator's award substantially exceeded the amounts claimed by Bopanang. In the result, the award embraced a total of R352 007,50 in respect of the nine items as against a total of R91 100,00 claimed by Bopanang.

[126] In the second place the arbitrator ruled that the total amount of R339 998,83 awarded was "subject to interest at 0.5% per week from 6 October 2002, when the payment was originally due". This was not in accordance with the relief sought in

Bopanang's statement of claim, referred to in the preamble to the arbitration agreement, which sought interest on the amount of R143 395,53 from 6 October 2002 and interest on the balance of its claim only from 21 April 2003.

[127] From the outset of the review proceedings Mphaphuli adopted the stance that in terms of the arbitrator's mandate any amounts to be awarded to Bopanang would be limited to those claimed by it. In its initial founding affidavit it stated that the arbitrator was expected to verify the work allegedly done by Bopanang, as well as the costs invoiced therefor; he was not expected to award any costs for work not carried out or at prices higher than those provided for in the price list or for work never claimed by Bopanang.

[128] In its supplementary founding affidavit in the High Court, Mphaphuli persisted with the stance that the arbitrator was obliged to have regard to the pleadings of the parties and the supporting documents attached thereto, which had been furnished to him. It stressed that Bopanang had at no stage sought to amend its pleadings to increase the amount claimed. Yet, so it was contended, the arbitrator failed to have regard to the pleadings, which were not even mentioned in his award. Accordingly, he had failed to perform his mandate and had exceeded his powers. It was further stressed that the fact that the arbitrator could not award Bopanang higher quantities than those claimed by it was so obvious that neither party thought it necessary to remind the arbitrator thereof.

[129] It is also important to note that from the outset and on the basis of Mphaphuli's founding papers, both Bopanang and the arbitrator, as appears from their answering affidavits, understood that one of Mphaphuli's grounds of review was that the arbitrator exceeded his powers by failing to have regard to the pleadings and invoices.

[130] Bopanang's response to Mphaphuli's averments was in essence that Mphaphuli had misconstrued the arbitration agreement and submitted that in terms of clause 1 thereof[107] the arbitrator had to determine the value of the work done as determined by inspection and measurement by him as provided for in clause 7, with the co-operation of the parties; in other words that the arbitrator was not bound by the claim and invoices submitted by Bopanang.

[131] In answer to Mphaphuli's allegations in its initial affidavit set out above, the arbitrator initially stated that, having studied the documentation handed to him (which at that stage essentially comprised only the pleadings of both parties), he realised that he would not be in a position to determine if any payment was in fact due in terms of the contract unless the quantities were re-measured on site. The parties therefore agreed, at his instance, that his mandate be extended to include the physical measurement of the work done on site. This was formalised in the arbitration agreement concluded by the parties.[108] It was therefore envisaged that his adjudication should be based on a re-measurement of the work executed, to be done in co-operation with the parties.

[132] I have already in another context recorded that the arbitrator made it clear that after the re-measurement (on which he said there was agreement) he was still required to embark on a determination of what part of the work re-measured had actually been done by Bopanang (on which there was not agreement).[109]

[133] His further response to Mphaphuli's allegations set out above was in consonance with this stance. He agreed that he had been obliged to verify the work done by Bopanang. However, so he said, it was at all times understood that Bopanang was to be compensated for work it had actually done, irrespective of what was reflected in its invoices, i.e. it was never the understanding that it would be bound by the invoices and would therefore not be able to claim for work it had done but had failed to invoice or had incorrectly invoiced. The invoices had had no other function than to serve as a basis for interim payments claimed by Bopanang during the currency of the agreement. That the parties had not understood his mandate to be restricted as contended for by Mphaphuli was borne out by the fact that neither party ever submitted that Bopanang would not be entitled to compensation for work actually done, but not included in an existing invoice.

[134] He further sought to emphasise that it would not have made any sense to limit Bopanang's claim, irrespective of the amount of work done, to only that amount which it had in fact claimed. Otherwise the re-measurement exercise would have been a waste of time and resources if the sole purpose was only to "reduce" Bopanang's claim. It was inconceivable that Bopanang would have agreed to the arbitration under such conditions as it would have had nothing further to gain.

[135] In his answer to Mphaphuli's supplementary founding affidavit, however, the arbitrator stated as follows:

> "I respectfully agree that on a strict reading of the arbitration agreement, I was obliged to take into account the pleadings exchanged by the parties, and all supporting documents attached thereto.
>
> However, as I have repeatedly indicated above, the parties (as they were entitled to do) restricted my mandate during the arbitration process to the physical re-measurement of the work that had been done, and a determination of what was reasonably due by any of the parties to the other on the basis of such re-measurement."

To that he later added the following:

> "I categorically deny that it was at any stage contemplated that I could not award higher quantities than those claimed by [Bopanang] in its invoices and other documentation. The intention was, at all relevant times, that the result of the physical re-measurement would be conclusive."

[136] In his rejoinder affidavit the arbitrator made it clear that it was his contention that during the arbitration process the parties reached agreement that the result of the physical re-measurement would be conclusive. He then for the first time added that the agreement was also that the quantities and figures stated in the invoices submitted by Bopanang had to be ignored.

[137] As regards the award in respect of interest the arbitrator explained that he had to "make an equitable decision as far as interest was concerned", that it was "not possible to determine on what date [Bopanang] became entitled to payment in respect of any particular work it had done" and that "in view of this practical difficulty" he simply decided to take the date 6 October 2002 (which was in fact the earliest date possible) as the starting point for the running of interest on all the amounts.

The findings of the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal

[138] I have already noted[110] that for all practical purposes the High Court failed to consider whether the award was made following on unfair procedural irregularities. It did not consider or even mention the constitutional right to a fair hearing. Instead, it insisted on viewing the review application before it as an impermissible attempt in effect to appeal against the arbitration award because it also engaged on aspects which otherwise had a bearing on the merits of the award.

[139] After noting that the allegation of bias was founded on the meetings referred to earlier, the High Court briefly analysed what it considered were the relevant facts relating to the meetings and on the basis of that analysis it concluded that there was no merit in the submission that the arbitrator was biased in favour of Bopanang.

[140] In respect of the second meeting the High Court contented itself with the following observations. The arbitrator requested the parties on 29 April 2004 to supply him with certain information. Bopanang made oral submissions. Mphaphuli replied in writing. Both parties were therefore afforded the opportunity to be heard. They, however, chose to supply the arbitrator with the required information in their own way. In respect of the third meeting, the comments of the High Court were restricted to the following. This meeting too was the result of the parties responding to a query raised by the arbitrator. Again, Bopanang replied in writing and made oral submissions, and Mphaphuli only furnished a written reply. It was significant, however, that the arbitrator decided the question raised in the third meeting in favour of Mphaphuli.

[141] It would seem that it was the High Court's view that the circumstance that both parties were given an opportunity of being heard was all that was required of the arbitrator, and sufficient to dispose of the issue of bias (the only issue that the Court was considering at that stage).

[142] What the High Court overlooked, however, was that whatever Mphaphuli had communicated to the arbitrator was copied to Bopanang, but on the other hand Mphaphuli was not made privy to the "oral submissions" made by Bopanang to the arbitrator on either of the occasions in question. The High Court failed, and in so doing misdirected itself, to consider the fact that the two ex parte meetings constituted a material infraction of the arbitrator's quasi-judicial duties (which in respect of the last meeting, was not undone by the decision reached by the arbitrator) laid down in the authorities referred to earlier[111] and the impact it had on the fairness of the arbitration proceedings. The remarks made below concerning the comments of the Supreme Court of Appeal on the third meeting are also relevant here.[112]

[143] The Supreme Court of Appeal's approach to the meetings is set out in paragraphs 18 and 19 of its judgment.[113] I deal below with certain factual issues arising out of the comments made in these paragraphs. At this stage attention will be given to certain legal aspects. I have already found that section 34 of the Constitution finds application in arbitration proceedings and that Mphaphuli did not waive its right to a fair hearing to which it was entitled in terms of the section. The approach of the Supreme Court of Appeal, as reflected in the stated paragraphs, does not take account of that right (and it may be pointed out in this regard that the inference referred to in the quotation from Total Support in paragraph 19 of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal, relating to an arbitrator's state of mind, is not a requisite for a court to hold that the precepts relating to procedural fairness were not adhered to). This approach was due to its finding that Mphaphuli was restricted to invoking the grounds of review set out in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act.

[144] The Supreme Court of Appeal categorised the meetings as "innocuous".[114] The categorisation is flawed, for reasons of fact and law.

[145] The Supreme Court of Appeal's comment that "[t]he purpose of those meetings was simply to verify certain figures and to clarify the use of certain items" was based on one of the arbitrator's averments, recorded in paragraph 102 above. However, also recorded is the arbitrator's confirmation of the statements made by Bopanang. The latter's explanations[115] demonstrate that the meetings did not have the restricted purpose found by the Court, but were about substantive issues that were related to the issues to be determined by the arbitrator – notwithstanding Bopanang's claim that the discussions did not concern the merits of the award or affect the ultimate award. This is made the clearer by the arbitrator's own further comments[116] and Mphaphuli's response thereto.[117] The arbitrator held repeated telephone discussions and meetings with one party on relevant issues. His final meeting with the party was arranged in formal fashion, on three days' notice, but without notice to the other side. It took place at a time where, on his own version, he was finalising his results and had found it necessary to raise further "crucial queries". The purpose of the 29 July 2004 meeting was to "resolve the final outstanding issues" ahead of his decision which was to follow shortly thereafter. "Innocuous" was in the circumstances a wholly inappropriate epithet.

[146] The Supreme Court of Appeal opined that the meetings were innocuous "against the backdrop of the arbitration agreement and the context of the arbitrator's mandate" and that the purpose of the meeting, as found by it, "fell within the parameters of [the arbitrator's] mandate."[118] (Seemingly, it is implied that all rights in terms of section 34 of the Constitution were waived by Mphaphuli.)

[147] This approach cannot be supported. As counsel for Mphaphuli argued, there is no factual basis for the conclusion that the arbitration agreement or the arbitrator's mandate permitted him to hold meetings with Bopanang in the absence of Mphaphuli. No explicit or implicit provision to that effect is contained in the arbitration agreement and, indeed, as shown below, neither the arbitrator nor Bopanang contended otherwise. On the contrary, clause 7 of the agreement provided expressly that "[e]ach party . . . shall appoint representatives to attend the physical inspection and measurement [by the arbitrator]." As counsel further pointed out, as a matter of fact, both parties took their right (and obligation) to be present at the inspection and measurement seriously. Bopanang recorded that both parties were represented at each site inspection and measurement held in terms of the arbitration agreement. In substance, the arbitrator confirmed this statement. In these circumstances counsel validly argued that once it is clear that the parties had a right and duty to be present at a physical inspection and measurement, it is inconceivable that it was their intention that following on the conclusion of the inspection and measurement, the arbitrator would be allowed to have discussions thereanent and about the arbitration with one party without the other being present.

[148] In fact, in its supplementary founding affidavit in the High Court, Mphaphuli states, directly contrary to the finding of the Supreme Court of Appeal, as follows:

> "The arbitration agreement did not mandate the Arbitrator to conduct meetings with the parties for the purposes of gathering evidence and in particular did not mandate the Arbitrator to convene such meetings with only one of the parties. Had [Mphaphuli's] attorneys not obtained the arbitration record, [it] would never have known that these meetings took place.
>
> Such meetings were not authorised by the arbitration agreement."

(Mphaphuli added that the meetings also "go to bias", an aspect to which I revert later.)

[149] Neither Bopanang nor the arbitrator takes issue with the above averments of Mphaphuli. Instead, in substance they seek to suggest only that the meetings did not affect the ultimate outcome of the arbitration (a stance, as will be shown below, which is impermissible in law).

[150] The finding is inescapable that what occurred amounted to a material procedural irregularity, resulting in unfairness sufficient, in terms of the authorities referred to earlier, to vitiate the arbitrator's award and warrant its setting aside by this Court. [119] In reaching a contrary decision, the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal failed to interpret the Arbitration Act in accordance with the Constitution.

[151] For the sake of completeness, it may be added that the considerations discussed above at the same time vitiated the arbitrator's award on the basis that the arbitrator misconducted himself in relation to his duties as arbitrator and/or that he committed a gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration proceedings and/or that the award was improperly obtained, as envisaged in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act.[120]

[152] However, even were the epithet "innocuous" to be apt, that would, as a matter of law, not avail against Mphaphuli's claim. Counsel for Mphaphuli accepted that in the case of some irregularities resulting in unfairness it may be permissible and necessary to look at the nature of the prejudice flowing therefrom. That issue, they argued, did not arise in casu where the nature of the infraction resulted in a failure of justice per se. I agree. Again, the authorities referred to earlier[121] (and those referred to below) have made clear that where a party is wrongly denied a hearing, where an ex parte meeting is held by the arbitrator with one of the parties and aspects bearing on or relating to the merits of the dispute between the parties are the subject of discussion, the result is a fundamental infraction of the requirements of fairness. It matters not, and the court does not enquire into, what the party denied its lawful opportunity would have said or whether, on the face of it, justice was done between the parties, or whether or not the arbitrator was influenced by what was said at the meeting. Neither the arbitrator nor the other party is entitled to proffer such latter propositions. The Supreme Court of Appeal accordingly misdirected itself in making the comment, and relying thereon, that the meetings "had no effect whatsoever on [the arbitrator]".

[153] Courts should not lightly assume that the right to be heard has no application. As Goldstone J put it in Traube and Others v Administrator, Transvaal, and Others[122] (a matter involving an administrative decision):

> "As I understand the law, if a person is wrongly denied a hearing in a case where he should have been given one, no matter how strong the case against him, the denial of the hearing is a fatal irregularity. In General Medical Council v Spackman 1943 AC 627 at 664-5 Lord Wright said:
> > 'If the principles of natural justice are violated in respect of any decision, it is, indeed, immaterial whether the same decision would have been arrived at in the absence of the departure from the essential principles of justice. The decision must be declared to be no decision.'"[123]

[154] In Administrator, Transvaal, and Others v Zenzile and Others[124] a similar approach was adopted:

> "It is trite, furthermore, that the fact that an errant employee may have little or nothing to urge in his own defence is a factor alien to the inquiry whether he is entitled to a prior hearing. Wade Administrative Law 6 ed puts the matter thus at 533-4:

[122] 1989 (1) SA 397 (W).

[124] 1991 (1) SA 21 (A).

> 'Procedural objections are often raised by unmeritorious parties. Judges may then be tempted to refuse relief on the ground that a fair hearing could have made no difference to the result. But in principle it is vital that the procedure and the merits should be kept strictly apart, since otherwise the merits may be prejudged unfairly.'

The learned author goes on to cite the well-known dictum of Megarry J in John v Rees [1970] Ch 345 at 402:

> 'As everybody who has anything to do with the law well knows, the path of the law is strewn with examples of open and shut cases which, somehow, were not; of unanswerable charges which, in the event, were completely answered; of inexplicable conduct which was fully explained; of fixed and unalterable determinations that, by discussion, suffered a change.'"[125]

[155] The comments in paragraphs 150 and 151 above are of application.

[156] As noted before,[126] neither the High Court nor the Supreme Court of Appeal canvassed the ex parte correspondence. This omission is inexplicable.

[157] The authorities referred to earlier[127] reflect that the same principles applicable to ex parte meetings between an arbitrator and one of the parties apply mutatis mutandis to ex parte correspondence between an arbitrator and one of the parties. Counsel for Mphaphuli accepted, correctly, that under appropriate circumstances the question of materiality may have to be considered in relation to ex parte correspondence, depending on the nature thereof.

[158] It is not in dispute that the letter of 19 July 2004 canvassed aspects that were material to the issues between the parties.

[159] The resolution of the factual disputes between Mphaphuli and the arbitrator adverted to in paragraphs 116 to 122 above is not, and cannot be, the subject of this judgment. They do, however, underscore the materiality of the contents of the letter.

[160] The important aspect is that on a material issue the arbitrator, on his own showing, received (and acted on) representations made to him by Bopanang, without Mphaphuli being afforded an opportunity of responding thereto.

[161] It should be stated that the provisions of clause 5 of the arbitration agreement[128] are of no assistance to the arbitrator or Bopanang. The fact that the arbitrator was entitled to require any of the parties to make such documentation available as he may have required, did not entitle him to disregard the prescripts of natural justice. In terms of the authorities cited earlier,[129] he nevertheless incurred the obligation to refer Bopanang's ex parte correspondence to Mphaphuli.

[162] The fact that the two letters in question were not sent by the arbitrator to Mphaphuli because of a "bona fide oversight" is not a relevant consideration. As was explained in Rose v Johannesburg Local Road Transportation Board:[130]

> "The fact that they or any of them [the members of the board] acted from excellent motives and feelings will not avail them if they have acted contrary to a well-settled principle of law in circumstances which may seem to affect the justice of their decision."[131]

[163] Again, the comments in paragraphs 150 and 151 above are of application.

[164] Neither the High Court nor the Supreme Court of Appeal adverted pertinently to the issue whether the arbitrator, in making any award in favour of Bopanang, was bound by Bopanang's pleadings, which detailed its claim as substantiated by the invoices incorporated in its statement of claim, or to the matter of amounts awarded which were in excess of those claimed. The High Court's relevant comments were that Mphaphuli's papers reflected an impermissible attempt in effect to appeal against the award of the arbitrator. The Supreme Court of Appeal commented that by submitting their dispute to arbitration the parties had waived their right to have the merits of their dispute re-litigated or reconsidered, and that an error of fact or law, even a gross error, would not per se justify the setting aside of the award – it would at best be evidence of misconduct.

[131] Id at 289.

[165] In the remarks that follow I do not lose sight of the circumstance that it is often the case that arbitration is resorted to in order, inter alia, to avoid the niceties of pleading. However, I conclude that in fact the arbitrator was bound by the pleadings. The reasons for this conclusion follow.

[166] It should immediately be emphasised, first, that the preamble to the arbitration agreement[132] states in terms what claim Bopanang was pursuing, as instituted by it. Second, as clause 4 of the arbitration agreement recorded, the arbitrator was placed in possession of Bopanang's pleadings, which incorporated the invoices. Third, clause 10 of the arbitration agreement precluded any variation thereof unless same was reduced to writing and signed by, or on behalf of, the parties.

[167] Further, I do not lose sight of the fact that clause 1 of the agreement records that the purpose of the arbitration was to determine whether payment was due in terms of the contract between the parties, and if so, the extent thereof, and that a final assessment of moneys reasonably due by either party to the other was required to be made by the arbitrator. The fact remains that the claim of Bopanang was placed on record and, as would be the position in ordinary civil litigation, that was the claim which Mphaphuli came to the arbitration to meet.

[168] As was stated in Interbulk Ltd v Aidan Shipping Co Ltd, The "Vimiera":[133]

[133] [1984] 2 Lloyd's Rep 66.

> "The essential function of an arbitrator, indeed a judge, is to resolve the issues raised by the parties. The pleadings record what those issues are thought to be and, at the conclusion of the evidence, it should be apparent what issues still remain alive issues. If an arbitrator believes that the parties or their experts have missed the real point – a dangerous assumption to make, particularly where, as in this case, the parties were represented by very experienced counsel and solicitors – then it is not only a matter of obvious prudence, but the arbitrator is obliged, in common fairness or, as it is sometimes described, as a matter of material justice to put the point to them so that they have an opportunity of dealing with it."[134]

[169] The arbitrator's initial response to Mphaphuli's averments[135] does not support his stance that he considered that he was entitled to ignore the pleadings or the invoices. Rather, on his own version, the agreement he refers to was simply that his mandate "was extended" to include the physical measurement, not that this would be the full extent of his mandate. However, he did later allege[136] that the common understanding was that Bopanang was to be compensated for work actually done by it, irrespective of what was reflected in its invoices. The comment may be made, however, that the basis on which the arbitrator sought to found this common understanding, namely that neither party ever suggested otherwise, is unpersuasive. An absence of contrary comment by either party would carry more weight in respect of a stance that Bopanang was bound by its pleadings. Moreover, as pointed out below, the arbitrator later changed tack, no longer relying on an understanding, but in fact alleging an actual agreement.

[170] Two further averments in the arbitrator's initial response do not bear scrutiny. First, the contention (not raised by Bopanang) that the invoices, previously sent by Bopanang to Mphaphuli, had solely served as a basis for interim payments during the currency of the agreement, may be based on the arbitrator's interpretation of the contract between the parties. Nevertheless, it bears emphasis that the selfsame invoices were incorporated in Bopanang's statement of claim.

[171] Second, the arbitrator's comment that it would be a waste of time if the sole purpose of the re-measurement would be to reduce Bopanang's claim and that Bopanang would have had nothing to gain from the arbitration,[137] need only to be stated to be rejected. The very dispute between the parties was whether Bopanang had done the work it claimed for. Re-measurement would have contributed to the resolution of that issue, but it could only have done so on the basis of the existing pleadings and invoices. The gain that would have accrued to Bopanang was obvious: to the extent that the re-measurement, and the arbitrator's determination of what portion of the work re-measured was done by Bopanang, established Bopanang's existing claims, it would have been successful.

[172] The arbitrator's stance in his further answering affidavit and his rejoinder affidavit[138] was somewhat different to his initial response. He acknowledged that on a strict reading of the arbitration agreement he was obliged to take into account the pleadings exchanged by the parties and all supporting documents attached thereto (to which the preamble to the arbitration agreement and clause 4 thereof made reference). But he contended that during the arbitration process the parties reached a further agreement and restricted his mandate to the physical re-measurement, the results of which would be conclusive, and that the invoices had to be ignored.

[173] However, in the first place, this contention, which in itself embraced contradictions and inconsistencies, did not square with his other averment that after the re-measurement he was still required to embark on a determination of what portion of the work re-measured had been done by Bopanang. This point was emphasised by Mphaphuli, which stated that the purpose of the inspections and measurements was to establish empirically what work had been done on site whereafter it had to be determined, in the light of the contract between the parties, which entity did what work and what compensation was due to Bopanang. Second, the arbitrator did not see fit to explain how or when it was that the further agreement was reached. Third, any such further agreement would have been invalid in the light of the non-variation provision in clause 10 of the arbitration agreement. Fourth, even if there had been such a further agreement (to the effect that the result of the physical measurement would be conclusive and eclipse the invoices), it would not have applied to at least some of the nine items referred to in paragraph 125 above, in that these items were not measured by the arbitrator, but the quantities thereof were the result of inferences based on assumptions by the arbitrator that the items would have been associated with other items that he did measure.

[174] The arbitrator's explanation[139] for the award of interest made by him does not constitute justification for his failure to adhere to the pleadings.

[175] The circumstance that the arbitrator regarded himself as unconstrained by the pleadings and the invoices, notwithstanding that they gave rise to the dispute, not only had the result that he exceeded his powers in terms of section 33(1)(b) of the Arbitration Act,[140] but also constituted a gross irregularity in the conduct of the proceedings in terms of the same section. It consequently adversely affected Mphaphuli's right to a fair hearing in terms of section 34 of the Constitution.

[176] This is made clear by the decision in Goldfields Investment Ltd and Another v City Council of Johannesburg and Another.[141] The case concerned a review of the decision of a valuation court, but the principles adverted to apply equally to arbitrations. Schreiner J commented as follows.[142] For cognisance to be taken of irregularities there is no need that there be intentional arbitrariness of conduct or any conscious denial of justice. It is not only high-handed or arbitrary conduct which is described as a gross irregularity – behaviour which is perfectly well-intentioned and bona fide, though mistaken, may come under that description. The crucial question is whether it prevented a fair trial of the issues – if it did, it will amount to a gross irregularity. A mere mistake of law relating to the merits will not constitute a gross irregularity, but if the mistake leads to the tribunal's not merely missing or misunderstanding a point of law on the merits, but to its misconceiving the whole nature of the inquiry, or of its duty in connection therewith, then it is in accordance with the ordinary use of language to say that the losing party has not had a fair trial.

[177] These remarks find operation in the present case and the arbitrator, owing to his erroneous view of, and misconstruing, his functions in respect of the application of the pleadings and invoices to the matters that he had to decide, failed to deal with them in the manner contemplated by the arbitration agreement.[143] The resultant gross irregularity constituted sufficient unfairness to vitiate his award.

[178] Again, the comments in paragraphs 150 and 151 are of application.

Bias

[179] Counsel correctly did not persist in a contention of actual bias on the part of the arbitrator and confined their argument to the contention that there was a reasonable apprehension of bias on the arbitrator's part. Counsel further accepted that Mphaphuli bore the onus of establishing the existence of such apprehension and that the test is an objective one. In Van Rooyen,[144] this Court stated the following:

> "That the appearance or perception of independence plays an important role in evaluating whether courts are sufficiently independent cannot be doubted.

> The reasons for this are made clear by the Canadian jurisprudence on the subject, particularly in Valente v The Queen
> . . . .
>
> The jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights also supports the principle that appearances must be considered when dealing with the independence of courts. When considering the issue of appearances or perceptions, attention must be paid to the fact that the test is an objective one. Canadian courts have held in testing for a lack of impartiality:
>
> > 'the apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one, held by reasonable and right-minded persons, applying themselves to the question and obtaining thereon the required information. In the words of the Court of Appeal . . . that test is 'what would an informed person, viewing the matter realistically and practically – and having thought the matter through – conclude'."[145] (Footnote omitted.)

In Jaipal, the Court cited this dictum with approval in the context of criminal proceedings.[146]

[180] The threshold for a finding of perceived bias is high. In South African Commercial Catering[147] this Court discussed the apparent double requirement of reasonableness posed in SARFU,[148] that is a reasonable person and a reasonable apprehension, and stated:

> "[T]he two-fold emphasis does serve to underscore the weight of the burden resting on a person alleging judicial bias or its appearance. As Cory J stated in a related context on behalf of the Supreme Court of Canada:

[145] Id at paras 32-3.

[146] Above n 102 at para 15.

[147] Above n 57.

[148] Above n 74 at para 45. See too Roberts above n 52 at para 32.

> 'Regardless of the precise words used to describe the test, the object of the different formulations is to emphasise that the threshold for a finding of real or perceived bias is high. It is a finding that must be carefully considered since it calls into question an element of judicial integrity.'"[149] (Footnote omitted.)

The comments are of equal application where a quasi-judicial capacity is involved.

[181] It matters not, however (as I accept was the position in casu), that the arbitrator's intentions were good or that he bona fide thought that he was acting within the terms of his mandate or was unconscious of any apprehension of bias that might arise from his conduct.[150]

[182] For their contention of a reasonable apprehension of bias, counsel placed reliance on the meetings, the correspondence and the award of amounts in excess of those claimed by Bopanang and reflected in its pleadings and invoices.

[183] As already recorded,[151] both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal addressed the issue of bias only with reference to the ex parte meetings, and the latter Court commented that no other overt act was invoked to found the contention of a reasonable apprehension of bias. That restricted approach was incorrect and misdirected. Further, the comment by the Supreme Court of Appeal that no reason emerges from the papers as to why the arbitrator would have shown an inclination to favour one party, was misplaced. A desire to favour one party does not require to be proved.

[184] In my judgement, the factors invoked by Mphaphuli, viewed objectively, both separately but more particularly cumulatively, must result in a finding that a reasonable apprehension of bias has been demonstrated: a reasonable person in Mphaphuli's position would reasonably apprehend that he/she had been the victim of bias, albeit unintentional, and that he/she had not received a fair hearing.

[185] Where a reasonable apprehension of bias is demonstrated, the court does not enter the debate whether there was actual influence and it is at pains not to measure the degree of the bias apprehended. In BTR Industries South Africa (Pty) Ltd and Others v Metal and Allied Workers' Union and Another[152] (a case involving what was considered to be a quasi-judicial tribunal, the Industrial Court) the following passage appears:

> "Provided the suspicion of partiality is one which might reasonably be entertained by a lay litigant a reviewing Court cannot, so I consider, be called upon to measure in a nice balance the precise extent of the apparent risk. If suspicion is reasonably apprehended, then that is an end to the matter."[153]

Conclusion

[187] In the light of the findings set out in this judgment, it is my view that Mphaphuli is entitled to the relief it seeks from this Court, and I would have granted Mphaphuli that relief with appropriate ancillary orders. However, this is a minority judgment and accordingly no order is made.

Jafta AJ and Nkabinde J concur in the judgment of Kroon AJ.

O'REGAN ADCJ:

[188] I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment prepared in this matter by my colleague, Kroon AJ. Unfortunately I cannot concur in it. In my view, although leave to appeal should be granted, the appeal should be dismissed. As will appear from the reasons that follow, there are two differences between my approach and that of Kroon AJ. First, in my view, section 34 of the Constitution does not apply to private arbitration although I do hold that it is an implied term of every arbitration agreement that it be procedurally fair. Secondly, it is my view that the arbitration agreement at issue in this case, properly construed, required the arbitrator to adopt an informal, investigative method of proceeding and not a formal, adversarial one.

[189] As Kroon AJ explains in his judgment, the applicant, Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd (Mphaphuli) is an electrical infrastructure contractor who was awarded a contract by Eskom (the national electricity supplier) for the electrification of certain rural villages in Limpopo Province. In May 2002, Mphaphuli entered into a subcontract with the second respondent, Bopanang Construction CC (Bopanang). In January 2003, Bopanang vacated the site early without completing its work on the ground that Mphaphuli had failed to pay moneys owing to it. Another contractor, AA Electrical, was then employed by Mphaphuli to complete the work and to undertake remedial work on the work performed by Bopanang.

[190] In April 2003, Bopanang issued summons in the High Court in Pretoria against Mphaphuli seeking payment of R656 934,44 from Mphaphuli for work it had done but for which it had not been paid. Bopanang also sought to interdict the client, Eskom, from paying Mphaphuli further. Bopanang and Mphaphuli then agreed that such an interim interdict should issue and that the dispute concerning the amount claimed by Bopanang should be referred to arbitration.

[191] Pursuant to this agreement, Bopanang prepared a statement of claim and Mphaphuli a statement of defence, as well as a counterclaim. Mr Nigel Andrews, the first respondent, was appointed as arbitrator on 21 July 2003, which appointment was confirmed when the arbitration agreement was signed on 16 October 2003. Mr Andrews was furnished with copies of all the pleadings.

[192] The arbitration process then followed. It is described in some detail later in this judgment. On 23 August 2004, Mr Andrews published his award in terms of which he found Mphaphuli to be liable to Bopanang in an amount of R339 998,83 and he ordered that interest be paid on that amount from 6 October 2002. Mphaphuli did not make payment in terms of the award, and, on 18 October 2004, Bopanang approached the High Court for the award to be made an order of court. Mphaphuli opposed this application and launched a separate application to set aside the arbitration award and to have the matter remitted to the arbitrator.[1] Mphaphuli was unsuccessful in both the High Court and subsequently the Supreme Court of Appeal.[2] It now seeks leave to appeal to this Court.

[193] There are several issues that arise. A preliminary issue is that Mphaphuli's application for condonation for the late filing of its founding affidavit and its supplementary founding affidavit was refused by the High Court, and this decision was upheld by the Supreme Court of Appeal. Kroon AJ concludes that both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal misdirected themselves in this regard. Given the conclusion I reach on the merits, it is not necessary for me to traverse this issue at all and I refrain from doing so.

[1] Bopanang's application was launched in the High Court in Pretoria under case number 27225/04. Mphaphuli's separate application was launched in the same court under case number 33188/2004. The applications were consolidated and decided together – Bopanang Construction CC v Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd; Lufuno Mphaphuli and Associates (Pty) Ltd v Andrews and Another, Case Nos. 27225/04 and 33188/2004, North Gauteng High Court, Pretoria, 22 February 2006, unreported.

[2] Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd v Andrews and Another [2007] ZASCA 143; 2008 (2) SA 448 (SCA); 2008 (7) BCLR 725 (SCA).

[194] Turning then to the issues in the case before us. Mphaphuli identifies the following three constitutional issues: to what extent are courts entitled to exercise supervision over arbitral proceedings; whether parties waive their constitutional rights in terms of section 34 of the Constitution when they agree to refer a dispute to private arbitration; and what the correct approach is to the grounds of review set out in section 33 of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965 (the Arbitration Act). I think it may be more logical and helpful to pose the constitutional questions in the following manner: (a) does section 34 of the Constitution apply to private arbitrations? (b) what, if any, is the relevance of the Constitution to the terms of private arbitration agreements? and (c) what, if any, is the relevance of the Constitution to the judicial scrutiny of arbitration awards?

Private Arbitration

[195] In approaching these questions, it is important to start with an understanding of the nature of private arbitration. Private arbitration is a process built on consent in that parties agree that their disputes will be settled by an arbitrator. It was aptly described by Smalberger ADP in Total Support Management (Pty) Ltd and Another v Diversified Health Systems (SA)(Pty) Ltd and Another[3] as follows:

> "The hallmark of arbitration is that it is an adjudication, flowing from the consent of the parties to the arbitration agreement, who define the powers of adjudication, and are equally free to modify or withdraw that power at any time by way of further agreement."[4]

[196] Private arbitration is widely used both domestically and internationally. Most jurisdictions in the world permit private arbitration of disputes and also provide for the enforcement of arbitration awards by the ordinary courts. With the growth of global commerce, international commercial arbitration has increased significantly in recent decades. This growth has been fostered, in part, by the Convention on the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards (the New York Convention)[5] which provides for the enforcement of arbitration awards in contracting states and which has had a profound effect on arbitration law in many jurisdictions.[6] It has also been served by the adoption of the Model Law on International Commercial Arbitration (the UNCITRAL Model Law) by the United Nations Commission on International Trade Law in 1985, which was amended in 2006 and which has been adopted in many jurisdictions.[7]

[197] Some of the advantages of arbitration lie in its flexibility (as parties can determine the process to be followed by an arbitrator including the manner in which evidence will be received, the exchange of pleadings and the like), its cost-

[5] The New York Convention was entered into in June 1958 in New York. It now has 144 signatories see http://www.uncitral.org/uncitral/en/uncitral_texts/arbitration/NYConvention_status.html (accessed on 16 March 2009). South Africa has ratified the Convention and brought it into force by enacting the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards Act 40 of 1977 (although the Act has been criticised by the South African Law Reform Commission – see South African Law Reform Commission Project 94 "Arbitration: An International Arbitration Act for South Africa" Report: July 1998 at paras 3.13-3.15). The Convention has been described as the "most effective instance of international legislation in the entire history of commercial law" (Mustill "Arbitration: History and Background" (1989) 6(2) Journal of International Arbitration 43 at 49 quoted in the South African Law Reform Commission Report: July 1998, op cit, at para 3.3).

effectiveness, its privacy and its speed (particularly as often no appeal lies from an arbitrator's award, or lies only in an accelerated form to an appellate arbitral body).[8] In determining the proper constitutional approach to private arbitration, we need to bear in mind that litigation before ordinary courts can be a rigid, costly and time-consuming process and that it is not inconsistent with our constitutional values to permit parties to seek a quicker and cheaper mechanism for the resolution of disputes.

[198] The twin hallmarks of private arbitration are thus that it is based on consent and that it is private, i.e. a non-state process. It must accordingly be distinguished from arbitration proceedings before the Commission for Conciliation, Mediation and Arbitration (CCMA) in terms of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995 which are neither consensual, in that respondents do not have a choice as to whether to participate in the proceedings, nor private. Given these differences, the considerations which underlie the analysis of the review of such proceedings are not directly applicable to private arbitrations.[9]

Does section 34 apply to private arbitration?

[199] The first question that arises then is whether section 34 of the Constitution applies to private arbitration. Section 34 provides that:

> "Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum."

In Chief Lesapo v North West Agricultural Bank and Another,[10] Mokgoro J on behalf of a unanimous Court reflected on section 34 as follows:

> "An important purpose of section 34 is to guarantee the protection of the judicial process to persons who have disputes that can be resolved by law."[11]

[200] This comment makes clear that the primary purpose of section 34 is to ensure that the state provides courts or, where appropriate, other tribunals, to determine disputes that arise between citizens. A similar understanding of the section was expressed by Langa CJ in President of the Republic of South Africa and Another v Modderklip Boerdery (Pty) Ltd[12] where he reasoned:

> "The first aspect that flows from the rule of law is the obligation of the State to provide the necessary mechanisms for citizens to resolve disputes that arise between them. This obligation has its corollary in the right or entitlement of every person to have access to courts or other independent forums provided by the State for the settlement of such disputes. Thus section 34 of the Constitution provides as follows . . . ."[13] (My emphasis.)

[201] On a straightforward reading, the section provides that everyone has the right to have disputes that are susceptible to legal determination decided in a fair, public hearing by a court or by another independent or impartial tribunal. Quite clearly, when parties decide to refer a dispute to be determined by an arbitrator, they are not seeking to have the dispute determined by a court. They are seeking to have it determined by an arbitrator of their own choice. The question that then arises is whether an arbitrator is "another independent and impartial tribunal or forum" as contemplated in the section. It seems to be beyond doubt that these words apply to other tribunals established by law such as the CCMA.[14] Such tribunals must also conduct "fair, public hearings" as provided for in section 34. The more difficult question, however, is whether these words apply to private dispute mechanisms established by parties by consent.

[202] In Total Support Management,[15] the Court grappled with the question as follows:

> "It is a moot point whether the words 'another independent and impartial tribunal or forum' in their contextual setting apply to private proceedings before an arbitrator or whether they must be restricted to statutorily established adjudicatory institutions. The word 'fair' qualifies 'public hearing' and the phrase 'fair, public hearing' relates not only to proceedings before a court but also before 'another independent and impartial tribunal or forum'. In a private arbitration the parties may by agreement exclude any form of public hearing – the need for anonymity or secrecy may well underlie the decision to resort to arbitration. The proper interpretation of s 34 may also involve the vexed question whether there may be a waiver of a constitutional right."[16]

[203] In Telcordia Technologies Inc v Telkom SA Ltd,[17] Harms JA concluded that "[o]n balance" the provisions of section 34 would apply to private arbitration. Kroon AJ in his judgment in this matter finds that this conclusion "commends itself for acceptance" and his judgment proceeds on the basis that section 34, and particularly the requirement of "fairness" within it, applies to private arbitration.[18]

[204] In reaching his conclusion, Harms JA relied on the jurisprudence of the European Court of Human Rights which has held that Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights is applicable to private arbitration.[19] The text of Article 6(1) is, of course, somewhat different to the text of section 34. Article 6(1) provides that:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice."

[205] In Suovaniemi and Others v Finland,[20] the applicants to the European Court of Human Rights complained that their right to a fair hearing in terms of Article 6(1) had been violated since the Finnish courts had upheld an arbitral award which the applicants alleged had been made by an arbitrator lacking impartiality. One of the arbitrators who had made the award had previously acted as counsel to one of the parties. They also objected to the manner in which the second of the three arbitrators had conducted the proceedings. The Court held that a voluntary waiver of court proceedings in favour of arbitration is in principle acceptable.[21] However, the Court continued:

> "Even so, such a waiver should not necessarily be considered to amount to a waiver of all the rights under Article 6. As indicated by the cases cited in the previous paragraph, an unequivocal waiver of Convention rights is valid only insofar as such waiver is 'permissible'. Waiver may be permissible with regard to certain rights but not with regard to certain others. A distinction may have to be made even between different rights guaranteed by Article 6. Thus, in the light of the case-law it is clear that the right to a public hearing can be validly waived even in court proceedings (see, Eur.Court H.R., Håkansson and Sturesson v. Sweden judgment of 21 February 1990, Series A no. 171, pp. 20-21, §§ 66-67). The same applies, a fortiori, to arbitration proceedings, one of the very purposes of which is often to avoid publicity. On the other hand, the question whether the fundamental right to an impartial judge can be waived at all was left open in the Pfeifer and Plankl v. Austria case, as in any case in the circumstances of that case there was no unequivocal waiver."

[206] The European Court then went on to consider whether the fact that the parties had known before proceeding to arbitration that one of the arbitrators had previously acted as legal counsel to one of the parties constituted an impermissible waiver. The Court reasoned as follows:

> "In the present case and insofar as concerns arbitrator M., the Court considers that the waiver made during the arbitration proceedings was unequivocal . . . .

[21] Id at 5 and relying on Bramelid and Malmstrőm v Sweden ECHR Case Nos. 8588/79 and 8589/79 (12 December 1982).

> The Court considers that the Contracting States enjoy considerable discretion in regulating the question on which grounds an arbitral award should be quashed, since the quashing of an already rendered award will often mean that a long and costly arbitral procedure will become useless and that considerable work and expense must be invested in new proceedings . . . . In view of this the finding of the Finnish court based on Finnish law that by approving M. as an arbitrator despite the doubt, of which the applicants were aware, about his objective impartiality within the meaning of the relevant Finnish legislation does not appear arbitrary or unreasonable. . . . The Court furthermore notes that in the proceedings before the national courts the applicants had ample opportunity to advance their arguments, inter alia, concerning the circumstances in which the waiver took place during the arbitration proceedings. Without having to decide whether a similar wavier would be valid in the context of purely judicial proceedings the Court comes to the conclusion that in the circumstances of the present case concerning arbitral proceedings the applicants' waiver of their right to an impartial judge should be regarded as effective for Convention purposes."[22]

[207] The conclusion of the European Court was thus that, given that the applicants had known that one of the arbitrators had acted as legal counsel for one of the other parties prior to the arbitration, and given that Finnish law provided that such knowledge gave rise to a valid waiver, the applicants had effectively waived their right to impartiality in the arbitration proceedings in terms of the Convention, and concomitantly their right to object on that ground. The precise relationship between private arbitration and Article 6 remains difficult and is an issue increasingly drawing the attention of commentators.[23]

[22] Id at 5-6.

[23] See, for example, the full discussion of the relationship between Article 6 and arbitration in Liebscher The Healthy Award – Challenge in International Commercial Arbitration (Kluwer Law International, The Hague 2003) at 61-80 and the authorities cited therein.

[208] Harms JA relied on Suovaniemi in Telcordia. Having found that section 34 did apply to private arbitration, like the judges in Suovaniemi, he then employed the concept of waiver. He reasoned as follows:

> "The rights contained in s 34 (as the ECHR accepted) may be waived unless the waiver is contrary to some other constitutional principle or otherwise contra bonos mores. Parties to a private dispute may, for instance, compromise their dispute and thereby forego all their rights under section 34. By agreeing to arbitration, parties waive their rights pro tanto. They usually waive the right to a public hearing. They may even waive their right to an independent tribunal. Counsel gave the example of two children who ask a parent to arbitrate their commercial dispute."[24] (Footnotes omitted.)

[209] The Court then held that parties who agree to refer a dispute to arbitration "necessarily agree that the fairness of the hearing will be determined" by the provisions of the Arbitration Act only, that they waive the right to an appeal (unless they agree to an arbitral appeal panel), and that they limit the interference by courts to the procedural irregularities set out in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act.[25]

[210] I find it difficult to reconcile the latter portion of the reasoning with the former portion. It seems to me that if one accepts that parties to an arbitration have waived their rights under section 34 in such a manner that the fairness of the hearing will be determined only by reference to the Arbitration Act, and that interference by courts with arbitration shall be limited to the irregularities spelt out in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act, it cannot be said that section 34 has any direct application to private arbitration at all. The thrust of the reasoning seems to me to be that when parties enter a private arbitration agreement, as long as that agreement is not contra bonos mores, they waive the rights that they would otherwise enjoy under section 34. However, we still need to consider whether section 34 does indeed apply directly to private arbitration.

[211] As it is clear that a private arbitrator is not a court, the question posed by Smalberger ADP in Total Support Management remains. When section 34 refers to another independent and impartial tribunal, does it include private arbitration? If it does not, then section 34 can have no application to private arbitration. In answering this question, one needs to read section 34 closely to see if its structure and purpose extend to private arbitration. It is clear that the section provides a right to have disputes resolved (a) by the application of law in (b) a fair (c) public hearing before (d) a court or (e) where appropriate an independent and impartial tribunal. Properly read, an independent and impartial tribunal (if appropriate) must hold fair, public hearings when it resolves disputes by the application of law. It is not possible textually to detach the requirement of fairness from the requirement of being in public: both requirements apply to proceedings before courts and independent and impartial tribunals.

[212] Underlying this right, as this Court has held, is the rule of law and the positive obligation upon the state to provide courts and, where appropriate, other fora for the resolution of disputes.[26] Private arbitrators are, of course, not provided by the state but are private agents employed by parties for the resolution of disputes.

[213] In considering whether private arbitration fits into the framework of section 34, we have to acknowledge that private arbitration, as conventionally understood, is ordinarily not held in public. It is, as its name implies, a private process. Nor can it ordinarily be said that arbitrators have to be independent in the full sense that courts and tribunals must be. As the Suovaniemi case suggests, parties can knowingly consent to an arbitrator who may not be entirely independent.[27] Accordingly, it is not clear that arbitrators can accurately be described as "independent . . . tribunals". As private arbitration proceedings do not, and, if international practice is to be accepted, should not require public hearings, and similarly if private arbitrators need not, as long as parties knowingly accept this, always be "independent", then the language of section 34 does not seem to fit our conception of private arbitration.

[214] The only strong reason to read private arbitration to fall within the meaning of section 34 is the requirement imposed by that section that the hearing be "fair" and, indeed, it seems to be on that basis that Kroon AJ concludes that section 34 does apply to private arbitration. However, I am not persuaded that it is appropriate to understand the section to relate to private arbitration, which otherwise does not fit the language of the section, simply because it might be seen to be desirable to require arbitration proceedings to be fair. The section must be interpreted on its own language and with integrity, and I cannot conclude, given the general lack of fit between private arbitration and the language of the section, that the section has direct application to private arbitration.[28]

[215] In concluding that section 34 does not have direct application to private arbitration, I do not finally consider what indirect application it may have, if any. Indirect application of rights in the Bill of Rights operates generally through section 39(2) of the Constitution which requires courts when interpreting statutes or developing the common law or customary law to promote the "spirit, purport and objects" of the Constitution. No argument was addressed to us on this issue but, mindful of the role courts have in giving effect to arbitration agreements, it seems to me that section 34 may have some relevance to the interpretation of legislation or the development of the common law.

[216] If we understand section 34 not to be directly applicable to private arbitration, the effect of a person choosing private arbitration for the resolution of a dispute is not that they have waived their rights under section 34. They have instead chosen not to exercise their right under section 34.[29] I do not think, therefore, that the language of [28] No argument was addressed to us on the question of whether an arbitrator appointed by the parties would himself or herself directly bear obligations under section 34 of the Constitution within the contemplation of section 8(2) of the Constitution. It seems to me that for the reasons given in this judgment, the answer to that question is probably "no". However, I refrain from firmly deciding the matter given that no argument was addressed to this Court in this regard.

[29] For a discussion of the difference between waiver and a choice not to exercise a constitutional right, see Mohamed and Another v President of the RSA and Another (Society for the Abolition of the Death Penalty in South Africa and Another Intervening) [2001] ZACC 18; 2001 (3) SA 893 (CC); 2001 (7) BCLR 685 (CC) at para 61, n 55. Some constitutional rights inhere in the individual and do not fall to be exercised and may, waiver used by both the European Court of Human Rights in Suovaniemi and by the Supreme Court of Appeal in Telcordia is apt. Indeed, it may not be apt in relation to constitutional rights at all,[30] but that is a topic for another day.

[217] Despite the choice not to proceed before a court or statutory tribunal, the arbitration proceedings will still be regulated by law and, as I shall discuss in a moment, by the Constitution. Those proceedings, however, will differ from proceedings before a court, statutory tribunal or forum. The first difference is that the process must be consensual – no party may be compelled into private arbitration. The second is that the proceedings need not be in public at all. The third is that the identity of the arbitrator and the manner of the proceedings will ordinarily be determined by agreement between the parties. The party who opts for arbitration will have chosen these consequences.

[218] In the light of the foregoing, on a proper construction of section 34 it should be understood not to apply directly to private arbitrations. I differ in this respect, therefore, from the conclusion of Kroon AJ. This conclusion, however, does not mean that the Constitution will have no relevance to private arbitration, as I shall now discuss.

The relevance of the Constitution to the terms of arbitration agreements arguably, therefore never be waived (see the authorities in Mohamed, op cit). The question is a difficult one and need not be further elaborated here.

[30] See the interesting discussion by Woolman "Category mistakes and the waiver of constitutional rights: A response to Deeksha Bhana on Barkhuizen" (2008) 125 South African Law Journal 10.

[219] The decision to refer a dispute to private arbitration is a choice which, as long as it is voluntarily made, should be respected by the courts. Parties are entitled to determine what matters are to be arbitrated, the identity of the arbitrator, the process to be followed in the arbitration, whether there will be an appeal to an arbitral appeal body and other similar matters.

[220] However, as with other contracts, should the arbitration agreement contain a provision that is contrary to public policy in the light of the values of the Constitution,[31] the arbitration agreement will be null and void to that extent[32] (and whether any valid provisions remain will depend on the question of severability). In determining whether a provision is contra bonos mores, the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights will be of importance.[33] As stated above, it is not necessary to determine what role section 34 might play in this analysis.

[221] At Roman-Dutch law, it was always accepted that a submission to arbitration was subject to an implied condition that the arbitrator should proceed fairly[34] or, as it

See Gane (tr) The Selective Voet, Being the Commentary on the Pandects Vol 1 (Butterworth and Co (Africa) Ltd, Durban 1955) 760. Although the Latin word used in Voet is "tacita", I think this is, in modern usage, best translated as "implied" rather than "tacit". The distinction in our modern law was nicely explained by Corbett AJA in Alfred McAlpine and Son (Pty) Ltd v Transvaal Provincial Administration 1974 (3) SA 506 (A) 532G-H as follows:

> "The implied term . . . is essentially a standardised one, amounting to a rule of law which the Court will apply unless validly excluded by the contract itself. While it may have originated partly in the contractual intention, often other factors, such as legal policy, will have is sometimes described, according to law and justice.[35] The recognition of such an implied condition fits snugly with modern constitutional values. In interpreting an arbitration agreement, it should ordinarily be accepted that when parties submit to arbitration, they submit to a process they intend should be fair.[36] Fairness is one of the core values of our constitutional order: the requirement of fairness is imposed on administrative decision-makers by section 33 of the Constitution; on courts by sections 34 and 35 of the Constitution; in respect of labour practices by section 23 of the Constitution; and in relation to discrimination by section 9 of the Constitution. The arbitration agreement should thus be interpreted, unless its terms expressly suggest otherwise, on the basis that the parties intended the arbitration proceedings to be conducted fairly. Indeed, it may well be that an arbitration agreement that provides expressly for a procedure that is unfair will be contra bonos mores.

[222] The contractual obligation of fairness accords with the approach of recent legislation regulating arbitration in other jurisdictions. Most notably, perhaps, it accords with section 33 of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996 which provides that arbitrators have a general duty to act "fairly and impartially . . . giving each party > contributed to its creation. The tacit term, on the other hand, is a provision which must be found, if it is to be found at all, in the unexpressed intention of the parties. Factors which might fail to exclude an implied term might nevertheless negative the inference of a tacit term."

[35] See Lazarus v Goldberg and Another 1920 CPD 154 at 157.

[36] See in this regard section 1 of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996 which provides as follows:

> "The provisions of this Part are founded on the following principles, and shall be construed accordingly—
>
> (a) the object of arbitration is to obtain the fair resolution of disputes by an impartial tribunal without unnecessary delay or expense;
> (b) the parties should be free to agree how their disputes are resolved, subject only to such safeguards as are necessary in the public interest".

a reasonable opportunity of putting his case and dealing with that of his opponent".[37] This is a general duty that may not be varied by agreement between the parties. In a similar vein, Article 18 of the UNCITRAL Model Law provides –

> "The parties shall be treated with equality and each party shall be given a full opportunity of presenting his case".

[223] Of course, as this Court has said on other occasions, what constitutes fairness in any proceedings will depend firmly on context.[38] Lawyers, in particular, have a habit of equating fairness with the proceedings provided for in the Uniform Rules of Court. Were this approach to be adopted, the value of arbitration as a speedy and cost-effective process would be undermined. It is now well recognised in jurisdictions around the world that arbitrations may be conducted according to procedures determined by the parties. As such the proceedings may be adversarial or investigative,[39] and may dispense with pleadings, with oral evidence, and even oral argument.

[37] In this regard see also the Report of the South African Law Reform Commission Project 94 "Domestic Arbitration" Report: May 2001 which, in its draft Bill, proposes a similar provision to the provision in the United Kingdom Arbitration Act. They propose a general principles clause in section 2 of the Bill which would provide that "the object of arbitration is to obtain the fair resolution of disputes". See also the proposed section 28(1) which establishes a general duty of fairness similar to that contained in section 33 of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act.

[38] Premier, Mpumalanga, and Another v Executive Committee, Association of State-Aided Schools, Eastern Transvaal [1998] ZACC 20; 1999 (2) SA 91 (CC); 1999 (2) BCLR 151 (CC) at para 39.

[39] So, for example, section 34(1) of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996, provides that the tribunal may decide all procedural and evidential matters, subject to the agreement between the parties. Procedural and evidential matters are defined in section 34(2)(g) to include "whether and to what extent the tribunal should itself take the initiative in ascertaining the facts and the law." I have opted to use the term "investigative" to describe a manner of proceeding in which the arbitrator, rather than the parties, takes the initiative in ascertaining the relevant facts and law. I could perhaps have used the term "inquisitorial", but have avoided it, preferring "investigative" which suggests immediately that what the arbitrator must do is investigate, in contrast to adversarial proceedings in which the contending parties lead evidence and proffer argument before the arbitrator.

The relevance of the Constitution to the judicial scrutiny of arbitration awards

[224] The final question that arises for consideration before turning to the facts of this case is the extent to which the judiciary may scrutinise arbitration awards. This is a matter which is regulated by section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act. This section provides relatively narrow grounds for setting aside an arbitration award as follows:

>
> (a) any member of an arbitration tribunal has misconducted himself in relation to his duties as arbitrator or umpire; or
>
> (b) an arbitration tribunal has committed any gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration proceedings or has exceeded its powers; or
>
> (c) an award has been improperly obtained,

[225] The basis upon which a court may set aside an arbitration award is a difficult issue which has been the subject of much debate.[40] It should be noted that one of the important questions of modern arbitration law around the world is the extent to which courts may supervise arbitration awards. Both the New York Convention and the UNCITRAL Model Law limit the scope for intervention to a narrow range of complaints.

[226] In approaching this question, it should be borne in mind that arbitration awards are given effect by the ordinary courts. So if a party refuses to obey an award, the law provides for the enforcement of the award by the ordinary courts. Indeed, this is the very purpose of the New York Convention which provides for the recognition and enforcement of arbitration awards in member jurisdictions even where the arbitration has taken place in another jurisdiction. The New York Convention provides only narrow grounds for a court to refuse to give effect to an award. Article V of the Convention provides as follows:

> "1. Recognition and enforcement of the award may be refused, at the request of the party against whom it is invoked, only if that party furnishes to the competent authority where the recognition and enforcement is sought, proof that:

[227] Article 34(2) of the UNCITRAL Model Law provides the grounds for setting aside an arbitral award by a court. Its terms are modelled on the provisions of Article

V of the New York Convention, so that the international regulation of arbitration sets the same standards for refusing to make an award an order of court as it does for setting aside the award. This has been described as "a pleasing symmetry".[41]

[228] A somewhat different approach to the courts' powers of intervention is provided in the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996. Section 68 provides that a court may set aside an arbitration award on the grounds of serious irregularity if the court considers the irregularity "has caused or will cause substantial injustice to the applicant". The grounds of serious irregularity listed include a failure to comply with the section 33 duty to act fairly; failure to conduct the proceedings in accordance with the procedure agreed by the parties; and failure by the tribunal to deal with all the issues that were put to it. This approach thus requires both a serious procedural irregularity and a showing of substantive injustice. The explanation given for this section by the Departmental Advisory Committee on Arbitration Law in their Report on the Arbitration Bill and Supplementary Report on the Arbitration Act 1996 included the following comments:

> "[Serious] irregularities stand on a different footing [from complaints concerning lack of jurisdiction]. Here we consider that it is appropriate, indeed essential, that these have to pass the test of causing 'substantial injustice' before the court can act. The court does not have a general supervisory jurisdiction over arbitrations. . . . The test of 'substantial injustice' is intended to be applied by way of support for the arbitral process, not by way of interference with that process. Thus it is only in those cases where it can be said that what has happened is so far removed from what could > reasonably be expected of the arbitral process that we would expect the court to take action."[42]

[229] In considering the question of the powers of the courts to set aside arbitration awards, the South African Law Reform Commission, in its report on "Domestic Arbitration", noted the following:

> "One of the most controversial issues of arbitration law reform concerns the powers of the court in relation to arbitration. It is accepted that court support for the arbitral process, particularly as regards the enforcement of arbitration agreements and arbitral awards, is essential. It is also accepted that courts are entitled to certain supervisory powers as the price for their powers of assistance. A court cannot be expected to enforce an arbitral award which has been obtained as a result of an arbitral procedure which was fundamentally unfair and which has substantially prejudiced the losing party."[43] (Footnotes omitted.)

The report then notes that a difficult balance needs to be achieved between affording the courts appropriate powers to scrutinise arbitration awards and not empowering unscrupulous parties to use the courts to undermine the purpose of arbitration: the speedy resolution of disputes.[44]

[230] The authors of the report continue:

> "The drafters of the Model Law were well aware of this problem and gave careful attention to it. It is generally accepted that they achieved the right balance regarding the extent of the courts' powers and the time in the arbitration proceedings when they may be exercised. Even in England, which has traditionally been regarded as a > jurisdiction where the courts have enjoyed excessive powers in the context of arbitration, there has been a clear and continuing trend since 1979 to curtail the powers of the courts."[45]

For these reasons, the Commission concludes by recommending that the powers conferred upon the courts to set aside an arbitration award should be modelled on the powers contained in the Model Law, in preference to the provisions of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act.[46] In addition, it also proposes, in section 52(5) of its draft Bill, that an award in conflict with public policy (one of the Model Law grounds for setting aside an arbitration award) includes—

> "(a) an award made in breach of the tribunal's duty under section 28 such as to cause substantial injustice to the applicant; or
> (b) an award induced or affected by fraud or corruption."[47] (Footnote omitted.)

[231] This approach is in effect a hybrid between the Model Law and the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996. The section 28 duty mentioned in section 52(5)(a) is the general duty of the arbitrator to act fairly (the equivalent of section 33 of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act),[48] so the effect of section 52(5)(a) is that an award can be set aside when a failure to act fairly causes substantial injustice.

[232] I set out the approach of the Model Law, as well as the United Kingdom approach and the debate in the South African Law Reform Commission, as I consider it to be important background in considering how one should properly and constitutionally interpret section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act insofar as private arbitration is concerned. Kroon AJ in his judgment concerning the proper approach to the interpretation of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act relies on the minority judgment of Ngcobo J in this Court in Sidumo v Rustenburg Platinum Mines Ltd.[49]

[233] In that case, the Court was concerned with a statutory arbitration before the CCMA in terms of the Labour Relations Act 66 of 1995. Section 145(2) of the Labour Relations Act sets out the grounds upon which an award made by the CCMA can be set aside by a court in terms nearly identical to those contained in section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act. In his reasoning, stating that the jurisprudence on section 33(1) provided a useful starting point for an analysis of section 145(2), Ngcobo J nevertheless emphasised the need not to overlook the differences in context between the two statutes. In this regard, he emphasised the importance of the fact that a CCMA commissioner "performs a public function and exercises public power".[50]

[234] The difference identified by Ngcobo J is indeed important, for it seems to me that the considerations set out in the preceding paragraphs which urge a court to be slow to set aside private arbitration awards are not directly applicable to the award of a statutory tribunal performing an important public power and protecting a constitutional right (the right to fair labour practices).[51] To that extent, therefore, I do not think that the reasoning in Sidumo can, without more, be of great assistance in determining the proper constitutional approach to the interpretation of section 33 of the Arbitration Act in the context of private arbitration.

[49] Above n 9.

[50] Id at para 260.

[51] Section 23(1) of the Constitution.

[235] To return then to the question of the proper interpretation of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act in the light of the Constitution. Given the approach not only in the United Kingdom (an open and democratic society within the contemplation of section 39(2) of our Constitution), but also the international law approach as evinced in the New York Convention (to which South Africa is a party) and the UNCITRAL Model Law, it seems to me that the values of our Constitution will not necessarily best be served by interpreting section 33(1) in a manner that enhances the power of courts to set aside private arbitration awards. Indeed, the contrary seems to be the case. The international and comparative law considered in this judgment suggests that courts should be careful not to undermine the achievement of the goals of private arbitration by enlarging their powers of scrutiny imprudently. Section 33(1) provides three grounds for setting aside an arbitration award: misconduct by an arbitrator; gross irregularity in the conduct of the proceedings; and the fact that an award has been improperly obtained. In my view, and in the light of the reasoning in the previous paragraphs, the Constitution would require a court to construe these grounds reasonably strictly in relation to private arbitration.

[236] The final question that arises is what the approach of a court should be to the question of fairness. First, we must recognise that fairness in arbitration proceedings should not be equated with the process established in the Uniform Rules of Court for the conduct of proceedings before our courts. Secondly, there is no reason why an investigative procedure should not be pursued as long as it is pursued fairly.[52] The international conventions make clear that the manner of proceeding in arbitration is to be determined by agreement between the parties and, in default of that, by the arbitrator. Thirdly, the process to be followed should be discerned in the first place from the terms of the arbitration agreement itself. Courts should be respectful of the intentions of the parties in relation to procedure. In so doing, they should bear in mind the purposes of private arbitration which include the fast and cost-effective resolution of disputes. If courts are too quick to find fault with the manner in which an arbitration has been conducted, and too willing to conclude that the faulty procedure is unfair or constitutes a gross irregularity within the meaning of section 33(1), the goals of private arbitration may well be defeated.

Should the court grant the application for leave to appeal?

[237] After this somewhat lengthy introduction on the law and private arbitration, I turn now to consider whether this case raises a constitutional issue within the jurisdiction of the Court and one which it is in the interests of justice to hear. At the outset I should say that ordinarily the question whether a particular arbitration award should be set aside, turning as it must on the precise terms of the arbitration agreement which regulated it, will not raise a constitutional issue of sufficient substance to warrant being entertained by this Court.

[52] In this regard, see section 34(2)(g) of the United Kingdom Arbitration Act, 1996, and Article 19(2) of the UNCITRAL Model Law which provides that in the absence of agreement between the parties, "the arbitral tribunal may . . . conduct the arbitration in such manner as it considers appropriate." This right is subject, of course, to the parties being treated equally in terms of Article 18 of the UNCITRAL Model Law.

[238] This case, however, being the first such challenge to be considered by this Court, is different. The Court has had to consider the relationship between private arbitration and the Constitution, the proper scope of section 34 of the Constitution and the approach to the interpretation of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act in the light of the Constitution. All these are constitutional matters of substance falling within the jurisdiction of this Court and which, given the need to provide guidance in this regard, it is in the interests of justice for this Court to entertain. The application of these principles to the facts of this case, even if arguably not concerning a constitutional issue itself, concerns a matter connected to a decision on a constitutional issue which it is in the interests of justice to decide. In so doing, we will avoid the piecemeal determination of the case and provide an application of the principles set out above which will hopefully elucidate those principles in a helpful manner. I would therefore grant the application for leave to appeal.

Should the arbitration award be set aside?

[239] Mphaphuli argues that the arbitration award be set aside because, first, the arbitrator held what it terms three "secret" meetings with Bopanang during the course of the arbitration. Secondly, Mphaphuli points to the fact that not all correspondence between Bopanang and the arbitrator was furnished to Mphaphuli; and thirdly, Mphaphuli submits that the arbitrator committed a gross irregularity by "effectively ignoring the pleadings filed before him" and awarding amounts in excess of what had been claimed and invoiced. Before turning to consider these complaints in detail, it will be helpful to give some further background to the arbitration.

The arbitration process

[240] As set out in the introductory paragraphs of this judgment, the arbitration agreement was entered into between the parties once litigation had been initiated by Bopanang to recover moneys it alleged Mphaphuli owed it in terms of a contract in which Bopanang had been appointed as a sub-contractor by Mphaphuli to electrify certain rural villages in Limpopo Province. In July 2003, Mphaphuli and Bopanang held a pre-arbitration meeting at which they agreed that Mr Andrews, a quantity surveyor, would be appointed as arbitrator. The note of this agreement reflected that Mr Andrews was appointed in the light of his qualifications and experience. The parties further agreed that Mr Andrews would be furnished with Bopanang's particulars of claim, together with a list of documents upon which it relied. Further, Mphaphuli was to lodge its plea and counterclaim (if any) and its list of documents by a certain date, which would then be followed by Bopanang's reply and plea to the counterclaim (if any).

[241] According to the arbitrator, once he had received this documentation he realised that he could not determine what, if anything, was due by Mphaphuli to Bopanang from the invoices alone and he concluded that he needed to re-measure the quantities on site. When the arbitration commenced on 6 October 2003, he informed the parties of this and the parties agreed that the matter would have to be postponed, and the mandate of the arbitrator extended to include physical re-measurement on site. Thereafter, a further arbitration agreement reflecting this agreement was signed on 16 October 2003.

[242] Clause 1 of this agreement was titled "Purpose of Arbitration". It provided as follows:

> "The purpose of the arbitration is to determine whether payment is due in terms of the contract concluded between the parties, and if it is determined that payment is in fact due, the extent of such payment due, having regard to the scope of the agreement; any agreed amendments or instructions for amendments thereto by the Defendant or ESKOM; the value of the work that has been done by the Plaintiff; the effect of any defects, if any, and the rectification thereof; any and all payments made to the Plaintiff. Therefore a final assessment of the moneys reasonably due by any one of the parties to the other needs to be made by the arbitrator."

The clear purpose of the arbitration was therefore to determine what, if anything, was owed by Mphaphuli to Bopanang.

[243] In relation to the procedure to be followed, the agreement provided in clause 4 that—

> "The parties record that the arbitrator has already been provided with a bundle of documentation forming part of the Plaintiff's Particulars of Claim. In addition hereto, each party shall be entitled to submit such documentation as it may deem necessary to the arbitrator by not later than 10 October 2003 [sic]."

[244] Clause 5 provided that the arbitrator "shall be entitled to require from any of the parties to make such further documentation available as he may require". It further stated that the parties would furnish the documentation to the arbitrator within three days of his request. Clause 6 provided that the arbitrator could liaise with representatives of Eskom and request Eskom to furnish any relevant documentation. Neither clause 5 nor 6 expressly stated that the documentation received by the arbitrator would be furnished to the parties. Clause 10 of the agreement stipulated that the terms of the agreement were the full agreement between the parties and were not to be varied save in writing.

[245] Clause 7 of the agreement provides that the arbitrator would commence the "inspection and measurement of the work" on site on 27 October 2003. It specifically added that each party should appoint representatives to attend the inspection and measurement.

[246] I should pause here to note that the agreement makes no express provision for formal adversarial adjudicative proceedings at all in which evidence would be led or legal argument submitted. Both Mphaphuli and Bopanang accept this. The agreement provided only for the furnishing of documents to the arbitrator by the parties and Eskom (with a power for the arbitrator to request further documents should he consider it necessary) and for a re-measurement process to take place on site. It was only in relation to the re-measurement process that the agreement stipulated that parties would appoint representatives. It is again worth noting that the representatives appointed were not lawyers.

[247] The date for the inspection was delayed till 12 and 13 November 2003. In his affidavit, the arbitrator describes, in a largely undisputed version, what happened on those days as follows:

> "Tatjane is a rural area situated in a remote and mountainous part of Limpopo province. It is a large area (totalling approximately 20-30 km^2) and for most of it, inaccessible to vehicles. Since it became clear to all of us that the inspection and measurements would have had to be done on foot, it was decided after consultation with the parties, that we split into two teams. Each team would comprise of representatives of both parties and would be tasked physically to re-measure all work done by Second Respondent. In the evening, we would then get together and combine the results of both teams. The first team comprised of myself, Mr Lufuno Mphaphuli . . . and Mr Shawem Kigole who represented the Second Respondent. The second team comprised of Mr Gerhard Esterhuizen (who represented the Second Respondent) and one Moses (who represented the Applicant)."

[248] Rain washed out most of the efforts at measurement on 12 November 2003 and the teams agreed to meet again on 1 December 2003. In the meanwhile, the arbitrator consolidated the results of the inspection and forwarded them to the parties. The arbitrator notes that the equipment installed by Bopanang was physically counted and measured. He emphasises that work installed by other contractors was not measured. The arbitrator further states that on 1 and 2 December 2003, the remainder of the area was inspected and re-measured. He notes that it became clear during the inspection process that Bopanang had to supply electricity to considerably more informal dwellings than had originally been estimated by Mphaphuli and that many of the dwellings in the area were new. It was also accepted, says the arbitrator, that Bopanang was entitled to be compensated for these additional installations. He also noted that the mountainous nature of the area had resulted in the need to re-route some of the electricity cables. By 18 December 2003, the arbitrator had completed a schedule reflecting the results of the inspection and re-measurement process which he sent to the parties for their comment.

[249] A flurry of correspondence occurred in the early months of 2004 when the parties wrote to the arbitrator setting out various concerns. From this correspondence and from his work on the measurements, the arbitrator recounts that it became clear that some measurements had been omitted and also that there was a significant factual dispute between the parties as to the remedial work that had been undertaken by AA Electrical. He accordingly suggested a further meeting on site with representatives of AA Electrical to resolve this dispute and to complete the omitted measurements. The meeting took place on 24 March 2004. The arbitrator once again consolidated the results of the re-measurement and inspection of 24 March and forwarded it to the parties.

[250] At this stage, I should note that Mphaphuli now objects to the procedure followed by the arbitrator on the basis that once the arbitrator had done the measurements, he should again have referred to the invoices and claims of the second respondent to limit the amount due to the amount claimed by Bopanang. The arbitrator rebuts this argument on the basis that he had advised the parties that a determination on the invoices would be impossible and that inspection and re-measurement were required. He states that once the parties had agreed on re-measurement, it would have made no sense to seek to do that in the light of the invoices. I shall return to this issue in a moment.

[251] On 29 April 2004, the arbitrator wrote to the parties identifying certain outstanding issues upon which he needed guidance. Mphaphuli responded to this request in writing, but Bopanang felt that it could not explain its responses in writing. Accordingly, a meeting was held between the arbitrator and a representative of Bopanang on 2 June 2004 where Bopanang's clarification was provided to the arbitrator. This was the second of the so-called secret meetings. According to the arbitrator, the result of this meeting was that the arbitrator wrote to the parties on 9 July 2004 in which he asked both parties to comment on the tentative conclusions he had drawn in the light of the meeting of 2 June 2004.

[252] Bopanang responded to this letter with a series of cryptic yes-or-no answers pencilled onto the faxed copy of the original letter. A copy of this response was not sent to Mphaphuli. However, the same questions had been put to Mphaphuli who did not respond immediately. Finally, after being reminded to do so by the arbitrator in writing on 6 August 2004, Mphaphuli, on 16 August 2004, furnished its responses to the queries of 9 July. It did not respond to all the queries raised by the arbitrator but where it did not respond, the arbitrator accepted that Mphaphuli did not disagree with his (the arbitrator's) tentative proposed conclusion.

[253] One final issue needs to be described here. When the arbitrator received Bopanang's cryptic responses to his letter of 9 July 2004, the answer in relation to one issue was unclear to the arbitrator. That issue related to a proposed revision of prices. The arbitrator held a further meeting with Bopanang, in the absence of Mphaphuli, on 29 July 2004 to discuss this issue. This was the third so-called secret meeting and is discussed in greater detail below. After that meeting, the arbitrator rejected Bopanang's proposal that revised prices should be awarded, and held in favour of Mphaphuli that Bopanang was not entitled to the revised prices as they had never been agreed in writing – the original contract required amendments to be in writing.

The proper interpretation of the arbitration agreement

[254] Construed in its context, it seems to me that this arbitration agreement contemplated that the arbitrator would adopt an informal, investigative method of proceeding. The factors are the following. First, the arbitrator is a quantity surveyor, expressly stated to have been appointed because of his expertise and experience. This fact suggests that the parties understood the process to be primarily a quantitative exercise which would require the accurate measurement of work done by Bopanang to determine the indebtedness of Mphaphuli.

[255] Secondly, the terms of the arbitration agreement itself contemplate that the purpose of the arbitration was to determine—> "whether payment is due in terms of the contract concluded between the parties, and if it is . . . due, the extent of such payment due, having regard to the scope of the agreement; any agreed amendments or instructions for amendments thereto by the Defendant or ESKOM; the value of the work that has been done".

It concluded by stating that "a final assessment of moneys reasonably due by any one of the parties to the other needs to be made by the arbitrator". Again, this emphasises that the function of the arbitrator was primarily quantitative.

[256] Thirdly, the agreement contemplates that "each party shall be entitled to submit such documentation as it may deem necessary to the arbitrator". There is no express provision for the exchange of documentation between the parties. Similarly, the arbitrator is entitled to request documentation from the parties without an express provision for an exchange of the documentation. Fourthly, the arbitrator was authorised to liaise with Eskom directly which was in turn authorised to furnish the arbitrator with any documentation he required. Again, the agreement does not stipulate that such documentation would be furnished to the parties. Fifthly, there is only one express provision that requires the presence of the parties and that is at the re-measurement process itself. Sixthly, the agreement makes no provision at all for the leading of oral evidence or the submission of oral argument.

[257] I am strengthened in my conclusion that an informal, investigative process was envisioned by the process that was in fact adopted as I have described it above. That process was one where the arbitrator received evidence, prepared a schedule of quantities based on the evidence he received, gave both parties a copy of the schedule or a letter setting out his concerns and gave each an opportunity to comment. A revised schedule containing the re-measured quantities was circulated to the parties at least three times during the arbitration: on 17 November 2003, 18 December 2003 and at the end of March 2004 (after the meeting with AA Electrical). In addition, the arbitrator wrote to the parties at least three times asking for their comments on preliminary conclusions he had reached: on 18 December 2003, 25 February 2004 and on 9 July 2004. Neither of the parties complained about the procedure followed to the arbitrator during the proceedings, and one can only assume that this was the process the parties had contemplated.

[258] I conclude therefore that on a proper interpretation of this arbitration agreement, the parties intended the arbitrator to follow an informal, investigative process and one in which no oral evidence would be led. The procedure was by and large aimed at the determination of facts and in particular the amount owed by Mphaphuli to Bopanang, if anything. No provision was accordingly made for legal argument. The question that now arises is whether the conduct complained of by Mphaphuli constitutes a gross irregularity within the meaning of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act in the light of this understanding of the arbitration agreement. I shall deal with each of the three complaints separately. Before doing so, I wish to deal briefly with the cases cited by Kroon AJ concerning the need for both parties to be present at all stages during arbitration proceedings.

[259] Kroon AJ relies on Lazarus v Goldberg and Another[53] which cites Cloete J in Croll qq. Kerr v Brehm to state that "no rule is more clear than that they [arbitrators] should not proceed to examine parties or witnesses in the presence only of one party, that nothing may be done inaudita altera parte". This rule is clearly correct in the context of an adversarial process. It is not clear to me, however, that it is applicable to investigative proceedings of the sort under examination here. Can it be said that it is unfair to one party for an arbitrator to obtain information, to form a preliminary view on the basis of that information and then to give both sides an opportunity to rebut that preliminary view? I do not think so.

[260] Another case relied upon by Kroon AJ is Shippel v Morkel and Another[54] in which Van Winsen J relied on a passage from Voet and concluded that

> "our Courts have accepted that in deciding upon matters submitted to them arbitrators are required to follow, at any rate in broad outline, the precepts which govern the procedure employed in the course of judicial proceedings."[55]

In my view, this conclusion is incorrect. There is nothing in the Arbitration Act which excludes investigative proceedings, as I have reasoned above, and judges should be cautious not to interpret section 33(1) of the Act so as to require arbitrators to proceed as if they were courts of law. Such an interpretation would undermine the purposes of arbitration which are to provide flexible and affordable alternatives to judicial dispute resolution. Van Winsen J's conclusion that "it is well established . . . that the procedural rules applicable in an arbitration require that the proceedings should not be conducted in the absence of one of the parties" seems to me (particularly given the previous dictum) to assume that the proceedings must be adversarial. That is an assumption that should not be made.

[55] Id at 34.

[261] It is not necessary to deal with each and every one of the authorities cited by Kroon AJ. Suffice it to say that, in the light of modern arbitration practice and procedure, courts should be careful not to require arbitrators to proceed in an adversarial fashion. To the extent that these authorities stipulate requirements of fairness relevant to adversarial proceedings, they cannot be faulted. To the extent, however, that they suggest that investigative procedures may not be followed by arbitrators, they cannot be accepted. This does not mean that anything goes in an investigative process. The requirement of fairness obtains there, as it does in adversarial proceedings. Its content is simply different. In each case, the question will be whether the procedure followed afforded both parties a fair opportunity to present their case.

The "secret" meetings

[262] The three "secret" meetings Mphaphuli refers to were held on 17 March 2004, 2 June 2004 and 29 July 2004. According to Bopanang, all that happened at the first meeting was that the arbitrator and a representative of Bopanang agreed to a date for a site meeting to discuss the extent of the remedial work conducted by AA Electrical. The meeting took place following a letter by Bopanang to the arbitrator enquiring about progress. Following the meeting of 17 March, the arbitrator immediately wrote to Mphaphuli to advise it of the date set for the site meeting, being 24 March.

[263] In assessing whether this meeting constituted a gross irregularity, it should be added that it is clear from the record that there were a number of occasions on which the arbitrator contacted one or other party to arrange a meeting or some similar administrative arrangement.[56] It is clear from the record that the process was an informal one and that neither party objected to this during the arbitration. It is also clear that nothing that happened on 17 March 2004 prevented Mphaphuli from presenting its case to the arbitrator within the framework of the arbitration procedure adopted. Given that the proceedings followed were informal and investigative and based on a methodology whereby the arbitrator repeatedly placed his preliminary views before the parties and gave them an opportunity to respond, the meeting of 17 March 2004 does not constitute a gross irregularity, if it constitutes an irregularity at all.

[264] The second meeting took place on 2 June 2004.[57] That meeting was held because Bopanang found it hard to respond in writing to the queries sent by the arbitrator to both parties on 29 April 2004. In the meeting, Bopanang's representative explained to the arbitrator the way in which certain equipment had been installed. On the arbitrator's version, the result of this meeting was that the arbitrator wrote a letter on 9 July 2004 to both parties setting out his initial and tentative conclusions on some of the equipment issues and asked both parties to respond. Both parties did eventually respond.

[56] So, for example, on 16 October 2003, Mphaphuli's representative contacted the arbitrator to inform him that the revised arbitration agreement had been signed and to suggest a site meeting with representatives on 27 October 2003. Again at the site meeting of 24 March 2004, Mr Mphaphuli declined to accompany the arbitrator on a site inspection saying he had to attend another meeting.

[265] It may have been unwise for the arbitrator to meet alone with a representative of Bopanang. The question that arises in this instance is whether it was unfair in the sense that it denied Mphaphuli an opportunity fairly to state its case. Mphaphuli was given an opportunity to respond to the explanations given by Bopanang to the arbitrator, in that the arbitrator formulated the issues and sent them to both parties requesting confirmation. This followed the process that had been adopted throughout the arbitration. The arbitrator reached preliminary conclusions and then gave the parties an opportunity to comment thereon. At times, by consent, those conclusions were reached in the absence of one or other of the parties. As noted above, for example, the site inspection on 24 March 2004 had gone ahead in the absence of Mr Mphaphuli as he chose to attend another meeting. It is to be assumed that he was willing to do this because he understood that the arbitrator would give him an opportunity to comment on the results of the inspection. This the arbitrator did in due course.

[266] Given the nature of the proceedings agreed upon, and particularly the fact (consistent with the conduct of the arbitration throughout) that the arbitrator set out the preliminary conclusions he had reached arising from this meeting and gave both parties an opportunity to comment thereon, it cannot be said that the meeting prevented Mphaphuli from presenting its case fairly to the arbitrator. It was indeed given an opportunity to do so. I cannot conclude therefore that the second meeting constituted a gross irregularity.

[267] The third meeting took place on 29 July 2004. In this meeting, the representative of Bopanang sought to persuade the arbitrator to award certain revised prices. According to the arbitrator, he decided after consideration that these revised prices were not payable by Mphaphuli and ruled in its favour in this regard. I should add here (though it is not an issue upon which Mphaphuli relies) that Bopanang's version of this meeting is less crisp. It is clear from its version too that it related to the arbitrator's desire to get clarity in relation to the cryptic responses Bopanang had given to his queries of 9 July 2004, but it suggests that the discussion may have ranged more broadly than the question of revised prices.

[268] Again this meeting should not have been held alone with the representative of Bopanang. Yet, at the time, the arbitrator was having difficulty contacting Mphaphuli at all which had still not responded to the letter of 9 July. When it did finally respond to the letter of 9 July, it appears to have agreed with many of the preliminary conclusions reached by the arbitrator in that it did not dispute them and instead mainly raised issues relating to quantities in the re-measurement schedule. Finally, on the arbitrator's version, the result of the meeting favoured Mphaphuli. In all these circumstances, it does not seem to me that this meeting should be found to constitute a gross irregularity in the context of this arbitration sufficient to warrant the award being set aside.

Failure to disclose all correspondence

[269] The second irregularity to which Mphaphuli points is the failure by the arbitrator to ensure that all correspondence received from Bopanang was forwarded to Mphaphuli. The arbitrator states that, to the extent that this happened, it was an oversight in his office, and that the vast majority of the correspondence received was circulated to both parties.

[270] Mphaphuli points to three letters in this regard (though in written and oral argument only the second and third letters were raised). The first letter was a letter sent by Bopanang to the arbitrator on 12 December 2003 raising a report by Eskom and the remedial works done by AA Electrical. Whatever impact this letter may have had, if any, on the arbitrator's conclusions, Mphaphuli would have had an opportunity to respond given that the arbitrator furnished it with his tentative conclusions in a schedule of measurements at least twice after the letter was received. Although it may well have been a regrettable oversight not to have forwarded the letter to Mphaphuli, it cannot be said that the failure to do so constituted an irregularity so material as to require this Court to set aside the arbitration award.

[271] The second letter was a letter of 24 February 2004 in which Bopanang wrote to the arbitrator furnishing comments on the claims of AA Electrical. This letter was one of a flurry of letters between the parties and the arbitrator at that time. The arbitrator generally forwarded letters of one party to the other, but in this case he admits the letter was not forwarded due to an oversight. However, it is also clear that this flurry of letters made plain to the arbitrator that there was a serious dispute of fact between the parties concerning the work done by AA Electrical. As a result, the arbitrator called a further site meeting to be attended by both parties and AA Electrical to resolve this factual dispute.[58] After that meeting the arbitrator reworked his measurements and sent them to the parties again at the end of March.

[272] Accordingly, although it may have been unfortunate that the arbitrator failed to provide Mphaphuli with a copy of Bopanang's letter of 24 February 2004, it cannot be said that this undermined Mphaphuli's ability fairly to make its case. It was given a full opportunity on 24 March 2004 to assist in the determination of the dispute concerning what work had been done by AA Electrical, and again once the revised measurements were sent to it at the end of March. The failure to provide Mphaphuli with a copy of the letter of 24 February, therefore, cannot be said to have amounted to a serious irregularity which would warrant setting aside the arbitration.

[273] The third letter to which Mphaphuli points in this regard is a letter from Bopanang to the arbitrator dated 19 July 2004. This letter is the cryptic response to the arbitrator's letter of 9 July 2004 described above at paragraph 64. It will be recalled that the arbitrator had given the parties a list of preliminary conclusions upon which he wanted their comment before finalising his award. It is clear that both parties were given an opportunity to respond to this preliminary set of conclusions. Although there is no doubt that it would have been desirable as a matter of practice for the arbitrator to have furnished a copy of Bopanang's letter of 19 July to the applicant, I am not persuaded that anything turns on this at all. The process adopted is quite clear. The arbitrator made preliminary findings and asked each party for comment. This is a classic investigative process. Mphaphuli was given a fair opportunity to make out its own case. There is no suggestion that the arbitrator contemplated an adversarial exchange between the parties on his preliminary conclusions. He simply asked each party whether the approach he adopted was correct or not.

[274] Each party then had an opportunity to persuade the arbitrator that his preliminary conclusions were wrong. In respect of several of the preliminary conclusions he had suggested in his letter of 9 July 2004, the arbitrator ruled in favour of Mphaphuli. Moreover, Bopanang's responses were cryptic as has been described. By and large, they were yes-or-no answers. In my view, there is not much that Mphaphuli could have said to rebut these simple yes's or no's beyond what it said in its own response to the very same queries. I conclude on this point too that Mphaphuli has not established a gross irregularity in this regard.

Ignoring the pleadings/arbitral mandate

[275] The final argument made by Mphaphuli is that the arbitrator, in pursuing a full re-measurement of the work undertaken by Bopanang, ignored the pleadings and thus misconstrued his mandate. This complaint goes to the question of the proper construction of the arbitration agreement. In this regard, I disagree with my colleague Kroon AJ. In my view, it is clear from the record that it was the arbitrator's view that it was impossible to determine on the basis of the invoices alone what money if any was owing to Bopanang. The arbitrator told the parties this and suggested that a fair process would be to conduct a re-measurement on site to identify what work Bopanang had in fact undertaken.

[276] It was further his view that once that re-measurement had been undertaken he would deduct from the re-measurement the amount Mphaphuli had paid Bopanang. The arbitrator states that it was not the intention of the parties that the amounts owing would be limited to the amounts originally claimed by Bopanang or as stipulated in the contract. In asserting this, the arbitrator points to the fact that it became apparent during the site inspection that far more dwellings needed to be electrified than had originally been provided for in the contract, and that the parties agreed that Bopanang was entitled to remuneration for work actually done. This Mphaphuli now disputes.

[277] During the arbitration, it must have been clear to Mphaphuli from the measurements repeatedly sent to it by the arbitrator that this is how the arbitrator construed his task. The arbitration agreement properly construed did not require both the re-measurement and determination of what was due on the basis of the re-measurement, and also the determination of what was due on the invoices and, in the light of the invoiced amounts, somehow curtailing the amount found to be due on the re-measurement. Such an approach was inconsistent with the agreement that a re-measurement was necessary, and that it would form the basis of a new schedule setting out the amounts Bopanang was entitled to in terms of the price schedule in the contract. Mphaphuli participated fully in this process. What is more, it was afforded at least three opportunities during the proceedings to dispute the re-measured quantities when the arbitrator furnished his preliminary re-measurements. One can only conclude that Mphaphuli did not dispute this manner of proceeding because its understanding of the arbitration agreement was precisely the understanding proffered by the arbitrator – the arbitration was to be based on the re-measured quantities and not on the invoiced amounts.

[278] I conclude in this regard that the arbitrator correctly understood his mandate and that Mphaphuli's complaint in this respect must fail. Counsel for the applicant did not press the argument relating to bias on the part of the arbitrator in either written or oral argument. Given the conclusion I have reached, there is no basis for concluding that the manner in which the arbitrator conducted himself gave rise to a reasonable perception of bias. No more need be said on this score.

Costs

[279] Mphaphuli has raised a constitutional issue in this Court. The respondents were brought to this Court to answer that argument. They did not rely on any constitutional right of their own but disputed the constitutional argument made by the applicant. Properly construed, therefore, this is private litigation relating to a commercial matter and the applicant has lost. In my view, it should pay the costs, including those consequent upon the employment of two counsel.

Order

[280] For the reasons set out above, I make the following order:

(a) The application for leave to appeal is granted.

(b) The appeal is dismissed.

(c) The applicant is ordered to pay the costs of both respondents in this Court, such costs to include the costs of two counsel.

Langa CJ, Mokgoro J, Van der Westhuizen J and Yacoob J concur in the judgment of O'Regan ADCJ.[*]

NGCOBO J:

[281] I have read the judgments prepared by my colleagues O'Regan ADCJ and Kroon AJ. They both agree that the application for leave to appeal raises a constitutional matter and that it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. However, they reach different outcomes. I accept that the contentions advanced by [*] Although Madala J sat in the case, ill health prevented him from participating in the judgment.

Mphaphuli raise a constitutional matter. However, I am unable to agree with my colleagues that it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. In my view, the application falls to be dismissed with costs. And for reasons set out in this judgment, I do not therefore express any view on the constitutional matter that Mphaphuli raises in this Court.

[282] The facts are set out in the judgments of my colleagues. I do not propose to repeat them in this judgment except to the extent necessary for this judgment.

[283] Suffice it to say that this litigation that has its genesis in a subcontract entered into between Mphaphuli and Bopanang on 16 May 2002. A dispute that ensued between Mphaphuli and Bopanang over payment and execution of the agreement led to Bopanang vacating the subcontracted site during January 2003. High Court litigation ensued. This culminated in an arbitration agreement signed by the parties on 16 October 2003. The arbitrator published his award on 23 August 2004. He found Mphaphuli liable to Bopanang in an amount of R339 998.83 together with interest on that amount calculated from 6 October 2002. The attempt by Mphaphuli to have the award reviewed and set aside failed in the High Court in Pretoria. An appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal suffered the same fate. Hence this application for leave to appeal.

[284] In its application for leave to appeal to this Court, Mphaphuli alleged that the crisp question on which it seeks the ruling of this Court is whether or not, in behaving irregularly, the arbitrator compromised one of its constitutional rights. The constitutional right implicated was said to be the right of access to court, which is enshrined in section 34 of the Constitution. In its written argument, it contended that the issue which lies at the heart of its application for leave to appeal is the relationship between arbitrations, the courts and the Constitution.

[285] It submitted that the application raises in particular:

i) To what extent are the courts entitled and required to exercise some control over arbitration awards before adopting them as their own and making them orders of court?

ii) Does the mere conclusion of an arbitration agreement mean that the parties had undertaken to waive fundamental aspects of their right to a fair hearing in terms of section 34 of the Constitution, and, if so, under what circumstances?

iii) What is the correct approach to the grounds of review set out in section 33 of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965 when that section is properly interpreted in the light of the right to a fair hearing contained in section 34 of the Constitution?

[286] These contentions by Mphaphuli no doubt raise a constitutional matter. But these issues are being raised for the first time in this Court. They were neither raised in the High Court nor in the Supreme Court of Appeal. And these are the kind of issues that, on Mphaphuli's version, arise from the manner in which the arbitrator conducted himself. They are, therefore, issues which were always there and did not arise subsequent to the decisions of the High Court or of the Supreme Court of Appeal. The question is whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal in these circumstances. It is instructive to trace Mphaphuli's cause of action as it developed in a series of affidavits filed by it in the High Court.

[287] The cause of action relied upon by Mphaphuli in its founding affidavit of 10 December 2004 was based on administrative action. It alleged that the arbitration process constitutes administrative action and should therefore be lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair as required by section 33(1) of the Constitution. In support of this cause of action, Mphaphuli alleged that the arbitrator had awarded Bopanang costs for work that was neither performed nor claimed for by Bopanang. In its opposing affidavit, dated 12 May 2005, Bopanang raised among others, two points. The first was that the arbitration process does not constitute administrative action, and that the provisions of section 33(1) of the Constitution do not apply. The other point was that none of the grounds of review set out in the founding affidavit amounts to those envisaged in section 33(1)(a)-(c) of the Arbitration Act.[1]

[1] Section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act provides:

>
> (a) any member of an arbitration tribunal has misconducted himself in relation to his duties as arbitrator or umpire; or
>
> (b) an arbitration tribunal has committed any gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration proceedings or has exceeded its powers; or
>
> (c) an award has been improperly obtained,

[288] In a supplementary founding affidavit, dated 3 August 2005, filed ostensibly to deal with matters raised in the record filed by the arbitrator, Mphaphuli conceded that the private arbitration process does not constitute administrative action. It now alleged that the process should be more accurately described "as a judicial or quasi-judicial process." In amplification of this, Mphaphuli alleged that the arbitrator failed to perform his mandate, he was biased in favour of Bopanang and there were manifest errors in the award. In response, Bopanang alleged that the arbitrator followed a transparent process which was fair to both parties and that he had applied his mind consistently with his mandate.

[289] In its four further replying affidavits filed between 3 October and 22 December 2005, Mphaphuli stood by its allegations that the arbitrator failed to perform his mandate and that there were manifest errors in the award. In particular, in its replying affidavit, dated 22 December 2005, to Bopanang's first answering affidavit, Mphaphuli stated that it had been advised that in the initial application for review, it had erroneously invoked section 33 of the Constitution. Mphaphuli claimed that this was due to its ignorance of the law and the fact that it relied upon its legal representatives.

[290] Now I have referred to these affidavits filed on behalf of Mphaphuli in order to show that despite modifying its cause of action as the litigation progressed, Mphaphuli did not raise any of the constitutional issues that it now seeks to raise. Nor did it raise these issues in its 15-page application for leave to appeal to the Supreme Court of Appeal. These issues were not raised in the Supreme Court of Appeal either. Any doubt on this score is immediately removed by an affidavit filed by Mphaphuli's attorney in this Court in support of the application for condonation.

[291] In that affidavit, the attorney tells us that:

> "At the outset I must confess that although I have been a practising attorney specialising in litigation for nearly 13 years, I have not ever dealt with a constitutional matter before this one. In addition, senior and junior counsel who appeared on behalf of the Applicant before the Supreme Court of Appeal are also highly experienced in litigation, but have not previously appeared before the Constitutional Court. Accordingly I deemed it necessary and received an instruction from the Applicant, to brief a new counsel with specialist experience in constitutional matters. Initially the brief to new counsel was to consider whether there were reasonable prospects of success with an appeal to the Constitutional Court. In other words, was there a constitutional issue which was implicated in the matter?"

[292] Mphaphuli itself confirms that the constitutional issues are being raised for the first time in this Court. In dealing with the interests of justice, it acknowledges the reluctance of this Court "to hear matters concerning constitutional issues that have not first been ventilated in other courts." It goes on to say, however, that "[w]hilst it is true that the constitutional issue was not couched as crisply as it has been in these papers, the same or similar issues were nevertheless raised (albeit more obliquely) in the Supreme Court of Appeal." But Mphaphuli goes on to admit that "the point remains that the constitutional argument was never articulated the way it has been done here and was therefore not adequately ventilated in the judgment of the . . . Supreme Court of Appeal."

[293] It is patently clear from these statements that the constitutional issue was raised as an after thought in order to get the ear of this Court.

[294] The Supreme Court of Appeal and the High Courts have jurisdiction to hear constitutional matters. The Constitution contemplates that this Court will ordinarily sit as a final court of appeal on constitutional matters except in those instances where it has original jurisdiction or where direct access to it is appropriate in the interests of justice. A litigant who intends to raise a constitutional issue must, therefore, do so in the court of first instance. Parties should not, in an attempt to appeal further from the Supreme Court of Appeal, raise, for the first time in this Court, a constitutional issue. This practice deprives both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal the opportunity to consider constitutional matters. But more importantly, it deprives this Court of the views of both the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal on the issue. In Carmichele,[2] we held that:

> "There is an obligation on litigants to raise constitutional arguments in litigation at the earliest reasonable opportunity in order to ensure that our jurisprudence under the Constitution develops as reliably and harmoniously as possible. In the result this Court has not had the benefit of any assistance from either court on either stage of the inquiry referred to above."[3]

[2] Carmichele v Minister of Safety and Security (Centre for Applied Legal Studies Intervening) [2001] ZACC 22; 2001 (4) SA 938 (CC); 2001 (10) BCLR 995 (CC).

[3] Id at para 41.

[295] This Court has, on many occasions, indicated that it is undesirable to determine constitutional questions as the court of first and last instance.[4] This is even more so in a matter such as this which concerns the interpretation and the application of a private arbitration agreement. In S v Bierman,[5] we said the following concerning the failure to raise a constitutional issue in the lower courts:

> "The applicant's failure to raise the constitutional issues concerning the admissibility of the Rev Bothma's evidence in her application to the Supreme Court of Appeal inhibits her ability to raise them now in this Court. As a result of that failure, this Court has not had the benefit of that Court's consideration of these issues which relate directly to established principles of the common law and to the application of such principles. The applicant's failure to raise the constitutional issues upon which her application to this Court is based in the Supreme Court of Appeal may well have been sufficient of itself to mean that her application to this Court should have been refused".[6]

[296] It is no answer for Mphaphuli to suggest that this Court has the benefit of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in Telcordia[7] on the constitutional issues raised together with the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal in the present matter. In the present matter, the Supreme Court of Appeal did not consider the role of section 34 in private arbitrations nor did it consider any of the questions now raised by Mphaphuli in its application for leave to appeal. That judgment is therefore of no benefit to this Court on the issues that Mphaphuli seeks to raise.

[297] In Telcordia, the Supreme Court of Appeal did not consider any of the questions that Mphaphuli is inviting us to consider in its intended appeal. What the Supreme Court of Appeal considered in that case is whether section 34 was applicable to private arbitration and held that it was.[8] It is true, the court held, that "there is nothing to prevent parties from defining . . . what is fair for the purposes of their dispute."[9] It also held, relying on the approach of the European Court of Human Rights, that the rights contained in section 34 may be waived unless the waiver is contrary to some other constitutional principle or is otherwise contra bonos mores.[10] But it also held that by agreeing to arbitration, the parties "necessarily agree that the fairness of the hearing will be determined by the provisions of the [Arbitration] Act".[11] This case therefore does not help us to resolve the issues that Mphaphuli seeks to raise in its intended appeal.

[298] What must be stressed here is the role of this Court and that of the Supreme Court of Appeal. This Court is not just another court to which an appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal lies. This Court has a special role to play in the context of our judicial system. It is the highest court, not in all matters, but in constitutional matters only. It follows from this that its appellate jurisdiction is limited to appeals against decisions on constitutional matters. This means that the appellate jurisdiction of this Court may be invoked only in respect of a constitutional matter that has been

[8] Id at para 47.

[9] Id.

[10] Id at para 48.

[11] Id at para 50.

raised and considered by the lower courts. As we have recently held, albeit in a different context, "the jurisprudence of this Court is greatly enriched by being able to draw on considered opinion of other courts."[12]

[299] Apart from this, the Constitution carves out our jurisdiction from that of the Supreme Court of Appeal. The Supreme Court of Appeal is "the highest court of appeal except in constitutional matters".[13] By constituting the Supreme Court of Appeal as the final court of appeal in "non-constitutional" matters, the Constitution seeks to achieve finality in litigation. If parties were to be allowed to raise a constitutional matter for the first time in this Court, this would not only undermine the role of the Supreme Court of Appeal, but it would also undermine the principle of finality in litigation.

[300] For these reasons, this Court should be very reluctant to entertain a constitutional matter that could have been, but was not, raised in the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal. This does not mean that this Court would never entertain a constitutional issue that is raised for the first time in the appeal before it. There may be circumstances where the interests of justice may well require this Court to entertain a constitutional issue raised for the first time in an appeal before it. However, such circumstances "would . . . be rare and . . . would have to be exceptional."[14]

[12] The AParty and Another v Minister for Home Affairs and Others [2009] ZACC 4 at para 56.

[13] Section 168(3) of the Constitution.

[301] The applicant has not demonstrated the existence of exceptional circumstances.

[302] There are two further considerations which militate against granting leave to appeal. The first relates to the prospects of success.

[303] As is clear from the arbitration agreement, the parties could not agree on the value of the work performed by Bopanang. To this extent they agreed on arbitration and defined as one of the purposes of the arbitration to "determine the value of the work that has been done by [Bopanang]" (Clause 1 of the arbitration agreement). With this purpose in mind, they looked for an arbitrator with skills in evaluating work done. They agreed on Mr Andrews, a practising quantity surveyor and a project manager from Johannesburg. In order to enable the arbitrator to carry out his mandate effectively, they gave him the power "to require from any of the parties to make such further documentation available as he may require" (Clause 5); they authorised him "to liaise with ESKOM . . . and to request any documentation" from Eskom (Clause 6); and, in turn, they authorised Eskom to make available to him any documentation that he required (Clause 6). Perhaps more importantly, they gave the arbitrator the power to inspect and measure work done on the site (Clause 7). And, as O'Regan ADCJ finds, neither clause 5 nor 6 expressly stated that the documentation received by the arbitrator would be made available to the parties.

[304] This was an investigative arbitration where the arbitrator had to play an active role in identifying and requesting information that was required for the purposes of carrying out his mandate. I therefore agree with the High Court that Mphaphuli misconceived the nature of the proceedings before the arbitrator. This was not a formal hearing where evidence was to be led and the arbitrator was obliged to receive submissions from the parties. The arbitrator had to inspect and re-measure the work done. The arbitrator's qualification bears this out.

[305] And for the reasons advanced by O'Regan ADCJ, I agree that the arbitration agreement contemplated that the arbitrator would adopt an informal, investigative method of arbitration as opposed to a formal, adversarial one.

[306] My colleague O'Regan ADCJ has analysed the facts and reached conclusions on the nature of the arbitration process involved here, the "secret" meetings, the failure to disclose all correspondence and the alleged ignoring of pleadings or arbitral mandate. I find her analysis and conclusions persuasive. However, in the view I take of the matter, it is sufficient for me to say that her analysis and conclusions amply demonstrate that Mphaphuli has no prospects of success in the intended appeal.

[307] The other consideration relates to the ultimate dispute between the parties. The judgments by my colleagues amply demonstrate that this case is essentially about the proper meaning and application of an arbitration agreement between the parties. Reduced to its essence, this case is therefore about whether or not the arbitrator's award draws its essence from the arbitration agreement. As is apparent from what I have said above, the purpose of raising the constitutional issues was merely to get the opportunity of a further appeal. This, in my view, cannot be countenanced.

[308] For all these reasons, I consider that it is not in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. The application therefore falls to be dismissed with costs including the costs of two counsel.

JUDGMENT

NGCOBO CJ:

Introduction

[1] This case concerns the power of the President to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j) of the Constitution to people who claim that they were convicted of offences which they committed with a political motive. Section 84(2)(j) provides that the President is responsible for "pardoning or reprieving offenders . . .". The question we are asked to decide is whether the President is required, prior to the exercise of the power to grant pardon to this group of convicted prisoners, to afford the victims of these offences a hearing. This case arises out of an application for leave to appeal directly to this Court and an application for direct access brought to this Court by the applicant, Mr Albutt.

[2] The application for leave to appeal is directed at an order of the North Gauteng High Court, Pretoria (High Court)[1] granting an interim interdict. That interdict prevented the President from granting any pardon under section 84(2)(j) pursuant to a special dispensation process for presidential pardon for political offences, pending the finalisation of the main application foreshadowed in Part B of the Notice of Motion.[2] The application for direct access is for an order declaring invalid section 1 of the

[1] Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others Case No 15320/09, North Gauteng High Court, Pretoria, 29 April 2009, as yet unreported.

[2] In Part B of the Notice of Motion the first to seventh respondents in this application sought the following:

> "1. The first respondent is interdicted from granting any pardon in terms of the 'Special dispensation for Presidential pardons for political offences'.
>
> 2. (Alternatively to paragraph 1) The first respondent is interdicted from granting any pardon in terms of the 'Special dispensation for Presidential pardons for political offences' unless and until the victims of the offence(s) in question, and other persons who were affected by such offence(s):
>
> 2.1 have been given access to the relevant application for a pardon and the proceedings and recommendations of the Pardons Reference Group in that regard; and
>
> 2.2 have been given an opportunity to make representations in that regard to the first respondent.
>
> 3. The first respondent is ordered (and the second respondent is ordered, only in the event of his opposing this application, jointly and severally) to pay the costs of this application.
> 4. Further or alternative relief."

Promotion of Administrative Justice Act, 2000 (PAJA).[3] This relief is sought in the event this Court finds that, upon its proper construction, section 1 of PAJA[4] defines administrative action to include the exercise of the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j).

[3] The President and the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development (the Minister) support both applications. For convenience I shall refer to the President and the Minister as "the state". A coalition of non-governmental organisations (the NGOs) resists both applications. In these proceedings they are the first to the seventh respondents.[5]

[4] Section 1 of PAJA provides:

> "In this Act, unless the context indicates otherwise—
>
> 'administrative action' means any decision taken, or any failure to take a decision, by—
>
> (a) an organ of state, when—
> (i) exercising a power in terms of the Constitution or a provincial constitution; or

> (b) a natural or juristic person, other than an organ of state, when exercising a public power or performing a public function in terms of an empowering provision, which adversely affects the rights of any person and which has a direct, external legal effect, but does not include—
>
> (aa) the executive powers or functions of the National Executive, including the powers or functions referred to in sections 79(1) and (4), 84(2)(a), (b), (c), (d), (f), (g), (h), (i) and (k), 85(2)(b), (c), (d) and (e), 91(2), (3), (4) and (5), 92(3), 93, 97, 98, 99 and 100 of the Constitution".

Factual background

[4] On 21 November 2007, former President Mbeki announced a special dispensation for applicants for pardon who claimed that they were convicted of offences that were politically motivated. This dispensation was aimed at dealing with the "unfinished business" of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (the TRC).[6] This "unfinished business" included "the question of amnesty for many South Africans who had not participated in the TRC process for a number of reasons".[7] As the former President explained:

> "As a way forward and in the interest of nation-building, national reconciliation and the further enhancement of national cohesion, and in order to make a further break with matters which arise from the conflicts of the past, consideration has therefore been given to the use of the Presidential pardon to deal with this 'unfinished business'."[8]

[5] The former President also announced the establishment of a multiparty Pardon Reference Group (the PRG) which would assist him in the discharge of his constitutional responsibility to consider requests made for pardons by offenders who fall within the special dispensation process. Persons who qualified for pardon under this process were "[p]ersons who were convicted and sentenced solely on account of allegedly having committed politically motivated offences before June 16, 1999" and who had not applied for amnesty by the TRC.[9] Originally, requests for pardons pursuant to this process had to be made between 15 January and 15 April 2008, but this period was later extended to 31 May 2008. The PRG was formally constituted on 18 January 2008. Pursuant to its Terms of Reference, one of its responsibilities was to "[c]onsider each application for pardon and make recommendations to the President."[10] And the PRG had the power to develop its own rules and procedures.[11] The PRG had a limited lifespan which did not extend beyond 30 November 2008.

[9] Item 7 of the Terms of Reference for a Special Dispensation on Presidential Pardoning Process Relating to Certain Offenders sets out who qualified for pardons:

> "7.1 Persons who were convicted and sentenced solely on account of allegedly having committed politically motivated offences before June 16, 1999; and
>
> 7.2 Comply with the pre-determined criteria and procedures as set out in the application form, may apply to the President for pardon in the prescribed manner.
>
> 7.3 A person will only qualify for consideration for pardon if—
>
> (a) he or she
>
> (i) is presently serving a sentence of imprisonment;
>
> (ii) was sentenced to a term of imprisonment or a fine for an offence which arose from or is related to, an act or omission associated with a political objective committed in the course of the conflicts of the past;
>
> (b) the offence referred to in paragraph (a) was committed on or before the date of the inauguration of the President on 16 June 1999; and
> (c) his or her application for pardon is accompanied by a prescribed affidavit or affirmation deposed to or affirmed by a person authorized by a political party or organization, institution, liberation movement or body, in which it is confirmed that the act or omission which constituted the offence in question, occurred under the instruction of, or in the execution of an order, instruction, command, direction, advice, plan or project of, or on behalf of, or with the approval of, or in furtherance, promotion or achievement of the policies, objectives or interests of, the said party, organization, institution, liberation movement or body of which the applicant was a member, agent or a supporter."

[10] Item 2.3 of the Terms of Reference for the PRG.

[11] The NGOs attached to their founding affidavit an undated document, which is apparently part of a larger document. The part that is attached deals with criteria, rules and procedures for making recommendations to the President. According to this document the only means of verifying the version of an applicant for pardon is "a copy of the judgment" which "is . . . discussed as a verification tool in order to compare and contrast the version

[6] In announcing the special dispensation, the President also explained how he would deal with applications for pardon, stating that he would "seriously consider the recommendations made to him by the Reference Group".[12] However, he emphasised that he would "form an independent opinion on the basis of the facts/information placed before him" to decide whether to grant or refuse a pardon.[13] He stated that in so doing he would—

> "be guided by the principles and values which underpin the Constitution, including the principles and objectives of nation-building and national reconciliation; and, uphold and be guided by the principles, criteria and spirit that inspired and underpinned the process of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, especially as they relate to the amnesty process".[14]

submitted by the applicant." See para 4.1 no. 6 Criteria, Rules and Procedure Used for Purposes of Making Recommendation in each Application for a Pardon. This document does not make any provision for the victims to be heard. In addition, this document sets out the main criteria for making recommendations to the President, namely, whether the applicant is indeed a political offender and whether the release of the applicant would not endanger society. In addition, it lists the Norgaard Principles that would be taken into account in determining the two main criteria. C(i)–(v) of the Norgaard Principles are as follows:

> "i. The motive of the offender – i.e. was it a political motive (e.g. to change the established order) or a personal motive (e.g. to settle a private grudge).
> ii. The context in which the offence was committed, especially whether the offence was committed in the course of or as part of a political uprising or disturbance.
>
> iii. The nature of the political objective (e.g. whether to force a change in policy or to overthrow the Government).
>
> iv. The legal and factual nature of the offence, including its gravity (e.g. rape could never be regarded as a political offence).
> v. The object of the offence (e.g. whether it was committed against Government property or personnel or directed primarily against private property or individuals)."

[7] The Explanatory Memorandum, which the Department of Justice and Constitutional Development issued to explain the special dispensation process, reiterated that the President would be guided by these principles, values, criteria and objectives in considering applications for pardon. Neither the statement by the former President, nor the Terms of Reference for the PRG and the Explanatory Memorandum, dealt with the question whether the victims of offences in respect of which a pardon was sought under the special dispensation were entitled to make representations.

[8] Beginning in February 2008, the NGOs made numerous attempts to secure the participation of the victims in the special dispensation process. These attempts were finally rejected by the PRG during August 2008 when it told the NGOs that neither its Terms of Reference nor any law compelled it to call for input from the public, in particular, from the victims. The PRG referred the NGOs to the President as the "custodian of the [pardon] process" who could take such considerations into account.[15] Subsequent approaches to the Minister and the President were also unsuccessful. During March 2009, the Office of the President in effect declined the request for victim participation in the special dispensation and refused to furnish any undertaking in this regard. Litigation ensued.

[15] Letter from Dr JT Delport, Chairperson of the PRG to Dr Hugo van der Merwe, Transitional Justice Programme Manager, Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation, 7 August 2008.

[9] The NGOs launched an urgent application in the High Court for an interdict preventing the President from granting any pardons in terms of the special dispensation process until the finalisation of the main application. The NGOs challenged the exclusion of victims from participating in the special dispensation process mainly on the grounds that it was inconsistent with section 33 of the Constitution,[16] the provisions of PAJA and the common law duty to act fairly. The application was resisted by the state on various grounds, including that the NGOs lacked standing and that the victims had no right to be heard when the President exercises the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j). The applicant and six other convicted prisoners[17] sought, and were granted, leave to intervene. They resisted the application on the same grounds as the state, but included non-joinder of other applicants for pardon as an additional ground.

High Court

[10] The High Court found that the NGOs had standing because they were acting on behalf of victims who could not act in their own name, in the interests of victims, and [16] Section 33 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa, 1996 provides in relevant part:

> "(1) Everyone has the right to administrative action that is lawful, reasonable and procedurally fair.
> (2) Everyone whose rights have been adversely affected by administrative action has the right to be given written reasons."

[17] The applicant and the interveners were co-accused in a trial arising from certain events that took place in Kuruman in the Northern Cape in 1995. Municipal workers who were on a peaceful strike were severely assaulted with lethal weapons. The applicant and the interveners indiscriminately smashed cars of innocent bystanders and pursued and assaulted other black persons who had nothing to do with the striking workers. Among those assaulted were women and elderly persons. See S v Whitehead and Others 2008 (1) SACR 431 (SCA) at para 12. They were sentenced to various terms of imprisonment. Another intervener was Mr JB van der Westhuizen who had been convicted in connection with a bomb blast in a Worcester supermarket on Christmas Eve in 1996 that killed four people and injured 67. All the interveners had applied for political pardon. The interveners did not take part in the proceedings in this Court.

also in the public interest. On the non-joinder issue, the High Court held that non-joinder was not fatal to the application. It reasoned that it was not necessary to serve the papers on all applicants who had applied for pardon prior to the hearing of the matter. Only those applicants for pardon who had been recommended for pardon had to be served. As the NGOs did not know the identity of those applicants, it was not possible to serve the papers on them. The High Court accordingly ordered the government to provide the NGOs with a list of applicants who had been recommended for pardon; that the NGOs serve the papers on those applicants for pardon; and that the Minister make the other applicants for pardon aware of the proceedings.[18]

[11] On the central issue of whether the victims had the right to participate in the special dispensation process, the High Court answered this question in the affirmative. Its conclusion rests on at least three legs: (a) upon a proper construction, section 1 of PAJA defines administrative action to include the exercise of the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j),[19] and hence the President is subject to the procedural requirements imposed by PAJA; (b) the effect of parole and pardon is the same and there is no justification for allowing victims of crime to be heard prior to a prisoner being released on parole but to deny victims a hearing when a prisoner is being considered for pardon;[20]

[18] Centre for the Study of Violence and Reconciliation above n 1 at 33.

[19] Id at 25-6.

[20] Id at 27.

and (c) the President was bound by his commitment to be guided by the principles of the TRC.[21] The Court reasoned:

> "[T]he President prior to releasing a prisoner on pardon, must have considered all the relevant information relating to the said prisoner. The said information should include, inter alia, the prisoner's application, the inputs of victims and/or families of that particular crime and any other relevant information which might come from any interested party. The inputs from the other interested parties will enable the President to verify the facts stated by the applicant in the [pardon] application form."[22]

[12] The High Court concluded that the victims of crime have a right to be heard prior to the exercise of the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j).

[13] The High Court accordingly granted an order interdicting the President from granting any pardons in terms of the special dispensation pending the finalisation of the main application. The state sought leave from the High Court to appeal to the Full Court of the High Court, alternatively, to the Supreme Court of Appeal. This application, which is apparently still pending in the High Court, prompted the applicant to seek leave from this Court to appeal directly to it. As indicated earlier, the applicant has also launched an application for direct access to this Court.[23]

[14] These proceedings are a sequel.

[15] It is convenient to consider first the application for leave to appeal.

Procedural and preliminary issues

[16] The central issue presented in the application for leave to appeal is whether the victims of the offences for which pardon is sought under the special dispensation process are entitled to be heard prior to the exercise of the power to grant pardon. However, to reach this issue we must first decide whether—

a) condonation should be granted to the applicant for the late filing of his application for leave to appeal and to the NGOs for the late filing of their answering affidavit;

b) leave to appeal directly to this Court should be granted;

c) the NGOs have standing; and

d) the High Court should have non-suited the NGOs for failure to join the applicants for pardon under the special dispensation.

[17] I propose to deal with the procedural and preliminary issues first.

Should condonation be granted?

[18] The application for leave to appeal was late by some nine days. The explanation for this delay is that initially the applicant was content to proceed with the main application. However, when the President sought leave to appeal to the Full Court of the High Court or the Supreme Court of Appeal, he became concerned about the delay this might entail and decided to appeal directly to this Court. The NGOs do not persist with their objection to the granting of condonation to the applicant. The NGOs were late by one day in filing their answering affidavit to the application for leave to appeal, and their application for condonation is not opposed by the applicant and the state.

[19] In the case of the applicant, the period of delay is minimal, there is a satisfactory explanation for the delay and there is no suggestion of prejudice. In the case of the NGOs, the delay is minimal. In these circumstances, condonation should be granted to both the applicant and the NGOs. An order to this effect will therefore be made.

Should leave to appeal be granted?

[20] The question whether leave to appeal should be granted depends upon whether (a) the application raises a constitutional matter and (b) it is in the interests of justice to grant leave. The application raises questions of considerable constitutional importance concerning the powers of the President to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j). Indeed, the NGOs do not contest that the application raises a constitutional matter. However, the NGOs contend that it is not in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal.

[21] The NGOs made much of the non-appealability of the High Court order, since it took the form of an interim interdict. They submit that it lacked the three attributes of an appealable order, that (a) it must be final in effect, and not susceptible to alteration by the court of first instance; (b) it must be definitive of the rights of the parties; and (c) it must have the effect of disposing of at least a substantial portion of the relief sought in the main application.[24] The NGOs submit that it is well-established that the granting of an interim interdict is not appealable under the Supreme Court Act, 1959.[25] While acknowledging that the test for leave to appeal to this Court does not require the satisfaction of these criteria, they submit that this Court should not entertain appeals against orders which have no final effect on the dispute between the parties. They submit that the order sought to be appealed against is such an order.

[22] What must be emphasised at the outset is that the interim nature of the order is not in itself determinative of whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal. It is a factor that is relevant to the overall enquiry into the interests of justice. This is so because section 167(6)(b) of the Constitution prescribes the interests of justice as the standard for granting leave to appeal directly to this Court.[26] The question for

[26] Section 167(6) provides:

> "National legislation or the rules of the Constitutional Court must allow a person, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Constitutional Court—
> . . .
> (b) to appeal directly to the Constitutional Court from any other court."

See also section 16(2) of the Constitutional Court Complementary Act Amendment Act 79 of 1997, which provides:

> "The rules shall, when it is in the interests of justice and with leave of the Court, allow a person—
>
> (a) to bring a matter directly to the Court; or > (b) to appeal directly to the Court from any other court."

determination, therefore, is whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to the applicant to appeal against the order of the interim interdict pending the finalisation of the main application.

[23] What is in the interests of justice must be determined in the light of the facts of each case.[27] The policy considerations that inform the non-appealability of interlocutory orders under the common law and section 20 of the Supreme Court Act are relevant, but not decisive, in this enquiry.[28] However, it will not generally be in the interests of justice for this Court to entertain appeals against interlocutory rulings which have no final effect on the dispute between the parties.[29] There are sound policy considerations for this. It is indeed "undesirable to fragment a case by bringing appeals on individual aspects of the case prior to the proper resolution of the matter in the court of first instance."[30] This consideration must of course be balanced against the fact that a final determination of the main dispute between the parties, which decisively contributes to its final resolution, might be more expeditious and cost-effective.

See also Khumalo above n 24 at para 7 and Minister of Health and Others v Treatment Action Campaign and Others (No 1) [2002] ZACC 16; 2002 (5) SA 703 (CC) at para 6.

[24] Ultimately, when determining whether it is in the interests of justice to grant leave to appeal against an interim interdict, the following considerations, while not exhaustive, are relevant:

a) the facts of the case;

b) the nature of the interim order and, in particular, the effect of upholding the interim order on the main application;

c) the desirability of having the views of an appellate court on the matter;

d) whether the matter is appealable;

e) the importance of a determination of the constitutional issues raised in the interim order;

f) whether the issues raised by the interim order require urgent resolution; and

g) the prospects of success.[31]

[25] The NGOs submit that the order of the High Court is clearly interlocutory and has no final effect on the dispute between the parties. Our courts have held that, in determining whether an order is final in effect, what matters is not only the form of the order "but also, and predominantly[,] its effect".[32] An interim interdict has a final effect if it disposes of any issue or portion of an issue in the main application; put differently, if it "anticipates or precludes some of the relief which would or might be given at the hearing".[33] An examination of the issues raised in the interim interdict proceedings and the manner in which they were dealt with may help to determine whether the court meant to express a final decision on those issues, that is, whether it intended to dispose finally of those issues or any part thereof.[34]

[26] The order made by the High Court rests mainly on two findings of law: (a) the exercise of the power to grant pardon constitutes administrative action; and (b) the victims of crime have a right to be heard prior to the President's decision to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j). These definitive findings of law by the High Court dispose of the issue whether victims have a right to be heard prior to the exercise of the power to grant pardon, an issue foreshadowed in the alternative relief sought by the NGOs in the main application. The order of the High Court is therefore final in effect; it is definitive of the rights of the victims to be heard prior to the decision whether to grant pardon; and it has the effect of disposing of the alternative relief claimed by the NGOs in the main application, although in theory it remains susceptible to alteration by the High Court.[35]

[27] There are further considerations which weigh in favour of the granting of leave to appeal. There is significant public interest in determining whether the President should hear victims of political offences prior to granting pardon in relation to those offences.

[33] Metlika Trading above n 32 at para 21 citing Pretoria Garrison Institutes v Danish Variety Products (Pty.), Limited 1948 (1) SA 839 (A) at 870. See also Zweni above n 24 at 532J-533A with the substitution of "any" for "substantial".

This is so because of the close relationship between the TRC process and the special dispensation process. There are some 2 114 applications for pardon in respect of political offences that are pending. There are, no doubt, other applications for pardon in relation to other offences that are pending. The record indicates that some of the applications for pardon in respect of political offences have been pending since 2002. While there is no right to a pardon, the applicants for pardon are at least entitled to have their applications considered without delay.[36]

[28] In addition, the decision of the High Court has cast grave doubt over the power of the President to decide applications for pardon without calling for the views of victims. It is clear from the judgment of the High Court that its conclusion on section 84(2)(j) goes beyond the special dispensation process and relates to the exercise of the power under section 84(2)(j) in general. It is desirable and in the public interest that this issue be resolved as soon as possible to enable the President to carry out his constitutional obligations without delay. While the views of the Supreme Court of Appeal or the Full Court of the High Court would no doubt have been of benefit to this Court, delays caused by the appeal process would be prejudicial to the public interest.

[36] Section 237 of the Constitution. See Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development v Chonco and Others [2009] ZACC 25 (30 September 2009), as yet unreported, at para 30.

[29] Moreover, this is not a case where the prospects of success are necessarily determinative of the interests of justice.[37] The issue raised in the application for leave to appeal is of considerable constitutional importance concerning the powers of the President to grant political pardon under section 84(2)(j). It is an issue which goes to the "unfinished business" of nation-building and national reconciliation. It is an issue which calls for an early and definitive decision of this Court.

[30] For all these reasons, I am satisfied that it is in the interests of justice that leave to appeal be granted to the applicant to appeal directly to this Court. An order to this effect will therefore be made.

[31] There are two additional preliminary issues to address before considering the main issue in the appeal. The one relates to standing, and the other relates to the non-joinder of other applicants for political pardon.

Standing

[32] The applicant makes a qualified concession in relation to standing. While accepting that the NGOs have standing, he nevertheless contends that they were only entitled to seek declaratory relief and were not entitled to seek an order preventing the President from granting pardons. In support of this contention, the applicant submits that each application for pardon must be considered individually to determine whether it should be allowed to proceed. This is necessary, so the argument goes, because certain victims and perpetrators may well have become reconciled and victims might want their perpetrators to be pardoned. The applicant submits that in these circumstances it would be unfair to prevent all special dispensation pardons from being granted.

[33] The concession that the NGOs have standing was properly made. Our Constitution adopts a broad approach to standing,[38] in particular, when it comes to the violation of rights in the Bill of Rights.[39] This is apparent from the standing accorded to persons who act in the public interest. This ground is much broader than the other grounds of standing contained in section 38.[40] The NGOs have standing on at least two grounds.[41]

[38] See, for example, Ferreira v Levin NO and Others; Vryenhoek and Others v Powell NO and Others [1995] ZACC 13; 1996 (1) SA 984 (CC); 1996 (1) BCLR 1 (CC) at para 229.

[39] Section 38 of the Constitution provides:

> "Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are—
>
> (a) anyone acting in their own interest;
> (b) anyone acting on behalf of another person who cannot act in their own name;
> (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interest of, a group or class of persons;
> (d) anyone acting in the public interest; and
> (e) an association acting in the interest of its members."

[40] See Lawyers for Human Rights and Another v Minister of Home Affairs and Another [2004] ZACC 12; 2004 (4) SA 125 (CC); 2004 (7) BCLR 775 (CC) at para 15.

[41] Organisations similar to the NGOs have been found to have standing before this Court. See, for example, Campus Law Clinic, University of KwaZulu-Natal v Standard Bank of South Africa Ltd and Another [2006] ZACC 5; 2006 (6) SA 103 (CC); 2006 (6) BCLR 669 (CC) at paras 20-2 and Lawyers for Human Rights above n 40 at paras 14-8.

[34] First, they are litigating in the public interest under section 38(d) of the Constitution. The NGOs contend that the exclusion of victims from participation in the special dispensation process violates the Constitution, in particular, the rule of law. They submit that, as civic organisations concerned with victims of political violence, they have an interest in ensuring compliance with the Constitution and the rule of law. Second, they are litigating in the interest of the victims under section 38(c). The victims whose interests the NGOs represent were unable to seek relief themselves because they were unaware that applications for pardons affecting them were being considered. The process followed by the President made no provision for the victims to be made aware of the applications for pardons, nor to be given the opportunity to make representations.

[35] The primary purpose of the litigation is to safeguard and vindicate the asserted right of the victims of the offences in respect of which pardons are sought to have an opportunity to be heard. A declaratory order without an interdict would not have been effective in protecting the rights of victims, in particular, those who might want to oppose the granting of a pardon. Having regard to the interests which the NGOs seek to protect, and the basis for their standing, there is simply no reason for limiting the relief they could seek to a declaratory order. I conclude that the NGOs have standing to seek the interim order interdicting the granting of pardons.

Non-joinder

[36] The applicant does not pursue the issue of non-joinder. He properly conceded that the interests of other applicants seeking pardon, who are not before this Court, were adequately looked after. Indeed, the interest that the applicant has in this case is identical to that of other applicants for pardon who are not before this Court.

[37] With these preliminary issues out of the way, I now turn to consider the central question presented in this appeal, namely, whether the victims of political offences in respect of which pardons may be granted under the special dispensation are entitled to a hearing prior to the exercise of the power to grant pardon.

The contentions of the parties

[38] The NGOs contend that the victims of the offences in respect of which pardons are sought under the special dispensation process are entitled to be heard. They challenge the decision to exclude the victims from participating in the special dispensation process on three main grounds. First, they contend that the decision to exclude the victims from participating in the special dispensation process is irrational. They submit that it is not rationally related to the objectives which the dispensation seeks to achieve, namely, national unity and national reconciliation. Second, they contend that the context-specific nature of the special dispensation process requires the President to give the victims an opportunity to be heard prior to making a decision to grant a pardon. Third, they contend that the exercise of the power to grant pardon constitutes administrative action under section 1 of PAJA and that this attracts the duty to afford the victims a hearing.

[39] The applicant and the state challenge the right of victims to be heard when the President exercises the power to grant pardon. First, they deny the charge of irrationality pointing out the differences between the amnesty process and pardon. Second, they contend that the exercise of the power under section 84(2)(j) is executive action and does not constitute administrative action. They submit that, properly construed, the definition of administrative action in section 1 of PAJA excludes the power to grant pardon. Third, confronted by what was described as incoherence in section 1 of PAJA, and, in the event of this Court finding that, upon a proper construction, section 1 of PAJA defines administrative action to include the exercise of the power to grant pardon, counsel for the applicant submit that PAJA is unconstitutional. This submission forms the basis of the application for direct access. The argument advanced by the state was substantially the same.

[40] In the course of oral argument the applicant also advanced two contentions which it will be convenient to dispose of before addressing the main questions presented in the case. The first concerned compliance with section 101(1)(b) of the Constitution,[42] and the other raised the question whether the President had in fact taken a decision to refuse to afford the victims a hearing.

[42] Section 101(1) of the Constitution provides:

> "A decision by the President must be in writing if it—
> . . .
> (b) has legal consequences."

The argument based on section 101(1)(b)

[41] The applicant submits that we should not pay any attention to what the former President said in Parliament because it was not in writing and, accordingly, has no legal consequence under section 101(1)(b). For purposes of disposing of this argument, it is not necessary to explore the meaning and scope of section 101(1)(b). Suffice it to say that, after announcing the special dispensation process, the President took concrete steps to give effect to this process.

[42] He established the PRG; its terms of reference were adopted in writing; the PRG adopted its criteria and procedures for making recommendations to the President; an Explanatory Memorandum was issued to inform the public of the special dispensation process, its objectives and the criteria, principles and the values that would guide the President in considering the applications; and the PRG has indeed made recommendations to the President. Apart from this, neither the President nor the Minister has taken up this point. On the contrary, former President Motlanthe, who deposed to an affidavit in these proceedings, declared under oath that he "intend[ed] to deal with applications for pardon . . . in line with the approach outlined by the then President [Mbeki]."

[43] In these circumstances, it can hardly be suggested that this Court should ignore what the President not only said, but also did to give effect to his speech. Whatever the meaning and scope of section 101(1)(b), I am satisfied that this Court can rely on what the President said in order to determine the issues raised in this case. The argument of the applicant based on section 101(1)(b) must therefore be rejected.

Did the President take a decision to deny the victims a hearing?

[44] In the course of oral argument, there was some assertion by the applicant, albeit in a faint tone, that the President had not taken a decision to deny the victims a hearing. As I understand the argument, it was based on a statement in the affidavit of former President Motlanthe to the effect that although the PRG had refused to receive representations from the victims, this did not mean that the President would not allow representations from the victims. This statement, which was argumentative in tone, was not accompanied by an offer to afford the victims the opportunity to make representations.

[45] This argument faces two insurmountable hurdles. The first is that it ignores the tenor of the letter dated 13 March 2009 from the Office of the President. That letter was in response to a request to allow victims to participate in the special dispensation process. It is clear from this letter that the victims were not going to be allowed to make representations. Were it to be otherwise, it would have been an easy matter for the Office of the President to inform the victims that they would be allowed to make representations. This did not happen. On the contrary, and this is the second hurdle, both in the High Court and in this Court, the state took the stance that the victims were not entitled to make representations.

[46] The matter must thus be approached on the footing that the Office of the President took the decision that the victims would not be allowed to make representations. It is this decision which the NGOs are challenging.

Questions presented

[47] This decision is challenged on three main grounds, namely that—

(a) the decision to exclude the victims from participating in the special dispensation process is irrational;

(b) the context-specific features of the special dispensation process requires the President to give the victims a hearing; and

(c) the exercise of the power to grant pardon constitutes administrative action and therefore triggers the duty to hear people affected.

[48] I will consider each of these issues in turn.

Is the decision to exclude the victims from participating in the special dispensation process irrational?

[49] It is by now axiomatic that the exercise of all public power must comply with the Constitution, which is the supreme law, and the doctrine of legality, which is part of the rule of law.[43] More recently, and in the context of section 84(2)(j), we held that although there is no right to be pardoned, an applicant seeking pardon has a right to have his application "considered and decided upon rationally, in good faith, [and] in accordance with the principle of legality".[44] It follows therefore that the exercise of the power to grant pardon must be rationally related to the purpose sought to be achieved by the exercise of it.

[50] All this flows from the supremacy of the Constitution. The President derives the power to grant pardon from the Constitution and that instrument proclaims its own supremacy and defines the limits of the powers it grants.[45] To pass constitutional muster therefore, the President's decision to undertake the special dispensation process, without affording victims the opportunity to be heard, must be rationally related to the achievement of the objectives of the process.[46] If it is not, it falls short of the standard that is demanded by the Constitution.

[51] The executive has a wide discretion in selecting the means to achieve its constitutionally permissible objectives. Courts may not interfere with the means selected simply because they do not like them, or because there are other more appropriate means that could have been selected. But, where the decision is challenged on the grounds of rationality, courts are obliged to examine the means selected to determine whether they are rationally related to the objective sought to be achieved. What must be stressed is that the purpose of the enquiry is to determine not whether there are other means that could have been used, but whether the means selected are rationally related to the objective sought to be achieved. And if objectively speaking they are not, they fall short of the standard demanded by the Constitution. This is true of the exercise of the power to pardon under section 84(2)(j).

[52] The applicant very properly concedes that this Court has the constitutional authority to examine whether the means adopted by the President are rationally related to the objective sought to be achieved by granting pardons to those convicted prisoners who claim to have committed offences with a political motive. I did not understand the state to contend otherwise. Nor is there any issue about the constitutional authority of the President to exercise his power to grant pardon as contemplated in the special dispensation process. Indeed under section 83(c) of the Constitution, the President has a duty to promote "the unity of the nation and that which will advance the Republic." The question for determination is reduced to whether the decision to exclude victims from participating in the special dispensation process is rationally related to the objectives that the President set out when he announced the process.

[53] When former President Mbeki announced the special dispensation process, he outlined its objectives and the criteria and the principles that would guide the decision-making process. The objectives that the special dispensation sought to achieve were national unity and national reconciliation. These objectives were to be achieved through the application of the "principles and values which underpin the Constitution", including the "principles, criteria and spirit that inspired and underpinned the process of the Truth and Reconciliation Commission, especially as they relate to the amnesty process".[47] But what are the principles, criteria and spirit that inspired and underpinned the amnesty process?

[54] These emerge from the fundamental philosophy of our negotiated transition to a new democratic order. It was recognised early on, during the negotiation process, that the task of building a new democratic society would be very difficult because of our history, and that this could not be achieved without a firm and generous commitment to reconciliation and national unity. The epilogue to the interim Constitution expresses this philosophy:

> "The pursuit of national unity, the well-being of all South African citizens and peace require reconciliation between the people of South Africa and the reconstruction of society. . . . In > order to advance such reconciliation and reconstruction, amnesty shall be granted in respect of acts, omissions and offences associated with political objectives".[48]

[55] It is apparent from both the address by former President Mbeki and the Explanatory Memorandum that the special dispensation process had the same objectives as the TRC, namely, nation-building and national reconciliation. While the TRC process sought to achieve this through amnesty, the special dispensation seeks to achieve these objectives through pardons. As former President Mbeki explained when he announced the special dispensation process: "consideration has therefore been given to the use of the Presidential pardon to deal with [the] 'unfinished business' [of the TRC]."[49] The submission on behalf of the state that the NGOs are mistaken when they contend that the special dispensation was designed to deal with the "unfinished business" of the TRC cannot, therefore, be sustained.

[56] The participation of victims was fundamental to the amnesty process. The process encouraged victims and their dependants "to unburden their grief publicly, to receive the collective recognition of a new nation that they were wronged, and, crucially, to help them to discover what did in truth happen to their loved ones".[50] But the truth of what really happened could only be known if those who were responsible for gross violations of human rights were encouraged to disclose it with the incentive that they would not be punished. Thus, the participation of both the victims and the perpetrators was crucial to the achievement of the twin objectives of rebuilding a nation torn apart by an evil system and promoting reconciliation between the people of South Africa.

[57] Indeed, as this Court observed in Azanian Peoples Organisation (Azapo) and Others v President of the Republic of South Africa and Others:

> "With [the] incentive [that the perpetrator will not receive punishment] what might unfold are objectives fundamental to the ethos of a new constitutional order. The families of those unlawfully tortured, maimed or traumatised become more empowered to discover the truth, the perpetrators become exposed to opportunities to obtain relief from the burden of a guilt or an anxiety they might be living with for many long years, the country begins the long and necessary process of healing the wounds of the past, transforming anger and grief into a mature understanding and creating the emotional and structural climate essential for the 'reconciliation and reconstruction' which informs the very difficult and sometimes painful objectives of the amnesty articulated in the epilogue."[51]

[58] In its report, the TRC emphasised the importance of the participation of victims and perpetrators in the achievement of national reconciliation:

> "By telling their stories, both victims and perpetrators gave meaning to the multilayered experiences of the South African story. These personal truths were communicated to the broader public by the media. In the (South) African context, where value continues to be attached to oral tradition, the process of story telling was particularly important. Indeed, this aspect is a distinctive and unique feature of the legislation governing the Commission, setting it apart from the mandates of truth commissions elsewhere. . . . The > stories told to the Commission were not presented as arguments or claims in a court of law. Rather, they provided unique insights into the pain of South Africa's past, often touching the hearts of all that heard them.

> By providing the environment in which victims could tell their own stories in their own languages, the Commission not only helped to uncover existing facts about past abuses, but also assisted in the creation of a 'narrative truth'. In so doing, it also sought to contribute to the process of reconciliation by ensuring that the truth about the past included the validation of the individual subjective experiences of people who had previously been silenced or voiceless."[52]

[59] The participation of victims is not only crucial to establishing the truth of what happened, but is also crucial to the twin objectives of nation-building and national reconciliation. In this regard, the TRC makes the following comment in its report: "In some cases . . . the Commission assisted in laying the foundation for reconciliation. Although truth does not necessarily lead to healing, it is often a first step towards reconciliation."[53]

[60] What is plain from what I have said above is that the victims of gross human rights violations were at the centre of the TRC process. As the TRC observed:

> "One of the unique features of the Act was that it provided guiding principles on how the Commission should deal with victims. These principles constituted the essence of the Commission's commitment to restorative justice. The Act required that the Commission help restore the human and civil dignity of victims 'by granting them an opportunity to > relate their own accounts of the violations of which they are the victim'. Through the public unburdening of their grief – which would have been impossible within the context of an adversarial search for objective and corroborative evidence – those who were violated received public recognition that they had been wronged."[54] (Footnote omitted.)

[53] Id at 107.

[61] Excluding victims from participation keeps victims and their dependants ignorant about what precisely happened to their loved ones; it leaves their yearning for the truth effectively unassuaged; and perpetuates their legitimate sense of resentment and grief. These results are not conducive to nation-building and national reconciliation. The principles and the spirit that inspired and underpinned the TRC amnesty process must inform the special dispensation process whose twin objectives are nation-building and national reconciliation. As with the TRC process, the participation of victims and their dependants is fundamental to the special dispensation process.

[62] Counsel for the state sought to justify the exclusion of victim participation on the grounds that there are important differences between the amnesty process and the special dispensation process. Much effort and time was spent on this aspect. One of the differences that was drawn to our attention is that in the case of a pardon, victims already had the opportunity to participate in the criminal proceedings. By contrast, the TRC process by and large dealt with individuals who had neither been tried and convicted nor sentenced in respect of the offences for which amnesty was sought. The state argues that there was therefore no prior victim participation, and precisely for this reason, the amnesty process required the participation of victims.

[63] There are difficulties with this submission. First, it is premised on the assumption that the amnesty process dealt only with perpetrators who had not been convicted. This premise is false. The amnesty process dealt with both persons who had not been tried and those who had been convicted and sentenced. One need only look at the provisions of the Promotion of National Unity and Reconciliation Act, 1995[55] (the Truth and Reconciliation Act) that deals with convicted persons.[56] Indeed, once it is accepted, as it must be, that the amnesty process also dealt with persons who had been convicted and sentenced, the submission loses its force.

[55] 34 of 1995.

[56] Section 20(8) provides:

> "If any person—
>
> (a) has been charged with and is standing trial in respect of an offence constituted by the act or omission in respect of which amnesty is granted in terms of this section; or
>
> (b) has been convicted of, and is awaiting the passing of sentence in respect of, or is in custody for the purpose of serving a sentence imposed in respect of, an offence constituted by the act or omission in respect of which amnesty is so granted, > the criminal proceedings shall forthwith upon publication of the proclamation referred to in subsection (6) become void or the sentence so imposed shall upon such publication lapse and the person so in custody shall forthwith be released."
>

Section 20(10) provides:

> "Where any person has been convicted of any offence constituted by an act or omission associated with a political objective in respect of which amnesty has been granted in terms of this Act, any entry or record of the conviction shall be deemed to be expunged from all official documents or records and the conviction shall for all purposes, including the application of any Act of Parliament or any other law, be deemed not to have taken place: Provided that the Committee may recommend to the authority concerned the taking of such measures as it may deem necessary for the protection of the safety of the public."

[64] Second, it does not pay sufficient attention to the fundamental difference between criminal proceedings and the pardon process. The question in a criminal trial is whether the accused is guilty of the crime charged and, if so, what sentence should be imposed. By contrast, in the pardon process the question is whether, notwithstanding the conviction and sentence, the applicant should be granted a pardon. In particular, the question in the context of the special dispensation process is whether the offence in respect of which a pardon is sought was committed with a political motive.

[65] Third, it misconceives the rationale for victim participation in the TRC amnesty process. Victims participated in the amnesty process not because they did not have a prior opportunity to participate in any criminal proceedings, but because their participation was fundamental to the objectives of the TRC process, namely, nation-building and national reconciliation. Indeed, it is difficult to fathom how these objectives could be achieved if the victims of gross violations of human rights were excluded from the amnesty process. The amnesty process encouraged victims to come forward to tell their stories and to help them to discover the truth by encouraging the perpetrators, in return for amnesty, to disclose the truth of what they did. This was crucial to "creating the emotional and structural climate essential for the 'reconciliation and reconstruction' which inform[ed] the very difficult and sometimes painful objectives of the amnesty articulated in the epilogue [to the interim Constitution]".[57]

[57] Azapo above n 50 at para 17.

[66] Finally, the argument based on the differences between the amnesty process and the special dispensation process misconceives the argument advanced by the NGOs. The NGOs do not contend that the amnesty process and the special dispensation are similar. They contend that the President made a commitment to apply the principles, criteria and spirit that inspired and underpinned the TRC process, especially as they relate to amnesty, including the principles and objectives of nation-building and national reconciliation. They submit that the President must be held to these principles which former President Mbeki said would guide him in deciding whether to grant or refuse pardons. The NGOs submit that it is these principles which require victim participation in the special dispensation process.

[67] Apart from these difficulties with their argument, the differences identified by the applicant and the state do not explain why, having undertaken to apply the principles and values which underpinned the amnesty process, it was decided to disregard those principles and values. The differences between the amnesty and pardon processes were known at the time when the former President made his speech in Parliament. Despite these differences, the President decided that the principles and values that underpinned the amnesty process would be applied to the special dispensation process. These differences therefore provide no basis for disregarding the values and the principles that the former President had stated would be applied to the special dispensation process.

[68] Once it is accepted, as it must be, that the twin objectives of the special dispensation process are nation-building and national reconciliation and that the participation of victims is crucial to the achievement of these objectives, it can hardly be suggested that the exclusion of the victims from the special dispensation process is rationally related to the achievement of the objectives of the special dispensation process.

[69] In my view, the address of former President Mbeki to Parliament itself evidenced and indeed recognised that, given our history, victim participation in accordance with the principles and the values of the TRC was the only rational means to contribute towards national reconciliation and national unity. It follows therefore that the subsequent disregard of these principles and values without any explanation was irrational. On this basis alone, the decision to exclude the victims from participating in the special dispensation process was irrational.

Do the special features of the special dispensation process require the President to hear the victims?

[70] Before the President decides whether to grant pardon, he must establish the facts in accordance with the criteria set out in the special dispensation process, namely, whether the offence was committed with a political motive. To establish the facts the President must hear both the perpetrators and the victims of the crimes in respect of which a pardon is sought. It is difficult to fathom how the President can establish the truth about the motive with which a crime was committed without hearing the victim of that crime.

Decisions based on the perpetrators' versions and their supporting political parties are more likely to be arbitrary, considering the President's objective of determining whether a pardon applicant qualifies for a pardon for an allegedly politically motivated crime. It is not inconceivable that a victim may want to make representations to demonstrate that the crime committed was not of a political nature, but due to other motives.

[71] A process which permits political party representatives and their members, to the exclusion of the victims, to consider whether a pardon should be granted in an offence with a political motive is entirely inconsistent with the principles and values that underlie our Constitution. Some of the principles and values that underpin our Constitution are the principles of accountability, responsiveness and openness.[58] And one of the principles that underpinned the amnesty process was the participation of victims in seeking to achieve national unity and national reconciliation. It is these principles and values that must underpin the special dispensation process as former President Mbeki stated. To do otherwise is to undermine the TRC process and is contrary to the objective of promoting national unity and national reconciliation.

[72] In these circumstances, the requirement to afford the victims a hearing is implicit, if not explicit, in the very specific features of the special dispensation process. Indeed, the context-specific features of the special dispensation and in particular its objectives of national unity and national reconciliation, require, as a matter of rationality, that the victims must be given the opportunity to be heard in order to determine the facts on which pardons are based.

[73] The NGOs also advance an attractive argument for the proposition that, having regard to the objectives of the special dispensation process, the common law duty to act fairly requires the President to afford the victims of crimes in respect of which a pardon is sought a hearing before a decision to grant a pardon.[59] In the light of the conclusion that I have already reached, it is not necessary to deal with this argument.

[74] For all these reasons, I conclude that the decision to exclude victims of the crimes in respect of which pardons were sought under the special dispensation process was irrational. The victims of these crimes are entitled to be given the opportunity to be heard before the President makes a decision to grant pardon under the special dispensation.

[75] Lest there be a misunderstanding of the scope of this conclusion, I had better stress the obvious. This case is concerned with applications for pardon under the special dispensation. What I have said in this judgment therefore applies to this category of applications for pardon only. What distinguishes this category from others not before us is that the crimes in respect of which pardons are sought are alleged to have been committed with a political motive; the objective of these pardons is to promote national unity and reconciliation; and the crimes concerned were committed in a particular historical context. Different considerations may very well apply to other categories of applications for pardon. This judgment does not therefore decide the question whether victims of other categories of applications for pardon are entitled to be heard. That question is left open.

[76] It is this category of pardons that was before the High Court. The High Court does not appear to have paid attention to the fundamental difference between the category of pardons in issue in this case and other categories of applications for pardon. Its conclusion, as I have pointed out above, went beyond this category and purported to deal with applications for pardon in general. In doing so, the High Court erred. So too, when it relied upon the provisions of PAJA to hold that the victims of the crimes in respect of which pardons are sought are entitled to a hearing before the decision whether to grant a pardon is made. These findings by the High Court were not necessary and cannot be allowed to stand.

[77] Finally, the applicant contends that, if the NGOs obtained the relief they sought, the resulting procedural requirements would impractically encumber the special dispensation process. This is incorrect. This judgment does not imply or entail that, in affording a hearing to the victims of those applying for pardon under the special dispensation process; the President is bound to replicate the procedures, investigations and hearings of the TRC. The final relief the NGOs sought was merely "an opportunity to make representations".[60] Their counsel expressly concede that, after the names of those pardon applicants who had been recommended for approval were made known, a general notice inviting submissions to the President from victims of the offences in question might suffice. It is abundantly established that what the opportunity to make representations requires depends on the context,[61] and it is not necessary to try to signify in advance what the opportunity for representations will require. It is enough to say that cumbersome impediments to the due despatch of the pardon process are not entailed.

[78] The next question is whether, in the light of this conclusion, it is desirable that we should reach the question whether the exercise of the power under section 84(2)(j) constitutes administrative action.

Should we reach the argument based on PAJA?

[79] One of the grounds upon which the NGOs urge us to find that the victims are entitled to a hearing is that the exercise of the power to pardon constitutes administrative action. This is one of the bases upon which the High Court made its order. The applicant and the state challenge this finding by the High Court, contending that upon its proper construction, section 1 of PAJA does not include the exercise of the power to pardon as administrative action. If it does, they maintain, then section 1 of PAJA is inconsistent with the Constitution. For their part, the NGOs submit that Parliament may extend a right granted by the Constitution and, in doing so, does not trespass into the province of the executive. We have had the benefit of the submissions of the parties on PAJA and its constitutionality.

[61] See, for example, Zondi v Member of the Executive Council for Traditional and Local Government Affairs and Others [2004] ZACC 19; 2005 (3) SA 589 (CC); 2005 (4) BCLR 347 (CC) at paras 113-4 and SARFU above n 43 at para 219 and cases cited therein.

[80] If one has regard to our jurisprudence, there is a substantial measure of doubt as to whether the exercise of the pardon power constitutes administrative action.[62] Yet if this question is decided in the negative, a more difficult question arises, namely, whether PAJA, upon its proper construction, includes within its ambit the exercise of the power to grant pardon. And if the answer to this question is in the affirmative, more complex questions arise. Those questions are whether: (a) PAJA merely regulates the exercise of the power or whether in effect it reclassifies executive action as administrative action; and (b) whether it is constitutionally permissible for the legislature to do either of these. The question that must be answered on this score is whether having answered the central question presented in this case, we should now venture into all of these difficult questions.

[81] What must be stressed here is the point that I have already made: this case concerns applications for pardon that are brought under the special dispensation, the question being whether the victims of the crimes that fall under this category of applications for pardon are entitled to a hearing. Once this question is answered in the affirmative in the light of the context-specific features of the special dispensation, it is not necessary to consider the question whether the exercise of the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j) constitutes administrative action. That broad general question was not before the High Court, which should not have posed and answered it, and we need not answer it in this case. Nor should we reach the question whether PAJA, upon its proper construction, includes within its ambit the exercise of the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j).

[82] Sound judicial policy requires us to decide only that which is demanded by the facts of the case and is necessary for its proper disposal. This is particularly so in constitutional matters, where jurisprudence must be allowed to develop incrementally. At times it may be tempting, as in the present case, to go beyond that which is strictly necessary for a proper disposition of the case. Judicial wisdom requires us to resist the temptation and to wait for an occasion when both the facts and the proper disposition of the case require an issue to be confronted. This is not the occasion to do so. There may well be cases, and they are very rare, when it may be necessary to decide an ancillary issue in the public interest. This is not such a case. It may well be said that the President is anxious to know whether the exercise of the power to grant pardon constitutes administrative action and whether PAJA applies to applications for pardon. The anxiety of the President should adequately be addressed by what I have said above, namely, that the High Court erred in reaching these questions.

[83] In the event, I conclude that it is not necessary for us to reach the question whether the exercise of the power under section 84(2)(j) constitutes administrative action and whether upon its proper construction, PAJA includes within its ambit the power to grant pardon under section 84(2)(j). These questions must be left open for another day when a proper occasion to determine them is presented.

[84] In the result no order should be made on the application for direct access which was conditional upon us reaching PAJA. In respect of that application, I consider it just and equitable that each party should bear its own costs.

Costs

[85] The issues that were raised in both the application for leave to appeal and the application for direct access are matters of considerable importance. As I have said, earlier, they concern the exercise of the power to grant pardon, in particular, the question whether the victims of the offences in respect of which the special dispensation process applies, are entitled to a hearing before a decision is made to grant pardon. The NGOs have succeeded in relation to the application for leave to appeal. They are entitled to their costs. The applicant entered the fray to safeguard his interest and those of other applicants seeking pardons who were not in court. In doing so, the applicant helped to put before the Court the perspective of the applicants for pardon. The applicant has, however, not succeeded. I think it would not be just and equitable to require him to pay the costs of the NGOs. That leaves the state to pay the costs of the NGOs.[63]

[86] I have already concluded that no order should be made on the application for direct access and that each party must pay its own costs.

Order

[87] In the event the following order is made:

(a) Condonation is granted to the applicant for the late filing of the application for leave to appeal.

(b) Condonation is granted to the first to seventh respondents for the late filing of their answering affidavit.

(c) The application for leave to appeal is upheld.

(d) The appeal is dismissed.

(e) The President and the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development are ordered to pay the costs of the first to seventh respondents. These costs will include costs consequent on the employment of two counsel.

(f) No order is made on the application for direct access.

(g) There will be no order as to costs on the application for direct access.

Moseneke DCJ, Cameron J, Froneman J, Khampepe J, Mogoeng J, Nkabinde J, Skweyiya J and Van der Westhuizen J concur in the judgment of Ngcobo CJ.

FRONEMAN J:

[88] I respectfully concur in the Chief Justice's judgment and only wish to add some comments in further support of his judgment. The judgment builds upon the fundamental understanding that under the Constitution, the President must always act in accordance with the rule of law, even when exercising executive functions.[1] It extends our understanding of what the rule of law requires of the President in the particular circumstances of this case. It does so, in the main, by determining the impact and meaning of the rule of law in the context of our recent history – the political strife that preceded and accompanied the birth of our democracy – and in particular the amnesty process put in place to assist in achieving national unity and reconciliation. The judgment draws its essence from the participatory process of the Truth and Reconciliation Committee (TRC). In so doing it gives content to the exercise of pardon in a manner which distinguishes it from notions of the nature and exercise of executive pardon powers elsewhere.[2]

[89] Some would find the broadened understanding of what the rule of law requires of us in these circumstances unpersuasive merely for the reason that it goes beyond the understanding of executive pardon powers elsewhere. Others might find those historical notions expedient in advancing a conception of executive power unconstrained by the rule of law. In my view it will contribute to a deeper understanding and acceptance of the rule of law if the content given to it in the main judgment also finds resonance, not only in our recent history, but also in pre-colonial history and in our own conception of democracy. And it does.

[90] This Court has held that the democracy our Constitution demands is not merely a representative one, but is also, importantly, a participatory democracy.[3] That holds true even for the executive function at stake here. Promoting national unity is an ongoing process in terms of the Constitution.[4] While it may be necessary for this process of national unity "not to punish those who have flagrantly violated the law",[5] it needs to be remembered that this flies in the face of what is conventionally associated with the rule of law.[6] In this regard the presidential pardon power in relation to offences that may have an impact on national unity have characteristics similar to the amnesty process, where individual participation of victims was the only rational means of attempting to effect that purpose. Counsel for the applicant argued that the requirement of victim participation was met through the process set in place by the President which involved all the political parties represented in Parliament. Put differently, the argument was that representative democracy was sufficient in the circumstances. It is not. It would be irrational to treat similar processes relating to past violations of the law for a political motive – amnesty and "national unity" pardons – differently, by regarding individual victim participation as essential to the one process, but not to the other.

[91] The notion of participatory democracy is also an African one. Victim participation was the norm in deciding the proper "punishment" for offenders in traditional African society. It was an expression of the participatory democracy practiced in those societies. That is my understanding of African tradition.[7] The main judgment therefore finds support in the African legacy of participation of citizens in affairs of the society, not as direct authority for its particular application to the facts of this case, but as further legitimisation that it accords with a tradition that runs deep in the lives of many people in this country. It is indeed difficult to escape the conclusion that this remarkable tradition of participation and capacity for forgiveness in African society also underlay, at a deeper level, the amnesty process. Without it the amnesty process would have been impossible, or at least it would have been immeasurably more difficult than it was. The same can be said for the ongoing duty to promote national unity.

[92] In the main judgment it is emphasised that the ruling does not in any way speak to pardon issues beyond the confines of the facts of this case. The same goes for these additional comments. I consider it important to demonstrate that the "pervasive demands for participatory living"[8] is one with deep roots in pre-colonial history, not that its past application should bind us in finding what is required for the present:

> "We do not have to be born in a country with a long democratic history to choose that path today. The significance of history in this respect lies rather in the more general understanding that established traditions continue to exert some influence on people's ideas, that they can inspire or deter, and they have to be taken into account whether we are moved by them, or wish to resist and transcend them, or . . . want to examine and

YACOOB ADCJ (Mogoeng CJ, Cameron J, Froneman J, Jafta J, Khampepe J, Maya AJ, Nkabinde J, Skweyiya J, Van der Westhuizen J concurring):

Introduction

[1] This case requires a decision on whether the appointment of Mr Menzi Simelane[1] as the National Director of Public Prosecutions (National Director) of our country by the President of the Republic of South Africa[2] is within the bounds of the Constitution. The Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development[3] (Minister) and Mr Simelane appeal against a judgment and order of the Supreme Court of Appeal,[4] which concluded that the appointment of the National Director was constitutionally wanting in that the process for appointment and, consequently, the appointment itself was irrational and invalid. The High Court[5] held that, while the appointment of Mr Simelane as the National Director raised some concerns, it could not be said that the conduct of the President fell foul of the Constitution.

[2] The order of the Supreme Court of Appeal reads:

> "1. The appeal succeeds and the first, second and fourth respondents are ordered jointly and severally, the one paying the others to be absolved, to pay the appellant's costs, including the costs of three counsel.
> 2. The order of the court below is set aside and substituted as follows:
> '(a) It is declared that the decision of the President of the Republic of South Africa, the first respondent, taken on or about Wednesday 25 November 2009, purportedly in terms of s 179 of the Constitution of the Republic of South Africa (the Constitution), read with ss 9 and 10 of the National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998, to appoint

> Mr Menzi Simelane, the fourth respondent, as the National Director of Public Prosecutions (the appointment), is inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid.
> (b) The appointment is reviewed and set aside.
> (c) The first, second and fourth respondents are ordered jointly and severally, the one paying the others to be absolved, to pay the appellants costs, including the costs of two counsel'."

[3] The Constitution provides that an order of constitutional invalidity of any conduct of the President has no force unless it is confirmed by this Court.[6] The order of the Supreme Court of Appeal declared invalid the conduct of the President. The Democratic Alliance[7] applies for confirmation of the order of the Supreme Court of Appeal. The Minister opposes the application. The President opposed the application in the High Court and in the Supreme Court of Appeal but has decided not to participate in these proceedings.[8]

The facts broadly

[4] The facts and circumstances that form the basis upon which the Democratic Alliance contends for the unconstitutionality of the appointment of the National Director are separately set out in detail later, in relation to each argument advanced. A broad outline of the facts will suffice at this stage.

[6] Section 172(2)(a) provides:

> "The Supreme Court of Appeal, a High Court or a court of similar status may make an order concerning the constitutional validity of an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or any conduct of the President, but an order of constitutional invalidity has no force unless it is confirmed by the Constitutional Court."

[7] The applicant.

[8] The President initially opposed confirmation but withdrew shortly afterwards.

a. Mr Simelane, in his capacity as the Director-General of the Department for Justice and Constitutional Development (Director-General),[9] was intimately involved in a dispute concerning the proper role of the then National Director, Mr Vusi Pikoli. The dispute related to the powers and duties of the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development and the National Director.

b. Mr Pikoli was suspended by the then President[10] on 23 September 2007.

c. Shortly after that, on 3 October 2007, Mr Mbeki appointed a commission of enquiry[11] headed by a former Speaker of Parliament, Dr Frene Ginwala (Ginwala Commission) to inquire into Mr Pikoli's fitness to hold office as the National Director.

d. Mr Simelane presented the government's submissions to, and gave evidence under oath before, the Ginwala Commission.

e. The report of the Ginwala Commission criticised with some severity the approach by Mr Simelane in making government's submissions as well as the credibility of his evidence.

[11] Section 12(6)(a) of the National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998 (Act) provides:

> "The President may provisionally suspend the National Director or a Deputy National Director from his or her office, pending such enquiry into his or her fitness to hold such office as the President deems fit and, subject to the provisions of this subsection, may thereupon remove him or her from office—
>
> (i) for misconduct;
>
> (ii) on account of continued ill-health;
>
> (iii) on account of incapacity to carry out his or her duties of office efficiently; or
> (iv) on account thereof that he or she is no longer a fit and proper person to hold the office concerned."

f. The then Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development,[12] Mr Enver Surty, requested the Public Service Commission[13] to investigate Mr Simelane's conduct during the Ginwala Commission.[14]

g. The Public Service Commission, in a detailed report, recommended disciplinary proceedings against Mr Simelane arising out of his conduct and evidence before the Ginwala Commission.[15]

h. The Minister[16] rejected the recommendations of the Public Service Commission.[17]

i. The President appointed Mr Simelane as the National Director two days after the Minister rejected the Public Service Commission recommendations.

j. Mr Simelane had been appointed as the Deputy National Director of Public Prosecutions a month and a half earlier.[18]

k. This appointment took place in the wake of Mr Pikoli's dismissal[19] by the then President[20] and the settlement of a case brought by Mr Pikoli to challenge his dismissal in terms of which Mr Pikoli agreed to be relieved of his position.

[20] Mr Kgalema Motlanthe.

l. The General Council of the Bar subsequently[21] began an investigation into Mr Simelane's fitness as an advocate arising at least out of Mr Simelane's conduct during the Ginwala Commission.

[5] The constitutional setting will be discussed in more detail later. But to understand the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal, it is enough to say that the appointment was made by the President as head of the National Executive in terms of the Constitution,[22] which requires national legislation to ensure that the National Director is appropriately qualified. That national legislation is the Act and provides that the National Director must be a person fit and proper for the job.[23]

The Supreme Court of Appeal

[6] The Supreme Court of Appeal considered that the President erred in four respects and that these mistakes rendered the process by which the decision to appoint Mr Simelane had been taken and, consequently, the decision itself irrational and invalid. The first was that, according to the President, he had firm views about Mr Simelane being the right person to be appointed the National Director even before he had considered whether Mr Simelane was a fit and proper person for the job. Second, the President incorrectly reasoned that the absence of evidence contradicting the idea that Mr Simelane was a fit and proper person for appointment justified the conclusion that he was indeed a fit and proper person. The correct approach, [21] In December 2009.

[23] Section 9(1)(b) of the Act.

according to the Supreme Court of Appeal, was for the President to determine positively whether Mr Simelane was a fit and proper person. This the President did not do. Third, the President disregarded the criticisms of Mr Simelane made by the Ginwala Commission, on the tenuous basis that the Commission had not been appointed to investigate Mr Simelane, but Mr Pikoli. Last, the recommendations of the Public Service Commission that the Ginwala Commission's criticisms merited a disciplinary enquiry against Mr Simelane were too lightly brushed aside.[24]

[7] The Supreme Court of Appeal was of the view that the fact that the Ginwala Commission's comments were not taken into account was in itself enough to set aside the appointment as irrational.

Submissions in this Court

[8] The Minister reiterates the argument advanced in the Supreme Court of Appeal that neither the Constitution nor the Act prescribes any procedure for the appointment of the National Director. This being so, it was for the President to determine the process. This he did, so it is submitted. That process was described in the Minister's written argument as including an "assessment and evaluation of the qualities, strengths and weakness of the person whom the President had identified for appointment." (Emphasis added.) The Minister stresses that the rationality requirement is not onerous, and submits that the test employed by the Supreme Court of Appeal went beyond rationality, and amounted to an unauthorised intrusion into presidential and executive territory. The Supreme Court of Appeal, says the Minister, applied the reasonableness standard appropriate for administrative action cases under PAJA,[25] instead of testing presidential executive action by reference to rationality alone. According to the Minister a court would, on the application of the proper test, be entitled to set aside the appointment only if it concluded that Mr Simelane was not a fit and proper person to have been appointed. Reliance is also placed on the separation of powers requiring a more deferential approach. It is contended that the President has a wide, subjective discretion in making the appointment and that it should be understood that the National Director is a political appointee who has a substantial policy-related role as distinct from other Directors of Public Prosecutions.

[9] The Minister addresses directly only one of the findings of the Supreme Court of Appeal set out earlier:[26] that the finding of the Court that the President had firm views about the appointment of Mr Simelane before he considered whether Mr Simelane should be appointed is incorrect. It is contended that the President said this after having considered the provisions of section 9(1)(b) in the process of Mr Simelane's appointment as Deputy National Director of Public Prosecutions. The [25] In terms of section 4 of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 (PAJA), in order to give effect to procedurally fair administrative action, the administrator must fulfil certain requirements. In terms of section 4(4)(a) an administrator may depart from the requirements if it is reasonable and justifiable to do so. In determining whether the departure is reasonable and justifiable the administrator must take into account the factors mentioned in section 4(4)(b). These factors are:

> "i) the objects of the empowering provision;
>
> ii) the nature and purpose of, and the need to take, the administrative action;
>
> iii) the likely effect of the administrative action;
>
> iv) the urgency of taking the administrative action or the urgency of the matter; and
>
> v) the need to promote an efficient administration and good governance."

[26] See [6] and [7] above.

only response by the Minister to the other findings of the Supreme Court of Appeal is that the Court glossed over other indications that Mr Simelane was fit and proper of which the Minister was aware. It is also asserted that the Ginwala Commission was not a court and that the Minister was right that Mr Simelane should have had the opportunity to respond to these matters before adverse inferences were drawn against him.

[10] Mr Simelane broadly aligns himself with the Minister, clarifying however that he was not a party to the process of his appointment.

[11] The Democratic Alliance supports the reasoning and conclusion of the Supreme Court of Appeal concerning rationality. It contends in addition that the evidence showed that Mr Simelane was not a fit and proper person to be appointed National Director, which it argues is an objective jurisdictional fact antecedent to appointment, and that the President had an ulterior purpose in appointing him. The Minister and Mr Simelane take issue with these submissions too.

The issues

[12] It is common cause, and rightly so, that the decision of the President was an executive decision and that the decision had to be rational. The Democratic Alliance is of the view that it is unnecessary to decide the question whether the decision by the President constituted executive or administrative action, because even in terms of the former, rationality is a requirement under the principle of legality. The issues this Court must traverse, after setting out the constitutional and statutory provisions that bear on the President's decision, are now defined:

a. The question whether the requirement that the National Director must be a fit and proper person to be appointed to that position is an objective jurisdictional fact antecedent to appointment.

b. The requirements of rationality concerned in particular with—

    i. the distinction between reasonableness and rationality and the relationship between means and ends;

    ii. whether the process as well as the ultimate decision must be rational;

    iii. the consequences for rationality if relevant factors are ignored; and

    iv. rationality and the separation of powers.

c. An investigation into whether the decision of the President to appoint Mr Simelane was rational and, in particular, whether the President's failure to take into account the finding in relation to and evidence of Mr Simelane in the Ginwala Commission was rationally related to the purpose for which the power to appoint a National Director was conferred.

d. If the decision is found to be rational in this sense then we must evaluate whether—

    i. the evidence shows that Mr Simelane is a fit and proper person to be appointed the National Director; and

    ii. the President had an ulterior purpose in making the appointment.

A conclusion that the appointment by the President of Mr Simelane as National Director was irrational, in the sense that the means employed to make the appointment were not rationally connected to the purpose for which the power had been conferred upon the President, would render it unnecessary to decide the issues in sub-paragraph (d) above.

The Constitution and the Act

[13] The appointment of the National Director is governed by section 179 of the Constitution and certain provisions of the Act. I set out those features that, in my view, are material to our decision:

a. The Constitution demands a single national prosecuting authority headed by a National Director of Public Prosecutions appointed by the President and Directors of Public Prosecutions appointed in terms of an Act of Parliament.[27] Section 10 of the Act requires the President to appoint the National Director according to section 179 of the Constitution.[28]

[27] Section 179(1) provides:

> "There is a single national prosecuting authority in the Republic, structured in terms of an Act of Parliament, and consisting of—
>
> (a) a National Director of Public Prosecutions, who is the head of the prosecuting authority, and is appointed by the President, as head of the national executive; and
>
> (b) Directors of Public Prosecutions and prosecutors as determined by an Act of Parliament."

[28] Section 10 provides:

> "The President must, in accordance with section 179 of the Constitution, appoint the National Director."

b. Section 179 obliges national legislation to ensure that Directors of Public Prosecutions are appropriately qualified.[29] There was some suggestion, on the basis that section 179 makes a continuous distinction between National Directors and other Directors, that the Constitution does not require the National Director to be appropriately qualified. I am prepared to accept that the reference to Directors being appropriately qualified may be construed as a reference to Directors of Public Prosecutions and not the National Director. All this means is that the requirement that the National Director must be appropriately qualified is not expressly stated in section 179. This cannot mean that the Constitution does not require the National Director to be appropriately qualified. That proposition, in my view, simply has to be stated to be rejected. The Constitution by necessary implication requires the National Director to be appropriately qualified.

c. Section 9 of the Act determines these qualifications.[30] For present purposes, the only relevant prescribed qualification is that a person

[29] Section 179(3) provides:

> "National legislation must ensure that the Directors of Public Prosecutions—
>
> (a) are appropriately qualified; and
>
> (b) are responsible for prosecutions in specific jurisdictions, subject to subsection (5)."

[30] Section 9 provides:

> "(1) Any person to be appointed as *National Directo*r, Deputy National Director or Director must—
>
> (a) possess legal qualifications that would entitle him or her to practise in all courts in the Republic; and
>
> (b) be a fit and proper person, with due regard to his or her experience, conscientiousness and integrity, to be entrusted with the responsibilities of the office concerned.
> (2) Any person to be appointed as the National Director must be a South African citizen."

appointed as a Director of Public Prosecutions, including the National Director, "must . . . be a fit and proper person, with due regard to his or her experience, conscientiousness and integrity, to be entrusted with the responsibilities of the office concerned."

d. National legislation is required to ensure that the prosecuting authority, and this includes the National Director, performs its functions without fear, favour or prejudice.[31] The Act does this.[32]

e. The National Director has the power to institute criminal proceedings on behalf of the State[33] and must determine prosecution policy after consultation with the Directors of Public Prosecutions and with the concurrence of the Minister.[34] The National Director is also obliged to issue[35] and enforce[36] policy directives to be observed in the prosecution

[31] Section 179(4) provides:

> "National legislation must ensure that the prosecuting authority exercises its functions without fear, favour or prejudice."

[32] Section 32(1)(a) provides:

> "A member of the prosecuting authority shall serve impartially and exercise, carry out or perform his or her powers, duties and functions in good faith and without fear, favour or prejudice and subject only to the Constitution and the law."

[33] Section 179(2) provides:

> "The prosecuting authority has the power to institute criminal proceedings on behalf of the state, and to carry out any necessary functions incidental to instituting criminal proceedings."

[34] Section 179(5)(a) provides:

> "The National Director of Public Prosecutions must determine, with the concurrence of the Cabinet member responsible for the administration of justice, and after consulting the Directors of Public Prosecutions, prosecution policy, which must be observed in the prosecution process".

[35] Section 179(5)(b) provides:

> "The National Director of Public Prosecutions must issue policy directives which must be observed in the prosecution process".

[36] Section 179(5)(c) provides:

> "The National Director of Public Prosecutions may intervene in the prosecution process when policy directives are not complied with".

process and has the power to review a decision whether to prosecute or not.[37] These powers and duties are extensive and their proper exercise and performance is crucial to the attainment of criminal justice in our country. And the attainment of an effective criminal justice system is in turn vital to our democracy.

f. The Constitution and the Act oblige the Minister to exercise final responsibility over the prosecuting authority.[38] The Act also obliges the National Director to provide certain information concerning prosecutions if the Minister requests it.[39]

[37] Section 179(5)(d) provides:

> "The National Director of Public Prosecutions may review a decision to prosecute or not to prosecute, after consulting the relevant Director of Public Prosecutions and after taking representations within a period specified by the National Director of Public Prosecutions, from the following:
>
> (i) The accused person.
>
> (ii) The complainant.
>
> (iii) Any other person or party whom the National Director considers to be relevant."

[38] Section 179(6) provides:

> "The Cabinet member responsible for the administration of justice must exercise final responsibility over the prosecuting authority."

Section 33(1) of the Act provides:

> "The Minister shall, for purposes of section 179 of the Constitution, this Act or any other law concerning the prosecuting authority, exercise final responsibility over the prosecuting authority in accordance with the provisions of this Act."

[39] Section 33(2) of the Act provides:

> "To enable the Minister to exercise his or her final responsibility over the prosecuting authority, as contemplated in section 179 of the Constitution, the National Director shall, at the request of the Minister—
>
> (a) furnish the Minister with information or a report with regard to any case, matter or subject dealt with by the National Director or a Director in the exercise of their powers, the carrying out of their duties and the performance of their functions;
>
> (b) provide the Minister with reasons for any decision taken by a Director in the exercise of his or her powers, the carrying out of his or her duties or the performance of his or her functions;
> (c) furnish the Minister with information with regard to the prosecution policy referred to in section 21(1)(a);

g. The President, the Minister and all other organs of state are not to interfere improperly with, hinder or obstruct the prosecuting authority.[40]

Is fitness and propriety an objective requirement?

[14] The Supreme Court of Appeal concluded that the President's decision was irrational irrespective of whether the decision taken by the President was subjective or whether the criteria for appointment of the National Director were objective. It nevertheless concluded, for the purpose of giving guidance, that the requirement that the National Director must be a fit and proper person constituted a jurisdictional fact capable of objective ascertainment. My approach is somewhat different. Questions as to whether and how the rationality requirement would apply if the criteria were merely subjective are, to my mind, complex. I therefore think it is appropriate to determine first whether the Supreme Court of Appeal was correct in concluding that the requirements represented objective jurisdictional facts.

[15] The Minister and Mr Simelane contend that the President has a wide discretion in the appointment of the National Director. It follows, so they submit, that it is for the President to make the decision – which involves a value judgment – and the

(d) furnish the Minister with information with regard to the policy directives referred to in section 21(1)(b);

(e) submit the reports contemplated in section 34 to the Minister; and

(f) arrange meetings between the Minister and members of the prosecuting authority."

[40] Section 32(1)(b) of the Act provides:

"Subject to the Constitution and this Act, no organ of state and no member or employee of an organ of state nor any other person shall improperly interfere with, hinder or obstruct the prosecuting authority or any member thereof in the exercise, carrying out or performance of its, his or her powers, duties and functions."

requirement that the person appointed "must be a fit and proper person with due regard to his experience, conscientiousness and integrity" is thus not an objective one.

[16] In developing the point, the Minister places considerable emphasis on the fact that the role of the prosecuting authority was policy driven and that the National Director was what was referred to in argument as "a political appointee". It is true that the National Director is appointed by the President. It does not follow that this renders the incumbent of that office "a political appointee". I endorse the statement in Legal Soldier,[41] describing the office of the National Director as a "non-political chief executive officer directly appointed by the President":

> "The most important change brought about by s 179 . . . is that a single national prosecuting post was created. Previously there was a direct link between the Minister of Justice and the various Attorneys-General, whose activities such Minister coordinated and to whom they reported. What s 179 did was to slot the NDPP in between the political head of the Department of Justice and the officers at the head of the provincial prosecutorial divisions. The effect of the change was to gather the strands of the country's prosecutorial services in the hands of one non-political chief executive officer directly appointed by the President."[42]

[17] The Minister also relied on the following statement in Geuking:[43]

> "The President in deciding whether to consent to the surrender of a person under s 3(2) must be free to take into account any matter considered relevant to what is a policy decision relating to foreign affairs. It is not for the courts to determine what [18] Geuking is not on point. It was concerned with a provision of the Extradition Act[45] to the effect that the President has to consent to extradition before it can validly take place. The Extradition Act lays down no criteria for the granting of the consent of the President.

[19] The present case is comparable with that part of SARFU[46] in which this Court held, drawing on the Appellate Division,[47] that the requirement that a matter must be one of "public concern" before the Commissions Act[48] applies to it, is an objective one:

> "In determining whether the subject-matter of the commission's investigation is indeed a 'matter of public concern', the test to be applied is an objective one. The legally relevant question is not whether the President thought that the subject-matter of the inquiry was a matter of public concern, but whether it was objectively so at the time the decision was taken. Whether or not the matter is one of public concern is a question for the courts to determine and not a matter to be decided by the President within his own discretion. In this context, the Constitution requires that the notion of 'public concern' be interpreted so as to promote the spirit, purport and objects of the > Bill of Rights and to underscore the democratic values of human dignity, equality and freedom. The purpose of the requirement that a matter be one of public concern is, on the one hand, to protect the interests of individuals by limiting the range of matters in respect of which the President may confer powers of compulsion upon a commission and, on the other, to protect the interests of the public by enabling effective investigation of matters that are of public concern."[49] (Footnotes omitted.)

[20] For the reasons stated above and for the reasons that follow, I agree with the Supreme Court of Appeal that the requirement is an objective jurisdictional fact.

[21] The starting point is the Constitution itself. It requires that the National Director must be appropriately qualified and leaves it to an Act of Parliament to determine the qualification in detail. The Constitution does not, in its terms, leave the determination of appropriate qualification to the President. It obliges the Legislature to ensure that the National Director is appropriately qualified. The Legislature, in my view, had the obligation to determine qualifications that must be present before an appointment could be made.

[22] Second, and as the Supreme Court of Appeal correctly points out,[50] the Act itself does not say that the candidate for appointment as National Director should be fit and proper "in the President's view". The Legislature could easily have done so if the purpose was to leave it in the complete discretion of the President. Crucially, as the Supreme Court of Appeal again pointed out, the section "is couched in imperative terms. The appointee 'must' be a fit and proper person."[51]

[23] Third, it is correct that the determination whether a candidate does fulfil the fit and proper requirement stipulated by the Act involves a value judgment. But it does not follow from this that the decision and evaluation lies within the sole and subjective preserve of the President. Value judgments are involved in virtually every decision any member of the Executive might make where objective requirements are stipulated. It is true that there may be differences of opinion in relation to whether or not objective criteria have been established or are present. This does not mean that the decision becomes one of subjective determination, immune from objective scrutiny.

[24] Another factor that points to the criteria being objective is the statement of this Court concerning the constitutional provision that the national prosecuting authority must perform its functions without fear, favour or prejudice:

> "NT 179(4) provides that the national legislation must ensure that the prosecuting authority exercises its functions without fear, favour or prejudice. There is accordingly a constitutional guarantee of independence, and any legislation or executive action inconsistent therewith would be subject to constitutional control by the courts."[52]

A construction that renders the determination of the qualification criteria to the President's subjective opinion is not in keeping with the constitutional guarantee of prosecutorial independence. The interpretation that these requirements are objective jurisdictional facts that must exist before the appointment is made is more consistent with the constitutional guarantee.

[25] The fifth relevant consideration is that the National Director can be suspended by the President on the basis, amongst other things, that the person appointed is not a fit and proper person, and can be removed from office by the President after a commission of enquiry. The President's decision stands unless Parliament takes another view.[53] If the President is the sole determinant of fitness and propriety, then

[53] Section 12(5)-(7) of the Act provides:

> "(5) The National Director or a Deputy National Director shall not be suspended or removed from office except in accordance with the provisions of subsections (6), (7) and (8).
>
> (6)(a) The President may provisionally suspend the National Director or a Deputy National Director from his or her office, pending such enquiry into his or her fitness to hold such office as the President deems fit and, subject to the provisions of this subsection, may thereupon remove him or her from office—

>
> (b) The removal of the National Director or a Deputy National Director, the reason therefor and the representations of the National Director or Deputy National Director (if any) shall be communicated by message to Parliament within 14 days after such removal if Parliament is then in session or, if Parliament is not then in session, within 14 days after the commencement of its next ensuing session.
>
> (c) Parliament shall, within 30 days after the message referred to in paragraph (b) has been tabled in Parliament, or as soon thereafter as is reasonably possible, pass a resolution as to whether or not the restoration to his or her office of the National Director or Deputy National Director so removed, is recommended.
>
> (d) The President shall restore the National Director or Deputy National Director to his or her office if Parliament so resolves.

> (7) The President shall also remove the National Director or a Deputy National Director from office if an address from each of the respective Houses of Parliament in the the spectre is raised of President A appointing someone as National Director on the subjective belief that the person concerned is indeed fit and proper and President B suspending or removing that person from office in the subjective belief, equally genuine, that the incumbent is neither fit nor proper. Neither the Constitution nor the Act could have contemplated that the position of the National Director would be so vulnerable to opinion.

[26] The final reason revolves around the importance of this portfolio in the context of our democracy. It is true that the functions of the National Director are not judicial in character. Yet, the determination of prosecution policy, the decision whether or not to prosecute and the duty to ensure that prosecution policy is complied with are, as I have said earlier, fundamental to our democracy. The office must be non-political and non-partisan and is closely related to the function of the judiciary broadly to achieve justice and is located at the core of delivering criminal justice.[54]

Rationality

[27] The Minister and Mr Simelane accept that the "executive" is "constrained by the principle that [it] may exercise no power and perform no function beyond that conferred . . . by law"[55] and that the power must not be misconstrued.[56] It is also

[56] SARFU above n 46 at para 148. This case was concerned with the President's decision as Head of State and not as head of the National Executive but the principle remains valid. The proposition is also to be found in accepted that the decision must be rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred.[57] Otherwise the exercise of the power would be arbitrary and at odds with the Constitution.[58] I agree.

[28] The four issues concerning rationality mentioned earlier[59] nevertheless require brief exploration.

Reasonableness and rationality

[29] It must be emphasised that it is useful to keep the reasonableness test and that of rationality conceptually distinct. Reasonableness is generally concerned with the decision itself. In the constitutional era reasonableness in the administrative law context has been authoritatively stated in Bato Star:[60]

> "In determining the proper meaning of section 6(2)(h) of PAJA in the light of the overall constitutional obligation upon administrative decision-makers to act 'reasonably', the approach of Lord Cooke provides sound guidance. Even if it may be thought that the language of section 6(2)(h), if taken literally, might set a standard such that a decision would rarely if ever be found unreasonable, that is not the proper constitutional meaning which should be attached to the subsection. The subsection must be construed consistently with the Constitution and in particular section 33 which requires administrative action to be 'reasonable'. Section 6(2)(h) should then > be understood to require a simple test, namely that an administrative decision will be reviewable if, in Lord Cooke's words, it is one that a reasonable decision-maker could not reach."[61] (Footnotes omitted.)

[30] While there may be some overlap between the reasonableness and rationality evaluations, these tools are best understood as being conceptually different. As was said in Albutt:[62]

> "The Executive has a wide discretion in selecting the means to achieve its constitutionally permissible objectives. Courts may not interfere with the means selected simply because they do not like them, or because there are other more appropriate means that could have been selected. But, where the decision is challenged on the grounds of rationality, courts are obliged to examine the means selected to determine whether they are rationally related to the objective sought to be achieved. What must be stressed is that the purpose of the enquiry is to determine not whether there are other means that could have been used, but whether the means selected are rationally related to the objective sought to be achieved. And if, objectively speaking, they are not, they fall short of the standard demanded by the Constitution."[63]

[31] It was held in that case that the means employed in the process of determining whether the President should pardon people who had been convicted of certain offences, namely not to give victims or their families an opportunity to be heard, was not rationally related to the purpose of determining whether pardons should be granted.[64] On the other hand, it was held in Poverty Alleviation[65] that the test laid down in Merafong[66] should be applied, and that the legislation aimed at transferring a part of Matatiele from the province of KwaZulu-Natal to the province of the Eastern Cape was "rationally connected to a legitimate governmental end."[67] In other words, the means employed, namely the transfer of a part of Matatiele from one province to another, was rationally related to the purpose of improving conditions for the residents of that part of Matatiele on the basis that the governmental purpose could be achieved in more than one way and that it was not for the Court to decide which way was better. The decision in Albutt was not concerned with the evaluation of two different methods of achieving the purpose but with whether not giving the victims or their families the opportunity to be heard was rationally concerned with the governmental purpose in issue in that case.[68]

[32] The reasoning in these cases shows that rationality review is really concerned with the evaluation of a relationship between means and ends: the relationship, connection or link (as it is variously referred to) between the means employed to achieve a particular purpose on the one hand and the purpose or end itself. The aim of the evaluation of the relationship is not to determine whether some means will achieve the purpose better than others but only whether the means employed are rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred. Once there is a rational relationship, an executive decision of the kind with which we are here concerned is constitutional.

It is common cause that doing away with cross-boundary municipalities is desirable for improved service delivery and governance. This is the purpose of the Twelfth Amendment. More ways than one of achieving the objective are, however, available, namely to locate Merafong either wholly in Gauteng or wholly in North West. From economic, geographical and other perspectives the choice can be debated, but it is one for the legislature to make. It is not for this court to decide in which province people must live or to second-guess the option chosen by the Gauteng Provincial Legislature to achieve its policy goals and thus to make a finding on how socially, economically or politically meritorious the Twelfth Amendment is."

Decision or process?

[33] The Democratic Alliance submitted that the irrationality ground covers irrationality in process as well as on the merits. The Minister and Mr Simelane did not appear fervently to embrace this proposition but did not advance any cogent alternative submission against it. Chonco 1,[69] concerned with the power of the President, as Head of State, to grant pardons under the Constitution,[70] elucidated the rationality requirement in the process of granting pardons:

> "In SARFU, this court, affirming Hugo, held that the powers s 84(2) confers on the President as Head of State originate historically from the royal prerogative and were exercised by the Head of State rather than the head of the national executive. The powers granted by sj 84(2) are now clearly original constitutional powers. Section 84(2)(j) is the source of the power, function and obligation to decide upon applications for pardon. Though there is no right to be pardoned, the function conferred on the President to make a decision entails a corresponding right to have a pardon application considered and decided upon rationally, in good faith, in > accordance with the principle of legality, diligently and without delay. That decision rests solely with the President."[71] (Footnotes omitted.)

[69] Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development v Chonco and Others [2009] ZACC 25; 2010 (4) SA 82 (CC); 2010 (2) BCLR 140 (CC) (Chonco 1). This case is referred to as Chonco 1 because of the two decisions concerning consequential cases that involved the same parties.

[34] It follows that both the process by which the decision is made and the decision itself must be rational. Albutt is authority for the same proposition.[72] The means there were found not to be rationally related to the purpose because the procedure by which the decision was taken did not provide an opportunity for victims or their family members to be heard.

[35] Mr Simelane points out that this case is not concerned with pardons. He argues further that cases involving pardons are distinguishable from the present case.[73] While I agree that this case is not concerned with pardons, there is no basis for the suggestion that the proposition in Albutt that decisions by the President as Head of State should be rational both in process and in the final decision should not apply here. It is true that the decision by the President in this case was made as head of the National Executive. It is illogical to suggest that while decisions by the President as Head of State must be rational in process and outcome, decisions of the President as head of the National Executive should be rational only in outcome and not in so far as they relate to the process.

[73] The Democratic Alliance relies on the case of Albutt above n 62, which was also concerned with pardons but the argument applies equally to the case of Chonco 1 above n 69, which in my view is on point.

[36] The conclusion that the process must also be rational in that it must be rationally related to the achievement of the purpose for which the power is conferred, is inescapable and an inevitable consequence of the understanding that rationality review is an evaluation of the relationship between means and ends. The means for achieving the purpose for which the power was conferred must include everything that is done to achieve the purpose. Not only the decision employed to achieve the purpose, but also everything done in the process of taking that decision, constitute means towards the attainment of the purpose for which the power was conferred.

[37] This conclusion addresses the differences that emerged in argument on whether the decision needs to be rational or whether the process resulting in the decision should also have been rational for an executive decision to stand. A related question, if the process is to be rationally related to the purpose for which the power has been conferred, is whether each step in the process must be so rationally related. The parties were ultimately in agreement that, while each and every step in the process resulting in the decision need not be rationally viewed in isolation, the rationality of the steps taken have implications for whether the ultimate executive decision is rational. In my view, the decision of the President as Head of the National Executive can be successfully challenged only if a step in the process bears no rational relation to the purpose for which the power is conferred and the absence of this connection colours the process as a whole and hence the ultimate decision with irrationality. We must look at the process as a whole and determine whether the steps in the process were rationally related to the end sought to be achieved and, if not, whether the absence of a connection between a particular step (part of the means) is so unrelated to the end as to taint the whole process with irrationality.

Rationality and ignoring relevant factors

[38] The Supreme Court of Appeal held that the President, by not taking into account the findings of the Ginwala Commission, ignored a relevant factor. This formulation takes us to the question of whether the seminal statement in Johannesburg Stock Exchange[74] concerning administrative action in the pre-constitutional era is at all relevant to the rationality evaluation:

> "Broadly, in order to establish review grounds it must be shown that the president failed to apply his mind to the relevant issues in accordance with the 'behests of the statute and the tenets of natural justice' (see National Transport Commission and Another v Chetty's Motor Transport (Pty) Ltd 1972 (3) SA 726 (A) at 735F–G; Johannesburg Local Road Transportation Board and Others v David Morton Transport (Pty) Ltd 1976 (1) SA 887 (A) at 895B–C; Theron en Andere v Ring van Wellington van die NG Sendingkerk in Suid-Afrika en Andere 1976 (2) SA 1 (A) at 14F–G). Such failure may be shown by proof, inter alia, that the decision was arrived at arbitrarily or capriciously or mala fide or as a result of unwarranted adherence to a fixed principle or in order to further an ulterior or improper purpose; or that the president misconceived the nature of the discretion conferred upon him and took into account irrelevant considerations or ignored relevant ones; or that the decision of the president was so grossly unreasonable as to warrant the inference that he had failed to apply his mind to the matter in the manner aforestated."[75]

[39] This Court in SARFU said that "the exercise of the President's constitutional power to appoint a commission of enquiry is not directly governed by the principle in the Johannesburg Stock Exchange case."[76] It follows that this principle would not directly govern the President's power to appoint the National Director either. That is not to say that ignoring relevant factors can have nothing to do with rationality. If in the circumstances of a case, there is a failure to take into account relevant material that failure would constitute part of the means to achieve the purpose for which the power was conferred. And if that failure had an impact on the rationality of the entire process, then the final decision may be rendered irrational and invalid by the irrationality of the process as a whole. There is therefore a three stage enquiry to be made when a court is faced with an executive decision where certain factors were ignored. The first is whether the factors ignored are relevant; the second requires us to consider whether the failure to consider the material concerned (the means) is rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred; and the third, which arises only if the answer to the second stage of the enquiry is negative, is whether ignoring relevant facts is of a kind that colours the entire process with irrationality and thus renders the final decision irrational.

[74] Johannesburg Stock Exchange and Another v Witwatersrand Nigel Ltd and Another 1988 (3) SA 132 (A).

[75] Id at 152A-D.

[40] I must explain here that there may rarely be circumstances in which the facts ignored may be strictly relevant but ignoring these facts would not render the entire decision irrational in the sense that the means might nevertheless bear a rational link to the end sought to be achieved. A decision to ignore relevant material that does not render the final decision irrational is of no consequence to the validity of the executive decision. It also follows that if the failure to take into account relevant material is inconsistent with the purpose for which the power was conferred, there can be no rational relationship between the means employed and the purpose.

Rationality and the separation of powers

[41] I must next address a contention that this Court's upholding of the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal that the decision of the President was irrational would amount to a violation of the principle of the separation of powers. The rule that executive decisions may be set aside only if they are irrational and may not ordinarily be set aside because they are merely unreasonable or procedurally unfair has been adopted precisely to ensure that the principle of the separation of powers is respected and given full effect.[77] If executive decisions are too easily set aside, the danger of courts crossing boundaries into the executive sphere would loom large. As O'Regan J helpfully explained:

> "A central principle of the United States jurisprudence has been to impose different levels of scrutiny on different categories of legislative classification. The most stringent level of scrutiny is reserved for classifications based on race or nationality, or those that invade fundamental rights. Such classifications are almost inevitably considered to be a breach of the Fourteenth Amendment. An intermediate level of scrutiny is applied to classifications concerning gender or socio-economic rights. The third level of scrutiny requires merely that a classification be shown to have a rational relationship to the legislative purpose."[78]

[42] It is evident that a rationality standard by its very nature prescribes the lowest possible threshold for the validity of executive decisions: it has been described by this

[78] Brink v Kitshoff NO [1996] ZACC 9; 1996 (4) SA 197 (CC); 1996 (6) BCLR 752 (CC) at para 35.

Court as the "minimum threshold requirement applicable to the exercise of all public power by members of the Executive and other functionaries".[79] And the rationale for this test is "to achieve a proper balance between the role of the legislature on the one hand, and the role of the courts on the other."[80]

[43] And Affordable Medicines said:

> "The rational basis test involves restraint on the part of the Court. It respects the respective roles of the courts and the Legislature. In the exercise of its legislative powers, the Legislature has the widest possible latitude within the limits of the Constitution. In the exercise of their power to review legislation, courts should strive to preserve to the Legislature its rightful role in a democratic society."[81]

This applies equally to executive decisions.

[44] It is therefore difficult to conceive how the separation of powers can be said to be undermined by the rationality enquiry. The only possible connection might be that rationality has a different meaning and content if separation of powers is involved than otherwise. In other words, the question whether the means adopted are rationally related to the ends in executive decision-making cases somehow involves a lower threshold than in relation to precisely the same decision involving the same process in the administrative context. This is wrong. Rationality does not conceive of differing thresholds. It cannot be suggested that a decision that would be irrational in an administrative law setting might mutate into a rational decision if the decision being evaluated was an executive one. The separation of powers has nothing to do with whether a decision is rational. In these circumstances, the principle of separation of powers is not of particular import in this case. Either the decision is rational or it is not.

[79] Pharmaceutical Manufacturers above n 57 at para 78.

[80] Affordable Medicines above n 57 at para 83. See also S v Lawrence; S v Negal; S v Solberg [1997] ZACC 11; 1997 (4) SA 1176 (CC); 1997 (10) BCLR 1348 (CC) at para 44.

[45] It is now possible to consider the crux of this case to decide whether the President acted rationally in appointing Mr Simelane as the National Director and whether the President's failure to take into account the findings in relation to, and the evidence of, Mr Simelane in the Ginwala Commission was rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred.

Did the President act rationally?

[46] The Democratic Alliance relied mainly on the findings of the Ginwala Commission and the evidence given by Mr Simelane at that enquiry as the basis for the submission that the President did not act rationally. The conclusions of the Ginwala Commission on Mr Simelane's evidence and the evidence itself raised questions that threw so much doubt on Mr Simelane's credibility and integrity, so the argument went, that it rendered the appointment irrational.

[47] The President relied on Mr Simelane's curriculum vitae, which indicated broadly that he had been the Competition Commissioner for a period of a little more than 5 years[82] and that he had been Director-General for a period of a little more than 4 years.[83] He also relied on his personal knowledge of Mr Simelane's personal and professional qualities, though we do not have much detail about the precise contours of this knowledge. The President also relied on the advice of the Minister to the effect that from the Minister's personal knowledge of Mr Simelane he was a fit and proper person to be appointed National Director. The Minister, who was familiar with both the Ginwala Commission and the Public Service Commission recommendations, advised the President, in effect, that there was no need for him to interrogate these documents and that he would advise that Mr Simelane be appointed, despite the recommendations made by the Ginwala Commission and the Public Service Commission. The basis on which the advice was given will be evaluated later in this judgment.

[48] The report of Mr Simelane's evidence in the Ginwala Commission and the question of whether the President was right in not taking it into account can properly be considered if we have in mind the purpose for which the power was conferred.

The purpose of the power

[49] The provisions of the Constitution and the Act must be taken together to determine the purpose for which the power was conferred. It is evident that the purpose of the conferral of the power upon the President was to ensure that the person appointed as National Director is sufficiently conscientious and has the integrity required to be entrusted with the responsibilities of the office. In particular, to ensure that—

a. the prosecuting authority performs its functions honestly and without fear, favour or prejudice;
b. decisions to institute criminal prosecution are taken honestly, fairly and without fear, favour or prejudice;
c. prosecution policy is determined honestly and is appropriate to the needs of our country;
d. the criminal justice system in so far as it concerns prosecutions is fairly administered;
e. any improper interference, hindrance or obstruction of the prosecuting authority by any organ of state is not tolerated; and
f. all Directors of Public Prosecutions carry out their functions honestly and fairly. [84]

It is obvious that dishonesty is inconsistent with the hallmarks of conscientiousness and integrity that are essential prerequisites to the proper execution of the responsibilities of a National Director.

The Ginwala Commission findings

[50] In the executive summary of the Ginwala report,[85] Dr Ginwala said of Mr Simelane:

[84] See [13] above.

> "I need to draw attention to the conduct of the DG: Justice in this Enquiry. In general his conduct left much to be desired. His testimony was contradictory and without basis in fact or in law. The DG: Justice was responsible for preparing Government's original submission to the Enquiry in which the allegations against Adv Pikoli's fitness to hold office were first amplified. Several of the allegations levelled against Adv Pikoli were shown to be baseless, and the DG: Justice was forced to retract several allegations against Adv Pikoli during his cross-examination."[86]

[51] In the report of the Ginwala Commission itself, Dr Ginwala said of Mr Simelane:

> "I must express my displeasure at the conduct of the DG: Justice in the preparation of Government's submissions and in his oral testimony which I found in many respects to be inaccurate or without any basis in fact and law. He was forced to concede during cross-examination that the allegations he made against Adv Pikoli were without foundation. These complaints related to matters such as the performance agreement between the DG: Justice and the CEO of the NPA; the NPA's plans to expand its corporate services division; the DSO dealing with its own labour relations issues; reporting on the misappropriation of funds from the Confidential Fund of the DSO; the acquisition of new office accommodation for NPA prosecutors; and the rationalisation of the NPA.
>
> All these complaints against Adv Pikoli were spurious, and are rejected [as being] without substance, and may have been motivated by personal issues.
>
> With regard to the original Government submission, many complaints were included that were far removed in fact and time from the reasons advanced in the letter of suspension, as well as the terms of reference. This further reflects the DG: Justice's > disregard and lack of appreciation and respect for the import for an Enquiry established by the President."[87]

[52] These extracts from the report of the Ginwala Commission ought to have been cause for great concern. Indeed, these comments represented brightly flashing red lights warning of impending danger to any person involved in the process of Mr Simelane's appointment to the position of National Director. Any failure to take into account these comments, or any decision to ignore them and to proceed with Mr Simelane's appointment without more, would not be rationally related to the purpose of the power, that is, to appoint a person with sufficient conscientiousness and credibility. The Minister did in fact study the Ginwala Commission Report to the extent that it related to Mr Simelane before advising the President. He also studied the report of the Public Service Commission[88] and representations that had been made to him by Mr Simelane's legal team in relation to that report. We must also look at Mr Simelane's evidence at the enquiry, the Public Service Commission's recommendations and, to some extent, the representations made by Mr Simelane's legal team, in order to determine whether the President acted rightly in not taking the evidence before the Commission into account.

Ginwala Commission: Mr Simelane's evidence

[53] The Democratic Alliance relies specifically on four aspects of the evidence of Mr Simelane:

[87] Id at paras 320-2.

[88] See [4 g] above.

a. Mr Simelane's failure to disclose a letter that had been drafted by him and sent by the Minister consequent upon a letter received by the Minister from the then President[89] (to Mr Pikoli) together with Mr Simelane's evidence relating to the contents of the letter he had drafted;
b. Mr Simelane's failure to disclose the former President's letter to Mr Pikoli's attorneys in response to their request for certain documents;
c. Mr Simelane's failure to disclose a legal opinion that had been obtained by him and which was adverse to his opinion concerning the relationship between the National Director and the Director-General.
d. Mr Simelane's evidence accusing Mr Pikoli of dishonesty.

The non-disclosure and content of Minister Mabandla's letter

[54] During the week immediately before Mr Pikoli's suspension, President Mbeki wrote a letter (the former President's letter) to the then Minister[90] requiring her to obtain certain information from Mr Pikoli concerning the intended arrest and prosecution of Mr J Selebi who was, at the time, the National Commissioner of the South African Police Service. The letter in relevant part reads:

> "In view of the constitutional responsibilities of the President with regard to the Office of the National Commissioner of the police service, I deem it appropriate that you obtain the necessary information from the National Director of Public Prosecution regarding the intended arrest and prosecution of the National Commissioner. This would enable me to take such informed decisions as may be necessary with regard to the National Commissioner."

[89] Mr Thabo Mbeki.

[90] Ms Bridgette Mabandla (Minister Mabandla).

It is apparent that the President's request was one for further information and did not request Minister Mabandla to give any instructions to the prosecuting authority in relation to the arrest or prosecution of Mr Selebi.

[55] It is common cause that Mr Simelane drafted Minister Mabandla's letter to Mr Pikoli consequent upon the former President's letter. The salient parts of the letter read:

> "[I]n order for me to exercise my responsibilities as required by the Constitution, I require all of the information on which you relied to take the legal steps to effect the arrest of and the preference of charges against the National Commissioner of the police service. This includes but is not limited to specific information or evidence indicating the direct involvement of the National Commissioner in any activity that constitutes a crime in terms of the laws of South Africa. In pursuing your intended course of action and any prosecution, the NPA must do so in the public interest notwithstanding a prima facie case. Such exercise of discretion requires that all factors be taken into account including the public interest. Therefore, I must be satisfied that indeed the public interest will be served should you go ahead with your intended course of action. Until I have satisfied myself that sufficient information and evidence does exist for the arrest of and preference of charges against the National Commissioner of the police service, you shall not pursue the route that you have taken steps to pursue."

[56] There is no dispute that this letter was not disclosed to the Ginwala Commission. It is transparent that the letter, seen in isolation, can be nothing but conduct by Minister Mabandla amounting to improper interference with, as well as hindrance and obstruction of, the National Director of Public Prosecutions in the exercise, carrying out or performance of his powers, duties and functions.[91]

[57] Mr Pikoli replied to this part of the letter in the following terms:

> "Finally your letter may be construed as an instruction to the NPA not to proceed with the arrest and preferring of charges against Mr Selebi until you have satisfied yourself that sufficient information and evidence exist to warrant such steps, and that such a prosecution would be in the public interest. I wish to point out respectfully that if indeed it were an instruction, it would be unlawful, it would place me in a position where I would have to act in breach of the oath of office I took".

[58] This reply too was not disclosed. It must be remembered that one of the issues pertinent to the Ginwala Commission was whether there had been any interference in contravention of section 32(1)(b) of the Act. It was in this context that Mr Simelane's evidence concerning the non-disclosure and content must be understood.

[59] Two aspects of the evidence are relevant here:

a. His evidence surrounding the non-disclosure of the document is absorbing indeed:

> "Adv Trengove: Did you know about the minister's letter of 18th September 2007 instructing Mr Pikoli not [to] proceed with the arrest and prosecution until she was satisfied that it was in the public interest? Did you know about that?
> Adv Simelane: Yes.

[91] In contravention of section 32(1)(b) of the Act, quoted above n 40.

Adv Trengove: And did you know that the letter and instruction was given on the 18th of September . . . did you know that?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: And did you know that Mr Pikoli refused to comply with that instruction?

Adv Simelane: Yes I remember his response, yes I think I read it once.

Adv Trengove: And do you know that he contended that if indeed it was such an instruction, that it would be unconstitutional?

Adv Simelane: Yes I recall that from his response.

Adv Trengove: Why didn't you disclose these events in the government's papers?

Adv Simelane: Because these are the details that wasn't necessary to disclose, because what was taken into account was not the reason why Mr Pikoli was insistent on proceeding in the manner that he had intended to proceed. What was at issue was the manner in which he proposed to do it, having regard to the representations that had been made earlier that Rev Chikane also spoke to and what implications for national security would be there if it was pursued in the manner that he had intended at that time.

Adv Trengove: Are you suggesting that these events were not relevant to the suspension of Mr Pikoli?

Adv Simelane: No.

Adv Trengove: No what?

Adv Simelane: I am not suggesting that these events were irrelevant for the suspension of Pikoli.

Adv Trengove: Sorry you have a double negative in there which makes your answer ambiguous. Are you saying that these events were irrelevant or they were relevant?

Adv Simelane: I am not saying they were irrelevant.

Adv Trengove: You are not saying they were irrelevant. Do you concede they were relevant to his suspension?

Adv Simelane: They were considered and they were part of it, so they would be relevant.

Adv Trengove: Do you concede that they were highly relevant?

Adv Simelane: They were relevant and they were considered in that context.

Adv Trengove: Do you concede that they were highly relevant?

Adv Simelane: I am not sure whether it makes a difference if they were highly, or very highly or very very highly.

Adv Trengove: Which adjective would you use?

Adv Simelane: They were important.

Adv Trengove: Important, but not disclosed.

Adv Trengove: I want to suggest to you that an honest preparation of the government's papers would have disclosed the letter and Mr Pikoli's refusal to obey the unlawful instruction a mere four days before his suspension.

Adv Simelane: I disagree and I object to the suggestion that the preparation of government's submission may have been dishonest or was dishonest. It was honest in its preparation and we, in its preparation we did not leave out that which we believed needed to be put there. This was part of the context in which that submission was prepared. So there is nothing dishonest that went into that preparation. That would be my submission."

b. The evidence concerning content, too, is interesting:

"Adv Trengove: Important but not disclosed.

Adv Simelane: Because they constituted part of the detail of what was, or were the main reasons. And one of which linked to that was the issue of national security.

Adv Trengove: They weren't part of the detail. They were an unconstitutional and unlawful attempt to interfere with the performance by Mr Pikoli of his constitutional duty.

Adv Simelane: Those are your instructions, I disagree.

Adv Trengove: I beg your pardon.

Adv Simelane: I am saying those are your instructions, I disagree.

Adv Trengove: I see. Why do you disagree? Was it a lawful instruction given by the minister?

Adv Simelane: The instruction, if you say that was an instruction, to me it was not saying Mr Pikoli cannot carry out what he wanted to do. So I don't read, I don't recall the letter like that.

Adv Trengove: Well let me read you the critical sentence . . . :

'I must be satisfied that indeed the public interest will be served should you go ahead with your intended course of action. Until I have satisfied myself that sufficient information and evidence does exist for the arrest of and preference of charges against National Commissioner of Police Service, you shall not pursue the route have taken steps to pursue.'

Is that not an instruction to stop the proposed arrest and prosecution of Mr Selebi?

Adv Simelane: No I don't read it like that because I read it in the context . . . (intervenes)

Adv Trengove: You don't like it?

Adv Simelane: No I said I don't read it like that.

Adv Trengove: I see.

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: How did you read it, as a request?

Adv Simelane: Well, I read it contextually, contextually in that it's a letter that asked for a report first so that the minister could then advise the president in exercise of her responsibilities over this institution and therefore she was then saying until Mr Pikoli then gives that report which she had requested, he shouldn't pursue that route that he intended to take.

Adv Trengove: Whatever her justification for it, it was an instruction not to go ahead, correct?

Adv Simelane: Until he gave that report yes.

Adv Trengove: No, not until he gave that report, until she was satisfied there was enough evidence . . . (intervenes)

Adv Simelane: Because she would be satisfied when she receives a report with the necessary information from Mr Pikoli, that's what she asked for.

Adv Trengove: No, no, she demanded the information, but said: You stop your intended arrest and prosecution until I am satisfied that there is enough > evidence for you to go ahead. That is an arrogation of a constitutional function that belongs to Mr Pikoli, correct?

>
> Adv Simelane: No I don't read it to say that he, Mr Pikoli couldn't carry through what he wanted to do. I don't read it the way you are reading it.
>
> Adv Trengove: Why did you not disclose this letter to this commission?
> Adv Simelane: Because this letter together with the point on which you have questioned me I have said were part of the issue of national security that had to be considered."

[60] I have already said that Minister Mabandla's letter appears to constitute a contravention of the Act as an improper interference with the prosecuting authority. Mr Simelane's attempt to explain its content and justify his own draft is revealing.

[61] If he did understand what he drafted he should have known that, at the very least, the letter was capable of the construction that it constituted improper interference and if he did not begin to see this possibility the question whether he would resist interference by others requires some explanation and answer. It is probable that he did indeed understand what he drafted.

[62] Mr Simelane, having conceded that the letter was both relevant and important, found himself driven to irrelevancies in the attempt to explain the failure to disclose it. These extracts reflect on Mr Simelane's credibility and conscientiousness. They are material. Any decision by any person aware of this evidence to ignore it in the decision-making process involving Mr Simelane's credibility would have been, on the face of it and in the absence of any explanation from that person, irrational. In other words, not taking the evidence into account was not, on the face of it, rationally related to the purpose of appointing a National Director, sufficiently conscientious and credible to resist interference with his office.

[63] Almost all this evidence was also in the Public Service Commission Report. The Minister says he evaluated this report in the light of the criticisms made of it by Mr Simelane's lawyers. In fact, he considered it carefully and came to the conclusion that no disciplinary enquiry should be instituted. He must have been aware of this evidence but decided to ignore it and to advise the President to ignore it.

Failure to disclose the then President's letter

[64] About a month after Mr Pikoli's suspension[92] his attorney wrote a letter to Mr Simelane, Minister Mabandla and to the Presidency requesting certain information. The letter, to the extent relevant, reads:

> "One of the issues in the inquiry is whether the President or anybody in the Presidency, the Minister of Justice or anybody in her Ministry or you or anybody in your Department interfered with the NPA's investigation and prosecution of the National Commissioner of Police Mr Selebi. Adv Pikoli informs us that there was such interference in the immediate run up to his suspension on 23 September 2007. . . . May we please have copies of all communications and other documents relating to the investigation and prosecution of Mr Selebi which you or your Department may have sent to or received from the President or anybody in the Presidency at any time since 15 September, the Minister of Justice or anybody in her Ministry at any time since 15 September . . ."

[92] On 22 October 2007.

[65] The former President's letter of 17 September 2007 was not disclosed. We would do well to examine Mr Simelane's evidence under cross-examination:

"Adv Trengove: . . . if I may just pick it up in the opening sentence in paragraph 3:

> 'May we please have copies of all communications and documents relating to the investigation and prosecution of Mr Selebi which you or your office sent to or received from the president or anybody in The Presidency at any time since 15 September 2007.'

Do you see that?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: That squarely covered the president's letter to the minister of 17 September 2007, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes if you mention that letter yes.

Adv Trengove: Now let's go then to your response to that letter . . . ?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: It's your response, it's dated the 1st November and it is addressed to Mr Moosajee of Deneys Reitz. . . .

Adv Trengove: . . . Then you go on in the next paragraph:

> 'We are not in possession of any documents relating to the investigation of the National Commissioner of Police, save for > reports prepared by your client. Our information is that the investigation against the national commissioner is ongoing.'

Was that statement true?

Adv Simelane: My understanding is that the investigation was ongoing.

Adv Trengove: Why do you ignore the critical part of this statement? You denied that you were in possession . . . of any of the documents requested of you, correct?

Adv Simelane: Well save for the reports that were submitted yes.

Adv Trengove: Yes. Why did you not disclose the president's letter to the minister which was specifically sought?

Adv Simelane: Well I wasn't informed about the letter, I became aware of the letter much later.

Adv Trengove: I still don't have it. I understand that you say you haven't seen the president's letter. Is my understanding also correct that you say you had heard about that letter however?

Adv Simelane: Yes because the minister, yes had received the letter.

Adv Trengove: Now then why didn't you disclose it?

Adv Simelane: Well the way we, the way I read the request and understood the request, it was for any information that related to this investigation. I didn't read the president's letter to be one of those that they requested.

Adv Trengove: I see. So you thought about the president's letter but concluded that it wasn't covered by the request?

Adv Simelane: No, I mean I was aware of it as I said, I heard that it was there.

Adv Trengove: Yes.

Adv Simelane: But I focused on the previous correspondence and the reports that were sent. Hence I drafted the letter in this way, because I read the request from the attorneys to be requiring that only.

Adv Trengove: Are you saying that you thought the president's letter fell outside the request?

Adv Simelane: Yes I didn't read it to fall within this particular request.

Adv Trengove: Well, why don't you go back to the request of the minister . . .

> 'May we please have copies of all communications and other documents relating to the investigation and prosecution of Mr Selebi, which you or your office sent to or received from the president.'

How can there be any ambiguity about its meaning?

Adv Simelane: I think we read this narrowly. I didn't read it to include this.

Adv Trengove: No, no you can't read it honestly and believe that the president's letter falls outside of it.

Adv Simelane: No I didn't read it to include.

Adv Trengove: I beg your pardon?

Adv Simelane: I didn't read it to, I didn't understand it to fall into this.

Adv Trengove: How did you understand it so as to exclude the letter from the president?

Adv Simelane: No I didn't read the request to be including in its ambit a letter of that type from the president, that's why I would not have . . . (intervenes)

Adv Trengove: But the request is very simple, it says to the minister: Minister, did you receive any communication from the president concerning the Selebi investigation at any time after 15 September. Now how can there be any doubt about the fact that the president's letter fell squarely within the terms of that request?

Adv Simelane: Look I didn't read it to be requiring a letter like that. So if you are saying in your view it should have been included, I can understand that interpretation.

Adv Trengove: My view is irrelevant, but we are going to submit to this inquiry that the concealment of that letter could only have been dishonest. Do you have any response to it?

Adv Simelane: No I don't think so, because we have sought to explain to this inquiry why it was felt that that letter need not be disclosed.

Adv Trengove: No, this has got nothing to do with permission, this has got to do with honesty and dishonesty. You said: We have no such a document in our possession. And I want to know who decided to tell that lie, you or the minister?

Adv Simelane: We didn't, I don't think it is a lie, because . . . (intervenes).

Adv Simelane: I think as I said I was aware that the minister had received a letter from the president, because she mentioned it. So I was aware of the letter but I hadn't seen the letter.

Adv Trengove: Won't you just answer my question though?

Adv Simelane: I don't understand, that the letter was privileged. We had always had that view that the letter was privileged.

> Adv Trengove: And is that why you denied that you had it?
>
> Adv Simelane: No we didn't, we didn't deny that the letter was there, we didn't make reference to it in our response, as I said because I didn't understand the request to be inclusive of that particular letter.
> Adv Trengove: You see because I want to suggest to you that if privilege was your issue or excuse, then the honest response would have been: Yes we have correspondence from The Presidency, but we refuse to give it to you because it is privileged. That would have been the honest response. It is not honest to say we don't have anything of the kind. Do you understand that?
> Adv Simelane: Yes I think we could have, if I had instructions to make reference to the letter and it was given to me, I would have then made reference to it."

[66] After some cross-examination, Mr Simelane conceded without qualification that the request by Mr Pikoli's lawyers squarely covered the letter of the then-President to Minister Mabandla. But then the trouble began. According to the record, Mr Simelane tried to evade the question whether the statement that the Presidency, the then Minister and Mr Simelane himself were "not in possession of any documents relating to the investigation of the National Commissioner of Police" was true. He then said that the statement was true. When pertinently asked why the letter had not been disclosed he said variously that the letter had not been disclosed because he became aware of the letter much later, that he was aware of the letter but thought it was not covered by the request, that he had known about the letter but had focused on the previous correspondence and reports that had been sent, that he considered the letter to be a privileged document, that he had no instructions to make reference to the letter (presumably from Minister Mabandla) and, most importantly, that he did not

"read" the President's letter to be one of those that had been requested. The last reason necessarily implies that he in fact read the former President's letter.

[67] All these statements cannot be true. If he read the letter, he must have known about it and if he knew about it he could not say he got to know about it much later. If he did not know about the letter, he could not have read it, could not have thought that it was privileged, could not have focused on something else and could not have been waiting for instructions.[93] It is inconceivable that the former President's letter was not in his possession when he drafted the follow up letter to Mr Pikoli, on behalf of himself, Minister Mabandla and the Presidency, presumably on instruction from Minister Mabandla.

[68] We must remember that Mr Simelane wrote this letter to the attorney saying that there was no relevant document in his possession more than a month after he had drafted the letter that had been sent to Mr Pikoli consequent upon the former President's letter.[94] Either Mr Simelane drafted the response on behalf of Minister Mabandla without reading the former President's letter or he had it in his possession and read it. If he did not have the letter when he wrote the reply, this raises serious questions about his conscientiousness. If he did indeed have the letter, sharp questions about his dishonesty rear their heads.

[94] The letter to Mr Pikoli consequent upon the receipt by Minister Mabandla of the former President's letter was drafted on behalf of Minister Mabandla and was dated 18 September 2007 while the letter by Mr Simelane to Mr Pikoli's attorneys was dated 1 November 2007.

[69] On the face of it, the contradictions reflect on Mr Simelane's credibility, integrity and conscientiousness. They were and remain material. Any decision, by any person aware of this evidence, to ignore it in the decision-making process involving Mr Simelane's credibility would have been, on the face of it and in the absence of any explanation from that person, not rationally related to the purpose for which the power was conferred.

[70] All but an irrelevant three and a half lines of this evidence was in the Public Service Commission Report. The Minister evaluated this report in the light of the criticisms made of it by Mr Simelane's lawyers. Indeed he studied it carefully and decided that the disciplinary enquiry recommended by the Public Service Commission should not be instituted. He must have been aware of this evidence but decided to ignore it and to advise the President to ignore it. Absent any sound explanation, a decision to ignore this evidence or the failure to take it into account would be irrational in the sense of not being rationally connected to the purpose for which the power was conferred.

Failure to disclose legal opinion

[71] It is common cause that Mr Simelane obtained a legal opinion that was to some extent adverse to his view on the relative roles of the National Director and the Director-General. His evidence on this score and his disclosure only during cross-examination of the fact that he had secured that legal opinion is illuminating:

"Adv Trengove: I want to turn to a different topic and that is the difference of opinion that existed between yourself and Mr Pikoli about your role in the NPA. You are acquainted with that topic, is that correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: And you are aware of the fact that part of the complaint against Mr Pikoli is based on your evidence to the effect that he did not permit you to play the role in the NPA that you believed you were entitled and obliged to do.

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: Correct. There was a difference of opinion between yourself and Mr Pikoli. Mr Pikoli's opinion was that he alone had the final say in the management of the NPA. Is that correct? I am not sure that your microphone is switched on, could you perhaps check?

Adv Simelane: Yes that was his opinion.

Adv Trengove: And in fact he insisted that the constitutional independence of the prosecuting service required that to be so, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes in respect of prosecutorial decisions, yes that's what he said.

Adv Trengove: That was your opinion that you are the accounting officer and in that capacity that you have all the powers and duties of the PFMA, Public Finance Management Act, Sections 38 to 43 confer on an accounting officer, is that correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes that's my argument.

Adv Trengove: You say in paragraph 13 [in your supplementary affidavit] that part 2 of the PFMA, comprising Sections 38 to 43, deals with the responsibilities of accounting officers. Am I correct in my understanding that your contention in other words is that your responsibilities were those spelt out in Sections 38 to 43?

Adv Simelane: Yes of the accounting officer, yes.

Adv Trengove: And you go on:

> 'One such responsibility is to ensure the effective, efficient, economical and transparent use of the resources of the department, trading entity or constitutional institution.'

Correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: Have you taken legal advice on the issue?

Adv Simelane: It's pretty straightforward, it doesn't need legal advice in my view.

Adv Trengove: Won't you answer the question. Have you taken legal advice on the question?

Adv Simelane: No."

And then a few minutes later after discussion of another topic:

"Adv Trengove: You said you took no legal advice on this issue, correct.

Adv Simelane: No, I don't remember really getting counsel opinion on it. No in fact, yes I think you are quite right, we actually did, we got the opinion of Adv Maleka, yes now I recall and Adv Khoza, yes we did.

Adv Trengove: Mr Simelane, you said you took no advice. You repeated that same answer and then when you saw me turning up a document you changed your mind.

Adv Simelane: No you are quite wrong. What I was trying to recall was what the opinion was and it actually covered quite a lot of issues, more than this one specific issue. So I am correcting myself that we did actually get an opinion on a whole range of issues about the role of the NDPP. If I recall that was our opinion yes.

Adv Trengove: Yes. You were intimately involved in the preparations of the papers.

Adv Simelane: Absolutely.

Adv Trengove: And in those papers one of the grounds, one of the accusations against Mr Pikoli is precisely this difference of opinion between you and him, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: And yet you don't tell the commission that you have taken legal advice on the question.

Adv Simelane: Sorry can you repeat that, I didn't hear it nicely.

Adv Trengove: You don't disclose to the commission that you had taken legal advice on the question.

Adv Simelane: No I didn't think there was a need to disclose that I took legal advice on the particular issue."

[72] The Minister tries to justify this about-face by saying that Mr Simelane is entitled, when he remembers something, to change his mind and say that he has done so. This attempt is, in my view, in vain.

[73] One of the important purposes of the Ginwala Commission was precisely to investigate this difference of view and to express a view on it. Mr Simelane must have deliberately taken the decision to obtain the legal opinion. He could in all probability not have forgotten about it. Absent any explanation, his failure to disclose a legal opinion adverse to his (and I may say adverse to the case he was making before the Commission) was seemingly aimed at misleading the Commission. His denial that he had obtained that legal opinion would, absent any explanation, be dishonest. What is more, when asked why the opinion had not been disclosed to the Commission, Mr Simelane did not say that he had forgotten to include it but rather that he did not think there was a need to disclose that he took advice on the issue. How does this statement square with conscientiousness? Important questions remain unanswered once again.

[74] This evidence too, reflected in the Report of the Public Service Commission, must have been known to the Minister and was ignored. The decision to ignore and the advice to the President to ignore relevant indications of dishonesty that could detract from the credibility, integrity and conscientiousness of Mr Simelane would, in the circumstances, be irrational unless there were a proper reason for ignoring it.

Improper accusation of dishonesty

[75] Mr Simelane did not accuse Mr Pikoli of dishonesty in any papers before the Commission until he was cross-examined. He then tried to improve his case by falsely accusing Mr Pikoli of dishonesty:

"Adv Trengove: Now that was the difference between you and Mr Pikoli. He insisted that he was the head and had the final say. You insisted that in your capacity as accounting officer there are certain matters in which you had the final say, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: Now in fairness to you and in fairness to Mr Pikoli, could you please turn to the comment that you make, on page 3, at the foot of the page, where you say in the very last line on page 3 in paragraph 8 you say the following, you are speaking about this difference between yourself and Mr Pikoli and you say:

> 'However, having said that I wish to state that there was no acrimony between Pikoli and I as the differences between us were purely professional.'

Is that correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes that's correct.

Adv Trengove: So Mr Simelane as I understand you on this score you do not accuse Mr Pikoli of anything worse than that he held a view which differed from yours, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes and the consequences that flow from that view.

Adv Trengove: Oh yes, but you accept that he genuinely held a different view from yours, correct?

Adv Simelane: Yes he held a different view.

Adv Trengove: And accepting that you differed from him on the law, given his perception of the law he acted entirely as he thought the law required him to do, correct?

Adv Simelane: I think with respect to the responsibilities of the accounting officer I was of the view and still am of the view that Mr Pikoli actually has a much better understanding and shares the same understanding that I share on the responsibilities of the accounting officer.

Adv Trengove: I see, so what you are really saying is that he was dishonest?

Adv Simelane: Well what I am saying is that he knows the correct position and in my discussions with him he, in fact he has even indicated on no less than two occasions that I am the accounting officer and therefore I should deal with . . . (intervenes)

Adv Trengove: Are you saying that he was dishonest? That he said he knew one thing, but said another, is that what you are saying?

Adv Simelane: Well if you call that dishonesty then so be it, but he definitely on no less than two occasions made it clear to me that you are the accounting officer, you deal with the issues.

Adv Trengove: Are you suggesting that while he insisted to have the final say in the management of the NPA, he actually knew that you had the final say as accounting officer?

Adv Simelane: On the issues of accounting officer, yes he definitely knew, he was in that position.

Adv Trengove: Now that's a very serious accusation because that's an accusation of dishonesty, correct?

Adv Simelane: If that's what you call it, but I can't tell you . . . (intervenes)

Adv Trengove: No, no not what I call it. You do know what the difference is between honesty and dishonesty, don't you Mr Simelane?

Adv Simelane: Yes I think I know the difference.

Adv Trengove: And the evidence of what you are now giving, the implication of what you are now saying is that Mr Pikoli was dishonest on this score.

Adv Simelane: Well the point is that he deliberately argued that he is not, that the accounting officer is not responsible for the part 2 of the PFMA that you have just cited, if his evidence would be that those are not the responsibilities of the accounting officer, I disagreed with him there and I disagree with him today.

Adv Trengove: I am not asking you what the position would be if he said that or if he said this. I am asking you whether you are saying that Mr Pikoli was dishonest on this score. You were there, I wasn't. Was he dishonest or was it a purely professional difference of opinion on the law?

Adv Simelane: It was a different view and it is a dishonest view in my opinion for Mr Pikoli to argue that he does not know and he doesn't agree that the accounting officer has those responsibilities in part 2 that you cited.

Adv Trengove: It was dishonest for him to argue that you say?

Adv Simelane: Yes.

Adv Trengove: I see. Now that's a very serious accusation to make against the NDPP, correct?

Adv Simelane: Oh yes, it's a serious accusation.

Adv Trengove: Yes. Why did you never in any of your affidavits say anything of the kind?

Adv Simelane: Say what? I think I stated it in the affidavits clearly that we differed on that particular point.

Adv Moroka: Chair, if Mr Trengove would refrain from interrupting the witness. He is entitled to finish his answer.

Adv Trengove: Mr Simelane, you never in any of your affidavits suggested that Mr Pikoli was dishonest on this score, correct?

Adv Simelane: I never used the word dishonest in the affidavits.

Adv Trengove: By whatever name you did not accuse him of dishonesty, duplicity, or whatever you might call it, correct?

Adv Simelane: No I didn't accuse him of dishonesty in the affidavit.

Adv Trengove: The only thing you said in your affidavit was:

> 'I wish to state that there was no acrimony between Pikoli and I and the difference between us was purely professional.'

That means an honest difference of opinion between two professional people, correct?

Adv Simelane: A difference of opinion and a professional one, yes.

Adv Trengove: I want to suggest to you Mr Simelane your current evidence that Mr Pikoli dishonestly pretended to hold one view when in fact he knew better, is a fabrication in the witness box this morning, because otherwise you would have raised it in the affidavits.

Adv Simelane: I disagree."

[76] Again this evidence raises questions that require urgent answers about Mr Simelane's integrity and conscientiousness. Unless there is a proper explanation for the contradiction in his overall testimony about whether there was a genuine difference of opinion between him and Mr Pikoli or whether Mr Pikoli was being dishonest in holding his opinion, there is cause for grave concern. Absent the resolution of this issue, the evidence could not be ignored without affecting the rationality of the decision.

[77] This evidence was not contained in the report of the Public Service Commission and the Minister may not in fact have seen it. But having known of the evidence that Mr Simelane gave that is referred to in the report of the Public Service Commission, the Minister ought to have seen to it that Mr Simelane's evidence was subjected to closer examination. The decision not to do so in the light of the Report of the Public Service Commission is irrational. If the evidence had been subjected to closer scrutiny this aspect of the matter would undoubtedly have been discovered. Once this had happened, any decision not to investigate the matter further in the process of making the appointment would not have been rationally linked to the purpose for which the power to appoint had been conferred.

Summary of consequences of the Ginwala Commission criticisms and evidence [78] In my view all the criticisms of the evidence and approach of Mr Simelane by the Ginwala Commission have, on the face of it, a sufficient basis in the evidence before it. So are all the criticisms expressed of Mr Simelane in the Report of the Public Service Commission. The President, on the advice of the Minister, decided to ignore the submissions in the Public Service Commission Report too. These were not to be taken into account. The reasons why he did so are important.

[79] We must now evaluate the reasons why the Minister decided to ignore the criticisms by the Ginwala Commission, the evidence before the Ginwala Commission as well as the recommendations of the Public Service Commission and to advise the President to ignore these matters in the process of making the appointment.

The Minister's reasons

[80] The first reason given is that the Public Service Commission had not given Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard. Mr Simelane had been heard in the Ginwala Commission and had been given every opportunity to defend his position. If the Minister had decided to commence a disciplinary enquiry against Mr Simelane, he would have been given a hearing there once again. In any event, it was not the Public Service Commission that had the power to institute disciplinary proceedings against Mr Simelane. That decision had been made after Mr Simelane had been heard. The fact that Mr Simelane had not been given a hearing before the Public Service Commission had made its recommendations to the Minister is no reason for not instituting disciplinary proceedings particularly because Mr Simelane had been heard by the Minister.

[81] The second reason given was that he agreed with the submissions made to him by Mr Simelane's lawyers consequent upon the recommendations of the Public Service Commission. These submissions were aimed at and succeeded in persuading the Minister not to institute disciplinary proceedings against Mr Simelane. They were technical and legalistic in nature. They were intent upon establishing that Mr Simelane's conduct was not hit by the relevant legislation. Nowhere in these submissions to the Minister is it said, nor could it have been credibly said, that Mr Simelane's integrity and honesty had been left untouched and that he had come out of the process morally unscathed. Indeed, Mr Simelane's lawyers submitted that if their submissions on whether Mr Simelane's conduct fell within conduct prohibited by law, he should be counselled and that disciplinary proceedings should nevertheless not be instituted against him. This was an admission by Mr Simelane's legal representatives that his conduct before the Ginwala Commission was less than desirable. It seems that the Minister ignored submissions by Mr Simelane's legal representatives conceding that his credibility was not wholly intact after evidence at the Ginwala Commission had been given. This too could not have been rationally related to the purpose for which the power had been given.

[82] Thirdly, having decided not to accept the recommendations of the Public Service Commission, and in effect not to give Mr Simelane an opportunity to explain, the Minister reasons that it was not right for Mr Simelane's conduct at the Ginwala Commission to be held against him because Mr Simelane had not been given an opportunity to respond to the Public Service Commission and because the allegations had not been proved absent an enquiry. Quite apart from the fact that it was the Minister's decision that resulted in the fact that Mr Simelane had not been able to defend himself in an enquiry, the Minister's statement is a concession that if the allegations against Mr Simelane continued to stand after being tested, they would be of a kind that would reflect badly on him. And the Minister is right in this.

[83] The fourth basis on which the findings and evidence were not taken into account is that the Commission was not investigating Mr Simelane but Mr Pikoli. This reason is also unacceptable because it implies that dishonesty on the part of a senior state official before a commission of enquiry, where the enquiry is not directly about the person concerned, can be disregarded.

[84] The last reason given is that the Ginwala Commission is not a court. This is an irrelevant consideration. It does not matter for the purposes of evaluation of credibility whether a person is dishonest and devious to a court, to a commission of enquiry, to an employer or to anyone else for that matter. Dishonesty is dishonesty wherever it occurs. And it is much worse when the person who had been dishonest is a senior government employee who gave evidence under oath. Although not a court, the Ginwala Commission was about as important a non-judicial fact-finding forum as can be imagined.

[85] The reasons given by the Minister for ignoring these indications of dishonesty, albeit prima facie, in the evidence of Mr Simelane before the Ginwala Commission, the evaluation of his evidence by that Commission, and the recommendations of the Public Service Commission did not in all circumstances hold any water. Indeed, they do not disturb my original conclusion that the failure to take these indications into account were not rationally related to the purpose for which the power to appoint a fit and proper person as a National Director were given.

Conclusion

[86] The difficulties concerning Mr Simelane's evidence that appear from a study of the records of the Ginwala Commission were and remain highly relevant to

Mr Simelane's credibility, honesty, integrity and conscientiousness. The Minister's advice to the President to ignore these matters and to appoint Mr Simelane without more was unfortunate. The material was relevant. The President's decision to ignore it was of a kind that coloured the rationality of the entire process, and thus rendered the ultimate decision irrational.

[87] And the President decided to heed that advice. The President knew that there had been a commission of enquiry but he accepted the Minister's reasoning that the Commission's findings should be disregarded because the enquiry had not been appointed to investigate Mr Simelane. Though the President said that he accepted the findings of the Commission, this acceptance appears to have been qualified by his reliance on the circumstance that the Commission had not been appointed to investigate Mr Simelane. The President appears to be saying therefore that he accepted the findings of the Commission only to the extent that they related to Mr Pikoli.

[88] The President too should have been alerted by the adverse findings of the Ginwala Commission against Mr Simelane and ought to have initiated a further investigation for the purpose of determining whether real and important questions had been raised about Mr Simelane's honesty and conscientiousness. This he should have done despite his knowledge of Mr Simelane as a person. There is no rational relationship between ignoring the findings of the Ginwala Commission without more and the purpose for which the power had been given.

[89] The absence of a rational relationship between means and ends in this case is a significant factor precisely because ignoring prima facie indications of dishonesty is wholly inconsistent with the end sought to be achieved, namely the appointment of a National Director who is sufficiently conscientious and has enough credibility to do this important job effectively. The means employed accordingly colour the entire decision which falls to be set aside.

[90] This is not to say that Mr Simelane cannot validly be appointed National Director. He may have an explanation and may well be able to persuade the President that he is a fit and proper person and should be appointed.

[91] Given this finding, it is unnecessary for this Court to determine whether Mr Simelane is in fact a fit and proper person to be appointed as the National Director or whether the President had an ulterior purpose in making the appointment. There is no finding in relation to these issues.

Remedy

[92] There is no merit in the contention by the Minister that Mr Simelane should stay in office and the matter should be referred back to the President for reconsideration. Mr Simelane is suspended and an Acting National Director has been appointed. There is accordingly no reason for our decision to have prospective effect alone.

[93] However, in these circumstances, we should make an order that the invalidity of Mr Simelane's appointment will not by itself affect the validity of any of the decisions taken by him while in office as National Director. This will mean that all decisions made by him remain challengeable on any ground other than the circumstance that his appointment was invalid.[95]

Costs

[94] There is no reason why costs should not follow the result. The second respondent, the Minister, who opposed confirmation of the Supreme Court of Appeal order, must pay the costs. The Democratic Alliance had four counsel. In my view, the costs of two counsel in this Court are appropriate.[96]

[95] Order

The following order is made:

1. The appeal is dismissed.
2. The second respondent must pay the applicant's costs in this Court, including the costs of two counsel.

[95] It is not clear from the papers whether the processes followed were those appropriate to the performance of functions by the President as Head of State or as the head of the national executive. Section 179(1)(a) requires the President to appoint the National Director in his capacity as "head of the national executive". Section 84(2)(e) applies to appointments the President makes, in the words of the section, "other than as head of the national executive". There is a difference between the two provisions. See Chonco 1 above n 69 at paras 28-40.

[96] No appropriate basis has been advanced not to interfere with the unusual costs order granted by the Supreme Court of Appeal, which included the costs of three counsel.

3. The declaration of invalidity by the Supreme Court of Appeal of the decision of the President of the Republic of South Africa, the First Respondent, taken on 25 November 2009, purportedly in terms of section 179 of the Constitution, read with sections 9 and 10 of the National Prosecuting Authority Act 32 of 1998, to appoint Mr Menzi Simelane, the Fourth Respondent, as the National Director of Public Prosecutions is confirmed.
4. Decisions taken and acts performed by Mr Menzi Simelane in his capacity as the National Director of Public Prosecutions are not invalid merely because of the invalidity of his appointment.

ZONDO AJ:

[96] Subject to what follows below, I agree with the order and reasoning of the main judgment.

[97] In paragraph 81 of the main judgment it is implied that there was no need for, or, no obligation on, the Public Service Commission (PSC) to afford Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard either prior to or after it had concluded its investigation into Mr Simelane's conduct and made its recommendation that the Minister for Justice and Constitutional Development (Minister) take disciplinary action against Mr Simelane.

The main judgment makes this point in response to the Minister's view that the PSC should have given Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard but the PSC refused to do so. The Minister criticised the PSC's failure or refusal to give Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard as a breach of the audi alteram partem rule which is entrenched in our law. He said it violated Mr Simelane's right to be heard. The main judgment implies that this is not so.

[98] I am unable to say that a statutory body such as the PSC[97] is not obliged to give a person whose conduct it is asked to investigate (and in regard to which it must make recommendations) an opportunity to be heard before it can conclude its investigations or, at any rate, before it makes its recommendations to an authority that has to make a decision such as the decision the PSC recommended in this case. Experience shows that, generally speaking, statutory bodies such as the PSC usually give affected persons an opportunity to be heard before they conclude their investigations and make recommendations.[98] The main judgment says that Mr Simelane had already been heard in the enquiry into the conduct of Mr Pikoli under the National Prosecuting Authority Act[99] (Ginwala Inquiry) and he was going to be heard once again in the disciplinary inquiry.

[97] The PSC is established in terms of section 196(1) of the Constitution which provides that "[t]here is a single Public Service Commission for the Republic." In terms of section 196(4)(f) the PSC has the power to, of its own accord or on receipt of a complaint, investigate, evaluate and monitor the public service sector particularly in relation to its personnel. The Public Service Commission Act 46 of 1997 provides further for the powers, functions and operation of the PSC.

[98] For example, commissions of inquiry as contemplated in the Commissions Act 8 of 1947.

[99] 32 of 1998. See section 12(6)(a).

[99] In my view the main judgment fails to appreciate that, if Mr Simelane was entitled to a hearing, the PSC should have heard him not only on whether there were grounds to believe that he had prima facie done wrong but also on what steps, if any, the PSC had to recommend be taken by the Minister. The Ginwala Inquiry had nothing to do with hearing Mr Simelane on what steps, if any, the Minister should take concerning his conduct. Accordingly, it would be incorrect to suggest that the Ginwala Commission provided Mr Simelane with the kind of opportunity to be heard to which the Minister was referring.[100]

[100] The main judgment also says that Mr Simelane was going to be heard once again in the disciplinary enquiry. This was if the PSC's recommendation was accepted and implemented. I also do not think that this answers the criticism of the PSC on the audi alteram partem point. The opportunity to be heard that Mr Simelane was going to be afforded in the disciplinary inquiry, if one was established, would have focused on whether or not he was guilty of the allegations of misconduct that would have been brought against him and on what the appropriate sanction would be if he was found guilty. That focus is rather different from the focus of the opportunity to be heard to which he may have been entitled to be given by the PSC. As I have said, the focus of the latter opportunity would in part have been on what steps the PSC should recommend be taken by the Minister against Mr Simelane if, prima facie, there were grounds for some steps to be taken against him.

[100] An example of a case where the opportunity to be heard that was given to workers did not cover the critical issue on which they should have been heard is Zondi and Others v Administrator, Natal, and Others 1991 (3) SA 583 (A) at 591D-G.

[101] In the light of the above, although I incline towards the view that a statutory body such as the PSC is required to observe the audi alteram partem rule in a case such as this, it is, in my view, not necessary on the facts of this case to express a definitive view. I am prepared to assume, without deciding, in the Minister's favour that the PSC was obliged to have given Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard. However, when one approaches the matter on this footing, it does not follow that the PSC's failure to give Mr Simelane an opportunity to be heard necessarily has the consequence that the Minister could ignore the PSC's findings and recommendations. Since the authority to initiate a disciplinary process vested in the Minister[101] and Mr Simelane's lawyers had submitted their representations to him, the Minister was obliged to take into account both the PSC's report as well as Mr Simelane's representations and decide whether he should initiate a disciplinary process. It seems that this is what the Minister did but he came to the conclusion that there were no grounds to initiate a disciplinary process. In regard to that conclusion I am in agreement with the finding of the main judgment.

[101] Sections 3(7)(b), 16A(1)(a) and 16B(1)(a), read together with the definitions provided for in section 1 of the Public Service Act, 1994 make it clear that the power to initiate a disciplinary process against the Head of the Department for Justice and Constitutional Development lies with the Minister.

Summary: Housing Consumers Protection Measures Act 95 of 1998 – section 10(1) – requires registration of home builder to receive consideration for work done – no infringement of unregistered home builder's rights to property and to access to courts

Application to have arbitration award made an order of court – statutory prohibition precluding court from making arbitral award an order of court – would amount to a court sanctioning an illegality

ORDER

On appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal (hearing an appeal from the South Gauteng High Court, Johannesburg):

1. The applications for condonation are granted.

2. The application for leave to appeal is granted.

3. The appeal is dismissed with costs, including the costs of two counsel.

JUDGMENT

MAJIEDT AJ (Moseneke ACJ, Skweyiya ADCJ, Khampepe J and Madlanga J concurring):

Introduction

[1] In most instances a home is the most valuable asset in a person's estate. The Legislature sought to protect housing consumers by enacting the Housing Consumers Protection Measures Act[1] (Housing Protection Act). This matter concerns the interpretation of section 10(1)(b) of the Act. Related thereto, it questions whether that provision infringes Cool Ideas' right not to be arbitrarily deprived of property in terms of section 25 of the Constitution and its right to have access to courts in terms of section 34 of the Constitution. I must at the outset record that no relief was sought either in the courts below or in this Court to have the section struck down as constitutionally invalid.

[2] The applicant, Cool Ideas 1186 CC (Cool Ideas), a duly registered close corporation primarily engaged in property development, seeks leave to appeal against a judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal. The majority in that Court upheld an appeal against a judgment of the South Gauteng High Court, Johannesburg (High Court) which granted Cool Ideas' application to have an arbitration award in its favour against the first respondent, Ms Anne Christine Hubbard, a home owner, made an order of court in terms of section 31 of the Arbitration Act.[2] The second respondent is the Minister of Justice and Constitutional Development (Minister), cited because the relief sought might implicate the constitutionality of legislation. The Minister took no part in the proceedings in the High Court, the Supreme Court of Appeal or in this Court.

Condonation

[3] Cool Ideas applies for condonation of the late filing of its application for leave to appeal in this Court as well as for the late lodging of its summary of substantial facts. There was opposition only to the first application, but this was abandoned at the hearing.

[2] 42 of 1965.

[4] The explanation proffered for the failure to comply with the time limits is satisfactory and no prejudice has ensued. It is consequently in the interests of justice to grant both applications.

Background

[5] On 13 February 2006 Cool Ideas and Ms Hubbard entered into a building contract. Cool Ideas undertook to construct a residence for Ms Hubbard for consideration of R2 695 600.[3] Cool Ideas enlisted the services of Velvori Construction CC (Velvori) to execute the building project. At the time that it entered into the building contract, Cool Ideas was not registered as a home builder in terms of section 10 of the Housing Protection Act. However, Velvori was duly registered as a home builder with the capacity to undertake the construction of a home. The building project was also enrolled by Velvori as required by section 14[4] of the Housing Protection Act.

[6] The project commenced, payments were made and received and the building works achieved practical completion in October 2008. Ms Hubbard then raised

[3] Cool Ideas subdivided a piece of land to which it had obtained rights and sold a portion of it to Ms Hubbard.

[4] Section 14 reads:

> "(1) A home builder shall not commence the construction of a home falling within any category of home that may be prescribed by the Minister for the purposes of this section unless—
>
> (a) the home builder has submitted the prescribed documents, information and fee to the Council in the prescribed manner;
>
> (b) the Council has accepted the submission contemplated in paragraph (a) and has entered it in the records of the Council; and certain issues regarding the quality of elements of the building works, refused to make the final payment due on the building project and claimed payment of R1 200 000 as the cost of remedial work. Ms Hubbard invoked the arbitration clause contained in the building contract and initiated arbitration proceedings to seek payment for contractual damages from Cool Ideas.

[7] On 12 February 2010 the parties agreed to the appointment of an arbitrator, Mr Charles Cook, an architect, to determine the dispute. Ms Hubbard claimed compensation on the basis of defective workmanship, relocation costs, penalties and certain compliance-type certificates. Cool Ideas counterclaimed for the portion of the contract sum which remained outstanding, namely an amount of approximately R550 000. The arbitration agreement, among other things, recorded that:

> "The arbitration will be held in terms of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965. The arbitrator's award shall be final and binding. There shall be no appeal against the arbitrator's award".

[8] The arbitration proceedings culminated on 15 April 2010 in an award in favour of Cool Ideas. The relevant part of the award reads that "[Ms Hubbard] is to pay the Respondent [Cool Ideas] the sum of R550 211 inclusive of VAT".[5]

[5] The terms of the order, in relevant part, are:

> "32.2. Interest to be paid by the Claimant on R1 101 333.36 from 7 November 2007 to the date of payment at the rate of 2% greater than the minimum lending rate charged by the Claimant's bank to its client, compounded monthly, the start date being 7 November 2007;
>
> 32.3. Costs are awarded in favour of the Respondent;
> . . .

[9] Ms Hubbard failed to satisfy the arbitration award. On 16 November 2010 she wrote to Cool Ideas contending that it was not entitled to claim remuneration under the building contract because it was not registered as a home builder in terms of the Housing Protection Act. She contended that Cool Ideas was not entitled to apply to have the award of the arbitrator made an order of court, since it would receive remuneration in direct conflict with the provisions of the Housing Protection Act.

[10] Cool Ideas was of the view that it was not necessary to register as a home builder in terms of the Housing Protection Act because that Act required both the enrolment of a building project that was subject to its provisions and the registration of a home builder. Cool Ideas contended that, in doing so, it distinguishes between two categories of home builders. The first is where the home builder has the capacity to undertake the physical construction of the home, as did Velvori. The second is where the home builder does not have this capacity and has to appoint a subcontractor. Cool Ideas argued that it falls into this latter category. It also averred that, upon enquiry to the National Home Builders' Registration Council (NHBRC), Cool Ideas was informed that it was not necessary for it to register as a home builder before commencing construction.

32.5. Any amounts due and remaining unpaid by the due date as set out in paragraph 32.2 herein shall accrue interest as for a judgment date at the rate of 15.5% per annum compounded monthly from the date due for payment."

[11] Subsequently, Cool Ideas applied to the High Court to make the arbitral award an order of court in terms of section 31[6] of the Arbitration Act.

High Court

[12] Ms Hubbard opposed the application and averred that, in terms of section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act, Cool Ideas was not entitled to carry on the business of a home builder or to receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a person defined as a housing consumer. Section 10(1) reads as follows:

> "No person shall—
>
> (a) carry on the business of a home builder; or
>
> (b) receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a housing consumer in respect of the sale or construction of a home,
> unless that person is a registered home builder."

[13] Between the delivery of the answering affidavit and the replying affidavit during the High Court proceedings, Cool Ideas applied for and was registered as a home builder in terms of section 10(6)(b)[7] of the Housing Protection Act.

[6] "Award may be made an order of Court—

> (1) an award may, on application to the court of competent jurisdiction by any party to the reference after due notice to the other party or parties, be made an order of court.
>
> (2) the court to which the application is so made, may, before making the award an order of the court, correct in the award any clerical mistake or any patent error arising from any accidental slip or omission.
> (3) an award which has been made an order of court may be enforced in the same manner as any judgment or order to the same effect."

[7] "The Council may, in addition to any other category that the Council may deem appropriate, in the registration of home builders distinguish between—

> (a) home builders themselves having the capacity to undertake the physical construction of homes or to manage the process of the physical construction of homes; and
> (b) home builders who in the normal course need to enter into agreements with other home builders in order to procure the capacity referred to in paragraph (a)."

[14] During the High Court proceedings, Ms Hubbard submitted that the arbitral award was incapable of enforcement and that it was void from the outset. She made neither a case for a remittal of the dispute to the arbitrator in terms of section 32(2) of the Arbitration Act, nor for setting aside of the arbitrator's decision in terms of section 33. The High Court was of the view that Ms Hubbard raised her defence in a manner which had the effect of an appeal in that the arbitrator erred on a point of law.

[15] Cool Ideas submitted that Ms Hubbard was precluded from raising new issues for the first time. In this regard counsel placed reliance on York Timbers[8] and Lufuno Mphaphuli.[9] The High Court upheld this submission and stated that, had the issue been raised as an exception at the arbitration stage, Cool Ideas would have been afforded the opportunity to deal with the point and the arbitrator may well have allowed an amendment. The question of non-registration could then have been traversed during the arbitration.

[16] The High Court held that there is no authority for the proposition that section 31(1) of the Arbitration Act confers a discretion on the court to refuse the application if it finds the award to be incorrect.

[8] South African Forestry Co Ltd v York Timbers Ltd 2001 (4) SA 884 (T).

[9] Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd v Andrews and Another [2009] ZACC 6; 2009 (4) SA 529 (CC); 2009 (6) BCLR 527 (CC) (Lufuno Mphaphuli).

[17] The High Court held further that a significant feature of this case was that by the time Cool Ideas wished to make the arbitral award an order of court, it had registered as a home builder in terms of the Housing Protection Act. In this regard the High Court cited section 14A(1) which is headed "Late enrolment and non-declared late enrolment". It reads:

> "Where a home builder—
>
> (a) in contravention of section 14 submits an application for the enrolment of a home to the Council after construction has started; or
>
> (b) does not declare the fact that construction has commenced at the time of enrolment and the Council becomes aware of that fact, > the Council shall require the home builder to satisfy the Council that the construction undertaken at the time is in accordance with the NHBRC Technical Requirements and shall take prudent measures, contemplated in section 16(1), to manage the risks pertaining to the fund."

[18] The High Court held that the Housing Protection Act envisions a situation where late registration is permissible after the building has commenced and therefore the peremptory provisions of section 10 are to be read with those in section 14A.

[19] The High Court further held that the work was done by Velvori, a registered home builder as required by the Housing Protection Act. To preclude Cool Ideas from its claim at that stage would be giving effect to form over substance. The substance of its claim at that stage was that it was a registered home builder and that at the time it executed the building work it did so in cooperation with the subcontractor, Velvori.

[20] The High Court made the arbitral award an order of court in accordance with section 31 of the Arbitration Act. Ms Hubbard appealed to the Supreme Court of Appeal.

Supreme Court of Appeal

[21] The majority in the Supreme Court of Appeal held that the purpose of section 10 was to protect consumers.[10] It held that section 10(7) required that both Cool Ideas and the subcontractor had to be registered as home builders in terms of the Housing Protection Act. That section reads as follows:

> "A home builder registered in terms of subsection (6)(b) shall be obliged, for the purposes of the physical construction of homes, to appoint a home builder registered in terms of subsection (6)(a)".

[22] While section 10 did not nullify the contract between Ms Hubbard and Cool Ideas, it nevertheless disentitled unregistered home builders from receiving consideration. Importantly, section 21[11] creates an offence for non-compliance with section 10(1) and (2) of the Housing Protection Act. Enforcing the arbitral award, in

[11] Section 21 reads:

> "(1) Any person who—
>
> (a) knowingly withholds information required in terms of this Act or furnishes information that he or she knows to be false or misleading; or
>
> (b) contravenes a provision of section 10(1) or (2), 13(7), 14(1) or (2), 18(1) or 19(5),
>
> and every director, trustee, managing member or officer of a home builder who knowingly permits such contravention, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding R25 000, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, on each charge.
> (2) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any other Act, a magistrate's court shall have jurisdiction to impose any penalty prescribed by this Act."

the majority's view, would be to give effect to an unlawful situation and provide legal sanction to the mischief the Housing Protection Act seeks to prevent. The majority rejected the High Court's finding that the Housing Protection Act envisioned a situation where late registration is permissible after the building has commenced in terms of section 14A. In respect of the arbitration award, the majority rejected the proposition on behalf of Cool Ideas that due deference should be shown to arbitration awards by our courts. In doing so, the majority emphasised that it was not seized with the question whether an arbitration award should be set aside, but rather with the enquiry whether it is legally tenable to make an arbitration award an order of court where to do so would amount to sanctioning the breach of a clear statutory prohibition. The appeal was upheld with costs. Willis JA, dissenting, took the contrary view that a refusal to make the arbitral award an order of court would lead to an unjust result.

Issues for determination

[23] The issues for determination in this Court are:

(a) the interpretation of section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act;

(b) whether Cool Ideas has been arbitrarily deprived of its property;

(c) whether the building contract remains valid;

(d) whether equity considerations are applicable; and

(e) whether a refusal to make the arbitral award an order of court constitutes a denial of the right of access to courts.

In this Court

Jurisdiction and leave to appeal

[24] Cool Ideas predicated its application initially on this Court's jurisdiction as it existed prior to the Constitution Seventeenth Amendment Act[12] (Amendment Act), which commenced on 23 August 2013. Later it changed tack and amended its notice of motion to seek a determination of a non-constitutional issue in terms of the extended general jurisdiction brought about by section 167(3)(b)(ii)[13] of the Amendment Act. The primary issue for determination is the correct interpretation of section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act. However, two constitutional issues were raised in the original application to deal with this issue, namely: (a) that section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act amounts to an arbitrary deprivation of property as envisaged in section 25(1) of the Constitution;[14] and (b) that the Supreme Court of Appeal's refusal to make the arbitration award an order of court infringed Cool Ideas' right of access to courts in terms of section 34 of the Constitution.[15]

[25] Apart from the fact that the original application for leave to appeal had been filed in this Court on 30 July 2013, almost one month prior to the commencement of

[13] Section 167(3)(b)(ii) in its amended form now reads as follows:

> "The Constitutional Court . . . may decide . . . any other matter, if the Constitutional Court grants leave to appeal on the grounds that the matter raises an arguable point of law of general public importance which ought to be considered by the Court".

[14] Section 25(1) read as follows:

> "No one may be deprived of property except in terms of law of general application, and no law may permit arbitrary deprivation of property."

[15] Section 34 reads:

> "Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum."

the amended section 167(3)(b)(ii), there is no need for this Court to exercise its extended general jurisdiction (assuming it could do so), since constitutional issues plainly arise here. It is therefore not necessary to decide whether this Court has extended jurisdiction in terms of the amended section.[16]

[26] It is furthermore in the interests of justice to decide these constitutional issues, since they arise as a consequence of the Supreme Court of Appeal's majority judgment. This matter requires us to interpret section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act and to subject it to scrutiny through the lens of the rights contained in sections 25(1) and 34 of the Constitution. These issues were not directly raised in the Supreme Court of Appeal. There are reasonable prospects of success and leave to appeal should consequently be granted.

The merits

[27] The interpretation of section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act requires a careful consideration of the scheme of the Act and its objects measured against the rights embodied in sections 25 and 34 of the Constitution. The nub of the dispute concerns the question whether section 10(1)(b) should be interpreted, as Cool Ideas contends, to mean that an unregistered home builder can receive payment for work done as long as registration has been effected by the time that payment is sought. Put differently, Cool Ideas contends that registration is not a prerequisite for a home builder to commence (and complete) construction, as long as registration has been effected by the time the home builder seeks payment.

Proper meaning of section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act[17]

[28] A fundamental tenet of statutory interpretation is that the words in a statute must be given their ordinary grammatical meaning, unless to do so would result in an absurdity.[18] There are three important interrelated riders to this general principle, namely:

(a) that statutory provisions should always be interpreted purposively;[19]

(b) the relevant statutory provision must be properly contextualised;[20] and

(c) all statutes must be construed consistently with the Constitution, that is, where reasonably possible, legislative provisions ought to be interpreted to preserve their constitutional validity. This proviso to the general principle is closely related to the purposive approach referred to in (a).[21]

I turn to an analysis of the legislative scheme of the Housing Protection Act, against the backdrop of these principles.

The scheme of the statute

[29] The purpose of the Housing Protection Act is to protect housing consumers. This appears from the name and preamble of the statute.[22] Unsurprisingly, this aspect was not in issue before us. The entire legislative scheme is predicated upon a building contract between a registered home builder and a housing consumer being concluded. The statute is not capable of being construed as permitting after-the-fact registration of a home builder when construction has already commenced (or may even have been completed) when it seeks payment from the housing consumer. It is necessary to discuss in some detail the various provisions of the Housing Protection Act which support this conclusion.

[30] Section 3 sets out the objects of the NHBRC. The ultimate objective is the regulation of the building industry[23] through, amongst other things, the protection of the housing consumer and maintaining minimum standards for home builders. The protection is optimally achieved in requiring the registration of home builders upfront and not during the course of or at the end of construction. The impugned provision must therefore be interpreted thus. To hold otherwise would be to defeat the primary objective of the statute. The contrary argument would in effect leave a housing consumer who is faced with defective workmanship on his or her house unprotected in respect of a civil remedy in terms of the Housing Protection Act until such time as the home builder registers with a view to recovering payment for its services rendered, should such a home builder ever choose to do so.

[22] The preamble to the Housing Protection Act states:

> "To make provision for the protection of housing consumers; and to provide for the establishment and functions of the National Home Builders Registration Council; and to provide for matters connected therewith."

[23] Section 3(b).

[31] Section 5 sets out the wide-ranging powers of the NHBRC. Section 13 contains important safeguards in favour of the housing consumer. Unless there has been compliance with certain provisions,[24] a home builder is prohibited from demanding or receiving from a housing consumer a deposit for the construction of a home.[25] I deal with these sections in more detail below.

[32] Chapter V deals with legal enforcement and, in a similar vein, affords housing consumers extensive protection through the imposition of the requirement on home builders to register with the NHBRC. Lastly, section 21 creates statutory offences for contravention of section 10(1) and (2). It provides for sentences of a fine not exceeding R25 000 or imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, on each charge.

[33] These provisions lead one to the ineluctable conclusion that the statute envisions registration of a home builder before construction commences. Moreover, the relevant section itself says so in plain language.[26] These prohibitions are stark and explicit. Equally clear is the purpose of these provisions (as is the case with the statute as a whole), namely to protect housing consumers.

[25] Section 13(7)(a).

[26] See above [12].

[34] The possibility of belated registration, advanced by Cool Ideas, would be inimical to the clear objective of the legislation. It would also violate the clear language and meaning of section 10(1)(b). Much emphasis was laid on behalf of Cool Ideas on the use of the word "receive" in section 10(1)(b) in support of this converse proposition. That emphasis is misplaced. Section 10(1)(a) and (b) and 10(2) must be read together and, as stated, contextually and purposively with regard to the statute as a whole. This section requires the registration of persons or entities that carry on the business of a home builder, and those that have entered into an agreement with a housing consumer in respect of the sale or construction of a house. In this instance, it is not permissible to extract one word from the section and then to rely upon it as support for the interpretation which Cool Ideas contends for in circumstances where it plainly controverts not only the plain, unambiguous text of section 10(1) and (2), but also the clear purpose of that section and of the statute as a whole.

[35] The further submission that Cool Ideas' non-registration was in any event cured by the fact that Velvori – which did the actual construction work – had been duly registered as a home builder, is devoid of merit. This is so given the plain and unequivocal requirement in section 10(7).[27]

[27] See above [21].

[36] It is of some significance that while, as the majority in the Supreme Court of Appeal correctly observed, section 14A allows for the late enrolment of a home after construction has commenced, there is no corresponding relaxation of the registration requirement to be found in section 10(1)(b). This too evinces a clear intention by the Legislature that registration should occur prior to and not during or at the end of construction.

[37] Accordingly, the interpretation given by the Supreme Court of Appeal to section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act, namely that registration is a prerequisite for building works to be undertaken by a home builder, must be upheld. Failure to register would result in the home builder being ineligible to seek consideration for work done in terms of a building agreement. It is convenient to discuss whether this interpretation amounts to an arbitrary deprivation of Cool Ideas' property. I think not.

Arbitrary deprivation of property

[38] The starting point of this enquiry must be whether there has been a deprivation of Cool Ideas' property.[28] It is common cause that there has been deprivation – Cool Ideas would not be able to enforce a claim based on unjustified enrichment, for the reasons mentioned below.[29] The outstanding balance of R550 000 would thus remain unpaid. This Court held in Opperman that the right to restitution of money

[28] See above n 14.

[29] Joubert et al (eds) LAWSA (reissue) vol 9 at para 209(d) and the cases cited there.

paid based on unjustified enrichment constitutes property for purposes of section 25(1) of the Constitution.[30]

[39] The next question is whether the deprivation of Cool Ideas' right to sue on unjustified enrichment is arbitrary. The answer to this question is inextricably linked to the discussion of the purpose of the Housing Protection Act, the legislative scheme as a whole and the interpretation of section 10(1)(b), set out above.

[40] In FNB v CSARS,[31] this Court set out the test for arbitrariness. It held that there will be an arbitrary deprivation of property if the law referred to in section 25(1) lacks adequate reason for the deprivation in question or is procedurally unfair.[32] Ackermann J then laid down guidelines for determining the requirement of sufficient reason for the deprivation.[33] In essence they entail an analysis of the means employed and the ends sought to be achieved as well as a consideration of the nature of the property and the extent of the deprivation.

[41] This approach was referred to with approval in Opperman.[34] As was the case in Opperman, the deprivation in this matter is not merely partial in nature. It deprives the unregistered home builder, Cool Ideas, of its right to payment and there must consequently be compelling reasons for it. Proportionality between the means and the end would therefore have to feature prominently in this enquiry.[35] But, unlike Opperman's factual matrix and ultimate findings, here the means justify the end, that is, there is a rational connection between the depriving statutory provision and its purpose. The purpose of the legislation has been set out above and is not in issue.

[42] There can be no doubt that the protection of housing consumers is a necessary and legitimate legislative objective. The means of protection is through the establishment of a fund to compensate housing consumers for defective work by home builders. Registration is a prerequisite for the construction of a home. Registration, quite apart from its protection objective, is also aimed at bringing home builders into the statutory fold of the NHBRC with all its wide-ranging powers and, secondly, to contribute towards the funding of the NHBRC through registration fees.

[43] The crisp issue is whether the penalisation for failure to register, namely the deprivation of consideration for services rendered by the home builder, is proportionate to the purpose of protecting housing consumers, that is, do the means of deprivation justify the ends of protection? I think they do. The purpose for deprivation is compelling. Moreover, it is a simple process of registration which is required. There is nothing overly complicated or onerous. The important consequences brought about by registration have been dealt with above. It is not necessary to regurgitate them. It would suffice to reiterate their importance by demonstrating the invidious position a housing consumer who has unwittingly contracted with an unregistered home builder would find herself in. There would be no safeguards under section 13, which places certain important obligations on the home builder and which also provides evidentiary aid to the housing consumer by way of the deeming provisions in section 13(2)(a). Most importantly, the housing consumer would have no recourse to the NHBRC Fund and no claim for restitution against the unregistered home builder. The deprivation effected by section 10(1)(b) is aimed at a limited target, namely those home builders who fail to register.

[44] I am satisfied that section 10(1)(b) is aimed at achieving a legitimate and important statutory purpose and that there is a rational, proportional connection between the statutory prohibition and its purpose. There is accordingly no arbitrariness in the deprivation and thus no violation of section 25 of the Constitution. I turn next to a discussion of whether the underlying building contract remains valid.

The continued validity of the building contract

[45] By invoking the arbitration clause in terms of the building contract, the parties entered into a separate arbitration agreement on 3 April 2009[36] (it will be recalled that the building contract had been concluded on 13 February 2006). This fell outside of the ambit of the building contract. My Colleague Jafta J does not draw this distinction. The arbitrator derives his powers not from the building contract (as Jafta J

[36] Clause 14.1 of the building contract reads:

> "Any dispute arising between the parties out of and during the currency of the contract or upon termination thereof may be referred to arbitration."

appears to suggest), but from the arbitration agreement. The arbitrator himself acknowledged this fact.[37] It is noteworthy that at the time of the commencement of the arbitration agreement on 12 February 2010, Cool Ideas was still not registered as a home builder for the purposes of section 10 of the Housing Protection Act.[38]

[46] Although I find below that the building contract remained valid, a distinction needs to be drawn between the building contract and the arbitration agreement.[39] It is the contents of the arbitration agreement that are before this Court. The arbitration agreement required the arbitrator to arbitrate on alleged defective work by Cool Ideas which occurred whilst Cool Ideas was engaged in the construction of a home for Ms Hubbard. Both the arbitration agreement and the building contract are subject to the legislative framework of the Housing Protection Act.

[47] The Supreme Court of Appeal correctly found that the underlying building contract remains valid, notwithstanding its finding that Cool Ideas was not entitled to payment due to its failure to register as required by section 10(1)(b). It reasoned, correctly so, that the prohibitions in section 10(1) and (2) are not directed at the [37] As appears from paragraph 4 of the arbitral award which reads:

> "The terms and conditions of my appointment as Arbitrator were set down in a document headed Arbitration Agreement dated 3rd April 2009 reference CDC/va/1459 (the Arbitration Agreement) and ultimately agreed to and signed by the parties".

[38] Cool Ideas only registered as a home builder in terms of the Housing Protection Act after it applied to the High Court to have the arbitral award confirmed as an order of court.

[39] See in this regard Harbour Assurance Co (UK) Ltd v Kansa General International Assurance Co Ltd and Others [1993] 3 ALL E.R. 897 where the Court, in upholding an appeal in which it determined whether an arbitration clause is a separate and autonomous contract, held that, "as a matter of practice, the principle [of severability of an arbitration clause from the principle agreement which contains it] has been sustained by the terms and implications of arbitration conventions and rules". (Parenthesis in original.) See also David Taylor & Son v Barnett Trading Co [1953] 1 ALL E.R. 843.

validity of construction contracts, but at the unregistered home builder who is barred from receiving any consideration for work done absent any prior registration as a home builder. There is nothing in the legislative scheme which suggests that the building contract is invalidated by these statutory prohibitions.

[48] I have already set out the main provisions of the Housing Protection Act. The legislative scheme rests upon a written building contract between a registered home builder and a housing consumer.[40] Section 13(1) places a statutory obligation upon the home builder to ensure that a written agreement is concluded and that the formalities in that regard are met.[41] Section 13(2)(a) lends further assistance to the housing consumer as against the home builder by importing deeming provisions into the written agreement against the latter, enforceable in a court.[42] And, of some

[40] See above [29].

[41] "A home builder shall ensure that the agreement concluded between the home builder and a housing consumer for the construction or sale of a home by that home builder—

(a) shall be in writing and signed by the parties;

(b) shall set out all material terms, including the financial obligations of the housing consumer; and

(c) shall have attached to the written agreement as annexures, the specifications pertaining to materials to be used in construction of the home and the plans reflecting the dimensions and measurements of the home, as approved by the local government body: Provided that provision may be made for amendments to the plans as required by the local government body."

[42] "The agreement between a home builder and a housing consumer for the construction or sale of a home shall be deemed to include warranties enforceable by the housing consumer against the home builder in any court that—

(a) the home, depending on whether it has been constructed or is to be constructed—

(i) is or shall be constructed in a workmanlike manner;

(ii) is or shall be fit for habitation; and

(iii) is or shall be constructed in accordance with—

(aa) the NHBRC Technical Requirements to the extent applicable to the home at the date of enrolment of the home with the Council; and

(bb) the terms, plans and specifications of the agreement concluded with the housing consumer as contemplated in subsection (1)".

significance is the fact that these provisions in section 13 may not be waived.[43] It is difficult to conceive how, given this importance of the written building contract in the legislative scheme, the entire agreement must be invalidated by the conclusion that an unregistered home builder is not entitled to seek payment for work done in terms of section 10(1)(b). It would be tantamount to a futile exercise if the Legislature were to enact a statutory prohibition against the remuneration of an unregistered home builder when the entire legislative scheme renders the building contract between the housing consumer and the home builder void from the outset. For this reason I find myself in respectful disagreement with Jafta J where he states that there is "nothing in the text of section 10(1), or other sections of the Act, which indicates that the underlying contract should remain unaffected."[44] It is inconceivable that the Legislature would specifically enact a provision such as section 13 to protect consumers but then render their contract invalid – a provision which stipulates various protective measures for the benefit of housing consumers. These include enforceable warranties by way of the deeming provision in section 13(2). These may not be waived. The Legislature is not likely to have provided for their inclusion in a building contract if the very same enactment renders the building contract invalid.

[49] The Housing Protection Act is, for good reasons, nuanced in its purpose and scheme. The underlying building contract must remain extant in order to render protection to the housing consumer in respect of what has already been erected and to the home builder for what has already been received. The parties are therefore entitled to retain what has been done or given, as the case may be. No restitution is legally tenable in these circumstances, as would have been the case with an invalid agreement. Thus, Cool Ideas would not be entitled to file suit against Ms Hubbard for unjustified enrichment, since the material element of performance without legal basis (sine causa) is lacking – the building agreement remains a valid causa.

[43] Section 13(6) reads:

> "Any provision in an agreement contemplated in subsection (1) that excludes or waives any provision of this section shall be null and void."

[44] See [96] of the judgment of Jafta J.

[50] It is of considerable importance to note that both parties approached the matter in this Court and in the courts below on the basis that the underlying building contract remained valid. The statements[45] by Jafta J that Ms Hubbard had challenged the arbitral award on the basis that it is invalid because the building contract itself is invalid are, with respect, not borne out by the extract quoted by Jafta J in his judgment,[46] or by any other part of the record. On the contrary, in response to the averment by Cool Ideas in its founding affidavit in this Court that the Supreme Court of Appeal correctly found that the building contract remains valid, Ms Hubbard stated as follows in her opposing affidavit:

> "I do not dispute that the failure on the part of Cool Ideas to have registered as a home builder in terms of the Housing [Protection] Act did not in itself render our building agreement void."

Counsel for both parties argued the matter before us on this basis, and correctly so.

[45] See [73] of the judgment of Jafta J.

[46] At [72].

[51] In summary: the underlying building contract remains valid and extant. This is so even though Cool Ideas is in law precluded from seeking consideration for the work done, due to its failure to register as a home builder prior to the commencement of the building works.

Equity considerations

[52] Cool Ideas contended that it would be inequitable for Ms Hubbard to be absolved from complying with the arbitrator's award and from paying the outstanding approximately R550 000 due to Cool Ideas. I am of the view that equity considerations do not apply. But even if they do, as my Colleague Froneman J suggests, the law cannot countenance a situation where, on a case by case basis, equity and fairness considerations are invoked to circumvent and subvert the plain meaning of a statutory provision which is rationally connected to the legitimate purpose it seeks to achieve, as is the case here. To do so would be to undermine one of the essential fundamentals of the rule of law, namely the principle of legality. The following dictum by Kentridge AJ in S v Zuma is apposite:

> "[I]f the language used by the lawgiver is ignored in favour of a general resort to 'values' the result is not interpretation but divination."[47]

It is for this reason that I am in respectful disagreement with Froneman J in his interpretation of section 10(1)(b) and the reasoning behind it. The plain import of section 10(1)(b) is that regardless of how much work has been done by the unregistered home builder, no consideration is payable by the housing consumer.

[47] S v Zuma above n 18 at para 18.

Does the refusal to make the arbitral award an order of court infringe Cool Ideas' right of access to courts?

[53] The majority in the Supreme Court of Appeal refused to make the arbitral award an order of court on the basis that to do so would amount to sanctioning an illegality and would subvert the legitimate purpose of the section by lending the court's imprimatur to the very mischief which the statute seeks to prevent. Our law has long recognised that any act performed contrary to the direct and express prohibition of the law is void and of no force and effect.[48] Making the arbitral award an order of court would undoubtedly amount to the court sanctioning the illegality which section 10(1)(b) imposes.

[54] Moreover, section 21 of the Housing Protection Act provides that non-compliance with the particular section constitutes a criminal offence. It is imperative to take cognisance of the fact that we are not concerned here with the setting aside of the arbitrator's award on one of the three grounds listed in section 33 of the Arbitration Act, namely: misconduct by the arbitrator, gross irregularity in the proceedings, or where an arbitral award has been improperly obtained. Nor are we concerned with a remittal to the arbitrator in terms of section 32. This matter concerns the provisions of section 31 of the Arbitration Act in terms whereof an arbitral award may be made an order of court.[49]

[48] Schierhout v Minister of Justice 1926 AD 99 at 109. See also Hoisain v Town Clerk, Wynberg 1916 AD 236.

[49] See above n 6.

[55] What we are seized with here is therefore not the correctness or otherwise of the arbitral award, but with the question whether the award ought to be made an order of court if the court order would be contrary to a plain statutory prohibition. What is more, as stated at the outset, there is no challenge to the section's constitutional validity. It cannot be expected of a court of law in such circumstances to disregard a clear statutory prohibition – that would be inimical to the principle of legality and the rule of law. To do so would amount to undermining the purpose of the legislation.

[56] That is not to say that a court can never enforce an arbitral award that is at odds with a statutory prohibition. The reason is that constitutional values require courts to "be careful not to undermine the achievement of the goals of private arbitration by enlarging their powers of scrutiny imprudently."[50] Courts should respect the parties' choice to have their dispute resolved expeditiously in proceedings outside formal court structures. If a court refuses too freely to enforce an arbitration award, thereby rendering it largely ineffectual, because of a defence that was raised only after the arbitrator gave judgment, that self-evidently erodes the utility of arbitration as an expeditious, out-of-court means of finally resolving the dispute.

[57] So it will often be contrary to public policy for a court to enforce an arbitral award that is at odds with a statutory prohibition. But it will not always be so. The force of the prohibition must be weighed against the important goals of private arbitration that this Court has recognised.[51]

[58] Against this backdrop I turn to consider whether this particular arbitral award is contrary to public policy. In my view it is. Courts are themselves subject to the fundamental principle of legality as they are bound to uphold the Constitution[52] and, as stated, to make the arbitral award an order of court in the present instance would undermine that very principle. Cool Ideas has placed extensive reliance on Lufuno Mphaphuli[53] and the principle of party autonomy in voluntary arbitrations.[54] While these are important considerations, I fail to see how they assist Cool Ideas here. Generally speaking, party autonomy in voluntary arbitrations will not trump the principle of legality where the enforcement of the arbitral award would constitute a criminal offence, as is the case here. I turn next to a brief discussion of Lufuno Mphaphuli to demonstrate why – although its reasoning is not irrelevant here – it is distinguishable from the present case.

[59] Lufuno Mphaphuli concerned a private arbitration between Lufuno Mphaphuli & Associates (Pty) Ltd (Mphaphuli), an electrical infrastructure contractor company, and Bopanang Construction CC (Bopanang), a close corporation engaged in similar business. Differences arose between the parties in respect of performance in terms of a written agreement in terms whereof Mphaphuli had engaged the services of Bopanang as a subcontractor to undertake certain work on its behalf for Eskom in rural Limpopo. The dispute was referred to arbitration before Mr Andrews, the respondent, a quantity surveyor and project manager. The arbitrator found for Bopanang, who sought to have the award made an order of court in terms of section 31(1) of the Arbitration Act. Mphaphuli opposed this application and launched a separate application in terms of section 32(2) of the Arbitration Act for the review and setting aside of the award and for remittal to the arbitrator. Bopanang succeeded in the High Court, but Mphaphuli did not; its applications for condonation failing for, inter alia, lack of merits in the main action. Mphaphuli met with the same fate in the Supreme Court of Appeal. In this Court the central issues were the interaction between the section 34 right of access to courts and private arbitrations as well as the question whether, and to what extent, parties who enter into an arbitration agreement are to be taken to have waived their constitutional right to a fair and impartial hearing and, lastly, the role of courts in confirming or setting aside arbitration awards. The statements in Lufuno Mphaphuli must be seen in their proper perspective. This is so because Lufuno Mphaphuli concerned the setting aside of an arbitration award in terms of section 33(2) of the Arbitration Act. As the majority in the Supreme Court of Appeal correctly held, it is important to remind oneself that this is not the case before us. We are concerned with whether making an arbitration award an order of court is permissible in circumstances where to do so would be to sanction a clear statutory prohibition. Some of the same considerations apply in this context. A court's refusal to enforce an arbitration award will also erode, to some extent, the utility of the arbitration process. But where a court is called upon actively to facilitate an illegality there is a need for greater caution.

[60] The refusal to make the arbitral award an order of court for the strongly persuasive reasons advanced by the majority in the Supreme Court of Appeal is required by public policy in this case. The court would otherwise be contravening a clear statutory criminal prohibition enacted for a particularly laudable and important purpose: the protection of housing consumers.

[61] At common law an arbitral award should not be executed if the particular matter is repugnant to arbitration.[55] Furthermore, Cool Ideas sought to draw an analogy with the Recognition and Enforcement of Foreign Arbitral Awards Act[56] and the UNCITRAL Model Law on International Commercial Arbitration.[57] But, to the extent that those instruments have any applicability here, they tell against Cool Ideas. Both empower a court to refuse to enforce an arbitral award if to do so "would be contrary to public policy" in South Africa. For the reasons I have given, enforcing this arbitral award in violation of a statutory prohibition backed by a criminal sanction would be contrary to public policy. This is also the approach adopted by academic [55] Voet 4.8.24.

[56] 40 of 1977. Section 4(1)(a)(ii) reads:

> "A court may refuse to grant an application for an order of court in terms of section 3 if the court finds that . . . enforcement of the award concerned would be contrary to public policy in the Republic".

[57] 1985. Article 36(1)(b)(ii) provides:

> "Recognition or enforcement of an arbitral award, irrespective of the country in which it was made, may be refused only if the court finds that . . . the recognition or enforcement of the award would be contrary to the public policy of this State."

writers. Thus, for instance, Butler and Finsen argue that if an arbitral award is "illegal or contrary to public policy" a court may not enforce it.[58]

[62] In the premises, Cool Ideas' reliance on the infringement of its section-34 right is misconceived. Its access to courts was not denied by the Supreme Court of Appeal majority but, in truth and in fact, the principle of legality, so fundamental to our constitutional project, was correctly upheld. Cool Ideas has been afforded a full and proper opportunity to have all the issues ventilated in the High Court and in the Supreme Court of Appeal. The section-34 challenge must consequently fail.

Costs

[63] In this instance I see no reason to deviate from the standard rule that costs should follow the result. Accordingly, Ms Hubbard is entitled to the costs of this application, including the costs consequent upon the employment of two counsel.

Order

[64] The following order is made:

1. The applications for condonation are granted.
2. The application for leave to appeal is granted.
3. The appeal is dismissed with costs, including the costs of two counsel.

JAFTA J (Zondo J concurring):

[65] I have read the judgment of my Colleague Majiedt AJ (main judgment). While I agree with the order proposed and some of the reasons underpinning it, I am unable to agree with some of the findings made. I do not agree that on 3 April 2009, Cool Ideas and Ms Hubbard concluded a separate arbitration agreement.

[66] I also disagree with the finding that the contract between the parties remains valid. In my view, properly construed, the prohibitions in section 10(1)(a) and (b) read with section 21(1)(b), nullify the contract even though no specific reference is made to it in those provisions. Flowing from this finding, my approach to the matter differs from the main judgment.

Background

[67] The primary question is whether the arbitration award should have been made an order of court for purposes of enforcement. The award arose from a building contract concluded by the parties in February 2006. In terms of that contract, Cool Ideas undertook to build a residential house for Ms Hubbard, who undertook to pay R2 695 600 for the construction. Furthermore, the parties agreed that any dispute arising from the contract would be submitted to arbitration. Clause 14 of the contract provided:

"Arbitration

14.1 Any dispute arising between the parties out of and during the currency of the contract or upon termination thereof may be referred to arbitration.

14.2 The arbitrator shall be appointed at the request of either party by the president for the time being of the Master Builders Association having jurisdiction in the area or by the president of the Building Industries Federation (SA), whose decision will be final and binding on both parties".

[68] Cool Ideas did not carry out the construction itself, but subcontracted Velvori Construction CC to build the house. At the relevant time, Velvori Construction was registered in terms of the Housing Protection Act but Cool Ideas was not.

[69] As is usual in contracts of this kind, disputes arose that led to claims being made by each party against the other. Ms Hubbard claimed the sum of R1 231 300.50 which she said was the cost of remedial work as she complained that there were defects in the building. Cool Ideas counterclaimed the balance of the contract price which was in the amount of R550 211, plus VAT and interest at an agreed rate.

[70] Mr Charles Cook, an architect and valuer, was appointed as the arbitrator. The disputes were submitted to the arbitrator for determination. In October 2010, the arbitrator issued an award in favour of Cool Ideas. In terms of the award, Ms Hubbard was ordered to pay the amount claimed by Cool Ideas. She was also directed to pay the costs occasioned by the arbitration.

[71] But Ms Hubbard failed to pay. In order to enforce the award, Cool Ideas approached the High Court requesting that the award be made an order of court.[59] In opposing the application, Ms Hubbard contended that enforcing the award would effectively be enforcing a criminal act because, when she and Cool Ideas concluded the building contract, Cool Ideas was prohibited from carrying on the business of a home builder or receiving any consideration in terms of an agreement with a housing consumer like her.

[72] Ms Hubbard's defence was pleaded in these terms:

> "[I]t was discovered . . . that [Cool Ideas], whom I contracted to construct my home, was not registered as a home builder in terms of the [Housing Protection Act].
>
> The effect of the above, so I am advised, is that [Cool Ideas] is not entitled to carry on the business of a home builder, or to receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a person, defined as a housing consumer in terms of the [Housing Protection Act], in respect of the sale or construction of a home.
>
>
> The result of the above is, so I am advised, that [Cool Ideas] was not entitled to claim any payment from me, let alone an amount totalling R1 228 522.09 (one million two hundred and twenty eight thousand five hundred and twenty two rand and nine cents) which consists of an amount of R1 064 746 (one million and sixty four thousand seven hundred and forty six rand) for 'work done' and the remainder consisting of interest charged upon such an amount.
>
>
> I confirm, as I have alluded to hereinbefore, that the award of the arbitrator effectively seeks to order the performance of a prohibited or criminal act, in that it purports to order me to make payment to an entity who carries on the business of a home builder, as defined in the [Housing Protection Act], in relation to an agreement in respect of the construction/sale of a home, while such an entity is not registered in > terms of the [Housing Protection Act] as required by such an Act." (Emphasis added.)

[59] This application was instituted in terms of section 31 of the Arbitration Act.

[73] It is apparent from Ms Hubbard's plea that she challenged the validity of the award on the basis that the building contract she had entered into with Cool Ideas was, itself, invalid because Cool Ideas carried on the business of a home builder and demanded to be paid consideration under the contract whilst it was not registered in terms of the Housing Protection Act. Thus the building contract was impugned on the ground that two prohibitions in section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act were violated.

[74] The High Court rejected the defence raised by Ms Hubbard and made the arbitration award an order of court. However, the Supreme Court of Appeal overturned the High Court's order and replaced it with an order dismissing the application with costs.

Order of court

[75] As mentioned, the main issue here is whether the arbitration award should be made an order of court. Making it an order of court is a prelude to enforcing it in the manner that a judgment of a civil court is enforced. Section 31 of the Arbitration Act regulates the process of making an arbitration award an order of court. It provides:

> "(1) An award may, on application to a court of competent jurisdiction by any party to the reference after due notice to the other party or parties, be made an order of court.

(2) The court to which application is so made, may, before making the award an order of court, correct in the award any clerical mistake or any patent error arising from any accidental slip or omission.

(3) An award which has been made an order of court may be enforced in the same manner as any judgment or order to the same effect."

[76] But converting an award into a court order does not follow as a matter of course. A court is entitled to refuse to make an award an order of court if the award is defective. Section 33 of the Arbitration Act sets out the defects which would justify the refusal. Section 33(1) provides:

"Where—

(b) an arbitration tribunal has committed any gross irregularity in the conduct of the arbitration proceedings or has exceeded its powers; or

(c) an award has been improperly obtained,

the court may, on the application of any party to the reference after due notice to the other party or parties, make an order setting the award aside."

[77] It is apparent from section 33(1) that an award which has been improperly obtained cannot be made an order of court. Impropriety may arise from a number of circumstances, including illegality. If an award is tainted by illegality, it may not be made an order of court and may not be enforced in our courts. It is a basic principle of our law that a court can never lend its aid to the enforcement of an illegal act. An act that has been performed in violation of a statutory prohibition may, generally, have no legal consequences. In Schierhout, Innes CJ observed:

> "It is a fundamental principle of our law that a thing done contrary to the direct prohibition of the law is void and of no effect."[60]

[78] Here, Ms Hubbard resisted the request to make the award an order of court on the basis that it was tainted by illegality. She contended that the building contract, in terms of which the arbitrator was appointed and the arbitration process was undertaken, was itself void because, at the time of its conclusion, Cool Ideas was not registered. It is common cause that Cool Ideas was not registered at the time that the building contract was concluded.

[79] In her plea, Ms Hubbard submitted that two prohibitions in section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act were breached when the building contract was concluded. The first prohibition is to the effect that no person shall carry on the business of a home builder. The second is to the effect that no person shall receive consideration in terms of any agreement with a housing consumer in respect of the sale or construction of a home.

Issues

[80] Owing to the defence advanced by Ms Hubbard, the following issues arise:

(a) whether in concluding the building agreement with her, Cool Ideas violated section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act;

(b) if so, whether the breach nullified the agreement;

[60] Schierhout above n 48 at 109.

(c) if the contract remained valid, whether, despite the breach, Cool Ideas was entitled to payment for the work done on Ms Hubbard's house; and

(d) if it was entitled to payment, whether the arbitration award ought to be made an order of court.

Illegality

[81] The illegality which is the bedrock of Ms Hubbard's defence depends mainly on the interpretation of section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act. I agree with the main judgment that the purpose of the Housing Protection Act, including section 10, is to protect housing consumers like Ms Hubbard. It achieves this purpose through a scheme that requires every home builder, such as Cool Ideas, to be registered in terms of the Act before it can carry on the business of a home builder. In addition, prior registration is necessary for a home builder before receipt of any consideration in terms of a building contract. And a home builder who subcontracts another home builder to carry out the construction of a home must be registered before the subcontract is concluded.[61]

[61] Section 10 of the Housing Protection Act, in relevant part, provides:

> "(6) The Council may, in addition to any other category that the Council may deem appropriate, in the registration of home builders distinguish between—
>
> (a) home builders themselves having the capacity to undertake the physical construction of homes or to manage the process of the physical construction of homes; and
>
> (b) home builders who in the normal course need to enter into agreements with other home builders in order to procure the capacity referred to in paragraph (a).
>
> (7) A home builder registered in terms of subsection (6)(b) shall be obliged, for the purposes of the physical construction of homes, to appoint a home builder registered in terms of subsection (6)(a)."

[82] Section 10(1) provides:

> "No person shall—
>
> (a) carry on the business of a home builder; or
>
> (b) receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a housing consumer in respect of the sale or construction of a home,
> unless that person is a registered home builder."

[83] A careful reading of the subsection reveals that it stipulates two prohibitions. First, it forbids any person from carrying on the business of a home builder unless that person is a registered home builder. The use of the word "unless" in the context of the section makes plain that registration as a home builder must precede carrying on the business and receipt of consideration. The phrase "carry on the business of a home builder" requires a little more elaboration. It is not in dispute that Cool Ideas is a home builder envisaged in the Housing Protection Act. Nor can it be gainsaid that Ms Hubbard is a housing consumer in terms of the same Act.

[84] The Housing Protection Act defines "business of a home builder" as—

(a) constructing or undertaking to construct a home or causing a home to be constructed for any person;

(b) constructing a home for the purposes of sale, leasing, renting out or otherwise disposing of such home;

(c) selling or otherwise disposing of a home contemplated in paragraph (a) or (b) as a principal; or

(d) conducting any other activity that may be prescribed by the Minister for the purposes of this definition.[62]

[85] It is clear from this wide definition that, when Cool Ideas entered into a building contract and undertook to construct a house for Ms Hubbard, Cool Ideas carried on the business of a home builder. Even when it later subcontracted Velvori Construction to build the home, Cool Ideas was still carrying on the business of a home builder.

[86] The facts of the case also show that Cool Ideas received payment for the construction of Ms Hubbard's house and what it claimed at the arbitration was the balance of the contract price. At the time Cool Ideas received part of the payment, it was not registered. It was registered after the arbitration award was issued.

[87] Therefore, both prohibitions on which Ms Hubbard relied for her defence were violated. The first violation occurred when the building contract was concluded. The second violation of the first prohibition happened at the time when Cool Ideas subcontracted Velvori Construction. The infringement of the second prohibition arose when Cool Ideas received payment for work done on Ms Hubbard's home. However, in respect of the balance that is the subject matter of the arbitration award, receipt of the money has not occurred and Cool Ideas has now been registered.

[62] Section 1(i) of the Housing Protection Act.

[88] In terms of section 21 of the Housing Protection Act, these breaches constitute criminal offences.[63] Each contravention carries a penalty of a fine not exceeding R25 000 or imprisonment for a period not more than one year.

[89] The answer to the question whether the arbitration award should be made an order of court depends on whether, despite non-compliance with section 10(1), Cool Ideas should derive benefit from the building contract. This in turn requires us to examine the effect of acting contrary to the prohibitions in section 10(1) when the contract was concluded. Put differently, whether the validity of the contract was not affected by the non-compliance.

Validity of the building contract

[90] The general principle of our law is that an act performed contrary to a statutory prohibition is invalid and has no legal effect. In explaining the principle in Schierhout, Innes CJ said:

> "[W]hat is done contrary to the prohibition of the law is not only of no effect, but must be regarded as never having been done – and that whether the lawgiver has expressly so decreed or not; the mere prohibition operates to nullify the act."[64]

[63] Section 21(1) provides:

> "Any person who—
>
> (a) knowingly withholds information required in terms of this Act or furnishes information that he or she knows to be false or misleading; or
>
> (b) contravenes section 10(1) or (2), 13(7), 14(1) or (2), 18(1) or (2) or 19(5),
>
> and every director, trustee, managing member or officer of a home builder who knowingly permits such contravention, shall be guilty of an offence and liable on conviction to a fine not exceeding R25 000, or to imprisonment for a period not exceeding one year, on each charge."

[91] However, the question whether non-compliance with a statutory prohibition would nullify an act is determined with reference to the language of the statute concerned.[65] But it is important to note that where a statutory provision under consideration amounts to a prohibition such as the ones contained in section 10(1) of the Housing Protection Act, an act performed contrary to it would be invalid, unless it is clear from the statute that, in the light of its scope and object, invalidity was not intended. In other words, it is the prohibition which "operates to nullify the act" performed contrary to it.

[92] In Lupacchini,[66] the Supreme Court of Appeal rejected a view of academic writers to the effect that a trustee who is still to receive authorisation from the Master has capacity to sue or to be sued on behalf of the trust, despite the provision that such trustee "shall act in that capacity only if authorised thereto in writing by the Master." The Supreme Court of Appeal held that legal proceedings which were instituted by a trustee before authorisation were invalid. The Court reasoned:

> "I regret that I can find no indications that legal proceedings commenced by unauthorised trustees were intended to be valid. On the contrary, the indications seem to me all to point the other way. Unless it were to be the case that all transactions performed in conflict with the section are to be treated as valid – which clearly cannot be the case, because otherwise the Act would be altogether ineffective – then I find nothing to distinguish its effect on legal proceedings. Indeed, it would > seem to me that the case is even stronger for finding legal proceedings to be a nullity."[67]

[93] The authorities referred to suggest that the building contract concluded by Cool Ideas and Ms Hubbard, in contravention of section 10(1)(a) of the Housing Protection Act, was invalid. But the Supreme Court of Appeal here held that the contract remained valid. That Court stated:

> "Sections 10(1) and (2) do not in terms invalidate the agreement between the home builder and the housing consumer. Quite the contrary – I think it is clear that, consistent with the overall purpose of the Act, the validity of that agreement is unaffected by an act of the home builder in breach of those sections. The prohibition in those sections is not directed at the validity of particular agreements but at the person who carries on the business of a home builder without a registration. They thus do no more than disentitle a home builder from receiving any consideration. That being so a home builder who claims consideration in conflict with those sections might expose himself or herself to criminal sanction (section 21) and will be prevented from enforcing his or her claim."[68]

[94] The first flaw in the reasoning advanced for the finding that the building contract is not affected by the breach is that the prohibition is directed at the home builder and not the agreement. While this is true, it does not shed light on whether non-compliance nullifies the contract. Indeed, in Lupacchini the prohibition was directed at the trustee and not the act he or she performed. Yet, the Court held that the act was invalid owing to the trustee acting contrary to the prohibition.

[95] The second flaw in the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Appeal in the present case lies in the fact that it approached the matter on an unduly narrow footing. The Court erroneously confined itself to the prohibition in section 10(1)(b) and reasoned that this prohibition does no more than disentitle Cool Ideas from receiving consideration. In this regard, the Supreme Court of Appeal was mistaken. It is apparent from Ms Hubbard's plea, quoted in the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal, that she relied on the prohibitions in both section 10(1)(a) and (b).[69] The prohibition in section 10(1)(a) directly affects the contract because it prohibited Cool Ideas from undertaking to build a house for Ms Hubbard.

[96] It was this narrow approach that influenced the Supreme Court of Appeal to conclude that an unregistered home builder who claims consideration contrary to section 10 exposes himself or herself to criminal sanction and would be prevented from enforcing his or her rights. I find nothing in the text of section 10(1), or other sections of the Act, that indicates that the underlying contract should remain unaffected. It will be recalled that the present contract embodies the undertaking by Cool Ideas to build a home for Ms Hubbard. It was the same undertaking that constituted a contravention of section 10(1)(a) and amounted to a criminal offence in terms of section 21.

[97] As the main judgment observes, section 10 must be read as a whole. More importantly, section 10(1)(b) cannot be interpreted separately. It must be construed together with section 10(1)(a) because they are integral parts of one provision. They share features. Both lay down prohibitions which forbid unregistered home builders from performing certain acts. The key feature in both sections is the registration of a home builder.

[98] A contract concluded in contravention of the prohibition in section 10(1)(a) cannot be regarded as valid. The fact that the unregistered home builder may not enforce his or her rights is irrelevant. An illegal contract cannot confer rights on the home consumer privy to it. Allowing the home consumer to enforce his or her rights under such a contract would amount to giving legal effect to a prohibited act. In Pottie, Fagan JA pointed out that—

> "[t]he usual reason for holding a prohibited act to be invalid is not the inference of an intention on the part of the Legislature to impose a deterrent penalty for which it has not expressly provided, but the fact that recognition of the act by the Court will bring about, or give legal sanction to, the very situation which the Legislature wishes to prevent."[70]

[99] In our democratic order, it is the duty of courts to apply and enforce legislation like the Housing Protection Act.[71] If the validity of legislation is not impugned, there can be no justification for not enforcing it, let alone giving legal effect to prohibited conduct.

[70] Pottie v Kotze 1954 (3) SA 719 (A) at 726H-727A.

[71] Section 165(2) of the Constitution provides:

> "The courts are independent and subject only to the Constitution and the law, which they must apply impartially and without fear, favour or prejudice."

[100] In Taljaard,[72] the Supreme Court of Appeal held that a contract of mandate concluded with an estate agent who had no fidelity fund certificate was valid because section 34A of the Estate Agency Affairs Act[73] does not in terms invalidate the contract of mandate of an estate agent who acts in conflict with section 26 of that Act. Bearing in mind that section 34A was introduced in 1998 in response to the High Court judgment in Noragent which held that non-compliance with section 26 did not invalidate the contract of mandate,[74] the Supreme Court of Appeal in Taljaard held that, if the Legislature intended the contravention to invalidate the contract, it could expressly have said so in the amendment.

[101] The finding in Taljaard was based on two reasons. First, the provision itself does not invalidate the contract. Second, if invalidity were contemplated and in view of Noragent, the amendment would have expressly provided for that. In Taljaard, the Supreme Court of Appeal did not explain why that Court adopted an approach that was at variance with its earlier decisions. A court is bound to follow its earlier decisions unless it is convinced that they are clearly wrong. As illustrated earlier, that Court in 1926 laid down the principle that "a thing done contrary to the direct prohibition of the law is void and of no effect."[75] This principle was affirmed in later decisions of that Court in Pottie,[76] and recently in Lupacchini,[77] which was written by the same Judge who wrote Taljaard.

[102] The invalidity of an act performed contrary to a statutory provision does not flow from the express terms of the prohibition but from the fact that the impugned act was performed contrary to a prohibition in a statute. When the Legislature wants to put an end to a particular conduct, it prohibits it. As was observed in Pottie, a court cannot give legal sanction to an act prohibited by the Legislature. Therefore, in Taljaard, the Supreme Court of Appeal erred in holding that the contract of mandate concluded contrary to the prohibition in section 34A was valid. The principle that what is done in breach of a statutory prohibition is invalid may be departed from only if it is clear from the language of the relevant legislation that invalidity was not envisaged. It is not necessary for the prohibition to say non-compliance with it would lead to invalidity.[78]

[103] In Metro Western Cape, the Appellate Division reaffirmed the principle in these terms:

> "It is a principle of our law that a thing done contrary to the direct prohibition of the law is generally void and of no effect; the mere prohibition operates to nullify the act. . . . If therefore on a true construction of section 3 the contracts in question are rendered illegal, it can make no real difference in point of law what the other objects of the ordinance are. They are then void ab initio and a complete nullity under which neither party can acquire rights whether there is intention to break the law or not."[79]

[79] Metro Western Cape (Pty) Ltd v Ross 1986 (3) SA 181 (A) (Metro Western Cape) at 188A-B.

[104] Unlike in Metro Western Cape where the underlying contracts were regarded as valid because they did not regulate the business between the trader and his customer, here the building contract governed the prohibited business of a home builder. The prohibitions in section 10(1) are the tools chosen by the Legislature to protect housing consumers. To hold that the building contract is valid would seriously undermine this purpose. Furthermore, to hold the contract valid but enforceable only at the instance of the consumer would result in an injustice and unequal treatment of the parties. While Ms Hubbard may notionally enforce her rights under the contract, Cool Ideas may not. This may lead to the deprivation of property under section 25 of the Constitution, alluded to by Froneman J in his judgment. I can find nothing in the language of the Housing Protection Act that suggests this sort of injustice was intended.

[105] The principle that a thing done contrary to the direct prohibition of the law is void admits of one exception. This exception applies where it is clear from the language of the law in which the prohibition is contained that invalidity of the act performed contrary to the prohibition was not envisaged.[80] Consistent with this principle, the main judgment holds that section 13 of the Housing Protection Act reveals that non-compliance with the prohibition in section 10(1)(b) was not intended to invalidate the building agreement between the home builder and the housing consumer.[81]

[81] Main judgment at [48].

[106] I disagree. Section 13 does not address the consequences of acting contrary to the prohibitions in section 10(1). Instead, section 13 introduces implied terms into building contracts and prescribes the requirements of a valid building contract.[82] These requirements are set out in section 13(1). They are:

---

[82] Section 13(1) and (2) provides:

> "(1) A home builder shall ensure that the agreement concluded between the home builder and a housing consumer for the construction or sale of a home by that home builder—
>
> (a) shall be in writing and signed by the parties;
>

(a) the building contract must be in writing and signed by the parties;

(b) it must set out all material terms, including the financial obligations of the housing consumer; and

(c) the specifications pertaining to the material to be used in the construction and the plans approved by a local authority must be annexed to the contract.

[107] Importantly, section 13(3) tells us the consequences of not complying with these requirements. It provides:

> "The failure to comply with a provision of subsection (1)(a) and (c) shall not render an agreement referred to in that subsection invalid."

[108] This section makes it plain that non-compliance with requirements (a) and (c) does not invalidate the agreement. On the approach of the main judgment, section 13(3) is superfluous because the scheme of the Housing Protection Act indicates that non-compliance with the Act does not invalidate the building contract. An interpretation that says the contract is invalid owing to non-compliance would be at odds with the legislative scheme.[83]

(iii) repair roof leaks attributable to workmanship, design or materials occurring and notified to the home builder by the housing consumer within a period which shall be set out in the agreement and which shall not be less than 12 months as from the occupation date."

[83] Main judgment at [47].

[109] Notably, in saving the contract from invalidity, section 13(3) makes no reference to requirement (b). This suggests that a contract which does not set out all material terms, including the financial obligations of the consumer, is invalid. This is implicit from section 13(3) which deliberately excludes requirement (b). The express terms of section 13 are at odds with the legislative scheme determined by the main judgment. It is apparent from section 13 that the Housing Protection Act envisaged that non-compliance with some of its provisions would render the building contract invalid.

[110] The main judgment holds that the extract quoted in [72] does not support the assertion that Ms Hubbard pleaded both prohibitions in section 10(1) as the bases for contending that Cool Ideas was not entitled to claim payment from her. In the first place, that extract is taken from paragraph 6 of the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal which records expressly that the extract is taken from the affidavit of Ms Hubbard, filed in the High Court in opposing the arbitration award being made an order of court.

[111] Secondly, the plain reading of the extract shows that Ms Hubbard states that Cool Ideas was not registered as a home builder. And in the italicised words, she contends that the effect of non-registration was that Cool Ideas was not entitled to carry on the business of a home builder or to receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a person, defined as a housing consumer in terms of the Housing Protection Act. As a result of this, she concludes that Cool Ideas was not entitled to claim any payments from her. It is difficult to appreciate how it can be said that the extract does not rely on both prohibitions in section 10(1)(a) and (b) when Ms Hubbard's affidavit uses the words of section 10(1)(a) and (b). The fact that, in the affidavit filed by her in this Court, she says that she does not dispute the validity of the building contract is irrelevant.

[112] Even if what she says in her affidavit in this Court were to be treated as a concession, it would change nothing. This is because a concession wrongly made by one of the parties is not binding on a court, if it relates to a point of law.[84]

[113] Furthermore, the main judgment holds that the parties concluded a separate and new arbitration agreement on 3 April 2009.[85] I cannot agree. The question whether Cool Ideas and Ms Hubbard have concluded a separate agreement entails a factual enquiry. That has not been established. On the contrary, it is apparent from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal that in referring their disputes to arbitration, the parties acted in terms of clause 14 of the building agreement.

[114] The arbitration agreement was not self-standing. Instead, it was an integral part of the building contract. Clause 14.1 expressly says that disputes arising from the building agreement would be referred to arbitration. It does not say that the parties would enter into a further agreement but stipulates that disputes arising from the building agreement, during its currency and after its termination, would be referred to arbitration.

[115] Although the word "may" is used in the clause, it does not signify that the parties were not bound by the terms of the clause. As part of a contract intended to be binding, clause 14 obliged the parties to act in accordance with its terms. Once there were disputes which the parties could not resolve, clause 14 precluded them from approaching a court. Instead, the clause obliged them to take such disputes to arbitration. Acting in terms of the clause, Cool Ideas and Ms Hubbard referred their disputes to arbitration. That much is clear from the judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal.

[116] To facilitate arbitration, clause 14.2 obliged the parties to request that an arbitrator be appointed, not by them, but by the person identified in the clause. Clause 14.2 stipulates that the arbitrator would be appointed by the president of the Master Builders Association, where there is one, or by the president of the Building Industries Federation (SA). His or her decision would be final and binding on both parties. Therefore, there was absolutely no need to conclude a separate arbitration agreement.

[117] In the circumstances, I hold that the building contract that was concluded in contravention of section 10(1)(a) is invalid.

Effect of the invalid contract on the arbitration award

[118] The process of taking the dispute to arbitration was rooted in the building contract. When the parties appointed the arbitrator and submitted their disputes to him, they acted in terms of the arbitration clause in the contract. The arbitrator too derived his power to determine those disputes from the building contract. Therefore, the invalidity of that contract vitiates the entire arbitration process. Consequently, the arbitration award was invalid because it was made in terms of an invalid contract.

[119] It is not necessary to address the other submissions advanced by Cool Ideas because they were premised on the mistaken assumption that the building contract was valid.

[120] It is for these reasons that I support the order proposed in the main judgment.

FRONEMAN J (Cameron J, Dambuza AJ and Van der Westhuizen J concurring):

Introduction

[121] I have had the privilege of reading the judgments of my Colleagues Majiedt AJ (main judgment) and Jafta J (concurring judgment). I cannot agree with their conclusion that the appeal must be dismissed. I would allow the appeal.

[122] My central difference with the main judgment lies in the constitutional issue that needs to be determined. The main judgment reaches the constitutional aspect relating to the enforcement of private arbitration awards by courts only towards the end, and then only in the narrow form of whether a refusal to make the arbitral award an order of court violates section 34 of the Constitution.[86] It also finds equity considerations not to be applicable.[87]

[123] In Lufuno Mphaphuli, this Court held that section 34 does not apply directly to private arbitrations.[88] I thus agree with the main judgment that the applicant's right of access to courts has not been infringed.[89]

[124] But that is not all that Lufuno Mphaphuli decided. It also dealt with the relevance of the Constitution to the terms and enforcement of arbitration agreements.[90] It held that in determining whether a provision of an arbitration agreement is contrary to public policy the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights will be of importance,[91] and it emphasised the importance of fairness in the arbitration process.[92] Importantly too, Lufuno Mphaphuli dealt with the relevance of the Constitution to the judicial scrutiny of arbitration awards.[93] It held that "the values of our Constitution will not necessarily best be served by interpreting section 33 [of the Arbitration Act] in a manner that enhances the power of courts to set aside private arbitration awards".[94]

[125] When parties enter into private arbitration agreements they make value choices about how they want to exercise their rights under the Constitution[95] and the extent of interference or control they wish courts to have over the private process.[96] These choices are material and relevant in determining what public policy in the enforcement of a particular private arbitration award should be. The Arbitration Act also recognises these choices and accepts their legitimacy in seeking to give effect to arbitration awards.

[126] Public policy in the interpretation, application and enforcement of contracts embraces issues of fairness.[97] Fairness "is one of the core values of our constitutional order".[98] When the enforcement of arbitration awards on the basis of public policy is at stake, fairness lies at the heart of the enquiry, not at its periphery.

[127] The primary issue at stake is whether a private arbitration award may be enforced contrary to a statutory provision. The main judgment says, No, not in this case, and fairness plays little or no role in determining whether it may. I disagree.

[94] Id at para 235. Although the reference is to section 33 of the Arbitration Act 42 of 1965 it is clear that O'Regan ADCJ regarded with approval the "pleasing symmetry" of the same standards for refusing to make an award an order of court as for setting aside the award. See paras 227 and 232.

[98] Lufuno Mphaphuli above n 9 at para 221.

Lufuno Mphaphuli tells us that public policy in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights, fairness in the arbitration process, and the personal choices of the parties play a material and relevant part in determining the issue. When due weight is given to these considerations, nothing stands in the way of enforcement of the award here, even on an acceptance of the correctness of the main judgment's interpretation of the Housing Consumers Protection Measures Act[99] (Housing Protection Act or the Act).

[128] I am in any event not convinced that this interpretation is correct. The inevitable result of the reasoning of the main judgment is that Cool Ideas will be deprived of its right to payment for work fairly and properly done. That will amount to deprivation of property under section 25 of the Constitution. The provisions of the Housing Protection Act should be interpreted in a manner that avoids that result. It can properly and reasonably be interpreted in that way.

[129] The concurring judgment of Jafta J avoids engagement with the central issue of enforcement of a private arbitration award in the face of a statutory provision by finding that the building contract, which includes the arbitration clause, is invalid and can, for that reason, not be enforced at all. This nevertheless has the effect that a court can never enforce an arbitral award if that would be contrary to a statutory provision. For the reasons already summarised,[100] I do not agree. In addition, this was not the basis upon which the parties approached the Court. Had this approach been raised, the question of severability of the arbitration clause from the rest of the building contract would have been at the forefront of the enquiry.[101] To the extent, however, that the concurring judgment finds that to hold the building contact valid but enforceable only at the instance of the consumer would result in an injustice and unequal treatment of the parties,[102] I agree. Our disagreement is in what must be done to avoid that injustice and unequal treatment. I consider the injustice and unequal treatment to be a compelling reason for enforcing the arbitration award.

[130] In the first part of the reasoning that follows I accept, as a starting point, the correctness of the interpretation of the Housing Protection Act in the main judgment. The next step in determining whether enforcement will be against public policy, is to weigh that interpretation against the parties' choice of private arbitration and the fairness to them individually in its effect. Viewed from this perspective public policy is not undermined by the enforcement of the arbitration award. For convenience I refer to this part as the arbitration approach.

[131] In the second part I assess whether section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act should not, in any event, be interpreted in a manner that is less restrictive of Cool Ideas' right to property.[103] That can, I hope to demonstrate, properly and reasonably be done. I will refer to this part as the interpretation approach.

[101] Compare Lufuno Mphaphuli above n 9 at para 220 and North East Finance (Pty) Ltd v Standard Bank of South Africa [2013] ZASCA 76; 2013 (5) SA 1 (SCA) at paras 18-23.

[103] Section 25 of the Constitution.

[132] Would the outcome, on either perspective, deprive Ms Hubbard of any of the protections that she should enjoy under the Housing Protection Act? The answer is No.

[133] It is time to substantiate these assertions. I will do so in the following order. First some brief reference to the facts needs to be made in order to give proper context to the question of fairness between the parties and the potential prejudice to Ms Hubbard if the arbitration award is enforced. I will then move to the discussion of the arbitration approach and the interpretation approach before concluding.

Fairness or prejudice to Ms Hubbard?

[134] When building started on Ms Hubbard's home it was being done by a registered builder, Velvori. The only reason why Cool Ideas did not itself register earlier was because it understood from a letter by the National Home Builders Registration Council (Council) that it was not necessary to do so. Ms Hubbard herself invoked the arbitration clause in the building contract and thereby triggered the arbitration proceedings. She did so in order to claim money back from Cool Ideas. Instead, the arbitrator found that she actually owed Cool Ideas more money. The award of the arbitrator amounted to an award for Cool Ideas to be reimbursed for the balance of the contract price, for items it had bought for Ms Hubbard. She does not allege that the arbitration process was unfair, nor does she allege that the actual findings of the arbitrator in relation to the building disputes were unfair or wrong. When she learnt that Cool Ideas had not registered as a home builder, she sought to avoid payment of what she owed. Registration occurred before judgment was granted in the High Court. What Ms Hubbard sought in those proceedings was not the Act's protection to attain proper building or correction of building works by Cool Ideas, but to escape payment of what she had been fairly found to owe to Cool Ideas.

The arbitration approach

[135] Lufuno Mphaphuli was the first and, until now, the only case where this Court has dealt with the Constitution's applicability to private arbitrations. The judgment expressly endorsed "the value of arbitration as a speedy and cost-effective process".[104] It saw its task as follows:

> "The Court has had to consider the relationship between private arbitration and the Constitution, the proper scope of section 34 of the Constitution and the approach to the interpretation of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act in the light of the Constitution. All these are constitutional matters of substance falling within the jurisdiction of this Court and which, given the need to provide guidance in this regard, it is in the interests of justice for this Court to entertain. The application of these principles to the facts of this case, even if arguably not concerning a constitutional issue itself, concerns a matter connected to a decision on a constitutional issue which it is in the interests of justice to decide."[105]

[136] The Court further enumerated the virtues of private arbitration in its flexibility, cost-effectiveness, privacy and speed. In determining the proper constitutional approach to the arbitration process, the Court bore in mind that litigation before ordinary courts "can be a rigid, costly and time-consuming process".[106] This led it to conclude that "it is not inconsistent with our constitutional values to permit parties to seek a quicker and cheaper mechanism for the resolution of disputes."[107] It also found, generally, that "courts should be careful not to undermine the achievement of the goals of private arbitration by enlarging their powers of scrutiny imprudently."[108]

[137] In this judgment, I accept the logical and necessary corollary of the approach in Lufuno Mphaphuli. I hold that where parties choose private arbitration as the means of resolving disputes between them, courts should respect and encourage that choice. In practical terms, here, that means that the Court should, for powerful reasons of fairness, license and enforce the outcome of Ms Hubbard's private arbitration with Cool Ideas.

[138] In Lufuno Mphaphuli the Court viewed its discussion and application of the principles regulating the interaction between the Constitution and private arbitration awards as properly within its jurisdictional remit. Due regard must be given to the precedential force of the decision. It is for this reason that I disagree with the finding in the main judgment that the issues in Lufuno Mphaphuli have little bearing on the central issue in this case and that it is distinguishable on the facts and the law.[109]

[106] Id at para 197.

[107] Id.

[108] Id at para 235.

[109] See [58]-[59] of the main judgment.

[139] Lufuno Mphaphuli laid down the following principles about the applicability of the Constitution to private arbitration awards:

(a) Section 34 of the Constitution[110] does not apply directly to private arbitrations, primarily because they do not require public hearings.[111]

(b) Indirect application of section 34 was not finally considered but it was stated that "mindful of the role courts have in giving effect to arbitration agreements . . . section 34 may have some relevance to the interpretation of legislation or the development of the common law."[112]

(c) Arbitration agreements that contain provisions that are contrary to public policy in the light of the values of the Constitution will be null and void to that extent. In determining whether a provision is contra bonos mores, the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights will be of importance.[113]

(d) In interpreting an arbitration agreement it should ordinarily be accepted that when parties submit to arbitration, they submit to a process they intend to be fair. The arbitration agreement "should thus be interpreted, unless its terms expressly suggest otherwise, on the basis that the parties intended the arbitration proceedings to be conducted fairly. Indeed, it

[110] Section 34 of the Constitution provides:

> "Everyone has the right to have any dispute that can be resolved by the application of law decided in a fair public hearing before a court or, where appropriate, another independent and impartial tribunal or forum."

[111] Lufuno Mphaphuli above n 9 at paras 213-4 and 216-8.

[112] Id at para 215.

[113] Id at para 220.

may well be that an arbitration agreement that provides expressly for a procedure that is unfair will be contra bonos mores."[114]

(e) Insofar as the interpretation of section 33(1) of the Arbitration Act, which permits an arbitration award to be set aside, is concerned—

> "the values of our Constitution will not necessarily best be served by interpreting section 33(1) in a manner that enhances the power of courts to set aside private arbitration awards. Indeed, the contrary seems to be the case. The international and comparative law considered in this judgment suggests that courts should be careful not to undermine the achievement of the goals of private arbitration by enlarging their powers of scrutiny imprudently. Section 33(1) provides three grounds for setting aside an arbitration award: misconduct by an arbitrator; gross irregularity in the conduct of the proceedings; and the fact that an award has been improperly obtained. In my view . . . the Constitution would require a court to construe these grounds reasonably strictly in relation to private arbitration."[115]

[140] The majority judgment of the Supreme Court of Appeal[116] and the main judgment proceed from the basis that the building contract and the arbitration agreement between the parties are valid, but that Cool Ideas may nevertheless not claim or enforce payment for any work done, be it in any ordinary court or by way of arbitration. That result is, on any standard, prejudicial and unfair to Cool Ideas.

[115] Id at para 235.

[116] Supreme Court of Appeal judgment above n 10. The judgment is based on an acceptance of the validity of the building contract, which includes an arbitration clause. It expressly rejected as irrelevant arguments presented to it relying on the equities of the case and that due deference should be given to arbitration awards.

[141] From Lufuno Mphaphuli we know that the determination of public policy in deciding whether an arbitration award should be enforced should be done in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. We also know that it requires courts to ensure fairness in the arbitration process, and that the personal choices of the parties in opting for arbitration must be given proper regard.

[142] The loss of the right to claim performance under the contract amounts, in terms of this Court's decision in Opperman, to the deprivation of property under section 25 of the Constitution.[117] If the building contract was held to be invalid, Cool Ideas may, in terms of the common law, have an enrichment claim: the condictio ob turpem vel iniustam causam (enrichment arising from a transfer made for an illegal or immoral purpose).[118] By clothing the contract with validity, this result is avoided, but at some cost.[119] Even if one accepts, as the main judgment does, that the deprivation is not arbitrary in terms of statutory and constitutional interpretation,[120] it does not mean that this consideration automatically determines the issue as far as the enforcement of the arbitration award is concerned. The choice of arbitration as a dispute-resolution mechanism indicates the contrary, namely that the parties elected to protect their respective rights to property under the Constitution through that process. If one determines public policy in accordance with the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights then the potential deprivation of Cool Ideas' property must count as a reason for not finding the enforcement of the award to be contrary to public policy, rather than the opposite.

[119] I was unable to find any case where an admittedly valid private contract or agreement (in terms of the applicable legislation) was found to be unenforceable by reason of the effect of the same legislation. The application of the principle in Wynberg above n 48 has been largely in the field of public law. See The Master of the High Court (North Gauteng High Court, Pretoria) v Motala NO and Others [2011] ZASCA 238; 2012 (3) SA 325 (SCA) at para 9; City of Tshwane Metropolitan Municipality v RPM Bricks (Pty) Ltd [2007] ZASCA 28; 2008 (3) SA 1 (SCA) at paras 22-3; and Potchefstroom se Stadsraad v Kotze 1960 (3) SA 616 (A) at 632G. [120] See [148]-[168] below on the approach to interpretation.

[143] On the premise that fairness plays no role in determining public policy when deciding whether private arbitration awards should be enforced by courts, both the majority judgment in the Supreme Court of Appeal and the main judgment fail to give further consideration to other factors that may be material and relevant when stricter control of private arbitration awards is envisaged. To reiterate: public policy in the interpretation, application and enforcement of contracts generally invokes the notion of fairness.[121] The fairness of the terms of an arbitration agreement is an important factor in considering their enforcement.[122]

[144] Material and relevant factors in this regard include that: the parties chose private arbitration instead of civil proceedings; Ms Hubbard initiated arbitration proceedings; the building was done by Velvori, which was registered from the start as a builder; the arbitration process was fair and not challenged as making wrong or unfair findings; the amount ordered by the arbitration award, payable to Cool Ideas, mainly related to compensation for additional personal choice items ordered by

Ms Hubbard which were not included in the original contract price; Cool Ideas acted in good faith at all times by enquiring whether it should register; it did register before judgment when told it was necessary; and last, but not least, Ms Hubbard, not Cool Ideas, is the recalcitrant debtor.

[145] It must also be remembered that one of the arguments for the interpretation that the Housing Protection Act did not render the building contract and the arbitration agreement invalid was to ensure that the warranties in section 13(2) of the Act would not be lost to a building consumer. On the facts here, enforcement of the arbitration award would not have deprived Ms Hubbard of that protection. In addition, the threat of criminal prosecution for late registration still hangs over Cool Ideas. Enforcement of the arbitration award will not, on an acceptance of the main judgment's interpretation of the Housing Protection Act, undermine the protection afforded by the Act to building consumers and the criminal sanction for non-compliance will remain. The only effect non-enforcement will have is to allow Ms Hubbard to escape payment of what has been fairly found to be owed to Cool Ideas. That is an impermissible use of the provisions of the Act.[123]

[146] The conclusion I reach is that there was no unfairness in the arbitration process, nor in its outcome. There is nothing substantive, in the sense of prejudice to Ms Hubbard, that would justify a court in finding that public policy should override the personal choice made by the parties to enforce their agreement by way of private arbitration.

[147] This is sufficient reason for the appeal to succeed. But even if this approach is not accepted, there is another basis for the same outcome.

Interpretation approach

[148] As noted, the loss of the right to claim performance under the contract may amount, in terms of this Court's decision in Opperman, to the deprivation of property under section 25 of the Constitution.[124] But that deprivation, says the main judgment, is not arbitrary. Section 10(1)(b) of the Housing Protection Act is aimed at achieving a legitimate and important statutory purpose and there is a rational, proportional connection between the statutory prohibition and its purpose.[125] I disagree.

[149] An interpretation that the building contract is valid, but that its enforcement by one of the parties, Cool Ideas, is not, deprives that party of any redress at all for the work it has done. Under the common law it may have a claim for enrichment if the building contract was declared invalid for illegality.[126] Counsel for Ms Hubbard sought to ameliorate this unjust and unequal result by suggesting that the common law could be developed to allow an enrichment claim, but fairly and properly conceded that as the law now stands there is none available to Cool Ideas.

[150] There are good reasons why it is necessary to favour an approach that may be less intrusive on Cool Ideas' rights. The first is that we are concerned with the fairness of depriving Cool Ideas of the power to enforce an arbitration award that has not been attacked as being a result of an unfair process or any substantively unfair findings. Second, and perhaps more important, is the accepted principle that the interpretation that best protects or enhances a fundamental right should, where reasonably possible, be preferred.[127] Is that kind of interpretation of the provisions of the Housing Protection Act reasonably possible? The answer is Yes.

[151] There can be no doubt that the Housing Protection Act is intended to protect housing consumers. As pointed out in the main judgment, it employs various measures to do so. But what, in the end, is the performance it seeks to enable housing consumers to obtain? The best answer to that is to be found in the warranties that the Act seeks to be enforceable by the housing consumer against the home builder in terms of section 13(2):

> "The agreement between a home builder and a housing consumer for the construction or sale of a home shall be deemed to include warranties enforceable by the housing consumer against the home builder in any court, that—

(aa) the NHBRC Technical Requirements to the extent applicable to the home at the date of enrolment of the home with the Council; and

(bb) the terms, plans and specifications of the agreement concluded with the housing consumer as contemplated in subsection (1);

(b) the home builder shall—

(i) subject to the limitations and exclusions that may be prescribed by the Minister, at the cost of the home builder and upon demand by the housing consumer, rectify major structural defects in the home caused by the non-compliance with the NHBRC Technical Requirements and occurring within a period which shall be set out in the agreement and which shall not be less than five years as from the occupation date, and notified to the home builder by the housing consumer within that period;

(ii) rectify non-compliance with or deviation from the terms, plans and specifications of the agreement or any deficiency related to design, workmanship or material notified to the home builder by the housing consumer within a period which shall be set out in the agreement and which shall not be less than three months as from the occupation date; and

[152] The registration of home builders – either those having the capacity to build or those who need to enter into agreements with other home builders to do so[128] – and the various other requirements laid down in the Act are all geared to ensure the enforcement of proper performance in the building of their houses by housing consumers against home builders. That is the substantive, overall purpose of the Act.

[153] There are many ways of achieving this purpose, and of striking the correct balance between the interests of housing consumers and those who have performed construction work for them. The Housing Protection Act can be read to protect consumers without barring Cool Ideas' claim for its performance.

[154] The starting point is that section 10(1)(a) and 10(2), read with section 21, indubitably make it a criminal offence for a home builder to have constructed a home while unregistered. This provides home builders with a very strong incentive, backed by the criminal law, to register before undertaking any building work.

[155] The central conundrum in this case arises from the finding that the contract (including the arbitration agreement) is valid. How can it be that Cool Ideas' contract with Ms Hubbard is valid, but its claim is unenforceable?[129] Could it be that section 10(1)(b) has a specific and narrow purpose only? That it was the Legislature's targeted intervention to render unenforceable certain of the contract's terms?

[156] Here, the presence of the other two very broadly defined prohibitions in section 10(1)(a) and 10(2) is significant. They do not make the contract invalid. Hence this third prohibition in section 10(1)(b) was necessary. The provisions read:

[129] Where it is not a gambling contract or other agreement offensive to public policy.

> "(1) No person shall—
>
> (a) carry on the business of a home builder; or
>
> (b) receive any consideration in terms of any agreement with a housing consumer in respect of the sale or construction of a home,
>
> unless that person is a registered home builder.
> (2) No home builder shall construct a home unless that home builder is a registered home builder."

[157] So seen, the prohibition in section 10(1)(b) should be understood in its own, narrowly expressed terms, rather than broadened by analogy with the two prohibitions flanking it. We should not, in other words, conclude that section 10(1)(b) embodies a similar, sweeping prohibition to section 10(1)(a) and 10(2). It is doing something separate, and narrower.

[158] Arising from this, an approach to the provision becomes possible in which it is clear that, while the first and the third prohibitions are absolute in relation to the activities proscribed (carrying on the business of a home builder and construction of homes), the prohibition on receiving consideration applies only at the time of receipt. In other words, you have to be registered to receive consideration, but you can register late.

[159] Weighing in favour of permitting late registration is, first, the simple fact that section 10(1)(b) uses the word "receive". And it does not interpose any qualification to the registration requirement. For example, it does not say "unless the person is a registered home builder at the time of undertaking the construction". Here it differs from the provisions of the Attorneys Act[130] and the Estate Agency Affairs Act,[131] which require possession of a fidelity fund certificate at the time of practising, for attorneys, and at the time of performance, for estate agents, to claim payment.

[160] Also in favour of this approach is the entire registration system the Housing Protection Act constructs. The Act gives the Minister the usual general power to make regulations.[132] But, in addition, section 7(2)(b) specifically obliges the Minister to prescribe by regulation "the terms and conditions for the registration and renewal of registration of home builders". Indeed, section 10(4) states that registration of a home builder "shall be subject to the terms and conditions prescribed by the Minister under section 7(2)".

[161] These provisions give particular point to the detail of the General Regulations.[133] Together with other provisions of the Act, they create a powerful supervisory body that is not only nominally present, but actively supervises the activities of home builders,[134] and actively protects housing consumers through implied warranties[135] and enrolment of housing projects.[136]

[136] Sections 14 and 14A.

[162] The Act itself says that the Council must register only home builders with the "appropriate financial, technical, construction and management capacity . . . to prevent housing consumers . . . from being exposed to unacceptable risks."[137] Closely allied to this, the Council can also impose conditions on registration and require a suretyship, guarantee, indemnity or other security in order to satisfy itself that consumers are adequately protected.[138] And the General Regulations set out more detailed conditions that the Council may impose before registering a home builder.[139]

[163] This expressly authorised system is fully consonant with the idea that late registration for the purposes of affording statutory sanction to receipt of consideration from a home-construction contract is feasible.

[164] On this approach, the Council, powerfully vested with authority under the legislation, will vet fly-by-night builders, denying them registration – but will permit good-faith builders like Cool Ideas, which omitted to register itself, but acted largely, if not exclusively, through a subcontractor that was registered.

[165] The upshot is that only carefully vetted builders with the necessary expertise and capacity to meet their financial obligations will ever be able to receive payment. Housing consumers are thus adequately protected.

[137] Section 10(3)(c).

[138] Section 10(4) and (5).

[139] See Item 11of the General Regulations above n 133.

[166] Can it be that a home builder, despite its skill and good faith, is deprived of any claim for payment, no matter how enormous its outlay, in perpetuity – without any way to remedy the mistake, even if it is carefully vetted and registered, subject to a range of conditions and suretyships imposed by the Council to ensure that its customers are adequately protected? Surely not.

[167] It is thus reasonable to interpret the provisions of the Housing Protection Act in a manner that is fair, does not deprive Cool Ideas of its property and does not necessitate the enhancement of the power of courts to interfere in private arbitration awards. Will this construction be detrimental to Ms Hubbard? That question has already been answered.[140] It will not, because she has enjoyed all the substantive protections under the Act.

[168] This interpretation is in accordance with existing authority. The broad formulation in Schierhout[141] that a thing done contrary to a statutory prohibition is always a nullity, has been qualified and flexibly applied in many later cases.[142] An illustration of the flexibility is to be found in Pottie.[143] There, as here, the conclusion of a contract in contravention of statutory requirements was criminalised without an express provision that the contract itself was invalid. In holding that this did not render the contract invalid Fagan JA stated:

> "The usual reason for holding a prohibited act to be invalid is not the inference of an intention on the part of the Legislature to impose a deterrent penalty for which it has not expressly provided, but the fact that recognition of the act by the Court will bring about, or give legal sanction to, the very situation which the Legislature wishes to prevent." [144]

And in relation to rendering contracts invalid as a further penalty:

> "A further compulsory penalty of invalidity would . . . have capricious effects the severity of which might be out of all proportion to that of the prescribed penalties, it would bring about inequitable results as between the parties concerned and it would upset transactions which, if . . . enforced . . . the Legislature could have had no reason to view with disfavour. To say that we are compelled to imply such consequences . . . seems to me to make us the slaves of maxims of interpretation which should serve as guides and not be allowed to tyrannise over us as masters." [145]

If this is good law in relation to the possibility of holding agreements valid in the face of statutory prohibition and criminal sanction, so much more it is for holding valid the enforcement of a valid arbitration agreement.[146]

[145] Id at 727E-G.

[146] This reasoning also finds support in jurisprudence from other countries that have dealt with similar issues. In Loving & Evans v Black 204 P.2d 23 (Cal 1949), a case involving almost identical facts, the California Supreme Court refused to enforce an arbitration award that was based on a contract between a homeowner and an unlicensed building contractor. The dissenting judge's criticism of the majority holding (at 30) was as persuasive then as it is now:

> "The majority opinion has attempted to resolve the problem as though it might involve an unlawful contract or a contract contrary to public morals and therefore void. It may be assumed that a law declaring such contracts illegal may not be circumvented by submitting controversies thereunder to arbitration and obtaining court confirmation. But the contract here is not of that nature. There is nothing basically unlawful or contrary to public morals in a contract to construct or repair a building. . . . The statute does not declare such a contract to be unlawful. The declaration of unlawfulness is confined to engaging in the business or acting in the capacity of a building contractor without having secured a license. A person pursuing the activities of a building contractor without the required license is guilty of a misdemeanour. And such person may not maintain an action in any court of the state for the collection of compensation for building contractor services. These are the [only] consequences attached to violation." Family law and Persons – Marriage – Alteration of gender of spouse in civil marriage – Difficulties experienced by transgendered persons in marriages solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961, in obtaining the recordal by the Department of Home Affairs of their sex/gender change, as provided for under the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 – Department of Home Affairs wrong in maintaining that applications by the transgender spouses under the Alteration Act could not be granted while their marriages remained registered as having been solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act.

Editor's Summary

The first to sixth applicants were three married couples whose marriages were solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961. The first, third and fifth applicants were transgender spouses in each of the marriages, having been born biologically male but undergone surgical and/or medical treatment to alter their sexual characteristics to female after they married. The latter step was taken because they experienced gender dysphoria in that that they were aware of being female trapped in a male body. The difficulties which transgendered persons in marriages solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961 were experiencing in obtaining the recordal by the Department of Home Affairs of their sex/gender change, as provided for under the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 ("the Alteration Act") led to the present litigation.

The transgender spouses applied in terms of section 2(1) of the Alteration Act for the alteration of their sex descriptions on their respective birth registers. None of the parties to the marriages considered the fact that the registration of the altered sex status of the transgender parties would result in the public records showing that their marriages had become same-sex marriages to be relevant to their marriage status. However, the Department of Home Affairs maintained that the applications by the transgender spouses under the Alteration Act could not be granted while their marriages remained registered as having been solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act.

The primary relief sought by the applicants included various types of declaratory relief affirming the subsistence of their marriages; declaring that the second respondent was required by law to alter a person's sex description in terms of the Alteration Act irrespective of that person's marital status; and declaring that the Department's refusal to process the applications of the first and third applicants in terms of Alteration Act because they were married in terms of the Marriage Act was unconstitutional and unlawful, and that its deregistration of the marriage between the fifth and sixth applicants was also unlawful and unconstitutional. They also sought interdicts directing the second respondent to grant the applications by the first and third applicants under the Alteration Act and to correct the population register to reflect that the fifth and sixth applicant were married to each other.

As secondary relief, sought in the alternative to the primary relief, and contingently upon the court upholding the Department's understanding of the statutory scheme, the applicants sought a declaration that the Alteration Act and/or the Marriage Act and/or the Civil Union Act 17 of 2006 were inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that any or all of them fail to allow the alteration of a person's sex description and sex status while that person was in a marriage that was solemnised under the Marriage Act.

Held – The Alteration Act makes provision for the formal acknowledgment, recordal and legal consequences of such transitions. It allows for the alteration, upon application to the Director-General of the Department of Home Affairs (cited as the second respondent in these proceedings), of a person's sex description on the birth register and the provision to the person concerned of an altered birth certificate. It also provides that a person whose sex description has been altered is deemed for all purposes to be a person of the sex description so altered as from the date of the recording of such alteration. The legal consequences of the recognition of a sex/gender-change in terms of the Alteration Act are therefore wholly prospective from the date of the recordal, and the Act does not have any retrospective effect.

Marriage brings about mutual rights and obligations that have been recognised to be contractual in legal character, albeit sui generis and entailing public law consequences. The effect of section 3(3) of the Alteration Act is that the recordal of a postnuptial sex/gender change in respect of either or both the spouses has no effect on their mutual marital rights and obligations. The formal recording of a person's gender or sex description is a matter of material legal and practical significance, impacting on the population register and the person's identity card.

The respondents did not identify a single provision in any of the legislation to which they referred that expressly forbade the processing and positive determination of the transgender spouses' applications under the Alteration Act. Also strikingly absent from the respondents' arguments was any acknowledgment of the expressly enshrined constitutional principle that statutes must be interpreted in a manner consistent with the promotion of the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights. They did concede that there is nothing in the Alteration Act itself that expressly or impliedly indicates that the applicant's marital status has any bearing on the ability or entitlement of a person who has transitioned to obtain administrative relief under the provisions of the statute. The Alteration Act did not contain anything to support the respondents' interpretation of the statutory framework. The problem with the implementation of the Alteration Act that the respondents sought to identify seemed to arise from their understanding of the Marriage Act and the Civil Union Act. The notion propounded by the respondents was that there was scope for a conversion from one type of duly solemnised marriage to another in the case of transgender persons. The Court found that to be based on a false premise. Both the Marriage Act and the Civil Union Act treat marriage as a union of two persons, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others. There is thus no parallel system of civil marriage, as contended by the respondents – only a parallel system for the solemnisation of marriages.

The applicants were held to be entitled in the circumstances to the primary relief for which they applied.

It was declared that the Department of Home Affairs' dealing with the applications by the first, third and fifth applicants under the Alteration Act was inconsistent with the Constitution and unlawful in that it infringed the said applicants' rights to administrative justice, and to equality and human dignity. It was also was inconsistent with the State's obligations in terms of section 7(2) of the Constitution. It was further declared that the second respondent was authorised and obliged to determine applications submitted in terms of the Alteration Act by any person whose sexual characteristics had been altered by surgical or medical treatment or by evolvement through natural development resulting in gender reassignment, or any person who is intersexed, for the alteration of the sex description on such person's birth register irrespective of the person's marital status and, in particular, irrespective of whether that person's marriage or civil partnership was solemnised under the Marriage Act or the Civil Union Act.

BINNS-WARD J:

Introduction

b [1] This case came to court because of the difficulties transgendered persons in marriages that were solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act 25 of 1961 are experiencing in obtaining the recordal by the Department of Home Affairs of their sex/gender change, as provided for under the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 ("the Alteration Act").

c [2] The first to sixth applicants are three married couples. Their marriages were duly solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act. The first, third and fifth applicants (to whom I shall refer individually as "KOS", "GNC", and "WJV", respectively,[1] or collectively as "the transgender spouses") were registered at birth as males. That happened because they were born d as biologically male. The second, fourth and sixth applicants, with whom KOS, GNC and WJV are respectively wed, are female. After they had married, each of the transgender spouses underwent surgical and/or medical treatment to alter their sexual characteristics[2] from those of a male to those of a female. They did this because from an early age they had

1 At the commencement of the hearing in open court I made an order, as sought in terms of para [20] of the notice of motion:

f "Permitting the Applicants to:

1. Use the First to Sixth Applicants' initials instead of their full names on all court documents filed that will be available to the public.
2. File and provide to the respondents a confidential affidavit that contains the First to Sixth Applicants' full names and unredacted versions of the annexures . . . that will not be made publically available."

The respondents did not oppose the making of the order. I granted it because I g considered that it would be just and equitable in the circumstances. It serves to protect the affected applicants' rights to human dignity and privacy, whilst not unduly limiting the operation of the freedom of expression rights under s 16 of the Bill of Rights. However, it was inappropriate for the applicants to have moved for the relief only when the application was called in open court. The public is entitled to uncensored access to any documents filed at court in pending litigious matters unless a court for good reason directs otherwise; see Cape Town City v South African National Roads Authority and others h 2015 (3) SA 386 (SCA), [2015] ZASCA 58 [also reported at [2015] 2 All SA 517 (SCA) – Ed]. I consider that in the circumstances the applicants should have applied ex parte in preliminary proceedings, possibly through the chamber book, for permission to file redacted papers upon the institution of the current application. It would have been appropriate to grant them such relief, subject to the right of any third party which considered itself prejudiced thereby to approach the court, on notice to the applicants, i for the amendment or rescission of the order.

2 The term "sexual characteristics" is taken from the Alteration Act, in which it is defined as meaning "primary or secondary sexual characteristics or gender characteristics". According to the Act's definition provisions "Primary sexual characteristics" denotes "the form of the genitalia at birth"; "secondary sexual characteristics" means "those which develop throughout life and which are dependant (sic) upon the hormonal base of the individual person" and "gender characteristics" are "the ways in which a person expresses his or her social identity as a member of a particular sex by j using style of dressing, the wearing of prostheses or other means".

experienced tormenting gender dysphoria.[3] Their self-awareness was that of being female trapped in a male body. Transitioning[4] was the means to liberate them from their gender dysphoria and express their self identification.[5]

[3] The Alteration Act makes provision for the formal acknowledgment, recordal and legal consequences of such transitions. It allows for the alteration, upon application to the Director-General of the Department of Home Affairs (who has been cited as the second respondent in these proceedings), of a person's sex description on the birth register and the provision to the person concerned of an altered birth certificate.[6] It also provides that a person whose sex description has been altered is deemed for all purposes to be a person of the sex description so altered "as from the date of the recording of such alteration".[7] Section 3(3) provides that rights and obligations that have accrued to or been acquired by such a person before the alteration of his or her sex description are not adversely affected by the alteration. The legal consequences of the recognition of a sex/gender-change in terms of the Alteration Act are therefore wholly prospective from the date of the recordal; the Act does not have any retrospective effect.

[4] By virtue of its foundation in the agreement between the intending spouses to enter into it, marriage brings about mutual rights and obligations that have been recognised to be contractual in legal character, albeit sui generis and entailing public law consequences.[8] The effect of section 3(3) of the Alteration Act is that the recordal of a postnuptial sex/gender change in respect of either or both the spouses has no effect on their mutual marital rights and obligations. Those endure as long as the

3 Dysphoria is a term used in psychiatry. It is defined in the Concise Oxford English Dictionary (10ed) (revised) (2002), as "Psychiatry a state of unease or general dissatisfaction".

4 To "transition" in the relevant context means to "adopt permanently the outward or physical characteristics of the gender one identifies with, as opposed to those associated with one's birth sex". See the Oxford Dictionary of English (Online version 2.2.1, Copyright © 2005–2016 Apple Inc.).

5 In National Legal Services Authority v Union of India and others AIR 2014 SC 1863, at para [76], the Supreme Court of India (per KS Radhakrishnan J) acknowledged that "Gender identity . . . forms the core of one's personal self, based on self identification, not on surgical or medical procedure". In Bellinger v Bellinger [2003] 2 All ER 593 (HL), [2003] UKHL 21, [2003] 2 AC 467 at para [5], Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead, describing various "indicia of human sex or gender", identified "self-perception" as one of them, and remarked "Some medical research has suggested that this factor is not exclusively psychological. Rather, it is associated with biological differentiation within the brain. The research has been very limited, and in the present state of neuroscience the existence of such an association remains speculative".

7 S 3(2) of the Alteration Act.

8 See the discussion in June D Sinclair (assisted by Jacqueline Heaton), The Law of Marriage, (Juta, 1996) Vol 1, at pp 311–312; and the description in the Equality Project judgment, at para [63], of marriage under the common law, before its recent development, as constituting "a highly personal and private contract between a man and a woman in which the parties undertake to live together, and to support one another. Yet the words 'I do' bring the most intense private and voluntary commitment into the most public, law-governed and State-regulated domain".

marriage does. It also has no effect on the transgendered person's rights against, and obligations to third parties.

[5] The effect of an alteration of the record of a person's gender or sex description on their birth register pursuant to the grant of an application in terms of the Alteration Act is that his or her sex descriptor is also altered on the population register. This follows in terms of the provisions of section 5 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 51 of 1992.[9] The population register is compiled and maintained by the Department of Home Affairs in terms of the Identification Act 68 of 1997.

[6] In terms of section 8 of the Identification Act, the population register must record a comprehensive range of information concerning each and every South African citizen and permanent resident. The information to be recorded includes particulars of such persons' names, dates of birth, gender[10] and identity numbers. It also includes the particulars (if applicable) of each such person's marriage contained in the relevant marriage register or other documents relating to the contracting of the marriage, "and such other particulars concerning his or her marital status as may be furnished to the director-general".[11]

[7] The identity number that is allocated to every person on the population register comprises a set of figures. In addition to a serial, index and control number, it consists of a reproduction, in figure codes, of (a) his or her date of birth, (b) gender; and (c) South African citizenship status.[12] It does not reflect the person's marital status.

9 S 5 provides insofar as relevant:

"(1) The Director-General shall be the custodian of all –

(a) documents relating to births and deaths required to be furnished under this Act or any other law; and

(b) . . .

(2) Particulars obtained from the documents referred to in subsection (1)(a) shall be included in the population register and such inclusion is the registration of the births and deaths concerned."

10 The word "gender" is used in the Identification Act to the same effect as the expression "sex description" is in the Alteration Act. Sex/gender classification in terms of the Identification Act currently operates on a binary model. Everyone is either male or female. Thamar Klein points out that, by contrast:

> "Australia, India, Nepal, New Zealand, and Pakistan, for example, all offer an additional legal sex/gender identification option, besides those of female and male, to citizens who identify themselves as otherwise. Australia and New Zealand offer 'X' besides 'M' and 'F' as sex/gender identification on passports, India has included 'transgender' in the government citizen ID number system, and Pakistan uses the term 'unix' on the national identity cards of transgendered individuals, whereas Nepal has incorporated the category 'other' for official identity documents. In all cases, intersexed as well as gender-variant people may apply for these options." (T Klein, "Who Decides Whose Gender? Medico-legal classifications of sex and gender and their impact on transgendered South Africans' family rights", (2012) 14(2) Ethnoscripts 12-34 (Universität Hamburg), at pp 22–23.)

While judgment in this matter was in the course of preparation it was announced in the news media that Canada also intends issuing "X"-designated gender neutral passports and other identity documents to citizens who identify as being neither male nor female.

11 S 8(e) of the Identification Act.

12 S 7 of the Identification Act.

[8] The alteration of a person's sex description in terms of the Alteration Act also has other knock-on consequences. Every person on the population register over the age of 16 is required to have an identity card (commonly called an "ID book"). If for any reason the card does not correctly reflect the holder's particulars, he or she must apply for a replacement identity card.[13] It follows that anyone who has transitioned is obliged to apply for a new identity document, which necessarily will reflect a reassigned identity number incorporating an altered gender-related figure code. In order to be able to comply with that statutory obligation, he or she would be required first to obtain a formal recordal of the change in terms of the Alteration Act. Making application under the Alteration Act in such cases will therefore be a matter of obligation, rather than one of choice.

[9] There must be a "recent photograph" on the population register of every person over the age of 16. The photograph must be provided or replaced every time such person applies for an identity card or a replacement identity card.[14] The identity card will therefore also include a photograph of the holder; in most cases reflecting the person's appearance as recognisably male or female. Section 17(1) of the Identification Act provides: "An authorised officer as defined in subsection (3) may at any time request any person reasonably presumed to have attained the age of 16 years to prove his or her identity to that officer by the production of his or her identity card as defined in subsection (4)". If anyone is called upon by an "authorised officer"[15] to prove who he or she is, they are required to produce an "identity card". A driver's licence or a passport, being documents "issued by the State and on which the name and a photograph of the holder appear", would serve as an identity card for the purposes of proving one's identity.[16]

[10] It will readily be deduced from what I have described thus far that the formal recording of a person's gender or sex description is a matter of material legal and practical significance. The many and various difficulties that could present for a person whose gender characteristics differ from those recorded on his or her identity card are not hard to imagine. The evidence bears this out.

[11] The transgender spouses applied in terms of section 2(1) of the Alteration Act for the alteration of their sex descriptions on their respective birth registers. The applications had the blessing and support of the transgender spouses' marriage partners. The first to sixth applicants are content in their respective marital relationships and currently have no wish or intention to end them.

13 S 19 read with Chapters 4 and 5 of the Identification Act.

14 See ss 9 and 15(2) of the Identification Act.

15 S 17(3) of the Identification Act provides that an "authorised officer" for the purposes of s 17(1) "means – (a) a peace officer as defined in section 1 of the Criminal Procedure Act, 1977 (Act 51 of 1977); or (b) a person, or a member of a category of persons, designated by the Minister by notice in the Gazette, and who for the purpose of this section shall be deemed to be such a peace officer".

16 In terms of s 17(4) of the Identification Act.

[12] It was common ground that, apart from death, divorce is the only manner in which their marriages can be dissolved.[17] A divorce would be obtainable only if it could be proved that there had been an irretrievable breakdown of their marriage relationship, or that one of them was suffering from mental illness or continuous unconsciousness as contemplated in section 5 of the Divorce Act 70 of 1979. They have pointed out, correctly, that as they cherish their marriages there is no legal basis for them to be dissolved.

[13] They consider the fact that the registration of the altered sex status of the transgender parties will result in the public records showing that their marriages have become same-sex marriages to be irrelevant to their marriage status. For reasons to be described presently, the Department of Home Affairs takes a different view. It maintains that the applications by the transgender spouses under the Alteration Act cannot be granted while their marriages remain registered as having been solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act.

[14] In the result, the applications by KOS and GNC in terms of the Alteration Act have effectively been refused; alternatively, the Department has failed to make a decision in respect of them.

[15] In the case of WJV, however, the Department did alter his sex description. But when it did so, it simultaneously deleted the particulars recorded in the population register of the WJV's marriage with the sixth applicant. It did this unasked. It also changed the record of the sixth applicant's surname to her maiden name.

[16] I shall relate the history of each of these applications in some detail later in this judgment.

[17] The Department's position is founded on its understanding of the import of the current statutory regime that provides a parallel system for the solemnisation of marriages. Since 30 November 2006, civil marriages may be solemnised under the provisions of either the Marriage Act or the Civil Union Act 17 of 2006. The enactment of the Civil Union Act was the legislative response to the judgment of the Constitutional Court in Minister of Home Affairs and another v Fourie and others; Lesbian and Gay Equality Project and others v Minister of Home Affairs and others.[18] That case concerned a challenge against the constitutionality of the Marriage Act and the common law definition of marriage because they unfairly discriminated against gay and lesbian couples by precluding them from marrying.

[18] In the Equality Project case, the Court declared the common-law definition of marriage to be inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that it did not allow for same-sex couples who wanted to formalise their unions to enjoy the status and the benefits, coupled with the responsibilities, that it accorded to opposite-sex couples who married. The Court also declared that the omission from the marriage formula in section 30(1) of the Marriage Act after the words "or husband" of the words "or spouse" was inconsistent with the Constitution.[19] It declared the Marriage Act to be invalid to the extent of that inconsistency.

[19] The Court suspended the declarations of invalidity for 12 months to enable Parliament to correct the defects. Its order provided that in the event of Parliament failing to correct the defects within the afforded period, section 30(1) of the Marriage Act would thenceforth fall to be read as including the words "or spouse" after the words "or husband" as they appear in the marriage formula in that provision. Notwithstanding that the Court did not expressly make a declaration to that effect, the import of its judgment was to develop the common law concept of marriage to connote "a union of two persons, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others". That much was necessarily implied in the finding that the previously expressed definition that marriage was "a union of one man with one woman, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others" was unlawfully discriminatory and infringed the right of gays and lesbians to enter into the sort of publically formalised union that heterosexual couples could by marrying under the Marriage Act.

[20] At the heart of the Equality Project case was the right of gays and lesbians to equality with heterosexual persons in respect of the institution of marriage. It perhaps bears emphasis, as an important aside, that sexual orientation or preference – the expression of a person's sexuality – is not an issue in the current proceedings.[20] There is no evidence about the first to sixth applicants' sexuality. Nor was there any need for such. As Lord Nicholls of Birkenhead thought it relevant to point out in Bellinger,[21] ". . . a transsexual person is to be distinguished from a homosexual person. A homosexual is a person who is attracted sexually to persons of the same sex". Many might think that that is to state the obvious, but the literature on transgenderism describes that there is an all too common tendency to 19 S 30(1) of the Marriage Act provides:

"In solemnizing any marriage any marriage officer designated under section 3 may follow the marriage formula usually observed by his religious denomination or organization if such marriage formula has been approved by the Minister, but if such marriage formula has not been approved by the Minister, or in the case of any other marriage officer, the marriage officer concerned shall put the following questions to each of the parties separately, each of whom shall reply thereto in the affirmative:

'Do you, A.B., declare that as far as you know there is no lawful impediment to your proposed marriage with C.D. here present, and that you call all here present to witness that you take C.D. as your lawful wife (or husband)?', and thereupon the parties shall give each other the right hand and the marriage officer concerned shall declare the marriage solemnized in the following words:

'I declare that A.B. and C.D. here present have been lawfully married". (Bold print supplied for emphasis.)

20 The applicants did allege that if the respondents were correct in their construction of the applicable legislation, the resultant discriminatory treatment in distinguishing between persons married under the Marriage Act and those wed under the Civil Union Act would, in effect, give rise to unfair discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. In view of the conclusion to which I have come it has not been necessary to decide that point. The contention seems in any event to be based on the very sort of conflation of concepts that has been criticised in the academic literature.

21 Bellinger v Bellinger, supra at fn 5, in para [10].

conflate sex, gender and sexuality, which is misconceived.[22] The tendency is manifested in the reliance by the respondents, in explanation of their approach to the interpretation and administration of the Alteration Act in respect of persons married in terms of the Marriage Act who subsequently transition, on the reported widespread opposition to any amendment of the Marriage Act to permit the formalisation of marriages between homosexual couples. The opposition to gay marriage was, amongst other things, advanced on the basis of ideas that "sex is . . . an essential determinant of the relationship called marriage" and that "the capacity for natural heterosexual intercourse" is essential for the subsistence of a marriage – I quote from the judgment of Ormrod J in Corbett v Corbett,[23] which was also a case concerning marriage and transgenderism. That viewpoint, or opinions aligned to it, seem to reflect what the respondents, in the context of the current case, characterise as relevant "deep public and private sensibilities" that allegedly bear on their ability to record the transgender spouses' sex/gender change[24] That such views have long since been legally discredited is evidenced, for example, by the following statement in the judgment of the European Court of Human Rights in Cossey's case[25]:

> "Mr Justice Ormrod's arguments are clearly unacceptable. Marriage is far more than a sexual union, and the capacity for sexual intercourse is therefore not 'essential' for marriage. Persons who are not or are no longer capable of procreating or having sexual intercourse may also want to and do marry. That is because marriage is far more than a union which legitimates sexual 22 A short but useful overview on the subject is given in Victor, Victoria or V? A constitutional perspective on transsexuality and transgenderism (C. Visser and E. Piccara), 2012 SAJHR 506. The authors observe that:

> 'The labels of transsexual, transgenderist, intersexed, transvestite, heterosexual, homosexual, bisexual and pansexual are all labels that are used in an attempt to describe the many permutations of human identity and sexuality. However, the conflation of sex, gender and sexual orientation has tainted our understanding of what these terms actually mean, leading to the perpetuation of misconceptions that have impacted on the legal treatment of transsexual and transgender issues. At the outset, a distinction has to be drawn between those terms that refer to the sexual orientation of an individual; those that have their application in reference to the biological sex of an individual; and those that describe the gender configuration of the individual" (at pp 510–511).

Albertyn and Goldblatt say that the:

> "Constitutional Court tends to use sex and gender interchangeably in the relatively large number of cases it has considered on these grounds. Sex is generally taken to mean the biological differences between men and women, while gender is the term used to describe the socially and culturally constructed differences between men and women." (C. Albertyn and B Goldblatt, "Equality", in S. Woolman and M. Bishop (eds.) Constitutional Law of South Africa (2ed), at 35–55.)

(Footnotes omitted.)

I am unable to find anything in that statement that is inconsistent with the concept of marriage in our modern law.[26]

[21] As mentioned, Parliament responded to the Equality Project judgment by enacting the Civil Union Act. It left section 30(1) of the Marriage Act on the statute book unchanged. It may be inferred that the Legislature's approach was that by enacting the Civil Union Act it had corrected the identified constitutional incompatibility in that provision of the Marriage Act.

[22] "Marriage" is not defined in either Act. It is established that the word is used in the Act consistently with its meaning in the common law.[27] Counsel on both sides accepted, correctly in my view, that the word also has that meaning in the Civil Union Act.[28] It follows that it was also not in issue between the parties that the common law has been developed in the manner described earlier.[29]

[23] The parties appeared to be in agreement at the hearing that, by reason of the unchanged wording of section 30(1) of the Marriage Act,[30] only marriages in which the intending parties are of opposite sex can be solemnised under that statute.[31] Equivalent unions under Civil Unions Act, by contrast, may be solemnised irrespective of the sex/gender of the parties thereto.[32] The parties entering into a formalised union under that Act must elect whether it is to be called a "marriage" or a "civil partnership".[33] Whichever designation is chosen, the character of a union entered into in terms of the Civil Union Act is indistinguishable in its legal effect and consequences from one solemnised under the Marriage Act.[34] The Civil Union Act is therefore available to both opposite- and same-sex couples for the solemnisation of their intended marriages. A man and a woman intending to get married to each other accordingly have a choice about the statute under which they will exchange their vows;[35] a same-sex couple does not. I shall describe the reported reason for this anomaly presently.

31 The applicants' Counsel had argued in their heads of argument that same-sex marriage was possible under the Marriage Act through "an approved marriage formula". The submission was no doubt based on the opinion to that effect expressed in the majority judgment in Fourie and another v Minister of Home Affairs and others 2005 (3) SA 429 (SCA), at paras [35]–[37] [also reported at [2005] 1 All SA 273 (SCA) – Ed]. The subsequent introduction of Civil Union Act called the feasibility of that approach into question. I am not aware whether there has yet been a case raising the interesting question whether an intended marriage in which one of the parties has already transitioned can be solemnised under the Marriage Act. The respondents' answering affidavit posits a positive answer. The second respondent averred "Had a partner to a relationship undergone a sex alteration prior to marriage and had such a marriage resulted in them entering into a heterosexual relationship, such couples (sic) would have been entitled to marry their respective partners under the Marriage Act". (Underlining in the original.) The respondents' position in this respect is somewhat ironic in the context of the importance they attach in other respects to the public's 'sensibilities' about any amendment to the Marriage Act.

[24] Marriage officers who hold their position ex officio by virtue of section 2 of the Marriage Act are automatically also "marriage officers" in terms of the Civil Union Act.[36] However, in terms of section 6 of the Civil Union Act a marriage officer ex officio may notify the Minister that he or she

32 Parliament sought to correct the defect identified in s 30(1) of the Marriage Act by providing the following formula in s 11(2) of the Civil Union Act to be used in the solemnisation of unions under the latter Act:
"In solemnising any civil union, the marriage officer must put the following questions to each of the parties separately, and each of the parties must reply thereto in the affirmative:
'Do you, A.B., declare that as far as you know there is no lawful impediment to your proposed marriage/civil partnership with C.D. here present, and that you call all here present to witness that you take C.D. as your lawful spouse/civil partner?', and thereupon the parties must give each other the right hand and the marriage officer concerned must declare the marriage or civil partnership, as the case may be, solemnised in the following words:
'I declare that A.B. and C.D. here present have been lawfully joined in a marriage/civil partnership." (Emphasis supplied for highlighting.)
The formula is plainly based on that in s 30(1) of the Marriage Act quoted in fn 19 above. The only material difference is the use of the words "your lawful spouse/civil partner" instead of "your lawful wife (or husband)".

33 S 11(1) of the Civil Union Act.

34 This follows from s 13 of the Civil Union Act, which provides:
"Legal consequences of civil union
(1) The legal consequences of a marriage contemplated in the Marriage Act apply, with such changes as may be required by the context, to a civil union.
(2) With the exception of the Marriage Act and the Customary Marriages Act, any reference to –
(a) marriage in any other law, including the common law, includes, with such changes as may be required by the context, a civil union; and
(b) husband, wife or spouse in any other law, including the common law, includes a civil union partner."

35 Provided that they are both over 18 (see the definition of "civil union" in s 1 of the Civil Union Act).

36 Para (a) of the definition of "marriage officer" in the Civil Union Act provides that the term means "a marriage officer ex officio or so designated by virtue of section 2 of the Marriage Act". S 2 of the Marriage Act provides:
"(1) Every magistrate, every special justice of the peace and every Commissioner shall by virtue of his office and so long as he holds such office, be a marriage officer for the district or other area in respect of which he holds office.
(2) The Minister and any officer in the public service authorized thereto by him may designate any officer or employee in the public service or the diplomatic or consular service of the Republic to be, by virtue of his office and so long as he holds such office, a marriage officer, either generally or for any specified class of persons or country or area."

objects on grounds of conscience, religion and belief to solemnising a civil union between two persons of the same sex, whereupon he or she is not obliged to solemnise such a civil union. Save as aforesaid, a marriage officer under the Civil Union Act "has all the powers, responsibilities and duties, as conferred upon him or her under the Marriage Act, to solemnise a civil union".[37]

[25] Whether or not the dichotomous regime in respect of the solemnisation of marriages is constitutionally compatible is not a question that has to be decided in this case.[38]

[26] In addition to the six applicants identified thus far, a registered non-profit organisation called Gender Dynamix ("GDX") was also party, as the seventh applicant, to the institution of the proceedings. Using a human rights framework, GDX seeks to advance, promote and defend the rights of transgender and "gender non-conforming" persons in South Africa and beyond. The seventh applicant has been working for a decade now on various issues concerning "the lack and/or improper implementation of the [Alteration] Act". A number of its employees or former employees had contributed to the enactment of the statute.

The history of problems regarding the Alteration Act

[27] The current executive director of the seventh applicant testified that the organisation's experience was that the implementation of the Alteration Act has been attended by a variety of problems. She described that these fall into "three basic categories":

(a) Ignorance by relevant officials of the existence and content of the Act.

(b) The absence of prescribed forms and procedures for the administration of the Act,[39] with the result that some persons experienced what was described as "persecution" when making applications under the Act.

and

(c) The requirement by the Department of Home Affairs that applicants who were in marriages that had been solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act first obtain a divorce before being allowed to have their altered sex/gender recorded under the Alteration Act; alternatively, "in extreme cases", the arbitrary deletion or alteration by the Department of the official record of the affected marriages when a sex/gender alteration was recorded. (In one example given by the deponent, a person who submitted an application under the Alteration Act in 2009 had had the record of her marriage, which had been solemnised in 1976 in terms of the Marriage Act, changed, without her foreknowledge, to that of a marriage purportedly solemnised under the Civil Union Act in 2009.)

37 S 4(2) of the Civil Union Act.

39 The Alteration Act, unusually, does not contain a provision for the making of regulations to assist in the administration of the statute.

[28] The deponent to the seventh applicant's supporting affidavit related that the reasons offered to applicants by the Department for the last-mentioned category of difficulty have included its understanding of the effect of the dichotomous regime provided by the existence side by side of the Marriage Act and the Civil Union Act and the reported inability of the Department's data capturing system to reflect parties to marriages that had been solemnised under the Marriage Act as being of the same sex. According to the deponent, the Department's perception that a catch-22 situation prevails has resulted in a number of applications just being left undetermined by the Director-General. One of the consequences has been that the ability of applicants to avail of the internal appeal remedies afforded in terms of the Alteration Act has been thwarted.[40]

[29] The Department has not been absolutely consistent, however, about its inability to register an alteration of sex in terms of the Alteration Act when the applicant has been party to a subsisting marriage in terms of the Marriage Act. The example was cited of a person who had applied for relief under the Act in 2011. Having initially been informed that she would first need to obtain a divorce, which she refused to do, the Department was eventually persuaded, after the applicant had obtained legal representation with the assistance of GDX, to amend the gender marker despite the continued subsistence of the marriage. It did so without "converting" the record of the union to one under the Civil Union Act.[41]

[30] The absence of a uniform approach by the Department to these matters is striking.

[31] The seventh applicant has been involved since 2011 in a series of engagements with the Department and the parliamentary portfolio committee for Home Affairs in an endeavour to resolve the difficulties. These have not borne fruit, and in some instances its approaches were not even favoured with acknowledgment. According to its executive director, GDX has assisted the first to sixth applicants to institute and prosecute the current proceedings because the organisation's "advocacy efforts on the issue have simply been ignored".

[32] The experiences of the transgender spouses confirm that the Alteration Act is being unsatisfactorily administered. It is appropriate to describe them in greater detail because they have each sought declarations in terms of section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution that the respondents' conduct in respect of their applications under the Alteration Act was inconsistent with the Constitution. The affirmative significance of such declarations, quite apart from any remedial or ancillary relief that might attend them, is axiomatic.

40 See also the description of difficulties encountered by applicants under the Alteration Act in the paper by T Klein (fn 10 above).

41 It is not apparent on the papers how the reported inadequacies of the Department's data capturing system must have been overcome in this particular instance.

KOS's application in terms of the Alteration Act

[33] KOS was born in 1981. She was raised as a male, but says that she "always knew that [she] was different". She married the second applicant in 2011, a year before she was diagnosed with gender dysphoria. She has been on hormone therapy since 2013 preparatory to gender reassignment surgery.

[34] She submitted her application in terms of the Alteration Act in March 2014 at the Department of Home Affairs' offices in George. Her wife accompanied her. The first official with whom they dealt refused to accept the application, despite KOS having a copy of the Act with her. The official advised KOS that it could not be possible to alter her gender as that "must be an offence of some kind". So despondent was KOS at this treatment that it was only at the insistence of her wife that they thereafter arranged to see a different official, who agreed at least to accept the application, whilst nonetheless expressing reservations about its feasibility. (KOS's reception at the Home Affairs office manifests the category of problem described in paragraph 27 (a) and (b) above.)

[35] Despite repeated enquiries KOS and her family were unable to obtain any information or feedback about the progress of the application. An email from KOS's mother to the Minister in February 2015, which catalogued nine fruitless telephone calls to the Department's client services desk during the period November 2014 to February 2015 about the lack of response to the application, was not favoured with reply or acknowledgment.

[36] During the prolonged period that her application was mired in bureaucratic inertia, KOS was all the while gradually coming to look more like a woman than a man as a result of the hormonal treatment that she was receiving. She consequently found herself in embarrassing situations in which she was called upon to explain why her appearance did not correspond with that depicted on her official identity cards. Some people proved sympathetic to her predicament; from others it elicited reactions of suspicion or hostility. This caused her increasingly to withdraw from dealing with the outside world and leave the management of her affairs to her wife.

[37] Eventually, in April 2015, KOS approached the Department's provincial headquarters in Cape Town. She set out the unsatisfactory history of her application and pointed out that the altered birth certificate that she had applied for was essential to enable her "to be able to resume my life as a registered South African citizen". She explained that without it she could not obtain her "new ID book, driver's licence, passport [or] even open . . . a bank account". An official there took up the first applicant's cause.

[38] It was discovered that the Department's head office in Pretoria, to which the office in George should have directed the application, had no record of it. However, even after a copy of the application was then faxed to the Pretoria on two occasions, a response was still not forthcoming. To their credit, KOS's exasperation about the lack of progress was shared by the officials in Cape Town who were dealing with the matter.

[39] On 23 June 2015, the Department's head office advised that more information in the form of expert reports was required; in particular, a letter from a medical doctor stating that "the operation was done". Gender reassignment surgery is actually not a requirement for relief in terms of the Alteration Act. (The head office request was a further manifestation of the problem described in paragraph 27 (a) above.) KOS nevertheless provided an additional letter from her doctor, but this notwithstanding, another four months passed without progress.

[40] After pressing the official dealing with the matter for a response, KOS was informed by telephone in late October 2015 that it had been ascertained that she was married and that the application could not be processed without proof that she had obtained a divorce (the problem identified in paragraph 27 (c) above). The reason given was that two women could not be married to each other. When KOS challenged the validity of that proposition, she was told that the problem related to the Department's computer system, which would not allow KOS's identity number to be changed while she remained registered as having been married under the Marriage Act. (It will be recalled that a person's marital status is not reflected on their identity number.[42]) It was suggested that she and the second applicant should go through with divorce proceedings and then remarry under the Civil Union Act.

[41] KOS and the second applicant thereafter took legal advice concerning divorce proceedings and were advised, correctly, that absent an irretrievable breakdown in their marital relationship, no grounds existed for them to seek an order under the Divorce Act for the dissolution of their marriage.

[42] The upshot is that KOS's application has effectively been refused; alternatively, the Director-General has failed to make the decision that he was required to in terms of the Alteration Act.

GNC's application in terms of the Alteration Act

[43] GNC was born in 1953. She experienced gender dysphoria from her early years, but for a long time resisted accepting her female self. She did this by consciously adopting especially masculine roles, such as voluntarily enlisting in a combat unit during her compulsory army service and later becoming a geologist, which she perceived to be a profession preponderantly associated with men.

[44] GNC married the fourth applicant in 1988, long before the enactment of the Civil Union Act. They have a daughter, who was born in 1992.

[45] For many years GNC internalised her gender dysphoria and suffered considerable distress by having to live with what she called her "secret". She disclosed her situation to her wife only in 2014. The fourth applicant has been understanding of GNC's situation and supported her decision to transition.

[46] GNC has undergone gender reassignment surgery. She has also succeeded in changing her forenames and obtaining an identity document that reflects her appearance as a female, but incongruously continues to indicate her sex/gender as male. When she applied for an altered birth certificate she was informed, in July 2016, by the same official who dealt with KOS's application that the Department's computer system "simply [would] not allow an amendment to [her] gender as [she] was married in terms of the Marriage Act". GNC was also advised to obtain a divorce and to remarry under the Civil Union Act. Understandably, she sees "no need to get a divorce to satisfy a computer system". In the circumstances, GNC's application has also effectively been refused.

[47] Like KOS, GNC has encountered difficulties and embarrassment in her day to day dealings with the outside world. This has been caused by the discrepancy between her appearance and the sex/gender descriptor on her identity documents.

WJV's application in terms of the Alteration Act

[48] WJV was born in 1971. She experienced gender dysphoria from an early age. When she told her father that she was in fact not a boy, but a girl, she was given a severe beating and subsequently compelled to participate in what her father regarded as masculinising activities. She came close to physically transitioning in the early 1990's but was persuaded by her psychologist that medical intervention might not be necessary. She was drafted into the army before she could make a decision. She did not fit in well in the military and her experience there was an unhappy one.

[49] WJV met the sixth applicant after her discharge from the army. They were married on 13 September 1997. WJV had told her wife about her gender dysphoria before the marriage.

[50] WJV commenced the process of physically transitioning in 2012. She approached the offices of the Department of Home Affairs at Roodepoort in November 2013 with a view to having her registered names and sex descriptor changed. The official with whom she dealt there advised that it would be better to tackle those objectives using a two-stage process; that is by first having her names changed, and then, when that had been done, applying for her sex description to be altered. The official advised that trying to achieve both objectives together would "confuse the system" and be likely to cause "a slowing and/or stalling of the application".

[51] Not wishing to prejudice her applications, WJV went along with the advice and applied first for a change of forenames. In March 2014, she received notice that her forenames had been officially changed in terms of section 24 of the Births and Deaths Registration Act 51 of 1992, and she was issued with a replacement identity document.

[52] WJV submitted her application under the Alteration Act on 7 June 2014. She was able to track the progress of the application through the official channels. The application was cleared in respect of fingerprints on 24 June 2014. By 15 July 2014 the system reflected that the application had been "processed", and then showed that the "rectification department" had received it on 21 July. From that stage, however, the hitherto reasonably efficient treatment of the application ceased.

[53] The lack of any further progress caused WJV to enlist the assistance of the Legal Resources Centre ("LRC") in December 2014. The LRC wrote repeatedly to the Department, including direct approaches to the Director-General and the Minister. The papers suggest that, save for one reply from the Department's client services centre, the correspondence from the LRC was not even acknowledged.

[54] Eventually, in October 2015, WJV was invited to come to the Department's office in Roodepoort as her documents were ready. She was advised that her wife should accompany her, as it would be necessary for the sixth applicant to apply for a replacement identity document. On arrival at the office, WJV was handed a letter confirming that her gender had been changed. The sixth applicant was informed that she was required to obtain a replacement identity card. It was explained to WJV and her wife that as a consequence of the registration of WJV's sex/gender change, the Department had had to delete its record of their marriage, and that the sixth applicant's surname had therefore reverted to her maiden name. WJV and the sixth applicant learned that the Department's "system" now reflected that they had never married. They were advised that they were free to marry under the Civil Union Act, and told that the Department would be willing to facilitate the solemnisation of a marriage between them under that Act.

[55] WJV also testified to various difficulties that she had had with her shopping and banking accounts because of the disparity between her registered and apparent identities. Her work requires her to travel to neighbouring countries, which she says "are known to be hostile to LGBTI communities". It has been a constant concern to her that the incongruence between her identity documents and her physical presentation might lead to difficulties on these trips, as is the prospect of being stopped by the local law enforcement authorities and having to explain her situation to strangers who might not accept her account and arrest her.

The relief sought in these proceedings

[56] The applicants applied in their notice of motion for varied and wide-ranging relief. It is sufficient at this point to describe it in the broad. By way of primary relief they sought various types of declaratory relief affirming the subsistence of their marriages; declaring that the second respondent "is required by law to alter a person's sex description in terms of the Alteration [Act] . . . irrespective of that person's marital status" and declaring that the Department's refusal to process the applications of KOS and GNC in terms of Alteration Act because they were married in terms of the Marriage Act was unconstitutional and unlawful, and that its deregistration of the marriage between WJV and the sixth applicant was also unlawful and unconstitutional.[43] They also sought interdicts directing the second respondent to grant the applications by KOS and GNC under the Alteration Act and to correct the population register to reflect that WJV and the sixth applicant are married to each other.

[57] Contingently upon the court taking the view that the primary relief, or at least part of it, fell properly to be sought in proceedings under the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 ("PAJA"), the applicants sought condonation, in terms of section 9 of that Act, for having instituted the proceedings outside the time limit prescribed in section 7(1) of the Act and, in terms of section 7(2)(c), exempting them from exhausting the internal remedies under the Alteration Act.

[58] By way of secondary relief, sought in the alternative to the aforementioned primary relief, and contingently upon the court upholding the Department's understanding of the statutory scheme, the applicants sought a declaration that the Alteration Act and/or the Marriage Act and/or the Civil Union Act is/are inconsistent with the Constitution and invalid to the extent that any or all of them fail to allow the alteration of a person's sex description and sex status while that person is in a marriage that was solemnised under the Marriage Act. Various forms of other relief ancillary to any such declaration were also sought.

[59] The applicants have sought certain of the relief not only in their own interest, but also, in terms of section 38 of the Constitution, in the interest of all other couples who find themselves in a similar situation.

The respondents' case

[60] The respondents opposed the application. The Director-General of the Department of Home Affairs deposed to an answering affidavit on behalf of all three respondents[44]. He averred that "the issues presented in this application are novel and have not been previously canvassed by the Department prior to them having been raised by GDX in its engagement with the Department". He proceeded "[t]his matter squarely raises an intersectional debate of issues related to same-sex relationships, marriage and sex alteration".

[61] The respondents contend that there is a gap in the existing legislation that needs to be filled if the applicants' complaints are to be effectively addressed. They aver that the effect of the statutory framework currently in place is the following (I quote from paragraph 13 of the answering affidavit):

1. Once a partner to a marriage undergoes a sex alteration (thereby converting the relationship into a same-sex one), such a relationship does not constitute a marriage under the Marriage Act.
2. However, the law provides no mechanism by which to convert such a marriage concluded under the Marriage Act into a marriage under the Civil Union Act or indeed to provide grounds upon which such a couple may divorce (it being accepted that the grounds for divorce under the Divorce Act do not apply on the facts of [the current] matters.
3. The result is that such a couple remains married under the Marriage Act, but that their sex alteration cannot be registered as contemplated under the Alteration Act.
4. This state of affairs results in persons who are in marriages concluded under the Marriage Act (and who were at the time of concluding such marriages in heterosexual relationships) being deprived of (sic) registering a sex alteration under the Alteration Act.

[62] The respondents accept that there is nothing in the Alteration Act, read on its own, to support the notion that an applicant's marital status has any bearing on his or her entitlement to obtain an altered birth certificate under that Act. They contend, however, "that the issues presented in this matter cannot be viewed in isolation solely through the lens of the Alteration Act". "Equally important", they say "are the implications of an alteration under the Alteration Act for the Marriage Act". They argue that the current matter involves "a question of [?marital] status". The respondents say it is also "a matter that touches on deep public and private sensibilities which [they] aver Parliament is well-suited to finding the best ways to vindicate".

[63] The respondents assert that they "do not accept the correctness of an argument seemingly advanced by the applicants that even though the Marriage Act does not allow for the conclusion of a same-sex marriage, it does allow for and apply to a marriage that was concluded as heterosexual and subsequently became same-sex". They point out that after the judgment in the Equality Project case the Department "gave careful consideration to the question whether the Marriage Act should be amended to make it applicable to same-sex marriages. There was extensive and wide ranging objection, inter alia, from the religious sector to follow such a course; the Civil Union Act was accordingly opted for", (Underlining in the original.) They contend that in the result there is a "parallel regime of the law governing marriage".

[64] The essence of the respondents' contentions is that the first to sixth applicants are the victims of a legislative conundrum. They accept that on their approach the resultant situation would impel a finding that some (unspecified) law or conduct involved was inconsistent with the Constitution, and that a declaration in terms of section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution would be indicated. The Director-General averred that:

> "the respondents have no objection to an order declaring that the Civil Union Act is unconstitutional for its failure to recognise as a valid marriage (either in its own right or by converting a marriage concluded under the Marriage Act), the marriage of two persons who were married as a heterosexual couple under the Marriage Act, and where, subsequent to such marriage, one person to that marriage registers a sex alteration on the Birth Register pursuant to the alteration Act".

Elsewhere in the answering affidavit the Director-General postulates that the conundrum might also be addressed by amendments to Alteration Act,[45] or the Marriage Act.[46]

45 The suggestion was that the Alteration Act could be amended "so as to provide that a condition or pre-requisite to an application for a sex alteration by a married person is consent by such person (and their marriage partner) to convert their marriage from one under the Marriage Act to one under the Civil Union Act". The case does not call for any determination in this regard, but I would venture that any such amendment would be unlikely to withstand constitutional scrutiny for a number of reasons. It would also be founded on a false premise. Relief under the Alteration Act affords recognition of a sex alteration, not permission to undertake one.

46 The postulated amendment to the Marriage Act would comprise of "a deeming provision . . . (with or without the consent of the other marriage partner) that a marriage concluded under the Marriage Act between a heterosexual couple is deemed to be a marriage under the Civil Union Act in instances where one party to a marriage concluded under the Marriage Act has undergone a sex alteration under the Alteration Act". The postulate is misconceived. First, a person does not undergo a sex alteration under the Alteration Act, he or she merely obtains an altered birth certificate in consequence of a sex/gender alteration that has already been undergone. Second, a postnuptial deeming of a marriage solemnised under one Act as one concluded under another Act would be vacuous if it would have no practical effect whatsoever on the marriage partners' subsisting rights and obligations vis à vis each other, or third parties.

[65] The respondents averred that while they "accept that the vindication of rights or indeed the addressing of legislative lacuna[e] are not dependent on public opinion, . . . the value of a public consultative process cannot be underestimated." They stressed that the Department was "mindful of the widespread and extensive public opposition to an amendment of the Marriage Act" which had ". . . largely informed Parliament's decision to adopt the Civil Union Act (as opposed to amending the Marriage Act), in order to give effect to the Order of the Constitutional Court in [the Equality Project case]".

[66] The Director-General sought to explain the advice given by departmental officials to four of the applicants that they should obtain a divorce and remarry under the Civil Union Act as having been premised on the notion that "under the current legislative framework a person in a same-sex relationship cannot conclude or remain in a marriage under the Marriage Act". (My underlining.) He summed up this explanation with the statement "I accept that is indeed correct as a matter of law".

[67] The Director-General's response to the deletion by the Department of the record of WJV's marriage was, however, entirely inconsistent with his notion that a person in a same-sex relationship "cannot remain in a marriage under the Marriage Act". He said that the registration of the alteration of WJV's sex/gender in terms of the Alteration Act and the attendant deletion of the registration of his and the sixth applicant's marriage had been "a mistake". He reiterated his understanding that the:

> "legislative framework . . . does not simultaneously allow for a person married under the Marriage Act who has undergone a sex alteration to have their sex alteration registered on the system while simultaneously allowing such a person to remain married under the Marriage Act; this is because the result of the sex alteration would be that that person would be in a same sex relationship, which is not permitted under the Marriage Act."

Discussion

[68] I have described the Director-General's reasoning as "inconsistent" because he tendered to restore the registration of the marriage of WJV and the sixth respondent on the system, subject to the simultaneous reversal of the recordal of WJV's sex/gender change under the Alteration Act. In other words, notwithstanding his averment that a couple that have become a same-sex couple as a result of one of them transitioning cannot "remain married under the Marriage Act", he is nevertheless willing to restore the registration of WJV and the sixth applicant's marriage. And he clearly does not have [in] mind deeming it a marriage under the Civil Union Act. What he is apparently content to tolerate is an inaccurate population register and a continuing breach by WJV of the obligation under the Identification Act to obtain a replacement identity card by reason of her altered circumstances.

[69] This highlights, I think, the confusion that appears to exist in the minds of the respondents and officialdom in the Department concerning the import and effect of the relevant legislation. I regret to say that their approach appears to have been coloured by the persisting influence of the religious and social prejudice against the recognition of same-sex unions[47] that, according to their evidence, was accommodated by the decision not to amend the Marriage Act but to bring in the Civil Union Act alongside it instead. They have not identified a single provision in any of the legislation to which they refer that expressly forbids the processing and positive determination of the transgender spouses' applications under the Alteration Act. All that they have been able to point to are the socio-religious objections that reportedly influenced the Legislature's decision to introduce the Civil Union Act and leave the Marriage Act unamended. They do not explain why those considerations should, or properly could, weigh to distort the plain meaning of the enactments as they appear in the statute book.

[70] What is also strikingly absent from the respondents' answer is any acknowledgment of the expressly enshrined constitutional principle that statutes must be interpreted in a manner consistent with the promotion of the spirit, purport and object of the Bill of Rights. Although section 39(2) of the Constitution places the interpretative duty on adjudicative bodies such as courts and tribunals, the provision necessarily implies that organs of State charged with administering legislation are expected to do so consistently with the meaning which the courts are called upon to give it. Organs of State fulfil that obligation by complying with section 7(2) of the Constitution, which obliges the State "to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights". The manner in which the applications by the transgender spouses were treated manifests a regrettable lack of compliance by the Department with its constitutional obligations in a number of respects.

[71] Furthermore, had there indeed been a serious concern that there was a gap in the legislation that required to be addressed in order to meet what the respondents admit has been the unconstitutional treatment of the first to sixth applicants (and others like them whose rights have been advocated by the seventh applicant), one would have hoped that the Department would by now be able to show that it had conscientiously engaged with the issues. Section 237 of the Constitution enjoins that all constitutional obligations must be performed diligently and without delay. It is regrettable, having regard to history, that at this late stage the Department has not formulated concrete proposals in respect of the supplementary provisions it contends are needed, and that it reports that it should be afforded a period of 24 months from the date of any order the 47 In Fourie (SCA) supra, at para [20], Cameron JA referred to "the acknowledged fact that most South Africans still think of marriage as a heterosexual institution, and that many may view its extension to gays and lesbians with apprehension and disfavour". I have little doubt that the same can be said about attitudes towards same-sex marriages that come about incidentally because of the sex/gender change of one of the originally opposite-sex partners in existing unions. Prejudice, however, can never justify unfair discrimination; Hoffmann v South African Airways 2001 (1) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (11) BCLR 1211 (CC) at para [37] and see also Equality Project at paras [112]–[113].

court may make in terms of section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution to remedy the situation.[48]

Proper construction of the pertinent legislation

[72] I turn now to consider whether the respondents' argument that there is a lacuna in the legislation can be sustained upon a proper construction of the extant laws.

[73] As mentioned, the respondents concede that there is nothing in the Alteration Act itself that expressly or impliedly indicates that the applicant's marital status has any bearing on the ability or entitlement of a person who has transitioned to obtain administrative relief under the provisions of the statute. The object of the Act is reflected in its long title, which is "[An Act]: To provide for the alteration of the sex description of certain individuals in certain circumstances; and to amend the Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1992, as a consequence; and to provide for matters incidental thereto". The sole criterion for obtaining an altered birth certificate under the Act is proof, in the form prescribed by section 2(2), to the reasonable satisfaction of the Director-General, that the applicant has altered his or her sex/gender. The Alteration Act therefore does not contain anything to support the respondents' interpretation of the statutory framework.

[74] I have already described the administrative consequences of an altered birth registration in terms of the Alteration Act.[49] The consequences are plainly directed towards facilitating the maintenance of an accurate and meaningfully informative population register. As I have highlighted, the failure by a person who has transitioned to obtain a replacement identity card is a criminal offence under the Identification Act. Such a person can obtain a replacement card only after going through the process provided in terms of the Alteration Act. The purpose of the Identification Act, as reflected in its long title is "[t]o provide for the compilation and maintenance of a population register in respect of the population of the Republic; for the issue of identity cards and certain certificates to persons whose particulars are included in the population register; and for matters connected therewith". The evident purpose of the population register is to provide generally for a database to be used to assist in matters of public administration. The content of the population register is not publically available and it may be accessed only with the specific consent of the Director-General.[50] This confirms the primarily governmental purpose of the register. Similarly, the particulars recorded 48 A prevailing reluctance to embrace and advance equality in the areas of sex and gender, especially when issues concerning homosexuality might be involved, is suggested by the fact that the significant advances made towards the realisation of constitutional rights and protections in this area since the dawn of the constitutional era have in the main been achieved through activist litigation, and not, as s 7(2) of the Constitution would contemplate, proactive executive and legislative action. See the long list of cases, many of them involving the Department, referred to in paras [12]–[14] and the footnotes thereto in Fourie (SCA), supra. The examples of legislatively initiated amelioration referred to by Ackermann J in National Coalition for Gay and Lesbian Equality and others v Minister of Home Affairs and others 2000 (2) SA 1 (CC), 2000 (1) BCLR 39 (CC) at para [37], have, by comparison, been relatively limited in their ambit.

in the population register may be amended only with the consent of the Director-General.[51]

[75] The public working of the register is manifested by its system of identity cards. The purpose of identity cards is to combat fraud in both the public and private sectors, and to assist in law administration and enforcement. A person's marital status does not impact on the formulation of his or her allocated identity number in terms of section 7 of the Act. On the contrary, the indication of any personal particulars apart from the person's date of birth, gender and citizenship status is expressly precluded from inclusion in their identity number.[52] Many of life's ordinary undertakings such as travel, legally driving a motor vehicle, or opening a banking account require every South African resident to carry one or more of the various types of identity card recognised in terms of the Identification Act. As the practical experience of the transgender spouses testifies, identity cards do not serve those purposes well if they do not accurately reflect the actual identity of the cardholder as he/or she would present in ordinary circumstances to the outside world. It will not help if anyone whose sex/gender characteristics have been altered from male to female is forced to keep a card showing their original sex/gender with a photograph depicting them as a person of the opposite sex to that which they actually appear to be. Having regard to the objects of the Identification Act, no conceivable purpose could be served by maintaining an inaccurate record of the particulars of any individual. On the contrary, to do so would thwart the effective operation of the Act and impede the exercise of personal rights and freedoms.

[76] I have already referred to the provisions of section 8(e) of the Identification Act.[53] In the case of the first to sixth applicants, it has the effect that the particulars of their respective marriages on the relevant marriage registers must be recorded on the population register. That will be so even if the marriages are subsequently terminated. The second respondent is obliged to supplement the information so recorded on the population register with any "such other particulars concerning [a person's] marital status as may be furnished to the Director-General". Information concerning the termination of a marriage would be an obvious example of "such other particulars". The particulars of a divorce order would fall to be added to the information on the register concerning the person's marital status. The respondents concede that the first to sixth applicants' marriages, remain valid notwithstanding the actual change of sex/gender of one of the parties thereto, and that they can be terminated only by death or divorce. It is not apparent to me why information concerning an alteration of sex/gender – something that does not affect the subsistence or legal effect of a recorded marriage – would constitute particulars falling to be recorded under section 8(e) of the Identification Act. All that would be required is an amendment of the particulars recorded in respect of the person's gender in terms of section 8(b).

51 S 6 of the Identification Act.

52 S 7(2) of the Identification Act, and in particular the following words therein "and no other particulars whatsoever".

53 In para [6] above.

[77] When regard is had to the close and direct inter-relationship between the workings of the Alteration Act and the Identification Act – both of which are administered by the Ministry of Home Affairs – it is perplexing that the respondents omitted to deal with this most directly practical aspect of the legislation in their answering papers. Indeed, they made no mention of the Identification Act in their answering papers whatsoever, or of the effect on its administration of the "lacuna" they would seek to identify in the relevant statutory framework.[54] It is obvious that the practical inter-relationship between the Alteration Act and the Identification Act for the purposes of government administration is immediate and real. The nature of its alleged "intersectional" relationship with the Marriage Act or the Civil Union Act on the other hand has proved difficult for the respondents to pinpoint, unsurprisingly.

[78] The problem with the implementation of the Alteration Act that the respondents have sought to identify seems to arise from their understanding of the Marriage Act and the Civil Union Act.

[79] The object of the Marriage Act appears from its long title. It is "[t]o consolidate and amend the laws relating to the solemnization of marriages and matters incidental thereto". (Underlining supplied for emphasis). It is unnecessary to analyse the content of the Act in detail. The "matters incidental" to the solemnisation of marriages with which it deals are the appointment and authority of marriage officers; the formalities that must be observed before a marriage can be solemnised, and what must be done by the marriage officer if objections are raised to a proposed marriage; the circumstances in which a marriage between two minors without parental or guardian consent may be dissolved; the prohibition of the marriage of boys under 18 and girls under 15 without ministerial permission; permitting the marriage of certain persons connected by affinity by virtue of previous marriages; and providing when and where marriages may be solemnised and for the presence thereat of at least two competent witnesses.

[80] The difficulties that the respondent rely on appear to lie in sections 29A and 30(1) of the Marriage Act.

[81] Section 30(1) of the Act provides for the marriage formula to be used in the solemnisation ceremony. As discussed earlier,[55] this is the provision that was centrally under consideration in the Equality Project case, which, because it has been left unamended by the Legislature, continues to have the effect of precluding same-sex couples from having their partnerships solemnised under the Marriage Act. "Solemnisation" is a noun derived from the verb form "solemnise", which means "duly perform (a ceremony, especially that of marriage) › mark with a formal ceremony".[56] That is what section 30(1) is concerned with. It does not bear on the consequences of any marriage solemnised in terms of its provisions. Indeed, as mentioned earlier, the Act does not contain any provision concerning the consequences

54 The only mention of the population register was at para [99] of the respondents' answering affidavit, where the deponent stated "I do not accept that an alteration of a person's sex description in the Population Register would not affect the validity of a marriage." of a marriage solemnised under its auspices. On the contrary, it is common ground that those are determined by the common law and are indistinguishable from those of a marriage or civil partnership solemnised under the Civil Union Act.

55 At paras [18]–[19], and fn 19.

56 Concise Oxford English Dictionary (10ed), revised (OUP, 2002).

[82] The Marriage Act, moreover, does not contain anything prohibiting a party to a marriage duly solemnised in terms of the formula prescribed in section 30(1) from undergoing a sex-change or obtaining an altered birth certificate in terms of the Alteration Act. Any provision that had such an effect would, for a number of reasons, be of very doubtful constitutional validity. It would probably be found to offend against the basic rights of everyone to equality because it would be likely to unfairly discriminate against affected parties on one or more of the grounds set out in section 9(3) of the Bill of Rights and also to unjustifiably infringe the right that everyone has to bodily and psychological integrity, including the right to security in and control over their body (section 12(2)(b) of the Bill of Rights). There being no express provision in the Marriage Act having the effect contended for by the respondents, why should one be imputed? For the reasons canvassed earlier, it would be against constitutional principle to interpret or apply the express provisions of the Marriage Act in a manner that would undermine, rather than promote the spirit, purport and objects of the Bill of Rights. For all these reasons, I am unable to find a cognisable basis in the facts of this case for interconnecting section 30(1) of the Marriage Act with the implementation of the Alteration Act.

[83] Section 29A of the Marriage Act prescribes the registration of a marriage solemnised under the Act: It provides:

> "Registration of marriages
>
> (1) The marriage officer solemnizing any marriage, the parties thereto and two competent witnesses shall sign the marriage register concerned immediately after such marriage has been solemnized.
> (2) The marriage officer shall forthwith transmit the marriage register and records concerned, as the case may be, to a regional or district representative designated as such under section 21(1) of the Identification Act, 1986 (Act 72 of 1986).[57]"

The only legal and practical effect of registration in terms of section 29A is to create an official record of the solemnisation of the marriage in terms of the Act as an historical fact. I have already discussed the consequential significance of the registration for the workings of the Identification Act. Registration is a matter of record keeping; it has no more bearing than section 30 does on the legal consequences of the marriage.

[84] The respondents' Counsel drew attention to the fact that the marriage certificate and other official forms provided for in terms of the regulations made under the Marriage Act identify the parties as "husband" and "wife", and raised this as presenting a practical difficulty should either of the parties subsequently change their sex/gender. If there is a difficulty, I fail to see why the Minister should not be able to address it by exercising her regulatory powers in terms of section 38(1)(a) of the Act to make provision for an appropriate form to cater for any required amendments to the official records or registers. There is nothing in the Act that prohibits the amendment of records to take account of subsequent name and/or sex/gender details of persons whose marriages were duly solemnised under the statute. The Minister cannot rely on any shortcomings in the regulatory record-keeping mechanisms of the Marriage Act to deny transgendered persons their substantive rights under the Alteration Act, or to frustrate the substantive requirements of the Identification Act. Apart from any other considerations, to do so would be to act inconsistently with her obligations in respect of the provision of effective and coherent government.[58]

57 The obligation imposed on marriage officers in terms of s 29A(2) with reference to the repealed Identification Act, 1986, would fall to be construed, in terms of s 12(1) of the Interpretation Act 33 of 1957, as applicable with appropriate modification with reference to the current Identification Act, 1997.

[85] Turning to the Civil Union Act. Its objects are expressed in the long title, which is repeated in section 2 of the statute, s.v. "Objective of Act", namely, "(a) to regulate the solemnisation and registration of civil unions, by way of either a marriage or a civil partnership; and (b) to provide for the legal consequences of the solemnisation and registration of civil unions". Apart from its provision of a gender neutral marriage formula, there are no pertinent differences between the prescribed formalities in respect of the solemnisation of marriages under the Civil Union Act and those under the Marriage Act. Unlike the Marriage Act, the Civil Union Act deals with the legal consequences of the unions that are solemnised under its auspices. As mentioned, it does so by providing that the legal consequences are the same "with such changes as may be required by the context" as those of a marriage solemnised in terms of the Marriage Act.[59] As discussed, both Acts treat marriage as "a union of two persons, to the exclusion, while it lasts, of all others". There is thus no parallel system of civil marriage, as contended by the respondents; there is only a parallel system for the solemnisation of marriages. The notion propounded by the respondents that there is scope for a "conversion" from one type of duly solemnised marriage to another has accordingly been advanced on a false premise.

[86] Furthermore, the development of our common law of marriage and the associated enactment of legislation enabling the formalisation of same-sex marriage has meant that the difficult socio-political issues identified by the House of Lords as standing in the way of its ability to come to the assistance of Mrs Bellinger,[60] and requiring the attention of Parliament, do not preclude a positive outcome of the application for the applicants in this case.[61]

58 S 41(1)(c) of the Constitution.

59 See s 13 of the Civil Union Act, which has been set out in fn 34 above.

60 See Bellinger v Bellinger fn 5 above.

61 The law has also moved on in the United Kingdom since Bellinger. There has been far-reaching statutory reform. See, for example, the Gender Recognition Act 2004 (c. 7) and The Marriage (Same Sex Couples) Act 2013 (c. 30).

Conclusion

[87] The applicants are entitled in the circumstances to the primary relief for which they have applied. The failure of the Director-General to decide the applications of KOS and GNC under the Alteration Act, alternatively, his effective refusal of their applications amounted to "administrative action" within the meaning of PAJA, and therefore fell, in terms of the principle of subsidiarity, to be challenged in terms of the provisions of that statute. The proceedings were instituted outside the time limit prescribed in terms of section 7 of PAJA and can be entertained only if an extension of time is granted in terms of section 9 of the Act. As mentioned, the applicants have applied for such an extension. The respondents, quite properly in the circumstances, have not opposed the application for an extension of time. The application raises important issues that bear materially on the lives of a section of South African society and on matters of public administration. It would therefore be in the interests of justice that the required extension should be granted. The context also makes it appropriate, to the extent necessary, to exempt the first to sixth applicants from having to exhaust the internal remedies under the Alteration Act.

[88] It is not clear to me that the Department's deletion of the record of the marriage between WJV and the attendant unilateral change of the sixth applicant's surname back to her maiden name is "administrative action". The action was not taken in terms of any law. It was clearly unlawful and falls to be set aside for being in breach of the doctrine of legality. Lest I should be thought to be wrong in this approach, however, I shall contingently, to the extent that may then be necessary, also grant relief in terms of section 9 of PAJA in respect of the challenge mounted against those actions.

[89] The applicants sought an order declaring that the second respondent "does not have the power to delete a marriage from the Population Register, or to alter a spouse's surname because one spouse has successfully applied for an alteration of their sex descriptor in terms of the [Alteration Act]". I am not persuaded that making such an order would be appropriate. The respondents have conceded that the second respondent has no such power and have explained that what happened in connection with WJV's application under the Alteration Act was "a mistake". Similarly, I do not think it to be necessary or appropriate to make an order declaring that the first to sixth applicants' respective marriages are valid marriages in terms of the Marriage Act. It was common cause on the papers that the marriages were valid. The statement by the second respondent that such marriages could not continue to exist if one of the spouses altered his or sex was uttered in the context of his confused and contradictory attempts to explain the Department's understanding of the "intersectional" effect of the Alteration Act, the Marriage Act and the Civil Union Act. I consider that the declaratory orders that will be made will adequately address those aspects.

Orders

[90] The following relief is granted:

1. It is declared, in terms of section 172(1)(a) of the Constitution, that the manner in which the Department of Home Affairs dealt with the applications by the first, third and fifth applicants under the Alteration of Sex Description and Sex Status Act 49 of 2003 ("the Alteration Act") was conduct inconsistent with the Constitution and unlawful in that it:

(a) infringed the said applicants' right to administrative justice;

(b) infringed the said applicants' rights and those of the second, fourth and sixth applicants to equality and human dignity; and

(c) was inconsistent with the State's obligations in terms of section 7(2) of the Constitution.

2. It is further declared that the second respondent is authorised and obliged to determine applications submitted in terms of the Alteration Act by any person whose sexual characteristics have been altered by surgical or medical treatment or by evolvement through natural development resulting in gender reassignment, or any person who is intersexed, for the alteration of the sex description on such person's birth register irrespective of the person's marital status and, in particular, irrespective of whether that person's marriage or civil partnership (if any) was solemnised under the Marriage Act 25 of 1961 or the Civil Union Act 17 of 2006.

3. An order is made in terms of section 9 of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act 3 of 2000 ("PAJA") extending the period within which the first to sixth applicants were permitted to commence proceedings for the judicial review of the second respondent's determination of, alternatively failure to determine, the respective applications submitted by the first, third and fifth applicants in terms of the Alteration Act to the date upon which the current application was instituted.

4. Insofar as might be necessary, an order is made in terms of section 7(2)(c) of PAJA exempting the first, third and fifth applicants from exhausting the internal remedies provided under the Alteration Act.

5. The second respondent's rejection of, alternatively failure to decide, the applications by the first and third respondents in terms of the Alteration Act is reviewed and set aside; and the second respondent is hereby directed to reconsider and, within 30 days of the date of this order, determine those applications in accordance with the provisions of the Alteration Act construed in the light of this judgment.

6. It is declared that the deletion by the Department of Home Affairs of the particulars in the population register compiled and maintained by the Department in terms of the Identification Act 68 of 1997 in respect of the marriage between the fifth and sixth applicants in terms of the Marriage Act, 1961, was unlawful; and the second respondent is hereby directed to, within 30 days of the date of this order, unconditionally, and without derogation from his approval of the fifth applicant's application in terms of the Alteration Act, reinstate on the register the record of the particulars of the solemnisation of the said marriage in terms of the Marriage Act.

ORDER

On application for confirmation of an order of constitutional invalidity granted by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria:

1. The order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria (High Court) on 26 September 2017 in respect of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 is confirmed subject to the variations set out in paragraph 2.

2. The order of the High Court is varied to read:

   "(a) Section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 is declared constitutionally invalid insofar as it automatically converted holders of any deed of grant or any right of leasehold as defined in regulation 1 of Chapter 1 of the Regulations for the Administration and Control of Townships in Black Areas, 1962 Proc R293 GG 373 of 16 November 1962 (Proclamation R293) into holders of rights of ownership in violation of women's rights in terms of section 9(1) of the Constitution.

(b) The order in (a) above is made retrospective to 27 April 1994.

(c) In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, the order in paragraph 2(a) and (b) shall not invalidate the transfer of ownership of any property which title was upgraded in terms of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 through: finalised sales to third parties acting in good faith; inheritance by third parties in terms of finalised estates; and the upgrade to ownership of a land tenure right prior to the date of this order by a woman acting in good faith.

(d) The order in 2(a) above is suspended for a period of 18 months to allow Parliament the opportunity to introduce a constitutionally permissible procedure for the determination of rights of ownership and occupation of land to cure the constitutional invalidity of the provisions of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991.

(e) The first respondent is interdicted from passing ownership, selling, or encumbering the property known as Stand 2328 Block B, Mabopane in any manner whatsoever, until such time as Parliament has complied with the order in 2(a) above.

(f) The third respondent is ordered to pay the costs of the applicant, including the costs of two counsel."

3. The third respondent is ordered to pay the costs of the applicant in this Court, including the costs of two counsel.

JUDGMENT

GOLIATH AJ:

Introduction

[1] Batho botlhe ba tsetswe ba gololosegile le go lekalekana ka seriti le ditshwanelo.[1] All human beings are born free and equal in dignity and rights. Whether in Setswana or in English, this extract from article one of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights is powerful because until 24 years ago it was not true for the majority of South Africans.

[2] During apartheid, the African woman was a particularly vulnerable figure in society and she suffered three-fold discrimination based on her race, her class and her gender. Reflecting upon the present, we must ask ourselves whether the African woman truly benefits from the full protection of the Constitution.[2] Moreover, we must establish whether enough has been done to eradicate the discrimination and inequality that so many women face daily. Laws and policies must seek to do more than merely regulate formalistically. The Legislature is enjoined to ensure that laws and policies promote the participation of women in social, economic and political spheres while also advancing the spirit, purport and objects of the Constitution. This is a case where a woman seeks to vindicate her right to access to housing – a right which is intrinsically linked to her dignity – by challenging a piece of legislation, which she contends perpetuates apartheid legislation that precluded her, and countless African women like her, from holding land tenure rights, simply because of her race and gender.

[3] This case involves this Court exercising its section 167(5) powers,[3] to confirm the order of the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria[4] (High Court), that declared section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act[5] (Upgrading Act) constitutionally invalid, to the extent that it automatically converts holders of land tenure rights into owners of property, without providing other occupants or affected parties an opportunity to make submissions. We are required to deal with three questions. First, whether the High Court order should be confirmed. Second, if the order is confirmed, what remedy would be most just and equitable. Last, how this Court should handle the issue of costs.

Parties

[4] The applicant, Ms Matshabelle Mary Rahube, brings the application in her own interest in terms of section 38(a) of the Constitution, as well as in terms of

[3] Section 167(5) of the Constitution reads:

> "The Constitutional Court makes the final decision whether an Act of Parliament, a provincial Act or conduct of the President is constitutional, and must confirm any order of invalidity made by the Supreme Court of Appeal, the High Court of South Africa, or a court of similar status, before that order has any force."

[4] Rahube v Rahube 2018 (1) SA 638 (GP) (High Court judgment).

[5] 112 of 1991. Section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act reads:

> "Any land tenure right mentioned in Schedule 1 and which was granted in respect of—
>
> (a) any erf or any other piece of land in a formalised township for which a township register was already opened at the commencement of this Act, shall at such commencement be converted into ownership;
>
> (b) any erf or any other piece of land in a formalised township for which a township register is opened after the commencement of this Act, shall at the opening of the township register be converted into ownership;
>
> (c) any piece of land which is surveyed under a provision of any law and does not form part of a township, shall at the commencement of this Act be converted into ownership, > and as from such conversion the ownership of such erf or piece of land shall vest exclusively in the person who, according to the register of land rights in which that land tenure right was registered in terms of a provision of any law, was the holder of that land tenure right immediately before the conversion."

section 38(c) of the Constitution, in the interests of other women who have been deprived of title to their homes by operation of apartheid laws and section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act. The applicant also brings this application in the public interest in terms of section 38(d) of the Constitution.[6]

[5] The first respondent is Mr Hendsrine Rahube, the applicant's brother. The second, third and seventh respondents (state respondents) are the state parties responsible for administering land reform and did not participate in the proceedings before us until this Court issued directions requesting them to make written submissions. These submissions were filed and support the legal arguments advanced by the applicant.

Background

[6] The applicant and the first respondent are siblings who, with other members of their family, moved into a property located at Stand 2328 Block B, Mabopane, North West Province (property) in the 1970s. At the time, the applicant, her grandmother, uncle, three brothers (including the first respondent) and two children all lived at the property. It is common cause that the grandmother was the "owner" of the property until she passed away in 1978. There is no documentary proof of her ownership. It may have been that the grandmother was simply the de facto owner, but the correctness of referring to her as the "owner" is neither here nor there given that the legal regime, as discussed below, made it clear that African women could not obtain formal rights in land because of gender discrimination.

[6] Section 38 of the Constitution reads:

> "Anyone listed in this section has the right to approach a competent court, alleging that a right in the Bill of Rights has been infringed or threatened, and the court may grant appropriate relief, including a declaration of rights. The persons who may approach a court are—
>
> (a) anyone acting in their own interest;
>
> . . .
>
> (c) anyone acting as a member of, or in the interests of, a group or a class of persons;
> (d) anyone acting in the public interest."

[7] The applicant moved out of the property in 1973 to live with her husband. She moved back to the property in 1977 after her marriage dissolved and has lived there ever since with her children and grandchildren. The applicant's brothers moved out of the property between the 1980s and 1990s and her uncle moved out in 2000.

[8] In 1987, the first respondent was nominated by the family to be the holder of a certificate of occupation (certificate) with respect to the property. In 1988, by virtue of his earlier nomination, the first respondent was issued a deed of grant. The deed of grant was issued in terms of Proclamation R293[7] (Proclamation), which was promulgated in terms of the Native Administration Act,[8] that was later renamed the Black Administration Act.[9]

[9] The Upgrading Act was enacted in 1991 but took effect in the former Republic of Bophuthatswana territory, which now forms part of the North West Province, on 28 September 1998 when the Land Affairs General Amendment Act[10] was signed into law. The Upgrading Act automatically converted rights in property, such as deeds of grant, to ownership rights. This meant that the first respondent, as the holder of the deed of grant, automatically became the owner of the property in terms of section 2(1), irrespective of whether he was residing at or using the property.

Litigation History

Magistrate's Court

[10] In August 2009, the first respondent instituted eviction proceedings against the applicant and other occupants of the property in the Garankuwa Magistrate's Court.

[10] 61 of 1998.

The applicant alleges that it was during this period that she became aware that the deed of grant registered in the first respondent's name had been converted into a full right to ownership in terms of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act.

[11] The applicant raised the constitutional invalidity of section 2(1) in opposition to the eviction proceedings. Consequently, the proceedings were suspended pending the outcome of an application in the High Court challenging the constitutionality of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act.

High Court

[12] The application to the High Court was opposed by the first and third respondents. The second and seventh respondents indicated that they would abide by the decision of the court.

[13] The applicant made a number of claims, including that she was the owner of the property in terms of the Restitution of Land Rights Act.[11] The High Court did not order any relief except for that relating to the constitutional invalidity of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act.[12] This was because other relief, such as an order declaring the applicant the owner of the property, may still be available to the applicant and other family members after the finalisation of the constitutionality challenge.

[14] The High Court upheld the applicant's constitutional challenge to section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act insofar as it provides for the automatic conversion of land tenure rights into ownership without any procedures to hear and consider competing claims.[13] The High Court reasoned that people who were not holders of certificates or deeds of grant were prevented from acquiring ownership of properties in which they had a substantial interest. This exclusion was inherently gendered because, in terms of the Proclamation, women could not be the head of a family, and thus, could not have a certificate or deed of grant registered in their name.[14]

[15] The High Court remarked that the Proclamation is characterised by language which is racist and sexist.[15] The Upgrading Act thus recognised and converted rights that had been acquired through a discriminatory legislative scheme. This injustice was compounded by the fact that upgrading was automatic and no review mechanism was created by the Act. The state respondents argued that section 24D of the Upgrading Act provided for an appeal procedure.[16] The High Court found that this section was lacking and did not save section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act from constitutional invalidity.[17]

[16] The High Court therefore held that section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act is inconsistent with sections 9[18] and 34[19] of the Constitution as it fails to protect, notify

[18] Section 9 of the Constitution reads:

> "(1) Everyone is equal before the law and has the right to equal protection and benefit of the law.
>
> (2) Equality includes the full and equal enjoyment of all rights and freedoms. To promote the achievement of equality, legislative and other measures designed to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination may be taken.

> (4) No person may unfairly discriminate directly or indirectly against anyone on one or more grounds in terms of subsection (3). National legislation must be enacted to prevent or prohibit unfair discrimination.

> (5) Discrimination on one or more of the grounds listed in subsection (3) is unfair unless it is established that the discrimination is fair."

[19] Section 34 of the Constitution reads:

and consult with the occupants of a property who do not have a certificate or a deed of grant registered in their name.[20]

[17] The High Court ordered that the declaration of invalidity should apply retrospectively to 27 April 1994. Although in its reasoning the High Court limited the application of this declaration in cases where the property in question has been sold to a third party and where the property has been inherited by a third party in terms of the laws of succession, this limitation was not included in the order.[21] The declaration was suspended for 18 months to allow Parliament time to cure the defect. In the interim, the first respondent was precluded from transferring or otherwise encumbering the property. The Court ordered that the third respondent was to pay the applicant's costs, including the costs of two counsel.

Confirmation

[18] This Court is requested to confirm the order declaring section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act to be constitutionally invalid. In terms of section 167(5) of the Constitution, orders of the High Court and the Supreme Court of Appeal that declare Acts of Parliament constitutionally invalid have no force unless confirmed by this Court. Before confirming such an order, this Court must be satisfied that the impugned provision of the Act is indeed inconsistent with the Constitution.

[19] The applicant argued that this Court should confirm the order of invalidity because the impugned provision of the Upgrading Act violates her right to equality, on the basis of gender and sex,[22] contained in section 9 of the Constitution, her right to

[22] For the purposes of this judgment references to the word "sex" refer to the biological characteristics that define humans as female, male or intersex. This is usually assigned at birth and differentiation between people is made on the basis of external genitalia, chromosomes, hormones and the reproductive system. References to "gender" are references to an identity that can change over time, and that differs from one culture or society to property contained in section 25 of the Constitution and her section 33 right to just administrative action. The reliance on section 33 is a departure from the High Court's findings which were based on section 34 of the Constitution. The first respondent opposed the confirmation proceedings but levelled arguments that, for the most part, spoke to the factual issue of ownership of the contested property rather than the constitutional invalidity of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act.

Interpretation of the Proclamation

[20] The Proclamation was put into force in Bophuthatswana in 1962. It is alleged that the Proclamation only made provision for men to be heads of the family. As a result, the first respondent obtained a deed of grant that was later converted into a right of ownership over the property. During the hearing it was unclear whether the another. Gender is both a social construct and a personal identity. In social terms gender refers to the socially created roles, personality traits, attitudes, behaviours and values attributed to and acceptable for men and women as well as the relative power and influence of each. In individual terms gender refers to the specific gender group with which an individual identifies regardless of their sex. For these definitions see Valdes "Deconstructing the Conflation of 'Sex', 'Gender' and 'Sexual Orientation' in Euro-American Law and Society" (1995) 83 California Law Review 1 at 20 read with fn 46 and 22 read with fn 51. See also Rubin "Notes on the Political Economy of Sex" in Reiter Toward an Anthropology of Women (Monthly Review Press, New York 1975) at 159 for an examination of the way that society transforms biological sex into products of human activity.

The distinction between these terms is recognised by our Constitution. "Gender" and "sex" are treated as two separate and distinct grounds in section 9 of the Constitution. In Woolworths (Pty) Ltd v Whitehead [2000] ZALAC 4, (2000) 21 ILJ 571 (LAC) at paras 73 and 110, differentiation on the basis of pregnancy was deemed to amount to differentiation on the basis of sex, rather than gender. This is because child-bearing relates to the biological make-up of the female sex. In the minority judgment of S v Jordan (Sex Workers Education and Advocacy Task Force as Amici Curiae) [2002] ZACC 22; 2002 (6) SA 642 (CC); 2002 (11) BCLR 1117 (CC) at paras 64-5, it was held that legislation that criminalised provision of sex work is unconstitutional because it discriminates on the basis of gender. There was no distinction made between sex workers who are biologically male or female and so this is not about sex-based discrimination. Rather the criminalisation overwhelmingly affects women because societal norms and patriarchal practices mean that women are more often than not the sellers of sex and not the buyers.

The recognition of the distinction between sex and gender is relatively recent. This judgment recognises that the basis for the impugned legislation was discrimination based on a conflation of both biology and the sociological view of women. Usually attribution of gender roles flows from biological classifications of male or female. The exclusion of women from being the head of the family is based on the social perception of what women can do and how they should behave. This is a sociological phenomenon, not a biological one. For these reasons, this judgment examines the provision using both the grounds of sex and gender in the Constitution but reference will be made predominantly to gender because the overwhelming effect of the impugned provision is to reinforce social rather than biological characteristics attributed to women.

factual situation in areas governed by the Proclamation (TBVC states)[23] was that African women were excluded from holding formal interests in property. This raised a question whether the Upgrading Act has had a genuine discriminatory impact on women. After the hearing, the Court deemed it necessary to direct the parties to file further written submissions on the effects that the Proclamation had on women.

[21] In their submissions, the applicant and the state respondents agreed that women had indeed been excluded from holding the position of head of the family that was a prerequisite for formal titles in land. The first respondent baldly alleges that this was not the case and that the applicant had held the titles to other properties during her marriage. There is no evidence of this. However, the applicant before us claims that she was legally unable to register her interests in the property because only men could be the head of the family. To test this submission, it is necessary to interpret the Proclamation contextually and then establish whether the Upgrading Act, which relies on the position created by the Proclamation, unfairly discriminates against African women.

Historical context

[22] The historical context within which a particular provision operated, or in response to which it was enacted, has been used as an interpretative tool by this Court on a number of occasions.[24] In Brink, this Court recognised that the interpretation of section 8 of the Interim Constitution[25] – now the section 9 right to equality – involved a historical enquiry. This Court held:

[23] "TBVC states" is the common way of referring to Transkei, Bophuthatswana, Venda and Ciskei, which were areas reserved for African people during apartheid and were awarded veiled independence in terms of the Promotion of Bantu Self-Governance Act 45 of 1959 and the Black Homelands Citizenship Act 26 of 1970.

[25] Constitution of the Republic of South Africa Act 200 of 1993.

> "As in other national constitutions, section 8 is the product of our own particular history. Perhaps more than any of the other provisions in chapter 3, its interpretation must be based on the specific language of section 8, as well as our own constitutional context. Our history is of particular relevance to the concept of equality. The policy of apartheid, in law and in fact, systematically discriminated against black people in all aspects of social life. . . . The deep scars of this appalling programme are still visible in our society. It is in the light of that history and the enduring legacy that it bequeathed that the equality clause needs to be interpreted."[26]

[23] African women under apartheid were systemically disenfranchised in a number of ways. It is important to recognise that the pervasive effects of patriarchy meant that women were often excluded even from seemingly gender-neutral spaces. The perception of women as the lesser gender was, and may still be, a widely-held societal view that meant that even where legislation did not demand the subjugation of women, the practices of officials and family members were still tainted by a bias towards men. The prioritisation of men is particularly prevalent in spheres of life that are seen as stereotypically masculine, such as labour, property, and legal affairs.

[24] This Court has recognised the cloaked but ubiquitous nature of patriarchy in the past. In Volks it held:

> "This Court has on numerous occasions stressed the importance of recognising patterns of systematic disadvantage in our society when endeavouring to achieve substantive and not just formal equality. The need to take account of this context is as important in the area of gender as it is in connection with race, and it is frequently more difficult to do so because of its hidden nature. For all the subtle masks that racism may don, it can usually be exposed more easily than sexism and patriarchy, which are so ancient, all-pervasive and incorporated into the practices of daily life as to appear socially and culturally normal and legally invisible. The constitutional quest for the achievement of substantive equality therefore requires that patterns of gender inequality reinforced by the law be not viewed simply as part of an > unfortunate yet legally neutral background. They are intrinsic, not extraneous, to the interpretive enquiry."[27] (Footnotes omitted.)

[25] O'Regan J remarked in Brink that:

> "Although in our society discrimination on grounds of sex has not been as visible, nor as widely condemned, as discrimination on grounds of race, it has nevertheless resulted in deep patterns of disadvantage. These patterns of disadvantage are particularly acute in the case of black women, as race and gender discrimination overlap. That all such discrimination needs to be eradicated from our society is a key message of the Constitution. The preamble states the need to create a new order in 'which there is equality between men and women' as well as equality between 'people of all races'."[28]

[26] Under apartheid, the effects of patriarchy were compounded by legislation that codified the position of African women as subservient to their husbands and male relatives. This context has been acknowledged by this Court on many occasions.

[27] In Gumede, Moseneke DCJ relying on the expert evidence of Professor Nhlapo,[29] stated that:

> "Legislating these misconstructions of African life had the effect of placing women 'outside the law'. The identification of the male head of the household as the only person with property-holding capacity, without acknowledging the strong rights of wives to security of tenure and use of land, for example, was a major distortion. Similarly, enacting the so-called perpetual minority of women as positive law when, in the pre-colonial context, everybody under the household head was a minor (including unmarried sons and even married sons who had not yet established a [29] Professor Thandabantu Nhlapo is an Emeritus Professor at the University of Cape Town. > separate residence), had a profound and deleterious effect on the lives of African women."[30]

[28] Later in that judgment, Moseneke DCJ also relied on the evidence of Dr Claassens,[31] which had been compiled by reviewing authorities and ethnographic material, to demonstrate the manner in which property rights held by African people were distorted in favour of men under apartheid. This evidence advised that—

> "[t]here is a range of historical and ethnographic accounts that indicate that women, as producers, previously had primary rights to arable land, strong rights to the property of their married houses within the extended family, and that women, including single women, could be and were allocated land in their own right. Furthermore there are accounts of women inheriting land in their own right. However, Native Commissioners applying racially based laws such as the Black Land Areas Regulations and betterment regulations issued in terms of the South African Development Trust and Land Act repeatedly intervened in land allocation processes to prohibit land being allocated to women."[32] (Footnotes omitted.)

In both Gumede[33] and the later case of Ramuhovhi this Court noted that the matrimonial property systems that were applied to women in the TBVC states dispossessed them of property rights in favour of the male head of the family.[34] This illustrates two things: a legislative inclination in favour of male property rights holders, and an acknowledgment by this Court that, generally at least, only men were considered to be the head of the family.

Textual reading of the Proclamation

[29] Read in light of the context above, the Proclamation definitely had discriminatory effects on African women. The Proclamation defines "family" in the following way:

> "'Family' in relation to a person, means—
>
> (a) the wife (including a partner in a customary union) and all unmarried children of such person;
>
> (b) all widowed daughters of such person and their unmarried children residing with the said person;
>
> (c) any parent or grandparent of such person, or of the wife of such person, who by reason of old age, infirmity or other disability is dependent on such person; and
> (d) any other person, who in the opinion of the manager is bona fide dependent on such person."

[30] This definition is crafted in gendered terms in that no provision is made for a husband, brother or non-dependent man to be a member of a family, and describes the family only in relation to the head of the family. The Proclamation does not define "head of the family" however, all references to the "head" are made using masculine pronouns. Section 8(1) of Chapter 2 of the Proclamation states:

> "Any person who is the head of a family and is desirous of taking up his residence in the township and of leasing and occupying for residential purposes, together with the members of his family, a dwelling erected by or belonging to the Trust, shall apply for a certificate in respect of such dwelling and of the site on which such dwelling stands." (Emphasis added.)

[31] Similarly, section 9(1) of Chapter 2 of the Proclamation provides:

> "Any person who is the head of a family and desires to purchase from the Trust a site in the township on which he is to erect his own dwelling, or on which a dwelling has been erected by or belonging to the Trust, for occupation by him and members of his > family for residential purposes, shall apply for a deed of grant in respect of such site."

> (Emphasis added.)

[32] On a plain reading of these sections of the Proclamation, it is obvious that it envisages a situation where only men could be the head of the family, with women relatives and unmarried sons falling under their control. It may be argued that the masculine pronouns used in the section should have been read as referring to both men and women.[35] This is not, however, a tenable suggestion.

[33] When the Proclamation is read in the context of the multiple discriminatory statutes that aimed to limit the autonomy of women at the time, it seems unlikely that the Legislature intended that the masculine pronouns should be read to be gender-neutral. Moreover, an examination of the treatment of statutes by the courts illustrates that Judges, in times gone by, even interpreted the seemingly neutral word "persons" to exclude women from its purview.[36] Beyond this context, it is unlikely that male relatives and township officials, operating within a system of patriarchy, which prioritised male interests in spheres such as property, would interpret the Proclamation in favour of African women.

[34] When faced with a challenge to the constitutional validity of a provision in an Act, the Court examining the challenge should ascertain whether it is reasonably possible to interpret the section in a manner that conforms with the Constitution.[37] In this case that would involve reading the Proclamation to have gender-neutral provisions so that section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act, which is based on the Proclamation, is saved from constitutional invalidity. This is not reasonably possible.

[35] Section 6(a) of the Interpretation Act 33 of 1957 states:

> "In every law, unless the contrary intention appears—
>
> (a) words importing the masculine gender include females."

[37] Govender v Minister of Safety and Security [2001] ZASCA 80; 2001 (4) SA 273 (SCA) at para 11.

This interpretation would be unduly strained[38] because it is simply not plausible that the Proclamation was applied in a gender-neutral way during apartheid. To read it as gender-neutral now would not cure the discrimination that occurred previously and, since the Upgrading Act is based on the position as it was during apartheid, would not render the Act constitutionally compliant.

Upgrading Act as a violation of section 9 of the Constitution

[35] The applicant relies on the violation of three distinct rights in her constitutional challenge: equality contained in section 9, property in terms of section 25 and just administrative action in terms of section 33. Because of this there are a few approaches that could be taken in evaluating her claim. We choose to focus the discussion of the invalidity of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act on its violation of section 9. Section 9 in our Constitution not only entitles everyone to equal protection before, and benefit of, the law[39] but also stipulates that the state may take legislative and other measures to protect and advance the rights of disadvantaged persons.[40] Vitally, it further prohibits both direct and indirect unfair discrimination against people on the basis of, inter alia, their gender and sex.[41] Equality, as a cornerstone of the Constitution, best encapsulates the applicant's major concern with the impugned section. Equality also underlies the reliance on the other rights in sections 25 and 33 of the Constitution.

Section 9(1)

[36] Following the test established in Harksen, it must first be held that differentiation between groups has occurred without any rational connection to a legitimate governmental purpose.[42] In this case, the Upgrading Act differentiates between people who were the holders of land tenure rights under apartheid and those who were not, but occupied the property. The practical effect is a differentiation between African men, who could be the head of a family and thus the holder of a certificate or deed of grant, and African women who could not. The state respondents, in their written submissions pursuant to directions from this Court asking for their view on the constitutionality of the impugned provision, agree that section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act is a violation of section 9 of the Constitution, and cannot have a legitimate governmental purpose.

[37] A provision in a statute that differentiates between groups of people but does so without a legitimate governmental purpose will be irrational and unconstitutional due to its inconsistency with section 9(1). This Court has held:

> "In regard to mere differentiation the constitutional state is expected to act in a rational manner. It should not regulate in an arbitrary manner or manifest 'naked preferences' that serve no legitimate governmental purpose, for that would be inconsistent with the rule of law and the fundamental premises of the constitutional state. The purpose of this aspect of equality is, therefore, to ensure that the state is bound to function in a rational manner. This has been said to promote the need for governmental action to relate to a defensible vision of the public good, as well as to enhance the coherence and integrity of legislation."[43] (Footnotes omitted.)

[38] That section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act was not enacted with a legitimate governmental purpose, is underscored by the fact that it also contradicts the overall purpose for which the Upgrading Act was enacted. This Court has held that the purpose of the Upgrading Act was "to provide for the conversion into full ownership of the more tenuous land rights which had been granted during the apartheid era to Africans".[44] The Upgrading Act was part of a scheme of legislation that was enacted to redress the injustices caused by the colonial and apartheid regimes. Land reform was one of the key focus areas of this scheme because the systemic deprivation of the African majority's rights in land and property was a main feature of the apartheid system.

[39] The Upgrading Act relies on the legal position created by the Proclamation in order to establish which rights warrant upgrading. In DVB Behuising, this Court stated with regard to the Proclamation:

> "One is dealing here with legislation that is admittedly racist and sexist and that constituted a key element in the edifice of apartheid. In characterising the proclamation we cannot ignore its history, what it was intended to achieve, and what it actually did achieve."[45]

[40] Similarly, in Moseneke, this Court stated:

> "Subordinate legislation made under [the Black Administration Act] has been referred to as part of a demeaning and racist system, as obnoxious and as not befitting a democratic society based on human dignity, equality and freedom."[46] (Footnotes omitted.)

[41] The Proclamation is subordinate legislation of the kind described above which created land insecurity and made it difficult for people to protect their land, whether from confiscation or from invasion.[47] The Proclamation gave some limited, subservient rights to certain African people, but because of the wording, African women were not included in that group. This position, as the cases above reveal, would certainly be in conflict with the values of the Constitution, like human dignity, equality and freedom, if it was still in force today. Surely a piece of existing legislation that was designed to counteract the effects of the Proclamation but fails will be similarly inconsistent.

[42] In Mabaso this Court was asked to deal with whether the continued differentiation between attorneys enrolled in South Africa and those enrolled in the former TBVC states was justified.[48] The Court found:

> "Ten years into our new constitutional order, citizens are entitled to have any unfairly discriminatory differentiation between the different legislative schemes removed from the statute books. Where it remains on the statute books, victims of the unfair discrimination are entitled to seek and obtain relief."[49]

[43] The Upgrading Act relies, in section 2(1), on the legal position created by an unjust Act. This highlights the distinct lack of a legitimate governmental purpose in the section. Section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act automatically upgraded titles, such as certificates and deeds of grant, into ownership rights. In doing this, it reinforced the position created by the Proclamation. During apartheid African women were not entitled to hold land tenure rights and under the Upgrading Act's dispensation their vulnerability was compounded as they did not have the opportunity to register their interests in a property before the title was automatically upgraded in favour of the male head of the family.

[44] This lack of a legitimate governmental purpose for the provisions of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act is thus irrational. The section is constitutionally invalid due to its inconsistency with section 9(1) of the Constitution. The section does not pass this lowest threshold of constitutional scrutiny.[50]

[45] In view of this it is unnecessary to delve much deeper into the alleged violation of other rights, but it will be helpful to explain that this discriminatory irrationality would have been even more difficult to overcome where the threshold constitutional standard is higher than mere rationality.

Section 9(2) and 9(3)

[46] Section 9(2) states that legislative and other measures may be taken to protect or advance persons, or categories of persons, disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

[47] The automatic upgrading of land tenure rights amounts to indirect differentiation by the state between men, who could hold these titles and women, who could not. In terms of Harksen, because the differentiation takes place on two specified grounds – gender and sex – it will amount to discrimination.[51] Similarly, it will be presumed to be unfair.[52] There has been no evidence to the contrary presented and the presumption of unfairness is further bolstered by the vulnerable position that African women have occupied for generations. Thus, section 9(3) has also been infringed.

[48] The Upgrading Act was a legislative measure taken in terms of section 9(2) of the Constitution to advance the rights of persons disadvantaged by unfair discrimination.

[49] Section 25(5) of the Constitution provides that "the state must take reasonable legislative and other measures, within its available resources, to foster conditions which enable citizens to gain access to land on an equitable basis". The quest to enable citizens equitably to access land must include attempts to strengthen rights in land that were previously held, such as the informal right that the applicant holds through her lengthy occupation of the property in question. The Upgrading Act, which took effect in Bophuthatswana in 1998, is a piece of legislation which speaks to the fulfilment of the state's section 25(5) obligation. Parliament failed, however, to act positively to ensure that the gender discrimination perpetuated by the Proclamation did not taint the equitable provision of property. Moreover, it only recognised and strengthened rights that were formally held, neglecting the countless holders of informal rights or interests in property.

[50] Section 25(5) creates a justiciable socio-economic right to gain access to land on an equitable basis. The Upgrading Act amounts to a step taken by Parliament in an attempt to foster the realisation of that right. It is a well-established principle of this Court that when evaluating the measures taken by the state in relation to socio-economic rights, those measures must pass the constitutional standard of reasonableness.[53] In Khosa, this Court held that the context of each case is vital in determining the reasonableness of a measure taken. This, the Court established, was best achieved by looking at the purpose for which the measure was pursued.[54]

[51] The mischief that the Act was created to rectify was to provide for recognition and security of rights that had previously been ignored or systemically devalued.[55] A reasonable step to ensure equitable access to land must do something to counteract pre-existing inequitable access. Otherwise, as in this case, it leaves intact inequity. The automatic upgrading of land tenure rights does not achieve this purpose because it excludes African women from the benefit of legal protection. If anything, entrenching an apartheid position would be the exact opposite of what the legislature sought to achieve with the Act rendering it an unreasonable legislative measure in terms of section 9(2).

Review procedures

[52] The applicant alleges that the failure to provide a forum for review of the various putative rights that may exist in a property before upgrading takes place renders section 2(1) constitutionally non-compliant. The High Court upheld this challenge by stating that this failure violated the applicant's right of access to courts in terms of section 34 of the Constitution. It further held:

> "[T]he lack of notice of the conversion, and the absence of a procedure for raising issues with the conversion of land rights into ownership, defies the audi alteram partem principle (that all parties be given the opportunity to respond to evidence)."[56]

[53] Before this Court, the applicant abandoned the section 34 challenge and instead based her final constitutional challenge to the Act on section 33 of the Constitution, which enshrines the right to just administrative action.

[54] We are not convinced that section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act violates section 33 of the Constitution. It is clear that the upgrading takes place automatically and therefore by operation of law. Thus, no decision is taken by an administrator and no administrative action has occurred. The legislative functions of Parliament are explicitly excluded from the definition of administrative action by section 1(b)(dd) of the Promotion of Administrative Justice Act[57] (PAJA).

[55] It is not necessary, however, for this Court to determine whether there has been a violation of either section 33 or 34 given that section 2(1) has already been impugned using section 9 of the Constitution. However, an examination of the review mechanisms, or lack thereof, for section 2(1) automatic upgrades also lends itself to the conclusion that the section 9 discrimination perpetuated against women is unfair and not rationally connected to any legitimate governmental purpose.

[56] Unlike other provisions in the Act, section 2(1) does not contain an internal review mechanism. While section 3(1)(a)(i) provides that land tenure rights in Schedule 2 of the Act will not be converted to a right of ownership unless the Minister is satisfied that the interests and rights of putative holders are protected,[58] the applicant in this case is left with only section 24D to protect her rights.

[57] The first respondent alleges that this section safeguards the rights of putative holders and thus, saves the Act from constitutional invalidity. However, section 24D does not adequately protect the applicant's rights or those of women in a similar position. In terms of section 24D(10)(a) any person who is aggrieved by an entry made in a register of land rights (which constitutes the formal recognition of the ownership right) may appeal to the Minister within 30 days of becoming aware of the entry, but not more than one year after the entry was made.[59]

[58] It is not uncommon for pieces of legislation that allow for the review of decisions or procedures to contain time-bar clauses such as this one.[60] Section 24D

[58] Section 3(1)(a)(i) states:

> "Where the State is the owner of an erf or piece of land situated outside a formalised township, the relevant land tenure right need not be converted into ownership, and a deed of transfer shall not be submitted unless—
>
> (i) the Minister is satisfied, on the basis of a report by a person assigned or appointed by him or her, that the rights or interests of putative holders are being protected."

[59] See above n 16.

[60] See for example section 7(1) of PAJA which states:

> "Any proceedings for judicial review in terms of section 6(1) must be instituted without unreasonable delay and not later than 180 days after the date—
>
> (a) subject to subsection (2)(c), on which any proceedings instituted in terms of internal remedies as contemplated in subsection (2)(a) have been concluded; or
> (b) where no such remedies exist, on which the person concerned was informed of the administrative action, became aware of the action and the reasons for

does not, however, allow for the condonation of the late filing of an appeal. This initial injustice is compounded by the fact that the section does not establish any procedure by which affected parties are notified of the automatic upgrading of the right. Resultantly, parties who have interests in property may only discover years later that the ownership of that property has been registered in the name of the holder of a deed of grant. As is evident in the case before us, these parties cannot then rely on section 24D to protect their rights because they are barred from bringing appeals more than a year after the right was registered.

[59] It is further worth noting that section 24D only makes provision for an appeal after the right has been registered in the applicable registry. In the case before us counsel for the applicant stated that there was no evidence that the right had been registered. However, registration is not a prerequisite upon which the validity of the right to ownership is premised. Instead, in terms of section 2(2) of the Upgrading Act, registration simply gives effect to the right that was automatically created by section 2(1). It seems likely that there may be cases like this one, in which the registration of the right cannot be located in the registry. Here, the "protections" in section 24D would be of little assistance as the appeal procedure is only against an entry made in a register, and not against the automatic upgrading of the initial right.

Just and equitable relief

[60] In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, once a declaration of invalidity is made, a Court may make any just and equitable order.[61] This includes

---

it or might reasonably have been expected to have become aware of the action and the reasons."

[61] Section 172(1)(b) states:

"When deciding a constitutional matter within its power, a court—

(b) may make any order that is just and equitable."

making an order limiting the retrospective effect of the order or suspending the declaration of invalidity to allow Parliament to rectify the inconsistency.[62]

Retrospective effect

[61] The High Court held that the order of invalidity should apply retrospectively to the date of the enactment of the Interim Constitution – 27 April 1994. In the High Court the applicant argued that it should instead be declared invalid from the date that the Upgrading Act was enacted in 1991. In this Court, however, the applicant abandons this argument in favour of the High Court's determination. In confirming the order of the High Court, it is important to recognise that the retrospective effect of this order is crucial to the effective protection of women's rights.

[62] A prospective order would not protect the rights of the applicant before us, nor would it provide relief to women in her position. Moreover, this Court cannot condone more than 20 years of discrimination brought about by the legislation by relying only on a prospective order of invalidity. With this principle in mind, one might ask how we can condone the nearly three years of discrimination that persisted between the enactment of the Act and the coming into operation of the Interim Constitution. This is certainly an issue that troubled Kollapen J in the High Court. However, the impugned provisions of the Upgrading Act only became constitutionally inconsistent, and therefore invalid, when the Interim Constitution came into force.[63] It would not, therefore, be just and equitable, nor indeed sensible, to extend the effect of the declaration of invalidity beyond 27 April 1994. The order of retrospectivity made by the High Court should thus be confirmed.

[62] Section 172(1)(b) states that a just and equitable order includes:

>
> (ii) an order suspending the declaration of invalidity for any period and on any conditions, to allow the competent authority to correct the defect."

[63] Ramuhovhi above n 34 at para 57.

Limited retrospectivity

[63] This aspect is not without its difficulties. More than 20 years have elapsed since the enactment of the Upgrading Act and in that time the advancement and protection of women's rights have made significant strides. This means that in some instances property ownership which was obtained through the operation of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act may have ended up under the legal control of African women. This could be for a number of reasons, including because of judicial intervention which prevents gender discrimination in intestate succession as in Bhe,[64] or indeed through the financial empowerment of women that has allowed them to purchase property in their own name.

[64] This Court must be cautious not to create new and different injustices in our attempt to remedy the one perpetrated by section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act. This Court is, therefore, empowered under section 172(1) of the Constitution to make an order limiting retrospectivity. In Ramuhovhi, this Court held that one of the factors that must be considered when limiting retrospectivity is the disruptive effect that unlimited retrospectivity would have. It further stated:

> "Limiting retrospectivity helps 'avoid the dislocation and inconvenience of undoing transactions, decisions or actions taken under [the invalidated] statute'. Currie and De Waal state that the disruptive effects of an order of retrospective invalidity must be balanced against the need to give effective relief to the applicant and similarly placed people."[65]

[65] All the parties before us agree that certain disruptions would occur if the order of retrospectivity is unlimited. The High Court identified two groups of people who should be excluded from the effect of retrospectivity. Those people were third parties who had, in good faith, purchased property which title had been upgraded in terms of section 2(1) and persons who inherited such property in terms of the law of succession.[66] The second category was further restricted so that this limitation only applies to estates that had been finalised. The High Court held that in both of the above categories, a transfer of property would not qualify for the exception if a party had been on notice that the property was the subject of a dispute.[67]

[66] We agree with the High Court's limitations on retrospectivity. In the past 20 years the position of women in society has improved and the alienation of property in sexist ways has largely been declared unconstitutional.[68] Moreover, it is imperative that this Court does not disrupt the South African property scheme by making an order that would impact substantially on the financial interests of buyers, sellers and banks who acted in good faith by relying on a law that they thought was valid.

[67] This may appear to be harsh treatment of women who have already faced the consequences of property in which they have an interest being alienated. However it is the established jurisprudential position of this Court that "as a general principle . . . an order of invalidity should have no effect on cases which have been finalised prior to the date of the order of invalidity".[69] This has been applied both to criminal matters and to the finalisation of estates in terms of the law of succession even where the effect of those cases was discriminatory. The Court aims, as far as possible, to avoid injustices being perpetrated both against the victims of an impugned provision, and against parties who acted in good faith in terms of the provision. But it is impossible to craft a perfect remedy. There may be other avenues of redress available to affected women based on the specific facts in each of these finalised cases. These cannot however arise as a result of this declaration of invalidity. This Court recognised in De Lange that it is a lesser evil for a constitutional violation to go without compensation than to impose monetary liability on a person who, knowingly or not, relied on what she thought to be a valid law.[70]

[68] We do, however, believe that the list of exceptions provided by the High Court should be extended. Women who, through a stroke of luck or another unforeseen event, obtained a title in property which was upgraded to an ownership right in terms of the Act should not have these titles nullified by virtue of this declaration. We do not have before us concrete factual evidence of the full effect that the Proclamation, and therefore the Upgrading Act, had on the rights of women. While it is clear from the submissions made by all parties that many women were denied the right to register their interests in property by virtue of their gender, we cannot conclusively say that no woman obtained a title at any point. The ground on which we are declaring section 2(1) invalid is that it does not take reasonable steps to ensure access to property on an equitable basis and that the Upgrading Act perpetuates discrimination against women in contradiction to the Act's stated aims. However, in instances where this injustice has been organically rectified, to allow this to be reversed would be exceptionally dislocated from the social context within which the Act operates.

[69] Therefore, the retrospective declaration of invalidity does not apply to cases where women had their titles upgraded by section 2(1) of the Act, nor does it apply to finalised estates where the property has been inherited by a third party acting in good faith, nor, finally, to cases where the property has been transferred to a third party through a final and valid alienation process.

Suspension of the declaration of invalidity

[70] As the High Court found, the effects of this declaration of invalidity may be far-reaching, with effects on groups beyond those explicitly excluded from the retrospective order. Parliament is in a far better position than this Court to conduct the necessary factual enquiry to establish the full extent of redress demanded. Moreover, the unconstitutional effects of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act cannot be remedied by a simple reading-in exercise. The best way to go about achieving this cannot be determined by this Court. The order suspending the declaration of invalidity for 18 months should be confirmed.

Interim relief

[71] To ensure that the applicant is given effective relief pending Parliament curing the constitutional defect in the Upgrading Act, the High Court ordered that the first respondent be interdicted from passing ownership, selling, or encumbering the property in any manner whatsoever. The High Court also protected persons who might be vulnerable to wrongful evictions or bad faith transactions utilising unconstitutionally conveyed property rights by stating that nothing prevented them from approaching a competent court for interim relief similar to that awarded to the applicant. Both of these pronouncements are sensible and provide adequate protection for the time being. Therefore, the order of interim relief is also confirmed.

Costs

[72] The applicant successfully challenged the constitutionality of section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act in the High Court. As a result, costs were awarded against the third respondent, the Minister for Rural Development and Land Reform, who opposed that application. This was because of the Minister's role as the state authority responsible for the effects of the legislation. The applicant was not successful with her claim against the first respondent because the High Court opted not to pronounce on this dispute. The general rule that costs should follow a successful result was applied and the applicant was ordered to recover all of her costs from the third respondent while the first respondent paid his own costs.[71] There is no reason why this costs order should be overturned.

[73] It is the norm to award costs in favour of a successful applicant for a confirmation. The third respondent did not participate in these proceedings until responding to this Court's directions issued after the hearing. Their response to these directions was useful and illustrated that the Minister no longer opposed the confirmation of constitutional invalidity. This fact is not, however, sufficient to justify this Court's deviation from the principle relating to successful confirmation proceedings.[72] In terms of Biowatch, "[t]he primary consideration in constitutional litigation must be the way in which a costs order would hinder or promote the advancement of constitutional justice".[73] It is clear that "[t]he state is under an ongoing constitutional obligation to respect, protect, promote and fulfil the rights in the Bill of Rights by ensuring (inter alia) that legislation which violates constitutional rights is amended or replaced".[74] The state failed to enact legislation that allows for the equitable distribution of land and the redress of gendered discrimination that occurred during apartheid. In the circumstances the Minister should pay the costs of the confirmation proceedings. The first respondent should bear his own costs.

Conclusion

[74] During apartheid it was not true that all persons were born free and equal in dignity and rights. The oppression that the system meted out was felt no more acutely than by African women. They were relegated to the status of perpetual minors, often forced to work in the unregulated domestic care sector to look after children who were not their own, and they were prevented from owning property which left them permanently dependent on the male heads of their families to access the basic protection that a home provides. Twenty-four years into democracy, a piece of legislation that reifies the factual position created by a racist and sexist apartheid Act cannot pass constitutional muster. The Upgrading Act, in its attempt to redress one injustice, exacerbated another. When enacting remedial legislation, Parliament must be aware of the historic omnipresence of patriarchy which will otherwise undermine even the noblest of legislative endeavours. In conclusion, section 2(1) of the Upgrading Act is constitutionally invalid insofar as it solidifies the position created by apartheid legislation which excluded African women from the property system and resulted in discrimination on the basis of sex and gender in terms of section 9 of the Constitution.

Order

[75] The following order is made:

1. The order of constitutional invalidity made by the High Court of South Africa, Gauteng Division, Pretoria (High Court) on 26 September 2017 in respect of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 is confirmed subject to the variations set out in paragraph 2.

2. The order of the High Court is varied to read:

   "(a) Section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 is declared constitutionally invalid insofar as it automatically converted holders of any deed of grant or any right of leasehold as defined in regulation 1 of Chapter 1 of the Regulations for the Administration and Control of Townships in Black Areas, 1962 Proc R293 GG 373 of 16 November 1962 (Proclamation R293) into holders rights of ownership in violation of women's rights in terms of section 9(1) of the Constitution.

   (b) The order in (a) above is made retrospective to 27 April 1994.

   (c) In terms of section 172(1)(b) of the Constitution, the order in paragraph 2(a) and (b) shall not invalidate the transfer of ownership of any property which title was upgraded in terms of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991 through: finalised sales to third parties acting in good faith; inheritance by third parties in terms of finalised estates; and the upgrade to ownership of a land tenure right prior to the date of this order by a woman acting in good faith.

(d) The order in 2(a) above is suspended for a period of 18 months to allow Parliament the opportunity to introduce a constitutionally permissible procedure for the determination of rights of ownership and occupation of land to cure the constitutional invalidity of the provisions of section 2(1) of the Upgrading of Land Tenure Rights Act 112 of 1991.

(e) The first respondent is interdicted from passing ownership, selling, or encumbering the property known as Stand 2328 Block B, Mabopane in any manner whatsoever, until such time as Parliament has complied with the order in 2(a) above.

(f) The third respondent is ordered to pay the costs of the applicant, including the costs of two counsel."

3. The third respondent is ordered to pay the costs of the applicant in this Court, including the costs of two counsel.

ORDER

On appeal from the Supreme Court of Appeal (hearing an appeal from the High Court of South Africa, Western Cape Division, Cape Town), the following order is made:

1. Leave to appeal is granted.
2. The appeal is upheld.
3. The orders granted by the High Court and Supreme Court of Appeal are set aside.

4. It is declared that clause 7 of the will of the late Mr Carel Johannes Cornelius De Jager and the late Mrs Catherine Dorothea de Jager dated 28 November 1902 is inconsistent with the Constitution and the Promotion of Equality and Prevention of Unfair Discrimination Act 4 of 2000, and therefore unenforceable.
5. The costs of Mr James King shall be paid from the estate of Mr Kalvyn de Jager.
6. There shall be no order as to costs in respect of other parties.

JUDGMENT

MHLANTLA J (Khampepe J, Madlanga J and Theron J concurring):

Introduction

[1] This matter concerns a will that was executed over a hundred years ago. It is common cause that a clause in a will, which contains a fideicommissum substitution,[1] discriminates against female descendants. At its core, this application concerns a novel issue whether and to what extent a court may encroach on freedom of testation, through the vehicle of public policy, in the context of private wills with unfair discriminatory bequests against unknown descendants on the sole basis of immutable characteristics. This matter calls on this Court to grapple with the perplexing question how to reconcile the fundamental right to equality and the primacy of freedom of testation in the context of

[1] De Waal and Schoeman-Malan Law of Succession 5 ed (Juta & Co (Pty) Ltd, Cape Town 2015) at 147-8 defines a fideicommissum as:

> "A legal institution in terms of which a person (the fideicommittens) transfers a benefit to a particular beneficiary (the fiduciary or fiduciaries) subject to a provision that, after a certain time has elapsed or a certain condition has been fulfilled, the benefit goes over to a further beneficiary (the fideicommissary or fideicommissarius)."

private wills. This question must be answered through the lens of public policy against the backdrop of our constitutional democracy.

[2] The applicants seek leave to appeal the decision of the Supreme Court of Appeal, which dismissed their application for declaratory orders that would grant them the entitlement to certain fideicommissary property.

Background facts

[3] On 28 November 1902, Mr Karel Johannes Cornelius De Jager and Mrs Catherine Dorothea De Jager (the deceased's grandparents) executed a joint will[2] (will) in terms of which they bequeathed various properties, including farming properties, to their six children – four sons and two daughters, subject to a fideicommissum.[3] One of their sons Cornelius, had three sons: Corrie, John and Kalvyn (deceased). The first to third respondents are John's sons. Mr Kalvyn de Jager died testate on 5 May 2015. He had no sons but left five daughters (the second to sixth applicants). His daughters had four sons – the fourth to eighth respondents (deceased's grandsons).

[4] The fideicommissum was governed by clause 7, which provided:

> "With respect to the bequest of grounds/land to their sons and daughters, as referred to under Clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4 of this, their Testament, it is the will and desire of the appearers that such grounds/land will devolve, following the death of their children, to said children's sons and following the death of the said grandsons again and in turn to their sons, in such a way that, in the case of the death of any son or son's son who does not leave a male descendant, his share/portion will fall away on the same conditions as above and therefore pass to his brothers or their sons in their place and in the case of the death of a grandson without any brothers, to the other Fidei Commissaire heirs from the lineage of the sons of

[2] Last Will and Testament dated 20 November 1902.

[3] The children of the deceased's grandparents were Gabriel, Carel, Cornelius, Arnoldus, Johanna and Georgina.

> the appearers by representation, in continuity, and in the case of the death of a daughter or a daughter's son without leaving a male descendant, her or his share will fall away in the same way and on the same conditions, and go to the other daughters or their sons, by representation, of the deceased's son's brothers or their sons "per stirpes", respectively."[4]

[5] In terms of the will, beyond the first generation, the fideicommissary property would, as far as the second and third generations were concerned, not devolve upon their female descendants. The deceased was the last grandson of the testators in respect of whose estate a fiduciary asset from the original will fell to be dealt with. The substitution of the estate following his death will thus be the last substitution.

[6] When Mr Cornelius de Jager died, his sons (including the deceased) each became fiduciary heirs to a one-third share in the farms subject to clause 7. The eldest son, Corrie, died childless. His one share in the properties devolved in equal shares to his two surviving brothers, John and the deceased. When John died in 2005, his share of the properties devolved upon his three sons. It is clear that until the death of the deceased the terms of the fideicommissum were interpreted in light of clause 7. They limited the fideicommissary beneficiaries to the sons of the testators' children and, thereafter, their sons. The clause was interpreted as not applying to any female descendants of the testators.

[7] Since the deceased had no male descendants, a problem arose after his death in 2015. The first applicant, Mr James King, was appointed as one of the six co-executors in the deceased's estate. The co-executors received three claims against the fideicommissary properties. The first was by the deceased's daughters, who claimed that the terms of the clause were discriminatory because female descendants were excluded from inheriting. Thus, they were entitled to inherit from their father's estate. The second was lodged by the first to third respondents, who relied on the terms of clause 7 and contended that since the deceased had no sons, the fideicommissum devolved on them. The third was lodged by the deceased's grandsons, who contended that if their mother's claim of unfair discrimination did not succeed, clause 7 of the will should be interpreted in such a way that the property devolves on them, as the deceased's male descendants (his grandsons).

Litigation history

High Court

[8] As a result of the conflicting claims, the first applicant launched an application in the High Court[5] and sought directions on how to deal with the fideicommissary properties. He supported the contention by the deceased's daughters that certain portions of clause 7 unfairly discriminated against them on the grounds of gender and sex. He thus sought an order declaring the offending portions of the will invalid. He also sought amendments that would have the effect of amending the will to include a provision that would enable the female descendants or daughters to inherit the fideicommissary properties.[6]

[9] The High Court noted that it was common cause between the parties that the terms of clause 7 were discriminatory against the female descendants of the testators.[7] That Court considered the key tension to be whether this discrimination raised an issue of public policy that warranted intervention by a court to strike out or amend the impugned provision of the will. In doing so, the High Court considered several cases dealing with public charitable testamentary trusts and the right to equality in the new constitutional era.[8]
